HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

FIRST SESSION—TWENTY EIGHTH PARLIAMENT

17 ELIZABETH II

VOLUME V, 1969

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE TWENTY FIRST DAY OF JANUARY 1969
TO THE EIGHTEENTH DAY OF FEBRUARY 1969, INCLUSIVE

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

THE QUEEN'S PRINTER, OTTAWA, 1969

29180—288½

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, January 21, 1969

The house met at 2 p.m.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

GRAIN

VANCOUVER, B.C.—REQUEST THAT STEPS BE TAKEN TO EXPEDITE SHIPMENTS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question, preferably to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, or the Minister of Agriculture. I ask whether in light of the continued congestion at Vancouver, which according to the January 17 market letter of James Richardson and Sons Limited—this was only last week—caused the loss of an additional 17,000-ton wheat sale to Japan, the minister could tell the house what concrete steps the government is taking to move the requested grade of grain to the ships waiting in Vancouver harbour?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am in no position to comment on the allegation that a sale to Japan was lost because of this situation; I would have to check. But I have already explained to the house that we are confronted in Vancouver with a situation that results from weather conditions, obviously, also from the desire to ship to terminal elevators for drying purposes as much damp grain as possible, and finally from the growth, unexpected in some cases, of exports. As I indicated before, and as my hon. friend knows, sales that were to be made by the United States to Japan have been made by Canada. This has created a situation in Vancouver from which we are trying to get out. All efforts are being made by the transportation committee and its subcommittee in Vancouver to remedy the situation as quickly as possible.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I do not make any comment on the explanation given by the minister with regard to why we are in this position. I would like to ask the minister whether he would take an early opportunity, this week I would hope, to spell out the concrete action the government is taking and proposes to take to meet the difficulty in which it finds itself. I am not asking the minister to explain now why we are in this position, but I ask whether he will make a statement on motions as to what concrete action the government proposes to take to get the western farmer and the country out of this difficulty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that all possible steps are being taken. I have also recognized that a serious situation was created by the causes that I have also indicated. A few days ago the hon. member for Mackenzie came into the house with statistics, saying that there were 1,000 fewer car loadings as compared to the same period last year. I have checked on that, and find it is not the whole truth. The whole truth is that cars loaded for Vancouver—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the minister would not agree that we are becoming involved in debate. My understanding of the question asked by the Leader of the Opposition was whether a statement would be made on motions.

Mr. Stanfield: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In other words, I am asking the minister whether he will tell the whole truth, including the concrete steps that the government proposes to take to deal with this problem.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): A supplementary question to the minister, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether the minister would go out west and really see the conditions on the prairies today, in order to realize the awfulness of the situation. I ask him at the same time whether, in view of the high authority of James Richardson and Sons Limited, he would consult the Minister without Portfolio from Manitoba and learn something about the wheat situation.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Mackenzie rising on a point of order?

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Yes, Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I believe it is also a question of privilege because the minister suggested I came into the house with some untrue figures. I received those figures from the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and, if he likes, I am prepared to give him this information.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, on this matter of ships in the Vancouver harbour, may I ask the minister, in view of the information which I received only yesterday from the harbourmaster of Vancouver to the effect that the number of ships awaiting cargo has now reached such proportions that 16 have had to be anchored in English Bay, and not in the inner harbour, whether for reasons of public relations, he would consult with the Minister of Transport to consider the possibility of foregoing the $2,500 a day demurrage on ships held there through no fault of their own?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I have looked back at the record for former years and I have found that even when the situation was far from being as dramatic as it is now, requests were being made for the payment of demurrage by the Canadian government; so this situation is not new. What I am saying, however, is that short of going there myself and administering the port of Vancouver, and dealing with box car assignments myself, which would be highly undesirable, the government has done everything that needs to be done to ensure that the work is being carried out by the proper authorities, and by people who know about transportation and about port operations. I think that is all the government can be asked to do.

To come back to the point made by the hon. member for Mackenzie, I did not say that he did not tell the truth. I said that the statistics he used were good statistics but that they gave a wrong impression of the facts. It is true that the carloadings are down by 18 per cent, but one must consider how this figure comes about—

Mr. MacEwan: Go back to the university and start lecturing there again.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would he consider doing what has been done before, that is appoint an individual or a controller who would go to Vancouver to co-ordinate the activities there?

Mr. Pepin: I have already answered this question five times. The reason I gave for not agreeing is that if a single man is appointed to do that job, every group might dump their problems on him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pepin: Instead of appointing one man we have appointed a transportation committee which brings together all the interested parties. A subcommittee has been formed in Vancouver to take care of that particular problem and the members of the subcommittee are the representatives of those who have an interest in and a knowledge of the problems. They are doing their best to get out of a very unhappy and difficult position.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that some of the ships in Vancouver harbour have been tied up for over a month, and in view of the many other difficulties involved in grain movement and handling over the past several months, will the government give consideration to the appointment of a grain controller to co-ordinate as well as to control and oversee all aspects of the grain situation?

Mr. Pepin: It would be desirable that members of a particular party co-ordinate their questions first.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce which I put previously to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister or officials of the department concerned considered the possibility and feasibility of diverting trainloads of drying grain to alternate sea ports and simultaneously diverting some of the ships? I am thinking of the ports of Prince Rupert and Seattle. Is the government looking into the feasibility of doing this?

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member suggested yesterday that we should use the ports of Seattle and Prince Rupert. I find that transportation costs to Seattle would be altogether in excess of what is acceptable. The dryer at Prince Rupert is being fully utilized at present. Ships will be diverted to Prince Rupert as quantities of dry grain accumulate at that port.

THE MINISTRY

REQUEST THAT CHANGES BE MADE

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): I would like to direct my question to the Prime Minister. I wonder if the Prime Minister would consider—and I say this seriously and not argumentatively—changing ministers and appointing in the place of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) or the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson), someone with greater knowledge of the subject?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: I will bring the matter up again at ten o'clock.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I would rather hear it now than at ten o'clock.

[Later:]

Mr. Woolliams: On a point of order. I do not know whether Your Honour noticed, but the Prime Minister wished to answer my question. In fact, he did answer it, but at that time there was a little noise in the house. I think he took the question seriously. He wants to answer it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the Prime Minister should give an answer to that question.

FINANCE

SUGGESTED BANK ACT AMENDMENT TO CONTROL INTEREST RATES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. In view of the statement made in a speech by the Governor of the Bank of Canada last night or some time yesterday to the effect that the changes in the Bank Act had apparently benefitted the banks more than the public, may I repeat a question which I have put to the hon. gentleman before, but in this new context? Is he prepared to consider amending the act in order to provide some control over the level of interest rates in Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all, I am not sure the Governor of the Bank of Canada said exactly what the hon. member has implied he said. I shall be pleased to send over a copy of the speech. In the second place, the last parliament decided to lift the interest ceiling under the Bank Act and the government is not at present considering opening up that legislation.

THE BUDGET

TIME OF PRESENTATION—POSSIBLE DELAY IN TAX STRUCTURE LEGISLATION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, connected with the general position. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether a report to the effect that there will not be a budget this spring is correct, and, if so, whether this means that legislation to alter our tax structure will also be delayed, and will not be before the house during the present session.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I hardly think those are supplementary questions. They are two very important separate questions. First, with respect to the budget. My prime concern at present is to get the budget presented on October 22 cleared up in the House of Commons. What I said was that if conditions remain as they are now it may not be necessary to present a budget this spring. This will of course depend on the accuracy of the economic forecast, which we are looking at very closely and which is under continuous review. Then again, it will depend upon whether expenditures and revenues are relatively close to what were forecast.

With regard to the other question on the subject of tax reform, I have indicated, I think in answer to the Leader of the Opposition, that our present schedule suggests that a draft bill on tax reform will be presented to the house in June.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it, then, the view of the minister that the economy of the country must be very strong indeed before it can stand two budgets of this government in a year?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker, I think—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is argumentative.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): A further supplementary question. I should like to ask the Minister of Finance quite earnestly whether he would not consider producing a white paper with regard to tax reform prior to introducing the bill, on the ground that once the government introduces legislation even in draft form it seems to be committed to it. Would the minister not agree that a white paper might lead to more effective consideration and better results in the end?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Benson: The reason I indicated we would introduce a draft bill is that people could then take a look at it and assess the implications of the various changes on the remainder of the tax legislation. I have also indicated that the draft bill would be referred to a committee of the house, and that the government would not be bound to the ideas presented in the draft bill, but would feel free to change any of them if it were convinced by representations to the committee that such changes were in the interest of the people of Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question with respect to the date of a budget, but may I direct it to the government house leader. In view of the fact that one of the principal changes that we made in our rules was to provide for a certain orderliness in our parliamentary year, which envisaged the budget coming in the spring, will the government house leader discuss this matter with the Minister of Finance? Does he not agree that if the budget is put off until the fall it will mess up the first full year that we had planned to be on a regular basis?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly be discussing with the Minister of Finance the question of the timing of the budget in the forthcoming session; that is the session following this one.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

A few minutes ago the minister was referring to a taxation reform and to the preliminary draft of a bill. Since there cannot be taxation without money, could he not at the same time consider a monetary reform, when the preliminary draft of the bill is studied?

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): A supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister not agree that his budget of October 22 was a deferred budget and would normally have been presented in May of that year had there not been an election? Would he also not agree that the economic state of the nation should be reported to the country this spring, rather than at some indefinite date in the future?

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, it would be my intention on appropriate occasions to keep the members of the house informed, as they desire, with regard to the economic state of the nation. As I have said, if there are any material changes from what I forecast in my budget of October 22, I will have no hesitation in coming back to the House of Commons with a budget. This does not necessarily mean there will be tax increases, but I would explain to the House of Commons the changes that have taken place, if they are materially different from what I forecast in October.

ESTATE TAX ACT

PERMISSION TO THOSE ADVERSELY AFFECTED TO APPEAR BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the very large volume of correspondence which has been received by the government and by all members of this house from those who are concerned with what they consider will be the adverse effects of the government's proposed estate tax legislation, will the minister use his good offices to assure those representing particularly the large groups, who feel they will be adversely affected by this legislation that they will be allowed to appear before the Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs to express their views, before the matter comes before the house for judgment?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been a good deal of correspondence with respect to the proposed changes in the estate tax legislation, which I maintain will over-all be beneficial to the people of Canada. All such correspondence is being answered. In addition to this, I have provided information to all members of the house so that they can deal with correspondence they may have received in this regard.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question. I think the minister will agree that his department has never received—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member can ask only a supplementary question; he cannot make a supplementary statement.

Mr. Hees: In view of the great importance of this matter to a great many citizens of this country, would the minister use his good influence to see that those representing these large and importantly affected groups are enabled to appear before that committee and give testimony?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, who appears before the committee is up to the committee, not the Minister of Finance. However, I can assure my hon. friend that I will provide hon. members with all the information they desire in regard to the changes to the Estate Tax Act. I think it might also be wise if some people who are making statements in connection with this matter would properly inform themselves before so doing.

Mr. Hees: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is this the Prime Minister's idea of the government having a dialogue with the people of Canada to find out their views on important questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT FOLLOWING MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL MINISTERS

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport about the important meeting the government house leader said the minister had the other day with the provincial ministers on the subject of highway safety. Could the minister make a statement about the outcome of that meeting, and about plans and decisions made with regard to highway safety?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the most significant aspects of the meeting were reported in the press release. I do not know if my friend has had a chance to see it; if not, I shall be glad to send him a copy of it. In effect, the provincial governments welcomed a role for the federal government in research, in co-operation with the provinces. Furthermore they welcome the idea, if it should meet with the approval of the government and parliament, of our introducing legislation designed to control the standards of automobile manufacture at the manufacturers' level. It was a most productive meeting and, I think, a good step in the direction of close and harmonious co-operation between federal and provincial levels of government in this most important area.

NATIONAL PARKS

QUEBEC—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Having mentioned several times that Quebec had no federal park, while the federal government has spent $225 million in the other States during the past ten years, the minister told me that negotiations were taking place and that he might make a statement later on.

I would like to ask him now whether negotiations are still in progress between the federal government and the province of Quebec regarding the planning of those federal parks, how far they have gone, and if there is disagreement, what is it about, as it seems that everybody is anxious to get an answer on the subject?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that we made a concrete proposal to the government of the province of Quebec in October 1968; we are still expecting its reply.

As for us, we are ready to proceed.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a supplementary question.

I thank the minister for his answer, and I would like to ask him whether Quebec has acknowledged the offers made by federal government, and what they were.

Mr. Speaker: The supplementary question is of a general nature, it seems to me. I do not feel it is very urgent; the hon. member could put it on the order paper. If it is urgent, he could discuss it on the adjournment motion.

Mr. Fortin: At ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In the interests of higher education would he identify the "pip squeak" universities he recently referred to?

An hon. Member: Is that a degree?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether the question as asked is in order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I think it is a very important question. Since this government is supposedly doing all it can to support education in this country and since the Prime Minister has taken it on himself to refer to our universities as "pip squeaks", I think for the sake of our students he ought to identify the universities he referred to.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

FISHERIES

ACTION TO ASSIST EAST COAST GROUNDFISH INDUSTRY

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Is he now in a position to announce government policy on the form of interim assistance for our east coast groundfish industry, as promised before Christmas?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for St. John's West asked a similar question on Friday and my parliamentary secretary took it as notice. Actually, within the month we will be outlining the short, medium and long term development program for the groundfish industry in the Atlantic region. One of the main objectives of this program will be to ensure that the prices paid to fishermen will be maintained at or about the 1968 level. Measures to be taken will include loans, which will help to improve the efficiency of the groundfish industry and make all phases of the industry more attractive from the income point of view.

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF SALT FISH MARKETING CORPORATION

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the discussion on January 16 regarding the setting up of marketing boards, could the minister say when the government will be in a position to announce that a salt fish marketing corporation will be set up?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this matter is under active discussion and I will be discussing it with the representatives of the Newfoundland trade and federation of fishermen very shortly.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SYDNEY, N.S.—REPLACEMENT OF CAR SHOP

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the loss by fire of the Canadian National car shop at Sydney has the minister, in the interests of continued efficiency and employment, made strong representations to the management of the C.N.R. to have the shop replaced as quickly as possible and, if not, would he give the house an undertaking to take this step at the earliest possible opportunity?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to pass along the hon. member's representation to the management of the railway.

AIR TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE FATIGUE FACTOR IN JET PILOT OPERATIONS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, last week in a number of questions undertakings were sought of the Minister of Transport by myself, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax (Mr. Forrestall) concerning long hours of flying by Air Canada pilots operating passenger jets. The minister undertook to reply to all those questions some time this week. Is he now in a position to answer, in view of the inherent great dangers to the travelling public?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have received a considerable amount of information since that time, but in respect to the one particular question asked by the hon. member the information supplied to me is incomplete and I would prefer to have time to get the supplementary data required before answering.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the limitations in that respect contained in the aeronautics legislation, concerning the hours of work within which air crews must limit themselves, is there any disciplinary action or criminal proceedings contemplated against anyone for the breach of those regulations or laws?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, first of all I must deny the allegation, and then go on to say that if the hon. member was talking about the hours of work, there was not a breech of regulations but in respect to the conditions under which the landing in question took place, it is a different matter and disciplinary action was taken in the United States by the licensing authorities. In addition we suspended the licence here of the company involved for a period of time, until satisfactory assurances could be given that in future regulations would be observed.

With respect to the hours that a pilot may operate or be on duty, I may say these were worked out by the Department of Transport in co-operation with the air lines and the Air Line Pilots Association. It is now some time since they were agreed to and I understand they are presently being reviewed, with the prospect of revisions based on the experience gained since the time they were first agreed to.

Mr. Nesbitt: Would the minister give an assurance that as of now Air Canada pilots are not continuously on duty for more than 17 or 21 hours at a time?

Mr. Hellyer: That is part of the question the hon. member asked before, Mr. Speaker, and I would like to reply at once and give that assurance. Certainly I can in respect to the way the hon. member posed the question the other day, but I would like to have the total information rather than reply piecemeal.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING SELF-GOVERNMENT

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In light of the current meetings of the Northwest Territories Council will the minister soon be in a position to tell us that he will be able to make an announcement about government policy regarding self-government in the territories?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I have taken a decision on this matter and submitted a proposal to the cabinet. I hope it will receive approval within the next weeks and I expect to be in the Northwest Territories, to announce the new policy, in early February.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INDIAN AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF POLICY RESPECTING CLAIMS

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian and Christian Affairs of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Dumont: Does anybody question that he is a "Christian?"

In view of the claim filed by the Indians on 85 per cent of the Quebec territory, what is the attitude of the government and his department about this?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, this claim was sent to the Quebec government and it will have to give an answer, favourable or not. This is not my problem at this time.

[English]

YUKON TERRITORY

REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT RESPECTING FORM OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary question to the minister with respect to the forthcoming reforms which he is going to announce regarding the form of government in the Yukon Territory. Is it his intention to announce those reforms within the next week or two, or to wait until the Sourdough Rendezvous that he will be attending in Whitehorse at the end of February?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I intend to be there, and I hope the hon. member will be present also.

As for the policy regarding the Yukon, I shall not proceed with its implementation before I have announced that of the Northwest Territories.

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

TABLING OF STANBURY-FIELD REPORT ON INDIAN TAXATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and refers to the question I put to him last Friday, which he took as notice. Is the minister now in a position to state when he will be tabling the Stanbury-Field report on taxation of Indians?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, we received that report in September. That document was prepared for the exclusive use of the department.

We are now studying this report. I do not think that we are in a position to table it now, considering that the document deals with taxation among the Indians in British Columbia and includes confidential details on certain individuals. We are studying the scope of that report. It might be possible some day to disclose its nature in the House of Commons.

We might also give new directives to the committee, because the information provided is not entirely satisfactory.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, inasmuch as this report has a direct bearing on the current negotiations between the government and the provincial health and welfare ministers, with respect to Indian Health and Welfare Services, could the minister expedite this matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that we are trying to act as quickly as possible in order to get a true picture of the situation regarding the taxation of Indians.

[English]

IMMIGRATION

STATUS OF CZECHOSLOVAK REFUGEES PROGRAM

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. Will the minister assure the house that the termination of the special Czechoslovak refugee program on January 10 does not refer to applications by persons from Czechoslovakia who are genuine political refugees?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the announcement terminating the program was an announcement with respect to the special program that had been in effect for a period of some months for Czechoslovak refugees. The normal refugee principle is still in operation for persons from that country and indeed all countries.

[Translation]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

REQUEST TO RE-EXAMINE POLICY

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Postmaster General.

Does he think it is possible to review the standards that determine the closing of post offices at the present time?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

PROCEDURE

RECONSTITUTION OF COMMITTEE—TELEVISING OF PROCEEDINGS OF STANDING COMMITTEES AND HOUSE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council in his capacity as government house leader. In constituting or reconstituting the Committee on Procedure and Organization will he give consideration to suggesting the inclusion in its terms of reference of the possible position regarding the installation of radio and television in the standing committees, and/or in this chamber, with a view to this matter being given full consideration and with the possibility of a recommendation being made to the house?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I will consider that suggestion, Mr. Speaker, and discuss it with my colleagues. In connection with the committee, I might say that we hope at an early date to have from hon. gentlemen opposite a list of their nominees to the committee and we will discuss with them broader terms of reference, along with those discussed on December 20 in relation to the proceedings of the house.

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In view of the statement made by Mr. Dozois, the Quebec Minister of Finance, to the effect that he would have requested a meeting with the Minister of Transport in connection with the selection of a site for the new international airport, can the minister tell the house whether he has set the date of that meeting?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, Mr. Dozois' telegram was in reference to a further meeting with Mr. Lussier to continue the discussions undertaken some months ago with respect to a site for the new Montreal international airport. I indicated to Mr. Lussier in December that it would only be after the first of the year the government would have available to it the information required to continue with these discussions, and that I would advise him some time in the new year when a meeting would be possible. Subsequently we have been able to arrange a mutually convenient time for a meeting and I hope we will be able to come to some meeting of minds in the not too distant future, so that a definitive choice can be made by the government to enable us to go ahead with the airport.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I take a brief moment to bring to the attention of hon. members that we will be running short of time very quickly. I ask the co-operation of hon. members to give as many members as possible an opportunity to ask questions. I would suggest that the questions be short, that there be not too many supplementaries and that the answers also be brief.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: I should like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Could the minister tell us whether, in his opinion, Mr. Dozois' statements are of a personal nature or if they would commit the Québec government?

Mr. Speaker: I do not believe the question to be in order.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport.

In view of the fact that we have learned from authorized sources, in fact from a Quebec government publication, that the government of that province was recommending the south shore of the St. Lawrence river for the site of the future international airport, does the federal government intend to abide by the Quebec government decision to choose the south shore as the site for the new airport?

[English]

Mr. Hellyer: The ultimate choice is one which must be taken by the federal government, which has the primary responsibility in these matters.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: I do not think it would be helpful for me at the moment to enter into a discussion concerning the relevant merits of the different sites proposed, because I really feel that would not be in keeping with the agreement we made with the government of Quebec some weeks ago that we would carry on discussions at a technical level before reaching a decision and making our decision public. So I would prefer not to comment on the statement of the hon. member.

FISHERIES

LOBSTERS—APPEAL COMMITTEES TO REVIEW APPLICATIONS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct this question to the Minister of Fisheries. The minister announced that, effective immediately, an upper limit will be placed on the number of boats permitted to fish for lobsters in the maritime provinces in 1969. In view of new lobster fishermen who may be desirous of entering the industry, will the minister indicate what steps have been taken to establish local appeal committees to review applications of boat owners.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking a question which is lengthy and which should be made on motions. I wonder whether he might like to ask the minister to make a statement on motions.

[Later:]

Mr. Crouse: In view of Your Honour's ruling, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he would be prepared to make a statement tomorrow on motions concerning the question I raised.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): I certainly would, Mr. Speaker, but I think the press release I made yesterday covers this matter. There will be appeal committees in each of the provinces.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Prime Minister.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Many people across this nation are perturbed owing to the fact that he, in an interview while overseas, made a statement that he was in favour of true communism. Would the Prime Minister tell the house how much difference there is between true communism and that behind the iron curtain.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

OPPORTUNITIES FOR UNEMPLOYED TO IMPROVE TECHNICAL SKILLS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In view of the increased level of unemployment, and in view of the urgent necessity that some of those unemployed obtained upgrading in technical skills, can the minister say whether or not there are additional funds available to those provinces which wish to improve their facilities for technical instruction.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL SECURITY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. When will the right hon. gentleman be able to table the expurgated copy of the report on security procedure.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The report is now being reviewed by the relevant government people. We are attempting precisely to find out what part of this report should be deleted, in conformity with the guide lines I laid down in an earlier statement.

FARM CREDIT ACT

ALLEGED AMBIGUITY OF GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that increased funds were made available under the amendment to the Farm Credit Act in order to set up economic farm units, and in view of the fact that the proposed changes in the estate tax are in direct conflict with this principle, will the minister consider a promotion for one of the ministers so that we will know what the policy is?

FISHERIES

CONSULTATION RESPECTING LIMITATION OF BOAT LICENCES

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Fisheries. Could the minister advise the house to what extent consultation was held with the fishermen in connection with the limiting of boat licences which was announced yesterday.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): A good deal of consultation, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

MACFARLANE TASK FORCE—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON FARM INCOME AND PRODUCTIVITY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. Some time ago it was suggested that the MacFarlane task force on agriculture would report before next year. I wonder when we will have a final report from that task force.

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there will be no final report until the end of 1969. Indeed there never has been an indication that there would be. We have asked for interim reports on certain parts of their studies so that these reports could be used as position papers for the agricultural congress which is to be held in Ottawa late in March. I believe some of these have been received and will be circulated. They will be distributed to the interested parties, the delegates to the congress. I see no reason why members of parliament could not have them as soon as they are distributed.

[Translation]

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question with regard to the future international airport.

I should like to know if the report of the study made by the federal-provincial committee on the subject has been forwarded to the Minister of Transport or if this study is not yet completed?

[English]

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I have two or three reports now. I am in the process of digesting them all.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PATENT ACT—TRADE MARKS ACT

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY TO GRANT LICENCES

The house resumed from Monday, January 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Basford for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of Bill C-102, to amend the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act and the Food and Drugs Act.

• (2:50 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I would like to elaborate briefly on the statement I started on yesterday.

Though we agree that this legislation will have an antimonopolistic effect, we want to emphasize that it does not go far enough; it is merely a poultice. To the small taxpayer, it will feel like a light tranquilizer. At first, he will believe the price of drugs has suddenly gone down only to discover in the end that big business in the drug industry has managed once more to by-pass the law and maintain the extravagant prices we know at present.

It is a shame to take advantage of the unhappy circumstances of disease to make profits. Therefore the government should be afraid to compel all the people responsible for producing and consuming food and drugs to act fairly and above-board. Retail prices should be relevant to cost prices. The true cost of drugs should not be altered. An end should be put to the collusion that is prevalent between doctors and pharmacists.

And, above all, doctors should stop their practice of selling to their patients the drugs offered free by drug manufacturers.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we should seriously consider, endowing the citizen with a greater buying power so that he may freely obtain whatever is essential to the maintenance of his health.

A healthy people within a healthy government, that would be the ambition of any Créditiste administration.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this bill with mixed feelings about its provisions. At the outset may I say I agree with the remarks of my colleagues who spoke earlier in this debate and with the feelings of a large number of people outside the house. The bill is in effect a faltering and insufficient step in the right direction. I think that most, if not all, hon. members agree there is a need for legislation of this kind. The need for a bill of this kind is very apparent. In the manufacture, distribution, promotion and particularly the cost of drugs we have a classic example of the failure of so-called private or free enterprise. I say there has been a failure in the sense that these companies have failed the people of this country but have succeeded in their own purely selfish aims. They have succeeded in their goal of making a profit but they have failed miserably to provide service at low cost to the sick of Canada.

My opinion that there is immorality on the part of enterprises of this kind is, I think, shared by some. Any enterprise that engages in making a profit out of the misfortunes of others is basically immoral. For the benefit of one hon. member on the opposite side of the house who rose to dispute with me about profits on an earlier occasion, let me say categorically that this is one instance where profits should be prohibited because they are immoral. Profit-making or the receiving of a reasonable return on investment is a privilege in our society, not a right. I believe that these companies in the so-called free enterprise drug industry have so outrageously abused this privilege that they now deserve the condemnation of the public and the intervention, supervision and control of the government.

Much has been said about foreign drug companies. On the one hand a great deal has been said by the so-called Canadian drug industry, particularly during a fear campaign some years ago, to the effect that there is something bad about foreign drugs. There was a great fear campaign about safety, control and so forth. My fears are not the same as some of those expressed by proponents of the pharmaceutical industry. Mine are more related to the international take-over and control of the Canadian industry.

The Toronto Globe and Mail of August 13 last, after examining one of Canada's totally Canadian owned and independent drug manufacturers—compared with other drug industries it is one of the smallest in Canada—pointed out that in the past decade the following has happened to Canadian drug companies: Charles E. Frosst Company of Montreal has been taken over by Merck Co. Inc., New Jersey, Elliott-Marion Co. Ltd. of Montreal by American Home Products, Ayerst-McKenna and Harrison of Montreal by American Home Products, Frank W. Horner of Montreal by Carter-Wallace Incorporated, New York, and L. D. Craig of Toronto, Bell-Craig Pharmaceuticals, by the Denver Chemical Manufacturing Company of Stamford, Connecticut. It seems hardly valid for the drug industry to express the hope that the government and the Canadian people will worry about impure and inadequate drugs being brought in from foreign countries when at the same time it expresses no concern about the foreign take-over of Canadian drug companies.

It is rather strange that some foreign drug companies which were alleging that Canada could receive impure and unsafe drugs from those countries have seemingly banded together with the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association of Canada. The president of that association—a noted columnist said he is a much-travelled master of the graceful phrase—was in Stockholm last summer to meet with drug corporations of other countries. As a result we now have an international cartel, about which my colleague the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) spoke last night.

One of the objectives of this international organization, as outlined by Dr. Wigle, is to:

—promote the development of ethical principles and practices throughout the pharmaceutical industry.

Perhaps it is pure coincidence, but among Ottawa lobbyists the term "unethical practices" usually means price-cutting. When this industry speaks of ethical practices it seems to me all one can say is that it shows the ethics of a tomcat in the way in which it has exploited the sick, the chronically ill and the injured in this country in respect of the prices of drugs. This organization should be the last to talk about ethics.

I suggest to the minister that this bill does not go nearly far enough. The minister and the government of Canada cannot by themselves deal with this international association. The minister and the government will only be able to deal with this international association is consort with the governments of other countries. A Canadian law by itself will not be sufficient to regulate, scrutinize and oversee this industry. It is my hope that the minister and his officials will maintain constant consultation with their equivalents in European countries and in Japan where the manufacture and export of drugs represents a fairly substantial operation.

There is another factor that causes me to wonder just how enthusiastic and wholehearted the government is about drug prices. I point out that while the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, (Mr. Basford), who I am sure is very concerned about this matter and will be very diligent and enthusiastic, will be implementing a piece of legislation designed to reduce drug prices by a variety of mechanisms, another department will be helping the industry. In other words, while he is trying to restrict, control and supervise the drug industry, certainly in respect of costs, one of his colleagues will be aiding the industry.

With regard to the pharmaceutical industry development assistance program, commonly known as PIDA, I should like to quote the minister's words of last October 17 as recorded in Hansard at page 1511:

The pharmaceutical industry development assistance program, which is administered by the Department of Industry, is a direct loan program designed to strengthen and improve the efficiency of the sector of the pharmaceutical industry which manufactures and sells prescription drugs at lower prices. These companies, most of which are Canadian owned, engage in or are prepared to engage in, effective price competition against the international drug firms.

I do not very often find myself in agreement with Mr. Western, a columnist of some note, but in the Winnipeg Free Press of last April he commented at some length on this program and I find myself in agreement with most of what he said. If the government is so anxious to restrict, control and supervise the drug industry, that is, Canadian and international drug companies, I hope that in the implementing of the PIDA program the minister will persuade his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) to use great discretion as to which companies qualify for loans from the Department of Industry.

I ask the minister to urge upon his colleague that all United States owned Canadian subsidiaries be excluded from this program. I say this because I notice that in the speech in Hansard, part of which I have just quoted, the minister qualified his remarks by saying that most of these companies were Canadian owned. I hope he will persuade his colleague the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to go farther and provide that only Canadian owned drug companies shall qualify for such assistance and that no assistance shall be available to United States subsidiaries or subsidiaries of any foreign owned company. I do not think these corporations warrant any concern by the government as to their welfare. They are hardly candidates for the poor-house. If investment is needed in Canada for drug research and production at competitive prices, or opportunities therefor, I submit that these international companies have adequate finances of their own and can raise the money here or in their own countries. They, least of all, warrant any consideration by the government and the Department of Industry.

My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), who began the debate for our party, listed five areas in which this party believes the government should be taking action in addition to the steps it has proposed in the bill. I should like to review these areas quickly without going into matters already covered. We hope the minister will look seriously at all five of these proposals. If he finds he is unable to agree with them now or is unable to persuade his colleagues to agree with some or all of them, we hope that as the months go by he will be able to implement some and eventually all of them.

Our first point is that we should abandon brand names for all new drugs and generic names should be applied to all new drugs being developed for sale in Canada or brought into this country. Again, I find it incomprehensible that those who promote the best interests of the pharmaceutical manufacturing industry should have waged a scare campaign about generic drugs being unsafe or cast doubt upon their quality, while at the same time competent institutions and people connected with them, private and public hospitals and federal and provincial governments, continually purchase drugs in large lots by their generic name. I suspect that their efficacity has been proven to be even better than that of brand name drugs.

Our second point is that the minister should persuade his colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to place a maximum of 10 per cent of total sales on the allowable tax deduction for advertising and promotion expenses incurred by drug companies and related industries. In my opinion even this limitation is too generous, but that is the proposal of our party.

Third, we suggest—this is an area that the minister himself can deal with through his department—that drug advertising be strictly scrutinized and controlled as to its claims and the manner in which it is presented to the public. As all of us in this house know, this has been a major factor in the ever increasing cost of drugs.

The fourth point we make is that the minister and his department should require the drug manufacturing industry to submit regularly and often standard cost reports for all new drugs, particularly those for which projected or expected sales are over $500,000 a year. Again, I believe this is a little too generous and that standard cost reports should be obligatory in respect of the development, production and eventual sale to the public of all new drugs no matter what their projected or anticipated sales may be. It seems to me this would provide the minister and his department with excellent information as to how to implement this and any other legislation that may be brought before us in the future. This should be a requirement and should develop into a standard practice as between the industry and the minister's department.

The fifth point is that raised by my colleague the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman). He dealt with it very well the other evening and therefore I need not repeat what he said. It is that the government should establish a crown corporation to manufacture and sell a limited number of the more important prescription drugs, probably somewhere between 15 and 30 of the most commonly used and most basic drugs of the prescription industry.

I repeat in this regard what I said earlier, that it seems to me the making of profits from the misfortunes of people who become sick is immoral. Surely this is a proper and logical place for a government business or crown corporation no matter what party happens to be in office. It is a perfectly logical and justifiable area for government intervention in the business world, not only to serve as a check upon the remainder of the industry but also to show these companies how to provide safe drugs to the sick at the lowest possible cost and without unconscionable profits and improper and false advertising.

The same column by Mr. Western in the Winnipeg Free Press to which I referred quotes the former minister regarding patents in these words:

> When the patent on terramycin recently expired in England, the drug appeared under a brand name at one-third the price charged by the original manufacturer. On chloromycetin in the United States, the reduction in the same circumstances was almost 50 per cent. It is noteworthy too that where there is effective competition, as in the case of hospitals, which buy on a tendering system, remarkable savings emerge. Thus a cortisone preparation selling at $17 per 100 units to Saskatchewan retailers was obtainable by hospitals and government departments at the price of $1.95—

In assessing royalties for compulsory licences, the commissioner (in Canada) will not, as in Britain, take into account expenditures on research, development and promotion. An important reason is that the manufacturer introducing a new drug secures, under the food and drug regulations, a five-year monopoly which should be adequate to ensure a reasonable return on research.

If the manufacturer is given a five-year monopoly for research, development and promotion, then he should be required by law to file complete information on his costs to be recovered. This will serve as a check on the price he wishes to charge and will enable the government to check him if he seeks to engage in unreasonable and unconscionable pricing within the five-year period which he has to recover these costs. Just giving these manufacturers a blanket five years without knowing what is involved in the make-up of these prices certainly leaves the door ajar, if not wide open, to going to every possible length—I will not say to cook the books—to exaggerate or enlarge these so-called costs of research, development and promotion to maximize profits.

I shall support this legislation even though I am convinced it does not go nearly far enough. Once it has been in operation for a year or at most two if as a result of that experience the members of this group are shown to be wrong and that the legislation has actually been effective in reducing and controlling drug costs, we will be only too happy to have been wrong. But if such proves not to be the case I hope the minister, who I am convinced, as I said earlier, is deadly serious about this matter and is enthusiastic and vigilant, will then proceed very quickly to bring additional legislation into the house that will go even farther than the legislation he is proposing now.

I repeat that in principle this is an area of enterprise in our society where the profit motive has no rights, no privileges and no business, and I hope that the measures that the government is proposing now and those they will introduce in the near future will go even farther to put an end to social need being made use of by those who place profits first and service to the people second.

[Mr. Benjamin.]

Mr. Raymond Rock (Lachine): Mr. Speaker, on February 13, 1968, I had the opportunity of speaking on Bill C-190 which is now being presented as Bill C-102 with minor changes. I have no intention of repeating what I said then. However, those who may be interested can find my speech in Hansard of that date at page 6698. At that time I stated that now that the bill's contents were known all people who will be affected should have the opportunity to appear before a committee and that the bill should be sent to a standing committee in order to give those who are interested the opportunity to be heard.

In accordance with the new rules adopted by parliament, this bill automatically goes to a standing committee. However, I feel that those who are interested may not be given the opportunity to be heard, and I would like the minister to give us the assurance that at least the representatives of the pharmaceutical industry of Canada will be heard, as well as all other interested witnesses. It has been stated that the representatives of the pharmaceutical industry have already appeared before the special committee on drug costs and prices headed by Dr. Harley and therefore nothing new could be added. However, at the time they appeared the recommendations on which the legislation was based were not known, and now that the contents of the bill are known the people affected should have the opportunity to appear before the standing committee.

There are many new members in the house since the last election who are unaware of the complications which this legislation will create for the industry and the effect it will have on some segments of the Canadian economy. Many Canadians feel that drugs are priced too high, and I believe that ways should be found to reduce these prices. I believe this could be achieved by convening a federal-provincial conference on drug prices to find a proper solution to this problem.

I am in favour of increased competition. The greater the competition, the greater the pressure on high prices. I believe that this legislation will not bring this about. What it will do is to bring in outside competition, imported competition, competition by importation. It will bring competition based on lower foreign wages. This legislation looks good on the surface. However, the so-called competition that exists in Canada is the same competition that exists outside Canada, and to allow finished patented drug products into this country is not detrimental to the companies themselves but rather to the thousands of Canadians employed by these internationally owned companies.

What this legislation is actually doing is to favour the owners of these internationally owned drug companies by giving them carte blanche to become importers of drugs. In the past they were forced to manufacture patented drugs in Canada. Now they will have the opportunity to choose whether they should continue to manufacture in Canada or simply import these drugs into Canada from their foreign, home-based parent companies.

From page one, column six, of the Montreal Star of January 18, 1969 I quote the following paragraph:

> Ayerst, an American drug firm, is a classic case. It has decided not to extend its Montreal plant. It has located in Rouses Point, just across the border, in the United States. Quebec nationalism is a factor, but so is the probability of enactment of a federal drug bill which the company fears would inhibit their operations in Canada.

Actually the company had a choice between extending the Montreal plant or extending the plant at Rouses Point. It chose Rouses Point. Other drug companies have held back decisions affecting their plants until the outcome of this bill is known.

I do not believe the solution is to import drugs as finished products in dosage form. Most of the pharmaceutical firms are internationally owned; they hold patent rights in all countries. The effect, therefore, of allowing importations as proposed in Bill C-102 would be seriously detrimental to all Canadians employed in Canada by these internationally owned companies. Why should such companies employ people in Canada, or expand their production in Canada, if they are able to export drugs to this country from their home bases? As I have indicated, these firms hold patent rights in all countries. Solutions must be found in Canada itself to force these internationally owned firms to reduce their prices. Otherwise, many Canadians who are now employed will be looking to the United States for jobs in the future.

The international pharmaceutical firms which have established themselves in Canada pay municipal taxes, school taxes and corporation taxes. They have formed a community in which many persons in their employ pay income tax, sales tax, school tax and property taxes. They pay sales taxes on all building materials used in the construction of their premises as well as on their sophisticated machinery and laboratory equipment. They are responsible for tax revenues which are badly needed for the expansion of our municipalities, our educational facilities and the economy generally. I point out that when we import pharmaceutical products these taxes and revenues are no longer available and that the effect is therefore detrimental to the expansion of the Canadian economy, detrimental to the expansion of our municipalities, to the improvement of our schools and to the growth of our labour market.

The importation of drugs would lead to a reduction in Canadian supplies and halt the expansion of the pharmaceutical industry here. Some firms may discontinue production altogether and disappear, like elements of the textile industry, to become importers and distributors rather than manufacturers.

The provisions in this legislation having to do with the importation of finished drug products will, to my knowledge, not succeed in reducing the prices of drugs. In the event, they would confront the drug industry and its employees with precisely the same problem as was created for the Canadian textile industry and its employees by the relaxation of duty on textile imports. I do not believe prices of drugs will be reduced at the retail level.

In its attempt to reduce drug prices some time ago the government removed the 12 per cent sales tax, an action which resulted in the loss of some $20 million in revenue. There is still no sign that the prices of drugs have been reduced at the retail level. On the other hand there is a definite indication that the government felt obliged to raise the income tax in order to replace the $20 million. Even if we remove the total net profit of this industry, the prices of drugs will not be reduced. I point out that the federal government received more revenue from the pharmaceutical industry in taxation than the industry made profit.

I hope that during its consideration of this measure the committee will hear witnesses from the drug industry, from the Department of Labour, from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, from the Department of Manpower and Immigration, from the Department of National Revenue and from the Department of Finance in order to assess the effect of this legislation on the economy, on the budget, on industrial expansion, on future employment, on revenues, and so on.

After hearing these witnesses, I hope the committee will attempt to estimate the effect on the present budget of the removal of the 12 per cent sales tax from drugs, and the impact the proposal to import manufactured drugs is likely to have on our total tax revenues and, in particular, on tax revenues flowing to municipalities and school boards. If committee members examine the figures in this connection I doubt that they will recommend the provisions dealing with the importation of finished drugs.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, if we refer to the official report of the House of Commons Debates for October 17, 1968, we find the speech of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), concerning this Bill No. C-102, to amend the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act and the Food and Drugs Act. The minister expressed then his point of view on the results that the proposed amendments would have for the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker, I shall be frank and say that I do not consider this bill in the same way as the minister; therefore, I am not as optimistic as he is. If we base our considerations on what we already know, that is if we stop for a moment to examine our personal experience—or to make a few comparisons in the light of the briefs and reports that have been filed, we reach the conclusion that we are facing an important monopoly which, in my opinion, originated under the present legislation. The unimportant amendments contained in the present bill will not change anything. Therefore, when the minister states, as reported in the Hansard of October 17, at page 1515, and I quote:

—the drug industry differs uniquely from other industries.

I quite agree with him. That industry differs from other industries first because the aim has been diverted from its end, and experience has taught me that drugs have served more often to enrich than to cure. First, at the manufacturing level, that industry fixes selling prices which are not proportional to costs.

I had a translation made of a few pages of the book of a serious and famous author, Mr. Stevenson, in which he mentions some extraordinary costs and prices relative to Canadian drugs. He says that profits made on some drugs range between 26,000 and 28,000 per cent.

[Mr. Rock.]

An employee who holds an important position in that industry told me last year that certain pills which sold wholesale in the United States for $3.00 per thousand retailed in Canada at $5.50 for 50.

This was not an accident or a mistake since most of the drugs are manufactured in the United States by parent companies, then shipped to our country. Their branches pack, bottle these products and label them with rather pompous names. In fact, 5 per cent only of the drug patent rights belong to Canadian residents while we import 85 per cent of the raw material necessary for the production of drugs used on the Canadian market.

In the field of information, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the rather scarce details available on pharmaceutical products are sent to hospitals, doctors and druggists, it is not surprising that the names on the labels of the drugs are meaningless for the ordinary customer. The names and the labels are totally beyond our understanding; however we have every reason to believe that these customers are not always obtaining the best quality products.

At this stage, Mr. Speaker, I should like to emphasize a significant point: certain officers, responsible for the administration of the Food and Drugs Act are not choir boys and unfortunately sometimes carelessness prevails over a sense of responsibility.

A druggist, the owner of a rather large establishment employing 15 people, told me recently that no inspector had visited his establishment for the past 26 months. He could have sold anything in perfect peace of mind.

As far as the work at the plant is concerned, the same situation prevails. The inspectors in charge of controlling the finished products are away more often than they should and the manufacturer is only too glad to be allowed to select himself the samples which are necessary to insure the prosperity of that industry in Canada. And yet the analysis of those samples should protect the health of all Canadian citizens.

We are facing a tricky problem, and I say it once more, a very powerful monopoly because it allows the manufacturers to speculate on the quality of the products. That monopoly is dangerous in that it allows people to alter the figures. As long as these fumblers are allowed to use publicity as a means of inducing people to believe they are the friends of the sick and of the aged, that monopoly will be a menace. This industry, aims at squeezing out their last farthing from the sick and the aged. One subsection of this bill, Mr. Speaker, tend to suggest that competition will improve the situation.

Well, let me tell you that I do not believe a word of it, for there is no competition in that industry; that is a proved fact. How could improvements be made at a non-existing level? So, whether this bill is passed or not, the results will be the same and the people are expecting more than that.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I beg the minister to forget all about that very insignificant bill and to ask the people in charge of drafting the bills for the Canadian parliament, to draft a more detailed piece of legislation that is closer to reality and which will bring about practical effects.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, over the years few industries have mounted the kind of lobbying of members of parliament that this industry has. Therefore without knowing too much about the situation we can assume that what the government is doing in its small way is advantageous to the average man in the street but probably detrimental to individual members.

In the last two days I have heard two speeches by members who have obviously had to take a position different from other member in their parties. They are members who represent ridings within which large segments of the drug industry are located. I sympathize with these members and realize that we have to weigh, on the one hand, the number of people employed in the industry against, on the other hand, a lowering of prices. I am sure that the industry in these ridings is responsible for the extreme pressure of all kinds that has been put on the members concerned. I note from information that is available that drug companies have even made contributions to election campaigns. That situation is not unusual, though it has not been common in Canada so far as this industry is concerned because there has not been need for this type of control.

A long time ago when the house was discussing drug supplies to hospitals under federal control, I suggested that part of this industry should be nationalized so as to permit the supplying of generic products to hospitals under federal control, public welfare agencies in the provinces, sanatoria and like facilities. This would establish some kind of yardstick.

It is all very well to say that aspirin has some advantages over Bufferin, or that Bufferin has some advantages over A.S.A., but anybody who knows the composition of these tablets realizes that basically they contain acetylsalicylic acid, that really the only difference is in their advertising on television, which itself is not a small factor. I have watched television advertising of a particular brand of beer and have asked myself why I did not buy that particular brand. The same is true of cigarettes that are advertised as yielding ten puffs more than other brands.

Again, we all know the advertisement which depicts a hammer banging the side of a man's head, and if you happen to have a hangover you think that the product advertised would be appropriate to remedy your condition. Therefore advertising is a major factor, though I wonder what people some years hence will think of us when they dig into the archives and produce some of the tapes of this kind that have been filed away for posterity. They will probably consider our knowledge of ailments and ills somewhat elementary after viewing the sort of advertising that appears on the television media. In this regard I cite the advertisement dealing with stomach acidity. If our stomachs work in that way and little levers permit the flow of anti-acid solutions in the proper direction, then it would seem that the whole thing works like clockwork.

We are continually being subjected to very heavy propaganda by the drug industry. However, I still subscribe to the belief that in government institutions which take care of patients and in veterans hospitals it would be to our advantage to use drugs that are a little cheaper than others, though they would have to meet high standards.

I note from some literature that has been published that the drug companies spend an average of $5,000 a year per doctor in advertising. This is a fantastic amount. There are a large number of people in Canada who do not earn that much money; yet the drug companies, unsolicited, spend that sum on advertising to entice doctors to buy a specific type of drug. This must have an effect upon the doctors.

Some time ago I went to a doctor who suggested I needed a certain type of pill for a period of time. As a member of parliament I decided that I could afford to buy it, though had I not been I might have had second thoughts. However, I told the doctor that I wanted a drug whose cost was reasonable and asked him to use the generic form. Having a fairly exclusive clientele the doctor was a little amused by this request, but eventually he told me there was a little company in Canada by the name of Empire that manufactured a very good product at reasonable cost. He marked down "Empire brand" on the prescription and put in brackets the word "cheap". When I presented the prescription to the drugstore I was asked whether I was sure the doctor had written the prescription and I informed the man behind the counter that he had. The cost of 100 Empire brand tablets was $17 less than another brand. The druggist concerned does not want me to mention his name. He continues to supply me with those pils at a fairly reasonable price.

In discussing this general subject with a doctor I learned something that many of us may not know. Except when writing prescriptions doctors have little to do with prescription drugs. A doctor told me that not long ago he had prescribed for a woman a specific type of penicillin which contained an additive. Originally the drug had been expensive, but he assumed that over the years it had come down in price and now sold for about $2 or $3 per dozen tablets. He sent the patient whom he knew well to the druggist for the prescription, telling her that it contained penicillin with an additive. It was not basic penicillin. When the lady came back three or four days later saying she was no better he asked her if she had taken the pills he had prescribed. She said, "No, I did not. I went to the druggist and he told me the pills were $16 a dozen. I cannot afford them, and I did not get any pills." Then the doctor phoned the druggist and had one heck of an argument with him, saying that the pills were unreasonably priced and ought to be worth only about $2 or $3 a dozen. The druggist said, "Yes, we have that kind of drug." He mentioned the generic name, with the additive. He continued, "We have that under another brand name. But you have always prescribed this specific brand. You specified that brand and we had no alternative but to supply the lady with that prescription." I say that the woman need not have gone to the doctor in the first place if she could not afford his prescription. In prescribing a drug he thought would cure her ailment the doctor did not consider that the drug he was prescribing was out of her financial reach. In the end he prescribed a substitute drug and the woman's problem was cleared up. The doctor told me that since his intern days he had not been familiar with the price of drugs. He assumed that the more expensive drugs became cheaper after the passage of years and he was surprised to learn he was wrong.

What this doctor thought many others think. Forceful advertising plays its role in influencing doctors to prescribe certain drugs. Obviously, the $5,000 a year the drug companies spend per doctor in advertising and promoting their products must be effective or they would not advertise.

Hon. members have argued that if we loosen our regulations and allow the importation of generic drugs we shall lower the quality of drugs used in this country. The Financial Post of August 3, 1968, carried an article indicating that, among other things, the Food and Drug Directorate of the Department of National Health and Welfare has been authorized to add 11 new inspectors to its staff. Their main job will be to monitor imported drugs. I do not know how many inspectors at present monitor drugs in Canada, but I suggest we do not have enough to do other than a superficial job. Our government agencies have not had the facilities to undertake development or monitoring work. Hon. members will remember that a few years ago, after Connaught Laboratories in Toronto produced Salk vaccine, the federal authorities were in no position to assess the effectiveness of the vaccine because the federal government had no one who could to that work. I suggest that we might take over the Connaught Laboratories which could then set national standards for drugs.

The article in the Financial Post says in part:

> Two food and drug officials will visit European capitals in August to call on drug control agencies and ministries of health. Food and drug expects that, by early next year, one man will be permanently stationed in Europe.

I presume that has already taken place. I continue:

> His job will be to maintain liaison with the European agencies, gather information about drug manufacturing firms and help the Canadian directorate in its job of policing imports to Canada.
> The directorate has already been armed with additional regulations giving it new powers to ensure the safety and control of imports. It can now demand that any importer of drugs in their final usage form must have evidence and information relating to the manufacture and control of the drug. The evidence must establish that the Canadian requirements for manufacture and control have been met.

In addition, the directorate can demand that an importer either test every imported batch of drugs in Canada to ensure its identity, potency or purity, or satisfy the directorate with evidence that each batch has been properly tested in its country of origin.

These new regulations, according to officials, close all expected gaps in the safety and inspection procedures of imported drugs. In effect, the directorate, faced with an unknown manufacturer, can order all tests conducted here.

Officials point out that, when drug ingredients are imported rather than the finished product, the act now provides them with sufficient authority to ensure safety. For one thing, the final drug will be manufactured in Canada and therefore come under their jurisdiction. In addition, they have power to order that any bulk or raw material import be tested here, prior to final manufacture, to pass standards of identity, potency and purity.

The article then lists a number of other steps which have been taken to control drug quality, thus answering the objections of hon. members who are worried about what will happen if we allow the importation into this country of generic drugs.

Some hon. members whose ridings contain drug manufacturers have argued against some of the provisions of this bill. Unless we can control what a legitimate mark-up on drug sales should be there is a good case for developing and testing new drugs. Although there is some dog eat dog competition in Canada, a good many drug companies have reached understandings with their distributors. The original manufacturer of a drug wishes to maintain a certain profit margin; yet companies manufacturing that drug under licence sell it to retailers at similar prices although they have not incurred the development costs of the original manufacturer. I doubt that it is a good idea to have small manufacturers developing new drugs. Since the development of new drugs needs a great deal of money it is obvious that it should be limited to those companies which are able to put them on the market as safe and satisfactory commodities.

I hope the government will consider extending the provisions of this bill. It is essential for us to know exactly how much it costs to manufacture generic drugs. Hon. members must be aware that everyone here is expendable. If we should catch the Hong Kong flu we are expendable, not being on the preferred list as recipients of Hong Kong flu vaccine. There is not enough to go around. The amount available is being used to treat the old and the very young, and this is as it should be. I am pleased that intervention has made this possible rather than the price being jacked up. We do not want drugs available for the rich and not available for the poor. But, Mr. Speaker, a young lady died in Ottawa the other day from Hong Kong flu. I do not know if she had access to the vaccine. She was a secretary. Probably that category is expendable from the medical viewpoint in the selection of persons who should get the vaccine, but I maintain that with our modern, technical knowledge we can afford to provide this type of vaccine for everybody in Canada. Certainly people should not die in the same numbers as those who died in past epidemics of typhoid, strep throat and the like, simply because vaccine was not available at that time to prevent their deaths.

In my opinion we will never be able to get enough vaccine. Salk vaccine is a good example. There was never enough to treat all those in the age category threatened by polio. We did not have enough because it was being developed by private industry. To be successful private industry must be assured that it will dispose of all the product it manufactures.

There is no point in private industry manufacturing a drug that does not have a long shelf life and must be disposed of quickly and economically. I understand that in the case of the Hong Kong flu vaccine eggs must be inoculated. The vaccine feeds on the eggs and it has a short shelf life. Even though a small private company may have the right under licence to manufacture this vaccine in Canada it may not be tempted to manufacture it if sales are made only to 3 million instead of 15 million Canadians. On occasion such a company may manufacture 3 million doses on the basis of anticipated sales and then discover that 8 million or 10 million doses are required. A crown corporation would be in a position to satisfy such a need.

We should also consider the provision of drugs in many fields of public welfare. In my area many people are in an age category that does not qualify for old age pensions. It is an area with little employment for those over 45 or 50 years. These people do not have old age pensions, but when they require drugs such as insulin the province of Ontario, through the municipalities, supplies them at cost. It also provides drugs free of charge to welfare recipients. The amount of such drugs provided all across Canada must be considerable. If the government established a crown corporation to manufacture drugs it could have a large part of its production based on the drugs distributed through welfare agencies and other government institutions.

Many people write me to say that their monthly drug bills are $15, $20 or $25. Some of us on occasion have monthly $15 drug bills. Just the other day one of my colleagues was not feeling well and I went to the drugstore for him to pick up his prescription. Cough pills cost $4, some other pills another $4, and something else another buck. The bill came to $8 or $10 for a few days in bed with a common cold. I do not think his cold had reached the Hong Kong flu stage.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is he well now?

Mr. Peters: No, he is still in bed. The old remedy of going out and buying a bottle of rum is probably still the best. Even if you do not feel better you can enjoy your sickness.

The cost of drugs is probably as important to many people as the limited amount of food which they can buy with their old age pensions and other forms of assistance. The cost of drugs always comes out of the food portion of their income. In many cases they either eat or buy drugs; they cannot do both.

I suggest that the minister should consider the establishment of a crown corporation. Possibly some companies in Canada might be interested in forming a partnership with a crown corporation so they would have the benefit of national research and of a large welfare market. At the same time they would have an opportunity to develop new drugs and act as an agent for the government in the use and control of imported drugs.

Canada is not the only country having trouble with drug prices. I notice a headline in one of the newspapers which says, "Swedish Pharmacies Threatened With Nationalization To Cut Prices." I know that one or two hon. members who have spoken in this debate are in the peanut drug trade. They have small companies employing 50 or 75 people. There are lots of these companies throughout the country. They buy pills in bulk, put them in bottles and sell them to grocery stores and novelty shops. They distribute patent medicines and such things, but all the big companies are in a cartel which I think has been investigated by every country in the world.

An investigation into the control of the A. G. Farben Company in the United States prior to the second world war resulted in the introduction of anti-combine legislation in that country. Drug companies formed a monopoly in Germany and most of Europe, and such monopolies are not less apparent today than they were 30 or 40 years ago. It is so easy for these companies to get together and decide, "You work on this drug and I will work on that one. When we get them developed we will set the price and we will all make a good thing out of the drug business."

We have mentioned some of the things that could be done to control the prices and the marketing of drugs. I suggest that what the government proposes is a step in the right direction. It will not reduce drug prices very much for the person living on an old age pension. Instead of paying $17 he may get his drugs in the future for $12 or $14. That is something and we welcome it. Further, when inspectors report to the minister that they are having trouble with such and such an importation, or that importation is not possible because of pressure applied by others, the government will have to act with a more strident voice than it has up until the present. I am sure this will happen as it gains more experience in the operations of the drug industry.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will have to look at the whole matter of advertising and the legitimacy of advertising. I could say something about that. Over the holiday I was very shocked by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation because it doubled its normal amount of advertising by having a period of self-gratification. It told us how wonderful it was in seven or eight minutes additional advertising. I would think it did this on its own. Self-gratification has become a real problem for those who are interested in the advertising media. Someone must pay for both the self-gratification and the advertising that is allowed under the act.

The minister will have to find some relationship between the total cost of drugs and the amount spent on advertising, not only advertising to the doctors but advertising to the industry and to the public in general. Lastly, the government will have to give consideration to the lowering of the cost of drugs for which the government itself is responsible. I think it would be very unreasonable if we were to find the government supplying aspirin rather than A.S.A. tablets to its own hospitals of welfare recipients. This, of course, is just one example. I have nothing against aspirin. I think aspirin is very good because it dissolves faster than an A.S.A. tablet. This is an advantage if one has a real headache. I am sure that when we as a nation supply and are responsible for these things we must get the most for our money. This probably will be done on a generic basis and there should be some education in this regard.

In closing I might mention another field we might consider. We should be thinking about the education that is given to the doctors by the drug companies in terms of generic drugs and what they will do. I am sure that when a company has a patented drug with a brand name it finds it is much more advantageous to tell the doctor about it than about the generic drug. Perhaps the doctor has the same difficulty we all have with the names of these new drugs. I will not try to name any of them. In the last couple of days we have heard some of these names. Some of them have immensely long and complicated names. Difficulty also arises because of the ease with which they sometimes can be mixed up. There was an inquest not long ago involving a case in which a doctor had prescribed over the telephone a specific generic drug but the druggist had misunderstood the prescription or the doctor had been confused. The prescription that was filled was for a drug which resulted in the death of a child. I am sure it could be argued that there would not have been that kind of confusion in respect of a brand name.

It may be that the minister should take a look at the naming of generic drugs and how this is arrived at so that some formalized code could be developed in order to eliminate confusion. Probably this in itself would tend to enable the doctor to use a coded generic name rather than admit to himself and everyone else that he cannot spell the name of a particular drug or in most cases even pronounce it. If there were a code for these various drugs which could be used I believe some of the difficulty would be removed.

I do not have very much more to say except that I hope the government through this legislation will continue to examine the problem and will not be reluctant to consider the establishment of a crown corporation so that yardsticks can be established in respect of the cost of production of new drugs and their sale price on the market.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity and privilege to take part in the debate on Bill C-102 which the federal government has introduced in the early part of the first session of this parliament. I am particularly interested in this bill as a physician and member of parliament for Parkdale which is a working man's area. I feel that the Canadian public finds it commendable that the federal government has courageously tackled the problem of the high cost of prescription drugs. The three intensive federal studies carried out so far in Canada have found that the cost of prescription drugs in Canada is higher than it need be. The federal government wishes to bring relief to all Canadians who are burdened with the high cost of drugs.

The incidence of disease is far from uniform. Those patients who pay the largest drug bills because of their disability are likely to have incomes substantially below the average. Not only, however, is the incidence of illness in the population uneven, but also it is quite unpredictable so that consumers cannot budget for a situation in which they may have to assume the burden of heavy drug expenditures. Beyond all this, health is naturally of primary importance. A person's health is also a significant determinant of the productivity of human resources in our economy. Bouts of sickness, chronic disease, and permanent physical disability are social and economic misfortunes which also are frequently disastrous. The inability of many people to afford the drugs they require is reflected in needless sickness, disability, unemployability and costly hospitalization which could have been prevented by adequate out-of-hospital treatment.

Public concern over the price of drugs has been reflected in a number of major public inquiries. Federal inquiries have been undertaken by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission which made its report in January, 1963, by the Royal Commission on Health Services—the Hall Commission—which made its report in February, 1964, and by the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Drug Costs and Prices—the Harley committee—which made its report in April, 1967. Public concern has also given rise to at least two provincial public inquiries—one by the joint committee of the Manitoba Pharmaceutical Association and the government of Manitoba, which made a report on the retail structure of drug prices in Manitoba in May, 1961, and the other by a select committee of the Ontario legislature which made its report in April, 1963. The government of Alberta made an important submission to the Harley committee urging the need for measures to reduce drug prices.

Patent Act—Trade Marks Act

The unanimous findings of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, the Royal Commission on Health Services and the Special Committee of the House of Commons on Drug Costs and Prices have proved beyond doubt that Canadian drug prices are higher than they need be. This is particularly true in the case of patented and trade-mark prescription drugs. All the federal and other public inquiries referred to were in agreement that no single measure by itself would bring about a significant reduction in the price of drugs to the consumer and that a number of co-ordinated steps must be taken. In consequence, the government determined to do what it could at the federal level to reduce drug prices and at the same time maintain a situation where drug manufacturing in this country would not be unduly restrained, where pharmaceutical research in Canada would not be discouraged, and also to ensure the Canadian public that drugs will be safe and effective.

Hon. members will recall that although Bill C-190, discussed in the House of Commons earlier this year during the previous parliament, was given second reading in February, it did not proceed further owing to the dissolution of parliament. On Thursday, October 17, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) re-introduced an amended bill, Bill C-102, under the title "An Act to amend the Patent Act, the Trade Marks Act and the Food and Drugs Act". Certain amendments were introduced in this new bill, notably in respect of safety and quality of drugs, as a result of the previous debate and the representations which have been made.

I would not like to prolong the debate on this issue but I want to bring again to the attention of the house that the government is looking at the whole issue of the cost of drugs. There are five measures in a federal package which are designed to lower the cost of drugs. The first step, which has already been taken, included the removal of the federal sales tax from drugs, the reduction of customs duties on these products from 20 per cent to 15 per cent and also the narrowing of the application of dumping duties to drug imports.

The second step in the government's program is that contained in the measure now before us, Bill C-102. There are other measures which will be taken by the government. The next one is the development of an information service for doctors, which was recommended by the Harley committee. The Food and Drug Directorate, with the assistance of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, is undertaking a program of providing objective information to the medical profession about the properties and prices of drugs, so that the prescribing physicians will be aware of the price differential between competing drug products of demonstrated quality, safety and effectiveness. The object of this program will be to enable the physician to know that a choice of drugs is available to him on the Canadian market for the needs of his patients. While the decision as to what the physician will prescribe is to remain with him, the intention is that he should be made aware there is a choice to be made in many cases between competing products and their prices. Resources have been provided for this purpose to the Department of National Health and Welfare, and it is expected that the first monthly information bulletin will appear without undue delay.

The fourth step in the over-all program is the pharmaceutical industry development assistance program, commonly known as PIDA, to which reference has been made by many previous speakers. The parmaceutical industry development assistance program, which is administered at the present time by the Department of Industry, is a direct loan program designed to strengthen and improve the efficiency of that sector of the pharmaceutical industry which manufactures and sells prescription drugs at lower prices. These companies, most of which are Canadian owned, are engaged in or are prepared to engage in effective price competition against the international drug firms.

The fifth step in the federal program is one which involves discussion with the provinces, and it is designed to tackle the problem of the high cost of the retail distribution of drugs, important aspects of which are within provincial jurisdiction. The government of Canada recognizes, as did the special committee, the so-called Harley committee, that it is not sufficient to inject price competition at the manufacturing level only by way of legislation. An important element in the cost of drugs to consumers lies in the distribution and pricing practices at the retail level. This is a matter which, now that the federal government is completing the steps that can be taken within federal jurisdiction, is on our agenda for future federal-provincial conferences.

It is useful at this time to refer again to the special committee of the House of Commons which studied this matter and which stated it hoped provincial governments and provincial pharmaceutical associations would take whatever steps are necessary in the light of changing circumstances to ensure that sufficient competition can be engendered in the retail drug business to lower prescription drug prices. I hope that all the provinces will take whatever action is necessary to lower the cost of drugs.

I am delighted to note that my province, Ontario, has already taken the initiative in this matter. The Speech from the Throne announced a program in February, 1968, which will establish a negotiated price at which not only hospitals but retail pharmacies will be able to purchase prescription drugs. The drugs and biologicals under consideration account for 85 per cent to 90 per cent of the cost of prescribed drugs to hospitals and consumers.

A statement from the Ontario health department indicated that discussions with pharmaceutical firms, wholesale distributors and retailers will be held in an attempt to reach a consensus on certain principles. A negotiated price will be established for drugs and biologicals purchased in bulk. Added to the bulk price will be a reasonable price for packaging and distribution. Hospitals will be provided with a price list of these drugs, and by purchasing at the negotiated price they will reduce their operating costs.

In the Ontario plan the retail pharmacies will also be able to purchase at this negotiated price and, being allowed a modest mark-up, would sell the drugs at the final price plus a dispensing fee. Apparently the Ontario Department of Health has had good co-operation in its efforts so far to determine what drugs should first be considered in this program and what method of distribution should be adopted so that substantial economies may be achieved. It is my hope that the other provinces will tackle this problem as soon as possible so that all Canadians may enjoy the full benefit of the efforts of their governments, federal and provincial, to lower the cost of drugs.

I should like to refer for a few moments to the speech made last Friday by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. He explained to us at some length what additional resources have been made available to the food and drug directorate to protect the safety and efficacy of generic drugs and to provide for inspection of imported generic drugs. I do not want to take up the time of this house as this speech can be read in Hansard, but I should like to state that we should be assured of the safety of generic drugs. Even Canadian university teaching hospitals are prescribing generic drugs for their patients. I am satisfied that the Food and Drug Directorate is doing everything it can to ensure the efficacy and safety of drugs in this country.

We in this House of Commons have a duty to see that the burden of the cost of illness is reduced. The legislation before us today in Bill C-102 will, I am sure, have a significant impact in reducing the cost of drugs in Canada without jeopardizing in any way the quality of the drugs offered to the public.

Our responsibility to the people of Canada is to promptly pass this bill as the law of our country. Bill C-102 is a clear indication of the government's determination to work toward a just society in Canada, a society which will seek to eliminate the social ills which disfigure the existence and impair the quality of human life for too many of our citizens. I therefore urge the members of the House of Commons and the members of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs to expedite the study of this bill and to enact it into law as promptly as possible.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, we have two champions in Canada today. We have ski champion Nancy Greene and we have Canada's shadow-boxing champion in the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). He seems to shadow-box on the question of consumer prices; he shadow-boxes on the question of the Combines Investigation Act and restrictive practices; he shadow-boxes on hockey; he shadow-boxes on advertising by companies in Canada, and now he is shadow-boxing in the field of drugs. This is why I call him Canada's shadow-boxing champion.

I have read the minister's speech of October 17 introducing this bill. Toward the end of the speech he apologized for making a lengthy speech and said:

> May I thank hon. members, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to go on for a few minutes after ten o'clock, and I apologize to them for this lengthy resumé of the principle of this bill and the reasons which lie beneath its introduction. However the debate under the original Bill C-190 was so lengthy and inspired that I considered I would be remiss in my responsibilities to the house were I to make this statement on second reading too abbreviated.

Here is the important sentence:

My impression has always been that there appears to be needless concern within the drug industry about the effects of the bill.

I tell the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that this needless concern is demonstrated by the drug companies. I recall the debate on Bill C-190 in the early spring of last year. The drug representatives were lined up in the galleries and there was a constant running back and forth with speeches they had prepared for certain members of the opposition. I looked around yesterday and again today and found there were present very few, if any, representatives of the drug companies. Therefore I am inclined to think they are laughing all the way to the bank with regard to Bill C-102.

I am rather worried about the attitude and action of members of the Progressive Conservative party. In view of the poverty in the maritimes, in Newfoundland and other parts of the country, the high prices paid by the poor people in these provinces and by the sick and elderly, I would have thought there would have been a real spark in the speeches of members from those parts of the country. I notice that the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Jamieson) agrees with me. These are known as the poor provinces of Canada and the people there suffer as a result of high prices. I have been really sad to watch the performance of members of the Progressive Conservative party and some Liberals in this debate. The only strength they lent to the argument against this bill was the safety factor, and they appeared to be walking on eggs as they made their speeches.

Most Canadians are determined to have safe drugs at reasonable prices. One must look first at the cost of drugs in Canada and ask why the cost is so high. I cannot think of any better authority to quote than one successful Canadian drug manufacturer who is quoted in an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, August 13, 1968. The president of Micro Chemicals Ltd., Gryphon Laboratories Ltd. and Paul Maney Laboratories Canada Ltd. set forth in an interview the problem the small Canadian drug manufacturer is having. The problem is caused by the penetration of foreign ownership. Mr. Speaker, you have heard me and many of my colleagues speak about the problem of foreign ownership in Canada and you are well aware of how conscious we are of it. I ask the house to take note of the words of the president of the three companies I have mentioned. He said:

In the past decade, says Mr. Cook, running through a mental list without effort, these Canadian companies have been sold:

Charles E. Frosst and Co. of Montreal to Merck and Co. Inc. of Rahway, N.J.; Elliott-Marion Co. Ltd. of Montreal to American Home Products Corp. of New York; Ayerst McKenna and Harrison Ltd. of Montreal to American Home Products; Frank W. Horner Ltd. of Montreal to Carter-Wallace Inc. of New York; L. D. Craig Ltd. of Toronto (Bell-Craig Pharmaceuticals) to Denver Chemical Manufacturing Co. of Stamford, Conn.

That is just a list that he gave from memory of Canadian firms which have been sold to foreign companies. Then he said:

Some of these, like Frosst, Ayerst and Frank W. Horner, had been giving Canada an international reputation in drug-making. They were also providing the country with a competition in drug marketing that has practically disappeared, Mr. Cook says. Competition now is strictly in the marketplace, depending mainly on how good the companies' sales and advertising campaigns are.

The article continues:

The solution was to tackle the large companies in the area of the money-making drugs to which the large companies alone had patent rights.

Here you have a successful Canadian manufacturer setting forth what is probably the main reason why there is so little control over drug prices. The reason is that foreign ownership has gained the day and dictates to the Canadian public the price it should pay for drugs. This is a sad commentary on our government, a government that pretended to be concerned about foreign ownership, set up the Watkins commission and received its report but did nothing about it.

I am sure the minister will agree that a more important factor in the cost of drugs depends upon the stroke of the doctor's pen when he writes a prescription for his patient. When I speak to my doctor friends they say, "Mr. Gilbert, I always put in the prescription the generic name of the drug." Sometimes I wonder just what doctors set forth the brand names, because the culprit appears to be the brand name drugs with their high prices. I think that most druggists are dependent on a medical book called the Vade-mecum. I had not heard of it until a doctor friend of mine told me that the Vade-mecum is the bible that doctors use in prescribing drugs. Many doctors thought it was a public book, but in point of fact the Vade-mecum is compiled by a commercial firm which sells space to different drug companies throughout the country, and this allows them to publish the book. So these drug companies buy space in the book on which doctors depend in writing prescriptions.

Then there are the promotion men who utilize 30 per cent of every dollar to promote drugs. These men go round to the doctors and after giving them half a bag or sometimes a bag of samples they engage in a whisper campaign in which they say: "These other drug companies, including the Canadian companies, are what is known as copiers; in other words, they try to copy drugs of other patent companies. They are known as non-research houses and backroom plants." This is the whisper campaign which these men promote on behalf of drug companies. They spend 30 per cent of every drug dollar on promotion. I might add that it has become so insidious that when pharmaceutical students complete their courses they are invited by these companies to what is known as an orientation program, which is really brainwashing. The drug companies take these young graduate pharmacists to Detroit or Montreal where they wine and dine them and show them all the great advantages of dealing with them. It is a sad commentary that 30 per cent of every dollar is spent by the drug companies on the promotion of drugs and only 7 per cent on research.

Let me say at this point that I give the Harley committee credit for immediately dismissing the argument presented to them by the drug companies that high labour costs in Canada were responsible for the high cost of drugs. The evidence disclosed that this was not so, that it is the promotional costs and the high profit factors that bring about the high price of drugs. In fact, there are many other factors. There are drug companies that not only line up members of the official opposition but also members of the government by giving them money to promote their election. One of the most effective members of the Harley committee was a member of our party who represented the former riding of Hamilton South. During the recent campaign 40 doctors in his riding contributed over $2,000 to ensure his defeat. This is the type of conspiracy that prevails. It is promoted by these drug companies and sometimes receives the support of members of the medical profession.

If we are really serious about tackling this problem, our first measure should be the replacement of the Vade-mecum. The Food and Drug Directorate should prepare a book, which could be called the Food and Drug Directorate compendium, setting forth the different types of drugs and their relative costs.

Mr. Basford: Would the hon. member permit a question? In the light of his remarks I was wondering whether the hon. member had read the speech made during this debate last Friday by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, during which he said that is exactly what we intend to do?

Mr. Orlikow: When, and where is the money?

Mr. Gilbert: We are again witnessing the artful shadow-boxing of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The question is, when is the government going to do it and why does it not do it now? When it does, it should follow the precedent that has been set in the case of radio and TV stations which are licensed to operate in Canada. In the same way I believe the drug companies should have to pay a licence fee to cover the costs of this compendium on drugs.

The Food and Drug Directorate compendium would list brand names only under the generic names and show the price of each asked by pharmacists for patient-size packages. Such a book without prices is already published by the druggists association. I would like to see the minister stand up in his place and say that he would do this immediately and that the cost would be borne by the drug companies. Then he could not shelter himself under the excuse that because of the cost reduction program of the government we cannot afford it at this time. The companies are the proper ones to charge.

Second, I would like the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to create a pharmaceutical products board which, first, would review applications for the marketing of a pharmaceutical patent to determine whether it is a genuine new drug meeting a unique need. This is very important when one considers the cost of patent applications and the experience with regard to such applications that when a patent is about to expire nearing the 17th year clever chemists and their lawyers make another application for a new patent. All it really involves is molecular manipulation in which they indulge. This is the method by which they attempt to increase the life of the patent. So we should have a pharmaceutical products board which would determine whether these patents involve genuine, new drugs to meet the unique needs of the public.

Second, the board should have the power to establish the price of the product based on the company's submissions of its costs for development, promotion and manufacture in Canada as evaluated by an examination of its books by board auditors. This is not a unique proposal. These are the requirements that are demanded from telephone and transport companies with regard to the operation of their businesses. There is no reason why this should not also apply to drug companies.

My second point relates to the safety factor. This aspect was gone into quite deeply by those responsible for the Harley report. The report said, in effect, that the safety factor was no greater in the case of drugs put out under a brand name than in drugs sold under generic names. The best example we have of the serious consequences which can arise in connection with a brand name drug is, of course, thalidomide; there is no assurance that because a drug has a brand name it is necessarily safe. We think of the meagre 7 per cent that these drug companies expend on research. We recall the minister telling us that if there is to be real research carried on in Canada in the field of drugs the government must make the major contribution. This being so, we are forced to accept the argument set forth by the main spokesman for our party on this issue, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and by the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman), that the establishment of a Crown corporation which would manufacture these drugs and distribute them is necessary. Such a corporation would probably get some of the research moneys which the government intends to make available for the development of drugs in Canada.

What amazes me is that certain drug companies operate here even though they do not meet all the standards set by the Food and Drug Directorate. A pharmaceutical products board or some such board should, therefore, declare the manufacture of pharmaceuticals to be as essential for public purposes as is broadcasting or banking. It should require that each company be majority-owned by Canadian citizens, and it should set up minimum standards of internal control over laboratory functions within each company. This is what should be done by the pharmaceutical board. It should set the standards by which these laboratories operate in connection with the manufacture of drugs. If companies do not comply with the regulations and requirements of the board they should be disallowed from doing further business in Canada.

We have urged strongly that a Crown corporation be set up to manufacture drugs, to set guidelines with regard to cost and to ensure the necessary safety factors. I hope the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs will vacate the title I have given him this afternoon of Canada's shadow-boxing champion and become the leader in giving Canadians drugs at a reasonable cost with the highest possible safety factor. To do this he will need courage and determination to set things right with regard to foreign ownership. He will need to establish standards in Canada by telling doctors they will be provided with a Food and Drug Directorate compendium setting forth drugs under generic names rather than under brand names. He will have to set a standard with regard to the laboratories in which drugs are manufactured. If he does these things he will make a mark for himself in Canadian political life. If he fails, he will remain as Canada's shadow-boxing champion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is my duty to inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): As I understand the new rules, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the second reading debate is to give bills a preliminary examination before referring them to a committee. I therefore do not intend to speak at any length today.

This bill has received its preliminary examination in the house and I hope it will be referred immediately to the committee on health and welfare. My position, and the position of the government, was clearly set out in my statement in the house in October when I introduced the bill for second reading, as well as in the excellent statements by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour (Mr. Perrault) and my own parliamentary secretary. All these statements have, I think, successfully rebutted various suggestions made by other speakers in the house that the bill before us is a bad one or an unnecessary one.

My officials and I look forward to the hearings of the health and welfare committee when we will have an opportunity to set forth our analysis of this measure in more detail and explain the meaning and purpose of each clause of the legislation. I am confident that when we give these explanations members of the committee will see the wisdom of this bill and share my hope that it will be passed and reported back to the house as soon as possible.

I was amused by some of the allegations which have come from members of the New Democratic party. They indicate they support this bill, and I thank them for their support, but they are certainly not loud in their praises. I was amused at the shadow-boxing of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert). Members of the N.D.P. insisted throughout the campaign that this legislation would never be introduced. Well, if the legislation is as ineffective as they pretend it is, I do not know why they were so concerned about it during the election campaign. Naturally, there was no doubt in the mind of the government or in the mind of the Liberal party that it would be introduced. And it has been introduced. If it is as ineffective as the N.D.P. alleges, I am amused they should have made it a campaign issue.

Again, the other night the hon. member for Waterloo South (Mr. Saltsman) took full credit for the fact that it had been introduced. If it is so ineffective as he and his hon. friends have suggested, I am surprised he should take full credit for its re-introduction. But that is all by the way, and in the nature of a political argument; we can fight that issue on another occasion.

What I do want to emphasize—and some members of the N.D.P. do not appear to be aware of this—is that the present bill is only one part of the government's drug program. We as a government are determined to have a beneficial influence on the price of drugs in Canada. We regard drug prices in Canada as being unduly high, as stated by the Harley committee. We are determined to see they are reduced, and this bill is only part of the program which we have undertaken, and will undertake, to force prices down.

This particular bill is concerned with amending the Patent Act so as to increase competition within the drug industry and expose the pharmaceutical industry in Canada to the winds of international free competition. I hope it will be successful. All I can say is that it is a measure that has been recommended by three boards of inquiry—the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission inquiry, the Hall royal commission and the Harley committee. I accept the recommendations of those three inquiries, and also their opinion that this type of amendment to the Patent Act will have some effect upon the cost of drugs in Canada. I hope it will; it is the belief of the government that it will. I am sure that we can convince the members of the health and welfare committee that the amendment will have this effect.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I will be dealing with all the points raised by hon. members in this debate. May I thank them for their contributions. Some of the criticisms and suggestions can be dealt with in detail during the committee hearings, which I hope will start very shortly.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENTS LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT SUBSTITUTING RATE PRESCRIBED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Hon. Jack Davis (for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could call it five o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to standing order 40, to inform the house that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert)—Canadian Broadcasting Corporation; the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Woolliams)—Sports; the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont)—Finance.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business, as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, notices of motions.

Food and Drugs Act

PUBLIC BILLS

FOOD AND DRUGS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING LISTING OF INGREDIENTS

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo) moved the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs of Bill C-12, an act to amend the Food and Drugs Act (listing of ingredients).

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill was first introduced in 1966 at the urging of many people who had written to me, as they had written to other members of the house, indicating the difficulties they were having in terms of identifying ingredients in food and drugs to which they were allergic. The purpose of this bill, as stated in the explanatory note, is to amend the Food and Drugs Act to require producers of food and drugs placed on the Canadian market to accurately and completely list all ingredients on the labels of their products, as far as possible.

We in Canada are somewhat remiss in not insisting upon ingredient labelling, and as a result a number of anomalies have appeared. For instance, food manufactured in the United States and exported to Canada by the parent of a branch plant in this country bears accurate labelling because the U.S. government has passed legislation which is more progressive in this regard than ours. Therefore there is the curious situation that products that are similar to each other, almost identical in some cases, if made in Canada frequently have no labelling of ingredients whereas they do if made in the United States. On the other hand, there have been instances where Canadian manufacturers market their products in Canada without labelling the ingredients because the government does not require them to do so; yet when exporting the self-same product they have gone to considerable trouble to label the ingredients in order to comply with the regulations of the country to which they are exporting. Therefore I think it is time this state of affairs was cleared up.

I believe that Canadian consumers, particularly those who suffer from allergies, are entitled to information that is important to them, and it is for this reason that I present this bill to the house, hoping it will gain support from other hon. members. Some members have become aware of my intention to introduce Bill C-12 and they have indicated their support and written me to that effect.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Some of them have personal knowledge of the difficulties that are created by inadequate labelling for people who suffer from allergies.

Many people in this country suffer from allergies, and these allergies take many forms. It is not my intention this evening to detail the various kinds of allergies and the difficulties that they create; I think much of this is common knowledge to all of us. We all know from our own personal acquaintances that this problem exists. We all know people who have to be very careful about the kind of food they buy for their children because their children are allergic to certain things. We have gone to restaurants with friends who have had to question either the waiter or the cook about almost every item of food brought to the table. There is not a great deal we can do to remedy this situation, but of course people do not spend all their time eating in restaurants. However, there is considerable work that I think we can do for those who purchase food for use at home and who require to know what the food contains.

What makes the problem even more acute in this day and age is that the friendly corner grocer is no longer a ubiquitous figure. There was a time when one could go into a small store and ask the assistant: "What's in this, John?", and generally the assistant would know. Or one could go to the corner drugstore or to the fish market and get some idea of what was in the food being sold. However, today everything is sold off the shelf. We have silent merchandising. People simply walk into a supermarket and pick products off the shelves.

Unfortunately, manufacturers of food products today are not nearly as concerned about informing the public as to what they are selling as was the small merchant of yesterday. Their chief concern is to attract the public, to put some bright colouring on the labelling or packaging so that we can instantly grab what we want. Industrial psychologists have told manufacturers that their products must have more eye appeal than others. They say very little about providing the public with information on the ingredients. As one supermarket operator remarked to a committee of this house, "You wouldn't want to take all the romance out of life by getting too factual about things." I think we have had a little too much romancing in our supermarkets. We have had too much psychic benefit, too much puffery, as they politely describe what they are doing. It is about time our consumers were given the right tc information.

As I said, this bill has been introduced because of urgent letters I received from my constituents and people outside my riding, many of them suffering from allergies. The provisions of the bill have some connection with allergies since they deal with a matter that has become of increasing public concern. People have the right to know what is going into their stomachs, onto their faces, as well what kind of products they are paying for. Very little has been done in this country to inform the public in this way. If anything, the attitude of many of our manufacturers and promotion-minded men is that the members of the public should be treated like children. The prevalent thinking is, "Do not tell them anything you do not have to. The less members of the public know the better it will be for them." I do not think that is so. I think members of the public want to be informed about the contents of products and will insist on knowing.

We have made some progress in this country by introducing legislation that calls for specific types of labelling for various products. Also, certain products must meet certain standards. Although the standards set by the Department of National Health and Welfare are valuable in that they protect us in general against injurious ingredients, they do not provide the protection that sufferers from allergies in particular need. For instance, the ingredients of certain products may be perfectly harmless for those who do not suffer from allergies but yet may be absolutely devastating for those who do. Setting standards that food products must meet is not enough. We must go farther.

The public has become aware of injurious substances in products other than food. The house has referred bills to do with tobacco and tobacco advertising to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. That committee will be asked to recommend that information about the effects of tobacco be printed on cigarette packages. We have begun publicizing the nicotine and tar contents of various brands of cigarettes on the principle that the public ought to know. After all, members of the public ought to be in a position to make decisions about health.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs has indicated that legislation will be introduced in the house dealing with labelling of various products, among them being toys, glue and various other products which might be injurious to the health of any group in our society. We are moving in the right direction. For that reason I submit that the bill before the house is particularly apt, being aimed at the specific problems confronting sufferers from allergies, as well as the general principle that the public ought to have in its possession all relevant information about products it buys.

Some hon. members have suggested that the costs incurred in printing new labels giving product ingredients would outweigh the advantages of printing such labels. I submit that the extra costs are not that great. I am not advocating an overnight change-over of labels. I understand that companies have substantial investments in present set-ups and it is unfair to expect them to change their labels immediately. If passed the legislation will allow a reasonable period for manufacturers to bring out new labels. It makes little difference whether or not the ingredients of a product are included on a label. We are talking here about a few extra words which could be inserted when the label is printed, and I do not see how that would increase the cost of labels significantly. On the other hand, the suffering of many people will be alleviated as a result of new labels giving the ingredients of products, and these advantages will far outweigh any minor costs the manufacturers may incur.

Another advantage stemming from having labels indentifying ingredients of products will be that we shall get rid of some of the mysterious nonsense surrounding many of our products. I am referring to so-called secret ingredients, to tigers that pop out of boxes and esoteric mysteries of certain products that in fact may contain some fundamental and pedestrian chemicals. All such ingredients should be made known. If the highly advertised product that is selling simply because of its advertising build-up can be undersold by an equivalent product, it ought to be undersold. Surely the public has the right to compare products. At the moment it cannot because it has no way of comparing the various ingredients of similar products. Of course, there will always be distinctions that cannot be listed—distinctions of taste and of quality which cannot be defined as well as distinctions resulting from promotion.

I do not expect that a piece of legislation such as I am proposing here will solve all difficulties associated with consumer knowledge of products. Nevertheless, acceptance of the principle that consumers ought to know will be a big step forward in assisting the public to obtain the information vital to it.

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) for introducing this bill. I intend to support it fully, being one of those who for many years have suffered from allergies. Over the years I have had to avoid many foods, on pain of suffering severe reactions if I ate foods to which I was particularly sensitive. I am therefore sympathetic to the problems of those who suffer from allergies. I have also introduced a bill similar to the hon. member's Bill C-56, which is far down the list and has no chance of being discussed during the present session.

When I first came here a few years ago I was made aware that the hon. member proposed to put before the house a bill similar to the present one, and I wrote him to tell him I supported it. The hon. member and I served on a committee a few years ago that studied the complaints of consumers and consumer organizations. Many appearing before the committee complained that present laws governing labelling are inadequate. They hoped we would recommend further legislation in our reports. In our interim and final reports to the minister—at that time to the registrar general—we recommended that legislation be introduced to require labels on food products in Canada to specify the ingredients of those products.

Some manufacturers and citizens seem to think that is not necessary. They say that an informed consumer, a consumer who wants to take his time, can look at the different products and decide what is good for him and what is not good for him. They criticize modern-day housewives and other purchasers and consumers, saying they are lazy and do not do the job that grandmother used to do. But the principal point is that today our consumer products, especially food products, have become much more complex than they were in grandmother's day.

Today we have foods in cans and in packages. We have specially prepared convenience foods, frozen foods, as a matter of fact completely frozen dinners with gravies and all sorts of sauces included in them. We have specially prepared baby foods which only became prominent on the Canadian market after the Second World War. Before the war most people prepared their babies' food.

Today we have many types of foods in packages and in forms that did not exist even 30 years ago, and they are becoming more and more complex. It is almost impossible for a consumer when he or she goes through a supermarket, picking up a package, a box or a tin, to know exactly what is in it. Usually the consumer knows the basic product. It might be a meat, a cereal or a vegetable, but because of the new types of processing there could be many other things added to it, different types of preservatives and other products to enhance the taste. It is most important that the Canadian consumer know clearly what he is buying.

This is particularly important for the allergy sufferer. I am familiar with several cases where people, particularly babies, nearly died, and there are even some cases of deaths. I have personal experience of one case. I know a family that gave their baby a particular baby food containing some egg. Of course they did not know the food contained an egg additive. The baby was extremely sensitive and allergic to the egg additive. It became violently ill and they got it to a hospital just in time to save its life. There is another example of a baby dying in Toronto. I have here a letter which says:

> An extreme example along this line is a patient who was attending the allergy clinic at the Hospital for Sick Children. This child was known to be sensitive to walnut. He was given a candy which contained a walnut inside of it and was dead before he arrived at the hospital.

There are many other examples. People who have allergy problems want to know what the contents are of the packages and the foods they buy.

This is not the only reason for requiring more explicit labelling. As the hon. member for Waterloo has said, whether we have allergy problems or not it is still important to know what we are getting. Many European countries have much more explicit labelling laws than Canada.

When we buy a product, whether it is a frozen food, a TV dinner, or a can of stew, we want to know what we are buying in addition to the main item in the can in case it is something we may not like, something we are allergic to, or just for general information purposes. We would also like to know what we are getting for our money. This was referred to by the hon. member for Waterloo. Sometimes the price of a food may seem to be extremely high compared with other foods. If we knew what the product consisted of we might have a greater appreciation of the price, and we would be more satisfied in buying the product if we knew what it contained.

To do what the hon. member suggests in this bill will not completely solve the problem. I think we should also try to do something about foods which are imported and exported. Many foods are brought into Canada. The Food and Agricultural Organization of the United Nations is presently working on labelling proposals and I think the Canadian government should continue to support work in this field.

I said that I support this bill and I do. However, I have certain reservations. From my point of view the bill is too lenient. I would have the law be more obligatory with respect to labelling. The wording in the bill says:

> —and in any case where it is possible to do so the regulations shall provide that all the ingredients contained in the food and drugs covered by this subsection shall be enumerated on the labels accompanying the said food and drugs.

I would have it a bit stronger than that because of my experience and my personal contacts with people who have had serious problems.

I would also think it important in this country, although this bill may not be the occasion to raise the matter, to oblige our manufacturers to have their labels in English and French so that all Canadian consumers may know what they are buying. I think there are other private bills on the order paper dealing with this aspect of the problem.

Another major criticism is that even if this bill were passed it would not cover many foods sold on the Canadian market. The Food and Drugs Act at present covers certain foods but there are others it does not cover and I would hope that if amendments are to be made all foods, whether they are prepared or convenience foods, would be covered by this type of regulation. I understand that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs is preparing legislation along this line. I urge him to take notice of this bill and other similar bills on the order paper. I urge him also to take notice of the arguments which are being put forward this evening, those put forward by the hon. member for Waterloo, my arguments and others which I presume will be made in support of the bill. The minister's parliamentary secretary is in the chamber and I hope he will convey the importance of this measure to the minister.

Some people might suggest that this bill be referred to a parliamentary committee, perhaps the committee on health and welfare. I do not think that is necessary. As I stated earlier, last year the consumers' committee studied this matter and it became fairly evident that this type of legislation is necessary. I cannot see the point of wasting time studying it once more. I think it is time for action and I would hope that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs would introduce legislation very shortly.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be short but I would blame myself if I failed to express the appreciation of the Ralliement créditiste to the sponsor of bill C-12, aimed at having dealers and manufacturers use labels with more accurate wordings.

We fully endorse this measure, Mr. Speaker. We believe it is an important means of protecting the consumer, in enabling him to have a better awareness of the products he buys.

Mr. Speaker, this bill is very simple and very precise. I believe the house could pass it without reference to the committee. In my opinion, the committee, which had the matter before it previously, will agree, as the previous speaker mentioned. It seems there will be no objection to a gradual change in the labels, taking into account the costs of such changes.

Mr. Speaker, I do believe that the retailers, the dealers and the manufacturers would find it profitable to bring about such changes, which would be aimed at improving the quality of the products.

The manufacturers should tell the truth about their products. If they will not say a word about their disadvantages, they could at least state their content.

For example, in the case of cigarettes, the disadvantages of nicotine and tar should be mentioned—and the committee is presently examining this question. But for the moment the problem lies elsewhere.

Our measures should be aimed at solving the basic problem of consumption.

• (5:20 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, now that we have a Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, it seems to me that similar measures should be adopted in order to protect the Canadian consumer.

Mr. Speaker, as I said, we are in favour of this bill on the control of labelling. Indeed, we know very well that it is impossible to get adequate information on the innumerable products that are put on the market. All we know is that every day, when we turn on the radio or the television set, or when we read the newspaper, we are swamped with misleading advertisements. Moreover, that was very often said, during the meetings of the committee which presided over the creation of the present department.

Mr. Speaker, somebody already said it—it was a certain Mr. Sandback—during the study in committee. I quote:

> The trade marks or the price are very seldom satisfying standards on which the consumer can rely to choose the best product that serves his purpose.

Because of the present situation which has lasted too long, the manufacturers show up the brand name, the trade mark and the price of their product, but not its contents. That is why housewives and consumers are often misled.

I wish to commend once again the mover of this bill and assure him of our full support, hoping that we will all decide that it is not necessary to put off this bill indefinitely or refer it to the committee, as the latter is already too busy. We should be able to dispose of it right away in the house. By so doing, we would make progress and we would indicate that we are ready to co-operate with the new Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in passing measures likely to protect the Canadian consumer, an aim we should all strive to attain.

[English]

Mr. David Anderson (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, like the previous speaker from this side of the house, I should like to congratulate the proposer of this bill for bringing to our attention and to the attention of the Canadian people the extent of the problem, and the fact that inadequate labelling causes great difficulty to many Canadians, particularly sufferers from allergies. One thing he certainly has done is bring forth the allergy sufferers in this house. Like my friend, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand), I also suffer from allergies. I have examples from my own experience which lead me to support the intent of this bill. I know that inadequate labelling is a serious problem for those who suffer from one allergy or another.

This question has already led to a fair amount of discussion in the house. We have heard of the discussion there was last year before the committee on consumer affairs. This led to the bill my hon. friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce proposed, which will not be discussed this session because of the lack of time. It also led to a bill which I proposed late last year and which probably will also not be discussed at this session because of lack of time. That bill deals specifically with the labelling of drugs.

I understand that a member from the major opposition party will be following me in expressing the views of that party on this matter. Therefore I believe that on both sides of the house there is general agreement that there must be better labelling of the ingredients in drugs and foods in Canada.

If I may, I should like to take a moment or two to outline the seriousness of the problem that is now faced by the allergy sufferer. There is the case that was mentioned a short time ago by my friend the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, concerning an egg derivative being used in a baby food with no indication of this on the label. There have been other cases in the past, in particular with regard to nuts which can cause an immediate and very violent reaction and indeed lead to death. There was a case in Toronto not very long ago of a child being given a chocolate which contained a walnut. The child was dead before arrival at the poison control centre.

There are many cases which involve the use of peanut oil. Many people are allergic to this product. Some of these allergies can be particularly vicious. I should like to read from a letter which was received from a doctor in Toronto who took the trouble to write on this matter. He gives information from his experience, as he is a specialist on allergies. He said:

> An extreme example along this line is a patient who was attending the allergy clinic at the Hospital for Sick Children. This child was known to be sensitive to walnut. He was given a candy which contained a walnut inside of it and was dead before he arrived at the hospital. Admittedly this was an extreme case and I would not suggest that labelling on all packaged foods would eliminate such errors. Nonetheless it could quite conceivably eliminate a tragic case such as this if the child had properly observant parents.

That is one example taken from his practice. There are many other cases, and it would not be possible to go into all of them in detail. I will mention, however, a case in respect of a member of my family who is allergic to seafood. Quite inadvertently he ate a dish which contained shrimp. About an hour later he passed out at the wheel of his car, and his car ended up in the ditch. It might well have been a fatal accident. The particular case of this member of my family would not have been prevented by proper labelling, because when one is dining at a friend's house one does not, after all, necessarily receive a list of the ingredients of everything that is placed before him. It is, however, an example of the problem itself.

I should like to continue by mentioning another letter from a doctor. This also deals with the problem and I think will give a general indication of the need for adequate labelling regulations. Again, this man is a specialist in allergies. He states:

As allergists we are concerned with two major problems. The first is acute anaphylactic reactions which may occur following an unexpected exposure to something like nuts or nut oils. The other problem is likely considerably more common and it is a chronic reaction usually due to some major food such as wheat, milk, egg or corn. These chronic symptoms will likely take the form of bronchial asthma or allergic rhinitis and although they are not as dramatic as the acute reaction mentioned above they produce far more disability.

The only way in which a person who is food sensitive can be protected from reactions to that food is by complete avoidance and this, of course, involves adequate labelling of commercial products. Although I have felt in the past that adequate labelling should consist of the major ingredients, I feel if it is at all possible that complete labelling shoud be undertaken.

I quoted from these two doctors' letters to outline to the house the seriousness of the problem.

I should like to spend a short time now on this question of complete labelling. It will probably be impossible to get complete labelling, and I think we all understand that. A dash of pepper may be included in a can of soup, for instance, and may or may not be listed in the list of ingredients for that particular product. Complete listing presents serious problems for manufacturers. We cannot get around these problems by attempting to force them to list everything in their product because that would simply be impossible.

The first problem involved is the space required on the label to list all the ingredients. There may simply not be enough space. Also important is the fact that the manufacturer may change the constituents of a food, depending on the prices of different components. For example, depending on the market values, the manufacturer may choose to use peanut rather than corn oil in his product. The label mentioning the ingredients would probably continue to list vegetable fat or vegetable oil. This would occur in spite of the fact that the manufacturer had changed the actual oil being used in his product. Such a change could lead an innocent purchaser to suffer a severe allergenic reaction.

A possible solution to the difficulty of complete listing of ingredients is the suggestion that a relatively limited number of products, which account for a high proportion of allergenic reactions, should be required to be identified on the label. These main allergens are milk, chocolate, corn, eggs, peas, tomatoes, wheat, nuts, certain flavourings, fruits and vegetables. If we insisted that manufacturers list these particular products which cause the difficulty and ignored others which do not, we would be taking a step in the right direction.

There is another problem involved, and that is the name of the actual ingredient itself. For instance, if casein salts were listed on the label I would not know what they were, nor would many other people, yet they might be a source of trouble for someone who was allergic to milk. It would not be evident to that person that this particular substance was a milk derivative. Monosodium glutamate, which is commonly used in many cooking preparations, particularly in Chinese food, is a wheat derivative, yet if you listed monosodium glutamate on the label the ordinary consumer would not know this. So, it is quite clear there is a special difficulty in identifying various products and using or choosing the correct name for the label. Perhaps I have spent enough time on that particular point, but it is something we cannot correct simply by legislation; it is something that must be considered.

Perhaps the best way of correcting this situation would be by officials of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the Department of National Health and Welfare getting together with the industry to work out lists of ingredients which should appear on the label. The department should decide on the correct names for those particular ingredients in order to warn the public of the actual composition of a product.

I think this could best be done, not through the provisions of this bill, but by other legislation presently in existence. While this bill does focus attention on this problem, and is very useful for this purpose, it is unnecessary in light of section 24(1) of the Food and Drugs Act. This section provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations to carry the purposes and provisions of the act into effect.

If I read the act correctly, it would be quite possible for the Governor in Council to regulate the labelling of any food or drug. In other words, if the officials of the consumer and corporate affairs department or the Department of National Health and Welfare decided a certain product should be labelled with the ingredients of a product, legislation exists by which the Governor in Council could make regulations requiring such labelling. I think this would be a more sophisticated and better way of doing this, rather than by passing legislation which would require, regardless of the problems I have mentioned that all ingredients, of all foods be labelled. I think this would be the better way for the reasons I have outlined. Therefore, while I can appreciate and do approve of the intent of this bill, I do not feel this is the best way of achieving the objectives of its proposer.

Before I leave this subject I should like to say a few words about a related matter. It is my opinion that regulations should be forthcoming which require the manufacturers of patent drugs to list all the ingredients of such a drug. If a child takes a product from a medicine cabinet which is simply labelled as "Dr. 'X's' rheumatism remedy", drinks it and ends up at a hospital or a poison control centre, there is simply no way for the doctor or the pharmacist to discover what is in that product except by analysis. This is obviously a time-consuming process. Of course, an attempt could be made to phone the manufacturer, if it was known who the manufacturer was, but this would be a hit or miss proposition. If the manufacturer involved could be found some information might be obtained, but in the meantime the child may well die.

I feel that it is very important for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and his officials to pay attention to this specific problem. I do not believe legislation is necessary, as regulations could be issued under section 24 of the Act which would require all manufacturers of patent drugs to clearly label their products with all the ingredients and the amounts of those ingredients. I urge the minister to consider this matter.

With these general observations on this subject I once more would like to reiterate that the objective of this bill is excellent, but the bill itself is not necessary. I think this matter could best be handled under the existing legislation, specifically section 24(1) of the Food and Drugs Act.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I will just take a moment of the time of this house to congratulate the hon. member for Waterloo (Mr. Saltsman) for feeling the pulse of the people who are affected by the uncertainty about drugs and food. It is very significant at this time that we find members on both sides of the house referring to bills dealing with this subject. We have heard references to Bill C-56, C-12 and Bill C-119. This seems to indicate there is a problem which we must face. There appears to be a duty not only on parliamentarians but on manufacturers to instruct and inform the ultimate consumer. We have heard how important it is that those who are suffering from allergies be advised as to what they are purchasing and how they can become involved.

I need not reiterate the excellent examples that have been given. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we are now faced with problems that exist because of the lack of proper or informative labelling. This problem must be faced and resolved. The hon. member who preceded me said that although this bill is good in principle and is an excellent amendment to the Food and Drugs Act, it is not the right way to bring about this improvement. He referred to section 24 (1) of the act and pointed out that under its provisions the Governor in Council is empowered to look into any matter that requires a change in the regulations. It seems to me that we are moving into an area in which all one hears is "Governor in Council."

I do not have an allergy but it appears to me that we have had several splendid examples of members who have said that this type of legislation is momentous and necessary at this time. Therefore, I believe the question is, are we prepared to face reality in this regard? There is a great complexity in the make-up of food and drugs, which calls for honest labelling. For this reason I fully support the hon. member's bill. I believe Canadians desire information in respect of the labelling of food and drugs. This information is extremely necessary today in order that full protection be given to the consumer.

One has only to look at the many patent medicines which are on sale to realize how much difficulty is caused because of the lack of proper labelling. People must have a choice when purchasing these goods. Through proper labelling they have the right of choice for their protection. There is a great deal of interest in the matter and this has been demonstrated by the fact that several members of the house have introduced similar bills. Therefore I have no hesitation whatsoever in fully supporting this bill. Having heard the hon. members who have spoken, I believe we need this type of protection. Hon. members have spoken about the allergies from which they suffer, and if these examples are multiplied by the thousand one realizes that there is in this area a great problem which requires our immediate attention.

We, as parliamentarians, must keep our ear to the ground and be concerned about the cry that comes from those who ultimately give us direction. I believe legislation such as this is required. Therefore I have no hesitation and no reservation whatsoever in supporting the hon. member's bill. I hope that the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), having read the bill introduced by the hon. member and the arguments put forward with respect to this question, will not think it necessary to submit the bill to the standing committee for further consideration. We can deal with this matter now. I believe it is in accordance with the intent of the new rules, which have been adopted to reduce the time spent on legislation in the house, that we deal with a matter such as this. This is the proper forum in which to deal with the question because the amendment is simple and its intent is obvious. Therefore I hope the minister will consider all the arguments that have been raised this evening and will follow the suggestions that have been put forward.

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the remarks made by previous speakers in connection with Bill C-12 are certainly valid. I am sure they will prove very useful to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) who is directly responsible for the operations of the Food and Drug Directorate. I am sure hon. members have already learned from the press and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs that there is to be introduced in the other place a bill called the Hazardous Products Act, which may deal with some of the problems raised in this debate.

I believe this government can be described as being consumer conscious. It accepts the right of the consumer to know, the right of the consumer to feel safe. The right to safety, to be protected against the marketing of goods which are hazardous to health or life, is one which I am sure is accepted not only by members of this house but by the Canadian people.

With regard to the specific amendment to the Food and Drugs Act which is contained in Bill C-12 and was explained by the hon. member who introduced the bill, I would like to bring his attention to the fact that section 24 (1) of the act provides that the Governor in Council may make regulations for carrying the purposes and provisions of the act into effect. Paragraph (b) of section 24 (1) specifies that the Governor in Council may make regulations respecting the labelling and packaging and the offering, exposing and advertising for sale of food, drugs, cosmetics and devices. This regulation deals with the size, dimensions, fill and other specifications of packages of food, drugs, cosmetics and devices.

It would therefore appear that section 24 as it now stands provides the necessary authority for the minister, the Governor in Council, to require a complete listing of ingredients of any food or drug. With respect to food, the current policy in the Food and Drug Directorate appears to be that ingredient statements are required only on labels of unstandardized food. Standardized foods include alcoholic beverages, baking powder, cocoa products, coffee, food colours, spices, dressings and seasonings, dairy products, cheeses, ice cream, fats and other substances.

In the food and drugs regulations foods are categorized as standardized and unstandardized. Generally speaking, the so-called standardized foods are not required to carry on their labels a list of ingredients. Other foods falling into the category of unstandardized foods, generally speaking are required to carry on their labels a list of ingredients. There are exceptions, however, to this general rule regarding the listing of ingredients on unstandardized foods and the following 14 groups of unstandardized foods are not required to carry on their labels a list of ingredients. They are bakery products, black pudding, white pudding, blood pudding, confectionery, flavouring preparations, gelatine desserts, non-nutritive seasoning sauces, pastry spice, pickling spice, poultry seasoning, preparations of synthetic colours, soft drinks, and soups.

I should also like to state today that as a general principle the Food and Drug Directorate considers that the consumer is definitely entitled to know what ingredients have been used in the preparation of food, and that so far as possible all foods should eventually carry a list of ingredients. Discussions have been held with government departments and groups interested in food labelling. A tentative agreement was reached whereby it will be the long term objective of all departments involved to require, so far as possible, a listing of ingredients on all foods.

At the present time the Food and Drug Directorate is examining the 14 groups of unstandardized foods which are not at present required to carry a list of ingredients, with a view to removing them from this exemption. Plans are under way to hold meetings with the processors of these foods to discuss the implementation of this proposal. Approximately 50 per cent of bakery products now carry a list of ingredients. These changes have been brought about on a voluntary basis by the industry with some stimulation from the Food and Drug Directorate. Already a trade information letter to all food manufacturers has been prepared requesting that the industry develop labels for soups which will carry a complete list of ingredients, and it is hoped that the standardized foods will be considered as soon as possible so far as this policy of labelling or listing of ingredients on labels on food products is concerned.

The Consumer's Association of Canada has made representations to the Food and Drug Directorate for a revision of the food and drug regulations to require that a list of ingredients be printed on the containers of all packaged food products. A special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on consumer credit stated in its interim report with regard to the listing of ingredients that, where applicable, ingredients should be revealed both by name and percentage of composition. Since its inception, a group of Canadians who formed an association called Allergy Information has been pressing for a listing of ingredients on all foods. The members of this association being allergic to one or more food constituents, have more than a passing interest in a knowledge of the ingredients of a food. To them, a lack of knowledge of the ingredients of a food may be a very serious health hazard when that food is consumed, and I as a physician understand that well. The lack of knowledge of the ingredients of a food may cause a serious allergic reaction, and perhaps even an anaphylactic reaction.

Members of the medical profession have also made representations to the Food and Drug Directorate. These doctors, especially allergists, have given examples of cases of tragedies that have occurred when a food was consumed which contained an allergen. I believe that all of these representations are important, and I am assured that the Food and Drug Directorate and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs are giving this matter their serious attention.

I have mentioned the trade letter that has gone out to the manufacturers of soups. Hon. members have probably also read in the press during the summer about the announcement of the Food and Drug Directorate concerning drugs. It issued special regulations for the listing of information on labels. I am sure that the public, and physicians in particular, have benefited from the regulations that are being introduced by the Food and Drug Directorate in the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The problem of labelling is a very complicated one, as mentioned by one or two previous speakers. Many problems arise in the listing of foods. At the present time it is estimated that approximately 200,000 labels will have to be examined. This, therefore, will be a long term project. However, the officers of the Food and Drug Directorate are working closely with officials of other government departments, especially the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which has a direct interest in food labelling. They are exploring the best means of achieving this objective.

Some hon. members have also stated that they have allergies and know from first hand experience how important it is for the consumer to know what is in a particular food. They have appealed for a complete listing of all ingredients on labels on all foods.

I support all the arguments that were brought forth this afternoon and I would like to assure all hon. members that I will bring them to the attention of the Food and Drug Directorate as well as to my minister, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, in the hope that further action will be taken to protect the Canadian public.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour appointed for the consideration of private members business has expired. I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

AMENDMENT SUBSTITUTING RATE PRESCRIBED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Davis for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Hon. Jack Davis (for Minister of Finance): With regard to the bill before us, Bill C-151, I should like to say at the outset that I can think of no sector of the Canadian economy which merits the support and the credit of the Canadian nation more than our fisheries. This bill, which will have the effect of modifying the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act in various ways, will be lending the credit of the nation to make it easier for fishermen to build new boats, equip their boats better and improve the tools of their trade so as to prosecute the fisheries in a more effective way.

The net result should be higher incomes for fishermen. Again, the basic purpose of this legislation is to make credit more readily available to fishermen as individuals and to ease the problem of high interest rates which they, in common with many other Canadians, are facing at the present time.

The amendments in Bill C-151 which bear on the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, an act which dates back to 1955, relate first of all to the character of the lenders. The number of lending institutions is increased. The interest rate at which these institutions can make money available to fishermen is made more flexible and more realistic in present circumstances. Finally, the liability of the minister of finance (Mr. Benson), the liability on the nation's treasury, is increased so as to carry the extra burden which increased loans will place on the credit of the federal government.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act which, as I have said, was passed in 1955, was designed to provide term credit to fishermen for a variety of fisheries improvement projects. Loans under this act are guaranteed by the government but in order to qualify for such loans applications must be made in accordance with the act and the regulations made under it. Fisheries improvement loans are made by the chartered banks and by certain credit unions or caisses populaires designated by the Minister of Finance. To these will now be added insurance companies and trust and loan companies. The managers of these lending institutions can advise fishermen whether or not they qualify for these loans.

Only individual fishermen can obtain loans. Companies, or large aggregations of fishermen cannot obtain loans under this legislation. A fisherman is defined as a person who owns or plans to obtain a fishing vessel, or fish catching and related equipment, and who makes his living by fishing.

Loans may be made for the purchase of fishing equipment, the construction of new fishing boats, the purchase of new or used fishing boats, the major repair and overhaul of such boats, shore installations and building used by a fisherman to carry on his business and other fisheries improvements. A loan may be used to finance the purchase of accessories to the boat, such as engines, winches or electronic equipment, nets, lines and traps, equipment used for preserving or preparing fish for sale, trucks, snowmobiles and other vehicles for transporting fish, and a variety of shore installations. These are only a few of the items in a long list of the uses fishermen can make of this assistance under the Fisheries Loans Act.

Details of each loan are worked out between the fishermen and the lending institutions. In establishing the terms of the loan the lender may take into account the type of fishing in which the borrower is engaged, the pattern of his income and his probable ability to repay the loan. In all cases, certain conditions must be met. In recent years legislation has set a limit of $10,000 on the total amount of the loan.

Back in 1955 when the act was introduced, the maximum figure was $4,000. This was increased to $10,000 in 1965. We ought, I believe, to consider whether the present level of $10,000 is appropriate, and in the committee's deliberations I hope we will hear submissions as to whether a figure, say, in the order of $25,000 would be appropriate for the future. A ceiling of $25,000 was part of the legislation passed a few months ago in this house in connection with the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

Fisheries Improvement Loans Act

The maximum rate of interest under the present legislation, from 1955 to the present time, has been 5 per cent per annum simple interest. This will be revised by Bill C-151 along lines similar to the provisions contained in the legislation last fall dealing with the Farm Improvement Loans Act and will be related to the current long term borrowing rate of the nation plus one per cent.

Limits are set on the amount of the cost of equipment or projects which can be financed with a fisheries improvement loan. These limits depend upon the purpose for which the loan is obtained. For most purposes the loan may be made for an amount of up to 75 per cent of the cost of the equipment or project. However, for the purchase of a vehicle a loan may be made for an amount of only up to 66⅔ per cent, or two thirds of the purchase price.

The type of security taken depends upon the purpose for which the loan is obtained. Normally, it takes the form of a mortgage on the article purchased, a lien on the equipment and stock of the borrower, or an assignment of monies owing to the borrower or any combination of types of securities. The borrower must also sign a promissory note.

The maximum period over which a loan may be repaid depends on the purpose for which the loan is obtained. For example, it is three years for vehicles, five years for fishing equipment, fishing boats and major repairs or overhauls, and ten years for all other purposes. Repayment periods vary, depending upon the size of the loan. For example loans of $500 must be repaid in two years; loans of $2,500 must be repaid in four and a half years; and loans of $10,000 in ten years. Repayments must be made at least annually, and in some cases they may be required more frequently.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was designed as an incentive to lending institutions to make credit available to fishermen. I think it is important to keep in mind that the objective of this legislation is to facilitate the making of guaranteed loans to fishermen. The ultimate decision on whether these loans are made or not made rests with the lending institution.

Fisheries improvement loans are guaranteed by the government as to their repayment in the event of default, but the lenders are the source of financing. The lenders of these funds must take into account the prevailing general level of interest rates and the cost to them of their sources of funds.

An amendment to the act which makes the rate prescribable by regulation enables the government to establish maximum rates that would be below the rates that fishermen would have to pay in the absence of the guarantee; but this would be high enough to enable the lending institutions to continue to lend their wholehearted support to the program. It would also provide the flexibility necessary to see that the program continues on a fair and equitable basis both to the borrower and lender by ensuring that the rates reflect changes over a period of time in the general level of interest rates. Under these circumstances, it should be possible for a new group of lenders to become active under this program. In other words, new sources of credit are made available to fishermen, particularly to fishermen who have already demonstrated their capability or whose prospects are attractive to the lending institutions of Canada.

This legislation authorizes the Minister of Finance to guarantee loans made by chartered banks and certain designated credit unions for the purposes set out in the act. The first guarantee period was for a three-year period and it has subsequently been renewed for additional periods, the most recent of which extends to June, 1970.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was intended as a companion piece to the very successful Farm Improvement Loans Act and the terms of the legislation were patterned very closely after the latter legislation. Lending under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has never approached the levels achieved under the Farm Improvement Loans Act but it has, nevertheless, been a significant source of credit particularly on Canada's west coast.

I might mention that the total number of loans to date since the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was introduced in 1955 amounts to 2,586, involving an amount of $6,168,800. This $6 million, while large in some contexts, is insignificant compared with the more than $2 billion lent to farmers since the Farm Improvement Loans Act was first instituted in 1945.

In 1955 when the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was implemented, the maximum rate of interest which could be charged by lenders was established at 5 per cent. At that time, this rate was sufficient to enable lenders to cover their costs of operations given the general structure of interest rates prevailing at that time. The general increase in interest rates in the recent past has, however, made the 5 per cent maximum rate increasingly unrealistic and lenders increasingly reluctant to commit funds, not only under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act but other government guaranteed lending programs.

Accordingly changes have recently been introduced in the Canada Student Loans Act, the Farm Improvement Loans Act and the Small Businesses Loans Act to make the maximum rate of interest prescribable from time to time by the Governor in Council. One of the proposed amendments to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act will remove the 5 per cent rate of interest from the act and, using a formula to be described in regulations, authorize the Governor in Council to prescribe a rate of interest. This will cause in the maximum rate of interest to be adjusted periodically thereby reflecting changes in levels of interest rates generally.

I should like to make reference, in order to describe this rate a little more fully, to a recent order in Council, which is P.C. 1968-2098. Speaking to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, the following appears:

—the rate of interest per annum payable to a bank in respect of a guaranteed farm improvement loan made on or after the coming into force of this section is the aggregate of one per cent per annum and the base rate calculated pursuant to subsection (2)—

That is, one percent over and above the government borrowing rate. Subsection (2) reads:

The base rate for each interest period should be equal to the simple arithmetic mean of the Wednesday closing mid-market yields for all Wednesdays in the averaging period immediately preceding the interest period as computed from the yields as published by the Bank of Canada on all Government of Canada bonds payable in Canadian currency and due to mature,—

(b) where the loan is made for any other purpose, in one to ten years,—

In simple words, the rate of interest to be charged over a period of months under this legislation must not exceed the long term borrowing rate of the government of Canada, experienced in a recent substantial period of time, by more than one per cent. I would expect that had the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act incorporating the amendments contained in Bill C-151 been in effect in recent months, the long term borrowing rate of the government of Canada would be of the order of 6½ per cent, and the maximum rate chargeable by these lending institutions to fishermen would have been 7½ per cent. I mention these figures for illustrative purposes only.

As I said before, chartered banks and designated credit unions are currently eligible lenders under this legislation. Another amendment will enable the Minister of Finance to designate trust companies, mortgage loan companies and insurance companies as eligible lenders. In other words, we expect the numbers and variety of lenders to increase as a result of the provisions of Bill C-151. This change parallels amendments made recently to the Farm Improvement Loans Act, whereby these categories of lender were declared eligible. It is hoped that this amendment will encourage these new categories of lender to participate over a time in this lending program.

The third amendment deals with the limitation of the aggregate amount of loans subject to the minister's guarantee. In other words, the total amount of money lent to fishermen will increase, and therefore the obligation of the Minister of Finance will accordingly increase. Currently this limitation is 15 per cent of the first $500,000 of loans made by a lender and 10 per cent on the aggregate amount in excess of this amount. The proposed amendment will extend the guarantee to 90 per cent of the aggregate amount of the first $125,000 of loans, 50 per cent of the aggregate amount of loans between $125,000 and $250,000, and 10 per cent of the amount of loans made in excess of $250,000. This provision will provide greater coverage to small volume lenders and, hopefully, provide greater incentives for them to participate in this program.

I wish to say also that the experience so far with the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act has been reassuring. The losses under this program have amounted to a fraction of 1 per cent and therefore the fishermen appear to be, on this record to date, very good risks indeed.

Before sitting down I should like to summarize the financial data relating to operations of the act to date. I am referring to the period since 1955, during which banks made loans under this legislation. As I said before, more than $6 million has been lent under this legislation, over half that amount or approximately $3.6 million going to fishermen in British Columbia. In part this may be because the provincial governments in the Atlantic provinces have set up credit institutions to lend money to fishermen, whereas in British Columbia that is not the case. The average loan in recent years has been about $4,500, roughly twice as much as the average loan made under the Farm Improvement Loans

Act to farmers. That fact may influence our final decision about the maximum loan to be made to an individual fisherman under this legislation.

After this bill is read a second time I hope it will be sent to the Committee on Fisheries and Forestry. We are looking for suggestions from hon. members and we will implement the suggestion to send the bill to that committee because we want to improve the credit of our fishermen. We believe the credit of the nation must be available to the fishermen of Canada. If the legislation is properly drafted it will help to support the fishing industry and make it more prosperous in the years to come.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the motion for second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-151 be amended by deleting the words "Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs" and substituting therefor the words "Fisheries and Forestry".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on second reading of Bill C-151 I wish first to express my appreciation to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) for the informative statement he made on this important matter. I also commend him for having his colleague move a motion to refer the bill to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry instead of to the finance committee. In my opinion the bill belongs in the Fisheries and Forestry Committee. I hope the co-operative attitude the minister has displayed will prevail in future on other suggestions that we on this side will make about other bills before the house.

As the minister said, the act this bill will amend was first introduced and passed by parliament in 1955. It was extended in 1959 for another three years and amended at that time to expand the definition of those who could borrow under it. It was again amended in 1962, and in 1965 the lending period was extended from July 1 to June 3, 1970.

At this time, Mr. Speaker, we are not being asked to extend the period under which loans will be granted. Instead, we are being asked to sign a blank cheque governing the rate of interest to be paid by fishermen on any loans approved in future. This, I might add, is a radical departure from the provisions of the original act which stated simply that the rate of interest to be charged by a lender on a loan was not to exceed 5 per cent per annum, simply interest. Now, we are told that on future loans under this act fishermen will pay a rate of interest to be prescribed by the Governor in Council. We are also told that the bill will authorize the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to designate certain trust, loan and insurance companies as authorized lenders under this act. Also, there will be an increase in the present limit of liability of the Minister of Finance in respect of individual lenders to encourage lending by small volume lenders.

In my judgment these changes will not bring about an increased use of this legislation. Nevertheless, the authorized use of trust, loan and insurance companies is a step in the right direction and may enable fishermen in some parts of the Atlantic provinces to secure loans from these organizations, specially if they reside a great distance from a bank or credit union.

I want to say at once that we in this party support this amendment. Though we have reservations about the increase in interest rates, we will support this bill because we believe that capital investment in modern equipment and technical know-how combined with skilled labour to a given resource will increase productivity and, thereby, total wealth.

For some reason the existing act has not been used by our fishermen to the extent planned by the government. A summary of operations for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1968, shows that a total of only 2,586 loans have been made by all lending institutions throughout Canada's ten provinces during the 13 years this act was in force. These loans amounted to $6,168,800. A study of these figures also demonstrates the character and integrity of Canada's fishermen. During the 13 years this act has been in force the government has been required to settle nine claims only for a total amount of $3,543. The minister said the record of our fishermen is reassuring, and well he might give them this accolade. Their record is outstanding and ought to be given greater prominence by the government. It indicates the strong moral fibre of our fishermen in meeting their financial obligations, even when the making of those payments at times required from them great personal effort and sacrifice. It is evident our lending institutions have little to worry about when granting a loan to a Canadian fisherman. This may account for the wording in the bill. Clause 3(ii) reads:

—as a result of guaranteed loans made by it after September 12, 1968, a total amount in excess of

(A) ninety per cent of that part of the aggregate principal amount of the guaranteed loans made by the lender that does not exceed one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars,

(B) fifty per cent of that part of the aggregate principal amount of the guaranteed loans made by the lender that exceeds one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars but does not exceed two hundred and fifty thousand dollars,—

Considering the amounts which have been lent to fishermen over the years I firmly believe this change will not impose any great liability on the Minister of Finance.

I note that the minister read from the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act bulletin, which is provided for the information of the fishermen, containing the changes he has outlined. I assume that all the other six terms and conditions respecting loans as listed in the original act still apply.

However, in his statement the minister has not provided us with any explanation of the lack of use of this act by our fishermen. In Nova Scotia it is evident that the fishermen are aware of the act but only 575 loans, amounting to $1,173,147, have been made since the inception of this legislation. In neighbouring New Brunswick only one loan was granted last year in the amount of $1,200, and since the act's inception only 170 loans were made in that province for a total amount of $131,378. In other provinces the story is much the same, and no doubt members from those areas will place on the record their views regarding this aspect of the legislation.

It is evident that this act in the past has not fulfilled the role for which it was designed, and I believe that the proposed increase in interest rates will make it even less effective in future. The increase in interest rates will certainly meet with the approval of our lending institutions but I cannot envision many fishermen jumping up and down on the wharves in the Atlantic provinces in praise of this change.

Since the facts would indicate that the fishermen generally are not aware of the act, I would suggest that the government give greater publicity to the measure by issuing better, perhaps more descriptive pamphlets, about it than the one which I now hold in my hand entitled, "Fishery Improvements Loan." From the facts that I have placed on the record it is evident that the fishermen are not aware of this particular program. If a better, more descriptive pamphlet were prepared by the minister and his department, and distributed by his many officials who operate in the Atlantic provinces as well as in his own area in British Columbia, this would be helpful in making fishermen aware of this particular aid.

There seems to be an attitude prevalent among Liberal government supporters and their advisers in Ottawa that the sky is the limit when it comes to spending. They seem to think when money gets tight all you have to do is increase the interest rates and more money will automatically become available from Canadians. From time to time we have heard pious protestations that spending would be curtailed, that the budget would be balanced, that we would get back to a sound economic policy, but the facts would indicate that this type of talk was only for the hustings. In truth, as we say in Nova Scotia, it was only the wind whistling in the rigging, and it is now evident that the government has lost complete control of Canada's finances.

It is this lack of control of expenditures by the government which makes it necessary to state in this bill that future loans made under the act will only be at rates of interest prescribed by the Governor in Council. With the fisherman's costs of ships and equipment constantly rising, and with prices generally for most of his products, particularly frozen fisheries products in the important United States market declining, I ask the minister and his colleagues where do they think the fisherman will get the money to pay higher interest rates? For that matter, what does the minister think will encourage the fisherman to secure a loan and plunge himself deeper and deeper into debt? A fisherman cannot operate his business in a manner comparable with the way in which the government is trying to run Canada. For example, last February the government estimated its spending at $10.2 billion while the latest estimate is some $400 million higher than that figure. If fishermen are to be classified as a good credit risk they must show good common sense and, above all, act in a responsible manner, which is a trait I would recommend for the consideration of the government.

It is impossible to think of a capital assistance program for the fisheries of Canada without realizing the tremendous importance of the fishing industry to the Atlantic provinces. The primary and processing branches together contribute over 8 per cent of the total net value of commodity production in the area, employ more than 6 per cent of the regional labour force, and fish products make up approximately one fifth of the total regional exports. However, in recent years the fishing industry has been going through a period of radical adjustment and there is really no quick solution—I am the first to recognize this fact—to some of its problems.

For example, on the Atlantic coast we have a highly productive, heavily capitalized off-shore fishery, and also a low productive, highly seasonal, labour intensive in-shore fishery yielding low incomes to those who rely on it for a livelihood. In addition, in the last 20 years there has been a tremendous shift from the traditional salt cod industry to the more diversified fresh and frozen fish products industry. Increasing pressure on fish stocks, not only by Canada but by other large fishing nations, has led to diminishing rewards for our fishermen and lower returns on their investment. Looking at the over-all industry there has been a downward trend in fisheries employment because the expansion in the offshore industry has been more than offset by a decline in inshore fishing activity.

In my opinion, this situation will continue and in fact will intensify in the years ahead, for it seems to me that in all industries the day of the independent, small scale primary producer is fast drawing to a close. The larger ships, the new and different fishing methods and equipment, plus an ever increasing use of electronic equipment have put all but a few of the small operators out of step with the present.

I believe future developments in the fishing industry must be viewed within the context of the development of the economy as a whole. I know the minister is working towards that end and he has given us some idea of what we can hope for in the future, but we in the Atlantic provinces hope it is not too long in coming. We look with much longing for his program, which from time to time he has hinted is coming.

Since it is evident that the off-shore fishery is more productive, and provides steadier employment and higher incomes, I believe we must give more thought to programs which will assist our fishermen to take advantage of this resource. In fact, with the expansion taking place in the fishing fleets of other nations we have no choice but to expand further our off-shore fleet if we wish to capitalize on this industry and provide further employment for our people. When you realize that we as Canadians are sending only one ton of fishing equipment to sea for every 80 tons sent by other countries you begin to realize that we must wake up, that we must look around and seize the opportunities that are open to us before they are taken away and developed by others.

Another interesting fact is that the ratio of Canadian fishing ships to those of other countries off to our shores is approximately 1 to 22. Now, this offshore expansion cannot take place over night. Some of our inshore fishermen are not young enough or physically capable of engaging in the offshore fishing industry. Therefore, some of this change can only come about as other jobs become available in other fields.

This is one of the reasons that we also look forward with interest to the regional development program of which we heard so much during the June election—

Mr. Stanfield: And seen so little of since.

Mr. Crouse: —and have seen so little of since that time. Any development program must be beamed toward our younger people, letting the eventual retirement of older fishermen gradually reduce their numbers to more acceptable levels, even though this may take a slightly longer period than would otherwise be desirable.

By encouraging programs which will expand the off-shore fishery it is hoped that the number of in-shore fishermen will be reduced, thus providing the inshore fishermen with a better chance of catching more fish and earning a better standard of living.

In summing up, I would suggest to the minister that if we are to have an orderly development of a modern fishing industry we must give encouragement to the trend from small inshore fishing operations to larger off-shore fishing vessels and even more modern fishing techniques. In order to bring this about the minister and his officials must give further consideration to the present ship-building subsidy program and reactivate the fishing vessel assistance program. Obviously this legislation which we now have under consideration is not adequate for this purpose. It alone will not enable our inshore fishermen, who are desirous of building 65 foot or 75 foot longliners, to achieve their goal. A fisherman or even a group of fishermen would find it extremely difficult to raise the necessary down payment in order to acquire a 65 foot or 75 foot longliner. Yet in the context in which I have presently explained the industry, this is an absolute necessity because the numbers of fish found on our inshore banks are declining. In order to go further afield, say, to Brown's or George's Bank where fishing is more profitable, the fishermen do require a larger ship.

Many of the fishermen have expressed their opinion to me that they require a ship of a minimum of 65 or 75 feet and of course they are unable to raise sufficient capital to construct this type of ship. The entire industry in some sections of Nova Scotia has come to a standstill, especially in areas where these so-called small boat fishermen are operating in considerable numbers. There was a time when none of us who are interested in the industry would look upon a 65 foot or a 75 foot ship as a small boat, but times change. I find now that our inshore fishermen are looking with interest to this type of ship and hope for the day when they will be able to build one and operate it along with their sons or immediate relatives. It is for this reason I hope the Minister of Fisheries will look carefully at the over-all program of assistance to the fishing industry. Of course one by-product of this type of assistance will be aid to our shipbuilding industry which is facing very serious economic difficulties at the present time. All of these problems will not be eliminated by this one particular move by the fisheries minister to reinstitute a subsidy program, but I can assure him it will be a considerable help to the people whom I have mentioned.

The traditional concept of the fishery as being an industry offering hard work, long working hours and little pay must change if it is to attract more young and energetic people. In my opinion, the fishery of the future will have to compete in every way with other industries. I believe this will involve the use of still larger ships with alternate crews to reduce the time each man spends at sea. Such a practice will also reduce the turn around time in port thus ensuring maximum use of this highly capitalized industry. In my opinion, the future development of the Atlantic fishery should be more planned and orderly than has been the case to date. Since most production in the industry is geared to the same market, the expansion in one province or area should be considered in relation to the expansion in other provinces or areas and in the light of existing or potential market conditions. This is one area in which I believe the Minister of Fisheries can be most helpful. I would suggest that both he and his officials could act as co-ordinator and a clearing house on development plans in the provinces. This type of co-operation is absolutely essential if marketing problems such as those which exist at present are to be avoided.

It is only through well planned, well co-ordinated programs of development that the fishing industry can reach its full potential and play its full part in the future development of the Atlantic provinces. Much has been done but the surface has only been scratched and much more remains to be done. We look to the minister for some proposal which will be helpful. I hope some of the suggestions I have made will be helpful to the minister. I can assure him it is the intention of members on this side of the house to co-operate with him in the implementation of any legislation that will be beneficial to the over-all industry.

Mr. Davis: Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member sits down I wonder whether I might ask him what, in his opinion, would be the average size of a loan which would be sufficient to help an individual fisherman finance a good, efficient, modern vessel for fishing in, say, Nova Scotia.

Mr. Crouse: Well, Mr. Speaker, the question of the Minister of Fisheries is an interesting one. It is almost impossible to reply until one knows the type of ship which would be required by the fisherman. For example, it might be a 65 foot or 75 foot ship which could be used in Danish seining. It could be a ship which would be used for the scallop dragging industry on George's Bank and/or conversely which could be used as a longliner or for ground fishing. It would depend entirely on the area in which the ship was to be operated. For instance, if it were to be operated in the Bay of Fundy it would require heavy power since the strong tides and currents in that area require that a ship have more power than one which would be operating in some other area. One would need to know the type of equipment involved, whether it would be for scallop dragging, Danish seining, ground fishing or longlining. If it is to be a longliner with 20 miles of nylon line, 1,000 floats and over 1,000 hooks it will require considerable capital investment. Conversely, if it is to be utilized only in the lobster industry some of this more expensive equipment would not be required.

Therefore, I would not be in a position to hazard a guess which would be useful to the minister, but I am sure this information is available from the fishermen's loan boards in the four Atlantic provinces. The minister could readily glean that fact from any of the officials. I am sorry, but I cannot give a more constructive reply to his question.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, when the government brings in a bill amending a good piece of legislation and tells us that the purpose of the amendment is to improve the existing legislation it is standard practice from the opposition side of the house to say, "We welcome the amending bill." I wonder whether we really should welcome this piece of legislation. Indeed, I think not. I took note of the words of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse). He said his party welcomes it but has misgivings about the part of it that raises the interest rate. Well, I submit there is not much else in the bill. I know there are two other things but I doubt whether the bill would have been brought in at all were it not for the purpose of taking off this 5 per cent ceiling on the rate of interest.

I suggest this long line of government bills to raise interest rates is becoming pretty dreary, pretty monotonous. It started a couple of years ago when the ceiling was taken off the rate of interest which banks may charge, which for many years was fixed at six per cent.

Members who were here and members who were not here will remember that the aim was to assist the little man. Well, we have now heard a statement from the governor of the Bank of Canada which confirms our view of that proposal, namely that it has turned out to be more beneficial to the banks than it has to the little man.

We have a government that has brought in a formula under which the interest rates on housing have gone up and up and up. Members will also remember the many days we spent on farm legislation. What was it that was central to each of those bills? Each of them raised the interest rate. In fact, I quite expect that before this debate is over some of my farm colleagues will get up and make speeches on this fisheries legislation, and they will make them very easily. All they will have to do is pick up the speeches they made on the Farm Improvement Loans Act and make the same speeches but substitute dried fish for damp grain.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): They could just repeat them from memory.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They could make them without reading them; that is correct. I am glad that the Minister without Portfolio recognizes the parallel between what is being done for the fishermen and what was done for the farmers. What is the government saying that is being done for the farmers, the fishermen and the little man? It is saying nothing except that we will have these higher interest rates. If we get through this debate, the next item on the order paper for the attention of the house is an amendment to the Veteran's Land Act. Can't you just hear the same screech coming from the government that it is doing this because it is good legislation and it wants to improve the situation for veterans? What does it do? It removes the 5 per cent interest ceiling.

I do not think we can take ourselves into affluence and prosperity and into a just society by raising the interest rates all around. I suggest that what the government should be doing in this area, instead of giving in to the trend and instead of going along with higher interest rates, is taking steps to roll back interest rates.

Mr. Baldwin: Be careful of that word "trend".

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) suggests I should be careful of that word "trend". We have a "trendy" Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who is following the trend, which is to raise interest rates for the so-called benefit of the little man, the working man, the farmer, the fishermen and the person who needs housing. The result is, of course, that interest rates just go higher and higher and people have to pay more for the money they get and suffer more in paying it back.

Mind you, there are some interest rates that do not go up. The government is still paying only 4 per cent on the money that is in the civil service superannuation fund. I must be careful or I will get off on a speech which I would not be in order in making, but I think I have made my point.

We have contended in respect of housing that instead of undergirding and guaranteeing high interest rates there should be direct government loans for the building of homes.

When we were debating farm matters my friends from farming constituencies took the same position in respect of loans to farmers for farm improvements and other purposes. They suggested instead of undergirding and supporting these higher interest rates there should be direct government loans.

I suggest that if the government is going to be of any help to the fishing industry, instead of this kind of legislation it should be bringing in provision for direct government loans. I support that part of the speech of the hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) when he objected to the interest rate. I also support the more important part of his speech in which he said there were other important things like the building of ships and other arrangements to build up the fishing industry which should be done if the government is really interested in this whole matter.

I do not intend to make a 40 minute speech and I hope the minister does not get up and ask me technical questions as to what is required for fishermen on the south shore of Nova Scotia. The only difference between the hon. member for South Shore and me is that I would not even try to answer. But I do know the difference between a 5 per cent interest rate and an interest rate that has no ceiling but which becomes 6 per cent, 7 per cent, 7½ per cent, 8 per cent or 9⅜ per cent, which is the rate that has been reached for housing under the National Housing Act.

I do believe that in this whole field, from the taking of the ceiling off the interest rates the bank can charge on through the price, the government has taken the people who need homes, the fishermen who need assistance, the veterans who need assistance, the farmers who need assistance, and all the rest of us, down the garden path.

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this bill I should like to make a few remarks about its relation to the province of Newfoundland. Whilst I do not wish to appear too regionalistic in my views by confining my remarks to the province of Newfoundland in so far as this bill is concerned, I must point out that the fishing industry, while it plays a very important part in the economy of the other Atlantic provinces, plays an even greater part in the economy of Newfoundland. While there are a number of people employed in the fishing industry in other Atlantic provinces—people who derive a livelihood from the fishing industry—I would suggest again that there are more people who derive their livelihood from this industry in Newfoundland, at least proportionately, than in any other province of Canada.

I should like to say to the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) through you sir, that this act and the amendments thereto which we are now discussing is just another empty gesture on the part of the federal government so far as Newfoundland is concerned. I should say that whatever its virtues may be so far as the fishermen in Canada are concerned, it does nothing—I repeat, absolutely nothing—for the people of my province, but emphasize the difference between other Canadians and the people of Newfoundland.

Since the inception of this legislation there has been a total of 2,586 loans made. There have been only 18 loans made in the province of Newfoundland. Of a total of $6 million loaned under this legislation only 18 loans amounting to $23,000 have been made to the fishermen of Newfoundland at the old rate of 5 per cent. The fishing industry is very important to my province when 25 per cent or ¼ of the population is directly or indirectly affected by this industry. The drastic state of the industry and the economic conditions that exist have made it impossible for Newfoundland fishermen to take full advantages of this legislation.

As I have said, since the inception of this legislation only 18 loans totaling $23,000 have been made to Newfoundland fishermen at the rate of 5 per cent. I ask you, how many fewer loans will be made when the interest rate has been lifted to accommodate chartered banks? Obviously, the interest rates will be increased, and the minister mentioned a figure of 7½ per cent. In the past when the interest rate was 5 per cent, the fishermen in my province only received 18 loans. I suggest that under this new legislation when the ceiling has been lifted absolutely no loans will be made to Newfoundland fishermen.

I do not know how welcome or beneficial this amendment will be to fishermen in other parts of Canada, but I can say without fear of contradiction that it will be completely useless so far as the Newfoundland fishing industry is concerned.

This legislation is just too sophisticated for an industry that has been allowed to languish in stone age techniques for too long. The bulk of the fishermen in the Newfoundland area and, I suspect in the Atlantic area generally, go to the fishing grounds in small, wooden boats and put out nets and lines by hand. They are competing with foreign fishing fleets complete with modern vessels, advanced fish catching and processing techniques, factory ships and the latest electronic and mechanical aids.

What we need most is assistance to bring the east coast fishing industry, and in particular the Newfoundland fishing industry into the twentieth century. We need a program of co-ordinated government assistance that will help the east coast fishermen, the Newfoundland fishermen, to achieve an equal competitive footing with the modern fishing fleets of other nations. Then, and only then, can we expect the Newfoundland fishermen to take advantage of legislation such as we are debating tonight.

As I understand it, this legislation simply provides that fishermen may obtain a bank loan at the going rate of interest. In order to persuade the chartered banks to make funds available, the government will guarantee these loans. I ask the Minister of Fisheries this question: How can the ordinary fisherman in my province even think of borrowing money which must be repaid in ordinary ways? How can a fisherman in my province think of borrowing money when his income is completely inadequate to handle such a financial burden and when the industry from which he makes that income is in such a sorry state?

The other day the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) complained in this house about the advertisements currently appearing in various newspapers and magazines. These advertisements are placed in the newspapers and magazines by the chartered banks in order to encourage people to spend beyond their means on frills and luxuries. As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, this policy defeats the aim of the government to cut back spending and extravagance in order to control inflation. Surely, legislation such as this, carrying as it does the authority and prestige of the federal government, is nothing but an open invitation to the Newfoundland fisherman to plunge into debt away over his head.

I suggest that if by obtaining a loan provided by this legislation the fisherman could hope to better either his income, or his standard of living or his ability to catch more fish, it might be a worth while gamble. But all he would do would be to spend money in a hopeless attempt to catch up with his competition. He would find himself no further ahead, and certainly further in debt.

[Mr. Carter.]

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat, what the Newfoundland fisherman needs is not legislation such as this but legislation that will help him tackle the root problems that beset his industry. He needs legislation that will help him overcome the social problems which he faces. Before we extend loan facilities to the people of my province we must bring them up to a position where they can usefully employ such loans. We must devote our attention to assisting fishermen on the east coast, and those in Newfoundland in particular, to improve their method of operation, their fishing techniques and means of marketing.

I am interested in an answer given in the house by the Minister of Fisheries to a question which I put to him concerning the establishment of a salt fish marketing board in Canada. I am looking forward with great interest to an announcement by the minister to the effect that this board will be established. I am sure I speak for all the fishermen in my province when I say we are keenly interested in this proposition. Such a marketing board should be established and, as I have said before, we are eagerly looking forward to an announcement by the minister in this respect.

I understand that before the end of January or some time soon a statement will be made by the government outlining the assistance that will be given to the fresh frozen fish industry on the east coast. I am very much interested in this question. I think I speak for all the fishermen in Newfoundland, and indeed all the fishermen in eastern Canada, when I say that we are anxiously awaiting the minister's statement in this regard.

There is a great need for drastic, immediate action by the government to improve the lot of the average fisherman on the east coast of Canada, especially those in the province of Newfoundland. I am sure members of this house and the minister are aware of the situation that now exists in my province. The fresh fish industry is in a state of chaos. Plants are threatening to close, and indeed in many instances have closed. They have been unable to make a "go" of it.

As I have said before in the house, unless the government accepts its responsibility in this respect and brings forward a plan of assistance, the fishing industry in Newfoundland and, I suspect in eastern Canada, will not survive. I do not wish to appear pessimistic but I think we have to be realistic. The fishing industry must have immediate assistance from the government. This assistance is all the more important to the province that I have the honour to represent. In my province, as I have said before, almost 25 per cent of the people derive their living directly or indirectly from the fishing industry. I urge the minister and his colleagues to come up with a plan to save the fishing industry of Newfoundland. The situation now is such that unless a plan of assistance is forthcoming the fishing industry is in grave danger of collapsing.

The legislation which we are now debating is of little or no use to Newfoundland in that the fishermen have not obtained loans under this program. Since the inception of the legislation only 18 loans out of a total of 2,586 have been made to fishermen in my province. I suggest this is because the Department of Fisheries has not publicized the program. I do not know to what extent the program has been publicized, but I suggest there must be some way in which it could be publicized more effectively in provinces such as Newfoundland to enable the fishermen to understand the program and avail themselves of loans under it. Perhaps the Minister of Fisheries could explain why in Newfoundland only 18 people out of a total of 2,586 have made use of the money available under this act.

I ask the minister to take steps to give this program wide publicity and try to find a way whereby fishermen who qualify for a loan under the act may be spared the time and trouble of having to travel long distances to the chartered banks or trust companies in order to obtain a loan. I ask him to try to find means whereby loans may be approved by perhaps fishery officers or officials of his department, thereby saving the fisherman the trouble, time and money involved in travelling to the larger centres in Newfoundland in order to make application for a loan.

Mr. Tom H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Like many members of this house who concern themselves with the welfare of the fishing community, I welcome the introduction of these proposals at this early time. I congratulate the minister upon introducing the legislation, and indeed since the hon. member for Capilano (Mr. Davis) has been Minister of Fisheries the fishermen of Canada, and particularly of British Columbia, are becoming accustomed to receiving constructive measures to deal with their numerous difficult problems.

The fisherman is, in essence, a small business man who requires medium range, low cost credit to improve and extend his operations, just as farmers and industry require low interest credit to conduct their operations.

This act has become archaic in the last 12 months and of little or no use to the industry because the present interest rate of 5 per cent has become unrealistic and certainly unobtainable. Financial institutions such as banks and credit unions are finding they must pay their depositors more than 5 per cent for the use of their funds. The credit unions, which have always enthusiastically supported the small fishermen, have reluctantly turned their lending support elsewhere in order to justify investments to the depositors.

Further, the government's guarantee of 15 per cent of the capital lent by the institutions is unrealistic and not in line with government policy in other fields such as agriculture and housing. The fisherman has found himself in an unsolvable dilemma. He has a government which would guarantee his loan, but he cannot find an institution which would accept the terms. Therefore, he has turned elsewhere and been forced to enter an unfavourable money market where rumours of bad catches and poor fishing returns have followed him.

Fishermen are told they must pay 10, 12 and 16 per cent for their funds; a price they can ill afford. Owners of fishing boats have turned to the fish buyers, the suppliers and the packing houses for their needed funds, a situation which is completely unsatisfactory to both the fishermen and the companies. The companies, in turn, must now borrow moneys to meet the boat owners' needs and are unable to use their credit facilities to modernize or build new plants, forcing down the manufacturer's productivity. The fishermen who obtain loans from these companies naturally feel bound to them, as far as the sale of their fish is concerned, and feel unable to take advantage of a competitive market.

It would indeed be attractive to retain the 5 per cent interest rate for fishing vessel improvement and purchase but completely unrealistic for it is much better to have 7 or 8 per cent money available than no money whatsoever at 5 percent. Indeed, this interest amendment is a realistic one which will be welcomed by fishermen and fish packing companies on both coasts.

The amendments regarding a 90 per cent guarantee of the first $125,000 will be accepted by small credit unions across our nation with open arms for once more these institutions will be allowed to assist the small fisherman, a position the community minded credit union wishes to enjoy.

But I suggest there is one section of this act which must be criticized to the fullest extent and there is an omission in the legislation which must be pointed out to this house. The fact that the amount to be borrowed remains at $10,000 is completely unacceptable. If we expect the fishing industry to benefit from our efforts, we must increase this amount to at least $30,000.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Goode: Let us look at government policy in similar situations during the last few months. Indeed, we recently increased the amount an individual could borrow under the farm improvement act from $15,000 to $25,000. The average farm loan is only $2,600, whereas the average fisheries improvement loan is $4,500. Therefore, in this situation, $30,000 is far more realistic.

The house must keep in mind that current shipbuilding costs, boat engines replacement costs and the cost of equipment have risen above those of 1965 when this figure of $10,000 was considered adequate. It is my hope that after this bill is completely reviewed by the house, the government will relent on this outdated and confining limit and let us have a realistic ceiling of $30,000 for our fishing industry.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I say that the proposed amendments are simple ones. They will encourage more participation by financial institutions, and as a result fishermen will have greater opportunity to borrow on reasonable terms and conditions to meet their growing capital needs. These amendments will contribute to greater efficiency, to reducing the cost of financing and to assisting in the productivity of a very important primary industry.

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode) because my reasoning is along the same lines. Bill C-151 to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act certainly has some sections which are welcome. For example, clause 1 permits an insurance company, trust company and loan company to become a lender under the act, in addition to those lenders already approved by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) such as banks, credit unions or other co-operative credit societies. I certainly support that provision because it creates better opportunities for our fishermen to obtain loans under the act.

Clause 2 of the proposed act is amended so that the maximum rate of interest of 5 per cent which now exists is replaced by such rate or rates of interest as may be prescribed by the Governor in Council. I assume that the same rate will apply here as will apply to loans to farmers which we discussed before Christmas. This, too, can be considered favourably.

If banks and other lending institutions are not interested in making loans because the interest rate is too low, then this is all to the good because other lenders will be more interested in making loans. If this is the case, it might enable more fishermen to obtain loans but an additional burden is added to some fishermen because the amount of their monthly or yearly payments is increased. So, I am sure the fishermen will not jump with joy on the wharves or elsewhere on hearing of this amendment. However, we must be constructive and we must ask ourselves who else can obtain loans at 5 per cent? Why should fishermen be set apart from the rest of the borrowers? I am sure this was the thought which the minister had when he proposed this amendment. But I am sure that if other interest rates had not gone up such as those relating to housing and other industries, and if this were not the trend as suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the minister would not have followed this course. His reasoning would be correct if the fishing industry were operating on a similar basis to that of any other industry.

Until the government introduces legislation or policies to ensure that all segments of the economy operate on the same profitable basis, we will have arguments.

• (9:20 p.m.)

I am not saying that all fishing operations are unprofitable. The groundfish industry in the Atlantic area is having its problems but in my own area the industry has become more diversified which enables more solid operations to be carried out, for example, fishing for lobster, scallop and herring. I am convinced there is a future for fishermen engaged in this type of fishing.

Clause 3 of the bill is also welcome. It encourages lending and it protects small volume lenders.

Up to now, I have not been too critical of this bill. But I do say to the minister that if he wishes to improve the fisheries loans legislation he should do a more thorough job. Why doesn't he go all out? This bill is essentially one to protect the banks and loan companies by increasing interest rates and by guaranteeing to the extent of 90 per cent, in one case, loans which do not exceed a total of $125,000.

This is all well and good. But what improvements have been made to help the fishermen themselves? This is what the act should be chiefly concerned with doing. The main reason for the ineffectiveness of the federal legislation is that the ceiling on loans is still too low, despite the increase from $4,000 to $10,000. The purchase of a purse seine, or a mid-water trawl, or equipment for crab fishing for a modern fishery, to name just a few items, represents an investment substantially greater than $10,000. As I say, if the minister wants to improve the act, why doesn't he go all out? I am talking, now, about loans to the profitable segment of the industry. I am not talking about a subsidy. I am talking about loans to make the industry modern and efficient in accordance with the wish the minister himself has often expressed in his speeches.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we are always protecting the big men, the big companies, the big corporations. And we always seem to forget the small man who has ambition and who would like to do something but is unable to get ahead because his family is not rich or because he doesn't know the right people. It is a disgrace, but most of our legislation protects the big man.

Granted, as the minister has said, that more than $6 million has been lent to fishermen since the inception of the act six years ago. In the ten year period from December, 1955 to March, 1966, a total of approximately $3 million was lent to the fishermen of Canada. But here is a comparison. In a one year period from April 1, 1967 to March 31, 1968, the fishermen's loan board of Nova Scotia lent fishermen no less than $6 million, or a little over. These new amendments will help, but they are not the real cure for the problems which the fishermen or the industry as a whole are facing.

The government has virtually put an end to the subsidy program in connection with wooden fishing vessels. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) says we cannot afford it. Very well, I will go along with that. If we cannot afford it, fine. Here is one way in which we could help. Why not assist fishermen by means of improvement loans which could be protected by the fisheries indemnity plan, one which provides the useful and attractive insurance scheme for fishing boats? This plan makes provision for maximum coverage of $25,000 and is self-supporting. Again, the maximum here could be increased so as to fully protect all loans. The government would be protected and fishermen would be equipped with better facilities to make the industry more profitable. The reason insurance coverage on boats is not increased is, once again, that to do so would affect the insurance companies. Once more we are protecting the big men. Let us stop playing politics, stop protecting the big guys, and help those who need help and who want to help themselves. I ask the committee to consider these suggestions carefully in due course.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): I was interested in the minister's statement in introducing this bill for second reading. I was interested and surprised because he confined his remarks to the narrow confines of the bill before us, an act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

In the course of his remarks the hon. gentleman failed to make any reference to the very serious problems facing the ground fish industry in Canada today. He failed to make any reference to the fact that this legislation is of no value whatever to the ground fish industry. One can only conclude he omitted to refer to it because he does not fully understand the situation.

In the course of the oral question period today the minister said in reply to a question I put to him that within the month he would be announcing government policy regarding—and I am paraphrasing—interim assistance to the ground fish industry. That is an improvement.

It is an improvement of 100 per cent, because we know that before the Christmas recess the minister was adamant in his refusal to give any indication that the government would provide assistance to the harrassed ground fish industry in Canada before the beginning of the next fiscal year in March of 1969. He was adamant in this regard even though the industry in eastern Canada had indicated to him that the whole of the ground fish industry was on the verge of total collapse because the government had cancelled the program of deficiency payments in October of last year. This course had been taken even though the factors contributing to the crisis requiring the deficiency payments were continuing and had in fact been accentuated. As I say, Mr. Speaker, it is an improvement. The minister has indicated, at least, that the government now recognizes the emergency nature of the situation, the existence of a crisis within the industry. He now recognizes that the industry must have interim assistance until the government gets around to long term policy planning in this regard.

This situation was brought about by factors over which the industry has no control. The minister well knows that it was brought about by conditions that are totally within the jurisdiction of the federal government. It has resulted from increased competition from countries who have devalued their currency, countries of the sterling bloc that have increased the subsidies paid to their fleets and in the process have flooded the United States market to the detriment of the industry in Canada. These are factors over which the Canadian industry has no control but which do fall 100 per cent within the jurisdiction of this government.

In introducing second reading of the bill this evening, the minister failed to make any reference to the critical situation facing the industry today. Only a few hours previously, on the oral question period today the minister said that within the month, presumably before January is out, the government will be announcing interim and long term planning to assist the ground fish industry of Canada.

As I say, in introducing the bill this evening the minister made no reference to the crisis facing the industry, knowing in his own heart that the industry is on the verge of total collapse because of government inaction. The minister knows that seven fish plants in the province of Newfoundland in the last two years have had to close down. At least, three have closed and four are going to close at the end of this month. These closures are due to the crisis in the United States market.

The minister also knows that the same acute situation is facing the Nova Scotian industry, which also is on the verge of collapse as a result of the same factors. Yet the minister stands in his place tonight and talks of an amendment to the act which, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said, merely gives the government the power to increase the rate of interest charged on fisheries improvement loans.

[Mr. McGrath.]

In actual fact this legislation is of no use to the Canadian ground fish industry; it is valueless to them. It is of great interest to the British Columbian industry, and I would be the first to support the legislation in view of that fact. But the Atlantic ground fish industry is facing a serious crisis, and in this regard I should like to put some facts on record.

I should like to make reference to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act annual report for 1967-68. According to this report, since the inception of the act the province of British Columbia has taken advantage of the provisions of the act and borrowed $3,591,662. This act came into effect in 1955. The province of Alberta has, of course, borrowed nothing. The province of Saskatchewan has borrowed $1,440. The province of Manitoba has borrowed $28,505. The province of Ontario has borrowed $98,681. The province of Quebec has borrowed $112,796. The province of New Brunswick has borrowed $131,378. The province of Nova Scotia has borrowed $1,173,147. The province of Prince Edward Island has borrowed $1,008,188. And lastly, the province of Newfoundland has borrowed $23,003. Since the inception of the act the province of Newfoundland has been extended 18 loans to the amount of $23,000, compared with the province of Prince Edward Island with 850 loans to the amount of $1 million.

There is my proof that this legislation is of no use whatever to the ground fish industry in Canada. As the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Carter) has indicated, 25 per cent of the population of the province of Newfoundland is dependent for their livelihood upon the ground fish industry. Yet the province of Prince Edward Island, with a population of 100,000, has been able to take tremendous advantage of this legislation.

As I say, in his introduction to the second reading of this bill the minister failed to make any reference whatever to the very serious situation facing the ground fish industry in eastern Canada, even though the bill provided him with the vehicle for so doing. I might say this is the first opportunity he has had to do so since his estimates were presented to the house before the Christmas recess. All this legislation does is to give the government the necessary authority to increase the rates of interest charged under the legislation.

It will make no difference to the ground fisherman or the cod fisherman whether the chartered banks, the insurance companies, the mortgage companies or any of these lending institutions are empowered to make loans under the act. He will still not be able to take advantage of the act's provisions for the simple reason that the lending institutions within the ambit of the act do not lend money to small economies of the sort with which the ground fisherman has to contend with his annual income of $1,000 a year. What lending institution or loan company would look at our inshore fisherman?

Statistics speak for themselves; they cannot be denied. The statistics that are on the record indicate that the inshore fisherman in eastern Canada earns, on average, $1,000 a year. This puts him outside the legislation and makes it of no value to him. As I said, I am at least grateful that the fishermen of British Columbia can take advantage of it, but what assistance, apart from the lobster fishermen or the fishermen of Prince Edward Island, do the fishermen in other parts of eastern Canada receive? What assistance do these 150,000 people in Atlantic Canada who are engaged in the ground fish industry receive?

What legislation does the government of Canada have to enable the 20,000 inshore fishermen in eastern Canada to secure loans to buy equipment? They have to pay the same inflated prices that prevail in British Columbia and Ontario, yet they have no legislation to assist them. Not only do we not have legislation to protect them, but we have a government that looks at them callously, without humanity and without feeling. The attitude of the government to the ground fish industry is, "They are all gold brickers down there; let them eat cake. They are bluffing. Let the industry collapse."

Oh, the Minister of Fisheries will get on national television and say, "There are plants in the Atlantic provinces that are inefficient and they must close down. Only efficient plants can continue to operate." That is like Joseph Stalin saying in the 1930's, "We must wipe out 1 million peasants in order to make the agricultural industry in the Soviet Union more efficient." That is the analogy, Mr. Speaker. When the minister says that only efficient plants may continue to operate he is saying in effect that there is room only for the elite in the Atlantic groundfish industry and, "The rest of you will have to go on relief. The fish are there but you cannot catch them because you are not efficient enough and because we, as a government, cannot cope with conditions in the United States market. We cannot fulfil our obligations to you as other countries do for their fishermen in order to ensure you earn a fair return for your catch and in order that you may be protected against the fluctuations in the international money market."

This legislation is very helpful and useful to the fishermen of British Columbia. They obtained the lion's share of the 780 loans granted since the fund was inaugurated in 1955. On national television the minister said the British Columbia fishermen are by far the best equipped of all the fishermen in Canada, and he used extravagant statistics to support his statement. He said the Newfoundland fishing industry is receiving 40 cents in federal subsidies for every dollar spent on our fisheries, whereas the British Columbia industry is receiving only 5 cents. He failed to mention that included in the figure of 40 cents is unemployment insurance for fishermen, which applies universally. He failed to include subsidies for shipbuilding; he failed to include the centralization program which is causing so much heartache in Newfoundland. He failed to include all those things in his misrepresentation of the facts, because that is the only way one can describe his statement. It was a total misrepresentation of facts.

Mr. Perrault: That is an irresponsible charge.

Mr. McGrath: It is a responsible charge, and the minister knows it. The minister made a statement on national television which he cannot support. Although the ground fish industry of Atlantic Canada today is on the verge of total collapse the minister knows that not one single dollar is going directly to its support. Oh, yes, the minister is well qualified to talk about the fishing industry. He caught trout in British Columbia. He fished for trout.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Perrault: You are fishing for votes. That's what you are doing.

Mr. McGrath: The hon. member can sit there complacently and interject because the knows how well off the fishing industry of his province is. He has not been to Atlantic Canada. He has no idea of the dire circumstances facing the fishermen of Atlantic Canada. He represents the fat cats of the fishing industry.

An hon. Member: Make responsible charges.

Mr. McGrath: The Minister of Fisheries is a member of a government that treats the fishing industry of Atlantic Canada callously, without heart and without feeling. Only a minister from British Columbia could say what the present minister said. We had a minister from British Columbia before—

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. McGrath: —and the same thing happened. A previous minister from British Columbia displayed a similar attitude.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tolmie): Order, please. The hon. member for St. John's East has the floor.

Mr. McGrath: The attitude of this government is epitomized by the attitude of this minister who, in the midst of the gravest crisis ever to face the fishing industry of Atlantic Canada, says, "Let them eat cake." That is his attitude.

He said on national television that many more fish processing plants will have to close down and that mistakes have been made in the centralization program. Oh, yes, he talked about mistakes in the centralization program as if he were talking about bookkeeping entries. His attitude was, "We moved people to the wrong place."

An hon. Member: That's the computer's fault.

Mr. McGrath: The minister's attitude is, "The computer made the mistake". We just happened to move people to the wrong place. We moved them out of their homes and happened to move them to the wrong place. We made mistakes. What is an individual? What are 100 individuals. What are one or two settlements?" That is his callous attitude and the attitude of a government that could not care less. This is the leadership our Minister of Fisheries gives to the fishing industry of Canada.

An hon. Member: Shame.

[Mr. McGrath.]

Mr. McGrath: That is the sort of leadership we have from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). As a member of parliament from Newfoundland, I am shocked that the Minister of Fisheries could introduce this legislation affecting the fisheries of Canada without making a single reference to the severe crisis facing the industry in eastern Canada. He did not mention the crisis once. He acted as if it did not exist or as if there were no fisheries. The crisis will not be resolved if the government persists in its do nothing attitude. But there is a ray of hope, Mr. Speaker. There is a glimmer of silver lining on the horizon. Replying to a question this afternoon, the minister said that within a month, meaning presumably before the end of January, he, on behalf of the government, would announce interim and long term planning programs affecting the Atlantic groundfish industry. Before this debate finishes I hope the minister will amplify those remarks, because the entire industry, in a manner of speaking, is holding its breath in anticipation. I hope the minister will say the government is sincere and means what it says.

To paraphrase the minister's reply early this afternoon, he said one of the main objectives of the government's program will be to insure that prices paid to fishermen in 1968 will prevail. The fishermen of Newfoundland would like to have that statement amplified so that they may know precisely what it means. The prices paid to Newfoundland fishermen in 1968 ran the full gamut from 1.5 cents a pound to 4 cents a pound.

The minister well knows that. Are we to conclude the fishermen will be paid the maximum of four cents a pound, not the minimum of one and a half cents a pound? These are questions to which an answer is awaited not by those members on this side of the house who are directly interested or involved in this question but by thousands and thousands of Canadians in the Atlantic provinces of Canada who are barely eking out a subsistence on the neglected ground fishing industry.

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the privilege and the opportunity to express my views on Bill No. C-151 called an Act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

The main purposes of this amendment could be summed up as follows:

First, to empower the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) to designate certain trust and loan companies as well as insurance companies as authorized lenders; second, to grant the Minister of Finance more responsibilities concerning individual lenders, which means that the government will guarantee in the future more important loans; third, to substitute for the present interest rate of 5 per cent the rate or rates that may be prescribed by the Governor in Council.

It is quite normal and in accordance with the practices of trade and industry for the fishermen or the fishing concerns to have access to the sources of financing in the same capacity as other concerns. Indeed, they need the credit that will enable them to finance their operations in a normal way, to invest in order to extend their trade or to renew obsolete equipment which can no longer be used.

This legislation enables also an individual to start a fishing concern thanks to loans granted by authorized companies.

The present bill is nothing but a change to the act which was sanctioned on July 11, 1955 and amended in 1959, 1962 and 1965.

Many similar acts deal with the farm industry and have the same purposes.

It is a good thing that there should be a greater number of authorized lending companies. We should hope for more competition between lending companies, in order to make sure that more considerable amounts are put at the disposal of fishermen and farmers, but I strongly doubt that this objective will be reached.

On the one hand, we want to accredit a greater number of lending companies thus causing available capital to become scarce since it is almost entirely built up from the savings of the Canadian people. Capital to finance private developments is scarce because the Canadian government, the provinces, the municipalities and the school boards secure the main bulk of the public savings to finance their own commitments.

Recent statistics issued by Wood Gundy Securities Ltd., a brokerage firm, and made available by the Canadian Press to our different information media, show that the various governments control the savings which, after all, are the main source of funds for financing private enterprise.

I quote an excerpt from the January 7 issue of La Presse which shows the government hold on public savings.

> Statistics issued by Wood Gundy Securities Ltd., a brokerage agency, about bond financing by governments and private companies, show that the federal government loans amounted to $5,263,955,000 in 1968.

This figure compares with that of $3,283,-909,500 for the year 1967 and it is the highest for the last five years.

> In 1968, the provincial governments borrowed, for their part, $1,384,700,000 as compared to $1,603,-006,000 in 1967.
> Loans through bonds floated by the Canadian municipalities in 1968—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order please. I wonder if I should not interrupt the hon. member, for I am afraid he is getting somehow away from the bill the house is considering at the moment, I mean the act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Rodrigue: As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, a solution must be found to this problem. The time has come to make a distinction between public developments, to give fishermen and farmers a greater proportion of investments and savings. Those changes could result in lower interest rates, and if more funds were available, certain private sectors could be financed. Savings constitute a huge financing "pool", but they are not limitless. They do not constitute an inexhaustible well. When governments take over indirectly private sources of capital, there is a danger of increasing interest rates, and that is what happens in the case of this bill, when industry and business have run out of funds.

In itself, this bill is commendable, but the present economic situation is not favorable; it could impede considerably what effects this legislation could have as far as our fishermen are concerned.

It is not by passing an act which will make more capital available to the fishermen that we will solve the problem. Interest rates constitute an even less commendable step. On the contrary, they will contribute even more to increasing the cost of production and operations and, in a few years, we will be called upon to amend the act in an attempt to solve the problem of the fishermen, which is created by a government that tolerates and encourages this shortage of capital and those high interest rates.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It being ten o'clock it is my duty to proceed to the questions to be debated on the adjournment motion.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, may I just get one of the bright young ministers to confirm that we are going on with this bill tomorrow and the other set legislation? I would even be prepared to take the word of the very honourable government whip on this matter.

Mr. Forest: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to announce the business of the house for tomorrow. We will continue with the bill under discussion today, C-151, and when it is concluded the house will deal with item No. 12 on the order paper, an act to amend the Veterans Land Act. If it is concluded the house will deal with item No. 33, Bill S-14, an act to amend the Aeronautics Act, and if this is concluded we would go on to item 41, an act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under standing order No. 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—LOAN TO BRAZIL

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I directed a question to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) as to the $850,000 interest-free loan made to Brazil but I did not get any answer.

We noticed some time ago, for instance, that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has increased its rates of interest to a level that contributes to the inflation prevailing in this country.

Since the beginning of 1969, we have that, from now on, those who wish to buy a house will have to pay interest at 9⅜ per cent, as this is now the usurious rate adopted by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

We could call that an act of piracy on the part of those who brought about that situation by depriving, so to speak, certain Canadian families of the right to build a home. At the present time, if a family head does not earn $10,000 per year, he cannot afford getting a new house.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) was appointed to a royal commission on housing and he travelled over 26,000 miles, going from one city to another, in order to find out what was wrong in the housing field. Now if such an expensive inquiry did nothing but contribute to an increase in interest rates, while we lend money without interest to foreigners, I think this is shameless swindling. In the face of such glaring injustice, the Canadian people cannot agree with the government and they are sorry to see a majority government indulging in such high-scale bigotry.

While the government is borrowing money, it is lending Brazil $850,000 for the construction of an airport and no doubt on an interest free basis as we are not given an answer.

As the Minister of Finance has failed to find a solution to this problem, especially when we are asking him to use the Bank of Canada for the benefit of the Canadian people, I say this is an unjustified loan while the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is increasing the interest rate to 9⅜ per cent. There is a limit to being patient and we have reached it. If there is no one in Canada in a position to awaken public opinion, our future position will become very difficult.

Besides, on looking back to the French revolution of 1793, when the king of France lost his throne and was beheaded by the guillotine, it so happened that the little people were tired and disgusted because of the indifference of their government. In fact, the government had not heeded the murmurs of discontent that preceded this terrible catastrophe.

It is often said that activity in the building trade is a sign of prosperity. Consequently, if we are in a position to make interest-free loans to Brazil, why instead of increasing the interest rates, could we not grant subsidies of 4 or 5 per cent on the purchase price of a house so that everybody could own his house?

It is felt that, under duress, the Canadian people must continue to pay interest on $5,300,000,000 for 1968 as compared to $3,300,000,000 for the year before.

Is this logical? Is this the price we have to pay for "Trudeaumania" which allowed elections to be held thanks to an electoral fund, which having been financed by out-and-out exploiters still makes it possible today to smother all human life as would an octopus?

Those financiers control the blood of our national economy. We are aware of it every day, since nobody can even breathe without their permission. But to-morrow, Mr. Speaker, the whole population of Canada will rise to clamour for justice, because it is inconceivable that one could live in such a wealthy country as ours while at the same time remain the slave of an economic system which is exploiting the people hideously, as it is now the case. This shows that in the future we must not fear that huge power which the financiers seem to wish to use to scare Canadians. On the contrary, we want people to be enlightened, since we want to make financially realizeable what is physically possible. If the government wants us to lend money to Brazil, we will have, in order to pursue the development of Canada to lend money also to the Canadian people, without interest, for 25 to 30 years, in order to enable those who would like to own a property, to get it without paying three times its price.

We, of the Ralliement Créditiste, rise against such scandalous exploitation and when loans are made to foreign countries, we cannot admit that the same cannot be done for the Canadian people the municipalities, the school boards, the provinces, in order to find, through the Bank of Canada which is the servant of the Canadian people, the final solution to the economic problem which is an obsession for everyone at the present time.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has not set the interest rate, but rather a ceiling for interest rates on mortgages which will be guaranteed by the Corporation. The purpose of this is to encourage the private sector to make more funds available for housing mortgages.

The loan to which the hon. member referred was made to Brazil under the agreement signed by Canada with the Interamerican Development Bank. The Canadian external aid program to Latin America was initiated in 1964 with an appropriation to that area of a certain amount of money, charged to the Development Loan Fund which had just been set up. The agreement then concluded with the Interamerican Development Bank contained arrangements whereby contributions to Latin America would be administered through that institution. According to the agreement, loans may be granted interest free, reimbursable after fifty-year periods with provisions for 10-year delays.

This loan will enable Brazil to undertake a technical and economic feasibility study with regard to building an airport for supersonic and giant airplane. A consortium comprising two Canadian firms, Parkin Associates Ltd. and Acres International Limited, in addition to a Brazilian firm, has been awarded the contract for the study.

In my opinion, this assistance helps create work for Canadian firms. These special consultant Canadian firms were granted contracts in spite of tight competition from important firms in other countries. The Canadian group will create a master plan which will consider the possibility of expanding the present airport instead of building a new one and they will determine the most appropriate site for a new airport, etc.

In granting development loans, Canada is endeavouring to establish assistance conditional on the nature of the project being financed and the capacity of the beneficiary to reimburse his debt.

This $847,000 loan has been granted under these conditions which are in agreement with Canadian policy in the matter of external aid programs to the underdeveloped countries and they are normal conditions for projects of this nature.

The Deputy Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The motion to adjourn the house is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

The house met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CANADIAN CITIZENSHIP

CHANGES IN PASSPORTS TO STRENGTHEN SECURITY

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, an extensive study of passport security has been conducted by the Department of External Affairs over recent months in which, I might say, the advice of other departments of government has been received. As a result of these studies, a decision has been reached by the government to introduce a number of changes in Canadian passport requirements. These are summarized in an announcement which I am making today and which I now table for the information of hon. members in both our official languages.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT

OBLIGATION OF PHYSICIAN TO REPORT TO LEGAL AUTHORITY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-159, to amend the Criminal Code (duty of attending physician).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Nesbitt: The purpose of this bill is to ensure that in cases where deliberate neglect or abuse is present, the physician called in to treat a child patient will be made aware of his obligation to report the case to the legal authorities, namely the police, as one way of putting an end to mistreatment of children, which seems to have become endemic in our society.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

PROVISION AFFECTING IMPAIRED DRIVERS WHO TAKE PROPER PRECAUTIONS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-160, to amend the Criminal Code (control of motor vehicle).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Nesbitt: Your Honour, the purpose of this bill is to amend the Criminal Code so as not to penalize drivers who realizing that they are intoxicated or that their ability to drive is impaired, are wise enough not to drive and to stop their car immediately and refrain from continuing their journey in their present state. I might add in this regard that since the United Kingdom changed their Criminal Code in this regard, I would hope the Minister of Justice might consider sending both these bills to the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

P.E.I.—FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO IMPROVEMENT CORPORATION

Question No. 535—Mr. Macquarrie:

1. Has the government contributed financially to the Economic Improvement Corporation of Prince Edward Island and, if so, what is the amount of such contribution since the establishment of the Corporation?

2. When is it intended to conclude an agreement with the Government of Prince Edward Island on an economic improvement program for the province?

3. Will such a program be based wholly or in part on the recommendations of the Economic Improvement Corporation of Prince Edward Island?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the department of Forestry and Rural Development as follows: 1. Yes. $331,-164.82.

2. Discussions aimed at an early agreement are presently taking place.

3. The program would be based in part on the recommendations of the Economic Improvement Corporation.

Questions

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER—POLLUTION BY AQUATIC WEEDS

Question No. 595—Mr. Rock:

1. Do floating aquatic weeds in the International Section of the St. Lawrence River, Lake St. Francis and Lake St. Louis contribute to the pollution of these waters?

2. Were there floating aquatic weeds present in those areas during the duration of the Seaway strike from June 21st to July 14th and, if not, what would account for their absence?

3. Were there dense mats of floating aquatic weeds in these waters immediately after the strike was over and are there any at present and for what reasons?

4. Do floating aquatic weeds deplete oxygen and contribute to pollution when they deposit on bottom of lakes or in bays and decompose?

5. Does the accumulation of floating aquatic weeds cause growth of weeds in areas where there was no previous growth?

6. Have floating aquatic weeds when decomposing contributed to the spread of algae in those waters?

7. Do floating aquatic weeds form high coliform densities close to the shores of Lake St. Louis, Lake St. Francis and of the International Section of the St. Lawrence River?

8. Has any federal department or agency made any water test or pollution counts in these waters and, if so, what were the results from 1957 until present?

9. Has the International Joint Commission or any federal department or agency, investigated the question of whether floating aquatic weeds that are appearing in the waters of the St. Lawrence Seaway are caused by the turbulence provoked by the propellers of large ships while travelling through certain channels in the St. Lawrence Seaway?

10. Has the International Joint Commission or any federal department or agency, ever investigated the question of whether floating aquatic weeds contribute heavily to the pollution of these waters and induce algae growth?

11. Are Canadian federal agencies collecting water quality data in the waters under the jurisdiction of the St. Lawrence Seaway and, if so, what are the results?

[Translation]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The growth of aquatic weeds results from increased fertility of surface waters and therefore can be considered to result from pollution. The weeds themselves can be regarded as pollutants since their decomposition imposes an oxygen demand on the water and nutrients are released in the course of their decay.

2. The river was surveyed before and during the strike and the usual growth of aquatic weeds was observed for that period of the year on 31 ranges from Kingston to Cornwall.

3. This condition has not been observed during water quality studies of the international section.

4. Yes.

5. This is not likely, suitable bottom substrate is probably required to support growth of aquatic weeds.

6. This phenomenon was not observed by the Department of National Health and Welfare in their surveys on behalf of the I.J.C., but the possibility of such an occurrence is real.

7. This phenomenon has not been observed, but the release of nutrients through plant decomposition may well stimulate bacterial reproduction. Pathogenic organisms are unlikely to reproduce because temperatures encountered in the river are generally lower than those ideal for the reproduction of pathogens.

8. The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources monitors water quality immediately downstream from the Robert H. Saunders generating station at Cornwall. Samples are collected bi-monthly for analysis of physical and inorganic chemical components. Data compiled since October 1967 indicates moderate fertility which is considered to be attributable in part to the innundation of arable land by the formation of the Lake St. Lawrence impoundment.

The Department of National Health & Welfare has been surveying the water quality of the international section of the St. Lawrence River since 1965, under an investigation by the I.J.C. Interim reports of the Commission to the Canadian and U.S.A. Governments have indicated the water quality of the St. Lawrence River to be generally good, with local pollution occurring near waste discharges. A comprehensive report on Lakes Erie, Ontario and the international section of the St. Lawrence is in the course of preparation for the International Joint Commission by its Water Pollution Advisory Boards. Following receipt of this Report, the Commission will conduct public hearings and formulate its report and recommendations to the two Governments.

9. No.

10. No formal study has been initiated, although experience indicates that these weeds probably do contribute to pollution and induce growth of algae. Water quality is only affected significantly near points of discharge of inadequately treated wastes. The problem of excessive quantities of aquatic weeds, which are indeed a nuisance and interfere with water use, is a result of natural and cultural enrichment of these waters, i.e.

the addition of such substances as nitrogen and phosphorus, through natural drainage, precipitation and directly from waste discharges. This matter will be treated extensively in the report to be submitted to the I.J.C.

11. No collections by Canadian federal agencies are made in the locks and canals of the seaway.

CONSTRUCTION OF SMALL BOAT FACILITIES

Question No. 765—Mr. St. Pierre:

1. In the period 1957-58 to 1966-67 inclusive, how many wharves, docks and similar small boat facilities, costing not less than $5,000 or more than $250,000, were constructed for fishing vessels and pleasure craft in the following areas: the Atlantic Provinces, Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia?

2. What was the total departmental cost of such works in each of the four areas?

3. To what extent did provincial governments or other bodies participate in the capital cost of such works in each of the four areas?

4. Are charges levied for (a) fishing vessels (b) pleasure craft in each area and what are current fees?

5. Is there an estimate available for the number of fishing vessels and pleasure craft in each of the four areas and, if so, what are the estimates?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Public Works and Transport as follows:

	ATLANTIC	QUEBEC	ONTARIO	BRITISH COLUMBIA
1.	434	160	160	79
2.	$21,150,442	$4,865,000	$3,713,200	$3,786,300
3.	$166,837	Nil	$25,447	Nil

4. Charges are levied for fishing vessels and pleasure craft in each area pursuant to Schedule of the Government Wharves Regulations made by Order in Council P.C. 1964-104 of 23rd January, 1964, as amended. The current fees, which are the same in all areas, are as follows:

(A) Fishing Vessels: (i) moored at any float at a harbour: (a) per day or portion thereof, per foot of length, 2¢; (b) per month, per foot of length, 40¢; (ii) moored elsewhere than at floats and not engaged in loading, unloading, or other commercial activity, per 24 hours or portion thereof: (a) on Sundays and statutory holidays per foot of length, 1¢; (b) on other days, per foot of length, 2¢; (iii) minimum side wharfage, 50¢. The Regulations provide for the exemption of payment of side wharfage in respect of any fishing vessel tying up to a wharf solely for loading supplies, including fish bait, or for unloading the vessel's catch of fish.

(B) Pleasure Craft: Pleasure craft are charged the same rates as fishing vessels, but no exemptions are granted.

	Atlantic	Quebec	Ontario	British Columbia
5. Fishing Vessels	22,071	2,509	1,626	7,746
Pleasure Craft:	85,000	193,500	761,000	285,000

WHEAT BOARD JURISDICTION OVER RYE, FLAX AND RAPESEED

Question No. 784—Mr. Southam:

Is the government giving consideration to having Rye, Flax and Rapeseed placed under the jurisdiction of the Wheat Board and, if so, when will this action be taken?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The question of placing rye, flaxseed and rapeseed under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board continues to receive consideration.

DANIEL MacISAAC—POSITION AND SALARY

Question No. 792—Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond):

Question No. 803—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has an office been opened or is one being opened in Saskatoon for the Honourable member for Saskatoon-Humboldt, the Minister without Portfolio?

2. If so, and if payment is being made by the Government of Canada, what is the estimated cost of operating the said office for (a) personnel (b) rental (c) other expenses?

Mr. Yves Forest Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. Yes.

2. (a) $2,691 (salary for one part-time clerk); (b) No rental payment being made as the office is located in a Crown owned building; (c) To date, the cost is $2,093.20 which is as follows: Minister's furniture, $1,223.00; Secretary's furniture, $371.00; Electric typewriter, $499.20.

AID TO MUNICIPALITIES TO OFFSET EDUCATION COSTS

Question No. 940—Mr. Robinson:

Is the federal government contemplating any direct financial aid to municipalities to offset (a) the cost of education in the field of primary and secondary schools (b) the capital cost of educational (i) buildings (ii) facilities (iii) equipment?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): No.

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTION TO QUEBEC SOCIAL ALLOWANCE FUND

Question No. 954—Mr. Caouette:

1. Does the government contribute to the social allowance fund of the Province of Quebec and, if so, what is the amount of its annual contribution?

2. What was the government's contribution to the fund (a) during the past fiscal year, and (b) during the past five years?

[Translation]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. See accompanying attached table.

2. See accompanying attached table.

MICROWAVE RELAY TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Question No. 988—Mr. Schreyer:

1. What is the present capacity of our existing terrestrial microwave relay telecommunications system?

2. Does the government have any forecast regarding the capacity utilization of our present terrestrial microwave relay telecommunications system for the next 5, 10, 15, 20 years?

3. Is the proposed satellite system less expensive or more than the present microwave setup and over what distances?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): In so far as communications is concerned: 1. There are currently two main terrestrial national microwave radio relay telecommunication systems in operation: the Trans-Canada Telephone System; and the CN/CP Telecommunication System.

The capacity varies; however, there is a working minimum of five, two-way broadband radio frequency (TV equivalent) channels in use today throughout the major portion of these coast-to-coast systems, including their many spurs.

The above systems are located south of the 55th parallel. In addition, CN/CP have placed in operation a broadband microwave route from Alberta through Northern British Columbia and the Yukon to Alaska. This system has one two-way working channel (300 circuits) at present.

2. Forecasts of additional utilization for the microwave systems for several years into the future are very difficult to make because other technological forms of communication may become more attractive and because the total demand for service is difficult to predict. Using present growth rates the total utilization of all systems might double every five years, but it does not necessarily follow that this growth rate would continue in future.

The additional potential capacity of these national microwave systems if and when augmented, coast to coast, could be up to 23 two-way broadband channels, of which 11 would extend for approximately 2/3 of the route length.

Each of these channels would have a capacity in both directions of one television signal or a varying quantity of 600-1200 voice-data circuits per channel. The CN/CP Alberta-Yukon system could be augmented to carry 4 additional channels.

3. A direct comparison of costs of a satellite system and a terrestrial microwave relay system is very difficult to make because the two systems are not directly comparable. In general, the cost of a terrestrial microwave system is proportional to distance, whereas satellite system costs are independent of the distance between earth stations.

AIR CANADA AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,006—Mr. Paproski:

1. (a) What is the current number of aircraft owned by Air Canada, by type (b) of this total, how many are in operation on scheduled services, by type (c) are any of the aircraft currently owned by Air Canada not in operation and, if so, for what reason?

2. Have any sales of aircraft been completed by Air Canada to date in 1968 and, if so, what aircraft have been sold, to whom and at what price?

3. Of the aircraft owned by Air Canada, how many have been offered for sale, by type?

4. (a) What aircraft does Air Canada have on order, by type, and what are the expected delivery dates for these aircraft (b) of the aircraft Air Canada presently has on order, what parts of each type are being manufactured in Canada (c) what is the value of the orders, by type of aircraft and by manufacturer, referred to in Part (b)?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Departments of Transport and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: The management of Air Canada advises as follows: 1. (a) 39 Viscounts; 23 Vanguards; 29 DC-9s; 28 DC-8s. (b) 33 Viscounts; 18 Vanguards; 29 DC-9s; 28 DC-8s. (c) 6 Viscounts and 5 Vanguards are retired.

2. During 1968 6 DC-9-14 aircraft were sold back to McDonnell Douglas Company, at a price arrived at during confidential negotiations for replacement aircraft.

3. Six Viscounts and five Vanguards.

4. (a) 9 DC-9s, 1 in late 1968, 5 in 1969, 3 in 1970, 13 DC-8s, 6 in 1969 and 7 in 1970, 3 747s in 1971. (b) It is anticipated that structural components, electronic equipment and auxiliary power units for L-1011 aircraft will be manufactured in Canada. (c) Since contracts are at present under negotiation, it is not possible to define the value of the orders resulting from the L-1011 program. However, it is anticipated that the following Canadian manufacturers will be major participants: Northwest Industries Limited, United Aircraft of Canada Limited, Fleet Manufacturing Limited, Bristol Aerospace Limited, Canadair Limited, Canadian Aviation Electronics.

*NATIONAL PARKS—POINTE FORILLON, GASPÉ

Question No. 1,020—Mr. Cyr:

Does the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development plan to create a national park at Pointe Forillon, Gaspé and if so (a) what will be the federal government's contribution to the project and has an estimate already been announced (b) does the project require a special agreement with the Province of Quebec (c) will the work begin in 1969 (d) is there any delay in carrying out this project and, if so, does the responsibility rest with the government?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Yes, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development plans to establish a National Park on Forillon Peninsula near Gaspé, as provided for in the Federal-Provincial agreement for the Development of the Lower St. Lawrence, Gaspé and Iles-de-la-Madeleine signed by the two governments at Rimouski last May. (a) In an appendix to the Federal-Provincial agreement, the projected federal expenditure for the development of the proposed National Park is given as $8,300,000. (b) Yes, as the Province must provide the land required free of all encumbrances in keeping with general policy in this regard. (c) Planning studies are envisaged for 1969. (d) Yes, the federal government is quite anxious to proceed but the final arrangements are not completed.

WHEAT—COST OF GUARANTEED FLOOR PRICE

Question No. 1,024—Mr. Douglas:

What was the cost to the Government of Canada of the implementation of the guaranteed floor price for wheat which was in effect between August 1, 1967 and July 1, 1968?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): A total amount of $3,435,811.

HUTTERITE COLONIES

Question No. 1,025—Mr. Thomson (Battleford-Kindersley):

1. How many Hutterite colonies are there in Alberta and Saskatchewan?

2. How many of (a) these colonies, or (b) individuals in these colonies, pay income tax?

3. How many of these colonies receive (a) Family Allowances (b) Old Age Pensions?

4. How many individuals in these colonies receive (a) Family Allowances or (b) Old Age Pensions?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, the Departments of National Revenue and National Health and Welfare as follows: 1. According to the 1961 Census of Canada, there were 11 Hutterite colonies (771 individuals) in Saskatchewan and 61 Hutterite colonies (5,370 individuals) in Alberta.

2. Hutterite Colonies, whether incorporated or unincorporated, are not taxable entities as they do not receive income on their own account. However, each member of a Colony must include in his income, for purposes of the Income Tax Act, his share of the profit attributable to the farming or other business activities carried on by the Colony of which he is a member. A statement on this subject was tabled in the House on November 6, 1968, but was incorrectly referred to on page 2469 of Hansard for that day as a statement on Disciples of Luther.

3. and 4. This information is not available.

ARCHITECTS SERVING NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

Question No. 1,039—Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West):

1. In respect to the reply to Question Number 525, what are the reasons for limiting the membership of the Advisory Committee on Design to the National Capital Commission to architects located in Ottawa-Hull, Montreal and Toronto in view of the legitimate national interest in the national capital?

2. Why were architects from other major Canadian centres excluded?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): 1. Membership on the National Capital Commission Advisory Committee on Design is neither (1) assigned nor (2) restricted according to location of residence in Canada.

MEMBERSHIP IN PAN AMERICAN HEALTH ORGANIZATION

Question No. 1,040—Mr. Orlikow:

Is consideration being given to the possibility of Canadian membership in the Pan American Health Organization, with or without membership in the Organization of American States and, if so, what steps have been taken to accomplish this purpose?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): 1. The possibility of Canadian membership in the Pan American Health Organization, which is both a specialized organization of the O.A.S. and the regional office for the Americas of the World Health Organization, has been under study in the Departments of External Affairs and National Health and Welfare for some time. This proposal is currently being reviewed as part of the government's general review of Canada's policy in Latin America and in the light of budgetary and other considerations. As indicated in the question, this proposal is distinct from the question of Canadian membership in the O.A.S.; membership in PAHO is open to Canada regardless of membership in O.A.S.

RICHMOND, QUE.—NEWSPAPER PUBLICATION

Question No. 1,067—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Are there any newspapers, daily, weekly or periodical, which are subsidized by the federal government and printed in the Constituency of Richmond and, if so (a) what newspapers specifying whether they are dailies, weeklies or periodicals (b) what is the amount of the grant or subsidy paid by the government to each newspaper and what is the annual circulation of the paper (c) what are the names, telephone numbers and addresses of all directors of such periodicals, weeklies or dailies?

2. On what basis does the government subsidize newspapers, daily, weekly or periodical?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): In so far as the Post Office Department is concerned: 1. No.

2. Traditionally, Parliament has sanctioned special rates of postage for newspapers and periodicals to encourage the development and growth of the Canadian publishing industry. These postage rates, to the extent that they do not cover the costs of postal handling and distribution, represent a subvention provided these publications.

RICHMOND, QUE.—WAR VETERANS

Question No. 1,072—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. How many Canadian veterans of the First or Second World Wars, residing in the federal Constituency of Richmond, are between the ages of 65 and 70?

2. How many of the veterans' widows, residing in the federal Constituency of Richmond, are between the ages of 65 and 70?

3. How many veterans reside in the federal Constituency of Richmond?

4. How many war amputees reside in the federal Constituency of Richmond?

5. What criteria does the Department of Veterans' Affairs apply in paying pensions to war amputees?

6. What is the total sum of pensions paid in the federal Constituency of Richmond, how many veterans are resident in Quebec, and what is the total sum of pensions paid to the latter?

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): 1, 2, 3 and 4. Statistics of the number of veterans, disabled veterans and veterans' widows are not maintained by federal constituencies.

5. The Department of Veterans Affairs does not itself pay pensions. The criterion applied by the Canadian Pension Commission with respect to pensions payable under the Pension Act is that, if an amputation was incurred during or attributable to wartime service, pension is paid under that act.

6. Statistics are not maintained of the total sum of pensions paid in federal constituencies. It is estimated that on March 31, 1968 there were 138,000 veterans resident in the Province of Quebec. The annual liability for disability pensions payable to veterans resident in Quebec on March 31, 1968 is estimated at $24,808,500.

*ZAMBIA—ESTABLISHMENT OF MISSION

Question No. 1,084—Mr. Fairweather:

At what approximate date does Canada intend to establish a mission in Zambia?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No date has been set for the opening of a Canadian mission in Zambia, Mr. Speaker. The current commitments for the extension of Canadian representation abroad, particularly in Francophone countries, have strained the personnel and financial resources of the Department of External Affairs. Nonetheless, the opening of a resident mission in Zambia retains a high priority.

2. When will a contract be awarded, and to whom?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. Curtis and Gordon Swinamer, $27,500.00; Merle MacEachern, $28,886.00; Whalley Construction Limited, $32,500.00; Stanley Reid Construction Limited, $43,774.50.

2. Contract has been awarded to Curtis and Gordon Swinamer.

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Question No. 1,129—Mr. Broadbent:

1. For each fiscal year, what have been the number of projects and the annual expenditures of the Industrial Research Assistance Program of the National Research Council since the establishment of the program in 1962?

2. For each fiscal year, what have been the annual expenditures of this program shared by the federal government and Canadian industry?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board):

NATIONAL RESEARCH COUNCIL OF CANADA

INDUSTRIAL RESEARCH ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Summary of Expenditures ($000's)

Fiscal Year	No. of Projects Min.	Max.	Total Grants Approved	Expended	Total Contribution Reported by Industry
1962-63	0	65	843.9	537.3	918.8
1963-64	60	84	2,093.1	1,603.6	2,503.8
1964-65	79	110	3,010.0	2,171.3	2,975.8
1965-66	105	140	4,088.0	3,306.3	4,564.6
1966-67	122	151	5,293.6	4,199.0	6,262.7
1967-68	122	159	6,361.6	5,086.9	6,828.2
1968-69 (to 21 Nov. 1968)	138	177	7,212.1	6,100.0 (Est.)	9,264.3 (Est.)
TOTAL		262	28,902.3	23,004.4 (41%)	33,318.2 (59%)

1. Eight additional projects have been approved as of 21 November 1968 but were deferred for lack of funds.

2. Projects may be approved and start at any time during the fiscal year. Generally, they terminate at the end of a fiscal year. Hence, the minimum and maximum number of projects in effect have been given for each year.

3. Companies are not always able to spend the full grant due to recruiting difficulties or construction delays.

4. Industry's contribution covers only the reported funding during the period of IRAP support. This does not include funding to complete the research project if it must extend beyond five years, or to develop products from the research results.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

CROWN CORPORATIONS—LANGUAGE PROFICIENCY

Question No. 812—Mr. Caouette:

1. In each of the proprietary Crown corporations, who is presently in charge of collecting information on language proficiency of the staff and what position does each hold at the present time.

2. For each fiscal year since the program's inception, what have been the annual number of projects and expenditures of this program, shared by the federal government and Canadian industry?

3. What is the total federal government expenditure commitment to this program in the current fiscal year?

4. Are changes presently contemplated in this program regarding either cost-sharing and repayment provisions or rate of interest provisions?

Return tabled.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

• (2:10 p.m.)

GRAIN

ALLEGED PARALYSIS OF WHEAT MOVEMENT THROUGH VANCOUVER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I ask leave, seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin, in accordance with the terms of revised Standing Order 26, to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the virtual bottleneck and paralysis of wheat movement in Vancouver Harbour, due to the failure of the government to work with the railways in scheduling box cars, leading to a situation which has already resulted in the loss of a 17,000 ton contract and which may result in the loss of others; which has caused damage and economic loss, since some ships have been tied up for as long as a month, paying demurrage charges as high as $2,500 a day; which has brought about stagnation in the movement of wheat at a critical time for western farmers; and in connection with which the government, yesterday, in the person of the minister, refused to take action.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mackenzie has given notice as required by Standing Order 26 of his intention to move the adjournment of the house to discuss the matter raised in his proposed motion.

An hon. members know, the provisions of Standing Order 26 have been radically altered in the new rules of procedure of the House of Commons. Under the terms of paragraph (5) of Standing Order 26, in determining whether a matter should be given urgent consideration, the Chair takes into account the extent to which the proposition concerns the administrative responsibilities of the government or would come within the scope of ministerial action, and also the probability of the matter being brought before the house within a reasonable time by other means. Additionally, the Chair must have regard to other considerations, many of which have been established as the practice of the house in previous years, before the enactment of the present Standing Orders.

The question raised by the hon. member, it seems to me, does concern the administrative responsibilities of the government.

As far as the opportunity for the question being raised before the house within a reasonable time by other means is concerned, the Chair must have in mind the fact that in the present state of its business the house is not likely to have available certain opportunities which on previous occasions would have provided a vehicle for a debate on this question. As an example, there is no current debate in respect to the Speech from the Throne. We learned from the Minister of Finance yesterday that there is some uncertainty whether or not there will be a budget debate within the near future, and the estimates are not likely to be tabled until some time in February.

There is another matter which I think may be of some importance, and that has to do with the alteration in circumstances surrounding emergency debates before the enactment of the current Standing Order 26. Before the present order was brought into force, in considering motions to adjourn under Standing Order 26 the Chair always had to weigh the importance of the proposed motion against the necessity of setting aside government business for the day and it was much more difficult to justify the granting of a motion under Standing Order 26 when that would have the result of delaying current important public business. To a considerable extent the revised Standing Order 26 reduces the relative significance of this factor.

In deciding whether or not to allow the motion the Chair must, of course, take into account the actual problem sought to be discussed. Is it of national importance and is it urgent?

In my opinion the new circumstances indicated by the questions asked in the house yesterday, by the concern expressed by the minister himself when replying to these questions, and by the hon. member's statement, indicate that a strong case can be made in favour of the proposed motion, on the ground of urgency of debate.

Therefore I am inclined to put the question to the house in accordance with the standing order for the reasons stated, that the matter is important, that there is urgency of debate, that the opportunity for debate within a reasonable time is restricted, and that public business is not impeded.

The question before the house is the following one. Has the hon. member leave to move the motion for the purpose of discussing the matter stated by him?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Discussion of the proposed motion shall therefore stand over until eight o'clock this evening, pursuant to section 9 of Standing Order 26.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, as I understood your ruling you set the motion over until eight o'clock this evening. As I understand it, we do not sit on Wednesday evenings.

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member will read the Standing Orders he will notice that this is a provision of Standing Order 26. When a motion of this sort is moved on a Wednesday we sit at eight o'clock.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

[Translation]

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, would you kindly call notices of motions Nos. 35, 36, 40 and 53?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

NOISE LEVELS, TORONTO AIRPORT EXPANSION

Motion No. 35—Mr. Diefenbaker:

That an Order of the House do issue for copies of any maps and diagrams in the possession of the Department of Transport which show what changes will result in noise levels in the surrounding inhabited areas should plans for the expansion of Toronto International Airport be carried out.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this motion is acceptable to the government. I think it should be pointed out, however, that the sketch desired by the right hon. gentleman refers to the major expansion proposed for Toronto International Airport in the Parkin report, and in that respect is no longer relevant. But as I say, the motion is acceptable.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house that motion No. 35 be deemed to be adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH KAISER CORPORATION

Motion No. 36—Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway):

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of all letters, communications, reports, memoranda or other data in respect of an agreement between the Government of Canada or the National Harbours Board, or any other agency or department of government, on the one hand, and the Kaiser Corporation on the other.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken to the hon. lady concerning this motion and she has agreed to limit it to include the agreement between the National Harbours Board and the Kaiser Corporation concerning the use of the port of Roberts Bank only. On this basis the motion is acceptable to the government.

Mr. Speaker: Subject to the reservations and conditions expressed by the minister, is it the pleasure of the house that motion No. 36 be deemed to be adopted?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

"LOCAL GOVERNMENT ON INDIAN RESERVES"

Motion No. 40—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of a document entitled "Local Government on Indian Reserves" prepared by the policy and planning directorate of the Indian affairs branch, dated August 4, 1967?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr.

Speaker, the Policy and Planning Directorate of the Indian Affairs Branch drafted, on August 4, 1967, a document on the local administration of Indian reserves entitled "Local Government on Indian Reserves". This document marked "Confidential for discussion purposes" contains interim views and comments on local administration and on organization mechanisms to ensure the carrying out at headquarters of duties pertaining to local governments. This document was intended for field officials and I do not think that we could table it in the house since it is a departmental document prepared for internal administrative purposes.

[English]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the document in question was distributed by an official of the department to someone other than an official and therefore has been given some public distribution. Because the document may be classified as a confidential document of the department I take it the minister is asking me to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Chrétien: Because of prevailing circumstances I should appreciate the hon. member's withdrawing his motion.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I wonder if with the unanimous agreement of the house I might have leave to have the document in question tabled, and then withdraw the motion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is suggesting an irregular procedure. Perhaps the motion might be allowed to stand and the matter might be reviewed by the hon. member and the minister in the meantime. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion stands.

SASKATCHEWAN—DETERRENT FEES BY CANCER PATIENTS

Motion No. 53—Mr. Burton:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all documents and correspondence exchanged between the Government of Canada and the Government of Saskatchewan with respect to the application of deterrent fees on cancer patients under the hospital insurance plan.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have talked to the hon. member about this matter. We do not have any correspondence or documents relating to that aspect of the problem with which his motion deals and he is aware of that now. In the circumstances I wonder whether he might consent to withdrawing the motion.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): On the basis of the minister's remarks, Mr. Speaker, I ask for leave to withdraw the motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT CROSSING—ENGINEERING FEASIBILITY

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday the Minister of Public Works said he would reconsider the matter I had raised in my motion No. 62 last week, which had to do with the Stanford research study. Is the minister now able to table the document I referred to?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, a decision in this matter involves the Minister of Transport and I have not had a chance to discuss the matter with him.

Mr. Baldwin: Try to get him here more often.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

RETURN OF MINISTER OF NATIONAL REVENUE FOLLOWING ILLNESS

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I know I express the pleasure of all hon. members of the house in welcoming back the Minister of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: I hope he finds himself in good health, well able to discharge his duties to his department and to render all possible assistance to the government.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the Minister of National Revenue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Hon. Jean-Pierre Côté (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I would like at this stage to thank the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) who, I think, spoke on behalf of all hon. members when he welcomed me upon my return here from the hospital. I can tell him that the operation was a complete success and that within a few months I will be able to carry out my duties as before.

[English]

I should also like to thank all hon. members who sent me notes while I was in the hospital, and assure them that they helped a lot in bringing me back here so quickly after my operation.

[Translation]

[Later:]

If I risked my life in that operation, Mr. Speaker, it is because it was not my intention to lead the life of a disabled man, but rather to be in better shape still to discharge my duties.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

EDUCATION

ABSORPTION OF NEW UNIVERSITY GRADUATES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance which arises from surveys showing that the recruiting effort by business and government has been substantially reduced on university campuses. It is estimated that 88,000 persons will graduate from universities this year, which is a record. Bearing that in mind, may I ask the minister if he will make a statement on motions in the near future to reassure the country that the economy will be able to absorb these new graduates, as well as to indicate what policies the government will follow and what programs it is prepared to undertake to ensure we do not lose to the United States or some other country a high proportion of this year's expected 88,000 graduates.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the Leader of the Opposition is asking the Minister of Finance to make a very general statement of a type which ought to be made on motions. But if hon. members think the question ought to be answered, and there is agreement for that, perhaps the minister might be allowed to do so.

Mr. Stanfield: I apologize if my question is not clear. I meant to ask the minister if he would make a statement on motions at an early date.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, as always I shall be very pleased to consider my hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. Stanfield: May I ask whether the specific question of the problem of finding employment for and using the talents of this large graduating class emerging from our universities this year is now before the cabinet in specific form?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I of course cannot say what is and what is not before the cabinet. However, speaking without having read the report that my hon. friend has mentioned, I believe that Canada will be able to absorb all the good young people whom our universities can produce in the future.

POLLUTION

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION DEALING WITH ENVIRONMENTAL ASPECTS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of a recent, major accident on the Macdonald-Cartier Freeway which was alleged to have taken place in major part because of air pollution, and in view of the report this morning that the International Joint Commission is concerned with the pollution of the St. Mary's River by two large Canadian corporations, will the minister inform the house whether legislation will be brought down this session to deal with environmental pollution, and standards for clean air and clean water?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would advise the hon. member that this whole matter of air pollution was discussed at the last federal conference of health ministers. At that time we undertook to try to arrive at standards and criteria this year and, in consultation with the provinces, see if they can be applied across the country in a uniform way.

If that entails legislation the government would consider it, and hopefully, this year.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a supplementary on the same subject to the Prime Minister. Can the right hon. gentleman inform the house whether it is the intention of the government to implement a recommendation by a member of the Fisheries Research Board that the government ought to establish a single federal agency to deal with the problems of pollution across the country, or is that agency now in the Department of National Health and Welfare?

Mr. Munro: Mr. Speaker, so far as one over-all agency to deal with this question is concerned, that would be a decision for the government to make. As the situation now stands the studies on air pollution are being conducted in the Department of National Health and Welfare. We have been doing quite a bit of work in this field up to the present time. We have been discussing the matter with the provinces and, as I say, subject to getting agreement on certain standards in our consultation with the provinces, perhaps we might be able to bring in legislation this year.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct another supplementary question, this time if I may to the Minister of Justice. Will his department look into the allegations contained in the report of the International Joint Commission and consider laying charges against the two corporations for polluting the St. Marys' River, if they are doing so as alleged by the commission, and will any other steps be taken to follow up that disclosure by this important international body?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Yes, sir, we will certainly look into it. If charges are to be laid the matter might well fall within the purview of the provincial attorney general.

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Minister of Transport. Can he tell the house if he will make investigations on the mining rights presently owned by some financiers in the far north of Quebec, who are not only interested in seeing the future international airport built on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, in order to meet their needs better, but who have recently paid the cost of a study conducted by a certain firm in collaboration with five federal members of parliament, in order to prove that the future international airport should be located at Sainte-Scholastique, in the constituency of Deux-Montagnes?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member can ask a question but not make a speech.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I only wish to know whether the Minister of Transport intends to make investigations, in order to find out the relation between the possession of mining rights and the study now in progress, the object of which is to prove that Sainte-Scholastique should be chosen as the site of the future international airport.

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Without prejudice to you and without judging your intervention, I think that the question that you let go unanswered is in order, and I suggest that the Minister of Transport would be in a position to answer it. We are therefore expecting an answer from him.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIONS BEFORE IATA RESPECTING HIJACKING

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Earlier this session a question was asked of the minister regarding what the government proposed to do to prevent the hijacking of aircraft. The minister said the matter was under consideration. I now ask the minister what proposals if any Canada is putting before the present meeting of IATA in Montreal regarding the prevention of hijacking of aircraft.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I will have to take that question as notice. I am not sure whether or not there are any formal proposals being put forward. I can say however, that this is a matter of continuing concern, particularly in view of the large number of hijackings which have taken place in the last few months.

AIRPORTS

TORONTO—EXTENSION OF MALTON SITE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Transport. Could the minister advise the house whether the studies which his department has been undertaking recently regarding the future needs of the Toronto international airport have led the officials of that department to the conclusion that the present Malton site can be sufficiently expanded to look after that airport's needs for the next 15 or 20 years in the supersonic age, or have they come to the conclusion that an additional site is necessary.

Mr. Speaker: The question asked by the hon. gentleman in those terms is similar to the question asked by the hon. member for Shefford. I suggest it should be rephrased, because it is not acceptable in its present terms.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I simply asked the minister whether the studies recently undertaken by his department have enabled him to come to the conclusion that the present Malton airport site can be sufficiently expanded to look after the needs—

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that the question obviously suggests its own answer.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister's department considering another site to look after the future needs of Toronto international airport?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The answer to this question is a matter of public record. As my hon. friend undoubtedly knows, if he follows events in respect of the Toronto international airport, we announced recently that the limited expansion which would take place there would be sufficient to accommodate traffic into the early 1980's and that soon, within perhaps a year or two, we would choose a site for an alternate airport which would look after the expansion looking beyond that date.

Mr. Hees: Is the minister giving serious consideration to the area I suggested earlier, that is the Picton area, where there is an excellent site which would accommodate all the needs of the department?

Mr. Hellyer: There are certain inherent liabilities which are obvious.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Speaker: Order. I assume the hon. member for Shefford, has a modified question to ask too.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Since the Minister of Transport is ready to answer, could he tell us whether it is true that the Quebec government was only advised on September 10, 1968, of the official decision taken by the federal government, to build a new international airport in Quebec, in spite of the fact that Messrs. Baribeau and Beanhaker's studies had been going then for over a year and a half?

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the question as put by the hon. member is in order. All he is asking is that a statement made outside the house be confirmed or denied. In this sense, I do not think it is in order.

Mr. Rondeau: I should like to discuss this matter at ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

"FESTIVAL"—ALLEGED DEGRADING PERFORMANCE, "NEIGHBOURS AND THE BASEMENT"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State who reports for the C.B.C. I have received a number of communications, as I am sure have other members, regarding the degrading and demoralizing program on the "Festival", series called "Neighbours and The Basement", which appeared on the C.B.C. on January 15. Has the minister inquired of the C.B.C. whether or not the admonition of the Prime Minister that government should stay out of the bedrooms of the nation should apply as well to a publicly owned corporation. This particular show, I am told, was degrading, demoralizing—and worse.

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, for the portion of the right hon. member's intervention that constitutes a question, my answer is yes.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FLOODING OF HOMES THROUGH HYDRO DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. In the dispute between the Indians of northern Manitoba and the Manitoba Hydro in respect of the flooding of a large number of Indian homes as a result of hydro development, is the department assisting the Indians concerned by paying for their legal and any other expenses which they may have.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I know what the problem is and the officials of my department in Manitoba do their utmost to assist the Indians who are in the unhappy situation of being unable to find some ground for understanding with the Manitoba government.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: I should like to ask the specific question whether the department is considering paying the legal costs in respect of counsel whom the Indians have employed.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am unaware of this aspect of the matter but I shall inquire.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

AGENDA FOR PARIS-QUEBEC DISCUSSIONS

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. May I ask the right hon. gentleman whether he or the government have obtained an inkling as to the agenda for the Paris-Quebec talks.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Do I have the agenda?

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Have you obtained an inkling concerning what may be on the agenda for the Paris-Quebec conference?

Mr. Trudeau: The French authorities have notified us of the meetings that are to go on. In a protocol sense they have behaved compatibly with our understanding of international law. We are assuming the discussions will be on subjects which are covered by the agreement between France and Canada, the accord cadre, and we hope this assumption is a correct one.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): May I ask the Prime Minister whether the question of bilingualism is among the subjects that will be on the agenda and, secondly, whether the Prime Minister plans to invite a delegation from Brittany to discuss matters of mutual and cultural concern.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

WESTERN CANADA—INVESTIGATION INTO HIGH PROFITS OF GROCERY TRADE

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Is the minister in a position to reply to the request of the Consumers Association of Canada that there be a federal investigation into the alleged high profits of the grocery trade in western Canada?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me this is a question of a general nature. Perhaps the question might be placed on the order paper. If my interpretation of the question is wrong, I would see to it that it is placed on the list of questions for consideration at the time of adjournment.

Mr. McGrath: May I point out that this request was made of the government in the last few days by the Consumers Association of Canada.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): The communication from the Consumers Association of Canada was relative to the annual report of the Director of Investigation and Research under the Combines Investigation Act. I have proposed that there be a meeting between the C.A.C. and the Director of Investigation and Research, because I think there is some misunderstanding in the C.A.C. relative to the powers, duties and functions of the Director under the Combines Investigation Act. I am also meeting this afternoon with representatives of the Consumers Association to discuss with them the white paper on price stability, which I tabled before Christmas. I am sure the subject will be pursued with them.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): In view of the minister's indication that the Combines Investigation Act cannot be used for this purpose, will he work with the appropriate ministers in the prairie provinces to effect such an investigation of grocery prices.

Mr. Basford: I had one meeting before Christmas with the Attorney General of the Province of Saskatchewan, who was the chairman of the three provincial ministers who were asked by their respective premiers to look at the recommendations of the Batten report. I proposed that Mr. Heald, the Attorney General of the Province of Saskatchewan, hold a meeting with the three provincial ministers in respect of that royal commission report.

ANTI-DUMPING DUTIES

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO TRIBUNAL

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he can advise the house as to when he proposes to appoint the final two members to the anti-dumping tribunal?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, they will be appointed as work develops for the tribunal. I understand that to date there has been only one case referred, and the members we now have are adequate for the work load. The idea is that as the work load increases we will extend the board membership to five members.

Mr. Hales: If it becomes necessary to increase the board membership to five, can the minister assure the house that the other two appointments will be given to well experienced businessmen?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that I believe the appointments to this board are men of as high calibre as any board we have in Canada. I have great confidence in every person appointed to this board.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION ESTABLISHING DEPARTMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister of regional development when the house may expect to receive the long awaited bill in respect of the establishment of his department, so he can proceed with this important work?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker; and we are anxious to produce the bill.

Mr. Stanfield: Is it possible for the minister to give the house some estimate in terms of days or weeks as to when this might happen?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): I am ready to discuss the matter with the house leader, after which perhaps I can give a more precise date.

EXTERNAL AID

POSSIBILITY OF EXTENDING ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday I asked the Minister of Transport in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister whether the government's review of Canada's foreign policy included a study of the possibility of increasing our activities under our external aid program. The minister said he would draw this important question to the attention of the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I expressed the hope that there might be a statement on this matter this week, and I wonder whether it is now ready?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the specific question is yes. This is part of the government's review of foreign policy, and we are considering both the quantity and the quality of our foreign aid.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicate when it is expected that Canada will reach the target of 1 per cent of our gross national product in respect of foreign aid?

Mr. Sharp: I cannot be precise, Mr. Speaker, but like the Minister of Finance, I should like to say "as soon as possible."

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I doubt whether that question is in order.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

DELAY IN MAY 7 DELIVERY

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General.

Since many of my constituents have complained about numerous delays in the mail delivery, could the Minister indicate to the house whether steps will be taken to improve the service?

Mr. Speaker: It seems to me that the hon. member is asking a question which has been raised on several occasions these last few days.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISCUSSIONS ON STRATEGY AND PROCUREMENT

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence whether he is now in a position to answer the question I asked last Friday, which was taken as notice by the then acting minister? I asked whether the Minister of National Defence would inform the house as to the purpose of the discussions that are taking place this week between the Canadian chief of the defence staff and the French chief of the joint staff, reportedly on matters of strategy and procurement, and specifically whether this had any connection with the review of Canadian defence policy, and implied either Canadian procurement of supplies in France or joint procurement projects between France and Canada.

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I shall try to answer all parts of the question in a manner satisfactory to the hon. member. I can say generally that the chief of staff took advantage of this trip to Brussels last week as a result of an invitation extended to him by the joint chiefs of staff of France, but there is no implication so far as procurement is concerned. We are not contemplating buying anything from France at this moment, and I should say there is no connection with the review that is taking place. I think this meeting is specifically concerned with some training manuals in French, which the Canadian forces are trying to produce in Canada.

DRUGS

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF ADVISORY COMMITTEE ON SAFETY

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he is in a position to give us a report of the results of the advisory committee on the safety of drugs?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can obtain a copy of that report when it is ready and table it in the house, if that is satisfactory.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR PRODUCTION OF ECONOMIC FORECAST

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in relation to a question I posed to his parliamentary assistant on December 19. I asked whether he would make available to the house the economic forecast which was made available to provincial premiers.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to take this question as notice and answer it on Friday.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST TO REVISE CENTRALIZATION POLICY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the great number of complaints received following the centralization of Unemployment Insurance offices, I would like to ask the minister whether he does not consider this sufficient reason to review that new policy?

[English]

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, the Unemployment Insurance Commission is a body which reports to parliament through me, but acts in an independent manner, free of political interference. If the hon. member has any concrete evidence that the commission is not fulfilling its role satisfactorily I will be pleased to take the matter into consideration and pass it on to the commission.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would discuss with the commission the advisability of not dismissing long service employees who are being let go because of a reorganization, but keeping them on until retirement takes place, as other government agencies have done?

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, I will be quite prepared on motions at an early date, perhaps tomorrow, to explain the procedure I have worked out with the Unemployment Insurance Commission. As I have said on several occasions, no one in the commission will be laid off with less than six months notice, which is double that normally given. I anticipate that, at a maximum, less than 50 people working for the Unemployment Insurance Commission, out of an original 800, will be given six months notice some time in February.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

FRED—PLAN FOR WESTERN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development whether he is prepared to answer the question I posed on Friday, January 17? I could repeat it if he wishes. I asked the acting minister because the minister was not in the house, whether he had received from the Newfoundland government a report on the proposed development plan for western Newfoundland under the FRED program, amounting to $305 million.

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, I have received this report. It is my view, which I believe the provincial government shares, that it would not be wise to base development measures for the province on the study of this area alone. We all know that the economic problems of the province as a whole are very difficult. In co-operation with Newfoundland officials, my department is currently examining what steps would best lead to the most effective joint development measures for the province.

SPORTS

NATIONAL HOCKEY LEAGUE—POSSIBLE TRANSFER OF OAKLAND FRANCHISE TO BUFFALO

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in relation to the reply he gave to a question asked last Monday concerning the possible transfer of the National Hockey League franchise from Oakland to Buffalo. I ask whether in that answer which in my opinion contained a veiled threat, the minister seriously wants Canadians to believe that in his opinion a transfer of this franchise to Buffalo would perhaps contravene the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act, whereas a transfer to Vancouver might not do so.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member is asking the minister to interpret a statute. I would not think that, asked in those terms, the question is acceptable.

Mr. Simpson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, the minister has already left that impression by saying he hopes that by the time they make this decision—and this indicates his interest in the franchise going to Vancouver—it will not be necessary for him to take action under the Combines Investigation Act.

Mr. Speaker: The minister was not in order in interpreting the statute, and the hon. member is not in order in interpreting the minister's interpretation.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—ADEQUATE FACILITIES FOR INDIAN REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. My question is related to what I understand was an announcement by the minister a few days ago that there will be a federal-provincial conference on Indian Affairs. If there is to be such a conference, will there be facilities for representatives of the native Indian people, in addition to government representatives, to be in attendance and participate in it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, it has not been decided yet to organize a federal-provincial conference on Indians problems. However, we have discussed this with the provincial Ministers of Welfare at last week's conference. When we reach a decision, we shall announce it, in order to determine the best method to get to know the views of the Indians.

FINANCE

QUEBEC BONDS IN EXCHANGE FOR CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the fact that salesmen of Canada Savings Bonds are presently going around "La belle province" telling people that Quebec will go bankrupt and advising them to exchange Quebec Savings Bonds against Canada Savings Bonds, could the minister tell us whether he has given instructions to his agents to act like that?

[English]

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I do not admit the premise of the question, and would like to take it as notice.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. While I was asking earlier—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Frontenac raising a point of order?

Mr. Dumont: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

For the information of the Minister of Finance, I tried to give him notice of my question, but unfortunately, I could not get anyone who spoke French at his office or at his assistant's. Because I have been unable to give notice, I cannot get an answer today.

[English]

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I did not receive notice of the question. As I understood the question, there was some action taken by people selling Canada bonds. I should point out to my hon. friend that at the present time we are not selling bonds in the market; the Canada Savings Bond campaign is completed, and was very successful. The only sales of bonds that can be going on are through dealers, where people are changing investments.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE FOLLOWING ACTION RESPECTING HOSPITAL CONSTRUCTION GRANT

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Arising from the minister's answer of January 15 to my question regarding the postponement of the expansion of ten of thirteen medical teaching centres in Ontario, will the minister undertake to make a statement as to what policies will be introduced by the federal government to meet the critical shortage of medical personnel, which the recent postponements will only make worse?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe any further statement is required. At the last federal-provincial conference of health ministers the federal government indicated the position we would have to take in the forthcoming year, namely that the expenditures out of the fund for this type of development would have to be limited to $37 million.

EXTERNAL AID

REQUEST FOR INCREASED USE OF AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs and relates to his statement in connection with a change of plans regarding foreign aid. I wonder if the minister could say whether there are plans for an increased amount of our domestic agricultural products to be used in foreign aid.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman knows that in general our aid is for the purpose of satisfying the priorities established by the developing country. We would be very happy to fit our agricultural products into a program put forward by those countries, if this is their order of priority.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

DISMISSAL OF COMMISSIONAIRES FROM MUSEUMS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. In connection with the cultural happening scheduled to take place in the Laurentians this week, will the question of the 15 commissionaires fired from museums be the subject of any review?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the officials of cultural institutions at their meeting in Val David next Friday and Saturday are to establish their own agenda and I cannot say if this matter will be on it.

[Later:]

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order with reference to the question I addressed to the Secretary of State. Would the Secretary of State, in view of the concern of veterans' organizations over this matter, seize the initiative in conducting a review?

[Later:]

Mr. Pelletier: Yes, Mr. Speaker, that matter was never neglected by the Secretary of State.

Every time the matter was brought up, we considered it still more closely. I, myself, read in the newspapers today allegations, contrary to the reports I have received, that some commissioners had lost benefits or even salary, and I inquired about that at once.

The hon. member for Brandon-Souris may be sure that this is a matter we certainly have no intention of neglecting.

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: Supplementary to my first question, Mr. Speaker, in the light of the growing protests from veterans organizations across the country over the injustice of the arbitrary action taken with reference to the commissionaires, would the minister seize the initiative himself and review this matter?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member will realize that at least part of his question was not in order. He can only ask a question, and cannot include in it an expression of opinion.

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

ALLEGED FAILURE TO ASSIST FEATURE PRODUCTION INDUSTRY

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, while I have the floor, I would like to answer the question put to me by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on January 15, with regard to the allegations of the Montreal Chapter of the Film Makers Association, accusing the Canadian Film Development Corporation of having failed to act. I told him that I would inquire and I am now in a position to give him whatever information I got.

At its meeting of December 17, the Canadian Film Development Corporation approved the investment of about $500,000 in the production of two feature films. They are "The Blast" and "The Act of the Heart". In addition, the Corporation is considering applications for three other feature films, fourteen feature film projects, two cases of distribution aid and two of film dubbing. The total investments should reach $1 million by the end of the fiscal year. The board of directors is to meet again at the end of January to discuss further the case mentioned.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR REPORT OF WOODS COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour? Has the minister yet received the report of the Woods committee on labour relations and, if so, will he be tabling it in the house before long?

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the Woods committee report is at the present time in the office of the Prime Minister, since this task force was set up by the Prime Minister's office two years ago. I understand that the English version is now available to the Prime Minister's office and is being translated, and that over the next several weeks the French version of the Woods committee report will also be available to the Prime Minister's office. As to its disposition, in view of the fact that its recommendations affect many departments and not only the Department of Labour, I would imagine that the Prime Minister himself would want to outline to the house the procedure that he intends to follow with regard to the publication of the report.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, will the Prime Minister make such a statement now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether this is the time to do it. I must point out to the hon. member as well as to other members that we are again running short of time, and if the Prime Minister made such a statement I am afraid that would be the end of the question period.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): At least the Prime Minister could tell us whether the report is going to be tabled.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will follow the usual practice. First we will have to read it and discuss it, and then we will see if it is in the public interest to table it.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

REPLACEMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development. In view of the fact that the term of office of the chairman of the Atlantic Development Board expires at midnight tonight, I should like to ask the minister whether a replacement has yet been made, and who it is?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, a replacement has not been made yet.

Mr. McQuaid: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the minister to make an appointment or to ask the present chairman to carry on for a longer time?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): This, Mr. Speaker, bears some relation to the question put to me by the Leader of the Opposition. Everything will depend upon the moment when the bill is tabled in the house.

[English]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ABOLITION OF NAVAL RANKS IN CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence, of which I have given him a brief indication and on which he agreed to make some comment. I wish to ask him whether it is indeed the intention of the Department of National Defence or the chief of the defence staff to abolish the use of naval ranks for those serving in the sea element of the Canadian armed forces?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can answer this question in the negative.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR INCREASED BORROWING RATE FROM SUPERANNUATION FUND

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, but since I just saw him leave the house I will direct it to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the government's action in raising interest rates on farm credit loans, veterans' loans and now fishermen's loans, will the minister consider increasing the rate at which the government borrows from the superannuation fund from the present 4 per cent to at least 5 per cent or more?

Hon. C. M. Drury (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, that question has been asked before, I think, and is being looked into.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

[Translation]

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell me whether during his stay in Europe he was able to find new solutions to help the poor in Canada?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's question is far too general. Therefore, I do not think it is in order.

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CARD SYSTEM FOR DRUG DISTRIBUTION TO INDIANS

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Further to his reply to a question a few days ago about the replacement of the list system for Indians entitled to free drugs with a card system, will the minister say what target date has been set for this change and, if none has been set, will he undertake to report to the house on this matter?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the cards have been prepared now as a result of consultations with the Indian people and other departments. We are spreading them out now amongst the Indian people. We hope that they will replace the list in due course, but there will be some duplication between the cards and the list for a month or so.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ON INDIAN RESERVES

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether before you call orders of the day—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member rising on a point of order?

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I have had a discussion with the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development concerning a motion for the production of papers, about which we took some action earlier. The minister and I have agreed to have the motion transferred for debate. If I could have the consent of the house to revert to notices of motions for production of papers I would ask that this be done.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Transferred for debate.

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member raising a point of order?

Mr. Laniel: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I simply wish to bring to your attention the fact that I rose about fifteen times and that there might be time to allow my question now.

Mr. Speaker: I have no objection, if the house will agree to let the hon. member do it. I must say that my attention was directed to the left of the Chair.

Mr. Laniel: Yet it would be the only question that will have been permitted on the government side today, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to ask the following question to the Minister of Transport. In view of all that has been said and written to date about this matter, can the Minister of Transport assure the house that in deciding on a site for the future international airport, firstly, all the economic advantages for the country and, secondly, the real advantages for the airline companies and the passengers who will use them, will be taken into consideration?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is making representations to the minister which are similar to those made previously. In that sense, I doubt that the question is in order.

Mr. Laniel: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that in the event of an affirmative reply, a site could have been chosen west of Montreal, between the riding of Stormont-Dundas and the metropolis.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FISHERIES IMPROVEMENT LOANS ACT

The house resumed, from Tuesday, January 21, consideration of the motion of Mr. Davis for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of Bill C-151, to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the passage of Bill C-151 but I would like to take this opportunity to say a few words about it. This bill is an act to amend the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, and yesterday I listened with interest to some of the debate on the bill.

I am not going to try to cover the ground which several hon. members from the Atlantic provinces covered in connection with the use to which this bill could and should be put. However, I do protest to the minister and the government against the clause in the bill which removes the 5 per cent ceiling on interest rates and leaves it up to the Governor in Council to set the interest rate which fishermen must pay for loans under this act. It seems to me that the government, in this field as in others, is moving in the wrong direction.

A number of hon. members referred to a lack of use by fishermen generally of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. I am quite certain that the increase in interest rates, which is bound to come about by the removal of the 5 per cent maximum rate, is going to do nothing to encourage fishermen to take out loans under this act.

I was very pleased to see the minister and other hon. members make reference to the excellent record of fishermen in regard to the repayment of loans under the act. I agree with other members that this should be broadcast widely. It is very interesting to note that in 13 years only nine loans, amounting to a small total of just over $3,000, have not been repaid. I do not think any other group in Canada can match this record, and the fishermen and their organizations can be very proud of the people in their ranks.

In going over the information given to the house yesterday it seems apparent to me that in some parts of Canada fishermen or fishermen's unions are not taking advantage of the loans available under this bill. I should like to pose a question or two to the minister. Has he or his department checked to see why the fishermen and their organizations have not made greater use of this act as a means of obtaining improvement loans? It seems to me it would be logical for fishermen to make the best possible use of this legislation when they needed loans for the improvement of their fishing equipment. I was amazed to learn of the small number of loans which had been taken out over the years. I would appreciate it very much if the minister when he winds up the debate could tell us why the fishermen in certain provinces in particular appeared extremely reluctant to seek assistance under this measure.

Finally, I repeat my complaint about the raising of the present maximum interest rate of 5 per cent. Throughout this session we find the government doing the same thing in connection with all new loan legislation. In my opinion this is not the way to bring relief to people who apply for assistance and desperately need it.

Mr. Ray Perrault (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments to the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act are certainly in the interests of the fisheries industry in all parts of Canada. During this debate some hon. members have attempted to suggest there were provincial motives involved on the part of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis). I do not think inferences of this kind have any place whatever in the House of Commons.

An unfair inference was drawn yesterday by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) that because the minister comes from British Columbia he had in some way worked against the great province of Newfoundland and other provinces in this country. Such an allegation is unworthy of this assembly. An attempt was made to divert the attention of the house from the real merits of the bill before us. It is a good bill, a bill which will provide a great deal of credit to help fishermen to build new boats, to equip their boats better, and to become more effective wherever they may fish.

The number of lending institutions is being increased. The interest rate is being made more flexible and more realistic. If the hon. member for St. John's East had any knowledge whatsoever of economics he would surely welcome this change. Loans may be made for a wider range of purposes than ever before. The minister, who needs no one to defend him because he is doing a good job in the office he holds, invited suggestions from the opposition with regard to a new limit on the total amount of loans to fishermen. Instead of constructive proposals we heard a diatribe unsupported by the facts. The minister pointed out that in 1955 the limit was $4,000 and that in 1965 there was a limit of $10,000. He suggested that perhaps $25,000 would be a realistic new limit and asked the opposition to make constructive proposals for changes in this area. What did we get? A total absence of constructive thought.

Mr. McGrath: The bill is only good for British Columbia.

Mr. Perrault: Again we hear divisive talk from the hon. member. It is fortunate we have Hansard because in an earlier year the hon. member, who was then assistant to one of the ministers, made a speech in the house. That was on May 12, 1961. The ground rules were different then, however, when this outspoken Conservative critic was a backbencher supporting a Conservative government. This is what he had to say then; I quote from page 4735 of Hansard:

> I realize that all too often people speaking on this subject tend to generalize and to oversimplify, and I hope that this afternoon I will not be too guilty of generalization, bearing in mind at all times that I do not have a really technical knowledge of this very complex subject.

He was uttering truth, Mr. Speaker. This is indeed a complex question. No one in Canada can remain unconcerned about this problem whether he lives in British Columbia or on the prairies or in the maritimes, because we are a united country.

I trust the hon. member is as concerned about the problems we face in British Columbia as we in British Columbia are concerned about the future of the maritimes. At an earlier period in his political career it seems the hon. member had a more highly developed spirit of candour. He said:

> I think you have here the real weakness of the Canadian salt fish industry, the fact that our markets for this product depend upon the stocks or supplies of the European markets. It is a common fact that most of the European markets are supplied generally by their own subsidized fleets operating in most cases in Canadian waters.

Of course it is a fact. It continues to be a fact today. But the same hon. member who told us in 1961 that the problem did not lend itself to oversimplification now asks the Minister of Fisheries to stand up and provide instant solutions to the difficulties of the Newfoundland fishermen. He knew in 1961 when he was defending his own government that this was impossible, that this was one of the problem areas.

The other day the hon. member for St. John's East accused other members of this house of knowing nothing about Newfoundland. "You haven't even been there", he said. Mr. Speaker, I have always wanted to go to Newfoundland. I am going there next month and I hope to talk to some of the people engaged in the fishing industry there. In this connection I might mention that when the hon. member spoke in May of 1961 he was asked by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, the hon. Mr. Pickersgill, whether he had ever visited the research station in Valleyfield, Newfoundland. His reply was:

Unfortunately I have not, because Valleyfield is so isolated and so far away from the main centres of the island that I have been unable to go there.

Mr. McGrath: There was no road through.

Mr. Perrault: I hope the hon. member was eventually able to get to Valleyfield in his own province and that he will excuse some of us for not getting to Newfoundland when in terms of miles it is considerably farther away from us.

Mr. McGrath: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Perrault: Oh, the hon. member for St. John's East made a spectacular speech yesterday. If he has any further statement to make, he can make it after I have finished.

Mr. McGrath: You can get to Valleyfield now because we built a road there.

Mr. Perrault: On another day and on another occasion the hon. member had something else to say about the Newfoundland fishery. These are his words as recorded in Hansard of April 28, 1959, at page 3137:

• (3:20 p.m.)

This question is a complex one. It has been perplexing the governments down through the years. One has but to look briefly at the history of Newfoundland to see that the economy, up to perhaps a few years ago, was based solely on fish; it was a one-product economy. The folly of this economic condition became evident in Newfoundland during the world-wide depression in 1933, for at that time we found ourselves unable to sell our fish in the world markets—

Now, I am one, sir, who is of the opinion that the future of Newfoundland, and to a very large extent the future of Canada's tenth province, will ultimately depend on the attitudes and policies of this government and the provincial government toward the fishery of Newfoundland.

After three years of Conservative government this is what the hon. member had to say about the then existing situation in the province of Newfoundland:

What do you find today if you go into these same settlements? You will find the little potato field grown over with weeds. He no longer keeps dairy cattle or poultry to supply his own needs. His fishing gear is rotting. His nets have rotted away and in some cases the people have not even bothered to request that the wharf be rebuilt.

That is what the hon. member for St. John's East had to say about Newfoundland after three years of Conservative administration.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the hon. member. Will he resume his seat. It seems to me that I must bring to his attention that the rules of relevancy require that the hon. member refer to the bill that is before the house. We should hear what his views are about the bill before the house, not necessarily what he thinks about the views that were expressed by the hon. member for St. John's East.

Mr. Perrault: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I accede to your request but I would remind the house that when a member of this assembly stands up and accuses this minister of a total misrepresentation of the facts, in a speech that wandered widely afield from the measure under discussion, this calls, in my submission, for a reply from somebody in the house.

These amendments are good; they are constructive and they are realistic. Those engaged in our fishing industry will be given access to more money at very favourable rates of interest. The minister is to be commended for the leadership he has shown in the matter of proposing amendments. I am simply pointing out to the house that we have not had a completely candid analysis of this bill on the part of the hon. member for St. John's East.

For example, the hon. member failed to point out to the house that the provincial government of Newfoundland makes assistance available to those in the fishing industry in that province at an interest rate of 3½ per cent. Much of the money that Newfoundland uses to provide a base for that program derives from the federal government. It might be in the interests of Canadian unity and of fair credit given for this fact to be acknowledged by the hon. member. What did we hear from him yesterday? A violent, inaccurate, personal attack upon the minister and his integrity and, in effect, an attack on the province of British Columbia.

I have referred to the position of the Conservative party in 1959 when the hon. member was defending this measure with such vigour. He said that the government of that day—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: According to the rules the hon. member should first resume his seat. The hon. member is again referring to statements made by the hon. member for St. John's East on another occasion. I feel that I have been as lenient as possible in allowing the hon. member to reply to some extent to the statements that he alleges were made by the hon. member for St. John's East yesterday. Having done this, the leniency of the Chair having been exercised to that extent, I think the hon. member should co-operate with the Chair and return to the consideration of the measure before the house.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, I hope that the point has been made as to the divergence between the statements made when the hon. member was defending his government in facing this problem and the statements that he made yesterday. In his speech we were told that there is a lack of assistance to the province of Newfoundland from the federal government. If the hon. member would become active in supporting this legislation, which is going to increase the amount of money that can be borrowed by those engaged in the fishing industry and make it available at realistic interest rates, he would be making a more constructive contribution on the part of his province than the contribution he made yesterday.

Under the provincial program, 10 per cent of the cost of a boat is available through a provincial subsidy at an interest rate of 3.5 per cent, repayable in ten years. On used equipment there is a 25 per cent subsidy, also at 3.5 per cent interest and repayable in ten years. That was one reason there were only 18 fisheries improvement loans in Newfoundland over the period cited by the hon. member in his speech.

How is this provincial assistance made available? It is because federal government development dollars amount to more than 30 cents for every $1 spent for all purposes in Newfoundland. Yet the hon. member from Newfoundland has told us that the government is doing nothing for Newfoundland and for Newfoundland fishermen, that the minister is, in effect, a liar. He would do better to support this measure, get behind it, and do a personal public relations job in Newfoundland by encouraging those in the fishing industry in the province to examine the legislation very carefully so as to find out whether or not they may qualify, and thus render a real service to his province. Quite apart from the unparliamentary aspects of some of the inferences that he drew yesterday, it is a fact that the federal government puts up over half the money in Newfoundland's provincial budget.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. The hon. member has implied that yesterday I said things which were unparliamentary. I maintain this is not so. At no time was I called to order by the Chair for saying things that were unparliamentary. I submit to Your Honour that the hon. member should withdraw that remark.

Mr. Perrault: If the hon. member is willing to withdraw his suggestion that there was a total misrepresentation of the facts on the part of the minister, then I will consider his request.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot rule on what was said by the hon. member yesterday, but I will rule that it is not unparliamentary to say that an hon. member has said something that is unparliamentary. I would leave it at that.

Mr. Moores: Mr. Speaker, a point of order—

Mr. Perrault: The measure before the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Moores: I should like to raise a point of order with regard to the hon. member's remark that the Newfoundland government has set up an agency to lend money at 3½ per cent. I would not want the hon. member to misinform the house, but I think he will find—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member knows that that is not a point of order. If he believes that it is then he might indicate to the Chair under which standing order he is raising it. That might be a little embarrassing for him.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, I am attempting to point out that there is concern on the part of members from all parts of Canada with regard to the plight of the Newfoundland and maritimes fisheries. But aid has been extended to the fisheries for a number of years, and this measure is simply going to improve the situation and make more money available for more purposes at realistic interest rates. The federal government, through all departments —fisheries, public works, transport, unemployment insurance, etc.—puts up the equivalent of more than 40 cents for every $1 that the fisherman gets for his fish.

In 1968—and this relates to the program which is part of the general pattern of assistance—the government had in operation three expenditure programs involving $4.5 million for groundfish, $2.5 million for salt cod and $1.2 million for the resettlement of fishermen. These programs were in addition to the other aid that is provided. This fact was not referred to yesterday by the hon. member.

If we are going to help any given part of Canada, then there must be a degree of cooperation among members of all parties of this house. The hon. member for St. John's East is either ignorant of the facts or he has chosen to ignore them; and neither condition is acceptable. I urge the hon. member to spend more time in his province promoting and encouraging a greater use of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act and less time in pursuing personally destructive vendettas against the Minister of Fisheries and the federal government. It is to be hoped that since he has now made his speech he will support this measure in the interests of the fishermen of Canada wherever they live.

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, some time ago the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) asked who the hell was the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour. I am wondering what the hell the hon. member is trying to prove with his irrelevant remarks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I may be anticipating the hon. member's remarks but I must tell him, as I told the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour, that under the rules hon. members' remarks should be confined to the principle of the bill and should not be personal in any way.

Mr. Lundrigan: I understand that, Mr. Speaker. It is unfortunate that the hon. member's remarks misrepresented the facts of a situation. No one will deny that in presenting Bill C-151 the Minister of Fisheries is trying to make an effort, in one form or another, to help the fishermen of Canada ameliorate their circumstances. One of our problems is that the Minister of Fisheries does not know the Atlantic region. His sincerity notwithstanding, he has not had a great deal to do with the Atlantic fishery. It might be a good idea if we had two deputy ministers responsible for fisheries, one dealing with the Atlantic region and one with the Pacific coast. Because there are great differences between the east and west coast fisheries I have heard it suggested that there ought to be two ministers responsible for fisheries who in turn would have deputy ministers. Although no one can say that the minister is displaying no interest in our fisheries it is true that he knows little about Atlantic Canada. I think he will be the first to admit that.

It is well for the minister to understand that our Atlantic fishermen are not looking for handouts or for government of Canada doles. I take strong exception to any suggestion that under Bill C-151 our fishermen will be entitled to receive a form of dole. That kind of thinking is unworthy of some of our better off Canadians who live in industrialized regions. It is unjust for anyone to classify some people in Canada as second class citizens who are satisfied to live on government handouts. Anyone making that suggestion about our Atlantic fishermen is wasting the time of hon. members and of this house.

Several times during this debate hon. members have mentioned that the fishermen of Newfoundland receive 40 per cent of their total incomes in the form of government handouts. Only last month the government of Canada made a so-called sacrifice and shipped 50 million pounds of fish to Biafra. The world looked on and said, "My, what a government they have in Canada; what a great government." The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was happy with the shipment, everyone was happy, and representatives at the United Nations acclaimed the magnificently benevolent attitude Canada displayed toward the suffering people of Nigeria and Biafra. We sent the fish all right, but what the people of the world did not understand was that the government of Canada squeezed the fishermen of Newfoundland in order to obtain that fish at the lowest possible price. It was the fishermen of Newfoundland who made the sacrifice and who shipped that fish to Biafra.

Mr. McGrath: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lundrigan: I wish to place on record what the government did. Officials of the government of Canada asked merchants of the Atlantic region to press fishermen for the lowest possible price as a condition to obtaining government contracts for the fish. As a result some fishermen in Newfoundland were paid as little as $13 per hundredweight of fish, the price last year having been $27 a hundredweight. Today we have people in Newfoundland kicking their heels on wharves and wondering what happened to the great benefits this government promised them and to which the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour alluded.

Yesterday evening the minister outlined the aims of this legislation, as found on page 4581 of Hansard. No one will question the ultimate aims of Bill C-151. We all want to see the fishermen of Atlantic Canada and other parts of the country benefit from the legislation. Yet the fact remains that few have made use of this legislation in the past. Merely passing this bill is like saying to our fishermen: There are fish in the water. The fact remains that the oceans are large. The question is, where are the fish? In the past fishermen did not know of the provisions of similar legislation. They did not know they could obtain money. Not many loans were made under this legislation last year, and the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour and the Minister of Fisheries are aware of that fact. Will it be the responsibility of the Minister of Fisheries, the Minister of Finance or anyone else charged with the administration of this legislation to make known to our fishermen the provisions of this legislation? The government allocated $500 to make known to the fishermen of Newfoundland the provisions of previous legislation. That was not enough. Our fishermen must be made aware of the provisions of this legislation.

The fact is that since our fishermen live in little coves and inlets they cannot receive messages through the mass communications media as readily as the citizens of Toronto or other metropolitan centres. Our fishermen should know of the benefits they can derive from Bill C-151, how they can apply for loans, pay those loans back, and what they must do if they get into difficulties and cannot make payments for a number of years. The government may have to hire public relations people to make known the benefits of this legislation, or it could be done through inspectors. It is a waste of time enacting laws to benefit our fishermen if they do not know of those laws.

Clearly the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour is privy to information not available to other hon. members. Twice during his speech this afternoon—and I think tomorrow's Hansard will bear me out—the hon. member said that this legislation will bring more favourable rates of interest to the fishermen of Canada. I have not seen anything in Bill C-151 to bear out that statement. There is no indication that interest rates will decline or become more favourable. Apparently the hon. member knows something about future interest rates; I am afraid our fishermen do not know what he knows. Hon. members will remember what happened to interest rates under farm legislation recently passed in regard, to interest rates charged on farm loans. There was no guarantee. The frozen interest rate of 5 per cent was lifted and there was no indication what rate of interest would be paid by these people. This is the third occasion in the last couple of months that we have seen the same thing happen.

I do not think we would be too happy, when purchasing a car, about going to a bank and getting involved in a financial transaction without knowing something about the interest rate. I cannot stand here and say to the Minister of Fisheries, to the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour, and to the house that I am happy with this kind of blind approach to everything. I cannot make such a statement. I am not going to say on behalf of the fishermen in my riding that I am happy with an interest rate when I have no idea what it will be.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour indicates that it is going to be a more favourable rate of interest. I ask the Minister of Fisheries to tell us what the rate of interest will be. I will certainly be happy to find out how much more favourable it is.

Mr. Perrault: You could not get money at 5 per cent.

Mr. Lundrigan: The hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour has indicated that the fishermen could not get loans at 5 per cent. Apparently the interest rate is going to be a good bit higher than 5 per cent, perhaps 10 per cent or 15 per cent. Yet he says it will be a more favourable rate of interest. Why is he saying that? Why does he not tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, that the farmers and fishermen are going to pay double for their loans, that the farmers and fishermen are going to be left out in the cold? I say to the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour: It is all very well for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to go out on blind dates but we want the farmers and fishermen of Canada to know what they are going to pay for money.

I had no intention of speaking at length on this point. I just wanted to inquire as to the favourable rate of interest, and to ask the minister to give serious consideration to telling the fishermen of Canada exactly what are the benefits of this legislation and to what extent they can be assumed by the fishermen of the Atlantic region and the rest of Canada.

Before sitting down, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that the hon. member for Burnaby-Seymour made reference to the 3½ per cent interest loans which are available in Newfoundland, money which he said is being made available by the federal government—

An hon. Member: By the provincial government.

Mr. Lundrigan: —apparently made available by the provincial government but coming from the federal government. I think he made the observation with respect to this little province off the east coast of Canada that it is surviving only as a result of the munificence of the government of Canada. I think that was the observation he made.

Mr. Perrault: May I ask a question?

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer—yes, ask any question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Perrault: On a point of order—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will resume his seat, please.

Mr. Perrault: I am stating my point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member resume his seat? The hon. member has the right to ask a question of the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate and that hon. member has the option to refuse. If that is what the hon. member for Burnaby Seymour stood up to do, I take it that the hon. member for Gander-Twillingate has refused to accept a question.

Mr. Lundrigan: Not at all, Mr. Speaker, I would never refuse such a request from my hon. friend from British Columbia.

Mr. Perrault: Mr. Speaker, a number of remarks have been attributed to me which clearly were not uttered by me. I simply suggest to the hon. member that if he is going to engage in the debate he should not feel it necessary to misquote. The hon. member should not misquote me. My point related to the amount of aid received by Newfoundland. The reference was made, Mr. Speaker, that I said in my remarks that somehow the federal government was supporting the province of Newfoundland and providing all the aid down there. That is an incorrect account of what I said and I made no such suggestion. I simply ask the hon. member to be factual.

Mr. Lundrigan: I hope the hon. member from B.S. is not asking me—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lundrigan: —to make a ruling on that. I would not presume to assume the awesome responsibility of the Chair. The hon. member indicated that there were amounts of money available at 3½ per cent from the Newfoundland Fishery Loans Board. This is correct. However, I would just like to say I have had occasion to write to that board on behalf of a number of people who have been hoping to expand their operations through the use of larger craft, better fishing gear and so on, but the reply I got was that there is no money available from that board. The source has dried up. There is no money available because no moneys are forthcoming from the source, whatever it was. The hon. member says it was the federal government. There has not been any money for six months and there is a good indication that there will be none this year. At least, that is the information I received as the result of my inquiries, so I think the person who is really out of order is the hon. member from B.S. and I think he ought to make this correction the next time he stands up in his place.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would request the hon. member that in future when referring to a riding he refer to it by its proper name. It is my duty to inform the house that if the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, from listening to members on both sides of the house I get the impression that in the main Bill C-151 is a necessary piece of legislation. While they are less than ecstatic about it, and there are aspects of the bill which do not appeal to everyone, nevertheless we have support from all corners for the referral of the bill to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry and its passage into law.

In winding up this stage of the debate I would like to make a few general remarks. This is essentially background legislation. Loans will be available to fishermen across Canada under conditions which will be acceptable to our major commercial lending institutions. One of the provisions in this bill changes the ground rules in such a way as to make loans of this nature attractive to the banks, credit unions, trust and loan companies and insurance companies. In other words, loans will begin to flow again to fishermen.

I mentioned background legislation. The loans available under this legislation are not attractive in all parts of Canada because in certain areas provincial governments, through their own departments, agencies and boards, make money available at even lower rates of interest. In those parts of Canada where a fisherman can get a better loan from a provincial board, in other words, a more favourable loan from the provincial authorities, he will do so, and he will only fall back on the federal legislation if he cannot get this provincial loan. If the provincial loan fund has dried up, as it does occasionally, then he has to fall back on the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, our federal or national legislation.

On the west coast of British Columbia where the greatest advantage has been taken of this federal legislation there is no provincial loan board, no direct loans available from the province. That is the main reason why this act is used to a greater extent in British Columbia than it is in the Atlantic region. Nevertheless, it does make sense for the national government to draw up legislation which applies uniformly across Canada. If the provincial governments in particular areas want to outdo our national legislation and introduce other legislation which is even more attractive—in this case for the fishermen—this is within the competence of the provinces to do so, and of course a background piece of legislation, a national piece of legislation which applies uniformly across Canada, is not likely to be fully operative under those circumstances.

There has been considerable comment about the level of the interest rate. The interest rate is a rate which will be determined from time to time. It is an interest rate which cannot be forecast with certainty. However, it is an interest rate which would be in the order of 7½ per cent now if these proposed amendments were law and the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act were operative with the new clauses which are being introduced in Bill C-151.

The 7½ per cent interest rate would be arrived at as follows: the long-term borrowing rate of the federal government in a recent period, say four months, would have been 6½ per cent, and fisherman taking advantage of this legislation could not be asked to pay a rate of more than one per cent above that. In other words, it could not be more than 7½ per cent. This 7½ per cent figure must be viewed in the context of all other interest rates. The largest and most influential companies in Canada today pay about 8 per cent. So this rate is a little better than the large corporations can do. It is better than the interest rate which a large corporation would pay for a new long term loan.

This support for an individual fisherman, this exceptional support from the people of Canada lending their collective financial credibility to him, causes his credit rating to rise because it is backed by the credit of Canada. If he went to the Industrial Development Bank at the present time to get a loan he would be asked to pay 8½ per cent. So he is better off than large corporations at 8 per cent and he is better off than companies paying 8½ per cent to the Industrial Development Bank. The new rate is certainly better than the 12 per cent he would have to pay if he obtained a personal loan secured only on the basis of his own assets or individual prospects. So he has a very good deal.

The fisherman will be able to obtain a loan in an amount up to three-quarters the cost of a new boat, new electronic equipment for the boat or a new shore installation. He will receive 75 per cent of his total investment at a rate which is better than that at which most other people can obtain money in Canada. This is a privilege which is extended to all the fishermen of Canada just as it is available to all the farmers of Canada. Those two groups have this special opportunity.

The 7½ per cent rate will be in effect as long as the cost of money to the government of Canada is 6½ per cent. If the pressures of inflation die down and the government of Canada or the people of Canada can borrow money at 4 per cent or less, this act will automatically bring the ceiling down to 5 per cent or less. If the government of Canada some day in the future can borrow money at 3 per cent, then loans to fishermen will be available at no more than 4 per cent. If the government can borrow at 4 per cent over any period of months, then the fishermen will be able to obtain money for less than 5 per cent, and so on.

This interest rate is part of the general rate structure. As interest rates rise this rate will rise and as interest rates fall it will fall. It will always be a preferred rate relative to the rate large corporations would pay and certainly will be preferential over the rate at which small companies might borrow from the Industrial Development Bank and the rate which most small commercial establishments would have to pay on loans made through a bank or other commercial lending institution. This is good legislation in the sense that it gives preference to the fisherman. It gives a preference to him in the sense that he will pay less for money than he would otherwise have to pay.

There are only a few other points on which I should like to touch. There is the question of the maximum loan which can be granted. This was raised by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode). This was the reason I asked one of the members what the amount would be that a fisherman would need to finance a new vessel. I would like to know what it would cost a fisherman today to finance a new longliner on the east coast, for example, or a new halibut boat on the west coast. Would the amount be $10,000 or would it more likely be $30,000, $40,000 or $50,000? If this is the amount of money a fisherman must have in order to equip himself with a new vessel including all the necessary electronic gear and so on, then we should consider a ceiling higher than the ceiling of $10,000 which has been in effect since 1965. This, however, is a matter on which we can obtain expert opinion and evidence when the bill is before the committee.

Several members have asked why these loans are not used more. In the Atlantic region, generally speaking there is provincial legislation under which loans are available at lower interest rates than are available now from private lenders. Also in some provinces there are direct grants available as well; in other words, interest-free money which in many cases is given and forgotten by the province. The lender in all these cases is the provincial government. One can perhaps make a case for direct loans by the federal government but we are not discussing direct loans today. We are discussing loans made available by private lenders with a federal government guarantee. This is parallel legislation to the Farm Improvement Loans Act.

I do not think there are any other points on which I should dwell now because we should get this legislation before the committee where I am sure all interested members will do their very best to improve it from the fisherman's point of view.

Mr. Marshall: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister would allow one question?

Mr. Davis: Yes.

Mr. Marshall: I have had occasion to relate to the inshore fishermen in the forsaken settlements that these loans are available and have asked them whether they have tried to obtain them. It would appear that the culprits are the banks. The banks will not grant the loans because they do not feel these fishermen are good risks. These are the people who are losing out in respect of the benefits of this legislation. I wonder how this might be overcome and whether the minister would consider overcoming this.

Mr. Davis: That is a very good question. The private lending institutions principally are banks. The banks do not have as many outlets in some of our Atlantic provinces as they have in Ontario or throughout the west. This is one deficiency. Also the credit unions, insurance companies and so on have fewer outlets, especially in the outport areas, for instance, of Newfoundland. So we do not have the offices we would like to have particularly in areas where small loans of this nature are badly needed.

I think also that we have fallen down rather badly in the sense that the literature describing these loans has not always been available. I understand it has been available on the counters in some of the banks, but I think these loans would be pushed only in areas where the bank manager, for example, felt that he knew something about the prospects of the fishery and of the individual fisherman. I believe the Department of Fisheries should take the responsibility of making this literature more attractive, more understandable and readily available particularly in areas where none of these institutions exist but where perhaps by correspondence or by a visit once in a while a fisherman might be able to go to a centre and obtain a commercial loan. This is a commercial loan with a federal government guarantee and there is a role for this although perhaps in areas where the provincial government feels it wants to give an added push to the industry it will not be as attractive as it would otherwise be.

Mr. Comeau: Mr. Speaker, would the minister permit another question? As the minister will note from my speech, I support this legislation. Would the minister agree that the fact that loans under this act are not used as much as they might be is not because of the lower rates the provincial governments are offering but because the maximum limit is higher under most of the provincial loans. The minister asked how much a longliner would cost. A boat builder informed me that the cost would be in excess of $1,000 per foot. This is an approximate figure. This means that a 60-foot boat would cost in excess of $60,000. Therefore a $10,000 limit will not do the trick.

Mr. Davis: I agree with the comment and I agree also that if we are endeavouring to upgrade the fishery we should be going into bigger, multiple purpose boats. This bill names the maximum loan which any of these commercial institutions may make available to an individual, but the actual amount is still at their discretion. We would want as large a proportion of the total cost of financing under these preferable conditions rather than under commercial conditions with no federal guarantee.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister is aware of the record of this legislation in the province of Newfoundland by comparison with the province of Nova Scotia. I do not have the figures in front of me, but since the inception of this legislation in 1955 the province of Newfoundland has only had 18 loans totalling $23,000. I am sure the minister recognizes that the need in Newfoundland is as great if not greater than in any other province. What steps is the department taking to correct this situation in order to make the benefits of this legislation more available to the fishermen of Newfoundland who so badly need them?

Mr. Davis: That is a difficult question to answer. This legislation is national; therefore its terms must be national. There is no preferential clause dealing with any particular region as opposed to others. I think we would have to consider other sources of credit to deal with specific situations under specific programs, for instance, the specific program relating to the salt fish industry which, as it happens, is confined largely to Newfoundland, or a somewhat broader one confined almost completely to the Atlantic region, the groundfishery program. It is under more selective programs of this nature that we could provide aid to certain regions to focus on regional problems or areas which the hon. member is concerned about at this time.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, following the passage of this legislation would the minister consider the preparation of a special brochure which could be provided to the banks and other lending institutions mentioned in the bill in order that they might be available in these institutions to Canadian fishermen? In my opinion there has been a grave lack of communication between the minister's department and the people concerned. It is obvious from the number of loans made that fishermen are not aware of the amount which may be borrowed. I should like to ask the minister whether he would give some thought to making brochures available to these institutions so they could be on public display.

Mr. Davis: I think the brief answer is yes. The Department of Finance circulated a brochure describing the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. It was distributed through certain banks and only available in certain branches where there was a local manager who knew something about fisheries. Perhaps through the fisheries department and in other ways we could get out more attractive literature to be distributed through more channels and, effectively, to many more fishermen. I think this could be done within the present budget of the Department of Fisheries. No doubt we could switch the emphasis from one program to another. I agree we need more advertising of this kind.

Mr. Harding: I am interested in the small number of fishermen in certain areas who have been availing themselves of assistance under this act. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the suggestions which have been put forward. Would a number of loans be rejected in some areas because the applicants were not good risks? Does the minister have any record of the number of applicants who have been turned down? Would a number of rejections result because the applicants were not good risks under this act?

Mr. Davis: The experience so far has indicated that a fisherman is an excellent risk. On the record at least he is a far better risk than a farmer, and a far better risk than a student under the student loans program. The figures I have seen in our annual reports indicate that a small fraction of 1 per cent of fishermen fail to make their payments on schedule. There was another aspect of the hon. member's question which I am afraid has slipped my mind.

Mr. Harding: Has the minister any record of the number of applications rejected or turned down?

Mr. Davis: No, I have not. However, because the government stands behind the loans I would have thought that individual bank managers would look with much greater favour on applications by fishermen. There is a question of commercial judgment involved here. Over and above the minimum guarantee which is set out farther on in the act, there is a risk. There has to be an assessment of an individual and his ability to pay the loan. But one must remember that the federal government does stand behind these loans up to a substantial amount.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

VETERANS LAND ACT

AMENDMENT SUBSTITUTING RATE PRESCRIBED BY GOVERNOR IN COUNCIL

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs) moved the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs of Bill C-152, to amend the Veterans Land Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it may not be necessary to speak at any length on this bill as hon. members are familiar in general terms with the Veterans Land Act. Perhaps I should mention that since the act became effective in 1942, some 117,000 veterans have taken advantage of its financial assistance to establish themselves on farms or small holdings. The total investment of funds for that purpose has amounted to $911 million. At the present time the department has approximately 56,000 active accounts representing an investment of $438 million. These figures clearly demonstrate that the V.L.A. has been a major factor in the re-establishment of Canadian veterans.

The purpose of the proposed amendment in this bill is to provide that certain interest rates charged on moneys lent under the Veterans Land Act may be prescribed by the Governor in Council instead of being fixed by statute. Hon. members are well aware that interest rates in the general economy of the country fluctuate from time to time and have in recent years been somewhat above the long term level.

At the present time the V.L.A. has three different rates, two of them fixed by statute and the third prescribed by regulation. The rate of interest on loans up to $6,000 was established in 1942 at 3½ per cent which was close to the cost of money at that time. For loans over $6,000 and under $20,000 the rate of 5 per cent was fixed by statute in 1954. For farm loans in excess of $20,000 the rate is determined by the Governor in Council and since 1964 has been related directly to that charged under the Farm Credit Act. This third rate is currently 7¾ per cent.

The effect of the proposed measure would be to transfer the rate for loans over $6,000 and under $20,000, which is now 5 per cent, from a statutory to a regulatory basis. It will permit the rate to be established from time to time by the Governor in Council. Hon. members will recall that the house recently considered a measure to amend the Farm Credit Act so that the interest rate under that plan might similarly be prescribed by regulation. The principle in both cases is the same. Following enactment of this measure it is the intention to apply the same interest rates for V.L.A. loans over $6,000 as those that are applied from time to time for the whole amount of loans under the Farm Credit Act.

I should like to emphasize that this measure will not affect the 3½ per cent rate on the repayable portion of V.L.A. loans up to $6,000 under part I of the act. This rate has been unchanged since 1942 and will remain on a statutory basis as at present. The conditional grant paid for ten years continued occupancy of the house by the veteran will also remain unchanged. The government recognizes the special position of veterans and regards the benefits outlined in the Veterans Charter as an entitlement for war service in War II or the Korean forces. Part I of the Veterans Land Act is one of these benefits included in the Veterans Charter. Therefore, although the 3½ per cent rate is now substantially below the cost of long term money, veterans who are established in the future will continue to receive this benefit.

Under the new arrangement the veteran borrower will pay 3½ per cent on the part I portion of the loan and a rate fixed by order in council on the remainder. It will be seen that the average of the two rates will vary with the total size of the loan. For example, under the provisions of the bill a newly established smallholder who obtains approval of an $18,000 loan with interest at 3½ per cent and 7¾ per cent would pay an average rate of 6½ per cent on the repayable debt of $14,000. Similarly, a veteran being established as a farmer and obtaining the maximum loan of $40,000 with a repayable debt of $37,200 for a period of 30 years would in the present circumstances be charged an average rate calculated at 7.4 per cent.

I might mention that the new rates will not affect applications received before September 13, 1968, and applications received after that date and approved before the coming into force of this bill will also fall under the old rates. Existing contracts remain unaffected. If, however, additional loans are approved after the bill becomes law, the new rate will apply but only to the amount of the new loans.

The preservation of the statutory 3½ per cent rate on part I loans produces an average rate which is materially lower than the interest rates paid for other kinds of mortgage loans. This in my view should be acceptable to the veterans of Canada because it maintains their preferred position in obtaining financial assistance under the act. I therefore trust that Bill C-152 will be referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs for detailed study.

Mr. Charles H. Thomas (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the introduction of this bill for second reading, not because I am happy about still another proposal to raise interest rates, something which has become a way of life under this government and its just society, but because I see at least a faint ray of hope that possibly the government is taking a first step toward making more money available to make the thousands of approved loans that are now pending. We have heard from various ministers as they have piloted bills through the house the cry that unless interest rates are increased the money market is just not interested in making loans. I do not wish to become involved in this argument; it has been thoroughly discussed in the past few months.

I was surprised when last evening I saw the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) rise to speak on the fisheries bill. I wondered just what his interest in fisheries could be unless it was something to do with Winnipeg gold-eye.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I could make the same speech today.

Mr. Thomas (Moncton): But he had not been on his feet very long when I realized the purpose of his remarks. I think he summed up the matter very nicely when he said that we have had a proliferation of bills brought in by the government in the past few months, the farm credit bills, the fisheries bill that we have just finished discussing and now the Veterans Land Act measure, and have now reached th point when any one of us could rise and talk on any of these bills just by repeating speeches already made. This is so because essentially the only thing these bills are designed to do is increase interest rates.

However, I would point out that in this case there is a fundamental difference. The money involved in this bill is not dependent upon the vagaries of the commercial market. The money with which to finance loans under the Veterans Land Act comes from a fund set up by the government at the time the act was amended in 1965. The amount was then established at $380 million and last year it was increased to $530 million. This is the limit of the fund and when it is reached no more loans can be made, regardless of interest rates. Therefore this proposal to raise interest rates will do nothing to increase the money available for loans under the act. It might make the Treasury Board a little more willing to increase the money available. If this should be the case we will at least have done something for the veterans who are in desperate need of housing.

At this point I would emphasize that I am not accepting the premise that there should be no subsidization of loans to veterans. I do not agree that the veteran should pay the full interest rate. This question will be discussed at length when the bill goes to committee. I would also remind the minister, as so many of his cabinet colleagues have been reminded by this side of the house, that the method of determining the rate of interest should be more clearly defined. Under this bill the rate of interest can be determined by the Governor in Council. But how? This is not spelled out. I know that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Dubé) said that it would probably be the same as that applied under the Farm Credit Act. But this, as we have discussed many times on these various bills, is not good enough. I suggest that when this bill comes before the committee a definite formula for setting interest rates should be established.

I think the house should have some assurance from the minister that if this bill passes the Treasury Board will then take steps to provide more money for the director, raising the ceiling of the fund if necessary. We do not want a repetition of 1968 when funds for loans to veterans were limited to about 35 per cent above the previous five-year average. As a result of this, loan funds were exhausted by July in four out of the seven regions. Because of this the director was forced to defer 1,000 loans, amounting to $14 million, until 1969 funds became available.

At present over 150,000 veterans have established eligibility for loans, and it is estimated that from 30,000 to 50,000 of these will be established before the final cut-off in 1974. In testimony before the veterans affairs committee Mr. R. W. Pawley, Director General of the Veterans Land Act, estimated that this would require approximately $100 million a year over the next six years. So I plead with the minister to give us the assurance that once this bill goes through he will see that $100 million is available each year, or as needed. This is what the veteran expects; this is the action he deserves.

I am pleased that the minister saw fit to make no changes in part I of the act and has retained the 3½ per cent rate on loans under this section. When the resolution was presented to the house I, along with most people feared that the proposal would apply to part I of the act as well. This would have been a breach of faith with the veteran and would have met strong opposition from the Canadian Legion and from this side of the house. But this objection cannot be raised now, and I would therefore urge that the house dispose of second reading quickly and send this bill to the committee where it can be discussed fully and where any necessary changes may be made.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, members of parliament and the Canadian people have been taken in very badly by the Liberal government in the last two or three years, particularly the low income groups. A few years ago we listened to the then minister of finance indicate that if the ceiling on the bank interest rate were raised—I can well remember the argument—interest rates would probably level out at about 4 per cent, that we would destroy the secondary lending institutions such as trust companies, finance companies and other institutions, and that the prime interest rate would come down considerably below the 6 per cent ceiling. It is an indication of how little most of us know about finance and about the methods used in financing that we did not even realize we were being hoodwinked at that time. Since then we have been continually faced with increasing rates on loans under specific legislation.

I was very concerned when the interest rate on farm credit under the Farm Credit Corporation was raised because these were long term loans that were being subsidized by the government to enable farmers across Canada to upgrade their farm operations and make them more economic. The same was true of farm improvement loans. Farm syndicates were in a different category because there was no fixed interest rate on such loans and there was some merit in freeing it. The fisheries legislation we have just discussed is in the same category. Loans were subsidized to assist in upgrading the operations of fishermen, particularly on the east coast.

Now we are faced with changes in the Veterans Land Act. In my opinion it is a good thing that the Canadian people in 1945 decided, in establishing the Veterans Land Act, to use this method rather than the old soldier settlement scheme which was so badly abused by governments, and to create this charter in such a way as to permit veterans to establish themselves on farms with special advantages.

I sincerely congratulate the Minister of Veterans Affairs for having been able to retain part I where the interest rate stands at 3½ per cent for loans up to $6,000. I think this is a reward to those who gave up, if nothing else, several years of their lives in the service of their country. It seems there are not many people in the government who have sympathy for the veterans and their problems. Therefore I assume the Minister of Veterans Affairs should be congratulated for having been able to retain part I, especially in view of the fact that the government seems hell-bent on balancing the budget at the expense of the little people. High interest rates will certainly not be a help in this regard. We know that when the government borrows money at 6½ per cent and then lends it to the veterans at 5 per cent there is a cost to the taxpayer, but we have some responsibility to the veterans. We established the 5 per cent interest rate when capital was being borrowed at under 3 per cent, and it seems to me that this will balance off so that the government will not lose much in this operation.

The Veterans Land Act has been operated very successfully, both by the present director and the previous one who sincerely believe in the principle of self-help for the veterans. The whole program has been a great success. It seems to me a great shame that we have not been able to maintain over a period of 30 years the same type of legislation for one veteran as against another. The cost of loans under part II and part III will probably run to 7¾ per cent.

Very recently we increased the interest rate on national housing loans which we now find are running as high as 9.58 per cent. It seems to me quite possible that before long loans under the Veterans Land Act, the Farm Credit Corporation, and our other fixed, long term, assured loans, will carry interest rates of 8 or 9 per cent as well.

The hon. member who just spoke suggested we should not discuss this bill at length on second reading but refer it to the committee. I am of the same opinion because it presents us with a fait accompli and there is absolutely nothing we can do about it. The government will need $500 million to meet its commitments and it will have to borrow. It will lend at an interest rate 1 per cent above its borrowing rate, which will mean a rate of 7½ to 8 per cent. We will have to borrow this money if we are going to make loans to the veterans and meet our commitments.

In my opinion there is nothing the committee can do about it; the committee can only muck around long enough to weaken the position of the minister in retaining the rate of 3½ per cent on the first $6,000. It seems to me there is nothing to be gained by sending this legislation to the committee or, indeed, by sending any legislation involving higher interest rates to committees. I think the country has been hoodwinked into believing we have really done something in the seven or eight bills we have recently dealt with, but we really have no influence whatever on their content in relation to interest rates. The rate is actually being set by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) who determines the government's over-all policy, which is to produce a balanced budget regardless of where the revenue comes from.

As it happens, the funds necessary for these loans are not available from any other source. Take veterans established under the Veterans Land Act, for example. For many reasons, the only borrowing sources open to them are these government institutions. Parliament, in my view, has no say in regard to the changes which are taking place and there is nothing in this bill which warrants sending it to the committee. I would be prepared, and I think members of my party would be prepared, to waive consideration by the committee. The interest rate is a fait accompli and there is nothing else to be discussed. We took part in a discussion concerning the Veterans Land Act a year ago when we were told there was a cut-off of applications for benefit under the Veterans Charter. We know how many applications there are, we know the need which exists, at least approximately, and there does not seem to be much that we can change in this connection.

I think we should let the country know that the government is failing to honour its commitments. Some of those commitments were made, it is true, by people who have gone from this chamber. But the commitments with respect to the Veterans Charter were entered upon not by one party alone but by every political party in a non-partisan manner. The commitment was by the House of Commons, by the government as a continuing entity, and it should remain in effect as long as there is a need for the benefits of the charter.

It is a breach of faith, in my opinion, when the interest rate is changed—a rate which was obviously subsidized as a result of decisions by people who knew what they were doing and wanted to give some return to the veterans of Canada for the services they had rendered. We have reached a sad pass when we have to ask veterans to pick up part of the tab because we in Canada have not been able to keep our financial institutions in line with the needs of our people.

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, to speak briefly this afternoon on Bill C-152, may I begin by drawing attention to the fact that when ministers speak in closing debates on bills with a similar provision they invariably suggest that the funds required by the people who need to borrow cannot be made available as formerly because the terms are no longer acceptable to the major financial institutions. This bill is another indication that the money people are telling the government of the day exactly what to do and where to get off. I agree that the minister is to be congratulated on retaining a rate of 3½ per cent on that portion of each loan up to $6,000. I feel that in the other bills which have come before us consideration should have been given to a provision of the same kind, but there is nothing we can do about that now. Only time and elections will provide the answer.

There is just one point I should like to dwell on. How have we allowed ourselves to become so deeply involved with the banks and the finance companies? Every time we turn around we find the banks and finance companies telling us what to do. And up to now there has not been a government big enough to put these institutions in their place. In my opinion this country is run entirely by these financial institutions and it is high time we in parliament had a say, through the government, in setting interest rates.

How is it that these finance companies, and the banks especially, always show such huge profits? We have read the latest financial statements of some of the banks and we have seen that while interest rates are rising their profits are constantly increasing. No one argues that individuals who invest their money are not entitled to a fair return, but I submit that a fair return on investment means a rate of interest which the people of Canada can at least afford to pay. It is time the government did something about this and used a stick on these institutions.

Another question bothers me when I consider Bill C-152 and similar measures in which interest rates play such an important part. What are the financial institutions really contributing to the welfare of our society in general? Somehow they get money out of the people, lend it back to them at high interest rates, and up go their profits. It seems to me these institutions provide nothing tangible for the benefit of the society in which we live. We know that the farmers, the fishermen, the labourers of this country, produce food and contribute to the general well-being. I suggest that until real thought is given to our monetary system the people of Canada will have nothing to be proud of as far as our financial institutions are concerned. I have never seen anything produced in a bank or a finance company apart from reams of promissory notes, and the paper upon which these are written has been produced by a pulp mill which employs workmen to manufacture the finished product. There is no reasoning behind the system under which we are living.

Having looked at the bill before us and similar bills having to do with interest rates I can only conclude that our economic and monotary system is back in the stone age and that there is no hope of ever getting out of the hands of the money-lenders. This legislation is an example of what will no doubt become the order of the day under the present government. The provision allowing the Governor in Council to set interest rates means that the money interests will control everyone, including the cabinet.

I say that the money institutions are using the big stick on all those who stand in their way and that today there is no one in government big enough to stand against those who are hoodwinking the people into paying high interest rates. It is time the people realized what is happening to them. The people know there is something wrong. No one is representing the people of Canada in regard to legislation of this kind, and this is nothing to be proud of.

I suggest that any government that permits the destiny of this country to be cannibalized by the banks and other financial institutions is highly suspect. Ministers have to present bills to the house in a very embarrassing situation. If only they realized the facts they would not be so ready to stand up and tell us that nothing can be done about the situation, that rates have to be set by the Governor in Council because lending institutions are not prepared to lend money to those requiring assistance under present circumstances.

To add insult to injury, most of these acts provide for a one per cent surcharge for the cost of handling loans. Once again I suggest that this is regarded as another source of income with which to try to balance the budget, a budget that cannot be balanced under the system prevailing today.

I have already said that the minister has done well to keep the interest rate at 3½ per cent up to $6,000, but I would seriously urge him when he is alone—I realize he cannot do this when in cabinet—to consider the consequences of the legislation before us. The minister said that the interest is calculated on the cost of money to the government, plus one per cent. The minister is aware of the fact that there is no limit to N.H.A. rates and other rates subject to control by the Governor in Council. The minister suggested that they might come down to 5 per cent but I believe this is nothing more than a myth.

The only thing this government has accomplished since it came to office is the raising of interest rates on every type of assistance to the people of Canada to improve social development. The implementation of the so-called 2 per cent social development tax was just adding insult to injury.

I should like to make my opinion on this matter very clear. It is high time that the cabinet took upon itself the right to determine the destiny of this country and removed itself from the hands of the moneyed interests.

Mr. Ross Whicher (Bruce): Mr. Speaker, we have just listened to a lecture on Canadian banking affairs. We have been told that the banks are really monsters. I do not have to stand up and protect the banks; they are quite capable of defending themselves. It just so happens that I had lunch today with the manager of one of the Royal Bank branches in Ottawa, and if my hon. friend cares to invest some money in any of these banking institutions they will pay him 6¾ per cent for his money tomorrow morning. I would simply ask the hon. member how he expects banks to lend him money at 5 per cent when at the present time they are paying interest of 6¾ per cent and as high as 7 per cent on their trust certificates.

My hon. friend suggested that the banks have not given anything to the economy of Canada, that they have not done a good job or produced any benefit. One thing they have produced for Canada is a whole lot of taxes: 52 cents on every $1 earned by every major lending institution of Canada either goes to Ottawa or to the provincial capital, whichever it may be. So I think they have given quite a lot. As a matter of fact, we should be proud of our banking system in Canada. None of them has gone broke, as happened in the United States not so many years ago. I suggest our banking system has led Canada forward a long way and that we should be proud of it.

To get back to the bill now before the house, I and I am sure many other government backbenchers are sick and tired of the sermons that are periodically delivered to us by members of the opposition in connection with the high cost of money. They blame the government for this. The present bank rate is 7 per cent. I should like to tell hon. members why it is 7 per cent. It is because the rate in the United States is 7 per cent.

As members of the House of Commons we might as well realize that so far as the financial world is concerned Canada is a mighty small pea in a great big pod. We have very little say in financial affairs. If my hon. friends, along with the rest of the world would get down on their knees and pray for an end to the Viet Nam War and if the war did end they would soon find the cost of money coming down not only in Canada but all over the world. Our United States friends are spending $30 billion a year on that particular mess in which they are involved. Money has to come from somewhere, and this is why the cost of money in Canada is so high.

My hon. friend also suggested that our veterans had been let down by this bill. Other hon. members have said the same thing. As a veteran of considerable experience who spent a long time overseas I am proud of what the government of Canada has done for veterans. No other country in the world has done more for its veterans.

Although it is unfortunate that the cost of money is increasing in Canada, I nevertheless agree with the bill presented to the house by the minister today. The plain fact is that the current rate is a reflection of what money costs and the government cannot do anything about it. The only alternative is subsidization. I should like to ask my hon. friends whether they are suggesting that all citizens of Canada should subsidize the interest rates charged our farmers, people who want to buy houses under the National Housing Act, or our fishermen under the bill we have just been discussing?

Mr. Peters: That is exactly what we are saying.

Mr. Whicher: My hon. friend has answered the question; he says that they should be subsidized. What he is saying in effect is that widows on the back streets of Canada who are living on fixed incomes should subsidize our farmers, fishermen and veterans. I say that should not be so. I say that the cost of financing should be borne by those who receive the benefit of such financing, and this is what is being provided by the bill the minister has put before the house today. My only criticism is that I had hoped the bill could have been presented earlier so that our veterans could have received sooner the benefits of this legislation which is so urgently needed.

Another point that my hon. friend raised in his sermon was that the banks and finance companies should be taken over by the government. What he is really saying is that we should confiscate the banks. I suggest that he is living in the wrong country, that he should be living in Russia. Although they may do such things there, we do not want that here.

Mr. Skoberg: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Moose Jaw is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Skoberg: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Whicher: If it is an intelligent one.

Mr. Skoberg: That will be determined by the outcome of the next election.

Mr. Whicher: What about the last election?

Mr. Skoberg: May I ask the hon. member whether he believes that banks and other lending institutions should be controlled by government regulation in order to limit the maximum amount of profit to which they would be entitled?

Mr. Whicher: The answer to that question is very simple. In his speech my hon. friend suggested that there was a huge area of profit here. I challenge him right now to turn to the financial page of any paper, the Toronto Globe and Mail or any of the Montreal papers, and look at the price today of Royal Bank stock. If he does so he will find that he will make less than 3 per cent on his money. Is that too much? I do not think it is.

Mr. Peters: That is certainly not the record for last year.

Mr. Whicher: Not for last year; that is the record as of yesterday. I do not have to go back a year or two because I am quite familiar with the profits made by banks.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Bruce has the floor.

Mr. Bell: Hurrah for the banks!

• (4:50 p.m.)

Mr. Whicher: Hurrah for the people investing in them. I believe there is no better way of investing one's money.

I congratulate the minister for bringing this bill forward. In common with all members of the house I am sorry to see interest rates going up. When I came back from overseas I was one of the first to take advantage of the Veterans Land Act, obtaining money at 3½ per cent. I wish all veterans could obtain money at 3½ per cent. Unfortunately, the only way governments can control the terrible plague of inflation is by having interest rates as they are. It is terrible to have to say that interest rates should be so disastrously high. No one could be more sincere than I am in hoping that they will come down in the near future. Inflation must be controlled, and our central bank can control inflation only by imposing high interest rates on the country.

Once again I congratulate the minister. Certainly I think all commitments to veterans have been met in Canada. The present bill offers our veterans an additional advantage which will enable them to obtain adequate housing.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION, REGULATIONS, ETC.

Hon. James Richardson (for the Minister of Transport) moved second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of Bill S-14, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You had better be good.

Mr. Richardson: —I wish to present to the house for consideration Bill S-14, which deals with amendments to the Aeronautics Act. As hon. members know, this act regulates and controls civil aviation in Canada. Part I of the act is administered by the Minister of Transport and deals generally with the licensing and operation of air crews, aircraft and airports. Part II comes under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Transport Commission and deals with the licensing and operation of commercial air services. Part III applies generally to employees who are charged with the administration of the act and also deals with prosecutions for violations of the act and regulations.

I should like to describe briefly the main amendments which are proposed under this bill. Clause 2 of the bill would enable the Governor in Council to authorize the Minister of Transport, subject to conditions and in lieu of the Governor in Council, to prescribe changes for the use of facilities and services which are provided by the Department of Transport in respect of aircraft or departmental airports. For example, automobile parking fees at airports must now be established by an order in council. The amendment, however, would enable the Governor in Council to authorize the Minister of Transport to prescribe such fees.

Clause 3 of the bill would authorize the Minister of Transport to delegate to the Deputy Minister of Transport the former's authority to make orders prohibiting or restricting the navigation of aircraft over specified areas during certain periods of time. This is to accommodate military air exercises. To expedite the obtaining of the necessary prohibition orders the Minister of Transport would authorize his deputy minister to make these orders.

Clause 4(1) and clause 9 amend the definition of aircraft in order to exclude hovercraft from the Aeronautics Act, as hovercraft are being brought under the Canada Shipping Act by an amendment to that act which is now before parliament. Because of the manner in which hovercraft operate they cannot be controlled and administered efficiently under the Aeronautics Act. Although hovercraft employ a form of flight one can hardly describe a vehicle that hovers between 6 and 18 inches from the ground as flying. Hovercraft as well as air-cushioned vehicles constitute a special method of transportation and are dissimilar to aeroplanes in almost every respect. They operate in an environment that conventional aircraft do not operate in.

Clause 4(2) of the bill amends section 6 of the act in order to authorize the Canadian Transport Commission to issue temporary licences for commercial air services, an example being seasonal licences or emergency licences.

Clauses 5 and 6 of the bill amend certain sections of the act in order to make it clear that the powers of the commission are confined to part II of the act only. Clause 7 amends section 13, to clarify the power of the Canadian Transport Commission to make regulations of general application with respect to commercial air services. Prior approval of such regulations would not be required by the Governor in Council. However, it should be pointed out that subsection 2 of section 13 would give to the Governor in Council the power contained in section 53 of the Railway Act to vary and rescind such regulations.

Clause 8 of the bill includes provisions respecting proof of documents in order to provide that copies of documents purporting to be certified by the secretary of the Department of Transport shall be true copies of the original documents on record or issued by the Department of Transport and also that such documents shall be prima facie evidence in prosecutions under part I. This clause further provides that a certificate from the secretary of the Department of Transport stating that no licence or certificate has been issued by the department will also be prima facie evidence in such prosecutions.

Although the proposed amendments to the Aeronautics Act I have just outlined are necessary and desirable improvements to the act, none of the amendments alters the underlying basis of the act. I therefore recommend Bill S-14, to amend the Aeronautics Act, for the consideration of the house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I am afraid I arrived in the house too late to hear the minister's introductory remarks. It seems to me that in this bill the government is endeavouring to cure an omission in legislation which recently was the subject matter of litigation before the Supreme Court. I take it that is why clause 7 of the bill has been included. It seeks to cure that deficiency. I do not know whether the minister dealt with that deficiency in his introductory remarks. If he did not I hope he will do so in his remarks closing the debate.

I believe the bill in itself is indicative of a very unfortunate trend to enlarge the areas of rule by regulation. It provides almost unlimited powers, in this case not for the Governor in Council but for an administrative tribunal, to make regulations which are not even required to be submitted for approval to the cabinet. This is a very undesirable trend. I am speaking now of clause 2 of the bill, but more particularly I am speaking of the power which the bill, if adopted, will provide to the Air Transport Commission to make regulations without any requirement to submit them to the minister or to the cabinet for approval. It is an extremely undesirable state of affairs.

Here we have an industry, general aviation—I am not now speaking of the huge international and national carriers such as Air Canada, and Canadian Pacific Airlines but of the industry in terms of the charter operators, both regional and smaller—which is going to be required to submit to regulations which may be made at the whim of the A.T.C. or a member thereof from time to time. It seems to me that this is a pretty untenable business proposition, quite apart from the suffocating atmosphere it imposes on the industry generally. It is completely wrong for a charter operator to be granted a licence under certain conditions which are imposed upon the licence at the time of its issue and then three or four months or perhaps a year or two later have the Air Transport Commission decide in its own wisdom that the conditions imposed upon the licence at the time of its issue are to be further limited. In this position a charter operator simply does not know where he stands from time to time.

One could go into specifics with respect to different classifications of licences that are granted but I do not think it would be helpful in a forum such as this. Suffice it to pick one example. Let us assume that a charter operator is given a Class A licence out of one of the major cities to operate a non-scheduled charter operation from that city. The restriction imposed upon the licence at the time of its issue might be that the operator will be restricted to the operation of one particular category of aircraft. Let us assume that at a later stage, a year hence, technological improvements result in equipment being available that is faster, safer and more comfortable than the type of equipment covered in the issuance of the licence in the first instance. If it wished the commission could turn a blind eye to such technological improvement and say to the operator: The existing limitation stands and this is all you are going to be permitted to operate. If the equipment happens to be a DC-3 at the time of issuance of the licence and jet improvements come along, so be it, because they may interfere with some other charter operator who may be in more favour with the commission.

I do not suggest for a moment that the commission has favourites, but nevertheless that kind of attitude could be adopted. What happens here is that the Air Transport Commission imposes its judgment on the operations of the carrier in place of what the carrier deems in its best judgment to be best for its business.

I know the reason for the legislation and that the desire of the Air Transport Commission is to see that the public interest is served at all times, but I suggest it is not going to be served by the commission having the power, as proposed in clause 7 of the bill, to change, bend and warp regulations as it pleases. It is an unlimited and most undesirable administrative power placed in the hands of well-meaning servants of the government on the Air Transport Commission, but nonetheless in the hands of people who in effect are making decisions for business that may not be in the best interests of business itself, decisions that may run entirely contrary to those which are taken by business. If the public interest is being served by an operator in terms of safety, comfort, speed and technological advancement, the decisions of those who made the investment which is providing that service should be the government criteria and not those of some administrative tribunal.

I believe the other amendments proposed in the bill are inconsequential, apart from their undesirability in terms of extending the regulatory powers of government and government boards. But the central and important part of this bill is the amendment about which I have spoken and which would cure a deficiency that became the subject of litigation before the Supreme Court. I believe that in attempting the cure the government may well find itself in a very difficult position in trying to control a creature which it has set up. I do not want to exaggerate because I know that the members of the Air Transport Commission at all times devote themselves to attempting to make their decisions in the public interest, but what is even more fearful about this amendment is the all-embracing, encompassing powers that are given to the commission with respect to the control and day-to-day operation and administration of the general aviation industry.

I hope the minister will deal with that aspect of the matter, and I hope that on second thought he will propose an amendment to clause 7 to pare down these rather extensive and, I submit, undesirable powers which the government proposes to give to the A.T.C.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I realize that we are on second reading of this bill, which does not allow for questions and answers, but the minister who is piloting the bill will have the right to speak in closing the debate, so perhaps I might use my right to speak for a minute or two to put a couple of questions to him in the hope that he will speak at the conclusion of the debate and answer them if he can.

First, may I ask the minister whether it is under the provisions of this act that the government is able to exercise any control over the hours of pilots on duty? As the minister knows, certain questions have been asked about this matter in the house in recent days. I recognize that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) said he wanted to get all the facts about the case in question before he made a reply to the house, but I put the question to the minister in these more general terms. Is this the act under which there is supervision over this matter and is the appropriate authority studying this matter in the light of modern conditions and in the light of the strains under which pilots work in modern aircraft?

I recall an incident some years ago in respect of which some of us felt that the crash, even though in that particular instance there was no loss of life, was due to the fatigue of a pilot who had been on duty for an excessive period of time. It is on the basis of that incident that I put this question to the minister and I hope he will answer it if he can.

The other question I should like to put to him would seem to be related to clause 3 of the bill. I suspect this is the type of clause about which the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has been complaining in that it seems to put authority in the hands of a deputy minister rather than in the hands of a minister, board or commission. Nevertheless, it is being done. I note that it relates to the issuing of orders or directions prohibiting or restricting navigation of aircraft over specified areas. I would like to raise a general question, but I think the easiest way for me to do it, since in this instance one Winnipeg member is talking to another, is to say to the minister there are times when I have had complaints of more noise than seems reasonable from aircraft flying over Winnipeg.

It so happens, since the member for Winnipeg North Centre is speaking to the member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) about this the situation, that it is our two areas from which these complaints seem to come. It seems that the flight paths from the international airport at Winnipeg which go north and west do not bother very many people, but when an aircraft takes off from the airport and goes east right over Weston and the heart of Winnipeg North Centre the noise is a little hard to take. Also, when an aircraft takes off in a southerly direction over River Heights the people of Winnipeg South complain.

I should like to ask whether under these provisions an effort will be made to cope more effectively with this problem. I do not intend to stand here opposing progress and saying that we should not have modern aircraft because they are noisy, but things do have to be balanced and we must be concerned not only about the right of people to have transportation by air but also about the right of people on the ground not to be unduly disturbed. The question is general but this is what I have in mind.

If we were going into the committee of the whole stage I would have waited to put this question to the minister, but perhaps I can do it in this way. When he replies I hope the minister will answer my two questions.

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. S-14 entitled an act to amend the Aeronautics Act is designed to normalize certain administrative procedures since the Air Transport Board has been replaced by the Canadian Transport Commission.

The act now stipulates that the charges for the use of any facility or service are set by order in council. To my mind, that procedure is slow and the new bill grants the minister the authority to propose indicated changes according to the circumstances.

One of the clauses which, in my opinion, concerns a large part of our population, is clause 3 which authorizes the minister to delegate his powers, under certain circumstances, and to prohibit or limit air navigation over certain specific areas.

Should an area be threatened, and should it become necessary to suddenly prohibit civil air traffic in that area, the minister should, of necessity, have the authority to do so.

I also feel that the additional powers granted the minister, under such circumstances, would be absolutely normal, because the minister represents the government and, due to that, has absolute authority in a matter as important as aeronautics.

In an era when the number of air passengers increases very rapidly, it is imperative that our laws be revised regularly with a view to facilitating their application, and to ensuring maximum security to the users of air services as well as to the crew of the aircraft.

Canadian laws concerning air transport are explicit, very strict, and a matter of special concern to the Canadian government. In spite of that, we have to deplore, from time to time, air crashes like the one which happened on February 7, 1968, at Vancouver.

The inquiry conducted by the Department of Transport at that time clearly showed that all the information requested before landing had been given to the crew. In this particular case, there seems to be evidence of some disagreement between the captain and the first lieutenant and of a conflict about the management of the craft.

The present bill is even more specific about a number of aspects of the Aeronautics Act. These changes have become necessary, because of the fast growth in recent years, of the air transport industry.

Other aspects will have to be reviewed in the future. There should be more concern about the number of hours the air crew have to work at a stretch and this should be subject to an inquiry by the Transport Commission. There is no blame involved here against the personnel or the Commission, but we should not underestimate the importance of ensuring the safety of both the crew and the passengers.

I am a layman in aeronautics, and so are other hon. members, and we should take the advice of experts on the question.

However, I think that the proposed amendments designed to provide the Minister of Transport with increased powers, can be accepted.

The legislation on aeronautics is not meant to inconvenience air carriers and their staff. On the contrary, it is meant to ensure the absolute comfort of passengers and crews.

The government has clearly shown its interest in the future of air transport each year by earmarking important amounts to improve or supplement present air transport facilities.

On the other hand, I am of the opinion that it is imperative for air carriers to provide the Transport Commission and the minister with all the co-operation that is expected from them so as to give the travelling public perfect service and the security they are entitled to demand.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, UNAUTHORIZED WORKS, ETC.

On the order:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of Bill S-19, an Act to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Mr. Richardson, for Mr. Hellyer, seconded by—

Mr. Baldwin: Bring in another minister. You need two.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Six o'clock.

Mr. Nielsen: Where is your attendance register now?

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, in the interim I wonder whether I could refer to the comments which were made on the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act.

• (5:20 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The house adopted the motion so we have to wait—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister did have the right on the previous motion to speak in closing the debate. I happened to be called out to the phone when the debate ended and he did not reply, so I should now like to ask the house to permit the minister to speak and answer the questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

AERONAUTICS ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITION, REGULATIONS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of Bill S-14, to amend the Aeronautics Act.

Hon. James Richardson (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate this opportunity to thank the hon. members who took part in this debate and to answer some of the questions which were raised. I know that in respect of others we will have an opportunity to consider them in greater detail when the bill is before the committee.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was primarily concerned with clause 7. I should simply like to point out that this is not an unlimited administrative power as it was described by him. As I pointed out in my introductory remarks, although prior approval of these regulations by the Governor in Council is not required, the emphasis in new section 13(2) is on the power given to the Governor in Council under section 53 of the Railway Act to vary and rescind regulations. This is not unlimited administrative power.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) spoke about the hours of duty of pilots, and of noise. These are matters of concern to us all. The first of these two subjects does come under this measure but the second, noise, does not. I do not think I should say more about them because actually we are not talking here about the whole act and neither of these subjects is a matter of amendment in the bill I have presented.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question at this point? What about the reference in the explanatory notes to clause 3 in respect of the powers provided for directions prohibiting or restricting navigation of aircraft over specified areas? Does that have anything to do with this problem?

Mr. Richardson: No, Mr. Speaker, that relates primarily, in fact entirely, to military areas and does not relate to the noise problems we have around big cities.

I should also like to thank the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Rodrigue) for his thoughtful observations. Finally, I should like to conclude this debate, although I think we have given second reading to the bill—

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In view of the precedent which has been established here I think we should give second reading to this bill once again.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

NAVIGABLE WATERS PROTECTION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEFINITIONS, UNAUTHORIZED WORKS, ETC.

Hon. James Richardson (for the Minister of Transport) moved the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of Bill S-19, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill S-19 which I should now like to present to the house for consideration has relation to amendments to the Navigable Waters Protection Act. I am certain that all hon. members recognize the importance of navigation and shipping as one aspect of our over-all transportation system. As its name implies, the Navigable Waters Protection Act was originally passed to protect Canada's navigable waters from man-made obstructions.

This act was first passed in 1882. Since that time it has been amended on a number of occasions, most recently in 1956. Changing circumstances and particularly the increase in the size of ships require that a number of improvements be made to the act. While I am speaking about the act as a whole in a general way, it might be worth while to point out that the largest number of applications for approval under the act relates to new bridges and repairs to old bridges, as well as to natural gas and fuel pipe lines, transmission lines and telephone lines. Usually these pipe lines or transmission lines are below the surface of navigable waters, but this act also relates to overhead lines which might block navigation. The other man-made works which are of concern are large dams, causeways, log booms and, of course, wharf and docking facilities of all kinds. In fact, anything that is built in the water that could interfere with navigation requires approval under this act.

The act when amended will be in three parts. Part one is concerned primarily with structures that have been designed for specific purposes. Part two is primairly concerned with obstruction to navigation which results accidentally or inadvertently as a consequence, for instance, of the discharge of solid materials by commercial concerns, which could sink in time to the bottom and become obstructions to navigation. This part of the act is also concerned with abandoned or derelict ships or barges which could become obstructions to navigation.

Part three is concerned primarily with ferry cables and swinging bridges. The amendments to the Navigable Waters Protection Act proposed in Bill S-19 are designed to bring the act up to date and make it easier to administer, and particularly to ensure that navigable waters remain navigable for the larger ships which are being constructed today as well as ships of shallower draft than those which were in existence at the time the legislation was first enacted.

Perhaps I should emphasize that this is really one of the most important points of these amendments. Ships today are larger; therefore they take more water. They also move faster and therefore sometimes need a wider channel in which to travel. The regulations that were made for smaller ships do not apply or are not satisfactory for today's larger ships.

Some of the amendments which we will discuss are of a technical nature and we will have the opportunity to examine them in detail when the bill is considered by the standing committee. In presenting this legislation I should like to outline the highlights of the bill by referring to the more important amendments which I propose.

Clause 2 includes in the definition of a "work" the dumping of fill and any excavation of materials from the bed of a navigable water. In various areas of the country fill has been dumped into navigable waters without approval first having been obtained under the Navigable Waters Protection Act. The act as presently worded did not cover activities of this kind. Clause 3 establishes the time limit following ministerial approval for construction of any work. This will prevent any unnecessary delay in the construction of a work for which approval has been given. Section 4 of the present act makes reference to the over-all work not exceeding $5,000. The amendment which is proposed eliminates any reference to the dollar value of a work.

The reason is that since the act is concerned with the protection of navigable waters, interference with navigation should be the only test applied to the construction of any work and its monetary value should have no bearing on the matter. The amendment proposed will require that all works being built in navigable waters, regardless of their cost, will require approval or exemption. I might elaborate briefly and say that I understand one of the problems with the $5,000 figure was that there was often as much argument about whether the work was worth $4,000 or $6,000 as there was about whether it was an obstruction to navigation. Really, therefore the amendment is going to get at the main purpose of the act.

Section 5 of the act deals with the removal of unauthorized works and with approval of works already constructed. At the present time, if any work is built contrary to the provisions of the act the minister's alternatives are these: (1) to remove the work at the expense of the owner; (2) to give approval to it after a period of five years; (3) to allow it to continue to exist without approval. The proposed amendments to the act, in addition to the power of removal now contained in the act, would give the minister authority to order the owner to alter a work. That is the key change; the work now can be altered and does not have to be removed in total. If the owner fails to remove or alter the work, the minister would have authority to remove or alter it at the cost of the owner and to render the owner liable to a penalty recoverable upon summary conviction.

Clause 7 of the bill extends the authority of the Governor in Council to make regulations under section 10 of the act and provides for a scale of fees for temporary approval whenever immediate inspection trips are required. Provision is made also for a scale of fees for late application for approval; that is, of course, applications which have been made after construction has commenced or has been completed.

I would particularly like to point out that clause 10 of the bill amends sections 18 and 19 of the act. The purpose of the amendment to section 18 is to extend the application of the section to all persons. At the present time it applies primarily to saw mills. The purpose of the amendment to section 19 is to ensure that this section applies to tidal as well as non-tidal navigable waters, and to increase to 20 fathoms the depth of water in which no substance liable to sink may be thrown. The limit of the depth has been increased from 12 to 20 fathoms in order to protect the new, deep draught, bulk carriers now coming into use.

In clause 14 of the bill the penalties under sections 26, 27 and 28 of the act are being revised upward to provide a more realistic figure and to provide the act with more force.

As hon. members know, this bill has been considered and passed in the other place. I should point out also that it was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications of the other place.

I would like to conclude the introduction of this legislation by emphasizing that Bill S-19, to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act, is primarily a bill to tidy up the existing legislation in this field. It does not include major proposals for change of either policy or principle, but it is useful and progressive legislation and I recommend the bill for the consideration of the house.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, before I deal briefly with some of the proposals contained in this bill I should like to bring to the attention of the house a suggestion just made to me by my friend the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). He suggested that when the government is considering future proposals or changes to acts and regulations of this type, it might well pay heed to the fact that today rivers and lakes are used by aircraft. I know this question is dealt with in other legislative proposals and regulations but it is one that might well be considered further. I mention it because we have just finished dealing with a bill amending the Aeronautics Act. My experience in flying in the north over the last 35 years or so leads me to believe there are circumstances and places with regard to which navigation was thought of strictly in terms of vessels rather than aircraft when this act was passed.

There are two aspects of this bill that I want to very briefly bring to the attention of the house. The first is that the bill is carrying a step further the practice of this government of putting into statutes and bills more and more often the right of the government to act by order in council, to act by ministerial decree. This matter was referred to in the discussion on the bill with which we just dealt and it has been mentioned in connection with other bills. If one wanted to compile a litany of the proposals in which this very iniquitous principle can be observed, he would have only to examine the list of legislative proposals which have been presented to this house over the few months since the 28th parliament met in September.

I shall not detail the bills now because there will be another opportunity, perhaps more suitable and one when I shall be more in order to deal with the question. If one looks at the list of bills we have passed he finds that slowly, insidiously and with great care and planning there has been taking place the pleasant seduction of the twenty eighth parliament by the government seeking and being given rights which in many instances should belong to parliament. To some extent this is observed in the bill we are now considering. It may be nice to have a situation wherein the head of the government is showing to our fascinated eyes spectacular conduct, but while this is taking place and we are looking at what is happening there, parliament is being filched of its rights.

It will be my purpose before this parliament is over to detail in very considerable measure all the proposals in question from the beginning of the parliament to the end and the rights which have been taken away from us. I shall indicate where this parliament has given to the government, without any recourse, discretionary control over so many aspects of our life and society, but that must wait.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with this bill in the light of a particular problem that has presented itself in my area and indeed in the whole of northwestern Canada. I wonder just how effective the Navigable Waters Protection Act is, or can be, under certain conditions which prevail. Some years ago the government of British Columbia, the government of Canada and that of the United States were negotiating with regard to the use of rivers for the production and generation of power in British Columbia. They included the Peace River and the Columbia River. Proceedings had come to a standstill and the governments changed. At that time, the then secretary of state for external affairs, now the leader of the government in the Senate, in his desperate anxiety to see that this project went forward entered into what I believe to be a very reprehensible arrangement with the government of the province of British Columbia to permit an obstruction to be placed across the Peace River in breach of this act.

This has been a navigable river, to my knowledge and from reading history, since Alexander Mackenzie, the first white man to come down the Peace River, cross the Rocky Mountains and go overland to the Pacific. He came down the Peace River in 1791. An arrangement was made under which the province of British Columbia was allowed to place a dam across the Peace River in the vicinity of Hudson Hope. At that time I asked the minister of justice and the minister of public works, who then had responsibility for the administration of this act, whether or not what was being planned by the province of B.C. did in fact constitute the sort of work at which the provisions of the Navigable Waters Protection Act was directed. The answer was yes, it did. On a number of occasions I asked the then minister of public works, the hon. Mr. Deschatelets, now a very distinguished member of the other place and who approached this in a very sincere way, whether any attempt was to be made to compel the province of B.C. to secure the consent which was required under this act.

I will relate this situation to the amendments which are now proposed as I develop my case. Despite the fact that the answers were always in the affirmative and that there was never at any time any suggestion that the damming of the Peace River and the related works for the purpose of generating power were not works to which this act applied, it was always admitted that no application was made and none was ever requested. I think this is a fantastic thing. I talk about this because I can recall the very last case which I had to deal with as a member of the bar. I was to appear for a farmer who had a small cattle ranch in the vicinity of Lesser Slave Lake. A very tiny creek passed through his pasture, so he fenced it in order to keep in his cattle. He got into an argument with the local federal department of public works officials who told him that while this was a small stream it was a navigable stream in the sense that there was a fisherman's boat a few hundred yards up stream. Three or four times a year this fisherman brought his boat downstream into Lesser Slave Lake. This farmer was a man of some principle, and he believed in fighting for what he thought was right. He opposed the position taken by the federal people. The matter went to the Exchequer Court of Canada and it was held, as of course it must be held under the act, that this was a navigable water. So, the farmer was compelled to take down his fence and pay the cost.

Three or four years later the province of British Columbia, because of the fact the then Secretary of State for External Affairs was ambitious to bring to what he hoped would be a successful conclusion these negotiations dealing with the erection of a power dam at Peace River, was allowed to completely disregard the provisions of this act. It was a flagrant violation.

I find that the new bill provides in one of its clauses that where a work has been placed without authority, the federal government may seek to have it destroyed or pulled down. I am not so bold as to suggest that this government would be able to do this, even if it wanted to tackle Mr. Bennet. There seems to be something about the provinces in either extremity of this country. Perhaps it is due to the fact that they sit on the beaches, look across the waves coming in and in this way acquire the characteristics of King Canute. They feel they can compel anything to happen, even the waves to go back. But for anyone to tackle either Mr. Smallwood or Mr. Bennet is quite an undertaking, and I do not think even a government dedicated to the just society would do this.

There is a change which is proposed here in clause 5 which reads:

> Where any work to which this Part applies is built or placed without having been approved by the Minister or is built or placed upon a site not approved by the Minister or is not built or placed in accordance with plans so approved, or having been so built or placed, is not maintained in accordance with such plans and the regulations, the Minister—

This means the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer). The Minister of Transport is of course also a very determined man and I do not know what happens when an irresistible force tries to move an immovable body. If this clause means anything, then it means the Minister of Transport would be within his legal rights in making this request of the B.C. government. But we all know this is not going to take place.

Since the dam was completed across this navigable river it has created one of the largest reservoirs in the country, and possibly in the north American continent, flowing back to the Rocky Mountain trench and up and down it for several miles. It will be a tremendously large body of water. In the last two or three years an attempt has been made to fill the reservoir. As a result, every summer the waters of the Peace River have been exceptionally low. It has been a ghastly sight, for anyone who has seen the beauty of these northern rivers, to drive along the course of the river and see what has happened. It is predicted the filling of this reservoir will have disastrous effects, not only on the hinterland between the Rocky Mountains but where the Peace River enters into the Slave River. It will have serious effects on the water level of Lake Athabasca and the whole Mackenzie River system. This has been confirmed by statements made by people living in the Yellowknife and Great Slave Lake area. It is obvious to anyone who travels along the river and has seen what has happened. It is all very well for the officials of the federal government or possibly of the B.C. government to say that once the reservoir has been filled this situation will not recur.

However, it is not possible to make that prediction with any accuracy because if, during the course of the calendar year there is not the rainfall and snowfall which is required to provide enough water in the dam, then the water which will be released will not be adequate to provide the navigable aspect of the river which is so essential.

I use the occasion of this amendment, as I think I am entitled to do to bring this very forcibly to the attention of the government because it does not simply affect one town and a few farmers; it affects thousands of people who use the river. We hear about the proposal to explore and establish potentially commercially feasible oil development fields in northern Canada and northern United States. It is very likely that the whole Mackenzie River system will be dedicated in part to both carrying traffic into that area and possibly taking commodities out. I think it is tremendously important for this reason.

So I hope that because of these amendments, combined with the original legislation, the government will look at this very carefully. I have been in correspondence with the government, but it is quite obvious that the government's view is that the province of B.C. occupies the area and so far it has shown no willingness to give effect to the great number of representations which have been made.

I now suggest to the government in the face of this amendment and of the existing legislation that if this bill and the original act are to be considered as being of any value, this is a grave situation which must be dealt with both by the federal government and by the Province of British Columbia.

Mr. Randolph Harding (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to what was said by the previous speaker in connection with the Peace River. I, too, wonder just how effective legislation under the Navigable Waters Protection Act has been in providing protection for the rivers and waterways which it is supposed to control.

Many of the amendments offered in this bill are good ones, but I certainly endorse the words of the previous speaker when he complained about the increasing use of orders in council by governments in both the federal and provincial fields. In this case, of course, we are referring to the federal field. I notice that in clause seven, of which we have been given a brief explanation, there is one sentence which appears to be of significance; I hope it means what it says. I reads:

> The governor in Council may make such orders and regulations as he deems expedient for navigation purposes respecting any work to which this part applies.

Recently I encountered a problem, as did the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), in connection with this aspect of the legislation. I placed a question on the order paper and it was finally answered by, of all people, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene). As far as I could make out it had nothing to do with his department; it had to do with navigation along the Columbia River. I should like to pose the following question to the minister because it relates very closely to this bill: just who establishes, for example, the schedule of times at which locks in the Arrow Dam may be used? This is a simple question which a number of organizations in my area have been asking over the last four months. We still have not received a satisfactory answer from the government. I am confident that responsibility lies within the Department of Transport under this legislation. We have been given the run-around from department to department and no one seems to know just who is making the regulations, how they were made, when they were made, and for what purpose they were made.

The other day, in connection with this set of regulations, I asked the following questions:

> 1. Was the Columbia River at the site of the Arrow Dam open to year-round river traffic prior to the dam construction?
> 2. Is the operation of the lock in the Arrow Dam on a year-round basis and, if not (a) what is the present schedule (b) when was it put into effect?

The answer given to each of these questions was, yes.

Mr. Speaker, this is not correct information. The answers given to this house and to the public of Canada are not correct. The locks on the Arrow Dam are not on a year round sechdule. The schedule is drawn up, apparently, by the British Columbia Hydro Authority, and these locks are open from 8 a.m. until 4 p.m. on days other than holidays and weekends.

Need I point out that it is precisely at weekends and on holidays that the public wishes to use these locks to take boats into the huge reservoir basin above the dam. Yet this is when access is being denied them. It is amazing to come here to Ottawa and find the department knows practically nothing about the setting up of this schedule, which, it appears, was drawn up by the Hydro crown corporation back in British Columbia. It makes one wonder what kind of hold the premier of British Columbia has on this government.

British Columbia Hydro pays the shot for the operation of the locks. I want to say here that the entire area below the Arrow Dam is concerned about the schedule and about the use of these locks. We shall not be satisfied with a four or five day week, and only limited opportunity to use these locks to reach the lake, some hundred miles in length, which lies above the dam. If the terms of the legislation before us will not permit anything effective to be done about this situation, I think the minister should take another close look as them.

I notice that a number of sections in the act have been changed. The Governor in Council is again given permission to exempt certain navigable waters from the terms of the legislation. It is in this connection, I presume, that the hon. member for Peace River is encountering trouble.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

Mr. Harding: I have other remarks to make on this subject. I see I have half a minute or so left. I notice the act is supposed to prevent debris getting into navigable waters and I presume this includes clearing. I do not know whether the house is aware that behind the Mica Creek Dam, in part of the huge lake formed there—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that it is six o'clock and according to the standing orders I must now leave the chair. The house will reconvene at eight o'clock for the purpose of considering a motion under Standing Order 26.

Does the minister wish to ask a question or make a point?

Mr. Richardson: I wonder whether the house would give unanimous consent to complete second reading? I believe the debate is close to completion and there is a meeting of the Transport Committee tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement?

[Translation]

Order, please. Does the hon. member for Champlain agree, as do the other members, that the discussion be continued until the house is ready to vote on the motion for second reading of this bill?

Mr. Matte: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

• (6:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Harding: Then if I may finish, Mr. Speaker, I was pointing out to the department that I presume the reservoir formed behind the dams constructed along the Columbia river system would come under the act.

I want to make it clear to the department that the lack of clearing, for example, behind the Duncan dam is a national scandal. Here is a reservoir basin almost 30 miles in length, and the only portion that has been cleared is a little chunk that is three or four miles from the top of the hydro dam. North of that the situation is a national disgrace and is unparalleled in Canada.

I should not like to see the department exempt basins such as these from the terms of the act. Here is a reservoir basin that covers a much larger area than the original lake. For mile after mile debris is floating in the water; snags are protruding and will do so for generations to come.

The same state of affairs will exist in the reservoir basin behind the Mica dam, where there will be a lake 125 miles long. The plan of the present administration of British Columbia is to flood the greater part of this basin without clearing the land. Millions of feet of trees will be under water and debris will be everywhere. The initial plan called for the cutting through of navigable channels and for eventual clearing, but this will never come in my lifetime or the lifetime of many of the other members of the house.

Again I want to make it clear to the department that I am under the impression that responsibility for this sort of debris does come within the jurisdiction of the department. I think the department has an obligation to insist that B.C. Hydro and the government of B.C. do a proper job of clearing in these areas so as not to litter and clutter navigable lakes and waterways. I have been fighting this sort of thing in the province of British Columbia for years. In this day and age when the preservation of our national resources is of such great importance it is a tragedy when a provincial government is allowed by the federal government to continue this state of affairs.

Although the opportunity will arise during committee stage to ask further questions, there is one other point I want to make before I sit down. The attention of the Department of Transport has already been drawn to the extremely high stumps just north of Nakusp, some ten feet tall, which will be flooded by the new lake. These will be very dangerous to small craft, particularly in stormy weather, when they may get holed when close inshore. This may result in some loss of life. Therefore I urge the department to check into this situation at an early date, because this coming spring we will see the flood waters of the Columbia river trapped in the Arrow reservoir. These high stumps will then be under water but will remain a potential hazard until the next low water, which will be almost a year later.

I believe that when legislation is passed it should be effective legislation. As the minister stated in his opening remarks, this act, which I believe he mentioned was put on the statute books in 1882, was designed to protect us from man made obstructions. I hope it does just that. Perhaps in his closing remarks the minister could tell the house why the new bill omits the provisions for the checks the Department of Fisheries used to make of navigable waters. For example, sawmills were not allowed to dump sawdust and other debris in the water.

The fisheries department made various checks to see that the intent of the legislation was being carried out, and as I say I understand that these provisions have now been eliminated. I should like to know whether some other check has been provided to take care of this sort of thing. Perhaps the need for this kind of check has disappeared, but I would certainly welcome an explanation in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): I have only a few remarks to make, Mr. Speaker, to stress a few points.

Of course, some constructions undertaken by some individual owners may affect navigation. However, it is rather the exception when such constructions are undertaken by individuals. In most cases, they are works carried out by provincial governments or by municipalities. At this level of government, it is generally possible to get along with the responsible authorities.

I should like to point out some natural causes that may also affect navigation, as is the case in the Champlain riding.

The Champlain river which flows into the St. Lawrence between Champlain and Batiscan carries some deposits which sink to the bottom of the river. Indeed, it is often necessary to dredge it at that location.

On the western side of that river have already been built—I do not know if it is through the good offices of friends or others—some wharves which have deflected the course of the river, so that property owners on the other shore—whose property is also adjoins the river—have seen their land so extensively eroded, that it is now in danger.

I have asked the department to look after that case. I have been told that the government responsibility is about 25 per 100 and that they would be prepared to assume 25 per 100 of the cost of the works which have become necessary due to natural causes or navigation.

Now, it will be understood that if it is necessary to undertake some works, let us say of some $100,000, $150,000 or $200,000, it is impossible for small wage-earners who make $5,000 to $6,000 to undertake those works. Consequently, the 25 per 100 contribution offered by the government would compel the property owners along the shore to pay $75,000 in the case of works amounting to $100,000.

I believe that, in such circumstances, the government should assume the entire responsibility. It is very well for the engineers to decide—and perhaps at times some pressure is exerted on them—that such effects are only partly due to navigation. When navigation or merely natural causes, such as the flow of a river, are eroding the land, it seems to me that we should be more reasonable and help those who suffer those losses.

It happens at many places along the St. Lawrence river, and particularly in my constituency. Therefore, I would like those considerations to be taken into account, and if, as shown in the bill, we do not want anything to obstruct navigation, navigation or navigable waters should never, in any way, cause damage to the waterfront owners.

The owners cannot interfere with navigation, but the reverse should not take place either.

Mr. Speaker: If he speaks now, the minister will close the debate.

[English]

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank you and all hon. members for going past six o'clock and allowing this debate to be completed today. Considering the hour, I will, simply sum up by saying that I have noted carefully all of the points raised by hon. members. We will have an opportunity to discuss them in detail when the bill is before the committee. I would like to reply briefly to one point raised by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin). May I point out that B.C. Hydro did not apply for approval of the Peace River dam and the act contains no provision under which a province may be compelled to seek approval.

With the thought that we shall be discussing this bill in committee may I ask the house to give this bill second reading.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read a second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications.

Mr. Speaker: The time being after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

[Translation]

It being past six o'clock, I now leave the chair.

The house will resume at 8 p.m. to consider an adjournment motion under the provisions of standing order 26.

At 6.14 p.m. the house took recess.

[English]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

GRAIN

ALLEGED PARALYSIS OF WHEAT MOVEMENT THROUGH VANCOUVER—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Speaker: Order. Pursuant to standing order No. 26 the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), seconded by the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) moves that this house do now adjourn.

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I don't mind telling you that I feel somewhat like the man who had been tarred, feathered and run out of town on a rail but who said, "If it were not for the honour I would not be here." It is indeed an honour at any time to speak in this house, Mr. Speaker, but it is disgusting that I have to resort to this technique that we have developed in the form of a new rule, disgusting that I have to rise in my place in order to focus attention on the lack of activity on the part of a government that apparently is willing to sit by and watch a situation develop without raising a finger. This government has allowed a serious decline in our wheat sales and the economy of the western farmer has been so eroded that there is very little hope for them. A situation has been created that effects the over-all economy of the country.

There are many who apparently express annoyance at having to return to sit in this house tonight during what would normally be a free Wednesday evening. To them I make no apology. I merely make use of a rule that apparently everyone wanted. But it was not the rule that caused the situation. It was the government's paralysis that demanded the action I have taken.

Today at Vancouver harbour there are 33 vessels either berthed, waiting for a berth or waiting to be passed for loading, emphasizing the emergency nature of the situation. Yesterday the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) said the situation resulted from weather conditions and the unexpected growth of exports. This indicates that the critical phase was reached suddenly, so far as the minister was concerned.

There is no doubt what happened. It was the complete bogging down of transportation facilities. This represents a genuine emergency and because the estimates have been passed there is no other opportunity to deal with it. It is not my intention, however, to debate the new rule, but I would bring to the attention of the house the government's total failure to realize and acknowledge the seriousness of the situation so far as the economy is concerned.

Failure to deliver on wheat contracts will drastically affect the economies of both eastern and western Canada. We are now in a position where our customers are wondering whether we can deliver. This is the latest in the sad story of mismanagement.

It was not very long ago when we read headlines such as, "Japan Gives Wheat From France Tryout." Earlier in the year, shortly after the strike of lakehead handlers, there was another headline, "Wheat Buyers Soon May Ask if We Can Deliver." That was in the Financial Post. Once a sale is lost it cannot be regained. One man's loss is another man's gain.

The James Richardson and Sons letter dated January 17 stated in part:

> The Japanese were also interested in 17,000 tons of Canadian wheat on their weekly tender but this was unavailable due to port congestion at Vancouver; they did take one cargo of Australian wheat.

That indicates that we have lost that sale. As I have said, one man's loss is another man's gain. Apparently the government is willing to go along with the present conditions. Apparently the government is not willing to accept its responsibility.

Let us review the situation. The Wheat Board sends out its salesmen and they make the sales. The Wheat Board is told when the customers would like the grain delivered. It knows the type of grain that is required. It receives notice several weeks in advance that certain ships have been nominated to deliver the cargo. It has ample time to check where the type of grain is that is required. After all, the Wheat Board invested in a computer. Then, the Board informs the railway companies that X number of cars are required to deliver certain types of grain at certain destinations. The railway companies then arrange and spot these cars, and deliver as requested.

But what has happened? As early as November 15 the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce announced in the house, with some satisfaction to all of us, that China was to take 58 million bushels of wheat between December and July, 1969. The Japanese market became available because the Japanese refused shipments of grain from the United States since that grain was tough and not suitable for milling. There was a ready market. We had the grain, if not from this year then from last year.

Southern Alberta, which is closest to the Vancouver harbour, has adequate supplies of No. 2 wheat. I understand that there is a demand at Vancouver port for No. 2 wheat, No. 4 wheat and No. 5 wheat. Again I ask, what went wrong? After all, the Wheat Board had acquired a computer and knew where the grain was. It is supposed to be more efficient now. Why send salesmen abroad if we do not arrange our own affairs to meet the customers' demands?

[Mr. Korchinski.]

The government refused to accept any responsibility for spoiled and damp grain. This is part of the problem. Its failure to act at the time of the strike at the lakehead is another part of the problem. Terminals were congested, and when damp grain was harvested the terminals were rearranging their space instead of being prepared to dry grain on a 24 hour seven day basis. This they did not do immediately. Why is there no dry grain at the west coast terminals now? Last fall the Wheat Board authorized a three bushel quota immediately for delivery of damp grain. There was a big rush by a few farmers who lived near elevators. They flooded the elevators and filled the available space. Fortunately, a few were able to deliver their three bushel quota. Many are still waiting to this date. Because of the rush to get grain through the terminals congestion developed. The situation should have been analysed. The Wheat Board should have opened a one bushel quota, have taken delivery and indicated what the capacity for drying was. Then, as more grain was required another quota could have been opened. The government kept dillydallying with their plans to assist in the drying of grain. We in the opposition kept telling the government the farmers were short of cash and could not dry grain.

Many farmers were deceived into thinking the Wheat Board would take all their grain when the three bushel quota was announced. They expected that by spring a six bushel quota might clean them out of damp grain. Many waited. They hoped that between the end of December and spring they would deliver at least another two or three bushels? What has happened? Nothing has happened since that initial flood. A survey on January 3 indicated that only 47 million bushels have been dried on farms. Yet an estimate indicates there are 350 million bushels of tough or damp grain on the farms. It is interesting to note why grain was not dry and why it was not available at the Vancouver terminals. I should like to quote from the Manitoba Co-Operator dated January 16, 1969. The article states:

> Of the 1,800 delivery points surveyed, 703 agents reported lack of availability of dryers in their area . . . too cold to operate dryers at 353 points, 210 agents said it was too expensive and 132 replied that farmers hoped to haul to country elevators or use the high moisture grain as feed.

My personal experience in my constituency, which has an abundance of damp grain, indicated there was no cash in the hands of the farmers. So, they did not dry. The Saskatchewan government analysed the situation. In an article in the Regina Leader Post of December 20, 1968 written by the Leader Post staff there is a report about a proposed program of the Saskatchewan government. The article reads in part as follows:

> The proposed program would pay the full cost of fuel, either propane gas or fuel oil, up to the maximum amount used, based on receipts provided by the supplier of the fuel, in all cases where the farmer does his own drying of grain ... the plan proposes to pay 50 per cent of the cost assessed by the custom dryer up to the maximum cash payment with a limit of six cents a bushel.
> The plan would also set a limit of $300 total in payments to a grain delivery permit book holder—

And so on.

It was obvious to the Saskatchewan government there was a lack of cash. Obviously, the federal government wanted to wipe its hands of the matter and leave it alone. At the end of December the government finally realized there was a lack of cash and announced that a special loan would be made available for the drying of grain. That was at the end of December. Between sessions something happened. This is the seventh sitting day since we returned from the Christmas recess but the government has not even seen fit to give first reading to a bill that would allow special loans for drying. I, personally, asked the house leader when he might have a discussion with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and he replied that discussions are going on. My goodness, how difficult it is to get through to some ministers! Even if the bill were passed, some time must elapse before regulations and forms could be delivered into the hands of country elevator agents. This has been the case in respect of the cash advance proposal that was passed in this house early in June. This will happen again. Another month goes by and the Government wonders why there is not adequate dried grain at Vancouver terminals.

What has happened is another example of failure to plan and to foresee the obvious. When one realizes that the number of boxcars available for transportation of wheat is 1,000 below the figure for last year, it becomes obvious that the situation is one of slipshod management by the government.

An hon. Member: A hell of a mess.

Mr. Korchinski: You can say that again; if the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) can say it you can say it.

Once again, wheat is piled high on the prairies; the farmers face an uncertain future. The minister makes excuses and the Prime Minister's only concern is about his extracurricular activities. If the Prime Minister devoted as much time to wheat as he does to dates we would not have this problem. Instead in Winnipeg he asked why we should sell wheat. He stated that it was the farmers' problem. This is the heart of the problem. The government just does not care. It is a hands off policy. Some call it laissez-faire; I call it lazy fare.

The government's policy has created a situation in which we now face the loss of contracts. It has been a catalogue of dismal mismanagement. I tell my N.D.P. friends, who are quick to oppose management at the drop of a hat, that the two month long strike last summer when the government sat in a state of rigid paralysis resulted in a congestion of grain which did not help. Last year the lakehead terminals shipped 373 million bushels compared to 356 million bushels in previous crop years. Last year Canada's sales volume dropped from 25 per cent to 20 per cent under this government's mismanagement. Further drops can be expected if this attitude on the part of the government persists. The following quotation is from the Montreal Star of November 6, 1968:

> Wheat and flour exports in the crop year ended last July 31 were the smallest since the 1959-60 crop year. They totalled 336,000,000 bushels against 515,000,000 bushels a year earlier.

Once again wheat is piling up on the prairies. The minister makes excuses. The government obviously is quite prepared to see things go by the board. What do we need? We need several things. We badly need a government that cares about the welfare of the farmers. This we do not have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Korchinski: We badly need a minister who will take things into his hands and instruct the trade concerning what must be done. We need some kind of a minister. We had a similar situation before. When the Progressive Conservative party formed a government we had our problems. When the China deal was arranged we realized there were transportation problems. The transportation problems had to be faced. There was a shortage of facilities at the west coast. But we had a minister who was willing to act. At that time Alvin Hamilton was the minister. He called the trade together and set out the problems. He obtained the assurance that the utmost co-operation would come from all, the railways, the terminal operators and the unions. It worked. There was no strike and deliveries were made on schedule.

Even Jack Pickersgill, the former minister of transport, tried his best to face up to the problem and see that adequate transportation was available. He called a meeting at Winnipeg.

The present minister does nothing but sit in the house, afraid to even venture to speak for himself. He has told us that everything is all right because God is on our side. It is time for the government to wake up. There is no co-ordination, no initiative, no desire to learn and no results. In the meantime we see headlines such as "Grain sales slow over holidays"; "Doesn't the government realize what is happening?"; "farm machinery sales show sharp decrease". This article indicates that sales have decreased in Saskatchewan by 21.8 per cent, in Manitoba by 18 per cent, in Alberta by 17.8 per cent and similar decreases for the other provinces. Does the government not realize how depressed the industry is?

I have another article which indicates that the average earnings of doctors in Canada in 1966 was $24,993; engineers and architects, $21,200; lawyers, $21,000; dentists, $17,200; accountants, $13,900; investors, $7,000 and other professionals, whatever they may be, $6,800. Even self-employed salesmen earned $7,600; business proprietors, $6,000; teachers and professors, $5,700; federal government employees, $5,600 and fishermen and farmers about $5,000. This is the situation, yet the government is quite prepared to lose markets for farm produce. What has happened to the leadership in this country? The Prime Minister goes off to London, treating his visit as a sort of honeymoon. What happened to his promises of 1,300 million bushels of grain sales in the next three years? Mr. McNamara expressed the fear—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret very much to interrupt the hon. member but according to the provisions of Standing Order 26 the hon. member's time has now expired.

Mr. Korchinski: May I say in conclusion, if the minister feels the job is too big he should resign.

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would say at the outset that the government has a serious responsibility to answer the question which has been put, and to indicate to this house how it proposes to deal with this very serious situation. It should indicate how it proposed to solve the grain marketing problem which affects not only western Canada but this country as a whole. If it will discharge that responsibility, then we should start to move this grain.

We, on this side of the house, have outlined actions to meet the situation which exists. We have done so on a number of occasions. We have pointed out the situation which was building up and stated on at least two occasions what could usefully be done. I suggest that the standing committee should meet with representatives of the Canadian wheat board to examine this matter and to determine what useful position could be taken.

The only answer we have ever been able to receive to our questions from the minister is that the officials of the wheat board would prefer to appear before the standing committee in March. Of course, if this is the minister's answer he is responsible for it and, I suppose, entitled to make such a decision.

On another occasion, I asked the minister whether he would consider doing what has been done before, that is appoint an individual to go to Vancouver to co-ordinate activities there. The minister said he had answered this question five times. I do not recall asking it five times, but apparently he answered it that often. He also said that he could not agree that a single individual should have all these problems dumped on him. I would hope that every crew on the west coast would dump its problems on such an individual. Perhaps if these problems were considered jointly we might find a way out of the impasse we have experienced. This might expedite the movement of grain.

Such a co-ordinator could meet with representatives of stevedoring firms, unions, wheat board officials and members of the board of grain commissioners and, last but not least, he could meet with railroad officials, because I am convinced some of the blockage exists there. He could impress upon them the seriousness of the problem.

Such an individual should be vested with the authority and confidence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) and could operate much more effectively than a committee or subcommittee. The government seems to be very strong in favour of committees and subcommittees, dialogue and communication, but in this case what we require is some action.

Let me describe the situation briefly to the house. According to the information I have, 20 ships lay at anchor in the inner and outer harbours at Vancouver. I am told that 19 of those ships are waiting to load grain. Fifteen of those ships are waiting to load higher grades, particularly No. 2. A few ships which arrived in Vancouver in December have made new arrangements to load lower grades of grain.

I have also received information that ten million bushels of grain are loaded and on the way to Vancouver. Of this amount 5,500,000 bushels are No. 2 Northern. These figures may not be exact, but this is the general situation which exists at this time. I have also been informed that the type of grain required is not in position and that from 200 to 400 cars are being unloaded per day at these terminals on the west coast. Last Saturday these terminals did not operate because there were not enough cars. These terminals are capable of unloading 600 cars per day.

In spite of these figures, we are in a better position at the port of Vancouver than we were several years ago when a similar situation occurred because the new Saskatchewan Pool terminal, with its great capacity, is available for the movement of grain through that port.

If we look at the other end of the grain picture we see that at the lakehead there are in store 41 million bushels of grain. The total capacity of the storage facilities is 90 million bushels. No one has explained why that capacity is not being used and storage space remains idle. It should be filled. We should be moving grain into the lakehead for the purpose of ensuring that the dryers keep operating and the grain is stored until the summer months when the weather warms up and drying could continue.

Let us look at the car loadings picture. I will give the house the figures for a five weeks comparison as between 1968 and 1967. In 1967, in the five weeks from December 6 to January 3, according to the Board of Grain Commissioners we moved 28,696 carloads of all grains. In 1968 in the same 5 week period we loaded 21,311 cars with all grains. There is a difference there of 7,385 cars in a five-week period. I would like to know why we moved less grain this year than we did in a similar period last year.

It is important that we get the answers to these questions tonight. It is more important that action be taken to solve the problem. There are some extenuating circumstances in this situation. We all know there are large quantities of grain with which we have to contend. I expect that the Canadian Wheat Board has made additional sales as a result of the strike at the gulf ports of the United States. I expect that additional sales have been made for one or two other reasons.

However, Mr. Speaker, there is no reason why we should not meet these conditions. We must be prepared to meet such conditions when they exist. We should gear our transportation system so we can meet this kind of emergency and deliver the product that we have for sale. We on the prairies operate at the end of a long pipe line and it is absolutely essential that this pipe line operate efficiently. It is of little avail to tell our farmers to be efficient, which they are, and to operate on very narrow margins, which they do, if the rest of the grain-handling industry is not efficient enough to move its product to the market when it is ready to be moved. This is what we are talking about tonight, the efficiency of our transportation and grain-handling system.

I am reliably informed that there is dry wheat at inland terminals which has not even been moved to the west coast to meet this demand. We should be using unit trains and making an all-out effort to meet the circumstances that exist. The failure to plan adequately to meet this situation is evident. We are in a highly competitive world market. We have always lived with the situation of being in a highly competitive world market. We know that this situation exists. We have known since the Kennedy round negotiations were completed that we would be in a tough marketing and negotiating position. This was evident. No sooner were those negotiations completed than the Americans and the French were cutting prices and we were fighting for markets. This should have been an added reason for being on our toes and missing no bets whatsoever.

When one considers the situation that exists on the west coast and at the lakehead, one has serious reservations as to how well the job is being done. I speak as a farmer whose neighbors have grain stacked up on their farms and whose very livelihood and well-being depends on the grain being moved to the market and being sold. We are not satisfied with the answers we have received in this house. This is one reason why I fully support the motion made this morning, namely, to have a full discussion on this matter. We have a cash advances program, but cash advances were not designed to move grain; they were designed to leave grain on the farms and to temporarily take care of the farmers while the grain stayed on the farm. The cash advances program is a temporary panacea; it is not a cure for anything. This program will not cope with the problem we face.

I am concerned about one aspect of this matter. We will have plenty of committees but not enough action. It is proposed that we have a National Grains Council. This will be a debating society. It will form more committees. Those committees will form subcommittees. We in this house will be trying to find out what the committees and subcommittees will be doing after they are formed. We do not need a National Grains Council; we need action. We need someone to put together the institutions and organizations we now have and make them work. We need co-ordination of the activities of the Canadian Wheat Board, the Board of Grain commissioners, the railroads and the elevator companies in order that this grain is effectively moved and sold. I do not wish to make light of the task that faces the Canadian Wheat Board or the Department of Trade and Commerce to which the Canadian Wheat Board is responsible. To some extent I know the nature of that task because at one time I sat on the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board; therefore I have some knowledge of the task it faces.

However, Mr. Speaker, I am not convinced that an all-out effort has been made to solve the transportation problem. I am not convinced that an all-out effort has been made to move box cars to the west coast and the lakehead in order that grain may be moved out of this country. I am not satisfied that the job has been done effectively. I will be very happy if this evening the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) or the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) rises and convinces me that the job of transportation has been done, is in good hands and is going ahead. I would have more confidence if they had done what was done by a previous minister of trade and commerce in a Liberal government. In a similar situation he appointed a transport controller, the late Mr. Milner, and gave him the job of seeing that the railroads moved the grain.

I would be much more satisfied and much more sure that the job was going to be done.

In closing, I want to say that these are the essential things which I think should be done, that is the appointment of a controller to see that the grain handling agencies are co-ordinated and can do this job effectively.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the motion which led to this urgent debate reads in part as follows:

> —I ask leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the virtual bottleneck and paralysis in wheat movement in Vancouver Harbour due to the failure of the government to work with the railways in scheduling box cars, leading to a situation which has already resulted in the loss of a $17,000 ton contract and which may result in the loss of others; which has caused damage and economic loss, since some ships have been tied up for as long as a month, paying demurrage charges as high $2,500 a day; which has brought about stagnation in the movement of wheat at a critical time for western farmers; and in connection with which the government, in the person of the minister yesterday, refused to take action.

A few years ago, we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, asked the Conservative government of the day to take emergency measures to build grain elevators in all Canadian ports to store the feed grains which the farmers of Eastern Canada need, and to prevent the type of situation we are now witnessing.

I know that out West it is often said that the quantity of feed grains used in Eastern Canada is very small, but I also know that it would have helped to relieve the congestion in the port of Vancouver had the construction of grain elevators been authorized in the East. Then, the bountiful crops of western grains could have been stored because in the East we use feed grains to feed the animals, even when the grain is damp or of inferior quality.

I had even suggested, in 1962, that we buy a ship to move the surplus grain in order to store it at Berthier-en-Bas, very near Quebec, as it is done in some countries when grain is plentiful and is stored for the more difficult years to come, this product which is essential for feeding our cattle which provide us with our daily food, as well as the grain of a superior quality in order to send it to those who need it to eat three meals a day.

Because the Conservative government of the day did not want to listen to the just requests of the official opposition—because we were asking for reasonable measures—the official opposition is forced to-day to ask for an emergency debate to advocate methods of insuring the export of grain, since the port of Vancouver seems to be congested. As I was asking then, grain elevators should have been built as far as the lower St. Lawrence area, that is at Baie Comeau, Sept-Îles, Rimouski, Rivière-du-Loup, Berthier-en-Bas, Trois-Rivières and even in the Saguenay area, in order to allow the people of the Lake St. John district to store the surplus grain of the western producers in a place where it would not be wasted. If this theory had been accepted, the problem would have been solved automatically.

When the Liberals took office, they suggested to appoint a Minister of Agriculture for eastern Canada who would have solved all those problems. If we must discuss today the problem of the accumulation of grain at the port of Vancouver, the difficulty to export grain to the countries that are waiting to get their orders, it is because a Conservative government did not want to see the situation in order to help our people in 1962, refused to keep its promises, like the present government that promised to appoint a Minister of Agriculture for the East, with a view to solving these storage and grain distribution problems.

I wish this emergency debate would last all night and would go on to-morrow because, according to the new rule, there would be no limit to the discussion. This has happened in England. I saw it also recently in Paris: the debate went on until 5 o'clock in the morning, on an important problem. I wish this discussion would last forever so that people would at last recognize that even if we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, are not listened to, we are still causing the voice of the people to be heard. It is the voice of truth, and it would be normal, for those on this side to lend an ear to it more often, so that they would know exactly what the people want.

I was expelled from the house in 1962 because I was demanding justice for the Eastern farmers and I was asking that the Western farmers be allowed to ship their grain to safe places so that it could be used one day by people who would need it. Victim of that unfair treatment, of that difficulty, and that humiliation, I am not at all ashamed, and I would not hesitate to do it all over again for the welfare of our fellow citizens. It is imperative at times that the truth be heard in this house.

In 1963, and in 1965, the then government made promises, and did so again at the last election campaign. One could read in the newspapers a statement which I compare with those I made in 1962.

I will quote this statement word for word to show that if equal distribution had been allowed across the country, we would not have all these problems that face us today in respect of grain accumulating in Vancouver and we would not even have to talk about the problem of distribution arising from the lack of cars, as for the grain to get there in time before harvest around September 15, for distribution across the country, space would have had to be found to store that wheat which might feed humanity tomorrow. In fact, if every Canadian got his fair share, as it should have been long ago, we would have prosperity and not all the present problems.

So, I shall quote this newspaper article showing, as I said, that we are asking for fair things not always accepted, even ridiculed at times, but which become realities after a few years of thinking. Here is what is said exactly in this article from the "Meunier Québecois" of December 1968:

> Truly, for some time, a lot of talk not to mention money has been wasted on the grain elevators in the Quebec harbour. We will not blame this one or that. We must consider the facts and judge positively. Is the present situation to the advantage of the farmer and the Canadian taxpayer? Let us recapitulate this matter from two years back—

As for me I would rather say for the last seven years. In fact, we have asked for fairer measures in 1962. I am reading on:

> In January 1967, the National Harbours Board publicly announced that the grain elevator in Quebec was going to be rented or sold by tenders. Tenders were called and BUNGE OF CANADA LTD rented the elevator for a 10-year period. This lease provided for two renewal options at a rental rate to be determined by the National Harbours Board. Rental for the first ten years amounts to about $915,959 yearly.
> At the same time, the National Harbours Board announced that it had received two bids following the public tenders and that the bid made by BUNGE OF CANADA LTD—

—an American company—

> —had been found the most favourable.
> That company that had intended to build a grain elevator at Sept-Iles in Quebec, had abandoned that project, independently of whether it bought the elevator in Quebec or not. The company had also announced that it was ready to sell its property at Sept-Iles even to a competitor.

The National Harbours Board announced further that the elevator at Quebec "would continue to be operated as a public elevator with an operation permit from the Board of Grain Commissioners".

Upon request, BUNGE gave a written assurance to guarantee that the shippers of domestic grain would have free and full access to the elevator.

Further, BUNGE gave a firm assurance that not only a space would be reserved for the domestic grain, but that additional space would be built for storing grain whenever necessary.

These two points were to be part of the lease, and in the property rented by Bunge, there was a piece of land on which new warehouses were supposed to be built for domestic grain when the elevator would further expand.

Apparently, the National Harbours Board wanted to suggest renting the elevator, since they had realized they could not use those warehouses at their full capacity. We may wonder what made them reach this decision since a few years before, extra storage space had been built to hold 4,000,000 bushels.

The idea, in building these grain elevators was to placate the opposition that was seeking redress. It was not heeded and these elevators were built only to be rented the next day to an American company thus allowing a few capitalists to get richer still. We, as members of the Ralliement Créditiste, will not stand for this any more, for, in our opinion, instead of giving way to the excesses of capitalism, we should, as I said before in this chamber, establish co-operative organizations to prevent the shameful abuses that prevail too often. I go on quoting.

What steps did that "National Harbours Board" take to induce shippers and exporters of domestic grain to use these new modern facilities that had just been built?

It would be interesting to know what surveys have been made in that connection. According to a press release at that time, the National Harbours Board claimed that the situation of the said elevator had been jeopardized in 1958 when the government allowed Cargill to build an elevator at Baie Comeau. A conclusion which is—

—logical or—

—preposterous—

—if you prefer—

—for if the Government felt that the situation of the elevator was threatened in 1958, why then did it build additional facilities in 1960 and again in 1965. In other words, after the Cargill construction, the National Harbour Boards doubled its capacity, modernized the elevator, and having spent the taxpayers money, rented the elevator to—

—a company by the name of—

—BUNGE without taking into account the needs of the farmers of the Quebec area.

[Mr. Dumont.]

Today, the serious problems of storing grain in the port of Vancouver should not surprise us, for in a country which produces more than 600 million bushels of wheat, it would be perfectly normal if elevators were built all across Canada. Let us recall those years when Joseph had provided for the storage of enough wheat to last the seven years when his people went through a difficult situation. If one day that same situation were to be duplicated the world over, we could ship wheat to those who would need it, in order to feed the human race who has to have at least three daily meals.

The article keeps on thus:

As another excuse, he indicated that for the local business around Quebec, the elevator would be in competition with that of Trois-Rivières once the new bridge were completed and that it was expected there would be special rates to deliver the grain directly from the West to the province by railway. Barely a year and a half later, it is obvious that all those forecasts and promises from the National Harbours Board were impossible.

Just like my colleagues of the Ralliement Créditiste, I am still wondering why Western grain does not get more rapidly to Eastern Canada, in order to meet the requirements both of bakers and farmers in the East and in order to clear ports such as that of Vancouver which, usually due to a lack of box-cars, so it seems, are unable to do the job.

Our proposals are sound, but the government does not want to listen to our demands, and as a result there are urgent debates such as this one tonight in order to find a solution similar to the one we have been advocating for seven years. Even though we have been laughed at, in an attempt to prove that we were wrong, our way of thinking is substantiated and now is the moment to prove the truth.

I am sincerely sorry that the farmers of Western Canada are in trouble. I have been to that part of the country and I know the value of its contribution to our trade. Personnally, being a former farmer, I am well aware of agricultural problems in Quebec and in Canada. I am in a position to say, since the previous legislators did not do justice to our people and we now represent the official opposition from Quebec in the parliament of Canada, that we are asking that our people be treated fairly.

Although at the present time, attention is drawn only on the problem as it affects the Western farmers, it does affect Eastern Canada too. Farming is heading for disaster, because we have been unable to convince Western farmers to ship their grain to Eastern Canada. If we could achieve that end, it might check separatism, which is feared by several hon. members, because it is no use preaching to a hungry man. At the present time, Eastern farmers are miserable on their parcel of land, because they do not think it possible that this grain which could be sold at a lower price in Eastern Canada, will one day bring them some profit.

They will have nothing to do with socialism, with a government that controls and they do not want to be told one of these days to do such or such a thing. Indeed, there is proof of that in the fact that they objected to the renting of the Quebec elevators to an American company that probably created some of the problems concerning grain exports. We lost, as was said in the motion today, 17,000 tons of cereals that could have been sold and such a sale would no doubt have contributed to our country's prosperity.

But because justice is being denied, because the economic power of electoral funds dictates the course followed by the parties in power—Tories or Grits, they are of the same making because they go to the same source to get elected—it is possible the day after the elections, with a majority government, to have laws passed that encourage those financiers and bring about disasters like the one we are witnessing now in Canada.

I will therefore keep on reading the article I quoted a while ago, giving you a few more details on what we are going through at present in eastern Canada, when we would have liked so much to help the people in western Canada. People may think what they want, but we are ready in Quebec to help our fellow citizens. We are ready to assist other Canadians who, as everybody knows, also want to make reasonable profit and benefit from the income of their farm, which would enable them to live decently, in a democratic way. Now problems like the one in the Vancouver harbour are created, which shows that when the government rented the Quebec grain elevators to an American company, it not only created storing problems, but also contributed to increase the control of American companies over the Canadian economy. In fact, a spokesman for the Federated Cooperative said one day: If we had not been here, our control on grain would have been done for. An American company was then coming to Eastern Canada to control the distribution of grain and this is the effect that we must bear today while we have to tackle problems like the one in which we are involved at this time. I shall read further the article to which I referred earlier:

It must be noted that up to the end of the 1966 shipping season about half a dozen shippers were competing with the Quebec market; this was the best guarantee for the local consumer that he would get the most reasonable offer.

At the end of the 1968 shipping season, there was only Bunge with the exception of one or two other shippers, who were moving grain to the Quebec elevators. The tenant systematically discouraged the shippers, as well as the shipping companies, from going to Quebec to unload the domestic grain—

It is not surprising that we should know the problems which are ours today.

—because he was trying to impose conditions forcing the shippers to give him three days notice before the loading of the ship at the Great Lakes ports, to give the name of the ship, the quantity, the grade of the grain and the date of arrival of the ship in Quebec.

With such information, the tenant could get in Quebec an advantage on the market by adjusting his price in order to compete in the best possible conditions.

A permit was issued by the Canadian Board of Grain Commissioners under section 134 (1) of the Canada Grain Act with different clauses.

This brought about more confusion at the elevator because the permit itself was interpreted in an ambiguous way by the Canadian Board of Grain Commissionners.

In a brief about the Quebec elevator, Mr. V. Martin, secretary and executive manager stated, for instance, "Bunge is allowed, though under no obligation, to take a ship out of turn. On the other hand, if a ship turns up, and there is no other one in line, and there is room in the elevator, Bunge has to unload the boat without any consideration for other plans or commitments.

In October, one of Bunge's competitors on the local market in Quebec, taking into account the above mentioned conditions, sent a boat to Quebec with 960,000—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: Just a few minutes more, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I must say, Mr. Speaker, that the last speech has cheered me up. Sometimes I have doubts about my competence, but having listened to the last speaker I was reminded of the famous words of a well known gentleman, who said, "When I look at myself I am a bit embarrassed, but when I compare myself with others I am cheered". At one point we were getting rather far from Vancouver and from the situation that exists there.

The motion which we have before us is full of impressive phrases, such as "paralysis in wheat movement in Vancouver harbour", "loss of a 17,000 ton contract", the possible loss of others, "stagnation in the movement of wheat". The hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski), with his usual enthusiasm, added additional big phrases, such as "serious decline in our sales" and "nothing is moving". That is about the mood that he has tried to create, though I am sure most of the house and the country does not agree with him.

The hon. member is making mistakes, though involuntary and unconscious ones, I am sure. He is also guilty of some exaggerations. My colleague the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) and myself will demonstrate this tonight. However, in doing so none of us will deny that we do have a serious situation here. The Wheat Board says that we have 31 ships loading or waiting for grain in Vancouver. Others have said there are 29 and 30, and someone said 33, but the official figure is 31.

I should like, first of all, to try to define the problem. At the root of the grain movement problem this crop year is the fact that farmers harvested last fall all time record quantities of tough and damp grain, and the quantities which must be handled are double that of any other year. This is regrettable but the government could not do anything to prevent that situation. It is well known that government can do many things, but it cannot change the weather.

The second fact which must be borne in mind is that the handling of high moisture grain is a slow, time consuming process. As an example—and this is only an example—terminal operators are finding that in some cases it takes several hours to unload a boxcar of high moisture grain, as opposed to minutes for dry grain. Again the government cannot change this situation.

Unusually severe winter weather has greatly cut down on the efficiency of railroad equipment. As an example, yesterday in Edmonton the temperature was 40 below zero, though had the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) been there it might have gone up a few degrees! This means, for instance, that a diesel engine normally capable of hauling 80 to 100 cars of grain can haul only 30. Again that is a situation that the government, however capable, cannot change.

Another factor is that the demand for Canadian grain from westcoast ports has been stronger than could have been anticipated. I have already said that; I will repeat it and provide the house with statistics on the subject in a moment. The desire to move the largest possible volume of high moisture grain to Vancouver terminals for drying and for export purposes has conflicted with efforts to meet this increased demand for dry grain.

I have already said that we have here a conflict between two very desirable objectives and purposes. One is the movement of maximum quantities of damp grain to terminal elevators for drying and export; the other very worth-while objective is the achievement of maximum exports. As I have indicated, we have had some unexpected export commitments to meet on top of expected export commitments. That is a situation to which I have often referred and has to do with Chinese and Japanese sales as well.

The simplest solution would have been to cut back on sales from Vancouver. After the results of the harvest were known, the Wheat Board was aware that there would be serious transportation and handling problems this year. The Wheat Board could have taken the easy way out and simply limited sales to safe levels. Instead they opted to maximize sales and tried to solve transportation problems. Had they not done so, hon. members on the other side would be accusing us for the loss of sales, and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) tonight accused us in fact for the loss of one sale in particular. His allegation is not correct.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: You lost more than one sale.

Mr. Pepin: One can imagine what hon. members of the Conservative party would have said if the Wheat Board, acting on conservative principles, had been afraid to take any chances. Hon. gentlemen of the Conservative party would have been among the first to accuse the Wheat Board or most preferably the minister responsible for the Wheat Board, for not being daring enough.

Mr. Woolliams: I notice the gold dust twins don't agree with you.

Mr. Pepin: In business you have to take calculated risks, and take the consequences.

An hon. Member: In what kind of businesses?

Mr. Pepin: In all businesses, including politics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pepin: What was done by the government is well known. As soon as it became evident that a crisis had developed in western Canada after the harvest last fall, the Wheat Board announced an advance delivery quota of three bushels per specified acre. This allowed for a quick movement of high moisture grains to terminals, and allowed dryers to begin operating at capacity.

I still remember the charming voice of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) shouting across the floor, "Get the wheat to the dryers." And I still remember the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) shouting to me, "Go out and sell, sell, sell wheat." That is exactly what was done. I am not blaming hon. members for their attitude. The government has supported the actions of the Wheat Board in what has been done. The right steps have been taken. I am not condemning hon. members for having shouted their advice to me. They were right to do so. The risk the Board took was a calculated one. That is all there is to it and there is nothing wrong with it. But when you take risks you also take the consequences.

The grain industry set up a committee in Winnipeg to co-ordinate the movement of high moisture grain.

Mr. Horner: How long ago was that?

Mr. Pepin: At the beginning of this situation, in the fall. I am talking about the Winnipeg Transport Committee and not about the committee set up in Vancouver, which is more recent. No doubt hon. members on the other side of the house consider they have revelations from God himself which enables them to anticipate history. My memory is good and I can remember hon. members on the other side of the house telling us to subsidize wheat left in the field. They knew it would not even be harvested.

At any rate, the transportation committee was created. Terminals and railways were given targets to achieve on a weekly basis. Each week these targets were reviewed and where short falls occurred the reasons for those short falls were and are examined. When a short fall is due to controllable circumstances corrective action is immediately taken. On November 26, when the Wheat Board held its press conference, the farmers were told the situation was difficult and that they would have to dry a lot of their own grain. Full investigations were made into the possibility of utilizing additional facilities, such as the terminals at Duluth and dryers in southern Ontario. That investigation disclosed that costs of using such facilities would be far higher than the costs incurred in drying grain on farms.

A subcommittee of the main committee in Vancouver was created in Vancouver under the chairmanship of the Vancouver manager of the Wheat Board to do the same work as the committee in Winnipeg was doing. I think the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) will explain what was done.

Mr. Baldwin: Yes. You raised interest rates.

Mr. Pepin: He will explain what was done in order to make available to farmers interest free cash advances so that they would not be financially handicapped when attempting to dry their own wheat. In addition, the duty of 15 per cent on imported stationary dryers was remitted; income tax regulations were amended to provide accelerated depreciation allowances for farm grain storage facilities and grain drying equipment; the government waived the provisions of the labour code to allow for 24 hour a day, seven day a week terminal drying, and at the moment all terminals are operating seven days a week 24 hours a day. I could go on listing what we did.

Mr. Baldwin: And do not forget what you are going to do about estate taxes.

Mr. Pepin: But we are being accused of doing nothing. The motion says in part, "the minister...refused to take action." We have been taking action all along.

Mr. Woolliams: Some action.

Mr. Pepin: I now want to talk about the sale of wheat to Japan. As I have mentioned in the house on a number of occasions, the House of Commons is not a market place and it is not in the interest of producers to discuss individual sales transactions.

Mr. Woolliams: How did the transaction we are considering go wrong?

Mr. Pepin: Does the hon. member disagree with that statement?

Mr. Woolliams: I disagree with the government's entire policy. Quite frankly, it has no policy.

Mr. Pepin: The hon. member's former leader, when he was prime minister, said in the House of Commons as reported at page 880 of Hansard for February 15, 1962:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not want to comment on a vote that took place yesterday but the hon. gentleman knows very well that throughout the years it has never been considered proper to reveal the particulars of agreements or transactions entered into by the wheat board. To do so would be to depart from the regular principle and would be of benefit only to those who are competitors.

If I were not so pleased to be on the government side of the house I might enjoy the experience of being on the other side for a few days to enjoy the game of telling the government, as hon. members over there do, that we should provide more subsidies, sell more of this, and do this and that without having to take the responsibility of what would happen if those suggestions were implemented.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pepin: I came well prepared, Mr. Speaker, and I can quote chapter and verse to hon. members on the other side. Hon. members said that the Wheat Board ought to give advance quotas for damp grain; that damp grain ought to be given priority in box car movements. They emphasized at the same time that we should not lose a single sale, and so on. I do not see why hon. members are complaining because their suggestions were carried out. Hon. members ought now to take their share of the responsibility for what has happened. We have taken chances—

Mr. Gundlock: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The minister has the option to refuse.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I am just warming up. The hon. member for Mackenzie accuses us of not having made one particular sale. As I said before, it is not the practice of the house to talk about specific sales, as the former leader of the Conservative party said. He stressed the value of that tradition. I hasten to add, however, that shipments of Canadian wheat to Japan this year are considerably above last year's level, being at 17.1 million bushels as compared to 12.5 million bushels in the August to December period last year.

Mr. Woolliams: Peanuts.

Mr. Pepin: I do not see why we should be accused of having missed one sale when 5 million more bushels this year than in the corresponding period last year have been sold. I don't want to break an old tradition but I might indicate to the hon. member for Mackenzie that the sale he assumed was lost has not been lost.

• (9:20 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pepin: Press reports at times can be wrong and this is one occasion. I am not saying that the sale will not be lost. I am saying that it has not been lost and that the Wheat Board will see to it that a maximum effort is made so that it won't be lost.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, since apparently members have only 20 minutes in which to speak, I wish to state that the debate we are having is partly on the functions of the minister. I do not want to quote Dawson and other learned authorities because if I did so I would be accused of going back to my former profession. But on reflection I ask, is it the function of ministers to replace the proper authorities? Is it my job to run the wheat marketing system in Canada, to tell the Wheat Board what to do, to command or, using the word used by the hon. member for Mackenzie, to instruct? Is it my job to instruct the members of the Wheat Board? Is it necessary for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) to instruct the Board of Grain Commissioners? I don't believe that because if it is our job to instruct then obviously we don't need these boards.

Mr. Horner: We will tell you your job.

Mr. Pepin: I am just trying to reason with the opposition members and this is sometimes difficult.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pepin: It is not the function of the minister, the way I look at it, to run Crown agencies. That is the way that traditionally these things have been looked at. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) is familiar with these theories. I am quite sure that when he was premier of Nova Scotia he did not actually tell everybody in the provincial government what to do. I know some people say he did but I don't believe that.

The function of the minister is to support the organizations for which he is responsible to parliament, to bring the different parties together when need be, to do everything to help these parties in the accomplishment of their tasks and this, Mr. Speaker, has been done in these grain difficulties by the members of the cabinet.

The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave) says that we should discuss, I think I quote correctly, the efficiency of the grain handling system in Canada. I am old enough to know that when things go well people go on their knees to praise the transportation system in Canada. Now that the weather has not been as kind as we all would like it to be, now that some difficulties have arisen I think this is a poor moment to suggest that there is something fundamentally wrong with the transportation system. I remember very well the praises accorded to the transportation system when things went well.

An hon. Member: When was that?

Mr. Pepin: Anyway, I can say honestly that the ministers of the government have given the proper wheat marketing and transportation authorities the fullest support we could. We have given our complete co-operation and I do not think anybody will say differently. But of course—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am afraid the minister's time has expired unless there is unanimous agreement of the house for him to continue.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Pepin: I will conclude by saying—

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): I object, Mr. Speaker, because I was not allowed to continue my remarks earlier.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. It is a matter of consent. There is the consent of the house to allow the minister to continue, whereas that was not available earlier.

[Translation]

Mr. Dumont: As unanimous consent is necessary, I object.

An hon. Member: You have nothing to say.

Mr. Dumont: I was not allowed to continue my remarks a short while ago. It is now my turn to object. I also asked for unanimous consent, and it was not given.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Dauphin.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak to this motion, and as its seconder, I would like to express my concern with the problem. In my opinion, the present situation of our wheat exports at the port of Vancouver is an indication of the chaos, lack of direction and failure of the government to one of the main segments of our economy in western Canada, a segment that is vital to have an agricultural policy that will benefit the well being of our nation.

On January 21 the President of the Winnipeg Grain Exchange, in an address to the annual joint conference of the Dominion Grain Association and U.S. Lake Carriers Association, stated that Canada's position in the world wheat trade is precarious and unlikely will ever again be as good as it has been in recent years. I would hope he is in error but at least this is an informed opinion.

We now witness the prospect of sales that we cannot fulfil due to the mismanagement of our export mechanism in the transfer of grain from the farms to the ships, at a time when the world wheat crop has exceeded 10 billion bushels for three consecutive years. This has resulted in a large surplus for the exporting nations of the world and intense rivalry to have this grain disappear into the markets of the world.

In an article in the Canadian Press of November 6, 1968, by Allan Sackman, the question is posed "Can the world do without our grain"? The statement of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in Winnipeg that the prairie farmer should sell his own grain, when it is well known that it is impossible for the farmer to sell his own grain, shows a lack of appreciation of the problems facing the agricultural producer.

Recently the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) announced the licensing of a variety of Mexican wheat designed to fill an area of wheat marketing for feed grains. This will cause further congestion in ports such as Vancouver in transfering this grain to the markets of the world. The increased number of varieties of wheat and other grains causes further problems and requires more sophisticated machinery to handle the grain at the ports.

Investigations in recent years of the grain handling situation show that we are sadly lacking in many areas to fulfil all the demands of our customers and to take care of unexpected sales that fortune has thrown our way. We must hurry to modernize our grain handling facilities so that we can cope with the unexpected.

This last fall we had a modestly good crop, severely damaged by rain and frost over wide areas of the prairies. In fairness, it seems to me that much of the congestion can be attributed to the large amounts of damp or wet grain in store and awaiting drying at Vancouver. Such harvesting seasons will recur at intervals and we will have to be prepared for them at least once every 20 years, if not once every ten years, so that we can carry on a major drying operation. The need for this will likely increase as farms increase in size and mechanization.

It seems to me only reasonable that provision should be made by the government, either in conjunction with local elevators on farms or with elevators at the coastal terminals, for a large amount of grain to be reconditioned for sale in the world markets. A chain is only as strong as its weakest link, and when handling facilities at a port such as Vancouver become clogged and break down, only chaos can result.

It is particularly disastrous to note, according to an item in the James Richardson and Sons weekly grain report, that a 17,000 ton sale of grain to Japan may have been lost and its place taken by a cargo of Australian wheat. It is very damaging that Japan, one of our traditional markets, and a country that does not fall under communist domination—leaving aside political consideration in our dealings with the communist bloc—is one country where unfortunately we have lost a sale.

It is well known that the erratic shipments of grain from the west coast have been a factor in the loss of our traditional Japanese barley market. In the past year we have seen this market slip away to France and Australia. This loss has been in part due to uncertainty of delivery out of our west coast port.

Canadian agriculture is facing severe circumstances in penetrating the markets of the world, and competition will be fierce. There are many facets of this problem that we cannot control but it is wise to rectify those things that we have the power to rectify. Certainly, one of our immediate tasks is to put the port at Vancouver into the best possible position for exporting grain.

[Mr. Ritchie.]

There are upwards of 300 million bushels of damp grain in farm storage. Many experts feel this grain will be seriously damaged if it is not conditioned by spring. So, in addition to the amount that has been expended by the farmer in harvesting the grain there will be a considerable loss in value. From a long range point of view it might well be considered that we should have facilities for the storage of grain outside this country in places such as Tokyo and Rotterdam. These are our main market areas. This would allow for a cushion in the event of delayed shipments of grain by reason of abnormal conditions such as strikes and other unforeseen problems.

I strongly urge the government to take the present tie-up at Vancouver as an indication of the seriousness of the situation in respect of the grain trade and particularly the handling facilities for grain in western Canada. I ask that the government act with all possible speed in this matter. I should like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce whether international markets have been lost because of any delay in getting the right type of grain in position; what can now be done to get the required types of grain to the terminals and, finally, a question which the minister did not touch on, will the prairie farmers have to pay for the mounting demurrage costs in respect of the boats?

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to register my concern about the problem of trying to be prepared for every eventuality in the business of marketing grain. It is a very serious thing to be unable to deliver grain in the quantities and grades, and at the time our customers require it. It is especially serious when after a year of poor sales our markets are showing some signs of buoyancy again, and we have added to a substantial carry-over from last year another better than average size crop. I note in passing that overseas clearances of wheat and wheat flour are running about 25 per cent or 30 per cent higher so far in this crop year than they were a year ago.

For years I have been saying that more and better facilities are needed for the storage and transportation of our grain. We must be prepared to deliver what our customers want when they want it. It is quite obvious that the unusually large amounts of tough and damp grain with which we must contend this year have interfered somewhat with the normal movement through our transportation system. I understand also that some Japanese orders for wheat from the United States were cancelled recently, and that the ships were sent on short notice to Vancouver to take Canadian wheat instead. This is a very welcome development and one which we can ill afford to fumble.

Canadian farmers are in the business of selling grain to a great variety of customers through the agency of the Canadian Wheat Board. To be successful in this merchandising operation, it seems to me one of the first essentials is to have an adequate supply readily available for our customers. I believe this demands a thorough overhauling and upgrading of our grain handling system. Methods must be developed very quickly to make sure that the Wheat Board can deliver grain to our seaports in whatever quantities and qualities may be required by the market from time to time.

I suggest we need more terminal space for the storage of large quantities of different grades of wheat. It would likely be necessary that these be at ports in order to avoid the rail line bottlenecks. Inland terminals served by unit or containerized trains, or pipelines, should also be considered. I think the suggestion made this evening by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont) regarding storage facilities in eastern Canada is also a very good one. Also, the statement of the last speaker that we need considerable storage facilities at overseas positions is worthy of consideration.

I know that some officials of the Wheat Board and the Board of Grain Commissioners recognize that our grain handling facilities are far from adequate to cope with modern grain market conditions. The Saskatchewan Wheat Pool has done something about this. This farmer owned organization, of which I am a member, has plowed back much of its past earnings and will put much of its future earnings into large new terminals at the west coast. I would urge everyone involved, the railways, the grain companies, the National Harbours Board and all other agencies to get on with the job of bringing our system up to date.

To get back to the immediate problem I tend to agree with those who have been advocating the appointment of a transport controller or commissioner. Some years ago such a person did a fine job of directing and co-ordinating grain movements. I know there has been a transport committee for most of the season so far. This committee is composed of representatives of various organizations. But the fact that the present problems have developed casts some doubt on the efficacy of this essentially voluntary arrangement.

It is said that the best type of committee to get action is a two man committee, with one member absent. Therefore, I would be in favour of the appointment of a transport controller, at least for the balance of this crop year, with authority to see that what needs to be done in this emergency is done and done promptly. There is a good deal of grain of various grades in western Canada which is needed to supply the market. It may be that traditional shipping areas may have to be disregarded. This may mean the shipping of Manitoba and eastern Saskatchewan grain to the west coast, or the shipping of Alberta and B.C. grain east. It may also mean an increase in shipping costs. I believe most farmers would agree it would be better to take a little less for grain in order to cover such increased marketing costs if this is necessary to develop and maintain our sales.

Then there is the matter of the equitable sharing of marketing opportunities between farmers of various parts of the prairies. Eventually all this grain will be handled some time, so it is essential that all kinds of grain be accepted from all areas and stored if necessary. If it is stored in positions where it is readily marketable, buyers will more likely be found. This important consideration of equality of delivery by the end of each crop year must never be forgotten. That is the main purpose and justification for a quota system.

In conclusion I would say that if there is any blame to be assessed in this present situation most of it can be laid to an outmoded transportation and storage system. In any case there is little profit in trying to blame individuals or groups. What we should be doing is deciding how best to improve conditions. I think there is a good deal of merit in having a one man transport controller with meaningful authority.

I believe also that the Canadian Wheat Board should be extremely flexible in designating shipping areas for both eastern and western shipments. If it can be shown that there is a shortage of grain cars, and I do not believe this has been proven, this should be quickly rectified by a transport controller. The future of our grain industry, which is so important to the economy of the whole nation, depends on whether or not we can cope with the current problems and whether we can develop methods to prevent their recurrence. The importance of maintaining Canada's reputation as a reliable producer and supplier of wheat cannot be overemphasized.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, a little while ago we witnessed a defence of the Wheat Board and the grain handling system which would have sickened any farmer from western Canada. It would have sickened the farmers there and have driven them to despair. I rise at this time, heavy of heart, because I realize the many difficulties with which the minister is confronted and his inability to cope with those difficulties. I have nothing particular against the minister but he is unsuited to handle the grain problems in western Canada. I notice the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in the house at this time. Let me remind the house of his remarks during the campaign. He said he would appoint ministers to his cabinet not on the basis of regional representation but because of ability. Surely the Prime Minister cannot sit in his seat today and tell us the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) was appointed to look after the wheat board because of his ability, particularly after his 20 minute speech of nonsense and garbage.

At one time the Minister of Trade and Commerce, during his speech, asked what his job was. He suggested that we should tell him what to do. He should not have been appointed if he did not know what to do or what his job entailed. Surely every farmer in western Canada could quickly tell him what his job is and what he should do. His job is to sell wheat and move it as quickly as possible. He should not take the attitude the Prime Minister expressed in Winnipeg some time ago and again in the House of Commons when he asked, why should the government sell wheat?

[Mr. Douglas.]

The minister should sell wheat because the wheat board is a branch of the government functioning on behalf of farmers. The government has accepted the responsibility to govern this country, and whether the Prime Minister wants that responsibility—and I am sometimes unsure about that—he has accepted it now. He went out and worked to acquire that responsibility. He now says that the selling of wheat is the farmer's problem and would only become a government responsibility if the state owned the land and hired the farmers to produce wheat. Perhaps the Prime Minister is like the Minister of Trade and Commerce who is now wondering what his job is. We all wondered what his job was when he was over in London, but now that he is back here in Canada he should recognize his responsibility and at least attempt to cope with this situation.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce outlined the problem but at no time did he say what the government was doing about it. He did not say we are doing "a", "b" or "c" about it, or this is what we hope to do. He attempted to throw this problem off his shoulders by saying the problem was the result of the production of tough and damp grain last fall and the railroad companies were having problems hauling the grain in the wintertime. We have had a cold winter this year in western Canada, but this is not the first cold winter and it will not be the last. The minister also blamed the situation on the fact that there was an unusually high demand for western wheat at the western ports. During the last few years Vancouver has moved over 50 per cent of the grain moved in this country, and if the minister doubts that he should look up the records. The minister went on to suggest that the farmers had asked for a 3 cent per bushel advance on damp grain, and said this got the government into trouble. He finally analyzed the problem by saying, or rather asking, what is my job?

Mr. Woolliams: It is obvious he doesn't know.

Mr. Horner: He doesn't know and he is not even prepared to find out. He has been the minister for one year, yet he does not know what his job is. There are 33 ships at Vancouver today, some being loaded and some not. The Prime Minister makes flippant remarks, but who is paying the demurrage charges on these ships which amounts to $2,500 per day? Let me tell you that the farmers are paying these charges. One shipping company in respect of one ship has put in a bill for $32,000 in demurrage charges. Let the Prime Minister flippantly reply to that fact. Let him take the blame, and let the government pay the demurrage charges.

What does the government have to say about the lawsuits being initiated by the shipping companies against the wheat board? These companies had arranged dates to load grain, yet the grain is not there. The ships are there and they are losing cargoes and contracts. They blame the wheat board because they cannot load at Vancouver. Is the government going to accept these lawsuits or is it looking into this problem?

What does the minister have to say about the grades of wheat moving out to the west coast? Vancouver facilities can handle something like 2,000 bushels per hour in the drying system. There was no need to move out a lot of damp grain. The wheat board could have moved out damp grain as fast as the drying facilities could handle it. Most of the storage facilities in Vancouver should have been used for dry grain. The damp grain this winter could have been stored a lot better in western Canada under the cold conditions. Instead it was stored in Vancouver and it might well be heating at this moment because of the warm climate and the severe dampness. The government mishandled this grain movement by shipping damp grain to Vancouver. That is the first mistake it made.

Instead of appointing a committee seven or eight weeks ago to organize and co-ordinate the shipment of grain to Vancouver, the government appointed a co-ordinating committee about two weeks ago. This action should have been taken four or five weeks earlier. The situation was obvious two months ago. It was obvious that the wheat board could not live up to the contracts which had been made in respect of shipments.

A ship today does not suddenly appear on the horizon like the ships sailed by Columbus when he discovered America. A ship takes some time to get to Vancouver and the wheat board knows that it is coming for a certain grade of wheat. Surely to goodness, this wheat should have been available.

I have some doubt as to whether Japan is prepared to accept damp grain. During the Christmas recess I travelled throughout my constituency and saw thousands and thousands of bushels of grain still in the fields. This is dry grain. There is a great deal of dry grain in southern Alberta. The government could have moved huge amounts of dry grain for storage in Vancouver. The government turned its back on this fact, and paid no attention to the situation.

The minister asked what his job is. Let me suggest it is to provide leadership and inspiration to his department to provide greater service. How could he inspire his department when, after one year in office, he still does not know his responsibility? If the rules permitted I would move that the minister resign or that the wheat board be taken from his responsibility. There has been some talk about this.

I should like to hear any western member who supports the government suggest that the wheat board should remain the responsibility of this minister who has no knowledge of this situation. I should like to see the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) cast his vote of confidence in support of this government's actions after listening to the speech the minister has made. I do not think he could do so and return to his constituency to face the farmers. I am sure no western member could do this because of the mishandling of this whole grain situation since the beginning of last fall. The minister has been inept in handling this problem since his appointment.

The Western Producer of January 2, 1969 published an article under the heading "France undercuts I.G.A. price". What is Canada doing about this? Has this government made any complaint? What is the minister doing? The hon. member for Assiniboia suggested that the farmers were prepared to sell for less. I suggest some farmers must sell for less because of high interest rates and because of the new estate taxes the government is introducing.

The minister asks us to consider what the government has done. It has increased taxes to farmers when they are alive and is now prepared to take their farms when they die. Perhaps when the government takes over these farms the Prime Minister will decide that now the government owns the farms it will have to sell the wheat. I suppose that will be the time the Prime Minister finally accepts responsibility for moving and selling wheat. Surely to goodness, in this democratic country we can expect more responsibility than that.

Grain

• (9:50 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas).

Mr. Douglas: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member said that I stated the farmers would be willing to take less money for their wheat. I said the farmers would be willing to take a little less in order to pay the extra transportation charges that may be necessary to bring wheat from—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Mr. Horner: That is no question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. I said that the hon. member stated the farmers would be willing to take less money. That is what he did say. I do not know what excuse he gave for that; whether it was transportation costs or any other kind of costs. In any event, farmers are going to take less under this government because of the rail line abandonment program and increased transportation costs, if nothing else. These extra charges are being faced by the farmers right in the hon. member's own constituency.

Farmers are not prepared to take less money. Many farmers have to take less in order to meet the interest payments on the huge amounts of money they have had to borrow in order to seed and harvest their crops, despite the fact that their crops are not moving to the market and the minister who is responsible for seeing that they move is not doing his job properly.

During the minister's speech I asked him how long ago the co-ordinating committee was set up. He did not give a direct answer; he tried to say it was set up some time ago. A co-ordinating committee was set up in Winnipeg. Winnipeg is not the problem; Vancouver is the problem. This co-ordinating committee was set up in Vancouver less than two weeks ago in order to co-ordinate and facilitate the movement of grain. This is not good enough. It should have been set up some time ago.

The minister should go to Vancouver and get the interested parties together. If the railroads are having difficulty in getting together, the minister should meet the heads of the railroad companies and find a way to facilitate the movement of grain. There should be huge trainloads of dry grain moving to Vancouver from the prairies, from southern Saskatchewan and southern Alberta. There is in this part of the country a huge amount of grain that normally moves to Vancouver. If the job were handled properly, the 33 ships there could be loaded with trainload after trainload of dry grain. Then we could carry on with the program of drying damp grain. Despite the problem that we face in this regard, all we have is this business of someone saying, "What is my job?" The people who should be concerned with dealing with the problem do not know what their job is. In this situation, how can leadership be given to the department concerned with handling the problem?

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) sits on the other side of the chamber very silently and glumly, looking at the problem which he wished to handle in his department. But the Prime Minister does not place that much trust in him either. He says, "No, we cannot give him this responsibility. We will give him the dairy problem, and that's all." He might know something more about the problem, being a member from western Canada. I question his judgment too, but I urge the Prime Minister to give him a chance and place the Wheat Board under his control. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang) might even do a better job. Surely if these ministers recognized what their jobs were, they would have enough ability to handle them.

The Prime Minister is not doing his job by ignoring a problem that is so vital to a major part of the economic life of western Canada. He has put the problem in the hands of one who is a very amiable, nice person but who knows absolutely nothing about the problem he is supposed to handle. Surely the Prime Minister cannot say that he is doing his job when he allows this situation to continue.

I urge the Prime Minister, who is sitting in the house listening to this debate, to reconsider the make-up of his cabinet. The minister concerned could carry on as minister of trade and commerce, but the Wheat Board should be placed within the responsibility of someone who is more capable, at least on the surface, of looking after these matters.

For the past year we have had the problem of damp grain. There has been no action in this respect. There has been a ball-up of our transportation facilities. Now, there is a ball-up at Vancouver Harbour where 33 ships are waiting to load grain. Many of these ships are paying demurrage charges. These charges, amounting to $25 a day, are coming out of the farmers' pockets. The demurrage charges for one shipowner have amounted to $32,000. You cannot say this is efficient handling of the problem in this day and age when efficiency is the guide to what we do.

An hon. Member: But not brevity.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, someone talks about brevity. My constituents sent me and other western members to Ottawa to act on their behalf. We came here to urge and drive the government to do those things which are necessary. We have tried to get some action from a government that is confronted with a serious problem that affects our constituencies and in fact the whole of the country. Brevity is in many cases nothing more than laziness. We cannot adopt a lazy attitude with regard to an important problem such as this.

Mr. Woolliams: Brevity is the soul of wit.

Mr. Horner: I close by saying that this problem demands more attention and action than the government has given it in the past. I hope that after this debate the government will be inspired to greater heights, for the benefit of the western Canadian farmer.

Mr. Mark Smerchanski (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, it is rather difficult to follow in the footsteps of the hon. member who has just finished making his speech, because I really wonder whether he really believes what he says. The hon. member takes the position that the present situation has a rather drastic effect upon our economy. The facts of the matter are that the movement of grain into the port of Vancouver is at the present time higher than it has been at any time in the past.

Mr. Horner: Tell the farmers that.

Mr. Smerchanski: As the minister has said, the reason the trainloads of grain are unable to be unloaded is the very severe winter conditions in Vancouver. These winter conditions have been the worst in 20 years.

An hon. Member: In Edmonton.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Horner: You said Vancouver; someone said Edmonton.

Mr. Smerchanski: After I have had my say, you can speak. I am not going to blow as hard as you, but I will blow on the facts. Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is that there are trainloads of wheat backed up into the sidings at Revelstoke, British Columbia, and a good percentage of the western Alberta towns. The reason is that in the movement of wet and damp grain there is a freezing problem and the unloading capacity at the terminal is reduced to approximately 20 per cent of the normal.

Mr. McIntosh: Is this something new?

Mr. Smerchanski: The reason is the unfortunate weather conditions in western Canada last fall. This was an act of God and is not the fault of any government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Smerchanski: By way of clarification for those hon. members who have sat in this house for many years, the Canadian government does not sell grain and I do not think any politician should interpret it in any other way.

• (10:00 p.m.)

I would like to quote from an article entitled "The Function of the Wheat Board" which was prepared by Mr. R. C. Brown of the United Grain Growers of Winnipeg and presented to a seminar in Brandon, Manitoba, dated December 13, 1968. The Wheat Board—and this is rather interesting—has been incorporated with the object of marketing in an orderly manner for inter provincial and export trade grain grown in Canada. It possesses the following powers. It has the right to buy, take delivery of, store, transfer, sell ship or otherwise dispose of grain. Under the same powers that it has vested in it it has the right to enter into contracts or agreements for the purchase, sale, handling, storage, transportation, disposition or insurance of grain.

I am a newcomer to the House of Commons but I am from western Canada. When I listened to the many statements from the Opposition that it is the responsibility of the government to sell wheat rather than that of the Canadian Wheat Board, I could not agree for this is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Horner: You are splitting hairs.

Mr. Smerchanski: These are the hairs that lost you the election on June 25. When the Opposition takes the position that their former minister of agriculture sold the grain and that their former administrators were able, by personal effort, to go out to China and Russia and make these sales on a personal basis, that also is not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Horner: Who put up the money?

Mr. Smerchanski: The Opposition makes no mention of what is going on in Prince Rupert on the Pacific coast. They might be interested to know that there is a certain amount of grain moved through this port.

Mr. Horner: They only have 700,000 bushels.

Mr. Smerchanski: So the facts of the matter are that in spite of the cold weather and of the congestion in the terminal at the port of Vancouver we are now moving approximately 350 cars per day as against about 650 that we should be moving.

An hon. Member: Hallelujah.

Mr. Smerchanski: Every effort is being made to move as much grain as possible and the facts that the United States ports are strikebound, that a good percentage of the ships are lying idle in our Canadian ports and that the weather is cold, are matters also to be considered. I appreciate what the hon. member for Yellowfoot says—

An hon. Member: You have the "foot" right.

Mr. Horner: You were half right; that is pretty good.

Mr. Smerchanski: Some members of the Opposition are telling us that it is also important to fill the grain terminals at the lakehead. Either the opposition is interested in the movement of western grain to the port of Vancouver or they are simply spinning their wheels, and the question arises: What does the present terminal at the lakehead have to do with the movement of grain to the port of Vancouver?

I appreciate the remarks coming from the area of gloom and doom, but they make about as much sense as did the premier of Manitoba some seven days ago when he sent his minister of agriculture to Vancouver to personally look into the reason grain is not moving through the port of Vancouver. This was only done because there are four by-elections taking place in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. McIntosh: Name them, starting with Churchill.

Mr. Smerchanski: The co-operation of all these people working on the railroads and in the terminals is very commendable. They are working on a 24 hour a day basis, seven days a week. As the minister has indicated, the least we can do is to give them our support and appreciation of the excellent work they are doing under very trying conditions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smerchanski: The next thing we should do is to consider what can be done to help to move the maximum amount of cargo through the port of Vancouver. Consideration must also be given to the fact that our sales of sulphur have tripled, our sales of gypsum have also tripled and shipments of copper concentrates have tripled and quadrupled from the port of Vancouver. This port is under a severe strain due to congestion which makes it difficult to handle the shipments of grain efficiently. Once Roberts Bank is completed, I think this problem will be solved. Again, I wish to commend the government for having had the foresight to plan for the future by providing better port facilities on the west coast.

I believe what the Opposition has said can be called nonsense and garbage. I agree with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) when he said that the verbs and adjectives of paralysis and catastrophe have no place in trying to commend the excellent work that is being done under very trying conditions of cold weather, the congestion at the port of Vancouver and the fact that a good percentage of the U.S. ports are on strike. I believe that these people should be commended for the excellent work they are doing. I give the Opposition credit for the fact they do not mean to be so critical. I am sure they would like to modify some of the expressions they have used, and they would certainly do so if they were fully aware of the difficulties connected with the movement of grain through the port of Vancouver.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I assure you that I have been most intrigued during the past few minutes to listen to the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Smerchanski) in Manitoba speaking as an expert on the grain handling situation in Vancouver. May I say with all respect that he might have better examined the facts of the situation in Vancouver before having the unmitigated gall and effrontery to stand here tonight to speak as an expert on the situation in Vancouver.

May I remind the hon. member and the house that I am not a farmer. I am not a wheat grower. But I represent the constituency of Vancouver East, and with the exception of two elevators on the north side of the inner harbour, all the wheat elevators in Vancouver are in Vancouver East, from the Boundary Road to Main. And therefore—

An hon. Member: You should do your homework.

Mr. Winch: Oh, boy! Am I glad you said I should do my homework. When that motion was accepted this afternoon, meaning that tonight at eight o'clock this subject which is of such concern to the wheat farmers of Canada would be discussed, what did I do?

An hon. Member: Your homework.

Mr. Winch: I spent over an hour on the telephone getting in touch with the Vancouver harbour board and the grain commissioners to learn the up to date situation at Vancouver Harbour. The result is that I can speak tonight on the basis of information given me by the Vancouver Harbour Board and the grain commissioners in Vancouver as to the situation in Vancouver at 5.15 Ottawa time, 2.15 Vancouver time.

The hon. member said I should do my homework. It is obvious that I did it. What is the information given me at 5.15 Ottawa time by the Vancouver Harbour Board and the grain commissioners in the Port of Vancouver? I will tell hon. members what the information is.

An hon. Member: We are waiting.

Mr. Winch: May I say, also, that with all the wonderful arguments and points that Conservative members are making on this issue I am sorry that some of the members on the government side have not done their homework, too.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Winch: In other words, some of the information which was given us is not correct. Now, for the situation at 5.15 Ottawa time.

Mr. Woolliams: Synchronize your watches, boys, we're going over the top.

Mr. Winch: This is a serious question. Please tackle it that way. This is not a time to be cynical, sarcastic or facetious. Please keep this in mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: In Vancouver today there were 26 ships at anchor in the inner and outer harbours, that means in the inner harbour at Vancouver and in English Bay. Please note that of those 26 ships at anchor, 19, according to the Vancouver Harbour Board, were awaiting grain.

Mr. Woolliams: Good gracious. How can the minister sit there.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I can understand why you are in such trouble when members on the government side think this is a laughable matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: Of the 19 ships awaiting grain in Vancouver this afternoon, 15 were waiting for No. 2 northern.

What about the elevator shipping berths? At 5.15 Ottawa time this afternoon, seven ships were loading wheat and four grain loading berths were unoccupied. Why were four grain berths unoccupied when there were 15 ships waiting for wheat? Fifteen of the 19 ships at anchor were waiting for wheat, and four of our loading berths in Vancouver were unoccupied.

May I refer again to the fact that 15 of the 19 ships at anchor awaiting grain were waiting for No. 2 northern. Let me follow this up with further information which I got from Vancouver this afternoon. There are 10 million bushels loaded and on the way to Vancouver in 2,500 box cars. But of those 10 million bushels of wheat only 5½ million bushels consist of No. 2 northern. As for the ships, some of which have been lying at Vancouver since early December, 15 out of 19 of them are waiting for No. 2 northern. Surely, this raises the question: why have the sale, transportation and port facilities not been better co-ordinated?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: May I also say, from the information I got by doing my homework, from the authorities themselves, that there are three other points I wish to mention, because I wish to be honest about all these things.

• (10:20 p.m.)

I wrote the words down as they were given to me over the phone. I was given to understand that some transportation problems developed owing to weather conditions on the prairies, and in particular owing to ice and snow conditions in the mountains, necessitating freight train limitation. I was also advised that the grain elevators in Vancouver are processing the grain as rapidly and as expeditiously as possible.

I should like to draw your attention to the third point that I was given from Vancouver this afternoon. I was further advised that an additional reason for the problem which has developed is that the type of grain sold, and to a great extent moved, was not the type for which the ships awaited the opportunity to load.

To me, there is a most important point. It indicates a lack of co-ordination in regard to the type of grain sold, the time when ships to transport the type of grain sold would arrive, and the transportation required to move the type of grain to the ships.

These are facts, not fiction, and they demonstrate that there has been a complete breakdown between production, transportation, shipment and sales. The responsibility for this breakdown can rest only upon this government and the preceding government, because they have been in power for the last six years.

The final word I received this afternoon—because I have been doing my homework—was that this matter cannot be resolved in one day or one week, or by this house sitting for as long as it wants. This is the cumulative result of years of neglect and lack of planning, of lack of co-ordination, control and responsibility.

The ships are in Vancouver. The elevators are operating. There are ten million bushels on the way. Yet out of seven grain loading berths in Vancouver, four were unoccupied by grain carriers this afternoon because the right grain was not in the right place at the right time.

Responsibility for having the right grain in the right place at the right time is directly that of the government or its agencies. We therefore have no choice but to place responsibility for this lack of planning on the government or its agencies. I am afraid that I may be becoming a little repetitious, so may I conclude by saying that this present predicament cannot be solved in one day. On behalf of the Canadian wheat growers, our transportation and shipping industries, and in order to rebuild the good name of Canada in its relations with other countries in view of our failure to meet our commitments as a result of the lack of proper planning, I submit that tonight we have the right to discuss this question and to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) and our Harbour Commissioners to please do something constructive soon.

[Mr. Winch.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in looking over the motion before the House of Commons tonight I think in fairness that it can be said that so long as I have been here there has never been a motion before the house containing so many inaccuracies. However, I want to deal with one or two other points before getting to that particular matter.

The hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) accused me of sitting in silence. He also used some other words to describe the activities of the Minister of Agriculture so far as the grain industry is concerned. I have been called a lot of things during the last few years that I have been in this house, but this is the first time I have ever been accused of remaining silent. I am usually something quite different from silent. For the hon. member's information, if he attempts to interpret my sitting listening to him, which is part of the procedure of the house, and remaining silent as in any way, shape or form acquiescence with what he has said, then I want to dispel that thought completely at this point.

He had some things to say which, in my opinion, were excessively critical of the minister in this house who is responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. He is welcome to his opinion, and under the rules of the house he can express his opinion, unfair though it may be.

Mr. Horner: In your opinion.

Mr. Olson: In my opinion, and perhaps my opinion is worth at least as much as the opinion of the hon. member. It seems to me that the kind of criticism that the hon. member has attempted to lay on the shoulders of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) is in fact criticism of the activities of the Canadian Wheat Board. If he is moving or supporting a motion of want of confidence in the Canadian Wheat Board—because they have responsibility for all of the activities he criticized—then I think, first of all, he ought to have the good sense, and secondly the courage, to say so. That is what he implied. I think it is the responsibility of the minister who answers to this house for the Wheat Board to support the board in actions it deems appropriate. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has indicated he supported the board throughout the trying times we have faced. It is fair to say that never before has a government been as helpful to the board as this government, has been in these adverse conditions.

• (10:30 p.m.)

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce mentioned steps which have been taken to ameliorate the situation, and I will not repeat them. He spoke about doubling cash advances, providing for additional money to be used for drying—

Mr. Horner: Increasing interest rates.

Mr. Olson: —allowing for tax relief on stationary grain dryers and changes in the income tax regulations to allow for accelerated depreciation of certain equipment. In addition, the government made provision for the waiving of certain sections of the labour code to permit existing drying facilities to be used to full advantage. Never before in Canadian history has a government taken so many steps in so short a period in order to be helpful to its farmers. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was instrumental in having the government take these steps and he ought to be applauded.

Mr. Horner: He was instrumental in not having grain moved fast enough.

Mr. Olson: Well, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said that 23 per cent more grain was loaded on board ships in the port of Vancouver at the end of this year than in the corresponding period last year. That performance is not perfect, but we are improving. Some of our problems stem from the fact that there has been an unanticipated increase in sales.

Mr. Horner: No.

Mr. Olson: The hon. member says, no. I suppose none are so deaf as those who will not hear.

In supporting this motion it seems to me hon. members of the opposition are seeking partisan political advantage and headlines, which will do much damage to our grain industry. Hon. members of the opposition not long ago spoke about harvesting conditions in western Canada and said that much grain in western Canada will never be harvested. What happened? Well, over 95 per cent of the grain was harvested. I do not say it was harvested in ideal weather conditions, but nevertheless it was harvested. All the noise hon. members of the opposition made that Canada would have insufficient grain to sell, and so on, reached the ears of our overseas customers and much damage was done. We had to do a great deal of work to repair that damage for which hon. members of the opposition were responsible.

The motion says:

I ask leave . . . to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the virtual bottleneck and paralysis—

Mr. Horner: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Agriculture knows that under the rules he may not impute motives to any hon. member or to any party in this house. In his diatribe against the opposition the minister has suggested we are seeking newspaper headlines.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Horner: He imputed improper motives to us. If he denies imputing those motives, fine and dandy. I submit he cannot deny them because an examination of Hansard will reveal exactly what he said. I think the minister ought to withdraw certain of his remarks.

Mr. Olson: I do not withdraw anything I have said, because I have as much right to establish a point as have hon. members on the other side of the chamber. The motion continues:

—in wheat movement in Vancouver Harbour—

Well, Mr. Speaker last week 380 cars, on an average, were unloaded in Vancouver every day, despite weather conditions which I admit were not favourable. In the summer, under ideal conditions, 650 cars per day may be unloaded. That figure has never been reached in wintertime.

Mr. Horner: It has.

Mr. Olson: It has not. The motion goes on to say:

—due to the failure of the government to work with the railways in scheduling box cars—

I listened to speeches from the opposition side and I have yet to hear one constructive criticism. Hon. members said, "There was not enough co-operation, not enough planning" and so on. They did not say where planning had broken down.

Mr. Woolliams: The government broke down.

Mr. Olson: Hon. members opposite obviously do not know that climatic conditions on the western prairies during the whole of 1966 were the most trying that western farmers have ever faced. That is a fact.

Mr. Woolliams: That is not a fact.

Mr. Olson: Despite that the farmers were able to harvest 95 per cent of their grain, notwithstanding difficult harvesting conditions. Grain has been moved from the field and is now in granaries. We doubled cash advances and made helpful and useful changes, even to the extent of putting a supplementary quota of three bushels per acre on damp grain.

Mr. Woolliams: He is beginning to sound like Jack Pickersgill.

Mr. Olson: That might not be so bad. He had a successful career. The motion goes on to say that we lost a 17,000 ton contract. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce proved that is not so. So far nothing in this motion reflects correct facts. It goes on to say that:

—which has brought about stagnation in the movement of wheat at a critical time—

The government is trying to help the Wheat Board. They are trying to sell more grain and contact more customers. The headlines across the country may be that there is not enough grain in Canada to meet commitments. That does not happen to be true.

• (10:40 p.m.)

Mr. Horner: Talk to the ship owners; talk to the farmers.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Olson: So much for that, Mr. Speaker. It is a fact that there is a shortage of No. 2 Northern to meet the increased amounts sold for delivery out of the west coast, and particularly out of the port of Vancouver, but I am pleased to advise the house tonight—because the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce did not have enought time to do it—that there are over 3 million bushels of No. 2 dry Northern, already graded up to export qualifications, in the terminal elevator at Moose Jaw, and I have before me—

Mr. MacInnis: Order them to get it moving.

[Mr. Olson.]

Mr. Olson: If I had enough time, Mr. Speaker, I could explain in detail why that grain has not been moved previously. I believe the Canadian Wheat Board and the Minister acted properly when they tried to get that grain out of country elevators, because there was quite a bit of No. 2 there, and they did this so that the farmers could haul in more to the country elevators. What's more, if the severe weather conditions prevailing on the prairies, and indeed at the coast, had not come about then of course we would never have had many of these problems.

Hon. gentlemen from the prairies ought to know about this. They know what happens so far as railway trains are concerned when the temperature drops to 30 or 40 below. Efficiency goes down to about 25 per cent.

Mr. Trudeau: They have forgotten, sitting here in Ottawa.

Mr. Olson: It is a fact that there are several million bushels of grain in the terminals, particularly at Moose Jaw, and I wish to advise the house that the C.P.R. issued a press release tonight, part of which I would like to read.

Mr. Horner: We know about it. They got their orders at four o'clock.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Olson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The release reads:

CP rail is marshaling diesel locomotives and box cars to load and move special trainloads of dry No. 2 Northern from the prairies to the Pacific coast, it was announced tonight.

Mr. Horner: Because of good work on the opposition side of the house.

Mr. Olson:

The first grain train will go into service later tonight at the request of the Canadian Wheat Board to assist in placing grain in position at the Pacific coast for export. "At the present time we have 3,787 box cars loaded with 7,500,000 bushels of grain at Vancouver or en route from the prairies—

"So far during the current crop year, CP rail has moved about 49,000,000 bushels of grain to the west coast for export, an increase of 31 per cent over grain shipments in the comparable period of the previous crop year."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: I have only a few minutes left, Mr. Speaker, but I wish to say that I think these cries of everything going to wrack and ruin, and the wording in this motion, are not a service to the Canadian grain producers or to Canada generally. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that the great problem that we have, and it is a great problem, in meeting all of these commitments is the adverse weather conditions. Anyone who wants to be even reasonably fair knows that that is true. It is a fact that in the cold weather train loads of grain that have to be pulled over the Rocky Mountains have to be reduced not only by half but substantially less than half so that there is enough power to pull them over the hill.

An hon. Member: That is not a new problem.

Mr. Olson: That is not a new problem but I wish hon. gentlemen opposite would hear me out. I sat here very quietly when they were speaking. In fact I was accused of being silent. The fact of the matter was that when we had these increased sales for December and January delivery coming at the same time as these very severe low temperatures, it was not possible for the Canadian Wheat Board, or indeed for the railways or anybody else, to schedule according to what is normal because this weather was not normal.

I am told that if the present cold weather stays in Edmonton for three more days it will break all records in the recorded weather history of western Canada for the longest period at the lowest temperatures. Now, Mr. Speaker, if that is the kind of criticism hon. gentlemen opposite want to level at the government and the transportation companies, that they should do something about this—well, that seems to be what they are arguing.

Instead of this kind of unjustifiable criticism, certainly the Canadian Wheat Board, the staff, the transportation industry and other sectors of the grain industry vitally involved in this whole thing should be urged to more efforts but they should also be commended for having made the best of a difficult situation under very adverse conditions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Olson: I could deal with many of the other details that have been raised in the arguments offered but there is not much time left to me, Mr. Speaker, and a lot of this detail has been gone over a number of times during the question periods. I would hope that taking into account the economic well being of the grain farmers and of the other people in the grain industry, for this year and indeed for the future, we could have a somewhat higher degree of co-operation in trying to find solutions rather than what we have had thus far which is really nothing much more than severe, unjustified, unwarranted criticism.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Winch: Would the minister allow a question?

Mr. Olson: Yes, certainly.

Mr. Winch: In view of the minister's concluding remarks that the pile up was because of weather and, shall I say, an act of God will the minister please explain why, with all the wheat in the assembly yards in Vancouver and en route, four of our shipping berths are not being used because the right kind of grain is not in the right place at the right time?

Mr. Olson: Mr. Speaker, I hope I have enough time left to answer that question. I suggest that if the hon. member had done a little more homework he could have found out about that too. The answer is as follows: with the many grades and indeed the number of carloads of damp grain that are in the marshalling yards it is almost a switching nightmare to get the No. 2 dry grain out of there and into the elevators so that it can be loaded. That is part of it. The other part of the story is as the hon. member pointed out, that only about half of the grain in the marshalling yards and enroute to Vancouver was No. 2. I do not have the precise figures in front of me but I think that a very small percentage, less than 50 per cent of it, a minor percentage, is No. 2. Therefore, to keep the pipe line open it is necessary to do a very complex job of switching in those yards so that they can get the carloads of No. 2 switched out to the right terminal where ships are loading No. 2.

The hon. member also knows that the weather conditions in the port have not been normal. They have been severe and this adds to the difficulties of the men working in the yards, on the unloading chutes and all through the whole operation. The adverse weather conditions affected the total output. So, Mr. Speaker, it is not a question of someone standing around and not doing a good job, whether it be the workers in the marshalling yards or at the terminal elevators along the way. It is that they have been working under very severe weather conditions all the way from the prairies right to the port.

Mr. R. R. Southam (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I believe I would be derelict in my duty as a representative of a rural area of western Canada if I did not take a few minutes to take part in this very important debate this evening. In spite of the criticism we have heard from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) about my colleague the hon. member for Mackenzie's (Mr. Korchinski) motion I wish to congratulate him for introducing this very important matter before the house at this time.

Last year on November 28 I had the privilege of moving a motion to adjourn the house in order to debate a matter of a national emergency concerning the serious situation that was taking place on the prairies at that time. I can recall, as can the minister and others opposite, that there were no less than 12 members from western Canada supporting me in the house at that time. I believe the defence of the government at that time was pitiful. Now, two months later we are still faced with this serious situation in Western Canada. I deplore the minister trying to defend himself and members of his government by criticizing us for bringing this situation to the attention of the house.

The world knows that in Canada we produce the best quality of wheat. It is because of this that we want to maintain our position in world markets. Despite the Minister of Agriculture saying that we should not be raising this issue there are headlines in every newspaper which one picks up such as, "Grain-drying problem worsening", "Wheat markets facing threat", "Farmers must dry grain at home", and so on. This goes on day after day. These statements come from responsible members of the news media right across Canada. Why should we in this house not defend the interests of the farmers whom we represent.

Although I must admit our congenial Minister of Industry, and Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) tried to mesmerize us somewhat with his very congenial delivery here in the house tonight, he attempted to minimize the situation. He mentioned there was only twice as much wet grain this year as in previous years, when the fact of the matter is there is three times as much.

[Mr. Olson.]

Last November 27 Mr. McNamara, the head of the Canadian Wheat Board, pointed out that the largest amount of damp wheat we ever had was something like 120 million bushels. This year we have 380 million bushels of wet wheat in western Canada and in addition have several hundred million bushels of wheat, coarse grain. This emphasizes the seriousness of the situation. On November 28 I tried to impress the government with the idea that they should get the wet grain to the terminals and this would mean that they would have to get the dry grain moving quickly. As we know, the St. Lawrence Seaway is closed in the winter and our greatest terminals are at Fort William and Port Arthur. At these terminals only approximately 8 million bushels of grain can be dried per month. We should have moved as much as possible to those facilities and left the pipeline to the west coast open. But the government, because of its inexperience or for some reason, took it upon themselves to open up a three bushel quota for wet grain and more or less lull the farmers into an artificial state of complacency by making them think this would solve the problem. Then they immediately plugged up the western pipeline so that when customers placed orders for dry wheat we could not meet the situation.

I have had a good deal of experience in respect of this situation, although I did not do as much homework as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). It so happens that a few weeks ago I was at the port of Vancouver. I saw there a large number of boats waiting to load grain. At that time, as has been pointed out, there were something like 25 or 26 boats. A number of berths were not being utilized for the simple reason that we did not have the right type of grain to service the boats that were waiting.

As has been pointed out there is the very serious situation in respect of the Wheat Board having to foot the demurrage bill. I hate to think of what the situation will be if Canadian farmers find they have to help to defray the demurrage payments. Members on this side of the house have continued to prod, pound and even hound the government into taking positive action to meet the catastrophic situation which faces western agriculture. There are chiefly three problems. The first is the inefficiency of this government through lack of experience and indifference. The second is the greatest pile-up of damp grain in Canadian history. Then, thirdly, there is the lack of wheat markets which has allowed the pile-up of dry grain in all the storage facilities we have such as in farmers bins, country elevators and terminal elevators.

I say that this problem has been aggravated because of the fact the government did not take cognizance of a situation in which the farmers are up against one of the worst economic difficulties faced in Canadian history. They have a huge carry-over of grain from the year before. They have a huge pile of wet grain and do not have the money to finance the drying of it. The minister criticized us because we have not made constructive suggestions. I criticize the government for not doing one of the things they should have done. They should have created initiative on the part of the farmer to help himself. I suggested that acreage payments might be provided in an amount up to $400 to each farmer. I believe that in times of emergency it is necessary to subsidize a major industry like agriculture. It is well known that the export of agricultural products in this country represent the second largest source of income which the country has. The wood pulp industry accounts for the largest, but agricultural production is the second.

Agriculture is a most important factor in the economic life of Canada. If the agricultural industry is allowed to go down the drain, which this government apparently is willing to allow it to do, we will feel the general effect not only in the agricultural industry in western Canada but right across this great nation. I feel that if the government had taken seriously our suggestion of several months ago and had provided an incentive to each farmer to help him pay the cost of moving drying equipment into position, this would have made a great deal of difference. In the most recent survey we found that there are about 3,200 pieces of drying equipment in western Canada and that only 900 are being used. The reason is that the farmers have not been able to foot the bill for the cost of moving these dryers into position. They do not wish to send good money after bad because with the loss of markets they are afraid that they might not be able to pull themselves out of the hole. They believe their industry is so important the government should be showing some initiative in recognizing this fact by assisting them in getting these dryers into position.

I suggested last fall that the government should have co-operated with the provincial governments to provide freight assistance to move these dryers into position. This should have been done on a 50-50 basis. I was pleased to note that the Saskatchewan Government Power Corporation is going to contribute free gas connections to farmers who have gas dryers installed to help them dry the grain. This is a case of a crown corporation taking the initiative from the federal government which has the basic responsibility for this problem. This is an example of a provincial government understanding an emergency in western Canada and doing something, but it is still not enough. This is an area in which the federal government should have moved long ago.

Back in 1961 we experienced the worst drought in the agricultural industry. We provided subsidy payments in co-operation with the provincial governments to move haying equipment into position in order to provide forage for our livestock. In the case we are now considering, we should be moving equipment to dry the grain.

Other hon. members from western Canada have made suggestions, and the minister has mentioned several things that have been done. These have been appreciated, but they have not been sufficient. We are still faced with the problem. I do not see why the government should excuse itself by saying it has done everything that can be done. There are many other things that could and should be done. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Smerchanski) presented the most ridiculous argument I have ever heard when he tried to get the government off the hook by suggesting this is a wheat board responsibility. This is like suggesting that when you hire a man to do a job you should not have to tell him what to do or how to do it. After all, if you are going to hire somebody to do a job, as we have hired the wheat board, you should give some direction. I am sure the wheat board officials would appreciate some direction from the government.

This government has recently begun to give the wheat board some instructions, but only after the emergency has become apparent. I do not want to belabour the situation, but I have had the opportunity of discussing this matter at some length in recent weeks and I want to emphasize the seriousness of this situation. We, as hon. members of the opposition want to make every effort to come up with some solution to solve this major emergency facing the Canadian grain and agricultural industry in Canada.

Grain

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say at the outset that if there has been any damage done as a result of this debate it is the result of the government's inability to cope with the overall problem which was brought to its attention many months ago. I was surprised that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) decided to stand up in this house and suggest that other countries are being scared off our market, because surely he knows that is absolutely wrong. He is doing nothing but trying to get off the hook.

In November of last year during the transport committee hearings the following question was asked of the president of the Canadian Transport Commission:

> What responsibility does the Canadian Transport Commission assume in so far as distribution of box cars is concerned?

I suggest that behind this whole problem lies the distribution of box cars.

The president of the Canadian Transport Commission replied:

> I understand that if there are complaints that Canadian box cars are being hoarded by American railroads, or if there are arguments to the effect, as there sometimes have been, that American cars are unduly delayed here in Canada, this is something that the railway transport committee certainly looks into. In fact, they are looking into this very question at the moment.

That was November 28. As late as January 17, I posed a question in the house to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) concerning the number of box cars that are now across the line and whether there was an equitable distribution of them. The minister's reply was:

> There are a considerable number, Mr. Speaker. I think this will be reflected in an answer to a written question which will be tabled next week.

The president of the Canadian Transport Commission was asked that question on November 28, and there is no justification for the minister to say on January 17 that some time the following week we would find out how many cars had been left in the open. We do not know whether they are across the border or on some other service of the Canadian railways.

At the committee hearing on November 28 we asked about the distribution of cars. The president of the Canadian Transport Commission said they were concerned about the problem and were looking into the distribution of box cars in Canada. He said they did not necessarily look at the distribution unless they were directed to do so, because really the Canadian Wheat Board and the railways co-operated to this extent.

My colleague the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) then asked whether the Commission had the authority to order the movement of box cars to a particular location in Canada. Mr. Pickersgill said that was a nice question. That is as far as we got in trying to find out where box cars are located. If one looks at the delivery points across western Canada it is quite apparent that there is a surplus of No. 1 Northern at many of the elevators. I am sure the ministers concerned are quite aware of this. No. 2 Northern is in short supply in many areas at this time.

I realize this indicates a very serious situation, but many of the people are wondering whether some of our customers will not accept No. 1 Northern in order to move it out of the elevators. They wonder whether consideration cannot be given to moving this wheat instead of No. 2 Northern. Some of the elevator agents have been trying to mix No. 1 Northern with No. 3 Northern in order to come up with what they thought would meet the requirements but because of the mildew they ended up with No. 3 Northern. This did not meet the requirements of our customers, but indicates the degree of co-operation on the part of those concerned with the problem in trying to come up with a suitable solution.

Another problem concerns the movement of cars generally and exactly where we stand in this regard. Both ministers have indicated at some length that everyone concerned is co-operating to the fullest in this respect. I suggest that in Vancouver at this time there is no hold-up in the port or the elevators. The hold-up results from the fact there is no movement of wheat from the prairies. We know that Canadian Pacific is handling at this moment from 175 to 200 box cars. Normally they can handle 300 or more cars, As has been indicated by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), the two railways combined can handle more than 600 box cars.

The news from Vancouver this morning was that the elevators can handle all the dry wheat that can be moved. The minister suggested that the situation in Vancouver is one of the important factors as far as the movement of grain is concerned. I believe he is a little out of touch with exactly what is happening. We know there is absolutely no indication that the railroads have any problem with regard to Vancouver. I refer to putting No. 2 Northern into position for shipment. Extra crews are working in the yards, and I am sure the railroads can look after the situation.

I was quite amazed, to say the least, when the Minister of Agriculture made his great announcement about the Canadian Pacific news release concerning what they are about to do. Hon. members know what happened at about 2.30 this afternoon. The few remaining Liberal members in the chamber indicates that there is not very much concern on that side of the house. I suggest that they consider the time when this question was raised today. At about 2.30 this afternoon the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) moved his motion, which was accepted by Mr. Speaker. At four o'clock instructions were issued from Winnipeg to the railway terminal at Moose Jaw telling them exactly what to do.

We knew there were 190 cars of No. 2 northern in that yard waiting to be moved. We also knew after four o'clock that a train was ordered for the west with a 70 car drag. We also know that orders were issued that all the No. 2 northern grain must be moved as soon as possible, and it was exactly four o'clock this afternoon when the message was received at the terminal. After the action was taken in the house, we knew wires would go out to that terminal and no doubt to many other terminals across the country. I suggest this indicates that it takes the action of the Opposition to move this government off its fat back. This is another example of what can be done if there is an indication from the government of their sincerity to do something for the economy of the country. A notice is sent from Winnipeg that additional units are to be put on to carry the grain west. Workers in the terminal were called on to work time and a half oiling box cars and getting them out.

I happen to have worked for some years on the railroad for an excellent company. They will co-operate if they have the co-operation of the government, but often they find that they load these cars with grain and they are then left in a siding. There is no justification for the government allowing this situation to exist this long without getting the railway companies involved directly. I am sure that if you look at the figures, you will find the railroads are willing to co-operate if there is some indication from the government and from various departments that they want to do something about the problem.

With regard to what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) said about these trains only hauling 30 cars in comparison to double that amount, in good weather, we must realize the reference is probably to a one unit operation. After the decision taken in the House, no doubt the Canadian Pacific, and the C.N.R., will move these trains efficiently and quickly to the port of destination.

I suggest that the operation could probably have been much more efficient if there were not as many mishaps and derailments. I believe this is something with which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) is morally obligated to deal before the week is out. There is an indication that there is an overall increase in these mishaps, which naturally delay the movement of grain. I can assure the house that there is a great delay in this regard.

I would like to conclude, since I know other hon. members wish to speak and we do not want to drag the debate out past 3 a.m. However, I suggest that in my opinion the government is trying to lay the blame on the Opposition. I suggest that the amount of time the ministers of this government have taken trying to cram through the house an unnecessary increase in interest rates could have been well used in co-ordinating the movement of grain, the need for which they could have anticipated.

Another thing which I would like to respectfully suggest is that the government has spent a considerable amount of time trying to set up the national grains council. I assure you that although we do not oppose the national grains council, the time taken up by those people could have been used to better advantage. I respectfully suggest also that it could well be when the top echelons of our civil servants in the various departments connected with this critical issue were compelled or requested to take the language course this then directly created a lack of coordination within the departments. It is my considered opinion that too many of our top civil servants have had to go to these courses at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I suggest the hon. member return to the issue before us.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): He is on it.

Mr. Skoberg: With great respect I suggest that what I said with regard to these courses was relevant inasmuch as these courses were partly responsible for the lack of co-ordination which gave rise to the situation we are discussing. I believe every member of the house is sincerely interested in co-operating with the government to the fullest extent, provided the government, in turn, is prepared to reciprocate. It is farcical for the minister to suggest that we were opposed to the Canadian Wheat Board, as he must know. Not one member has ever criticized the Wheat Board as such, and we believe the Wheat Board should be given the fullest support in its endeavours. But in order to do its job properly, the board must have the support of the ministers with whom it works, and I suggest it does not have this backing.

As to sales, I am sure that if there had been unexpected sales the government would have used the occasion to make headlines across the nation. The only sale they did announce—and the announcement was made with a great fanfare—turned out to be a continuation of an arrangement already made. I am sure we would have heard about it by now if there were really big new sales in the offing.

I cannot agree that the action of the opposition has had anything to do with sales overseas at any time. The markets are there for the getting, and if we make a concerted effort and co-ordinate all the departments involved, I can assure the minister sales will be forthcoming. At present there are too many departments which are reluctant to interfere with each other. If they would get together, something could be done.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): In rising to participate in this debate I shall probably not be as colourful or as carefree or as charismatic as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), nor do I wish to be, nor shall I try to be. I feel the subject before us is of utmost seriousness.

I welcome, as do all hon. members, particularly those from the prairies, the announcement by the minister that some 3½ million bushels of No. 2 northern wheat are being moved from the terminal at Moose Jaw. I would say this is another victory for the opposition, thank to the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski). I am sure he can be considered as a very good friend of the western Canadian farmer.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

From the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), one might conclude that the present prairie grain situation is bright. It would appear it has improved vastly in the past eight hours. Seriously, there can be no doubt that Canada's grain industry is in serious difficulty, despite what the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) have said.

Indeed, the situation is such as to constitute a grave national emergency. A production, distribution and marketing system that was once a model for others and constituted the backbone of this country's economic well-being is today paralysed and impotent. Ships waiting to load Canadian wheat for foreign buyers lie idle on the Pacific coast. Railway arteries are clogged with the wrong grain in the wrong place and at the wrong time. Farmers on the prairies are sunk in debt under huge piles of dry grain that cannot be moved and damp grain that cannot be exported.

What has happened to this system that in happier days sold and shipped countless millions of bushels of grain without serious interruption and to the satisfaction of producer and customer? I believe that the basic cause of today's disaster lies in the refusal of a series of Liberal governments to undertake the basic overhaul of grain production, marketing and distribution methods which has been urged not only by members on this side of the house but by others who are knowledgeable experts in this field.

The immediate causes of the situation that could kill new wheat sales and jeopardize renewal of contracts with our traditional buyers are, I believe, the lack of foresight by responsible officials, the absence of government concern, government inaction over the past few critical months and, last but not least, lack of concern on the part of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). If since assuming office last summer the minister had spent some time acquainting himself first hand with the responsibility he has in regard to Canada's grain producers, who last summer were overburdened with record surpluses of grain, rather than touring South America on a ministerial junket and appearing on television, he might have come to realize the important role that our grain industry plays in this very important export trade. Perhaps then he might have realized that he had been rewarded with a very challenging and interesting job.

The Canadian Wheat Board is the minister's responsibility, and I suspect that the Wheat Board must accept a good portion of the blame for the present situation. How much more falls upon the responsible minister when the wrong grades are in the wrong place at the wrong time, as the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) stated. I submit, Mr. Speaker, this is not an act of God. While the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) has no direct say in these matters, it is still reasonable that we should expect him as an agricultural leader and as a farmer to take a close interest in anything that works to the detriment of his own area of responsibility. In my opinion the inaction the ineptitude and the lack of knowledge of the Minister of Trade and Commerce have worked to the detriment of our western wheat producers.

When I spoke about foresight and the lack of it, I had reference to the fact that the problems of fulfilling commitments for dry grain and handling vast amounts of damp and tough grain, the result of last year's inclement weather and terrible harvesting season, must have been apparent to the experienced officials of the Canadian Wheat Board. They must have experienced this situation some months ago. Not only that, the government of this country was cross-examined many times by members of this house, and the answers we received were ludicrous.

We were referred to as "publicity seekers". One headline read: "Opposition Publicity Seekers Hurt Wheat Sales, Says Olson". We were accused of damaging our foreign markets. We were not publicity seekers. We were seriously concerned about government inaction and offered our suggestions and solutions and alternatives, watching the serious situation unfold before our very eyes. We suggested the government give assistance by making available large grain dryers, by making advance payments for grain drying, or by some form of acreage payment assistance. The Minister of Agriculture replied by saying, as reported at page 3569 of Hansard:

> —hon. members opposite are seeking publicity and it is my right to express my opinion also.

The fact that you, Mr. Speaker, saw fit to allow this emergency debate indicates the seriousness of the situation. I suggest that publicity had no effect whatever on your decision.

More than any other body in this country the Wheat Board knows how much wheat of any grade in a certain condition must be shipped from where to whom at specified times. Furthermore, it must know existing contractual commitments to foreign buyers who become more fickle and illusive every day in the existing grain market. Knowing these obligations, how can the government have planned so badly as to fill grain storage facilities with damp grain instead of with dry and marketable grain? How could the minister responsible be so casual about such a grave question and leave detailed planning to others without taking any interest in what was happening? The government had a responsibility in this general area.

As other hon. members have said, about 30 ships are waiting to be loaded in Vancouver harbour. At the same time dry grain, some of it three years old, sits on the prairies and cannot be sold because it cannot be moved. The empty ships are costing our prairies farmers about $2,500 a day each in demurrage costs.

What can one say about the Canadian wheat producer? First he was hit last summer by a strike of grain handlers at Lakehead elevators, and the government took no action until wheat shipments had been delayed to the maximum possible extent, storage facilities clogged, box cars piled up, and our customers frustrated. Next, our wheat producers were hit by dreadful weather conditions during the harvesting season that left them with a diminished crop that was damp, tough and unsaleable. They also had a formidable carryover of unsold grain from previous years.

Then the Wheat Board and the Ministers of Agriculture and Industry, Trade and Commerce said that the individual farmer was responsible for drying his own grain. Most farmers had no drying equipment and to buy it would cost money. With sales dwindling and poor quality crops our producers were faced with the dilemma of whether to invest money in dryers or await a breakthrough in the marketing of damp and tough grain. To make matters worse, western farmers were short of cash. Credit was tight. Firms drying grain commercially required guaranteed payments from farmers which farmers could not meet. Yet throughout this period, even though the government had ample time to act and ample warning of what lay ahead it did nothing to help our farmers in their extraordinary difficulties.

When government inaction and indifference were finally overcome and when the government offered to help farmers in drying their damp grain, it was too late. You just cannot dry grain in the 30 degree to 40 degree below zero temperatures we have had on the prairies. To do what they could to help the Canadian Wheat Board embargoed shipments and thus sales of dry grain and devoted all shipping resources to shipping damp grain to terminals for drying. This policy has resulted in the worst tie-up of grain storage facilities in Canada's history.

It is beyond me, Mr. Speaker, why the minister did not take a leaf from the book of previous ministers who have been responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board and name a transportation controller or, if you like, special commissioner, whose word would be final and who would have jurisdiction over the railroads, the Wheat Board and everyone else, who could break up the log jam, co-ordinate the movement of box cars with supply and demand, and generally bring order out of chaos.

The Canadian grain industry has indeed sunk into a pitiful situation under the present government. We have lost sales to traditional customers and we have failed to make sales to new customers. We are not likely to make any new sales when the trade learns of our present predicament. Why, we are in such a mess that we could not even give our wheat away. Just before Christmas, on December 23, the newspapers carried a story of how a gift of 35,000 tons of Canadian wheat for two African countries was loaded on ships but held in Canada because the two countries said they had never asked for it and would not accept it. Do you call that planning? Do you call that co-ordination? The only things the government has been able to co-ordinate are high interest rates, high taxes, and now high demurrage charges.

The present mess is damaging and pathetic. It is another chapter in the gloomy story that has been unfolding over the past several years of Liberal government. But bad as the present situation is, I believe that sincere action by the government could remedy the situation to a certain degree. But such action may only bring temporary relief. It may not correct the basic weaknesses of our outmoded system which is forced to operate in changing times and a changing environment. I believe that the system has to be overhauled, and we on this side of the house have advocated changes in the production of grain, the sale of grain by the producer, in the marketing of our produce abroad and, above all else, changes to update our distribution system.

If we do not modernize our techniques, take a fresh look at conditions and make new appraisals of existing conditions, if we do not multiply and modernize our grain handling and distribution facilities, then all emergency measures that this debate may bring about will be fruitless. They will simply postpone the evil day when Canadian wheat ceases to be a major item of export and Canadian grain production a major support of our national economy.

During the last election campaign we heard a great deal about the great things that the government was going to do. There were to be sweeping changes, new concepts, new approaches, new initiatives, a reshaping of this and a reshaping of that. After the election the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that good government is rather dull at times and is not exciting.

One of the policies that the government brought forward concerned a national grains council. We have heard nothing of it lately. Surely such a body as a national grains council would prevent a situation of this nature. Mr. Speaker, I am afraid it is the same old story, words with no action, promises without fulfilment.

I believe we require an honest endeavour by those responsible to look at the whole changed picture of the world wheat market, at Canada's place in it, and that this long careful look must be followed by action which will put us back into global competition and retain the great grain industry as a major national asset. We need action to restore some life to our western economy which is so dependent on grain markets. We need to restore the cash flow and to relieve the heavy burden of debt that has resulted from the costs of producing, harvesting, storing and drying the overabundance of grain that is on hand. We cannot afford losses of sales like the recent one to Japan of some 17,000 tons estimated to be worth some $10 million.

Whatever government action may come as a result of this debate, and I hope it is quick and effective, whatever may be done now to solve the immediate crisis can only be an emergency measure. Beyond that lies the absolute necessity for a basic re-assessment of and fundamental changes in our organization and policy. If this debate has done no more than pinpoint the need for future action it will have served its purpose well.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, we are hearing again from members of the opposition about a particular point in their present panic in respect of the immediate situation with regard to wheat. I should like to go over the history of their panic tonight and take a look at what they do, what they accomplish and how they fail so greatly to serve the people whom they ought to be serving best.

First of all I wish to draw the attention of the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) to the complete inappropriateness of his use of the word "stagnant" to describe the grain movement situation. I might point out to him that "stagnant" is defined by the dictionary as "becoming motionless, having no current, ceasing to flow".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. Is the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis) rising on a point of order?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Yes, Mr. Speaker. My point of order arises from the disagreement by the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) with the use of the word "stagnant" which is in the motion put forward by the hon. member for Mackenzie. In so doing the minister is reflecting on the decision of the Chair to allow this debate to take place. Any reflection on the wording of a motion which has been accepted by the Chair is certainly a reflection on Your Honour in occupying that position. I would ask that the minister withdraw the remark.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): The hon. member for Mackenzie used the word in circumstances which are clearly and completely inappropriate in view of the facts. I should like to point out once again that wheat exports in fact are higher this year than they were at the same time a year ago. They total 125.4 million bushels this year compared with 103.7 million bushels last year at the end of December. I wish to point out also that so far as the Vancouver situation is concerned shipments in the crop year from August 1 to December 31 from the Pacific coast totalled 56.9 million bushels compared with 33.8 million bushels in the previous year. Does this look like stagnation to the hon. member?

I point out to the hon. member that notwithstanding the answer which the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) gave to him yesterday about carloadings he repeated the same insufficient information which he had before him. From August 1 to January 17 carloadings to Vancouver totalled 44,165 cars compared with 38,211 cars in the same period in the previous year. Does this look like a slowdown or stagnation?

It is completely clear that this has been a difficult harvest year and that there were very important things to attend to in getting damp grain to the terminals. It was important that those who have responsibility in this regard, like the Wheat Board which was under severe attack by opposition members tonight, should take this question and give it serious attention. They did this with the result that drying facilities now operate on a 24 hour a day, 7 day a week basis drying grain. Let me point out to hon. members opposite the manner in which the Wheat Board has in recent days calculated the wheat which still remains to be dried, and the way in which it has drawn to the attention of the farmers specifically what they could do in the way of drying grain and what the farmers must do themselves.

I should now like to point out to members opposite the nature of the general panic over the days, weeks and years. Let me draw to their attention respectfully the damage they do to the western agricultural industry by this kind of action. This year they talked about the panic as a result of their feeling that grain was going to stay under the snow. Sometimes they panic because it rains too much, and sometimes they panic because it rains too little. They panic always, and ask the government to do something.

After these people got over the panic about the harvest they began to panic about damp grain conditions. While panicking about this they began to panic about the quota system being even. They panic about low grain sales and they panic about demurrage being payable when the Wheat Board is carrying out its proper responsibility in attempting to maximize sales. The Wheat Board must take the appropriate risk that demurrage might be payable. This is a risk the Wheat Board deems to be appropriate from time to time in order to maximize sales. The Wheat Board goes all out to make sales, but members opposite begin to panic about demurrage.

Not only does this constant attitude by members opposite upset the efforts of the Wheat Board to sell grain abroad, it does something at home. They call for government help for farmers on every occasion when something occurs, whether as a result of nature or of the economic system of grain handling, which is disadvantageous to the farmer. That leads people who hear about agricultural problems in the west to believe that western representatives are not worth listening to. When the hon. members' panic at one moment is gone, it is replaced by another panic the next moment.

I suggest to members from agricultural constituencies that there is a fundamental message which they should be preaching and getting across to members from central Canada and to the people of this area. They should be talking about the fundamental problems facing agriculture in a broad, economic way. There is a fundamental problem in relation to the fact that every group, bar a few in Canada, has power to adjust its income when it sees fit; yet the farmer has no such protection. This is a matter of a fundamental kind which members representing agricultural constituencies in the west should be concentrating their attention on. They should not panic about interest rates on farm credit loans, because that is a form of uneconomic farm subsidy which ignores the whole picture of real needs and costs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): I suggest hon. members opposite are doing a disservice to their constituents in this respect.

Mr. Horner: You people would rather subsidize the banks.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): Members opposite come into the house and say they are not attacking the Wheat Board. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is in this house tonight answering the charges they lay against the Wheat Board. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is in constant contact with the Wheat Board about all matters. I say to hon. members opposite, and particularly the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) and the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), that their remarks about the service the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is giving to the Canadian farmer are not only discourteous but are downright reprehensible.

Mr. McIntosh: You haven't heard anything yet.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): I have the honour of working closely with this minister and am able to judge far better than they the quality of his service and the manner of that service to the western farmer. Only last night the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce again met with the Wheat Board. These questions are always in his mind.

Hon. members opposite have today pointed to some of the serious difficulties with which we are faced. This is the problem. There are real, serious difficulties involved in an operation as large as this and there will be times when hindsight would be a very valuable asset. I gather that the hon. member for Crowfoot has it. He suggests we might have left the wheat on the prairies because the 40 degree below weather in Edmonton is very valuable for storing wheat. There is no way in which one can foresee these things. The Wheat Board must make the best decision it can on the facts available to it when it has to make a decision. This is what the Wheat Board does.

There are serious questions which must be examined. Is the local elevator system adequate to meet the needs of today? Do we have enough terminal facilities? Can we afford more? Should we have enough facilities for peak loadings? Can we pay the price? Serious questions like these must be examined. I look forward to the examination of these questions in a thorough fashion by the National Grains Council which is being set up to look into these very matters. In this council the best minds involved in the operation of the whole grain industry will be brought to bear.

I point out to hon. members opposite that while they have been panicking, some things have been done of great merit and help to the prairie farmers. The doubling of the cash advance has been a godsend at this time. This new scheme, which comes very close to buying the wheat on the farm itself, is of tremendous help to the prairie farmer. This year, to date, $122 million has been taken out in cash advances.

An hon. Member: That demonstrates how broke the farmers are.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): This is almost twice as much as the maximum amount ever taken out in a whole year. This program is of significant help to the western farmer.

Mr. Horner: We realize that the policy is good. After all, we brought it in.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): Members opposite panic from issue to issue. By ignoring the facts they do a disservice to the Canadian farmer. By the news they spread abroad they do a disservice to the Canadian farmer. By the completely unwarranted attack upon the functions of the Wheat Board they do a tremendous disservice to the cause of prairie agriculture. Above all, they do a disservice by diverting attention to false arguments when they should be paying attention to the solid, sound, economic arguments which can in fact be made on behalf of prairie agriculture.

• (11:50 p.m.)

Mr. D. R. Gundlock (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, the last thing I heard the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) say, and he was bragging about it, was that loans to farmers had been doubled. I would like to ask the minister why they were doubled. Was there not a need for that?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member wishes to relinquish the floor his speech will be over and I will call another member.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister has finished his speech. The hon. member for Lethbridge has the floor and he should make his speech.

Mr. Gundlock: This may be so, Mr. Speaker, but through you I would like to ask the minister why the loans were doubled. He is bragging about it and he is saying there is no need for it but I must point out there must be a need because they were doubled.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member realizes that we are not in committee now. As I suggested a moment ago, the minister completed his speech and resumed his seat. The Chair recognized the hon. member who has the floor now and who, I am sure, will want to continue his speech.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to correct the last statement of the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister cannot rise on a point of order to correct a statement. That is not a point of order.

Mr. Lang (Saskatoon-Humboldt) May I say the hon. member was misquoting me, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is not a point of order to correct an alleged misquotation.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Speaker, I sat here and listened to the minister. His seatmate is leaving. We have listened to facts and figures all evening, mostly about the weather. The government says this is the greatest day in history for the movement of grain. However, if I may, Mr. Speaker, I wish to tell the minister that last year was the worst year in history for the movement of grain. This almost reminds me of a joke. We hear a lot about movement of grain but not about deliveries. How about the deliveries? That is what we are talking about. We have heard from many ministers tonight and especially from one very vocal minister who can really put on a show, namely, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin). I hope we will hear from the Minister of Agricutlure (Mr. Olson). However, we have heard mostly about the movement of grain while we are really talking about deliveries.

If the rules will permit, Mr. Speaker, I might tell a story about that. I recall that before we had simultaneous interpretation in the house all that could be understood was that it is very easy to conceive but very hard to deliver. So far as I am concerned as a western farmer, this is the position of the government at present. They can do a lot of talking but it is very hard for them to deliver. The main trouble is that they talk so much about it and do so little. We have listened for about two hours to stories about the weather. I ask you, Mr. Speaker; is there anything new about Canadian weather this year? Granted, it may be a little cold in Calgary, but is there anything really new about it? All the minister was doing was making excuses. The farmers do not want to listen to apologies and excuses. They want some answers, and perhaps the best answer would be for the government to keep its hands off the Wheat Board.

An hon. Member: Make up your minds.

Mr. Gundlock: That is just fine. I have heard it said in this house that when you are after big game you do not bother with rabbits. What are we after tonight? The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), made an impassioned speech. I feel the same way as he does, because I am a farmer.

A few moments ago I was about to make a comparison between the Wheat Board and the C.B.C. The Wheat Board is presumably a producer owned organization, a producer controlled organization. From some points of view, the C.B.C. is a comparable organization. But it is left free to run its affairs from day to day. We have listened tonight to speeches for hours and hours and we may listen longer still. Because we are farmers, because we are producers, the government says one thing on one side and another thing on the other side.

The Minister of Agriculture, who has really nothing to say about the situation, nevertheless talked a great deal, and members will see his speech in Hansard. I know what he had to say when he was talking to his constituents; he is a neighbour of mine. He said we had to send No. 2 wheat from the inland terminal at Lethbridge. We heard talk from the minister about a three bushel quota. I should like to ask the minister: where are the deliveries?

We are here representing the farmers, and I have to speak for them. I can do so because I am one of them. I know what the quota is; it is three bushels at my delivery point. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has assured me that I have a three bushel quota. Well, I wish he would tell my banker. What will be the answer? Sure, there are a lot of cars going today. The hon. member for Vancouver East told us there were lots of cars moving now. The hon. member says he called Vancouver at 4.30 this afternoon. But according to the Wheat Board even the minister did not have the figures that he gave.

• (12 midnight)

An hon. Member: It was 5.30.

Mr. Gundlock: Well, there is one hour's difference between here and Winnipeg, so I concede that. But what happened to all the box cars that were on the way? They were returned because they could not be unloaded in Vancouver.

The Minister of Agriculture and the Minister without Portfolio mentioned No. 2 wheat. I should like to know where this wheat came from and where was it bound for. I am a farmer and I know what the quota is. The minister does not have to tell me that I have a three bushel quota. Hon. members opposite should not laugh. That is why we are here tonight, because they have been laughing about this matter.

We are told the C.P.R. can only handle 30 cars instead of 150 because of the weather conditions. On the main line at Calgary there are 250-car trains, and this at a time when the temperature is 26 degrees below zero. So does this talk about the weather make sense? All we have heard are excuses and apologies which have nothing to do with the Wheat Board.

I listened to the speeches this evening. They were interesting. Yet I hope when the minister speaks later to wind up his debate he will point to something real that has been done to help our farmers. Of course, when anyone talks about wheat, chickens, eggs or what have you he is talking about agriculture. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is a very pleasant sort of person, and some of us would not mind if he swapped portfolios with the Minister of Agriculture.

The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont) talked about co-operation between eastern and western Canada. I know perfectly well that the people of eastern Canada need more grain. In some instances they bring it in from the United States. They should buy a lot more from the west. We are willing to co-operate with them.

Tonight we heard much talk about subsidies and helping our farmers. Actually, the government does not pay subsidies to our western farmers. You might say that the government pays subsidies toward the shipment of grain going east. That is one way of looking at it and I find no fault with that. The people of the east need our grain. Our internal grain trade can only promote co-operation between the people of eastern and western Canada.

I am glad to see the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce back in his seat. When we are not in the house or in our respective constituencies I enjoy his company. I remember full well that before the Christmas recess there were not enough box cars to move wheat, all existing box cars in my constituency being tied up in moving wheat. They were unloading No. 2 wheat from an inland terminal, apparently on orders of the Minister of Agriculture. I ask this question: Who is responsible for the Wheat Board and for our grain commissioners? Is it not the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? Apparently he is responsible for those bodies, and yet in some ways he is not. I think the minister knows full well what I am talking about. As I said, Canadian Pacific box cars were busy unloading grain from an inland terminal, but they had no cars available to help my constituents fulfil their quotas.

I am speaking about the three bushel quota we have heard so much about. I do not have it yet. Why? Cars were busy unloading an inland terminal because they could not find No. 2 wheat all down the line. In the midst of my constituency, north, south and west, there was No. 2 wheat—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sad to have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Gundlock: I shall take only one more moment, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member may continue only if he has the unanimous consent of the house. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I regret to say that apparently there are some objections.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that I am rising to participate in this debate because I know that in the constituency I come from this is an emergency not only to the farming population of the area but to the entire population of Yorkton-Melville, and indeed to all the people of Saskatchewan. The crisis, as I see it, has been building up for a number of years. It has not happened only because of things that occurred recently. Basically it is an accumulation of many things.

The farmer has been caught in a cost-price squeeze. The costs of farm production have been going up, indeed skyrocketing. The costs of farm machinery, fertilizers, even land, and all the other commodities a farmer has to use to produce a bushel of wheat have increased. Meanwhile the price the farmer is getting for a bushel of wheat and many other commodities has not been increasing substantially and at times has been falling. Because of the crisis we also have in Saskatchewan and in the western part of Canada this year a lack of cash for the farmer. Farmers need cash if they want to continue in the farming industry. In addition, bank interest rates have gone up and the farmer has a much more difficult time borrowing the money he needs to keep his operation going. Not only will this have a drastic effect this year but it will cause disruptions in following years in the agricultural industry in western Canada. Furthermore, it is not only the farm community that is affected but the rest of the economy as well.

For example, when wheat is not moving we know that the farmer is not going to be selling wheat. As a result he will not be buying commodities, and when commodities are not purchased by the farmer the businesses directly involved in supplying him will be affected as well. In other words, all sectors of the economy are affected. Basically every person in western Canada is a farmer whether he is living on a farm or not, because either directly or indirectly his prosperity is tied to the farming economy.

Just this evening, Mr. Speaker, I was talking to a person who runs a furniture store in the small town of Canora at the northern end of my constituency. He tells me that his sales have gone down drastically this year as a result of the crisis in the farming industry. He also talked about other businessmen in his community. Some of them, particularly in the machinery business, have seen their sales go down by over 80 per cent. This is the kind of thing that is occurring especially in the smaller centres in Saskatchewan.

I was talking to another man from the small village of Jedburgh, and I was told that in that place the elevator will be closed down for a month if grain does not start moving. They have not got the necessary box cars. The grain produced in that area is tough, damp and of inferior quality. What have we got to combat this situation? Increased interest rates! The farmer is having a much more difficult time getting the necessary cash to run his operation.

I would also like to submit, as other hon. members have done, that the crisis in the grain industry today is a national emergency. It has repercussions for the entire Canadian economy. That is why we should be concerned, no matter what part of the country we come from. That is why we should try to clear up the problem confronting us today. It is a problem that is affecting many other industries.

One thing I would like to comment on that has really made me quite sick and mad throughout the debate so far is the statistics that have been quoted by various cabinet ministers, in fact by all three who have spoken in the debate, as well as by the other government members. They tell us how things have improved in western Canada during the last few years, but anybody who has been out west knows that things are not good enough. We know they have not improved.

At any rate, you cannot tell the farmers that they have improved. They know they have not.

I should like to invite the Minister of Trade and Commerce to come to Yorkton-Melville or any other western constituency, spend only one day there, and talk to the farming people. Regardless of the statistics he quotes I am sure he will then know that something is badly lacking in the farming industry today. It is no joke. I am very dismayed when I hear people opposite laugh at the situation in which the farmers find themselves today. I believe that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), when speaking in Winnipeg, summed up the attitude of the government toward the farming industry when he suggested it is basically the farmers' responsibility to sell the wheat. This is the kind of attitude we see across the way today. It is essentially the philosophy of Liberalism or limited government. They do not want to become involved; they want to lock up the problem in a closet and throw away the key. It is just like Biafra; they lock up the problem there and say that it does not exist.

There is no co-ordination or planning. They speak, for example, about establishing a national grains council. What will this do? It will probably provide another bureaucratic institution with more red tape, protocol and confusion. Then we start asking why people are really becoming fed up with things and why the country is becoming restless. We ask why there are demonstrations and riots in our society. I think the answer is apparent. People want action from governments at all levels. Some day the farmer will become fed up with what is happening to him. He is tired of being continually slapped in the face. Maybe the next time the Prime Minister comes to Saskatchewan he will not only be met by demonstrating students but also by farmers unless something is done immediately in an effort to alleviate the problem of the farmers of Saskatchewan and the west.

I think all of us in this house know that many farmers are sliding into poverty. Things are rough. If they have grain, they cannot sell it or it is tough, damp or of inferior quality. It seems ludicrous that while we talk about wheat sales and lack of markets two-thirds of the world population is living at a level of deprivation. It does not seem right when we have so much grain. I have heard many members of the government insinuate that the farmers are lazy and complacent about drying their own grain. Why do they say this? I think the members of the government should look at themselves. They have shown a lack of leadership. The people on the farms do not have the cash to dry all the grain they want to dry or if they do some of them do not wish to run the risk because of the poor operations that are going on.

This evening many members have quoted statistics. They have spoken about many things. All I want to say is that we should get down to doing some good, basic planning because the farmers of western Canada and all the people in the smaller communities in the country as well will suffer if we do not. We must do something constructive. It has been suggested that we appoint a controller who would go to Vancouver to help supervise the loading of ships and clear up the bottleneck. This is one thing we could do. There should be more co-ordination between the Wheat Board, the transportation system, the National Harbours Board and the government in trying to alleviate the problem. In the long term we must really support the agricultural industry of this country. We must look for any new alternatives that people can explore.

This crisis is just one of a number we see in the farming industry in Canada today. On behalf of the people of my constituency I plead that the government do something immediately to alleviate the crisis which faces us today in western Canada.

• (12:20 a.m.)

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): I am going to try to be as impartial as I can.

An hon. Member: I thought you were going to say brief.

Mr. Yewchuk: I shall be brief in my remarks as well. I should like to begin by stating that the Liberal government, since it has been in power, has been known as a government having no real concern for western agriculture. What is happening here tonight is typical of the way this government deals with problems, particularly agricultural problems. This government waits for a crisis to occur and then scurries around in an attempt to come up with some emergency solution. There does not seem to be any thought of looking ahead or trying to foresee an emergency, and doing something about it.

In spite of repeated warnings in the past two months or so that a crisis situation was developing in respect of wheat sales, the movement and drying of wheat, no effective government action has been taken. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) gave us repeated assurances that something was being done and that things were not so bad for the farmers. They gave us assurances that everything possible was being done.

The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) said we were panicking. Perhaps we are because we are concerned about this problem. I submit that the minister and his associates have had their heads in the sand hoping that the problem would disappear. Now that they have pulled their heads out of the sand, they have found the problem is still with us.

Perhaps our panic has been a good thing because, as the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) has stated, it has stimulated some action. Markets for grain are difficult to find, but this government cannot even meet the few commitments it has made to deliver the grain to whatever markets are available at this time. Ships are anchored at Vancouver but grain is not being loaded. Grain is not moving from the prairies to the coast. There does not appear to be proper co-ordination, and co-ordination is required without question.

Since the onset of this session the government has seen fit to put through several farm bills raising interest rates. I have in mind the farm credit measure and the prairie farm advancements. As a result it feels that the problems have been solved. Government members have sat back in their chairs and patted themselves on the back. I do not think they have any reason to do so. These actions were the result of crises situations and were all short term measures. We must have something better. We should have intermediate and long term plans.

If there have been any intermediate or long term measures, I should like to hear about them from some member of this government. We have given repeated warnings about damp grain but no action has been taken. We have given warnings about the insufficiency in respect of the movement of grain, but no action has been taken. We heard recently the announcement by the Canadian Wheat Board that less than half of the damp and tough grain would be dried and that the other half might be spoiling. Somewhere around 2,500,000 bushels of wheat might possibly spoil. This is a loss our country cannot stand.

The government boasts about having new faces in the cabinet; new men who will present new ideas. These men were supposed to come up with some new answers, but the farmers are still waiting and the ships are still waiting at Vancouver. We are still waiting to ship our products to our markets.

We are losing our markets and we are being asked to be proud of the way this government is handling the problem. For the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture, who made the request that we should make suggestions rather than just criticisms, let me suggest something which may help to solve this problem. I think the suggestion can be summarized in two key words; communication and co-ordination.

Communication is required between the government, the various agencies associated with the collection of wheat from the producer, those associated with the transport of wheat and those associated with the loading of wheat on ships for markets. Communication is required within this groups, and co-ordination as a result of that communication. I would like to reiterate, for the benefit of the Minister of Agriculture, those two key words—communication and co-ordination. I hope the minister takes them home and thinks about them.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, I have done many things in my life at twelve thirty o'clock at night, but very seldom have I made a speech at this hour. However, I believe this is an important subject to discuss even at this late hour. It is a subject that affects the livelihood of many people in this country, not only those in western Canada but the people in my province and in particular those in the constituency which I represent. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, it affects people right across Canada. I think this fact was demonstrated very forcibly this evening when we had a very positive and useful contribution by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). He pointed out the situation which exists within his own constituency and noted its impact upon the residents of the heart of the city of Vancouver.

At the outset, I would like to clarify and discuss several points that have come under discussion tonight. First of all, I would like to deal with the point raised by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) in particular, who once again suggested as has been suggested by government members in the past, that whenever any of us on this side of the house dare to ask questions regarding the grain industry of Canada or the activities of the Canadian Wheat Board, we are attacking the Wheat Board and undermining its position.

This is absolutely false. That statement is not worthy of the Minister of Agriculture or any other minister.

I suggest that the greatest disservice that can be done to the Canadian Wheat Board is for ministers to continue to hide behind its skirts whenever they are trying to work their way out of a difficult spot. I want to make it quite clear that in our criticisms, as far as I and my colleagues are concerned, we are pointing at the government and nobody else. I think the Wheat Board is doing a good job. We have on that board competent, good men who are trying their best to do a job. They are fallible, of course; they make mistakes on occasion. We shall not fault them when they make an honest mistake, because this happens. Our criticisms are directed at the government because of its failure to take the action which has been recommended to it.

Second, Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with the statements of the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang). They suggested that the points raised by members of the opposition have been doing great damage to the grain industry. So far as I am concerned, the damage to the grain industry has already been done and is being done by the lack of adequate government action to deal with some of the problems facing western Canada. I feel we must keep before us at all times—and this point has been made by members on all sides of the house—that really the immediate crisis we face is only part of a larger problem. I refer to the general income problem, and the general cost price squeeze that faces the farmers of western Canada. I think it is important to keep this in mind.

I received a very interesting letter this week from one of my constituents. I would like to read it into the record because I think it is very pertinent and refers to something that should be kept in mind. This letter reads as follows:

> I am at a loss to know why the Wheat Board opened the quota to three bushels per seeded acre before the unit was delivered, or at least to give a farmer a reasonable time to haul his unit. I am one out of quite a few who haven't been able to haul a bushel. I am a half section man so the 400 bushels mean as much to me as 1,500 does to the man with two or three sections. I harvested less than 900 bushels this last season of very poor grade which I might add is five or six damp or even feed.
> [Mr. Burton.]
> I don't think I need remind you of the position most farmers find themselves in. Someone is going to have an awful headache before this time year. Even so we do get a good crop the coming season that won't solve our problems.
> Trusting you may be able to give me some sort of a solution to problem.

I suggested a number of things to this gentleman in answer to his letter, and I assured him that for my part I would do everything possible to help. But I must point out that in his letter this gentleman pointed out very forcibly and clearly that we have two items before us: One is the very immediate problem of deliveries, marketing and transportation which we have been discussing, and the other is the far larger one of income, the cost price squeeze and the rehabilitation which is needed in many areas of this country.

I would like to point out that the crisis that is before us is a national problem. It is something that affects many areas of the national economy, and unless we find adequate solutions it will jeopardize the welfare and the well being of many parts of the Canadian economy.

Over the past several months we have witnessed a series of recurring crises. The Minister Without Portfolio, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Humboldt (Mr. Lang), attempted to paint this situation in terms of opposition members panicking as problems arose. I would suggest that members of the opposition pointed out very validly some of the problems that were facing western Canada and, as was their duty, asked the government what they were going to do about them. From time to time we also put forward positive proposals to deal with these problems. For example, the hon. member for Regina Lake Centre (Mr. Benjamin) on December 5 put forward 12 different proposals for the consideration of the government. On one other occasion, on October 15, I put forward 8 different proposals for the consideration of the government. Other members of this house and members of my own party have also put forward proposals.

First of all, we had a difficult harvest. We do blame the government for quite a few things that have happened, but certainly no one would suggest that they were to blame for the difficult harvest situation that existed this fall. Then, we also had a slow marketing situation. I could go into this at some length because I think the government has to bear some responsibility, going back for a period of more than a year, with regard to the small marketings and the low level of exports that we have witnessed over the past year. Certainly, when the Minister Without Portfolio and other members of the government tried to point out that the exports this year are higher than they were at the same point last year, that is really not bragging about very much because last year they descended to the lowest level for quite a number of years. This of course brought on a situation of low and slow deliveries. Following this, as a result of the harvest conditions, we had the problem of tough and damp grain.

Finally, the government acted and brought in the three bushel quota for tough and damp grain. I think it is recognized in all quarters of the grain industry now that this quota has been responsible for some of the problems which are presently facing the industry. I will not deal with this at any length but I think it should be noted in a discussion of this subject, not that there is a three bushel quota now but that the introduction of this quota has worked some inequities and has helped to produce some of the problems that exist in the grain industry at present. As a result, it was quite obvious there would have to be a very extensive drying program. Farmers started to dry grain on their own, but it was not very long until reports were coming back that a number of samples of dried grain were tested by the Board of Grain Commissioners and rejected. This left farmers in a quandary as to what to do. There is still no real direction from the government as to what might be done on a co-ordinated basis in terms of pooling the resources of the federal and provincial governments, of the grain industry, and of farm organizations to deal with this difficult problem.

After that there was a shortage of box cars, which again created a difficult situation. Action was taken and the problem was eventually overcome. Then, there were difficulties about unloading at the terminals, and some of these are still plaguing us. Then a grave situation arose at the Port of Vancouver, causing serious injury to the grain industry.

What is the solution? It seems obvious that we need more adequate co-ordination and direction within the entire scope of the operations in the industry, including farm deliveries, the operations of elevator companies, transportation and terminal companies, shipping companies, the Wheat Board and the Board of Grain Commissioners. There needs to be better direction, and proposals to this end have been put forward on a number of occasions by members of this party.

I, myself, have made proposals to this effect. The minister's reply to a recent suggestion of mine was that we should first do some co-ordination here. I do not mind that but I do submit that co-ordination is first required on the part of the government. Requests have been made for the appointment of a transport controller, or a grain controller to help bring this co-ordination about by dealing with all aspects of this situation. This proposal is not new. In 1955, for instance, a transport controller was appointed and I believe he did an effective job. In the early 'sixties a problem arose in connection with heavy sales to China, and the government of the day to its credit called upon the services of a former commissioner of the Wheat Board, Mr. Riddell, to supervise and co-ordinate activities at Vancouver. From the information I have, I gather that the different authorities concerned felt they were doing all they could to deal with the situation. However, when they got together with the co-ordinator they found they were able to improve their operations and speed up the handling of the grain.

The minister seemed to reject this idea yesterday; he thought it would result in the onus being placed upon one man to take action. I believe it has been shown that this is not the case, provided the individual concerned approaches his duties in a sensitive manner and bearing in mind that there are different authorities involved each with his own sphere of operations. Up to the present we have seen a disjointed approach by the government.

Finally, we have the comments of the minister in this debate tonight. In the contribution of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) he reported that there were 31 ships in the port of Vancouver at this moment. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) noted that there were in fact 33 ships either waiting in the harbour or at berth at 5.15 this afternoon, Ottawa time, I believe. So, he must have more up to date information available to him.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce related a number of problems that had been experienced over the past few weeks. He mentioned there had been weather problems, and this is true. He pointed out that the handling of high moisture grain involves certain difficulties, that it was a very slow process to unload and handle such grain. I do not quarrel with that.

The minister also noted that there had been a stronger demand for grain than was anticipated earlier this fall, and I do not quarrel with that statement either. I understand new export orders came in early in December which were additional to the orders previously expected. The Wheat Board decided to follow a policy of optimizing its sales and undertook to work out the transportation problems later.

So far as I am concerned, I give the Wheat Board credit for taking that action. I have no doubt that the Wheat Board followed up its decision by taking all the necessary steps, within its area of authority, to see that deliveries were made to the purchasers of grain. But the fact is that these steps were inadequate.

The minister seemed to question what exactly was his function. Is it his function to operate the wheat marketing system and to instruct all the officials involved as to what they are to do? I would say that that is not his function. The minister noted that it is his function to support that organization, and I agree fully with that statement. I urge him to fulfil that function by appointing a grain controller or transport controller to deal with the current problems facing us, and with other problems which I predict will arise over the next few months.

When we look at all the difficulties outlined by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I understand the minister wishes to ask a question.

Mr. Pepin: May I ask the hon. member what the minister is supposed to do with the advice that he gets?

Mr. Burton: I suggest that he has to sort through the various suggestions made to him and reach a decision. The particular course of action that I recommend at the present time is the appointment of a grain controller to co-ordinate all aspects of grain marketing.

Mr. Pepin: That is one opinion.

Mr. Burton: That is one opinion and I recommend it to the minister. I think it has received a wide measure of support tonight from all sides of the house. I heard the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) suggest that it would be very useful to have a transport controller, and I commend him for putting that suggestion before the minister. This is the course of action that is required. What is needed is co-ordination, direction, and an attempt to achieve a proper working together of all elements and sectors of our grain handling industry. This is the sort of support the minister should give the Wheat Board to help it do the job we all want to see it do, and which it has been doing its level best to do. Lack of government action has resulted in despondency and confusion among western farmers. That has been aggravated by the fact that the government has so often said in this house, "Everything is fine; there is no problem. We have everything in hand and there is nothing to worry about." The farmers of course have seen that is not so. Lack of adequate government direction has resulted in the farmers of western Canada fearing for the long term future of their industry.

Tonight, we must consider what must be done to help our farmers. As I have already said, for heaven sake let us appoint a controller of grain and a controller of transportation to make sure our grain is marketed properly. Second, and this point arises from my first point, let us make sure that enough No. 2 wheat arrives in Vancouver, but not too much. In its panic reaction to existing circumstances the government may dump too much No. 2 wheat from western Canada into Vancouver, attempting to make sure that overseas commitments are met. The result may be that we will have too much No. 2 wheat in Vancouver and not enough of the other grades.

Third, I suggest that compensation through the Canadian Wheat Board should be made for demurrage and other special costs which have arisen this year, in part because of lack of government policy and direction during the past few months. Fourth, we ought to provide some form of direct financial assistance to farmers in drying grain. That has already been discussed in the house. Some of us do not feel that the government's proposal to pay $600 more in cash advances to farmers will help our farmers. Many of them feel that, with conditions as they are, they are unlikely to repay that advance by July 31 next. We must give direct financial assistance to farmers in order to help dry their grain. That will be in the national interest. Fifth, we ought to embark on a long range program to help elevator companies instal drying equipment. Recently members of the Saskatchewan legislature, including the leader of the opposition, Mr. W. S. Lloyd, made a special trip to North Dakota to see how grain was being dried there. They learned that in practically every elevator in North Dakota grain may be dried. It is an accepted practice that grain is dried in or near country elevators in that state. In this country it is much more difficult to harvest wheat and it seems to me Canadian wheat producers would benefit in the long run if we adopted a practice similar to that carried on in North Dakota.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member to advise him his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

• (12:50 a.m.)

Mr. A. C. Cadieu (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I would feel very remiss if I did not take part in this important debate tonight. I want to congratulate my colleague from the Mackenzie riding for bringing this very important subject before the house. Because our constituencies are adjoining, I am sure we have similar problems.

On September 25 last, as recorded at page 466 of Hansard for that date, I addressed several questions to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson). The first one reads:

> My question arises out of the very serious situation that has been created in western Canada owing to the very wet and impossible harvest conditions. Many farmers are going to be up against a serious feed shortage unless they have especially good weather in the late harvest season. Has the minister and his department asked the P.F.A.A. officials to make a survey of the seriousness of the situation?

The minister replied that this was being done. My supplementary question, which was ruled out of order, was as follows:

> —have any plans been made to assist farmers with regard to drying facilities for wet grain? In order to get feed for livestock many farmers will be forced to take tough or damp grain off the land.

At that time the minister said a survey was being conducted. I wish to point out that many people who have had a complete crop failure have not received their P.F.A.A. payments as yet and they do not know when they are going to receive them. Much of the crop in that area was damaged by frost, and when farmers got the rest of it off the land it was tough and damp.

Cabinet ministers talk a lot about the three bushel quota. I would like to tell you, Mr. Speaker, what the three bushel quota means in my area. When the three bushel quota was established the officials had not made a survey. The local elevator was full of grain from last year, yet in a letter to me the wheat pool chairman said that the largest shipping point in Saskatchewan had not received one single box car in a four-week period. Can you tell me what good the three bushel quota was when the elevator was full and there were no box cars? This demonstrates the seriousness of the situation.

The three bushel quota was really detrimental to many of the farmers in the area because they harvested lots of grain that would have been far better if it had been left in the swathe. Now, they find it impossible to buy the necessary drying equipment, or hire it. It is impossible to dry the grain because of the adverse weather.

The situation is not a laughing matter although I notice that a lot of members on the government side tonight seem to think it is a laughing matter. It would not be a laughing matter to them if they received some of the letters sent to me telling of the seriousness of the situation in which people find themselves. In the past few days I have received letters from people who cannot provide for their families. These people have no grain to ship. They cannot haul it out. The elevators cannot take some of the grain because it is too wet. It is certainly no laughing matter.

I notice that the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatchewan (Mr. Lang) talked about doubling the cash advances on farm store grain. This is not too much help to a farmer who doesn't have any grain, but it brought back to my memory how members on the government side, when in opposition, criticized the cash advances legislation my party introduced. They said the Wheat Board would walk off the job if we did such a thing, but now they double the amount of the cash advances. I think this was a necessary move. I know a great many parts of western Canada will reap benefit from it, but it certainly will not benefit a farmer who has not any grain.

I think this matter is so important that I would remain here even if it meant having my breakfast here in order to represent my constituency. Members of the opposition have continually brought the urgency of the situation to the attention of the government. I notice that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did make a statement in Winnipeg that he did not think it was up to the government to sell wheat. That is all right; the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce throws his hands up in the air and says, "What do you expect me to do." He should not wonder what he should do. What in the world is he doing there? He might be a very good fellow, but if he is not doing a good job let someone do something about it. I do not think a country such as Canada can afford, in a situation of this kind, to have a member from Montreal trying to represent western Canada. If he does not know what he is supposed to do, then for God's sake let the government put someone in there who does know what to do.

It appears to me that the government is doing everything it can to kill the goose that laid the golden egg. I suggest that we let our mind wander back not too many years. The government in office at that time had western Canada stripped right down. But under a Conservative government the farmer of western Canada was given an opportunity. Look how quickly that government put all the factories to work and everything began to move. The unemployment situation was cured. But look at the predicament in which western Canada is today. Where has the buying power gone? All one need do is look at the record of machinery sales. I believe these are some of the things the government should consider. Not only the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce but also the Minister without Portfolio should realize the seriousness of the situation, as should the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson).

I was home during the holidays and never before have I seen a situation in my constituency as serious as that which exists today. Yet members opposite sit here tonight and laugh. This is not funny; this is a serious situation. We have heard about the seriousness of the situation in Vancouver. We heard from the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch). He certainly knows something about the situation in Vancouver harbour. I had the opportunity to see what a really great institution that is for handling grain. If the grain is not moving and we have to pay demurrage charges, then they will have to come out of the price we receive for the wheat. It only brings $1 a bushel. My father received twice that much 30 years ago for a bushel of wheat. How can a farmer carry on in this day and age when that is all he can get for his wheat, and out of that he has to pay all this demurrage expense.

I was very happy that Mr. Speaker allowed this debate to take place. I feel it is very important that the people whom I represent should have heard from me on this important subject. The Minister of Agriculture and others have heard the plea from one of the former prime ministers that they should go out there and look into the seriousness of the situation. If they do not think it is serious, let them come to Meadow Lake. I will show them, and I will also show them some letters I have received. Many farmers will be in serious difficulty when they come to put in new crops. This is something that should be considered. I heard a very good suggestion today. The government should encourage elevator companies to instal grain drying equipment.

During the Christmas recess I discovered that a lot of small dryers are not operating efficiently. I discovered that a great deal of grain has not been dried properly and has been rejected. A great deal of grain in western Canada has been overdried or burnt. Farmers cannot sell this grain. Most of the farmers do not want to spend another 20 cents per bushel on this wheat because they feel they cannot sell it.

If anyone thinks this situation is not serious he should go out and observe it first hand. This government should be worried about the situation. It is not a laughing matter that we are here at this time of the morning. It is very important to the western farmer that the government take some action when the farmer is saddled with tough and damp grain.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, the hour is getting late. I do not represent a western Canadian farm riding but I have been very interested in this debate and I hope the government has learned something. I note that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and other long standing members of the agriculture committee are standing outside the curtain. They must know that over the years agricultural problems have changed. These problems have been brought to the attention of the government since I have been here but the government has found no solution.

The new minister from Saskatchewan has suggested that somebody has pushed the panic button. This is a very interesting remark, particularly to the unemployed in this country. I suggest the minister is unemployed, but the farmer in this country is not interested in that fact. He has too much to think about because of his own problems.

These farm problems are always regional. When they occur the farmers get after their members of parliament to do something about them. Unfortunately, there is insufficient action on the part of the government. Some years ago we had an opportunity to consider the problems in respect of wheat production. The committee on agriculture at that time presented a report to this house, but obviously the minister has not read it. He is not aware of the recommendations that committee made. Had those recommendations been implemented many of the problems in respect of box cars would have been alleviated.

It is my opinion that the minister should not have control of the Canadian Wheat Board. This government agency has been transferred from one minister to another over the years. I have a great deal of respect for this minister who has inherited this responsibility. Since I have been a member of this house the responsibility for the wheat board has rested with the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Trade and Commerce and one or two others.

Perhaps the minister should consider putting the wheat board under the direction of one of the ministers without portfolio because this agency is responsible for many problems which affect the entire country. The production and sale of wheat is an important part of our economy. I do not know what ministers without portfolio do, but one of them should interest himself in this matter.

The minister responsible for this government agency is now handling an extremely important portfolio and the addition of this responsibility is ridiculous. To throw the Wheat Board, which is a major responsibility, on top of his other responsibilities is idiotic. The minister has great capacity but I am sure that even he cannot pay full attention to these four major responsibilities. I suggest that at least two of them, and probably all of them, are running into some difficulty because of his inability to cope with all these problems.

One had only to look at the minister's desk this evening to realize how much responsibility he has. He had on his desk a pile of correspondence that he had been answering for four or five hours. And this is on overtime; it is not done in normal hours.

The Wheat Board is an important agency, but let us face another problem. The chairman of the Wheat Board is a great propagandist. He has a personal machine that never allows him to come out at the worst end of any question or mistake that may occur. The minister or somebody else may be blamed for a mistake, but in my experience Mr. McNamara will not be blamed—and my experience covers a long period of time. The chairman of the Wheat Board does a good job and looks after himself.

Many things could be done to solve this problem. There have been in the past a great many problems in this industry. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) thinks he has to defend himself against all these problems. He does not. I do not think all members of parliament would accuse him of having been responsible for the weather, the mistakes created because of the quota system or those of the industry. They may. However, I think they would be speaking figuratively and really would not hold the Minister of Agriculture directly responsible for all these problems. But they hold the government responsible in the sense that action could be taken to solve the problems but it has not been taken.

The government has not taken action to solve the problems faced by this industry. One or two solutions to the problems were contained in the report of the committee which studied the matter. First, we have a very lousy transportation system for moving grain. We obviously cannot continue to handle the quotas produced by the farmer. The committee said that if any emergency arose we would be in serious trouble. We had probably the best co-operation in respect of our transportation facilities, the country elevators and terminal elevators in the ports of Vancouver, Prince Rupert and at the head of the lakes for a period of two or three years when we handled much more than we should have been able to handle with the facilities at our disposal.

In respect of this industry we are operating out of a box car. We do not operate the potash industry or any other industry in this country to the best advantage. Modernization will have to take place in the grain elevators and other facets of the agricultural industry. It does not behoove us to continue the practice we have followed in the past. We must build new elevators. We should not use elevators which were designed 50 years ago simply because the people in the community have a vested interest in them.

We would be much better off if we built elevators which had drying facilities in them. Farmers should not have to have drying facilities on their farms. There may be a drought for three years, good crops for five years, and two years of an excess of rain. For eight or ten years a farmer may have to use drying equipment on only one or two occasions. We cannot afford this situation in regard to our elevator arrangements.

When we went out to western Canada I am sure every member of the committee was shocked when he learned something that probably even the farmers do not know. When we walked into the Moose Jaw terminal we found it had in it less than 20 bushels of grain. This had been the situation for many months. They had 40 employees. If each of them had taken one bushel of grain home, that elevator would not have been needed at all. That terminal facility could be putting class II wheat into export shape for marketing in three or four days. All you would be doing at the elevators, either at the head of the lakes or in Vancouver, would be moving the grain into the ships that were tied up in that area. The necessity this year for drying grain as well as for putting it into export position has made things much more difficult. The situation could have been coped with much more easily in the terminal elevators than the elevators at the ports.

As everyone knows, there has been great reluctance to use the port at Churchill. The facilities at Churchill could have been used to a far greater degree for European export of wheat, probably three or four times as much. This recommendation has been made by all transportation people in the Churchill area. They have said that if grain were moved to the port at Churchill the cost would be less than in moving it to other ports. Yet this was not considered until an emergency arose.

I suggest to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce that he set up the commission which has been recommended. He has the choice of either setting up a commission to co-ordinate the transportation or one to handle the whole co-ordination of the grain movement. The grain commissioners have a responsibility in this field, as have the country elevators and the Wheat Board. It is difficult for each and every one of them to be in contact with each other. For instance, I am told tonight that there has been another bad train wreck in the Edmonton area. If this is so, these shipments could be rerouted by a transportation commissioner with teletype facilities in his office. He would know the movements of the C.N.R. and C.P.R. and could make appropriate arrangements.

If we do not have such a facility I suggest we will be in continual difficulty. The facilities we do have are archaic and we should seriously consider what to do about this problem on a long term basis. Everyone concerned with the industry and with agriculture has done a very good job in their own field to make possible the deliveries that we have made over the last four or five years. This is a unique year because of the drying problem. There is also a general problem in the field of agriculture which is developing very rapidly. I refer to the high interest rate on purchases which the farmers have to make. Obviously this has had some effect on the ability of country elevators to buy drying equipment. So there have been special problems this year.

If the minister considers himself big enough to sit on this whole problem he will find himself in exactly the same situation as the one which his great predecessor, C. D. Howe, had to face. He was not big enough and he had to obtain the help of other competent people. If the minister wishes to call these people executives and appoint them to his own staff in charge of specific aspects of this problem I would not be opposed to such a move because I believe it would get the job done. But if he waits until each of these boards reports to him and carries out the work of co-ordination on the basis of those reports he will find he is considerably out of touch.

This problem has been with us for a number of years and until Members of Parliament get up and make a noise nothing ever seems to be done. The present situation has developed to some degree during every one of the 12 years in which I have been here, and I think the Minister of Agriculture will bear this out. Nothing new has been said in this debate. There is no emergency with which we are unfamiliar. For God's sake let us sit down in the agricultural committee and settle some of these problems or at least those which are capable of solution.

I do not say these things in a partisan way. The object is to maintain as much of the export market as we can, and this involves not only supplying the desired grain in the proper condition but supplying it on time to fill the ships as they arrive. It means that grain should be moved uniformly so that all farmers have an appropriate quota and so that no dislocation arises in connection with our transportation or harbour facilities. The movement of grain should be co-ordinated in such a way that the right grain reaches the right place at the right time. If this can be done Canada will have a future in the marketing of grain.

I have no personal or constituency interest in the grain industry but from the experience I have gained as a result of the opportunity of travelling across western Canada I am sure that unless some major changes take place, originated by the government, there will be a serious calamity affecting our ability to export at prices which will allow farmers a reasonable return while enabling us to meet the international price structure.

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the debate this evening on this important subject I should like at the outset to offer my hearty congratulations to the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) for instituting this discussion.

We have listened to what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) had to say. He attempted to show that the government had done everything in its power to alleviate the present situation at Vancouver, and he ended by asking: What is my job? I suggest that the minister responsible for the Wheat Board should work in close harmony with the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson) and that the two should get their facts and figures straight. No doubt they have to a certain extent. But on one hand we found the Minister of Agriculture telling us that the unloading of cars at Vancouver was going on at a very good rate—he said some 300 cars a day were being unloaded—while on the other hand the Minister of Trade and Commerce tells us that because of damp grain and weather conditions it has taken an hour on many occasions to unload one car. I wonder how those figures can be reconciled.

We also had a lecture from the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) who attempted to tell the opposition what they should be doing instead of bringing to the attention of the government the damp grain situation. He went over some aspects of the problem and said that we should spend out time finding solutions instead of panicking when the damp grain problem manifested itself last fall, panicking again when deliveries could not be made on time, and panicking further when ships were held up at anchorage in Vancouver harbour. If the Minister without Portfolio feels that the opposition is panicking, then it is very fortunate that the hon. member for Mackenzie and those who have supported him panicked, as the minister called it, on this occasion.

One point that has been brought out very forcibly in this debate is that in spite of the minister's statement that the government has no authority to dictate to the Wheat Board or to any other body that handles grain in Canada, the farmers of western Canada will be amazed when they discover that one result of this debate today has been the announcement in the house that orders have been given to ship with all haste all of the No. 2 grain that can be shipped from elevators at Moose Jaw. I am also amazed by the very caustic criticism that has emanated from government benches in regard to matters that opposition members have brought to the attention of the house in this debate. I am convinced that had it not been for this debate the order to ship No. 2 grain from Moose Jaw would not have been given. I understand it was also ordered that overtime should be worked to the limit in order to get the grain moving as quickly as possible.

If those on government benches are in no position to dictate or even to suggest to the Wheat Board or the Board of Grain Commissioners what they should do, then I would be interested to find out where this order came from. Regardless of where it came from, it is a good thing that the order was given. Shipments will be made from Moose Jaw as rapidly as possible so that some of the ships that are waiting at anchorage at Vancouver will be loaded with No. 2 grain and requirements met. When we know a little more about this order we will be able to ask questions and I hope we will be given answers. However, I am sure the western farmers will realize what initiated this order to get grain moving.

In view of the fact that a great number of members who have taken part in this debate have made the point that a number of improvements are necessary not only in our grain handling facilities in western Canada, at terminal and prairie elevators but also in rail transportation arrangements, this would be a very opportune time to mention briefly shipping arrangements through the port of Churchill. There are a number of reasons for bringing up this important matter at this time. Over the years the government has announced prior to the opening of the shipping season that in the year to come a record number of bushels would be shipped through Churchill. I have no figures in front of me but I think the figures I will mention are accurate.

The year before the Conservative government took office in 1957, 16 million bushels were shipped through Churchill. From then until 1962 grain shipments increased each year through Churchill until about 24 million bushels were shipped. My constituents feel that Churchill is capable of handling more wheat than the port is handling at present. The Liberal government on taking office assured us that record shipments would be made through Churchill. If one looks at the figures one will find that in only one year since 1962 have more than 24 million bushels been shipped through our port. I think 25.5 million bushels were shipped one year. In other years shipments were drastically reduced. During the past season I think about 22.5 million bushels were shipped through Churchill, a drastic reduction, particularly after the government had assured us we would be handling record shipments.

Mr. Pepin: I bet you a dollar your figures are wrong.

Mr. Simpson: I am sure anyone checking with officials of the National Harbours Board will learn that Churchill has the reputation of being the most efficient port in Canada in turning around ships and in loading and unloading them. Churchill on many occasions has been declared the most efficient port in Canada; yet grain shipments through that port are not being increased to the extent they ought to be. Perhaps the minister may produce figures showing that Churchill had a record year this past year. The Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang) lauded the government for the grain traffic handled by the port of Vancouver. I wish he were here to tell us why grain shipments through Churchill have been decreasing each year. Is the government being influenced by some who are lobbying on behalf of other Canadian ports? A port of Montreal official, J. C. Bourguignon, secretary of the Montreal Port Council, made a statement in 1965 which has been repeated many times. He called government promises to increase freight shipments through Churchill "electioneering", adding that he could hardly believe that could happen "without consultation between the federal government and eastern port managers". He went on to say:

> The council has strongly opposed any move to increase the use of Churchill because it is an artificial enterprise opened due to the war. We don't mind the status quo, but we'll rise up against any government plan to increase its use.

Considering the need for us to modernize grain handling facilities across Canada and remembering what Montreal port officials are saying about Churchill, it seems that those Montreal officials as well as others are influencing the government to hold the line on shipments through Churchill. There are many reasons for saying this and bringing this matter to the attention of the house because, just to quote a few figures, storage charges at the Churchill elevator are six cents a bushel for nine months while storage charges at other terminals are nine cents for nine months. It costs 12 cents a bushel to take wheat from Saskatoon to Churchill, and 27 cents a bushel to take wheat from Saskatoon to Montreal, pointing up the fact that it is much cheaper to ship it out of Churchill than out of any other port in Canada from the Churchill designated area of grain shipment in western Canada.

I would also like to point out that on June 20, 1966, the day the first Russian wheat sale was announced, the price of No. 2 wheat at Montreal was $2.205 a bushel, and the same day the price of No. 2 wheat at Churchill was $2.13 a bushel, a difference of seven cents a bushel. This means that it is not only cheaper to ship wheat out of Churchill than it is out of these other ports but it is also cheaper for the purchaser to buy it. There is a saving for the purchaser and for the farmer. These are only some of the reasons why the port of Churchill should be considered in the improvement which hon. members think is so necessary for our grain handling facilities across Canada.

There is also talk about the shipping season at Churchill. It should be extended and there are various ways in which it could be extended. A report I have here says that in 1927 the McLean Commission spent a season on the Hudson Bay route and reported that there could be a shipping season of 120 days without the assistance of icebreakers. Today, 42 years later, we have only 88 days. So the extension of the shipping season at Churchill to not less than 120 days is a definite requirement if we are going to improve our grain handling facilities in western Canada.

Along with that there should be marine rates of insurance available for the port of Churchill comparable with those available at other ports. To this end immediate consideration should be given to the use of the new Alexbow-Hammerhead and Gibson icebreaker systems. Members of the government should know what I am talking about because the government has a considerable financial interest in the Alexbow itself. Incidentally, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) did not even know the name of it when I brought it to his attention.

Mr. Scott Alexander, the inventor of the Alexbow, has told me personally that the port of Churchill would be mush easier to keep open with the Alexbow than any of the St. Lawrence ports in the wintertime, and he sees no reason whatever, if he is given the opportunity, that he could not take a barge in from an eastern seaport to Churchill in mid-winter—January, February, or any time you wish to mention.

I am not advocating that next year or the year after the port of Churchill should be kept open during wintertime, but I am advocating that the port of Churchill could be kept open for a much greater length of time if the government would take action to see that it is kept open. I again refer to my belief that the government is listening too closely to shipping interests in other Canadian ports. In 1905 and 1910 ships were coming into the port of Churchill after the middle of November without the aid of icebreaking equipment, without any radar and without lighthouse services. So there is no reason in the world that this port cannot be kept open much longer each season.

One other facility that should be located at the port of Churchill—and this is something the government should look into—is a pilot boat in order that pilot services can be rendered at all times regardless of weather conditions because the present pilot boat is not suitable for all weather conditions. There should also be an increase in the storage capacity over the present 5 million bushel capacity to 10 million bushels. The larger ships are now capable of loading up to one million bushels and therefore the present storage of 5 million bushels is not sufficient to guarantee there will be sufficient grain at the port at all times. The additional storage capacity would also make it possible to carry stocks of other types of grain besides wheat in addition to providing for more grains of each type.

In conclusion I would say to the minister and members of the treasury benches that a good look should be taken at this port. They will recall that a few years ago some sales were made to Czechoslovakia and representatives of that government came to Ottawa to talk with representatives of this government or their predecessors. Every assurance was given to me in the house at that time that those representatives from Czechoslovakia would be made fully aware of the facilities at Churchill and the savings they could enjoy by taking their grain out of Churchill.

I am not in a position to make the charge that this information was not given to them. But Mr. Jim Gray, the secretary-treasurer of the Hudson Bay Route Association, in talking to these Czechoslovakian representatives was told they never received this information. We did clear up the situation when the Russian sales were made by Canada because these people were in the gallery and I had the opportunity of telling them there was the opportunity of shipping through Churchill.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the important problem which is before us to-day, and I will try to remain within the ambit of the matter now under discussion.

The problem concerns mainly western Canada, but this situation is not germane to us, for if there is a lack of box cars to carry wheat to the port of Vancouver, that reminds us of a familiar situation that we, of the Creditiste Party, have been denouncing for many years, namely the accumulation of wheat as a result of the lack of box cars. Needless to say that hon. members know it, and more particularly the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson).

We have denounced the economic bottleneck which is affecting Canada. There is obviously an abundance of wheat in western Canada and there is a market for our production, because foreign countries are willing to buy our wheat. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) shakes his head; I would like to know which argument would convince him. We are having difficulty with wheat exports and transportation, a problem which has already been mentioned in this house, since the Créditistes are represented here since 1935. The situation is the same, from the economic point of view. In other words, it is production in relation to consumption, and the transportation facilities are inadequate.

Complaints are now heard about the lack of box cars, while we, Créditistes, complain because for the last 30 years the transportation facilities do not make the link between production and consumption. This is why we have denounced in the past the economic congestion that has prevailed, especially in the past 30 years, and tonight the special congestion in a certain sector of production.

Now there is a solution to those problems. Some will say, as some ministers did, that it depends on the weather. It reminds me of a problems which occurred a few years ago in the Ukraine—where a lot of wheat is grown —and which was similar to the one which is now raised. There was a bumper crop of wheat, but the officials of the communist government of the Ukraine had not delivered the necessary permits to the farmers of the state to enable them to harvest their wheat on time.

It did happen that all the wheat was lost under the snow. There was a lack of planning, and the technocrats, the officials of Ukraine, a socialist and communist country, stated that the bad weather was responsible for the crop being left under the snow.

Here, in Canada, planning could not be achieved concerning the operations in Vancouver harbour, one of Canada's main ports, to make it suitable for receiving wheat shipments. Moreover, and this is even more serious, financial planning was neglected—although we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, have been requesting it for a long while—in order to ensure the development of national harbours to meet export needs.

For instance, if you read the question the honourable member for Portneuf (Mr. Godin) asked in this house a little while ago and which appeared on the order paper for January 15, you will see that the Ivory Coast refused the wheat which Canada wanted to give it.

We also learned, through other official documents of the house, that a small country, that is Niger, has its own merchant marine. Its boats are ploughing our rivers and the Great Lakes to get our wheat or other products. A small country gives itself an adequate transportation system, to meet its needs, but here, in Canada, weather conditions, we are told, are responsible for the present situation. And yet, I think what is most regrettable and astonishing is that the Minister of Agriculture knows the solution to our problem. He has been preaching it for more than 30 years. He must have liked that solution since he supported it in and out of the house. Because he met with some minor problems in the Social Credit party, he left that party. Now he is in the Liberal party, where he is experiencing a much more serious problem than the lack of box-cars in Vancouver. If the Minister of Agriculture left the Social Credit party because of very minor problems, I think he should also leave the Liberal party, because he is now in a straitjacket and therefore is unable to solve our problems, and he knows it.

I know he is intelligent and I respect his integrity. I know he remembers the Social Credit doctrine but I am convinced that despite his intelligence, he will be unable to apply the principles he loved and defended and for which he even paid dues for thirty years when he was a respectable and an out-and-out Créditiste. Today, he is a sort of straitjacket within the Liberal party. He now blames the weather for the lack of box-cars in western Canada, the same way Canadian economists, during the depression held sun spots responsible for the economic crisis. We have transportation problems—

The Deputy Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is wondering a little from the subject under consideration.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out to you that during the depression, the sun spots were in the heads of the economists and that, at the present time, there are problems out West which are comparable to the false sun spots of the depression.

Now, we have come to grips with a similar problem. First of all, let us speak of the economists. The Minister of Agriculture should not trust economists too much, for the last report of the Economic Council of Canada recommends to increase production. On the other hand, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) tells us: Tighten up your belts and increase production. There is a contradiction in that. This is the illogical consequence of an absurb economic system, and it explains why, today, we are faced with a transportation problem out West and why tomorrow, another problem will come up in the Maritimes.

We are also grappling with a wheat problem in the province of Quebec. Indeed, our farmers cannot buy Canadian wheat at the same price as the Chinese Communists; when our wheat sold for $1.50 a bushel in the province of Quebec, it was about twice what they paid. These are not stories but facts that are born out by the figures of the Department of Trade and Commerce. We are now grappling with the problem of the export of wheat which is perhaps not directly our problem in Quebec but in which we are interested as Canadians.

It is the same problem that exists now in western Canada and that is reflected in other segments of the economy because there is no planning by the federal government.

First, they do not plan their financing. Consequently, they are now grappling with a given problem and to-morrow there will be another one. Instead of solving our problems, we make enquiries and we create royal commissions. Big deal. Instead of trying to solve the problem tonight, why not form a royal commission and study still another year, because that is the solution which the Liberals have been putting forward for many years.

How is it that tonight the Minister of Agriculture announced—I believe I was absent from the house at the time—that the C.P.R. had issued orders to make available in the port of Vancouver all the cars required to meet the needs of the present crisis?

Why did the C.P.R. not do it a few weeks ago? Why is it possible today when it was not at that time?

Tomorrow, hundreds of cars will stand on the sidings in the port of Vancouver, but how much will it cost us for the cars that will thus stand idle for whole days? Might it be that the C.P.R. wants to replenish its coffers or that its shareholders stand to make greater profits?

For weeks and weeks we needed them, and there were none, but now we have them all together at the same time!

Such are the questions that could be directed to the Minister of Agriculture and which deserve an answer. Those questions are of concern to all Canadians. Why? Because we are facing a financial problem and tonight, it is a transportation problem.

It is just the same in the field of economics: a transport problem, an economic bottleneck, a bottleneck affecting the means of transport in Vancouver. The minister will no doubt explain it, by putting the blame on the weather, just as the socialist technocrats, several years ago, explained to the whole world how they had lost their crops on the farms of Ukraine by blaming it on the snow, the frost and on permits which arrived too late.

In the present case, things were not planned in good time and this vindicates the Creditistes who want to decentralize production. The Minister of Industry and Trade and Commerce is grinning; he has listened to nobody but the technocrats and now he is confronted with the situation which arose here tonight. He should seek the advice of experienced entrepreneurs, of successful businessmen, rather than of technocrats who try to explain away their carelessness by speaking of the weather or some such nonsense.

[English]

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to note that some hon. members to my right have indicated pleasure that I am participating in this debate. I mention this especially for the benefit of the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Stewart) who previously indicated he did not wish to be here any more. However, the fact that I mentioned him will bring to the attention of his constituents that he is present in the house at two o'clock in the morning, and if it takes a Conservative member to draw that to their attention I am happy to do so, since he can find no other way of doing so himself.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why not name everyone who is here?

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): It has already been suggested to me by another hon. member that the question of wheat has gone through the mill this evening. I hear another familiar voice, which reminds me that possibly this evening Liberal members were moved by the importance of this debate. Some of them may even have telephoned British Columbia and said: "For God's sake, someone give us some figures; they are pounding us down here". I leave it to members of the house to guess just who that member is.

An hon. Member: Name him.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): He is not worthy of it. For somebody from the east coast to participate in a debate on wheat may come as a surprise. However, it is a subject which the Speaker considered of national importance and worthy of debate. It is surprising to me that throughout the evening Liberal members, including the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), have cast reflections on the opinion voiced by the Speaker, and so did the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Lang).

However, I consider that this matter concerns the economy of Canada, and what is good for the west is bound to be good for the east. Today the economy of this country is facing a staggering loss from the mismanagement that has been going on since this government, and especially the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, has tried to run the affairs of the Wheat Board.

At this time I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) who has brought this important matter to a head and, as is evident from the announcement made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Olson), forced the government to take steps that have already been suggested by a number of hon. members. There has been an announcement tonight that all available amounts of No. 2 northern are to be moved as quickly as possible.

Mr. Olson: That action was initiated a long time ago.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): It still took the debate to get it moving. Before the minister made his announcement he knew very well that members of the house were aware of it since the early afternoon.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): This is only a further indication that hon. members on the government side have holes in their heads. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Gundlock) brought to the government's attention the fact that although there are very severe winter conditions in western Canada this year they are conditions which the railways have been used to and should have been able to overcome. On other occasions far more wheat was moved with far fewer box cars available. This is an indication of mismanagement in this field.

Someone has reminded me that the railways then used steam engines. I am happy to take up this point because my constituents were very sore a few years ago when the C.N.R. converted from coal to oil. This is an indication that the railways may well begin to think of coal again. I only hope that some day we shall see a reversion to steam, which would give the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce a suitable form of locomotion to surmount the difficulties caused by cold weather and carry the grain over the mountains.

I noticed a number of contradictions between statements made by various members on the government side. Not long after the Minister of Trade and Commerce had spoken the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Douglas) took part in the debate, expressing an entirely opposite point of view with regard to the appointment of a transportation commissioner. This is what he advocated, but the minister was afraid to go along with the idea.

I take exception to certain of the remarks made by the Minister of Agriculture because I consider them to be a reflection on the decision of the Chair to allow this debate on an important national issue. The Speaker agreed to allow this debate; yet the Minister of Agriculture said it was destroying markets. In my opinion this was a reflection on the Chair.

Mr. Olson: On a point of order, at no time in my speech did I make any reflection on the Speaker in any way, shape or form.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): The Speaker ruled that a debate on this important subject could be carried on to deal with a question of national importance on an emergency basis. When the minister gets up and says that opposition members are destroying Canadian markets he is reflecting on the Chair.

An hon. Member: Not at all.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was in attendance for a short time. Hon. members over there talked about weather conditions and blamed the situation at Vancouver on the weather. It was like hearing a weather report from every minister. The Prime Minister remarked at that time: "Bring on the sun". This expresses the interest and concern the Prime Minister has shown for the western farmer.

An hon. Member: Sounds like Smallwood.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): If you want to believe some of them, there are prominent Liberals who would have us think they can control the weather. Perhaps we shall have an opportunity of hearing where that report from British Columbia was, whether or not the figures were obtained.

When questions about this situation were put to the minister last fall the hon. gentleman summoned up his best smile, shrugged his shoulders, gave a wave of the arm and said: "We can always pray". This was the attitude of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Tonight the same minister asked the house with the same wave of the arms and the same smile—no, I must say the smile had developed into a smirk—What is my job? What am I to do? I have one suggestion for the minister. I suggest he get out of the wheat field because he is going against the grain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): There is every indication of mismanagement and lack of knowledge on the part of the minister in dealing with this question. As I say, a number of hon. members have shown that despite bad weather conditions larger quantities of grain were delivered in other years with fewer box cars, and this clearly indicates there is something wrong somewhere. If the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister without Portfolio or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce wish to blame opposition members for destroying export markets or for creating a situation that is unacceptable to buyers, then he must make the same accusation against the members of his own party who have made similar representations to the government as those made by opposition members.

• (2:00 a.m.)

An hon. Member: I thought you were in Cape Breton.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): I hear a stupid and idiotic remark from a Liberal member to my right who says he thought I was in Cape Breton. I made it quite clear that I regarded this as a national emergency that affected the entire Canadian economy, and what is good for western Canada is good for Cape Breton. When the minister realizes that each segment of the economy affects the other segments in this country, then he can make a speech or, rather, read a speech that has been prepared by somebody else. My advice to the minister is to get out of the business because he knows nothing about it.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it so happens that the head office of the Canadian Wheat Board is located in the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre and so is the Board of Grain Commissioners and the Grain Exchange. Therefore I should favour the house with a 20-minute speech. However, like many others who are here I have shown my concern about this issue by staying here. I hope that Your Honour is satisfied that we have had a good debate and that you are satisfied that the debate has now been concluded.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to section 13 of standing order 26 I am satisfied that the debate has been concluded. I therefore declare the motion carried. This house stands adjourned until two o'clock p.m. later this day, pursuant to standing order 2, section 1.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 2.06 a.m.

Fifth report of standing committee on finance, trade and economic affairs, in French and in English—Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau).

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATIONALIST CHINA—INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE CHANGE IN POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs a question about something I read in the press—an announcement which I think might better have been made in the house. I should ask whether the statement attributed to him yesterday, that Canadian policy with regard to Nationalist China would be the subject of negotiation, indicates a change in government policy, or in the two China policy set forth by the Prime Minister some time ago.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): As far as I know, Mr. Speaker, this government has never enunciated a two China policy. I am sure the hon. gentleman will agree that when we hold these discussions with the Chinese authorities which, according to this government, have as their objective the recognition of the Peking regime, the question of Formosa will of course be a subject for negotiation.

Mr. Stanfield: The hon. gentleman has indicated that the question of the Formosan government is to be negotiated. Has the government been in touch with the Taiwan government about this matter, and is there anything the minister can report to the house in this connection?

Mr. Sharp: The views of the Canadian government have been made public. Indeed one of the stated objects of the government is to bring about mutual recognition between Peking and Ottawa. The authorities of the Nationalist government know this, they have discussed it with me, and understand its implications.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I should like to ask the minister whether, if he institutes discussions with the government of the People's Republic of China, he will make inquiries about the methods used by the government of that country in handling its relations with the press.

Mr. Stanfield: Could the Secretary of State say whether a position has actually been taken by the government of Canada with regard to the timing of contacts with the representatives of Communist China or, if not, when such decision might be taken? Can the minister indicate where contacts with representatives of Red China are likely to take place?

Mr. Sharp: No decision has yet been reached. The subject is now before cabinet for decision, and when decisions are made they will of course be made public.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

COMMUNICATIONS AS A DEPARTMENTAL ACTIVITY

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I should like to address a question to the Postmaster General arising out of a speech he made last night indicating that the post office might branch out into other forms of communication, including telephones. I should like to ask the Postmaster General whether his intention is to include telephone communications as part of the activities of the post office, particularly in view of the continued increases in telephone rates which the Bell Telephone Company is demanding and receiving.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the exact words which I used yesterday afternoon in my speech were that to reorganize the post office on a business basis is itself a major undertaking. Beyond that, at this point I am in the realm of ideas, not policy. We may have to undertake major changes in structure to mould the post office into—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have to interrupt the minister for a moment to remind hon. members of the well established rule in connection with speeches that are made by ministers outside the house. The hon. member for York South can ask the minister a direct question. However, if he is now referring to a speech made outside the house he can only ask the Prime Minister whether the statements represent government policy. But I repeat that he can ask a question, if he so wishes, directly, as has already been done.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the indication that my question is proper. It was because of the minister's language that I asked him the question I did.

I should like to ask the minister a supplementary question. While he is preparing to make the post office more efficient, will he give consideration to introducing in Canada what is called the giro system for the post office, as recommended in and implemented by Great Britain, so that consumers can use the post office for other purposes and thus make greater use of the post office in competition with the chartered banks?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking a question of very general nature. I suggest it should not be asked at this time but rather placed on the order paper.

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport and of the acting minister, may I put my question to the Prime Minister?

Could he inquire and tell us why it is now impossible for us to get in touch with Mr. Henri Roussel, a highly qualified expert at the Montreal office of the Canadian Transport Commission who disappeared two days after his statement that there is no major objection to locating an international airport on the south shore, though his chief, Mr. Baribeau had asserted that an international airport would never be located on the south shore?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not think that the question as asked is in order.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ALLEGED SNUBS BY PRESIDENT DE GAULLE—PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN TROOPS IN TWO WORLD WARS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether or not, as a result of the latest snub on the part of General de Gaulle to the representative of Canada, the government of Canada is going to make a protest and bring to the attention of the President of France the tremendous sacrifice of Canadians on French soil both in the first war and in the second war, and that this kind of thing is not appreciated by Canada, with egregious snubs from week to week.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I seem to recall that last year the right hon. gentleman's party thought that we protested too much over the Gabon matter, which was a question of substance. The question the right hon. gentleman has put concerns social events. We feel that it is within the sovereign authority of the government of France to give dinners to whom they want. I might add that I think that our ambassador in Paris knows of other places where he can get a good meal.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was a gratuitous statement about this party. The government was not criticized for any action it took; it was the pusillanimous nature of the protest that we objected to. I ask the Prime Minister, in his trip to Europe did he pass over France because of the cold atmosphere existing between the government of Canada and the government of France?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, I admit I hoped to enter warmer climates, but I was not too lucky. It was raining in Rome also.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Was it not too hot?

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FIVE DAY DELIVERY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question of immediate urgency to the Postmaster General. It has to do with the implementation of the five day delivery. Will the minister undertake to make an early statement on motions outlining the progress of negotiations which were to resume this morning. Also, can he assure members of the Canadian public that they will not again become the victims of controversy or conflict between the department and its employees.

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, a good many changes are going on inside the Post Office Department. I can assure hon. members of the house that I discussed these changes fully with the leaders of the two unions involved—we had a long discussion earlier this week—and, as the hon. member has suggested, negotiations are still proceeding.

Mr. Macquarrie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Since the minister has been so communicative will he indicate if the government intends to table the initial report of the task force which, in a heartening way, showed how the post office could save $50 million yearly.

Mr. Kierans: It is the report, Mr. Speaker, of a task force within the department and is a preliminary report only. I was pleased with the projected results contained in the report, but I want to satisfy myself that what is promised in it can be carried out.

Mr. Mac T. McCutcheon (Lambton-Kent): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Postmaster General whether, in view of increasing numbers of complaints about slow delivery and poor post office service, he will assure the house that before entering other communications fields, such as telephone services, he will make sure that postal service in this country is again raised to acceptable levels.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that the question as asked is argumentative.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In the discussions going on with the postal unions has the department refused to assure union representatives that permanent employees of the department will not be laid off while casual employees continue to work for the department?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, the department has refused nothing and has made no promises. As I say, we are negotiating, and until a final meeting of minds is reached we will not give away any advantages we might have.

Mr. Orlikow: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister assure permanent employees of the department that none of them will be laid off while temporary employees are kept on strength?

Mr. Kierans: Mr. Speaker, I want to find employment for all people who work in the post office. I realize that in cutting down to five day weeks we shall wind up with excess man-hours. It therefore behooves me to find alternative jobs for those who will be affected, as well as to provide additional services to the people of Canada that are economic and justified. We have all this very much in mind, Mr. Speaker.

ESTATE TAX

REQUEST FOR PRESENTATION OF LEGISLATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. In the very near future does he expect to present to the house the estate tax bill? I ask that particularly because strong pressure is being brought to bear on the government from within the Liberal caucus to present the bill in its present form and because there is strong support for the bill within the Liberal party.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The first part of the hon. member's question is in order, but the second part is out of order.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): The minister can answer half a question.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should simply like to say that the bill is a great bill which is good for the people of Canada. I had hoped to present the bill tomorrow, Friday, but I probably will not be able to until Monday because of printing difficulties and the translation. It is ready now.

Mr. Hees: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, has the minister been down to his constituency recently and talked to the people there? If he has done so he would not be able to make the answer that he has.

Mr. Benson: People in my constituency trust me.

Mr. Hees: Wait until you get there, Ben. You have some news coming to you.

Mr. Benson: I go to my constituency every week, which is more than you do.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he is going to continue to be so firm in his estimates of public expenditures, and how long it is going to take to get bills printed?

Mr. Benson: I would just like to say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Calgary North.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

QUEBEC—IMPRISONMENT AWAITING TRIAL—APPOINTMENT OF JUDGES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has he had an opportunity to read the report on the administration of justice—the commission with reference to Quebec—and has he noticed in the report that some people have been several months in jail waiting for trial? Further, have the extra judges required been appointed by his department for Quebec?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have read the relevant parts of the report referred to by the hon. member. I might say that the daily administration of justice, the administration of the courts, is not directly a federal responsibility. As for the nomination of the judges, because I undertook to consult as widely as I could in judging the competence of men and women to be appointed to the bench, that consultation is still going forward. I hope there will be some appointments in the next two weeks or so.

Mr. Nielsen: What's the matter with Judy?

Mr. Woolliams: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the report mentions an increase in the number of murders in Canada has the minister worked out any liaison with the province of Quebec and other provinces so far as that matter is concerned?

[Mr. Hees.]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We are in close touch, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Woolliams: I would like to ask another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not concerned with the minister's touch. I was looking for action.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member ask a question?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes, Mr. Speaker. What action has the minister taken, if any, in reference to the 50 per cent increase in murders in Canada?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I think that the whole concept of violence in our society and the attitude that provokes that type of conduct are matters which, together with the provincial attorneys general, we are constantly concerned about, as indeed are all the people of the country.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Minister of Justice said he is trying to find the best men and women for judgeships may I ask is the former hon. member for Niagara Falls under his contemplation at the moment?

An hon. Member: Oh, you are smart.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): She does not immediately come to mind, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

IMMIGRATION

SPECIAL REGULATIONS RESPECTING IMMIGRANTS FROM U.S.

Mr. John Burton (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration I wish to direct a question to the acting minister. Has the government introduced or is the government considering the introduction of special regulations that would affect certain classes of immigrants from the United States?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Not as far as I know, Mr. Speaker, but I will convey the question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration who will be in a position to give an answer later on.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBLE ABOLITION OF COMMISSION

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, who has jurisdiction over the National Capital Commission.

In the light of reports which have been circulated since yesterday in press circles, can he tell us if the National Capital Commission will be soon abolished?

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, as far as I know, no decision has been taken to that effect. A tripartite report has been forwarded to the federal government and to the governments of Quebec and Ontario, but no decision has been taken and the news or the rumour is unfounded.

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

As the Minister has insinuated that the structures of the National Capital Commission will be modified, can he tell us whether the province of Quebec will be consulted about these changes, given the financial contribution it will undoubtedly have to make?

Mr. Marchand (Langelier): The province of Quebec is always consulted, Mr. Speaker.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER, B.C.—EMPTY SHIPS LEAVING PORT

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address this question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In the light of his remarks last night and the debate which took place last night, would he explain to the house why big grain ships are leaving Vancouver today empty.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, as at 2.10 this afternoon Ottawa time there were eight grain boats loading at Vancouver and 22 awaiting berths, which, as I remember well, are the same figures as of yesterday at 5.10 p.m.

Mr. Horner: The question was why grain ships are leaving Vancouver empty, not how many are being loaded. In the Vancouver Province of today's date it is stated that, of two big grain ships, one has already left and another is scheduled to leave empty. Would the minister explain why they are leaving empty if everything is working well.

Mr. Pepin: I will check on the value of the information.

NATIONAL SECURITY

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF ROYAL COMMISSION REPORT

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Prime Minister. I wonder whether the Prime Minister could inform the house when he intends to table the report of the Royal Commission on Security, or at least report to the house on it.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Two days ago I said we were still waiting for the consideration of an abridged version that would be acceptable for tabling in the house.

CROWN CORPORATIONS

POSSIBILITY OF CHANGE IN STATUS OF BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. In view of the reported remarks made by the minister yesterday, which have already been the subject of a question in the house today, could he give us the answer to the following question: Is it the intention of the government to take over the Bell Telephone Company and transform it into a public corporation?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): So far as I know there is no such intention. The people on this side of the house have much more imagination and ideas as to how to spend money.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. I would ask him why he ignores the members to my right.

Mr. Kierans: I include them, of course, and the members of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Inquiries of the Ministry

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

H.M.C.S. "BONAVENTURE"—ALLEGATION REGARDING OVERCHARGES IN REFITTING

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, this question is directed to the Minister of Justice. On Monday last in answering a question put by the hon. member for Calgary North he indicated that informations had been laid against Remus Rodaru and Cardinal Engineering and Machinery Company Limited in connection with the Bonaventure bills. He also left the house with the impression that proceedings might be reinstituted. Can the minister affirm whether it is now possible to reinstitute those criminal proceedings that were terminated, as he explained on Monday?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): I said that the crown prosecutor here in Ottawa representing the provincial Attorney General had been unable to obtain the evidence of Erhardt Junkers in Germany and felt he had insufficient evidence to proceed, and the Crown applied to withdraw the charges. The magistrate refused the application and the preliminary inquiry was commenced. The Crown offered no evidence in the circumstances and the charge was dismissed.

In the circumstances described there was of course no trial. The hon. member is asking me for an opinion. It would appear that the defences of res judicata or autrefois acquit are not available. I think that is as far as I would like to go in an answer. It would be my view that if new evidence were furnished there would not be a bar to new proceedings.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

REQUEST THAT ALLOWANCE NOT BE REDUCED BECAUSE OF INCREASED OLD AGE BENEFIT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Has the minister or the Governor in Council taken the necessary steps so that recipients of the war veterans allowance will not have their allowance cut back by the amount of any increase they receive in old age security or guaranteed income supplement by way of a cost of living bonus? This was done last year, and I am asking whether it is being done again this year.

Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, these steps have been taken effective January first.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether consideration is also being given to increasing the basic amount of war veterans allowances?

Mr. Dubé: This is always under consideration, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

AIRPORTS

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Would he tell the house whether he intends to intervene directly in the matter of the site of the future airport? Does he think the representations of Quebec will be seriously considered?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the Prime Minister to express an opinion and his question, as he has put it, is not in order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

PRESENCE OF PERSONS IN GALLERY NOTING OPPOSITION ATTENDANCE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

A few weeks ago the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) drew the attention of the house to the fact that some people were taking the attendance of the opposition members in the house.

In the last few days, I have noticed that the very same people have moved from the gallery and now stand here, behind me, to check our attendance every day. I would therefore ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to see to it that we are not spied upon every day. Let them take note of the names of all the members, if necessary, but not only of the members of the opposition. Is this the procedure the Prime Minister intends to use to check absenteeism in the house?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker I am taking note of the fact that the member does not wish to be spied upon. If he has something to hide, I would ask those people not to take note of it.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I feel that the Prime Minister's reply is most evasive and even arrogant. I have nothing to hide, but I think that all members should be watched closely and not only a few. We should all be treated equally. Parliament is above the officials. We have a mandate from the people and, therefore, we are responsible to the people and not to those who go about in the lobbies scribbling things down in notebooks.

[English]

An hon. Member: Have you got a spy in the press gallery or in the official gallery?

[Translation]

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have had the occasion not long ago to complain personally about the fact that I was spied upon too much and I understand perfectly the hon. member's feelings.

[English]

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister on this matter of attendance. Is the Prime Minister aware that the Minister of Finance is here today and he should not be, and did he give him permission?

An hon. Member: You are a naughty boy.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

EARLY IMPLEMENTATION OF MEASURE—DISMISSAL OF COMMISSIONAIRES FROM MUSEUMS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Clerk of the Privy Council last October, as has been revealed by the secretary general of the National Museum, issued a memorandum urging the early implementation of the terms of the official languages bill and, if so, under whose or what authority was this done?

Mr. Speaker: In view of the fact the hon. member is referring to an incident which is alleged to have happened last October I doubt whether there is urgency to the question. If there is urgency, and it is certainly not apparent to me, and if the Prime Minister feels it can be answered, I have no objection.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, if this cannot be dealt with as a question on orders of the day, perhaps I could deal with it as a question of privilege. As we all know, the official languages bill has not yet been dealt with by this house, and if there are memoranda going out from official sources this must be under somebody's authority, for it certainly does not have the authority of parliament.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could be helpful. After the official languages bill was introduced in this house for first reading in October the Clerk of the Privy Council under my authority did write to various departmental heads to suggest that, in keeping with the government's desire to plan ahead, they take certain preparatory steps toward the day when they would have to implement such an act. There was no direction given for any specific action, but just an indication that provisions should be under way, so that when action was required the departments would be in a position to take it.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, the secretary general of the National Museum indicated that action was taken with reference to commissionaires.

Mr. Trudeau: That may have been the statement by the gentleman in question, but this was not under government direction.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

TABLING OF STANBURY-FIELD REPORT ON INDIAN TAXATION

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to what is referred to as the Stanbury-Field report on taxation of native Indian people, and the reply which the minister gave the house on Tuesday last. The minister made reference to the fact that there are certain aspects of that report which relate to the confidential nature of taxation on individuals, and I am wondering whether he would be prepared to table in the house the documentation which authorized this study, its terms of reference, authority and the like?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I shall look into the matter and report to the house as soon as possible.

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE

STEPS TO RELIEVE MEDICAL MANPOWER SHORTAGE

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask whether the Minister of National Health and Welfare has held any meetings with the provincial health ministers or the Canadian Medical Association in respect of the acute medical manpower shortage, and the provision of medical assistants?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there has been some discussion, a lot of which has been going on within the medical profession itself. I assume the hon. member is referring to doctors' aides. Our department is involved in this discussion and reacting to these views but, as the hon. member knows, we are not the ones who can make a decision. This is a decision for agencies such as the medical profession itself.

Mr. Rynard: Has there been any arrangement for a meeting with those bodies?

Mr. Munro: Not that I am aware of; but I will check, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Munro: While I am on my feet, may I amplify my answer to the hon. member for Simcoe North. He might very well have been referring to the task force on health costs that was set up as a result of the last federal-provincial conference of health ministers and that has met today. This matter may well be discussed.

ESTATE TAX ACT

ALLEGED SPECIAL BURDEN ON HEIRS TO FAMILY FARMS AND BUSINESSES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question which arises from the remarks of the Minister of Finance at the annual meeting of the London West Liberal Association, as reported in the press, where he admitted that the new estate tax places a special burden on estates of which the major assets are not liquid. Why was this special burden placed on the heirs to family farms and family businesses?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is relating the question he has posed to the minister now to a statement made outside the house, and I am sure he knows the rules in this regard.

Mr. McIntosh: I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member cannot ask a question supplementary to one that was not allowed.

OPPORTUNITY TO APPEAR BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, now that a great discussion has commenced on the proposed changes in the estate tax bill, and how they will affect not only farmers and businessmen but homeowners in cities, will the participatory democracy about which the Prime Minister so often speaks go so far as to allow interested parties to present their cases to an appropriate committee of the House of Commons before the final disposition of the bill or, failing this—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope the hon. member does not propose to go on until two o'clock tomorrow morning. It seems to me he is making a statement rather than asking a question. I wish he would ask a question, so the Chair may have an opportunity to rule on it.

Mr. Korchinski: Mr. Speaker, I have already asked one part of my question as to whether the appropriate committee of the House of Commons might hear briefs, or whether a secretariat might be set up to accept briefs which would be available for public scrutiny, and which might indicate the public concern over this socialistic measure.

Mr. Speaker: The question as asked by the hon. member is not one that can be accepted. It contains statements, allegations and expressions of opinion, and certainly as asked it cannot be received.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

PANARCTIC OIL—SHARING OF PROFITS BY INDIANS AND ESKIMOS

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Now that Panartic Oil has announced that it is digging two wells on Melville Island, can the minister tell the house whether consideration is being given by the department to ensure that Indian and Eskimo residents of the arctic areas will share in the profits of any oil or gas lines in these areas made by Panartic Oil?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether shares of that company will be distributed to Eskimos and Indians, but we have taken the necessary steps with Panartic to make sure that during the development work they will offer jobs to qualified Eskimos to work on Melville Island in digging operations.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: I do not think the minister understood my question. I was not suggesting that they get shares, but in many farm areas farmers get part of the profits from oil found on their land. I am asking that the same consideration be given to Indians and Eskimos.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I have nothing to add to my answer, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INTRODUCTION OF MEASURE RESPECTING INDIAN CLAIMS

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether it is the intention of the government to introduce the Indian Claims Commission bill again?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I answered this question a few days ago and my answer is the same.

[English]

SOUTH INDIAN LAKE, MAN.—FLOODING OF HOMES THROUGH HYDRO DEVELOPMENT

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Can the minister assure the house that his department will do everything possible to protect the interests of the approximately 100 Indian and Métis families at South Indian Lake who are now threatened with unilateral expulsion by the Manitoba government, due to flooding in connection with a hydro project?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I answered this question yesterday and we are extremely interested in the problem which a certain number of Indians in Manitoba have to face.

I would like to answer the specific question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) concerning lawyers' fees. The department does not have to pay the fees of lawyers hired by Indians to defend them, but I am informed that the Manitoba government has assured the Indians that it would meet the expenses incurred by them to enforce their rights.

[English]

ESTATE TAX ACT

ALLEGED SPECIAL BURDEN ON HEIRS TO FAMILY FARMS AND BUSINESSES

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, since you ruled out of order a previous question of mine, may I now rephrase it and ask the Minister of Finance why he finds it necessary to place a special tax burden, as he has admitted, on the heirs of family farms and family businesses?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is still argumentative.

Mr. McIntosh: On what grounds, Mr. Speaker?

[Later:]

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Twice I have tried to get a question across to the Minister of Finance. Last time I think you said that my question was argumentative. Was that the ruling you gave? I suggest my question was not argumentative and I should like to ask the minister why it is necessary to place this tax burden on family farms and family businesses.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot allow the minister to reply to the question. The hon. member, along with other members of this house, has placed on my shoulders the burden, which is not always a pleasant one, of being Speaker of this house. I am called upon to interpret the rules. I have interpreted the hon. member's question as being argumentative, and the matter is not subject to discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIntosh: Well, Mr. Speaker, may I rephrase my question and ask the minister whether it is his intention to place a special tax burden on the heirs of family farms and family businesses.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think that that question is somewhat more acceptable than the first one, and I will allow the minister to answer it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): I have tried to answer each question which my hon. friend asked. Also, I would like to assure my hon. friend from Saint John-Lancaster that I am in the house today because I knew the Leader of the Opposition would be out of the house.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Anybody who has eyes in his head would have seen that the Leader of the Opposition was in the house earlier, and I suggest the minister is here today because he is doing penance.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I rise on the same point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I say that the Leader of the Opposition left because he could not get any answers from the government.

Mr. Benson: I would simply like to say that it is very difficult to find out who the Leader of the Opposition is.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek can now see how argumentative his question was.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question raised by the hon. member with respect to the speech I made outside the house, I would simply like him to read the whole speech, in which I said that no undue burden was placed upon either family businesses or farms through the changes in the estate tax. If he wants, I will send him a copy of the speech.

Mr. J. H. Horner (Crowfoot): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it not a fact that the minister believes that a special burden is placed on estates which are not made up of liquid assets?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I will have to rule again that this is an argumentative question.

AGRICULTURE

POTATOES—SUPPORT TO ACREAGE PAYMENTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the continued depression in the potato market in all of eastern Canada, and particularly in Prince Edward Island, I wonder if the Agriculture Stabilization Board is now giving consideration to special support to acreage payments, as given last year, in order to offset the difficult times which farmers will have in putting in a crop in the spring?

[Mr. Speaker.]

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge we have had no requests for that, to date, and therefore it is not under active consideration. However, the department is always ready to consider proposals of this nature.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

INCREASED ASSISTANCE FOR BLIND PERSONS

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Has the minister received representations regarding increased assistance to blind persons, and what is being done about these representations?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not aware of any such representation of late, but I will check into the matter.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY INDUSTRY—ABANDONMENT OF QUOTA SUBSIDY SYSTEM

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the statement recently reported that the government's long term policy is to abandon the quota subsidy system presently in use for the dairy industry, would the minister consider making a statement regarding the alternatives he will propose?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I will send the hon. gentleman a copy of the speech. If he will read it I am sure he will find that what I said is that it is the government's policy to remove the need for subsidies and quotas.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Gleave: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I will allow the hon. member to ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Gleave: I wish to direct it to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the minister consider tabling the results of the study on the nationalization of the dairy industry in Canada, and the development of a departmental program in this area, as mentioned in the department's annual reports of 1965 and 1966?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I will consider the matter, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gleave: Will the minister take it as notice—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I assume the minister has taken it as notice. I also notice the hon. member for Brandon-Souris on a question of privilege.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENT AND FOR REINSTATEMENT OF COMMISSIONAIRES

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of privilege which I wish to address to the right hon. Prime Minister. In view of the possible infringement of privileges of the members of this house, with reference to the document issued by the Clerk of the Privy Council which has been circulated prior to parliament's consideration of Bill C-120, would the right hon. gentleman table that document so we could all peruse it?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe there was an infringement of the privileges of this house.

Mr. Diefenbaker: There certainly was.

Mr. Trudeau: The document itself was an internal document, and I do not believe it is the usual practice to table such documents. But I repeat that the purport of the document was to suggest that, the bill having been introduced, persons to whom the document was addressed should devote some time to a close analysis of the bill, and give some preliminary thought to its implications.

This, to me, does not seem to be an infringement of the privileges of this house; it is giving to civil servants a copy of a bill which is in the possession of the house and which is a public document, and saying, as is obviously true, that it is the government's intention to proceed with this bill. It is on the order paper, and we want to proceed with it quickly. It is giving people at department level the occasion to do some preliminary planning—no action. That is the purpose of the document.

Mr. Diefenbaker: An invitation to use the axe.

Mr. Nielsen: Since the document has been referred to, and partially interpreted by an employee of the government, does the Prime Minister not feel that hon. members of this house should also be entitled to peruse the document and assess the interpretation made?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not feel so, mainly for reasons of principle. There is nothing in this particular document that there is any particular reason for withholding. I have it here; it is a short one of four paragraphs. It is an internal direction from one civil servant to another, on the orders of the Prime Minister, telling him to do some preliminary thinking about a bill which is before the house.

An hon. Member: What about action?

Mr. Trudeau: The action will come after we have debated the bill.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on a point of order?

Mr. Nielsen: On the question of privilege—and there may be a point of order arising, now. I believe our rules require that once a document has been referred to, as it has been, in terms of content, vaguely though the Prime Minister may have done so, it must be tabled.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have no hesitation in ruling that the mere fact a public document has been mentioned does not require, under the rules, that it be tabled. Should a document be quoted from it has, according to our rules, to be tabled, if it is an official document quoted by a cabinet minister. But that is not my understanding of what has been done by the Prime Minister.

Mr. Nielsen: Hon. members will of course accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but the Prime Minister has in fact referred to the contents of a public document, and I submit our rules now require it to be tabled.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On that point of order, I recollect at least two occasions during the time I have been here when reference to a document, giving a summary of the contents, or a summary of a portion of the contents, was sufficient to require that the document be tabled. Were it otherwise, we would be in a position whereby a minister could simply interpret what he wanted to—he could give his own version of a direction handed to these various departments, and then refrain from tabling the document in the house. I think Your Honour should reconsider this question, because your decision means that ministers may simply give their own ideas as to the meaning of a document, without the house having an opportunity to ascertain whether or not the statements made by ministers were in accordance with the contents of those documents.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, the ruling I have given arises from the fact that I have often studied the precedents and the citations on this very point. It has so often arisen in the course of debate that hon. members demand that a document should be tabled, either because it has been referred to or because a minister has quoted from it.

I would think the citation I have before me justifies the ruling I have made.

> A minister of the Crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a despatch or other state paper not before the house unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table.

My suggestion to hon. members is that the Prime Minister has not quoted from the document. The hon. member says he has referred to the content. That is not my interpretation of what has been done by the Prime Minister.

Mr. MacLean: On the question of privilege, I have a question I should like to ask the Prime Minister. Since it seems evident that the intent of this document was misinterpreted by at least one of the officials receiving it, and that he took action on it which resulted in the termination of the employment of a number of persons, will the Prime Minister consider reinstating all those people who have been affected by a directive based on what is, as yet, only a bill and not an act of parliament?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Trudeau: Without accepting the premise that any employment has been terminated as a result of a misunderstanding of the document, I am prepared to ask the minister to study this case. I have already asked him what has happened in other similar cases, and he has told me there has been no termination of employment—that there had been some shift in employment from one part of a building to another.

An hon. Member: With loss of pay.

Mr. Trudeau: No termination of employment and no loss of pay.

An hon. Member: Sent to Siberia.

[Later:]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I do not want to prolong the discussion unduly, but I thought my hon. friend from Peace River was rising on the same point. Your Honour did make a ruling with regard to a document. I would respectfully recommend to Your Honour the reading of citation 159 paragraph 3. I would also point out that the Prime Minister indicated to members of the house he had the document itself in front of him.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Speaker: I should like at this point to read from citation 159. I have before me 159 (3) which reads:

> It has been admitted that a document which has been cited ought to be laid upon the table of the house, if it can be done without injury to the public interest.

This should be read along with citation 159(1). What I suggested to hon. members in the ruling I made a moment ago was that the document had not been cited by the Prime Minister. He referred to the document, but of course that is not the same as making a citation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): May I ask the President of the Privy Council to tell us, as leader of the house, the nature of forthcoming business?

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. As the house knows, today we shall begin the debate on second reading of the omnibus Criminal Code bill. Because of the wide interest in the bill and the prospective list of speakers it is anticipated we shall continue second reading tomorrow and on Monday.

In view of the heavy volume of business before the committees—the 15 legislative items before the standing committees—it is my intention to propose a motion similar to the one moved last November, that the sitting for Tuesday be suspended in order that the standing committees may pursue their study of the legislative items on that day.

On Wednesday and Thursday next I propose to call order No. 1 for the consideration of the business of supply. I understand there will be an opposition motion forthcoming on those two allotted days.

Mr. Baldwin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that, inspired and led by the opposition the house has given second reading to 15 bills in seven days, can the leader of the house indicate when some constructive measures will be brought before the house—and I hasten to say I exclude from that description any measures sponsored by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. member for York South we shall soon be making an announcement with respect to the legislative program for the balance of the session, perhaps on Thursday next.

• (3:00 p.m.)

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice) moved second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in introducing this massive bill I am very sensitive of the solemn duty that I have to the law of this country and of the effect that this bill, if adopted by the house, will have on the individual lives and individual human rights of everyone in Canada. I speak this afternoon with the confidence that this legislation is the most important and all-embracing reform of the criminal and penal law ever attempted at one time in this country. The omnibus measure contains matters of deep social significance which, in the course of time, will affect the lives of most of us, perhaps each one of us, in varying degrees.

I submit this bill to the scrutiny of this house, weighing as best I can the delicate balance between law and morals and the historic ideal of the rule of law in a free society. In placing these matters before you, sir, the government is endeavouring to have the criminal law reflect the attitude of what most persons believe to be reasonable and necessary for the well-being of our society or, to put it in another way, to bring the law into line with the times.

The interest shown in that project has been tremendous. No wonder that such interest often became argumentative.

In my opinion, it would have been absolutely unrealistic to hope that the proposals which have been made would be free of controversy. However, the fact that such controversy exists, although serious and sober, ought not to stand in the way of the proposed bill before this house.

We have listened to and carefully weighed the arguments and the views from all sides and, on that basis, we have tried to draft a bill which, we believe, is sound and useful and will receive the approval of most of the people in this parliament as well as outside.

[English]

Much has been said and written recently about the concept of law and order. It was probably the underlying issue in the recent election in the United States. We are not immune from that discussion; what is happening there is contagious. We are witnessing what has been described as a new search for human values and relationships—relationships between man and man and between men and government, new relationships that have new meaning in the technical and psychological context of our age.

What this search and the accompanying changes mean, as far as I am concerned, are not a demand for law and order that freeze men into a predetermined pattern but law and order that respond to change and to movement and give us options. Because, sir, yesterday's order, if unresponsive to change, becomes tomorrow's oppression.

[Translation]

It is not the first review of the Criminal Code. However, I do not think that any other review of our criminal statutes has aroused such a great interest. It is true that in 1954, parliament studied and adopted a general review of the Criminal Code but its main purpose was, on the one hand, to give it a more orderly and understandable pattern and, on the other hand, to change and repeal provisions which had become obsolete. Since its inception in 1892, until the early 50's, the Code had been amended several times, but in a piecemeal fashion and without any overall plan. By making these remarks I do not wish to depreciate the results achieved by the review of 1954.

It was really a necessary and significant task. However, it did not get the kind of contribution which the bill under consideration has inspired all across the country.

No bill concerning the Criminal Code has been as much scrutinized and commented upon by members of the legal profession as well as the people in general.

This bill will be remembered, I am sure, as a high point in penal reform in Canada.

[English]

This bill is identified, and will be identified in the future, with the indelible imprint of our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). It was he who had the courage to assemble it, to introduce it into parliament and to defend it across the land under the sharp scrutiny of a general election. If ever, then, there was a legislative measure that has been tested by public opinion and received a popular mandate, if ever the people of Canada have been given an opportunity to participate in public debate surrounding a legislative measure, it is this omnibus Criminal Code bill. We in this House of Commons, sir, have had a full opportunity to review and discuss it. The people of Canada have had every opportunity to look at it and to talk about it.

Since assuming this portfolio I have received representations, both public and private, from every quarter. I am glad to say that I sought all the advice I could from whoever would give it to me. I am grateful to those in the house and outside the house who have made their views known to me. I particularly want to thank, of course, the members of the legal profession from whom we heard. I am grateful to the memberships of the various delegations who came to see us, and I thank the thousands of individual citizens who expressed their opinions to me.

We were, of course, in touch with the provincial Attorneys General, and with the permission of the house I should like to table at this time the correspondence sought earlier by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) between the various Attorneys General of the provinces and the government of Canada.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a little late now.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I said that I would submit it at the appropriate time. With the permission of the house I should like to table it now.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (3:10 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): It took some time, I might say, to obtain the necessary consent of the Attorneys General, which explains in some measure the delay in tabling the documents. As will be seen from a comparison of Bill C-150 with the earlier Bill C-195, the representations we received did result in certain changes. Finally, I am grateful to all hon. members from all parties who gave me their advice and counsel and understanding.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, this bill is not easy to read. It contains 120 clauses in 126 pages. It takes a stand on some of the controversial questions of our time. Some of them pertain to the most inner part of our lives: life itself, death and the most delicate personal relations between human beings. I would be amazed indeed if even one of the hon. members showed an equal enthusiasm for all of the 120 proposals. Who could expect that? Any amendment to the Criminal Code induces controversy. Our response to this bill will depend upon our tolerance and our understanding of the needs of a pluralist society, a society where everyone must strive to reconcile his opinions and personal beliefs, including the ones dearest to his heart, with those of his neighbours, who are also earnest and sincere.

This bill will also test our respect for the sacredness of the law. It will prompt many of us to search their own hearts thoroughly.

[English]

Some hon. members have had to struggle with themselves to accept this bill. Some have had to struggle mightily because it deals with fundamental concepts. I understand this, and the Prime Minister and members of the government understand it. I hope nothing I say today or in the later stages of this bill will give any hon. member any impression other than that I deeply respect the consciences and private convictions of all hon. members.

Mr. McGrath: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): With the indulgence of the hon. member I will, at the end of my speech. I know the pressures to which a good many hon. members are subjected, and I respect them. Nevertheless, I believe that all the provisions of this bill are beneficial and in the best public interest, and I hope the measure I am introducing this afternoon will eventually find favour with the majority of hon. members and, even more important, meet with the approval of most of our fellow citizens.

Despite the variety of the subject matters contained in the bill and despite the wide range of views held about them, the government is firm in its conviction that this house and the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs later will deal with this bill as one bill, indivisible, and not as several individual items of legislation. When I first accepted this portfolio I wanted to assure myself that the will of the house could be properly tested on every clause. I am satisfied, particularly under the new rules, that this can be done. I am now satisfied that the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs will review the bill clause by clause. When the bill is reported back to the house from committee, amendments to any clause are permissible under the new rules. So, sir, no hon. member will be deprived of the opportunity of making his view or vote known or felt, if that is his intention.

Why should the bill be split? Hon. members are not being deprived any rights in respect of any clause. And if the bill were split, how would we go about splitting it? Would there be a separate bill for the clauses affecting therapeutic abortion, lotteries, the breathalizer test or the gun law? How far would we go and where would we stop? The government is of the opinion that this bill stands for the general principle of criminal and penal law reform and should be dealt with by the house on that basis.

I want to say, too, that the government fully endorses this bill. It is a government bill, bears the government stamp and will be supported by the government. We feel bound to the bill as the principal item of social reform in this session of parliament. It is identified with our Prime Minister and party. We believe it has been tested favourably with the people of Canada and has met the approval of the people in a general election. We believe therefore that, on the one hand, we have the right and, on the other hand, the duty to stand behind the bill in all stages of debate that will follow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Again I want to say that I recognize the personal and individual trials of conscience that some hon. members have faced, and I hope that in my dealings with any hon. member I do not trespass on the inner preserves of his private convictions.

With the indulgence of the house I should like to deal with some individual provisions of the bill, with some of those that have provoked the most comment. One of the most significant amendments proposed in the bill is aimed at the drinking driver. I think all hon. members are concerned about the rash of highway accidents and death on our roads, and it might be useful to recite a few figures. In Canada, 5,379 people died in highway accidents in 1967. This was over 200 more people than died in the same way in 1966. Publications of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics show that in the years from 1958 to 1967 the number of persons killed on our highways rose by over 66 per cent and the number of persons injured in the same period in highway accidents rose by more than 100 per cent. During the first six months of 1968, compared with the similar period in 1967, increases were registered in all categories of motor vehicle accidents. Traffic injuries were up 8.4 per cent over the same period in 1967 and traffic deaths were up 4.1 per cent over that same period in 1967.

The point of this part of the legislation is that the drinking driver is responsible for a disproportionate share of these accidents. The truth of what I am submitting to the house has been forcefully demonstrated by the study carried on in Grand Rapids, Michigan. This study is regarded as the best and most exhaustive practical study in this field in North America. By careful comparisons of groups of persons who were involved in traffic accidents—the study extended over a year and each group covered some 8,000 people—the experts who conducted the study were able to demonstrate a number of things. They demonstrated that blood alcohol levels over 0.04 per cent are definitely associated with an increased accident involvement. The probability of accident involvement increases rapidly at alcohol levels over 0.08 per cent and becomes extremely high at levels above 0.15 per cent. When drivers with blood alcohol levels over 0.08 per cent have accidents they tend to have more single vehicle accidents, more severe accidents in terms of injury and damage and more expensive accidents than similar sober drivers.

Another point brought out by the study is that drivers in the higher alcohol level classes tend to become involved more frequently in the more severe accidents. Less than 5 per cent of the drivers in the 0.00 per cent alcohol level class are involved in fatal and serious personal injury accidents but almost 10 per cent of the drivers in the 0.08 per cent and higher alcohol level class are involved in the severest class of accidents. Thus an accident involved driver in the 0.08 per cent and higher alcohol level class is almost twice as frequently involved in a fatal or serious accident as the driver in the 0.00 per cent alcohol level class. This, then, I would submit to Your Honour is the answer to the question, what do deaths and injuries on the highways have to do with the drinking driver?

• (3:20 p.m.)

The next question which arises is, what assurance is there that the setting of a statutory blood alcohol limit and the compulsion to take a breathalyzer test will have any appreciable effect on drivers who drink and, in turn, on the death and injury rate? Apart from the obvious answer dictated by the figures I recited from the study, and from common sense, the experience in the United Kingdom gives ground to expect that if this legislation passes there will be several hundred Canadians alive next year who would not be alive if there were no compulsory breathalyzer test. There will be several thousand more persons uninjured and several thousand more hospital beds free for people with other illnesses which would otherwise be occupied by patients broken in bone and spirit in traffic accidents.

[Translation]

In addition to showing the part which is played in traffic accidents by drivers who take alcoholic drinks, the study entitled "Grand Rapids" supports the opinion that .08 per cent represents the real danger level. That is why this figure of .08 per cent was proposed by the standing committee on justice and legal affairs, a few years ago, by the Canadian Bar Association, by the British Medical Association and by the Legislature of Manitoba in its resolution of May 1968. It is also the figure which was used in 1967 in the Road Traffic Act in the United Kingdom.

As for the Canadian Medical Association, they recommend a figure of .05 per cent. The present bill recommends the adoption of a figure set—with the support of a number of authorities—at .08 per cent.

An act which would make it an offence for anyone to drive an automobile when the alcohol level in his blood exceeds .08 per cent would be unrealistic, from a practical point of view, if at the same time, it did not provide for compulsory tests.

Consequently, the present bill suggests that, under definite circumstances, a citizen could be requested to provide a sample of his breath to be analyzed. The bill does not request any sample of blood or urine.

[Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton).]

[English]

When the resolution in favour of compulsory breathalizer tests was passed by the Canadian Bar Association, there were immediate outcries across Canada that such a proposal was a retrograde step and involved compulsory self-incrimination. I want to say that the traditional rules of self-incrimination apply only to statements or declarations made by accused persons. The view I am now expressing is supported by the Supreme Court of Canada. Self-incrimination does not extend to physical or real conditions or to mark such as a man's fingerprints, footprints, the state of his clothing, the state of his behaviour or the state of his breath. Under the bill the driver is not subject to a compulsory breathalyzer test unless at that time, or within the previous two hours, he has conducted himself in such a way that a peace officer, in the words of the bill, "would have reasonable and probable grounds" in arresting him for impaired driving.

The burden would be on the Crown to prove his conduct and if the arrest was not justified the driver would be entitled, with impunity, to refuse the breathalyzer test.

Mr. Woolliams: If he doesn't he is convicted.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We will discuss that, Mr. Speaker.

As a member of the legal profession and as someone who believes in civil rights I think any type of compulsion is unsavoury in a free society, and any type of compulsion enforced by penal statute or by the state must find its justification not merely in a rule of law but in the needs of the community. I am submitting to the house that the needs of the community more than justify the proposed amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: Don't misrepresent the law.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): With respect, I do not think I am misrepresenting the law, but we can argue that later. As with other provisions of this bill, it is a question of weighing the conflicting interests—the balance of public convenience—that can never be totally reconciled. It is my view and the view of the government that in deciding which is the more vital to social order in Canada and to the benefit of the majority of the people in our country, there should be severe penalties in case of drinking and driving.

I am determined to fight murder on the highways and to combat carnage on the roads. I am convinced that firmer action is required by this parliament to shake up the conscience and state of awareness of the Canadian people, and to support the sound sense of the admonition found on some billboards, "If you drink don't drive, if you drive don't drink." If you heed that observation I can say that is the admonition to which this test is applied. All of us have been in the situation where we have said to ourselves—and I am not a hypocrite about this—"There but for the grace of God go I."

I now want to talk briefly about firearms. A number of significant amendments are proposed which will tighten control over the availability and the use of firearms in the interest of public safety. This is a tougher gun law. There are some entirely new offences and procedures created by the bill. It provides for the making by a court of a prohibitory order against criminals who have been convicted of offences involving firearms. It provides for a new search and seizure procedure at the instance of the provincial Attorney General where the personal safety of any person is involved. It provides for a new offence of selling or in any way transferring a weapon to anyone under a prohibition order or to anyone of unsound mind. It provides for a new offence of dangerous use, carriage or possession of firearms, aimed at the trigger-happy hunter, the type who goes out into the woods, hears something and fires, the type who sees something, does not know what it is, and fires. At the moment juries are loath to convict because the only available charge is criminal negligence with a maximum penalty of life. This new offence will have a maximum penalty of two years.

The bill provides for a more realistic approach to the question of possession of firearms by younger persons by generally prohibiting children under the age of 14 from using firearms except under the personal supervision of someone who has a permit, someone who is lawfully entitled to use a firearm. It requires young people between 14 and 17 years of age to obtain a permit to possess a firearm of any sort.

I am going to confess to the house that I do not believe there is any foolproof gun law. Even if we were to withdraw every weapon in the country—

An hon. Member: You would have a revolution.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa Carleton): —even apart from the political factors involved, if we were to enforce registration of every weapon in the country a gun could always get into the wrong hands, and in this area of legislation, as in others, it is not possible to reconcile all the conflicting interests.

I am glad to say that no gun enthusiast or organization of sportsmen or gun club has ever suggested to me that there should not be a gun law. The real issue, I would submit to hon. members, is to achieve controls which will discourage and penalize the criminal and the criminally careless, which will remove lethal weapons from the irresponsible or mentally ill, which will help to foster social attitudes against violence and which will at the same time leave the avenue open for responsible people to engage in legitimate sport and hobbies involving firearms in the same way as those interested in motor racing are left free under restricted and controlled conditions to exceed the speed limit.

I now want to turn briefly to the question of lotteries. I may say that I am dealing now with those clauses of the bill that have provoked the most public response and comment. The proposed amendments concerning lotteries—and when I use the word "lotteries" I mean games of chance generally—incorporate a fundamentally new approach in the sense that the amount and nature of gaming which will be permitted will depend to a considerable extent on the policy of provincial authorities in issuing the licences to which I will refer in a moment. The attitude toward lotteries in Canada varies in various parts of the country. The proposed amendments will provide, to an appreciable degree, for recognition of that fact. The nature of the proposed amendments might be described as local option within prescribed limits set in the Code. The amendments also clarify an important obscurity in the present law in relation to the conduct of lotteries by religious and charitable organizations.

I shall just deal, Mr. Speaker, with a few essential aspects. First of all, any provincial government, either alone or in conjunction with the government of another province, will be allowed to conduct a lottery. I was asked, on several occasions, whether municipal institutions would be also allowed to conduct lotteries, under the proposed act. The answer is no, except in the case of provincial lotteries where they may be appointed as representatives of the provinces.

Secondly, no province will be allowed to conduct any lottery system in another province without being authorized to do so by the government of the latter.

Thirdly, charitable and religious organizations will be allowed to run lotteries under a provincial licence. How many and how big these lotteries may be will depend on the licences. As the law now stands, those organizations can occasionally have lotteries, but the words "occasionally"—"à l'occasion" —and "usually" explain the great differences which exist between the lotteries authorized in various regions of the country. In the final analysis, the attitude of the local authorities is the determining factor. And it is that ambiguity, which I pointed out a while ago, which will be removed.

[English]

We have heard more from individuals on the proposed amendments concerning abortion than on any other provision. This aspect of the law was also the subject of exhaustive consideration by the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. It is a matter that is undoubtedly of profound concern to all of us, and it has been the subject of debate, often very emotional debate, for a number of years.

The Prime Minister and I have both said on previous occasions that in considering this proposition before the house it is important to bear in mind the uncertain state of the present law. To assume that the present law on abortion is clear and thereby to move on from there to allege that the amendments are too stringent, or not stringent enough, or in substance change nothing is, in my submission, arguing from a false premise. The fact is that the present state of the law is not clear and one of the overriding purposes of the legislation is to clarify it.

The legal officers of the Department of Justice have been unable to find a single reported Canadian case, involving a charge of unlawfully procuring an abortion, which discusses abortion for medical reasons as a defence to that charge. Some claim that in Canada there is no defence whatever to a charge of procuring a miscarriage based upon medical considerations; others argue that a miscarriage may be procured if it is necessary to preserve a woman's life; and still others maintain that the law is not being amended in substance but is merely being codified and will reflect what is now being done in hospitals under responsible management by ethical members of the medical profession with the tacit, if not the express, approval of those responsible for the administration of the criminal law.

The essential point of the proposed amendments is that abortion shall not be unlawful if a committee of physicians in an accredited hospital certify that in their opinion the continuation of the pregnancy of the female person, of the mother, would or would be likely to endanger her life or health. Those are the words of the clause. I wish to emphasize that the test is danger to the life or health of the expectant mother.

Whether an abortion is justified for the reasons mentioned will involve the making of a decision by members of the medical profession based on medical considerations. Needless to say, that judgment will have to be made in a bona fide manner. Under this bill abortion based solely on considerations of eugenics or the commission of sexual offences is not included. Therapeutic abortion committees will not be called upon to decide whether a criminal offence has been committed. We have considered that such a therapeutic abortion committee is not the proper forum to deal with questions of that kind.

I realize full well that this matter goes right to the essence of life, goes right to the bone. There is not going to be any consensus on this issue in this house or in the country. There are those on the one hand who abhor abortion for any cause, or for any reason whatsoever. There are those on the other hand who would make abortion wholly permissive or at the personal option of the woman. We have not reached a consensus between those views in this bill. We have reached only what I might call an accommodation. When the life or health of a mother is in jeopardy, therapeutic miscarriage will be absolved from the penalties in the criminal law.

This proposed legislation does not authorize the taking of foetal life; it does not promote abortion. It simply removes certain categories of abortion from the present place they have on the list of indictable offences. I want to repeat that the legislation does not promote abortion; it permits it under the restricted circumstance where the mother's life or health might be in danger. I believe that any member—and I say this after a good deal of personal reflection—may in good conscience support this clause if he is convinced as I am that its net effect will be to foster rather than impede the general public and civic good.

That is the test I would urge members to apply to this particular issue.

I should also like to mention specifically certain other amendments. I realize I will go a little longer than the permitted time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You have unlimited time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Thank you for reminding me. There are 120 clauses and 126 pages in the bill. Even within the restricted scope to which I am now limiting myself I will be doing inadequate justice to the bill.

These amendments remove certain sexual conduct between consenting adults in private from the purview of the criminal law. There is one point which I cannot emphasize too strongly in this regard. It is that parliament would not, in enacting these amendments, be condoning this type of conduct. Parliament by not imposing the criminal law upon fornication or adultery is not thereby condoning fornication or adultery. By having broadened the laws affecting divorce during the last parliament, parliament did not by that promote or condone divorce as a remedy worthy of emulation. Individuals will continue to be responsible to themselves for their moral behaviour.

I should like to place on the record a passage from the Wolfenden report dealing with this matter in the United Kingdom:

> Unless a deliberate attempt is to be made by society, acting through the agency of the law, to equate the sphere of crime with that of sin, there must remain a realm of private morality and immorality which is, in brief and crude terms, not the law's business. To say this is not to condone or encourage private immorality. On the contrary, to emphasize the personal and private nature of moral or immoral conduct is to emphasize the personal and private responsibility of the individual for his own actions, and that is a responsibility which a mature agent can property be expected to carry for himself without the threat of punishment from the law.

Portions of this bill relate to the operations of the Department of the Solicitor General and fall within the jurisdiction of my colleague who is here sitting in the house with me. They deal with the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act and the Prisons and Reformatories Act. There is in addition one section of the Criminal Code, section 634, which deals with imprisonment of over two years and less than two years. That proposed amendment is also the concern of the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith).

I feel, I must point out briefly the eight main topics which fall within his jurisdiction:

I shall not deal at length with these amendments, as the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) will comment on them in due course. At this point, I shall limit myself to pointing out that they deal, among others, with the following topics:

(1) the circumstances which make it necessary for delinquents to be imprisoned in a penitentiary or a provincial institution;

(2) an increase in the number of members on the National Parole Board;

(3) the continuous supervision and orientation of those delinquents who are released, not on parole, but for having accumulated remissions in excess of 60 days;

(4) the crediting of the remission periods deserved by the inmate in the calculation of the length of his parole;

(5) the obligation to credit to the inmate the period of time during which he has been held after suspension of his parole or while waiting for its cancellation;

(6) faster transportation to the penitentiary of inmates originally detained in a provincial institution while their appeal is heard;

(7) a proposed new standard for remission applicable to the inmates of provincial institutions in order to allow them to be eligible for total remission as they would have been allowed had they been detained in a penitentiary.

[English]

That is neither an exhaustive nor a detailed exposition of the provisions of the bill which fall within the jurisdiction of my colleague, the Solicitor General. He will be explaining further that part of the bill relating to the matters for which he is charged under his statute.

I do not wish to go into any detail about the amendments in respect of harassing telephone calls, but I would hope that that provision will be looked into by members of the committee. I draw it to the attention of the house.

There are some important amendments relating to suspended sentence and probation. At the committee stage I hope these amendments will be given thorough scrutiny.

There is an important amendment in respect of misleading advertising which transfers the provisions of section 306 of the Criminal Code to the Combines Investigation Act and gives the federal Attorney General jurisdiction over the prosecution. I cannot resist saying that the consumer has a fundamental right to correct information and that truth in advertising is essential to any charter for the consumer. I hope these amendments will more effectively protect the consumer's right to correct information in future. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) and I intend that there shall be vigorous enforcement of these provisions on a national basis.

In response to many pleas from societies and others concerned about cruelty to animals there are some important amendments in the Code relating to cruelty to animals. There are also some important provisions relating to fitness to stand trial and insanity, basically to the effect that the guilt of the accused should be first tested before the issue of insanity is tested so that insanity does not prevent the nature of innocence or guilt from remaining forever in abeyance. Hon. members will want to review these very carefully.

There is one matter I should like to mention which involves the detention of witnesses. I mentioned it when I introduced the bill before Christmas. Under the law as it now stands a material witness in a criminal case can be detained with no time limit prescribed if there are grounds to believe he will not appear to testify when required to do so. Under the amendment it is proposed that no witness shall be detained for a period exceeding 30 days unless prior to the expiration of that time he is brought before a judge. It is proposed that a person detained as a witness may on his own motion, within that 30-day period, make application to be brought before a judge. Unless the judge before whom the witness is brought is satisfied that his continued detention is justified, either because of evidence adduced at the time of that application and because it is clear that his evidence at the trial itself will be material to the case, the judge will have to order him to be discharged or released on recognizance. On the other hand, if the judge is satisfied that his continued detention is justified, he may order that he remain in custody but the total period of detention shall not under any circumstances exceed 90 days.

The case which gave rise to the proposed amendments was brought to light by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). I am sorry he is not here now to hear me say this. It involved the detention for several months of a young fellow, 20-year old Henri Berubé, at Montreal because it was alleged that he had been an eyewitness to the murder of James D. Ross. I hope it will give the right hon. gentleman some personal satisfaction to know that his crusade in this particular case has brought a remedy into the criminal law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I now ask the house to proceed with the second reading of the bill. As I understand the precedents and the Standing orders of the house, Mr. Speaker, consent at the second reading of the bill represents agreement on the main principles of law reform, within the limits of the bill, as well as on referring the bill to the committee.

• (3:50 p.m.)

[English]

May I say to members of the standing committee that I appreciate the considerable amount of work that will now be before them if the house grants second reading to this bill. I am confident that members of the committee will give this measure a thorough study and their best judgment. This bill will provide a major test for the new rules and the broadening of our committee system. I have always believed that the power of the legislature should be strengthened as against that of the executive. The committee system should provide members of parliament with a forum in which to exercise their individual judgment and in which to obtain the necessary information upon which to base that judgment. The proper functioning of our committee system is not to my mind an Americanization of our parliamentary traditions but rather a means whereby the individual member of parliament can better fulfil his role as an intelligent servant of the people in the way they intended when they put all of us here.

I do not intend to tamper with the freedom of the committee. I respect its membership and its collective judgment. Under the new rules the committee will technically be able to call witnesses as it deems fit. I do not intend to transgress upon the committee's prerogative in this regard, and I hope I am not doing so now if I remind the house that certain aspects of this bill have already received deep study by members of the House of Commons, particularly those relating to abortion and the breathalyzer test. When the committee in its good judgment sees fit, my parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Cantin), whom I wish to thank publicly for all his help and support in the presentation of this bill, will consider it a privilege, as will I, to appear before the committee together with the officials of the Department of Justice.

May I say in conclusion that there is nothing immutable or unchangeable about the criminal law in this country. There is nothing infallible about parliament which enacts it. Reform of the criminal law should not be just a decennial tradition—not just once in ten years. I think reform of the criminal law should take place more frequently than that and more frequently than even just once each parliament. If in the light of experience any changes or additions to the Criminal Code appear not to have been in the public interest, they can always be changed or repealed at any time. Nor will I hesitate to bring forward any further amendments in the future whenever that appears to be in the public interest, as I subscribe to continuous legal reform.

The government intends to establish an independent national law reform commission having as its principal term of reference the continuous reform of federal statutes, giving us the ability as well to plan ahead in the development of our law. This commission will be independent of government and will be charged with an objective assessment of our law and its applications. We have established a research branch in the Department of Justice so that the justice side of the department will be just as effective as the Attorney General's side.

It is my hope that shortly after this bill has been dealt with I will be in a position to introduce another bill dealing with, among other things, wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping, pre-trial detention and bail.

I ask the members of this house to summon up their best collective judgment in the analysis of this complicated measure. Today all of us here embark once again upon that endless search for justice and for an understanding and compassionate system of law, perhaps falling short of the goal in our uncertain stumblings but always seeking the ultimate reach of the human heart.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I think I would be remiss in my duty and responsibility as the first speaker for the official opposition on this serious matter if I did not say that I listened to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) with great interest. I know he took great care in preparing his address.

I suppose this might be an afternoon when all the critics of lawyers might look upon us and say that they all have certain characteristics and to some degree are slightly charismatic. To take a personal approach for a moment, last year I noticed a comment in the Globe and Mail—someone drew this to my attention over the weekend—that I sometimes impersonate Perry Mason. I felt very deeply about that, a little touched and a little hurt. I am about the age of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), not a chicken or a boy. I have been practising law for 25 years. If Perry Mason appears to act like me then I suggest he has copied some of my methods over the years.

On the serious side, we have a motion before us that this omnibus bill receive second reading and be referred to the standing committee. The order of business reads:

> Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-150, an act to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act.

Although I do not intend to do so now, at the conclusion of my speech I will move the following amendment, and I read it now to bring it to the attention of hon. members, particularly the spokesmen for other parties:

> That the said motion be amended by adding after the words "National Defence Act" the following:
> "and the said standing committee be instructed to make and bring into the house four separate reports in relation to the following matters contained in the bill,
> all clauses:
> (a) referring to abortion;
> (b) referring to homosexuality and gross indecency;
> (c) referring to lotteries and gambling; and
> (d) all the remaining clauses of the bill."

We say at the outset that the committee should be instructed under the new rules to bring in four distinct and separate reports on the matters I have set down in the amendment I intend to move at the conclusion of my speech. I realize and appreciate that I am treading on new ground. Under the new rules the philosophy and purpose behind second reading of a bill before the house are completely changed. Under the former rules governing the procedures of parliament the matter of principle was under consideration and discussion, and when the speeches were finished and the question was put the vote and decision of the House of Commons were made on the principle of the bill itself. In brief, when we considered the principle of the bill we considered the fundamental primary elements and the fundamental truth and the general law contained therein. We also considered the fundamental moral motive and the substance of the bill, particularly in respect of a bill such as this. But second reading of a bill has been downgraded and is now a matter of procedure only.

Under the new rules a member of parliament can wholly disagree with the principle, the substance, the motive and the purpose of a bill and vote for it on second reading because he is merely sending the bill on a trip to a standing committee for study. We have always had the procedure, and I want to make this clear because some people think this is new, of studying a bill by referring it to a standing committee of the house. I need not bring to your attention, Mr. Speaker, with your years of experience as our Speaker, the great volume of changes made in the National Transportation Act. Actually a brand new bill was produced as the result of the many hours, days and weeks of study by the committee before it was brought back to the house. Many amendments were moved to the bill by that committee. Many suggestions were made. So the fact that under the new rules the standing committee will consider this bill clause by clause is nothing new. This is not a new reform; we have been doing it ever since we have had the parliament of Canada.

The Minister of Justice said in the House of Commons on January 16 in answer to my oral question that the bill would not be split into categories or divisions separating that part of the bill dealing with acts in private between husband and wife or consenting 21-year old adults, that part pertaining to gambling and lotteries for particular purposes, namely, when the proceeds are used for a charitable or religious object, or with regard to wagering on horse races, agricultural fairs or exhibitions, etc., that part of the bill legalizing an abortion to a female person where the continuation of her pregnancy would be likely to endanger her life or health and, lastly, the other general terms and amendments to the Code with which the Minister of Justice dealt at the end of his speech. The minister, as we do, once wanted the bill categorized and broken down in order that abortion, homosexuality, lotteries and the other amendments could be considered separately so that every member of the House of Commons could vote according to his conscience. That is what we want.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: There is no way in which the minister can say that this is not what he intended and that he has changed his opinion. In fact I say to the minister now that his presentation in this regard seemed to be apologetic. He was regretful and was on the defensive; he protested too much. He laboured hard trying to explain and justify his position. So far as the test of the general election is concerned, I will not go into that subject. I will only say that it was not part of the government's program to go to the people on matters of homosexuality or abortion. Perhaps the charisma of the Prime Minister might have had something to do with it.

I need not remind the house that lotteries, homosexuality and abortion are matters of great concern to our consciences. They are matters of concern to the sense of what is right or wrong in one's conduct or motives. They are matters of concern impelling all Canadians toward the right action according to their consciences. They are matters that are complex, made up of component parts of ethical and moral principles that control or inhibit the actions or thoughts of every Canadian. They may be described as involving for every Canadian an inhibiting sense of what is prudent, just and right. These subjects must be given strict and reverential examination. I want that kind of consideration, and the Canadian people want it so they can express themselves and their consciences on these separate and distinct matters. I suggest the Minister of Justice also wants this.

This leads to comprehending the complexity of these many subjects affecting the conscience of every Canadian. There are members on both sides of the house who will have to compromise some of their principles and, above all, compromise the principles of their constituents, because we are not here primarily to study and understand our own consciences. We are representing the people of Canada—265 members speaking for 20 million Canadians. That is why we are here. Parliament is the people's conscience. There are members who would vote for all parts of the bill except those clauses dealing with homosexuality. That is the way some of them feel, and that feeling exists among members on the other side.

An hon. Member: How do you know?

Mr. Woolliams: Because I have talked to some of them. Here I would say to the new members that there is a gentleman's agreement that one never discloses the source of one's information by name. However, let me not be put off the track.

There may be members who would vote for all parts of the bill but those sections in reference to abortion, and they should have that privilege. Others might vote for those sections of the bill if the word "health" was legally defined, and they also should have that privilege. The same problem may arise as to lotteries. To carry the argument to its conclusion, on the one hand there may be members who will not vote for any of the sections dealing with homosexuality, lotteries or abortion but are prepared to support other merited changes and reforms to the Code. The whole package may be good politics but the way in which it is presented to parliament exemplifies rotten procedure and bad reform.

I do not believe I am treading on sacred ground when I remind the government and the minister that various religious groups and bodies differ on what they consider acceptable to their faiths, their religious institutions and their consciences. It is utter nonsense to suggest that members of parliament and indeed Canadians, who were one of the first peoples to be guaranteed their religious freedom by the common law, by the Bill of Rights and by other statutes, can separate their spiritual and the temporal responsibilities. I remember when in July of 1960 the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) pointed out in the debate on the Bill of Rights that Canada was the first nation to get its religious freedom by statute. Students of political science will recall the following words from St. Matthew, which have been quoted in many political texts:

> Render therefore unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's;
> And unto God the things that are God's.

Of course we must differentiate between the spiritual and the temporal. Therefore this bill should be separated and divided so that all changes can be fairly decided upon according to the consciences of members of parliament and the people of this nation. I point out that when the Minister of Justice was campaigning for leadership he realized and appreciated the degree of feeling connected with some of these matters and felt the political pulse of the delegates. He said that this bill would in fact be considered in the manner I suggest today, that it would be divided to allow us to express ourselves according to our consciences and our feelings. I ask him now, why the change? I ask him in all sincerity, because he knows I respect him as a friend, who runs his department?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do not recall ever having said that during the leadership convention. Mind you, I said a lot of things but I do not think I said that.

Mr. Woolliams: I never thought that from the time the convention was called until now the minister had ever stopped running for the leadership. But I will not get into an argument about that. If he says he did not say it during the active part of the leadership campaign, let me tell him he did say it on TV and to the press. I have the clippings. I do not intend to get into an argument in that regard. But since he is rising on a point of order let me ask him: Who runs his department? Does he or does the Prime Minister?

At the end of my speech I shall make some points concerning why I consider my amendment to the main motion to be relevant and in order. Before I leave this point let me make it clear that we in this party did not move that the bill be not read a second time, nor did we move that the standing committee not study it. We merely intend to move an amendment on the substance of the bill, that when it goes to committee it be studied in a certain manner. I submit that this puts the amendment in order.

I will now go on to another aspect dealing with the Criminal Code. The Minister of Justice said that these are the greatest changes made since the Code was enacted in 1892. I felt he downgraded that great Canadian, Mr. Garson, who was minister when great changes were made to the code, and the minister knows it. The present Criminal Code of Canada is at best a haphazard arrangement based on English precedent, historical accident and outdated mythology. The minister has not scratched the surface in this regard. We can trace the foundation of the Criminal Code back to the work of Sir James Stephen. His draft code of 1868 along with Burbidge's Digest, which was really an edition of Stephen's work in a Canadian context by Mr. Justice Burbidge of the Exchequer Court of Canada, became the Canadian Criminal Code in 1892 after being presented to the parliament of Canada by the then minister of justice, Sir John Thompson.

• (4:10 p.m.)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I am very happy that I have pleased one section of the country.

The development and improvement of the Code over the past 70 years has been largely by way of amendment. The minister told us today: I have got this bill now, but I shall be adding something else tomorrow. He is like Alice in Wonderland. When we look at this great article we see this beautiful, fine picture of a Canadian who is a great reformer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: But he has had to admit that everything he has done to date the Prime Minister has handed to him on a platter. Yet tomorrow, like Alice in Wonderland, he will become a great reformer.

My good friend from British Columbia over there is a member of the bar. I hope he will give this measure some study because I am sure it is important to him and to his people.

As I was saying, the development and improvement of the Code over the past 70-odd years has largely been by way of amendment, as is proposed today. The desirability of proceeding in this manner has been challenged by a leading Canadian authority, Professor Alan Mewett, who in an article entitled "The Criminal Law, 1867-1967" which appeared in the Canadian Bar Review stated:

> The numerous amendments present a shocking indictment of the process of criminal legislation.

Professor Mewett concluded in somewhat dejected fashion—he did not appear to be as excited about the Code as does the Minister of Justice—by saying:

> Thus, tampered with and tinkered with, it remains the monument of the eminent Victorian, Sir James Stephen.

Later he added:

> But it is not a cause for congratulation that Sir James Stephen would be quite at home with the Criminal Code of 1967.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether this same unhappy conclusion could not be drawn in 1968 or in 1969? Of course it could. What should we be looking for, then, when we consider the reform of the Criminal Code? We heard what the Minister of Justice had to say in this regard and I think most hon. members would be in accord with much of his thinking as to the need of a codified law relating to the morals of the nation.

The notion that crime can be placed in a single category is erroneous. Violent crimes create a climate of fear in the streets of our growing cities. White collar crime, though important in economic terms, is much less visible than are crimes of violence. The material cost of crimes such as petty theft, consumer fraud, violations of the Combines Investigation Act and embezzlement dwarfs, in economic terms, all crimes of violence.

To control violent crime and white collar crime we must have laws which are practical and acceptable to modern interpretations of life and human behaviour. The Minister of Justice agrees with me in this regard. This is why I hoped the minister, when he talked about amending the Code, would really do a job and not merely scratch the surface.

The value of proper laws and proper law enforcement cannot be underestimated in connection with the control of crime but I have felt for years that we must get at the breeding grounds of crime. What are those breeding grounds? Crime breeds in the cesspools of injustice. Crime breeds in the urban slums of our fast-growing cities. Urban poverty makes people the victims, not the masters, of their environment. A bad environment becomes the hereditary property of succeeding generations.

In order to launch a major assault on crime we must attack the conditions of despair and denial of human opportunity in which crime can grow. However, crime still thrives under conditions of affluence; it is white collar economic crime which is erroding the capitalistic system and promoting more controls, less freedom. Carried to a conclusion, this kind of crime will lead us farther down the road of socialism.

In brief, police, courts and prisons cannot by themselves control crime. We must all deal with it. We must also deal with the underlying causes of crime, the immense and stubborn forces which pervade our environment, form our character and determine the quality of our lives. Through long-range effort in a new land of bountiful resources such as Canada, we can surely conquer poverty, ignorance, disease, discrimination, family breakdown, injustice, social tension and despair. But while we must strive to uproot the causes of crime we must put our practical mind to work in amending the various sections of the Criminal Code in such a way as to guarantee that the law is respected, and so that it shall not protect the rich while constituting an injustice against the poor. Crime is a national problem in terms of our constitution, and that is why we are debating the present measure in the House of Commons today. Law enforcement, as the Minister of Justice reminded us earlier this afternoon on the orders of the day, is a provincial and local responsibility. This parliament has a legal responsibility, but there must, of course, be some liaison between the hon. gentleman's department and others working in the field of justice and law enforcement. Incidentally, I wish the R.C.M.P. was still under the jurisdiction of the Department of Justice so that liaison might be improved. I see the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) looking at me somewhat sharply, in a manner he can use at times—

Mr. Baldwin: A sardonic smile.

Mr. Woolliams: It is for us to bring excellence to every aspect of the administration of criminal justice—to correction, to courts, to law enactment in every jurisdiction in Canada. Laws must be reformed. They must be repealed if enforcement is impossible, if the majority of people find them unjust and no one pretends to obey them and, above all, if no one is willing to enforce them. Surely this is the purpose of amending the Criminal Code. At least, I hope it is.

We hear a great deal of discussion about reform. Let us consider what we might have done today. Despite the length of the bill and the number of clauses, 120 in all, many significant and desirable changes are regrettably not included. One of the most urgent areas of reform is our system of bail in Canada. The Minister of Justice has mentioned this in the past, but I note we are not being asked to deal with any specific proposals here. Why could we not have been given a thorough review of the Criminal Code and cleared the whole thing up in one shot without further delay? I am pleased to think the Minister of Justice agrees with me. In the October, 1968, edition of Maclean's magazine, which I hold up for hon. members to see, the hon. gentleman sets out his conception of justice and is reported as saying in part:

> —a man has to have equal right to counsel; provisions like bail have to operate equally as between rich and poor—

Recently a report appeared that in one of our great provinces in this nation people have waited months, even years, for trial. This sort of thing does not happen in only one province. Representatives of the party to which I belong have asked for a royal commission to look into these things but there has been no affirmative approach to this request on the part of the government. Why was bail reform not included in this omnibus bill? Provision should have been made. When we asked him about it the minister said, in effect; It should be there but it is not. What he really means to say is that the Prime Minister would not let him insert it.

The original idea of bail was, of course, to make certain that the accused would appear. But our existing bail system is not ensuring this. There are many problems. Magistrates generally set bail according to the offence charged rather than according to the chances of the accused reappearing for his trial.

I began to practice law 25 years ago, though let me say I did not inherit a law practice or have that kind of affluence bestowed on me. Like many of the lawyers in this House of Commons I had to do a lot of police court work. What happened when I went to the police court to have bail set in a case? The first thing that the magistrate asked Crown counsel was what the accused's record was. The accused might not have been in trouble for five years, but if the police knew the man's record and that he had committed a certain crime five years previously, in some cases they rounded up all such suspects and charged them with vagrancy. Then they stayed in jail. These young, disillusioned men who thought they had rehabilitated themselves, would tell me they had been in jail since Friday and had lost their jobs, that their families thought they had returned to crime.

Mr. Nielsen: It is still happening.

Mr. Woolliams: You bet it is still happening; it occurs every day. Reform in this regard would have made my heart pump with the proper kind of blood.

Then let us consider the great problem raised by marijuana. I remember one case in which Crown counsel was E. J. McCormick, Q.C.—he told me I could use his name—and the accused came from a good family. Counsel told me that the accused was going to appeal and that he wanted the magistrate to reduce bail. The magistrate said he could not, that the matter had to go to the high court. While arguments of this sort go on, the youth becomes further frustrated and stays in jail.

More disturbing is the result of surveys that have shown that in some cities well over half of all accused persons did not raise the bail that was set at their first court appearance. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the half who remained in custody were not the rich.

Mr. Nielsen: How about bail for Indians?

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) mentions bail for Indians. Not only can they not get bail, but they never have counsel. I have seen Indians in court in the Peace River area. I went up there twice to defend an oilman on an impaired driving charge. The rich do have to come to us fellows who represent the poor, and I will tell you why, Mr. Speaker; it is because we have a knowledge of criminal law. Clarence Darrow's life illustrates that. When the railway companies got into trouble they came to him.

Even when the accused is able to raise his bail there is often an inexcusable delay in releasing him. The rules relating to the security that an accused can use are anomalous and unrealistic. Finally, there is a multitude of problems concerning professional sureties and money lenders.

I have not given an exhaustive outline of the problems, but I trust that it has been sufficient to illustrate that the minister was abundantly right when he said that bail revisions should be included in the omnibus bill. Did the minister do so, Mr. Speaker? No. I heard a member from the New Democratic party ask why not. As long as this discrimination exists it means that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor.

I now want to move to another section. Section 622 of the Code provides the judge with discretion, in cases where the maximum penalty is not more than five years, to impose a fine in lieu of imprisonment or in addition thereto. But in cases where the maximum sentence is more than five years the judge cannot impose a fine in lieu of or in addition to imprisonment.

I had an experience two or three years ago in defending a couple of university students on marijuana charges. We went through the preliminary hearing because we wanted to plead before the high court where we thought we would get fairer justice. Under the Narcotic Control Act the maximum sentence for possession and use of marijuana is seven years. The accused in this case were Americans and counsel for the Crown contended they should have been charged with trafficking, which carries a maximum sentence of 14 years.

Let us apply this case to section 622, since we are talking about reform. The maximum sentence was more than five years so the judge could not impose a fine in lieu of imprisonment or in addition thereto. Therefore, what did the lawyers have to do? We went to work in back rooms to devise a method to enable the judge, who wanted to fine these accused, to send them back to the place in the United States whence they came. We found a case that held that the judge can count time spent in jail awaiting trial, although the court of appeal of Alberta disagreed on this point with the court of appeal of British Columbia and held it could not be done. Since it was about this time of day we asked the judge to give them one day in jail and a fine, and that is what he did. We found a House of Lords case which held that since sentence was passed after dinnertime the accused did not have to serve any time in jail. This sort of thing is not good enough and should be the type of reform that the minister should come to grips with. He has a large staff in his department and it would not be too difficult to overhaul the Code.

Some of the offences which fall into the category with which I am dealing are false pretences and theft under $50. The $50 limit was set so long ago that it is now ridiculously low as a result of inflation. It is difficult to steal anything worth under $50 any more, even from Woolworth's. A bit of shoplifting or siphoning gas, involves amounts that are under $50 as a rule. Therefore I think some consideration ought to be given to changing the figure of $50 in the same way as in district court, as opposed to the small debt court, the jurisdictional limit has gone up. In addition, under the Narcotic Control Act possession of marijuana carries a sentence of seven years, and this is likewise outdated.

One of the distinguished members of this house, a former Attorney General who is a member of this party, was talking about this very matter the other evening and remarked that we would all be upset if we found our own children using such substances. We would be even more upset to find them being used by professional men and people from certain families. I am going to deal later with the poor people who do not have any chance at all. I think we would all be upset if we found our children charged under this kind of outdated, Victorian law. I think the sentence should be a fine.

What happens to the poor boy or girl who has no counsel? I recall an occasion when four lawyers worked on an argument that asked the judge for a sentence of one day in jail and a $500 fine. Can the average man afford this kind of counselling today? Of course there is one law for the rich and another for the poor.

Let me deal with some other anomalies. That same section of the Code provides for the giving of time to pay. But who goes before judges on theft and false pretence charges? Mostly people without money and without jobs, with little education and with few prospects. Some of them will scrape up the fine but others, after asking for a number of extensions, find that they are unable to raise the money. What happens? They go to jail.

I thought that in this great "just society" the day had ended when a person went to jail for debt. Take the case of a boy accused of an offence whose father can afford to pay the fine. The fine is paid. But take the case of a boy whose father cannot find the money to pay the fine or who has no father: he goes to jail for debt.

The present Code provides that a magistrate has, with the consent of the accused, jurisdiction to try any offence except a handful like rape, murder, treason, etc. This means that between 85 per cent and 90 per cent of all criminal cases are tried by magistrates who are overworked. Thus, if a youngster who has no record does not plead guilty he frequently elects trial by magistrate. The old hand almost invariably chooses the high court. He knows the ropes and knows he stands a better chance, especially with a good counsel. The old hand then has the benefit of a lengthy preliminary inquiry and, if committed for trial, has the right to change his election to a district court or other high court. That right stems from a decision of the Supreme Court. He can even, during a preliminary, re-elect to be tried by the magistrate. Authority for that statement is Cooper v. The Queen, a Nova Scotia case which was affirmed in the Supreme Court. Thus the magistrate's time is taken up with lengthy preliminaries and the district court judge or the court of Queen's Bench hears all the evidence again. If all magistrates were lawyers one might not object if their jurisdiction were absolute. But in some parts of the country, in Alberta especially, magistrates are not necessarily trained in the law. It is dangerous, therefore, for an accused to appear before an untrained magistrate.

Many years ago a magistrate in southern Alberta, after hearing evidence for a couple of days, said, "I will now deliver my judgment." The judgment he delivered was: "I have seen you grow up, sonny. You never were any good to start with and you are still no good, so I am going to send you to penitentiary." Some hon. members may laugh, but I took the matter seriously. I took it to the court of appeal and the judges there concluded that the magistrate had not considered the evidence. What would have happened to that boy if no lawyer had taken the case to appeal?

Mr. McIlraith: Was the magistrate referring to the accused or the lawyer?

Mr. Woolliams: I don't know, George. I will not get into an argument because I took the case very seriously. You go back to your mortgage practice.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: I was only joking with the Solicitor General. I have recognized over the years that he is an able lawyer. I was only trying to be humorous, not facetious.

We must review the question of jury trials. In some instances the legal process, where a man elects trial by jury, is extremely slow. On the other hand, in Alberta one can elect to be tried on almost any kind of charge by a judge alone without a jury. That stems from old legislation passed in the days when the Northwest Territories were sparsely settled. There were not enough people to make up juries and judges had to try cases alone. Alberta is the only province where such legislation is in effect. Personally I believe that the jury system provides substantial justice for the average man. He is tried by his peers who intuitively do the right thing. In this respect the whole question of the administration of criminal justice cries out for attention and reform. Not only should the appeal system be modernized but the entire pre-trial process of preliminary hearings, grand jury hearings, etc., ought to be examined.

Part of this examination or reorganization might include the following suggestions with respect to preliminary inquiries. At present, if the accused does not elect to be tried by a magistrate there must be a preliminary hearing. As hon. members who are lawyers know, even where accused wish to go to a high court to plead guilty—an example is the two university students I mentioned—they must still go through the preliminary inquiry process before reaching the high court. Why could the government not say that in instances like that the preliminary inquiry could be waived? Why could an accused not go directly before the trial division of the Supreme Court? That sort of reform might be considered. That is the sort of reform Canadians who read the Prime Minister's book thought they would see. It seems that we are to have jam tomorrow but not jam today.

One of the cornerstones in the common law system of criminal law is the traditional principle that the accused is presumed innocent until his guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt. However, there have been in the past exceptional cases in which the legislature has thrown upon the accused the onus probandi of a part of the issue. Strong objections have been raised to legislation of this type so much so that members of the judiciary have made such comments as "it is a pernicious method of proof to introduce into the common law." Another judge said that legislation of this type is opposed to every principle of what is right and just and to the entire spirit of British law. The most outstanding example of this type of legislation is section 295(1) of the existing Criminal Code which reads:

> Every one who without lawful excuse, the proof of which lies upon him, has in his possession any instrument for house-breaking, vault-breaking or safe-breaking is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for fourteen years.

Under the existing legislation, in theory anyone could be charged for having a flashlight or screwdriver in his glove compartment, objects which I am sure many of us have in our cars. That is because the offence is complete when the Crown establishes possession by the accused of a screw driver, flashlight and so on. There has been much general concern over the years about this type of legislation. In June, 1967, Mr. Justice Hall said in a Supreme Court of Canada decision in Tupper v. The Queen:

> Whether Parliament intended it or not, s. 295 (1), as it reads, permits of no other interpretation. It puts the possessor of many necessary tools of trade, automobile accessories and tools and hundreds of similar instruments used and carried daily for routine purposes which might be capable of being used for house-breaking in the position that merely from being in possession under the most innocent circumstances, he can be brought into court and put to the proof that he has a lawful excuse for having a screwdriver, a flashlight or some other such household tool or instrument in his car, boat, tool kit or on his person at any given time or place which includes his home. It can be argued and readily accepted that this may not happen frequently, but it can and may happen if Parliament really intended what the section says when, without any qualification as to time or circumstance, it put the burden of proof on the person in whose possession any such item may be found.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

How does this section of the Criminal Code affect, say, a young man who in his youth did a little breaking and entering for which he was convicted and who is picked up by a policeman a couple of years later when a robbery occurs in his district? If a policeman finds in the glove compartment of the young man's car a flashlight or screwdriver he can charge him with possession of burglars' tools and the onus is on the boy to prove his innocence. He needs a good lawyer. And many of our young men caught in a similar trap cannot afford one. It thus becomes incumbent on us to take a very careful look at this type of legislation and assure ourselves that any departure from significant principles of the common law are clearly justified.

In this regard the committee will have to balance carefully the competing forces that will be created by proposed section 224A, popularly called the breathalyzer section. During this inquiry committee members should also satisfy themselves as to the reasons for removing the words prima facie which precede the words "evidence" in a number of places.

When talking about the breathalyzer test the minister said, "But you don't have to take it." If my interpretation of the section and that of other lawyers is correct, it means that if the policeman who stops you is reasonably sure you have been drinking and asks you to take the test and you refuse to do so, you are then guilty of an offence. Let me say at once that as a Canadian I agree with the minister that murder on our highways must be ended. He quoted some interesting figures. They show what happens when the use of alcohol is abused. But legislation seeking to cure the evil of the drinking driver must not be a worse evil than the one it seeks to cure.

Next I wish to direct my attention to the problem of an accused's right to obtain counsel. The present Criminal Code in section 709(1) states in part:

> —the defendant is entitled to make his full answer and defence.

Any hopes that this would provide adequate protection for an accused were abruptly shattered in 1966 in Regina v. O'Connor when the Ontario court of appeal held that where the accused was refused permission to obtain counsel at a police station he was not prevented from making a full answer and defence at his subsequent trial. An appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada upheld this decision. In other words, the accused has a right to demand a lawyer for his trial but it does not give him the right to obtain a lawyer before the police question him, or under certain procedures that take place at the preliminary hearing. He is entitled to make one telephone call. He calls his lawyer and if the lawyer is out, then that is his call.

It is essential that we bear in mind that the judicial rule is that relevant evidence is admissible regardless of how it is obtained, with the exception of confessions of accused obtained under duress or promise. Consequently, it is relevant for the purposes of the trial whether the method of acquisition contravened the Bill of Rights which states:

—no law of Canada shall be construed or applied so as to . . . (c) deprive a person who has been arrested or detained (i) of the right to be informed promptly of the reason for his arrest or detention, (ii) of the right to retain and instruct counsel without delay—

Mr. Justice Aylesworth of the Ontario court of appeal stated in Regina v. Steinberg:

The appearance of justice is an important element to be considered in criminal matters—

Notwithstanding this statement we still do not have, not even in the so-called just society, adequate provisions to ensure the right of an accused to counsel throughout the period of his detention—and how important that is to a first offender.

I want now to direct my attention to certain matters which, as I have said, affect the conscience of every member of parliament and every Canadian, namely, those sections dealing with abortion and homosexuality.

In reference to abortion the amendment does not change, in my opinion, what has been the general social practice and the basic general judicial interpretation of the Criminal Code at the present time. Section 209 states:

(1) Every one who causes the death of a child that has not become a human being, in such a manner that—

The words "in the act of birth" have since been added.

—if the child were a human being, he would be guilty of murder, is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

(2) This section does not apply to a person who, by means that, in good faith, he considers necessary to preserve the life of the mother of a child that has not become a human being, causes the death of the child.

In other words, there are exceptions. Today if a doctor in good faith decides that the life of the mother is of prime importance he can perform the operation without the consent of a committee and is exempt from being charged with an offence under the Criminal Code. This has been interpreted by the House of Lords, which decisions are usually followed by the Canadian courts, including the Supreme Court of Canada.

The words, "preserving the life of the mother" are to be construed in a reasonable sense. They are not limited to the case of saving the mother from violent death; they conclude the case where continuance of the pregnancy would make her a physical or mental wreck.

That is Rex v. Bourne, House of Lords, 1939. In other words, section 209 is interpreted, without the words in the amendment "in the act of birth", to include not only preserving the life of the mother but also where her life would be physically or mentally wrecked. Section 195 of the Criminal Code gives the legal interpretation of a human being.

The new section states that a qualified medical practitioner who procures miscarriage of a female person and a female person who permits a qualified medical practitioner to procure her miscarriage will not be guilty of offences if the therapeutic abortion committee of the hospital where the miscarriage was procured has certified that in the opinion of the committee the continuation of pregnancy would be likely to endanger her life or health. What is the difference? Have the legal beagles really suggested this change or has it been in the hands of hanky-panky politicians?

An hon. Member: Oh!

Mr. Woolliams: An hon. member says "Oh". Mr. Speaker, with the greatest respect to the member who said that—

An hon. Member: Who said it?

Mr. Woolliams: —I have talked to lawyers and if necessary I can quote a professor who claims there is no difference. That is his opinion, but of course the law is the subject of various opinions.

Were the women of the nation consulted? There is only one woman member of this house and perhaps she feels this would have been better left in the halls of injustice waiting for women's emancipation.

The great quarrel, apart from those who are against any kind of abortion or the legalizing of a miscarriage, will likely revolve around the definition of the word "health". What does health mean? The House of Lords stated the test that continuance of the pregnancy would put the mother in a state of physical or mental wreck. Does the new law go farther? This reform is spoken of in glowing terms. Is it window-dressing to be gobbled up by those who have studied the changes or are they merely overcome by the propaganda they have read? In the scientific medical field, with the extension of the application of psychology and psychiatry health could have a very wide definition. Words grow with sociological changes.

I think it is important, on behalf of my party and the people of Canada, to put on record certain arguments presented to me by members of my party and by societies regarding their feeling as to therapeutic abortion.

In 1933 the Supreme Court of Canada awarded an unborn child—a foetus—damages when the unborn child was injured while in the womb and the injuries were caused by the negligence of another. I would like to quote from a brief dated October, 1968, of the Knights of Columbus, an organization representing a large section of this country. I hope the committee examines this brief. Possibly the minister had to walk a tightrope but that is the responsibility of leadership and being a minister. I am not being critical in that regard. The brief states:

Unquestionably all adhere to our solemn obligation to respect the life of other human beings. Our contention is that this obligation embraces the life of the foetus. Rather than establishing a difference between foetal life and life after birth, the thrust of science is in the other direction. Indications more and more favour one human life in a maturing process with characteristics of individuality perceptible even at the moment of conception. Can anyone ignore the implications in the voluntary destruction of foetal life? When the probability of human life is involved, is one free in his dealings with it?

Our concern is the direct killing of the life of a foetus. On the other hand, we readily admit that a mother is not morally required to forgo medical treatments which will save her life if by doing so the unintended death of her foetus is incurred. Anything less than a mother's life such as personal convenience would be a disregard for life, and the sacrifice of greater values for lesser ones. No one has to tell a mother that the life she carries in her womb transcends the animal or vegetable. The physical and mental morbidity attached to abortive procedures gives ample evidence of her convictions and of those who surround her. In addition, medical tradition dictates that operative procedures are indicated only to prevent or correct pathology.

From the medical standpoint we strongly support the statement of the Catholic Hospital Association of Canada: "We know of no satisfactory arguments, nor even a consensus in the medical profession generally, for the opinion that abortion except for the rare instances when desperate measures are called for to save the life of a pregnant woman, can truly be regarded as a therapeutic means to preserve her physical and mental welfare."

That is their position. I want to make it clear, in my position this afternoon as spokesman for my party, that I am like the minister; I do not take a position. I want the committee to take a look at it. But I say to the minister that if there has ever been a bill upon which we should have a free vote in parliament, this is it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: I would have thought more of the Prime Minister's just society and his just leadership if he had said to the Liberal caucus and to the great national Liberal party: You have a free vote in this regard. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we have considered that in the light that everyone on this side of the house can vote according to his conscience.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, my remarks on this bill will be quite lengthy but I suggest that even if they are lengthy they may shorten the debate. My speech was prepared by myself and the members of the justice committee of the Conservative party, and I want to thank them for their help. We are setting forward the issues which the committee must take a look at, and we are placing the position of our party on record, that everyone should have the right to vote according to his conscience on these matters.

I have said that the women have been neglected. Now I want to read from a brief submitted to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada by Mrs. L. E. Moyer of Nova Scotia. Again I say that this is not my position. I am just pointing out what some of the people of Canada think. I quote:

And yet, a significant proportion of Canadian women (it may well be a majority) are opposed to abortion for reasons which should be of interest to all Canadian women. We are not all religious fanatics; we are not all naive to the realities of modern behavior; and we are not all relics of the Victorian era who would impose on modern society the evils of puritanical and artificial moral standards. We are opposed to abortion for reasons which have to do with freedom and justice in a democratic society; and for reasons which have to do with promoting full status for Canadian women as free, independent, responsible human persons who are worthy of respect. I suggest that these reasons deserve to be heard: that they deserve to receive a public exposure which at least approaches that which has been given to the other side of the question, realizing, of course, that abortion can hardly be considered a popular topic of discussion. The majority of people, understandably, are loath to discuss it or even to think about it at all.

I pause at that point to say that doctors do not like to talk about it. The doctors who perform these operations at various stages under the old Code do not like to discuss it.

Also, we must face the fact that affluence and the pursuit of pleasure have bred in modern society a certain softness or lack of moral courage which strongly resists subjects which are painful or even disturbing, especially where morals are concerned—

Then she asks these three questions:

Three fundamental questions naturally emerge as containing the whole issue. And it is not necessary to be a theologian, or a medical doctor, or a legal expert in order to answer these questions. And yet, they are never faced and never answered.

1. Does an unborn child constitute human life?

Under the old Code, section 195, we know the answer.

This question usually is disposed of by referring to it as an "old saw"; and red herrings are dragged out in the form of references to such matters as whether the soul is more important than the body. Sometimes the answer is given that an unborn baby constitutes "developing" life. But it is not his life which is developing. He has life already. It is not even his personality which is developing because his personality already has been determined. And how can we speak of life as "developing" anyhow? So the question remains unanswered: does an unborn child constitute human life? And, if not, the interesting question is raised: what then is an unborn child?

2. Under what conditions, in a free society, can direct and voluntary taking of innocent life be permitted by law? The proposed legislation would permit abortion under certain specific conditions. But, if an unborn child is not a human individual, why should abortion be restricted at all? Is the proposed legislation telling us that under certain conditions which may relate to the general welfare of an individual, Canadian law should provide that innocent human life can be destroyed? Or, is the proposed legislation telling us that certain conditions are necessary before a woman can have an unwanted growth removed from her body? It must be telling us the one thing or the other. And both statements are completely unacceptable.

3. What will be the immediate and the long-range effects of such legislation on Canadian women as individuals and on Canadian society as a whole? I think that the main reason this question is never answered is that sufficient study to make possible a satisfactory answer has never been undertaken.

There are two viewpoints, one from a lady writing to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women and the other by the Knights of Columbus. These are some of the questions that the public are asking and these are the matters which the committee must examine, discuss and weigh well. Is the Code badly worded? The minister said so. I agree. Is the minister curing this problem? I think not. I pose this question to the minister: Have the Canadian Medical Association and the doctors in the various provinces agreed to take this responsibility thrust upon them by the Criminal Code? And are the doctors fully protected as well as the female patients?

The special committee sat and studied many briefs concerning abortion, under the chairmanship of Dr. Harley, and were unable to agree on any kind of definition of health. Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock as I think this is a good place to break off my remarks for the moment.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Before proceeding with private members' business it is my duty, pursuant to standing order 40, to inform the house that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert)— Canadian Broadcasting Corporation—program respecting pollution problem at Dunnville, Ontario; the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale)—Bilingual Requirements for Commissionaires at Museums; the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie)—Post Office Department—negotiations respecting five-day delivery.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, notices of motion (papers), private bills, public bills.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

INDIAN AFFAIRS

"LOCAL GOVERNMENT ON INDIAN RESERVES"

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena) moved:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of a document entitled "Local Government on Indian Reserves" prepared by the Policy and Planning Directorate of the Indian Affairs Branch, dated August 4, 1967.

Indian Affairs

He said: Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be some continuity for those who will be reading this debate and because it is sometimes necessary with such motions to point out that they have been transferred from another point in time I think I ought to put on the record just what is involved. The motion I sought to move yesterday asked for the production of a particular document entitled "Local Government on Indian Reserves", prepared by the policy and planning directorate of the Indian affairs branch under date of August 4, 1967. Yesterday when giving the reasons that the document could not be produced the minister said that it was a document marked "Confidential for discussion purposes". He said further:

• (5:00 p.m.)

This document was intended for field officials and I do not think that we could table it in the house since it is a departmental document prepared for internal administrative purposes.

I pointed out yesterday and do so again today that if it was a document prepared, as the minister said, for internal administrative purposes there is a tremendous amount of confusion and misunderstanding within the department itself because the document in question was given fairly wide distribution to people who were not officials of the Indian Affairs Branch and who were not employed by the branch in any capacity. In other words, departmental officials gave at least semi-public distribution to this document. That is how it came into my possession.

However, since the document deals with a fundamental and basic aspect of authority which the native Indian people should have over their own affairs I felt it would be desirable to attempt to have it tabled in parliament so that it would be a public document in the full sense of the word and would be available to all the native Indian people in Canada and not just a few of them. I have discussed this matter with a number of the native people who indicated they would like to have the document made available to them because it reflects the government's attitude as to local government control and the determination by the native people of their own affairs which is something that is pretty fundamental to them.

Without trying to offend the minister or without trying to sound as if I am offending him I submit that this is another example of the basic philosophy within his department and the government. Government tends to be secretive. It tends to be aloof from the general public in respect of the publication of documents for discussion. It tends to be a closed circuit corporation. It wishes to do things within a vacuum or behind closed doors. It does not want basically to bring people into the discussion and the development of programs and ideas which relate to them. I submit that this is simply an extension of that concept of secrecy. So far as I am concerned the concept of government should be the reverse. It should be open, friendly and generous in its discussions with people. It should do its best to obtain the confidence of the people in every possible way and only maintain secrecy in a unique situation and not as the traditional way of doing things. It is with this attitude that I disagree.

In respect of secrecy and the refusal on the part of the government to take the national Indian people into its confidence, I submit that the fact that the document itself is embarrassing to the government is the real reason it does not want to make it public. By its construction, by its phraseology, the document indicates a government attitude which is disdainful of the right of the native Indian people to control their own affairs. All this is taking place at the same time that so-called convention conferences are being held. On the one hand the government tells the native people that it wants to talk to them about certain things and obtain their views, while on the other hand it prepares documents of the type I hold in my hand and refuses to make them public and give to the Indian people the thinking within the internal structure of government about things as fundamental as local government control.

Without reflecting upon a vote of this house, I point out that a few days ago we asked in the house for the production of another document relating to the fish and game laws as they apply to the native Indian people. That was refused. Subsequently there was a vote on the matter in the house and the majority, including the minister, voted against making that report public so that the native Indian people could see what was included in it about something as basic as fishing and hunting rights. When the committee was set up to deal with the fish and game laws the gentleman who is the Lieutenant Governor of British Columbia and who was then the minister in charge of Indian affairs on behalf of the Liberal government told us that when that report was prepared it would be made available to the native Indian people. But when it finally was prepared it was kept as a secret government document.

The government does not always act in this way. I have in mind another internal report which was prepared within this branch that the government saw fit to make available to a member of parliament from the Liberal party so that he could make a speech in the house based upon that so-called confidential report. So we have a sort of two-faced approach here in that the government is prepared to make available for political reasons so-called confidential reports which deal with some aspect of Indian affairs and yet in other cases, such as in respect of a document like this, it is determined to keep them as secret as it possibly can.

This document has the heading "Local Government on Indian Reserves". I am arguing that it should be made available to the Indian people because it reflects the attitude of the government and of the whole structure of the Indian Affairs Branch with regard to wanting to control the activities and destinies of the native Indian people and the councils they elect. This is all the more reason that it should be made public. The attitude of the government and the department is a reflection of their approach to the municipal structure.

When in respect of the Garden River reserve a disagreement rose about whether or not the council was properly elected, the involvement of the Indian Affairs Branch added to the confusion. A Mr. Eric Boyd, who I believe is the head of a section in the branch and who incidentally I do not think is competent to fill the position he holds although he may be competent as a public relations man, told us in the midst of the discussion concerning the election of the Garden River reserve council that the reserve was just like any other municipality. That reflects the attitude of the department in wanting to foist on the native Indian people an authoritarian structure similar to that of municipalities without asking them what they want to do.

In this regard I should like to touch upon an aspect of the situation in British Columbia which is fraught with tremendous danger for the native people of that province. I do not know whether the minister is familiar with it, but I certainly ask him to look into it and accept the responsibility with which he is charged in his position of protecting the rights of the native Indian people not only in the province of British Columbia but in every province.

The British Columbia legislature recently passed, at the request of the government, an amendment to the municipal act which permits the people on Indian reserves to become incorporated as municipalities. If any band of Indian people in the province of British Columbia becomes incorporated as a municipality under the provisions of this act, unless the minister and the federal government take some protective measures they will lose every single, solitary square inch of reserve land and every last penny in their capital account funds which they may have as a result of the sale of any land. They will lose every penny that may be held in trust for them by the department.

There is an order in council in existence in the province of British Columbia which dates back some time before the war. It was passed as a result of the McKenna-McBride royal commission into Indian affairs in British Columbia. When the province transferred to the federal government certain lands as a result of that royal commission inquiry which were to be Indian reserves, it passed an order in council which said that if any band becomes extinct the reserve lands and the capital account moneys from the sale of any reserve lands would revert to the grantor, that is, the provincial government. It was the opinion of the legal advisers of the Indian Affairs Branch in the early days, when the Indian people of a community were thinking about becoming a municipality, that if an Indian band in the province of British Columbia became organized as a municipality it would become extinct as an Indian band and would lose every inch of reserve land. It is incumbent on the minister, and I know how sincere and dedicated he is in respect of the cause of Indian people, to take steps to deal with this situation if this has not been done or it has not been brought to his attention.

The document we are trying to have made public contains page after page suggesting that Indian reservations will eventually become municipalities. I submit the government cannot keep going in two directions at the same time. The government cannot continue to advance the idea that Indian communities should become municipalities without taking protective measures to make sure that they know what they are doing, know what the situation is and have access to this document. These people should be informed what the government is doing to protect and preserve their rights down to the last iota.

The document refers to the establishment of a local government bureau which is supposed to act as the co-ordinating agent of various regions, hold discussion meetings and smooth the path through the Ottawa headquarters. This is an embarrassing phrase to the public servants in the Indian Affairs Branch. The document refers to smoothing the path through the Ottawa headquarters.

Mr. Peters: It is a two-headed thing.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): My colleague suggests it is two-headed. I have already said today, although not in the house, that there is a tribal war going on in this department between the minister and the real minister, as he has been called on some occasions, the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Andras). This is one of the few departments that has two heads and no direction. These two heads have been fighting with each other for favours from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and about which one is really the head of the department.

In any event, this document was prepared within the branch and refers to the necessity of smoothing the path through Ottawa headquarters. We all know that the Indian Affairs Branch has been in the business of producing red tape for so long it has enough red tape for all the government departments and lots left over to confound and confuse itself as to what it is doing, but to have it written clearly in a document prepared by the department that there is a need to smooth the path through Ottawa headquarters is probably one of the reasons the document has not been made public in any formal way.

The people who conceived this idea felt that the local government bureau should be based in Ottawa. This is just more centralization and another example of the ivory tower attitude. These people feel they should not get into the field or talk to these native people about what they are doing or what they want. These officials want to maintain themselves insulated here in Ottawa with all the rest of the useless bureacrats who exist in the Indian affairs department. They want to set up another structure to deal with this idea imposed upon the native people. That is why this document has not been published.

The document goes on to say that regardless of any desire to permit the Indian people a free hand in running their reserves on a local basis the department cannot in all practicality divorce itself entirely because undoubtedly these people will require some guidance and control. Those sound to me like the words of bureaucrats. This is the type of thing the minister does not want the people to know. He does not want them to know the department is thinking in terms of authoritarianism and control.

That is not the only place in the document where the word "control" is used. It appears throughout the course of the document, and is used in reference to the necessity to control the affairs of native Indian people. This is the old paternalistic attitude which has plagued the Indian people of this nation for the last hundred years. It is the attitude of the government that the native Indian people are not competent to run their own affairs and that somebody in Ottawa has to do so for them.

There are a number of references in this document to controlling these people. For instance, it suggests that it is incumbent upon the department to control their affairs and that within reason it is necessary to establish control agencies. This type of reference continues for page after page. This is the real reason the document has not been published.

The minister has not told us this, but I know from speaking with him that he exudes sincerity. I know this from the manner in which he speaks, the nice phrases he uses and the intensity with which he approaches Indian affairs. I am sure he would like to make this document public. I am sure he would like to say yes, Mr. Speaker, let us make it public because it deals with Indian affairs and with something fundamental, namely, a people who desire to run their own affairs.

The minister is engaged in consultation and conference with Indian people all across this nation. He has told them to come and tell him what they want to do about their own affairs. The question which begs an answer is, why does he not make this document public?

Mr. Chrétien: Because it is not my policy.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): I notice the minister making copious notes of what I am saying. I am sure he will get up and reply. I am looking forward with interest to what he will say, and I am sure the Indian people will be interested. It is far more important that they listen to what the minister has to say than that I listen. I know that the minister in his heart could not have said the nice things about the Indian people which he has said over the months if within his heart he really did not feel it was desirable to make this document public.

I know that the minister's confrere, that other chief who is trying to run the department, the hon. member for Port Arthur, feels in his intestines that a document like this should be made available. The difficulty is that these hon. gentlemen are subject to the pressures of the department. They have not got guts enough to stand up to the deputy minister and departmental officials who have been making life miserable for the Indians for a donkey's years. They have not got the intestinal fortitude to tell them what to do. Instead they are telling you.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just told me why I should not produce the document, because he said it is a bad document and is paternalistic. If this is so, it is not my policy to be paternalistic to the Indians. I do not want to create the impression that it is the policy of the government to be paternalistic. However, we will be judged by our acts. Even if we produce thousands and thousands of documents, what will count in the last analysis is what the government and I will decide in terms of making it possible for the Indians to make their own decisions. We will not be judged by what some member of the department may write about the problem but rather by the decisions we will make. It is on that basis that the Indian people will judge us.

I am quite happy that the hon. member has asked me to produce the document. The reason I am not doing so is not that I am too shy to produce it but that if I were to do so someone in the Indian community would be sure to say that it is our intention to be paternalistic. Perhaps there are some people in the department who have such an approach and such a mentality, but I can assure the hon. member that because of my background I could not possibly make a good colonialist, and it is certainly not my inclination to be paternalistic. If that is the impression of the hon. member for Skeena from reading the document, then he will agree with me that there is no point in tabling it. If it gives the impression of a paternalistic attitude on the part of the government, we do not wish to create any such impression.

There is another argument which I want to make. If we were to produce every document that some people in the department decided to prepare in order to put forward new ideas, then it would be impossible to operate the department. We have nothing to hide. Certain internal propositions are made which appear in documents that are not yet complete and which, if tabled too soon, can create a bad impression. The hon. member knows very well that I have said many times to Indian communities that I will make sure the Indian people of Canada will have the opportunity to make their own decisions at the band and at the reserve levels. I think this is badly needed because it will give the Indian people the opportunity to develop leadership qualities. Studies are made along these lines to see what kind of government can be given to the Indian people at the band level. They are useful, but at some point we will have to make a decision when we revise the Indian Act. It is at that time that these things will be changed.

I said to the hon. member and to the public in general that I think that most of the Indian people right now are willing and able to make their own decisions, but we have to make it possible for them. I do not think it is right for me to be obliged to sign a document when an Indian wants to get a loan from C.M.H.C. If he wants to do that, he should be able to deal directly with the corporation and not come to me as if I were his white father.

Mr. Peters: What the Indian wants is a rich guarantor.

Mr. Chrétien: Many things have to be changed. For example, I do not think it is right that in 1969 all the Indian lands are still in the hands of the minister as a trustee. We have to do something about this. This land belongs to the Indians and they should be free to do want they want with it.

I cannot agree to produce the document because it is an internal document. As the hon. member for Skeena said, if it is a bad document I do not want to give a false impression to the Indian people. In fact, he himself said it is not necessary to produce it.

I am glad he asked other questions and I will look into them. He asked a very important question about the British Columbia government and what it has decided in order to make it possible for Indian reserves to become municipalities. He warned me that there is some danger of the Indian people in these localities losing their lands or losing the money which they have in special accounts. Personally, I am not aware of that amendment, but I will look into it. As I have said many times before, I will ensure that every action taken by anyone in the department is in the best interest of the Indian people.

I feel it is important that I should point out to the hon. member that he is asking me now to overprotect the Indians and to be paternalistic. When I am not, on the other hand he blames me and says I do not care. It is very difficult. I hope that some day he will make up his mind. If he wants the Indians to take their proper place in Canada, he should allow them to make their own decisions. When one of us makes a decision it may be good or bad but this is the price we pay for our liberty. I cannot always be paternalistic and protective toward the Indians. I cannot always tell them that they have the freedom to do this or that but they must not have too much of it, or tell them to come and see me to get advice or to obtain my signature. At a certain point in time we will have to make up our minds. I think that many Indians desire to become full citizens. They want to share both the advantage and the responsibilities of being Canadians, and they want to have the same freedoms as we. We have to move in that direction and we have made some progress with the programs that we initiated a few years ago. There is a long way to go yet and many problems to solve.

For example, in terms of education we have made great strides. Ten years ago only 15 per cent of the Indian people were going to school above the fifth grade. Now 95 per cent of the Indians are in school above the fifth grade, and this has happened in the short period of 10 or 11 years. It is a big improvement. I know that education is the key, and we have to do more about it. If good education is provided to the Indian people, they will have the mobility they need to find their place in Canadian society. I think we have to favour any programs which will allow the Indian people to fit into our society. We have to admit that it is increasingly difficult for some Indians to live in the traditional way in the far north, fishing and hunting. For many of them it is not economical any more to do that, and we will have to educate them to permit them to adjust to society and to find employment.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

I am glad to report to the House of Commons that last Friday, when I was speaking in Edmonton, I said to the chamber of mines of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon that they have to take the step of giving employment to the Indian people because there is a problem of the turnover of employment in the north and the best way to solve it is to train the Indian people to do those sort of jobs. However, I think we should not always expect the Indians to adjust to us. I said to the Indian people that we have to adjust to them also, and with the Indian people we will have the best possible labour force we can have in the north. I think we are moving in the right direction.

There are other examples of the type of policy we are developing. For instance, in the contracts that we sign with some of the mines that are developing in the Yukon and the Northwest Territories that are under federal jurisdiction, we insert clauses which force companies to hire Indian or Eskimo people. I know we will have to give special training to Indians, but we have programs for that and we will develop new ones.

I am glad the hon. member is so concerned about the Indian people. I know he is sincere and he wants to do the best for them. He can criticize me—that is what I am here for—but I hope he will offer some positive criticism in order to help me solve the problems. I do not think that to produce a document which, according to the hon. member, shows a paternalistic approach will help the cause. I can read that document, but it is not a new one. It was drafted in 1967, so it could not have been drafted while I was minister. Even if it were, this is no proof that everything produced by civil servants is approved by the minister.

I hope the hon. member will agree with me that I do not have to approve everything which is put forward to me. If documents are bad, I will not approve them. This document might perhaps give the false impression that I want to be paternalistic. I do not. Because of my age, I do not think I could be a father to 250,000 people. Again, because of my background I am a very bad colonialist. I cannot, unfortunately, because of the rules, produce the document. In these circumstances, perhaps the hon. member will accept my explanation and withdraw his motion. I understand his point. The fact I do not produce the document is not related to the substance of it but to the rule that there are certain documents which are intended for internal purposes to help ministers make up their minds.

Incidentally, I do not intend to ask anyone to get it back. It is the person who gave out the document who is responsible, somehow. We shall be judged in the last analysis by the way in which we orient the policies of the department and in a few months I think the hon. member will learn very clearly that I do not want to be thought paternalistic.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Would the minister permit a question? May I ask him, now that he has made this tremendously predictive speech, whether he will disown the document to which reference has been made?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I cannot disavow or accept the document; I say that I have not even read it all and I do not intend to read it today, but I am generally aware of what is in it. It contains statements which I can accept and others which I reject. However, I cannot reject it in full; as in any other document, I take what is good in it and reject what is wrong.

[English]

I thank the hon. member for telling me what is bad in the document.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the minister.

He has just stated, in reply to the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard), that he has not read that document and that he does not intend to do so today. If he has not read it, how can he know what is in it and say that the document is confidential and that it cannot be tabled today?

Mr. Chrétien: This is not the point, since the document concerned was published in 1967 and dealt with the possible administration of reserves or the development of reserves into municipalities. I have read reports on the problem, but I have never fully examined the document. I am merely acquainted with the summary and I say that I do not wish to table it, since it is a document intended for internal use and for the information of departmental officials. This is why such documents may not be published.

It is a matter of principle. I think that we are entitled within an administration to exchange views. But what really matters are not the views of Tom, Dick and Harry within a department, but the minister's decisions. The documents will help me to form an opinion. However, I do not have to accept or reject it entirely. As I said a while ago, we will take what is good in that document, as in others, and reject what is wrong.

I do not think that this attitude is contradictory.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I shall speak only briefly on this subject.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Peters: You talked me out of it. There is so much enthusiasm being shown by hon. members who wish me to continue at length that I will do so.

An hon. Member: Oh.

Mr. Peters: This document was published by the policy and planning directorate of the minister's department. I presume it was circulated on August 4, 1967. It is not a new document. I really have not read it thoroughly; I have just glanced at it. This is a very poor copy. The department should make it a little darker for the sake of those of us who possibly need glasses.

An hon. Member: Try to get a better copy next time.

Mr. Peters: I am concerned about the secrecy employed by the department in circulating a document which certainly has some merit. If it has no merit at all, then the director should, I suggest, be fired. If these people are not producing anything of value, then we should get rid of them. I notice the minister says he has not read it. However, I should have thought his executive assistant would have considered it worthwhile bringing to his attention, or that the director himself might have been in contact with the hon. gentleman on this subject.

I have five or six Indian reserves in my riding, so I am personally interested in these matters. I was interested in the question which was raised by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) involving Chief Pine.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, this question was raised by the hon. member for Skeena and the problem was resolved after I had received representations. I declared the election was valid, and that is all. I do not understand why the hon. member should wish to talk about it now, unless he wants to congratulate me for what I did.

Mr. Peters: I think this does really concern us; it is the paternalistic aspect of this document which is involved. In this particular case, one of the agents decided there were 603 Indians on the reserve and that they would be entitled to six representatives. After the election had been held, it was found the Indians numbered only 575. The Chief came to me about it. I found out afterward that he had gone to a number of other people as well. He is a very good politician. I have known Chief Pine for a long time and he is a smart cookie in many ways. He came to me with a legitimate problem. The Indian Affairs branch said there had to be another election because it had been found there were fewer Indians than expected. The minister would not say he was willing that the band should have an extra councillor. I checked with Chief Pine and he told me there might be ten meetings held. Councillors get $25 a meeting, so the amount at issue would be about $250. What happened, was this. The Indians met the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Prime Minister turned to the minister responsible for Indian affairs, and said: "Settle it". The minister did the same thing as the spokesman for his department, the same thing as the law officers in the branch. He said: I cannot.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I said, yes. And the six councillors elected are now in office.

Mr. Peters: That is not as I understand it. The minister said, no, because this question had been referred to the legal branch of the department for an opinion. The lawyers said it was not in order to override the provisions of the act. The matter was referred to the Department of Justice and that department gave a similar opinion. In these circumstances, an order in council was passed giving authority to do something which is not allowed by the act itself. This was done merely to make legal an interpretation of the act which, really, turned upon a technicality. After all, there is always room for a little give and take where figures fall very near a dividing line.

The point I am making concerns the act, not what the minister has said. This document expresses really the thinking of the officials in his department. I do not blame the minister for telling the house the document cannot be made public. He is really telling us that he does not know what is in it, whether it should be made public or not. As a matter of fact, I disagree with the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard); I think it is fairly representative of the thinking of the departmental officials. He said it was a bad document but I do not think it is. I say it fairly represents the paternalistic attitude of many of the Indian affairs officials.

I have heard the minister address numbers of meetings in my area and I know that his approach is conciliatory; that he is interested in giving his own views, not those expressed to him by his officials. He has done much to bring about a dialogue between himself and his colleague and Indian bands in particular areas. In my opinion, this document does represent the views of the planning directorate of the Indian affairs branch. I think it should be circulated and torn to pieces. It is paternalistic and departmentalistic.

I know that the Indian agent, who was in my area for a while, never bothered to talk to the Indians for months and months. I know for a fact that he did not attend one reservation for a period of five months. I do not think he counted the Indians or even looked at the roll.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Did he cash his pay cheque?

Mr. Peters: He certainly did. I asked people who worked with him how long he had been there, and they told me three years but that they didn't know what he did. He knew how many Indians had voted, so I suppose he did count them.

If the minister reads the document, then he may find it is not detrimental to him and probably represents his opinion. However, in his remarks today he has spoken against the motion and is refusing to disclose the document.

Quite frankly, I was ashamed to have to listen to an official of the department give me some silly argument about why he was not able to satisfy the little problem that Chief Pine had. After all, we are spending here only $250. We can give some other Indian in the band an education, but really $250 is neither here nor there. Obviously, this man has some contribution to make but we are tied with red tape. According to this document, the red tape will be extended.

The minister might be wise to disavow this document, but we have no objection to its being tabled because it is fairly representative of the opinion of the planning directorate. I think that before making a new code for the Indians we should put our own house in order, and this document gives us some basis for so doing.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will answer the hon. member concerning this problem—

[English]

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that the minister really does not have this particular right.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I was just going to confirm that. The minister has spoken and he cannot speak again.

Mr. Chrétien: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, although I have spoken an argument has been raised to which I think I should be entitled to reply.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to suggest that the house give unanimous consent to the minister to make these comments, because of their value and the importance of the subject.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not want unanimous consent for something to which I am entitled.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: There is some confusion whether this debate has or has not expired. If it has expired, then my impression is that the minister can close the debate, speak for five minutes or some limited time. My impression is that the debate has expired, unless other hon. members wish to speak? Then, I recognize the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, do I only have five minutes to speak?

Mr. Lewis: We will extend it to you.

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: I would like to deal with this matter of the Garden River reserve. In my opinion, the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) completely missed the point. It was a question of deciding whether we could legally recognize the election of a sixth councillor in the Garden River reserve. According to the official, it was not a matter of discretion. There had been an error, and it was provided in the act that on a reserve, there can be one delegate for every 100 people. Now, on election day, there were not 600 Indians on that reserve. Therefore the official had no right whatever to do anything but to void the election.

I know it is ridiculous that this mistake should have happened. We have made the appropriate remarks to the official concerned; everyone knows it is fairly easy to count to 603 or 575. Such a mistake is ridiculous but it has been made. In fact, there were not enough Indians on the reserves to allow for the election of more than five representatives.

We have asked the Department of Justice for advice, and we have been assured that by an order in council we could confirm the election of six councillors instead of holding another election. I thought it best to settle things this way.

However, I cannot, as a minister of the Crown, go beyond what I am authorized to do by the law, and then the law did not give me the authority to validate the election of the six delegates.

That is why I had an order in council passed. Today I wonder how come, after I have straightened things out, the hon. member blames me for having done so. If I had not settled the situation, he would have blamed me for having done nothing.

I would ask the hon. member to tell me if he wanted five or six Indians on the reserve to be elected. If he does not know what is the exact situation, he should have asked for information before making representations in the House of Commons.

As far as the document is concerned, I do not have to reject or accept it. I repeat my point which is quite simple. Hundreds of documents full of suggestions are prepared in all departments to enable the minister to formulate a policy.

The documents themselves are not very important. What is important for the Indian people, as well as for the house, is to know the minister's policy. And I receive advice and recommendations of all kinds and from all sides.

Like all ministers, there comes a time when I have to take a decision. However, it would be impossible, in my opinion, to table all the documents prepared by our officials; first of all, the house would not be large enough to hold them and, moreover, that would involve a waste of time for everyone.

Each official has his own responsibilities and, if he gets an idea, it is his duty to refer it to us, if he thinks it is of some value. As administrators, we have the responsibility of determining the value of an idea.

In addition, I believe that unless we can assure our officials that their suggestions shall remain confidential and also that there is no risk of a public debate following whatever proposals they dare make to the government we cannot expect a sound administration.

I recognize that the ministers' actions and the government's policy must be discussed in the house. However, the documents that paved the way to such policy should not be debated in the open.

Getting back to what I said earlier, I have nothing to hide about what is in that document. Eventually our policy on the administration of the bands and the reserves will become known. A while ago, I told the hon. member for Skeena that we intend to allow the Indian people to participate to a larger extent in the administration of their own affairs, since, in many cases, they are both well informed and determined to make their decisions by themselves, and we shall devise the necessary policies to concretize our aims.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Skeena.

Mr. Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, if you had risen earlier I should have presumed that it was to ask whether the minister had unanimous consent of the house to carry on with his remarks. I should have been happy to accede to any request by the minister to continue, since I do not think he should be saddled with any five minute time limit.

The minister has said on two or three occasions that it is not possible or advisable to produce all documents prepared in the Indian affairs branch. But he misses the point. We are not asking for all documents. We are asking for one specific document which has been drawn to the minister's attention but which he has not yet read. We are asking for a document, and this is an important point, that has been distributed to a number of native Indian people by persons working in the department. A number of Indian people have therefore looked on the document as a document with some official status. Indeed, the minister gave credence to that belief by saying he could not produce the document because it was confidential.

When I asked the minister if he disowned the document, he retorted, "How can you disown something you know nothing about?". He did not disown it; neither did he adopt it. He said he would take from it what was good and reject what was bad. Of course, the minister will interpret what is good. If his interpretation coincides with the interpretation of our native Indian people, well and good; I will agree with him. Otherwise, I will not.

We have a document which the minister refuses to reject and refuses to adopt. This document has already been circulated amongst our Indian people. They consider it has some stamp of approval. In the short time the minister has occupied his portfolio he has learned no doubt the degree to which our native Indian people distrust the department which, in the years it has existed, has done practically nothing to dispel that distrust. Over the years it has acted in an autocratic, overbearing, paternalistic and stupid way when dealing with Indian affairs. If the minister maintains his attitude that the document in question is secret after a number of native Indian people have seen it and have concluded that it enjoys some official status, he will be doing himself a disservice, to say nothing of the disservice done to our native Indian people. Surely when this motion for the production of papers appeared on the order paper appropriate officials in the minister's department ought to have drawn the document to the minister's attention and told him what was in it. That did not happen and reflects on some officials. No doubt someone in the minister's department said, "We cannot disclose this document. It is marked 'confidential'." Perhaps the person who marked it confidential is the same person who told the minister the document could not be disclosed. The minister, apparently without question, accepted the opinion of some official in the department that a certain document was confidential. He did not bother to look at the document.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hour for consideration of private members business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): At five o'clock I was discussing the definition of health in relation to the amendment on abortion. I said the special committee, under the chairmanship of Dr. Harley, studied many briefs relating to abortion, but were unable to agree to any definition of health.

It is my personal opinion the moment you define words you get into many abstract judicial interpretations of what the legislators meant, while on the other hand the failure to define health forces the high courts, the Courts of Appeal, and the Supreme Court of Canada to legislate. They must, in their capacity and responsibility, arrive at a definition. What is their reaction to this kind of legislation?

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps you should wait until the minister is present.

Mr. Woolliams: Oh well, he's been pretty good today.

All of these matters must be studied by the committee. Under the said section, causing the death of a child that has not become a human being in the act of birth is not illegal if the doctor causing the death considers it necessary, providing the operation was performed in good faith to preserve the life of the mother. The onus is on the crown to prove the operation was not done in good faith. This is called the Bourne principle. Allowing the medical practitioner to exercise his own judgment in the act of birth is an act separate and apart from the amendment. If, however, the pregnancy is to be terminated prior to the act of birth, the matter indeed becomes very complex.

I would like to pause here for a few moments. There has been an addition to section 209, and this is what makes it so horrible and is something I think the committee will have to consider very carefully. I have been most serious all the way through this, but I could not be more serious when I refer to this. The old rule said:

> Every one who causes the death of any child that has not become a human being, in such a manner that, if the child were a human being, he would be guilty of murder, is guilty of an indictable offence—

What has the minister done by adding the words "in the act of birth"? Under the old rule if a doctor came to the conclusion in good faith that the life of the mother would be impaired and without the operation she would become a mental and physical wreck, then he could proceed to operate. For the moment I am dealing only with the addition of the words "in the act of birth". These words are dealt with by Professor Mewett in the Criminal Law Quarterly, Volume 10, 1967-68 at page 385 which I suggest every hon. member should read. I will not quote the article but will explain the meaning.

A doctor could wait until a woman was in labour before taking the life of a child to save the life of the mother or to prevent her physical or mental wreckage, without regard to the new amendment and without ever having a committee or certificate. That is not my interpretation, it is what the professor says. That is the law. If there is any question of this, then analyse it. When does a person become a human being under the Criminal Code? Section 195 reads:

> (a) it has breathed,
> (b) it has an independent circulation, or
> (c) the navel string is severed.

That is the legal definition and I leave it at that. I ask in all seriousness that the committee divide its report into separate subjects. We are not dealing with the price of grain or the loss of a market, we are dealing with the beginning of human life.

Mr. Nielsen: And the end of it.

Mr. Woolliams: As the hon. member said, "And the end of it". This is the reason I am so serious. I have pleaded many cases and have never been more serious than I now am. I want to know on what I am voting because this is a very important subject to the faith and conscience of the men and women of this nation. I know the committee may clear up this matter but it could be easily smoothed over. It is easy to make a great speech, or half of one, regarding murder on the highways. I do not intend to deliver the other half.

The Bourne principle allows a medical practitioner to exercise his own judgment in the act of birth. If, however, the pregnancy has to be terminated the matter becomes very complex.

I repeat that this new amendment does not seem to carry the law as it is being practised a step further. There are those who will maintain that a woman's body is her own. There are those who will maintain that the law will leave entirely untouched the problem of an unmarried pregnant woman, the victim of rape, or the respectable married woman who does not want a child. I believe the law remains the same in that regard. I trust the committee will inform us if my view is correct. One writer said if that is all the law really does, a pregnant woman would be well advised to wait until the onset of labour, then have the child disposed of under section 209 without the rigamarole provided for in the new amendment involving the meeting of a committee, approval, the certificate, plus the operation.

Now I turn to a new subject, the section dealing with homosexuality. The new clause 149A, refers to acts which are categorized as acts in private between husband and wife or consenting 21 year old adults. It does not say 21 year old adults; it says 21 year old persons. Are these adults at 21 years? In brief the new section appears to legalize homosexuality under two conditions. They are that the acts take place between a husband and his wife or any two persons, whatever their sex may be, over the age of 21 years. The committee may want to ask these questions.

The marriage licence permits two persons to commit acts which, if they were not married, they could not commit until they were 21. If the act is committed between two people, and one is 20 and the other one 21, does that make it only more immoral or does it make it morally right? The committee may want to ask, why is it legal in the criminal sense for two persons over the age of 21 to commit an act in private while one person under 21, married, but not to the other person commits the act in private and becomes guilty of criminal offence? The question might be asked, does the marriage licence, by itself, legalize in the criminal sense these acts? Well, under the Code it does. The question of moral law is for the committee to decide. The reason my speech is taking so long, Mr. Speaker, is that these things must be analysed.

In an historical sense, since 1631 when the Earl of Castlehaven was executed for the rape of his wife and sodomy with his servants, we have come a long way in these matters. In 1954 in the United Kingdom a special departmental committee, under the chairmanship of Sir John Wolfenden, was appointed to consider the problem of homosexual offences. In its public report in 1957 the committee recommended that private homosexual acts between consenting adults should no longer be a criminal offence. In 1960 the British House of Commons approved the recommendation 213 to 99.

I would like now to quote from an article entitled "Law and Morals" by Norman St. John-Stevas, in the Twentieth Century Encyclopedia of Catholicism. It is rather lengthy but it deals with this subject in a very broad manner.

United States law on homosexual offences was greatly influenced by English law, and homosexual acts between males are punished in all the states. The type of acts punished, however, and the punishment laid down, varies from state to state.

In Canada, the punishment varies from province to province, because although the law is uniform, the sentences vary from judge to judge.

Penalties may be as low as one year's imprisonment with a maximum of three, as in Virginia; or as high as a maximum of seven years, as in Rhode Island; or a maximum of sixty years, as in North Carolina. Some states distinguish between different types of offences, and penalties are graded according to which offence is committed and whether there are aggravating circumstances. No comprehensive figures are available on law enforcement but in some states certainly the law appears to be only spasmodically enforced. In New York City for example, in 1948 there were only 146 arrests for sodomy and in 1949 the figure was 112. From 1950 to 1954 only 89 sodomy cases were reported in the United States of which 27 were in California, nine in Texas and five in New York. Nearly all the cases involved some public element.

In England figures for prosecutions and convictions have been made available through the Wolfenden report, which show that the English laws are not dead letters. Indictible cases rose from 390 in 1931 to 2,504 in 1955. For the three years ending in March 1956, 300 adult offenders were convicted for offences committed in private with consenting adults. Homosexual conduct between women is not punished in England, and although it may be theoretically in America, it is so rare as to be negligible in practice.

The Catholic and traditional Christian attitude to homosexuality was developed at a time when there was little knowledge of either the extent or causes of homosexuality, and today these approaches need to be modified in the light of new knowledge. Homosexuality is now known to be much more widespread than was thought in the past, as the researches of Dr. Kinsey and others have shown. In the first of the Kinsey reports, published in 1948, on the American male, Dr. Kinsey used case histories of 12,000 men. He concluded——that 37 per cent of the male population of the United States had had some homosexual experience between the beginning of adolescence and old age. For males who had remained single until the age of 35, the figure rose to 50 per cent. Of the male population 25 per cent had more than incidental homosexual experience or reactions for at least three years between the ages of 16 and 55. Of the males 8 per cent were exclusively homosexual for at least three years within these age limits, and 4 per cent of the white males were exclusively homosexual throughout their lives after the onset of adolescence. Dr. Kinsey and his assistants found these results startling, but when they were checked they yielded the same result. An aberration is not, of course, right because it exists, as Kinsey at times assumes, but the figures do indicate that homosexuality is not a problem confined to a tiny group of perverts but one of much wider social significance.

And this is rather startling,

What are the causes of homosexuality? Medical evidence and opinion can supply no agreed answer, but it is widely accepted that apart from perverts who have turned to homosexual practices entirely of their own free will, there are inverts, who form the majority, whose psycho-sexual impulses are directed more or less exclusively towards persons of the same sex. Traditional Christian thought has been ignorant of this state of inversion and has tended to regard the whole problem as one of perversion without extenuating circumstances.

The writer goes on and points out that the law on homosexuality has never really been enforced. He points out that where it is enforced, the majority of the people convicted are not the type of people who should be put in jail. He points out that there is nothing to show they will be rehabilitated if they are put in jail. Even the churches go along with that view.

Many people who have considered the subject conclude that our common law does not effectively distinguish between sin, which is a matter of private morals, and crime, which is an offence against the state having anti-social consequences. However, many of us who have practised before the bar of justice, and others in many fields, know that punishment has been imposed on a small minority of offenders in Canada and sometimes on those who least deserved to be imprisoned.

Our standing committee must reach the conclusion in the light of scientific, psychiatric, psychological research and knowledge that imprisonment is largely ineffectual to reorient those with homosexual tendencies. I would ask the committee to consider this question: If a law is ignored, if a law is unenforceable, if it is indeed unjust, is that not grounds to make the change even though we may abhor legal permissiveness? These acts are accepted in Canada de facto today if not de jure. Does this section solve the problem? It might. That is for the committee to decide.

I now turn to the question of lotteries. Coming from Calgary, where Mrs. Mary English has dedicated her life to the support of legalized lotteries to be used for medical research and charitable enterprises, and where she has gathered 500,000 signatures and claims that she journeyed from coast to coast to obtain these on a shoe-string budget of $1,000, I would hope that the committee would take a very liberal viewpoint—and of course I mean with a small "l"—on the suggested changes. I think that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in drafting these sections of the bill has walked a very tight rope, in fact razor-edged.

The minister has endeavoured not to offend those who consider lotteries as gambling, even when the funds go to support churches and social welfare enterprises, and those who accept lotteries as good, moral, legal sport. The strongest argument that Mrs. English puts forward is, and these are her statistics:

—the Irish Sweepstake draws about $100,000,000 each year and only $6,000,000 returns. That means $94,000,000 benefits another country.

Some hon. Members: Shame.

• (8:20 p.m.)

Mr. Woolliams: Why should we accept these facts? If we were to wake up some morning and read in the paper that John Jones, our neighbour, won a sweepstake, then was charged under the Code and put in jail, we know what a hue and cry would go up. So, this law is unenforceable. Do these new sections allow the Kinsmen or other fraternal organizations to run a raffle in order to raise funds to build a swimming pool for children? I doubt that; I do not know, but I do not think so.

Then there is the section on firearms. I would like now to briefly direct my attention to the sections which would amend the Criminal Code with regard to offensive weapons. It is significant that the provisions in this bill differ substantially with the original proposals contained in Bill C-195, the original bill of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This raises some very interesting questions. I suggest that the committee must give careful consideration to these.

We are faced with a basic conflict between the legitimate use and regulation of firearms. We must discern how we may best impose restrictions that will effectively limit their improper use. We have been lucky in Canada. We have not had situations like those in respect of the Kennedys and Martin Luther King. Sometimes these influences take a little longer to come to this country. In making these changes, I submit that we must be careful not to turn the responsible and legitimate gun enthusiast into a criminal. We must also ask why the so-called sawed-off rifles and shotguns have been removed from the prohibited category to be placed in the restricted or registerable category. We must ask whether it is prudent to permit the classification of weapons to be exclusively by orders of the Governor in Council. We must ask whether provisions should be included to stop the sale of war surplus weapons at the source rather than legislating restrictively after they reach the market. I am thinking particularly of the United States where at one time people were able to order machine guns from a catalogue.

We may be thankful that we are not forced into a situation of legislating by hysteria and yet me must not let this lull us into a feeling of complacent disregard. Before I move my amendment, I should like to thank the house for the time and patience accorded to me. I have been lengthy because this is a difficult subject to cover. We in this party have set out very clearly where we stand. We feel that these matters affect the conscience of every member of parliament and believe that there should be a free vote. I should like to assure the minister that our criticisms have been offered in the spirit of a sincere and judicious desire to improve upon the criminal legislation of this country. I would furthermore like to express my appreciation to the minister for his efforts in this regard. We do appreciate the difficulties that are inherent in this type of legislation due to the unique multi-religious, racial and linguistic structure of Canada. Nevertheless, we also trust that the minister and indeed all members will take heed and accord due consideration to the manifold problems which have yet to be resolved in this particularly viable area of concern to every Canadian.

[Mr. Woolliams.]

I shall now move my amendment. I ask:

That the said motion be amended by adding after the words National Defence Act the following: And the said Standing Committee be instructed to make and bring into the house four separate reports in relation to the following matters contained in the bill,

All clauses:

(A) referring to abortion

(B) referring to homosexuality and gross indecency;

(C) referring to lotteries and gambling; and

I have copies of this amendment in French and in English.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, in making the decision in this regard, that you will be breaking new ground. This precedent you establish tonight, Mr. Speaker, will either confine us in a small room under the new rules or permit us to be somewhat expansive. The motion says that we will have second reading and then the bill will go to the committee. We are only saying that surely parliament is paramount over the committees; that we stay here in the House of Commons and that the committees are creatures of parliament. I hope this amendment will receive support from other parties because they may feel the same as we do about the matter so far as it affects the conscience of all Canadians. We only ask that we have an opportunity, with four distinct reports, to express ourselves. We are all different. We all come through a different religious door. We all came up through a different kind of family. Some of us in this House of Commons have adopted children. Some of us feel very deeply about some of the clauses in the bill.

When we are considering a subject which affects the conscience of all of us, surely we should have the privilege of testing it here in parliament. It may be, from what the minister said, that the government has made up its mind and will vote us down; but we want the opportunity of at least being voted down. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to give this matter the fullest consideration. I plead with you. I realize I am breaking new ground. I do not do this lightly. I do it having regard to the feelings in our communities and the pressures from the groups in our communities.

I ask you tonight, Mr. Speaker, if there is any doubt in your mind, to consider this and weigh it with the legal officers who have served the House of Commons well. Do not brush it aside because it is too great a problem. We may not in our lifetime here, or in the lifetime of future members of parliament, again deal with such important matters that affect the conscience. Give us an opportunity to express ourselves on the separate items. I would hate to think that because I felt deeply about one section of the bill I would have to vote against reform that must come.

I realize that in the heat of debate some of us say this, that and the other, but I believe I have always respected the Chair. So, with the greatest respect, I say that great judges make great law because they have the creative capacity to have the vision to see social needs. We only need think of Oliver Wendell Holmes to realize that great judges, great lawyers and great thinkers cut and carve new ideas and establish new precedents because they interpret conditions in broadest sense in the light of great changes. I have made the greatest plea to you I can possibly make as a member of parliament. If it is the will of parliament to vote down this amendment, I will accept parliament's will with grace. If the amendment should be set aside because it is out of order under the new rules I believe I will feel—and I say this with the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker—that I have been denied my time in court.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before the Chair is called upon to make a ruling on the point of order which has been raised by the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), I wonder whether hon. members would like to make suggestions and refer to authorities and citations for the guidance of the Chair.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I should like to do that with your permission, Your Honour. I would not like my submission to be interpreted by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) as an attempt to deny him his day in court. As a matter of fact, when I listened to his speech it reminded me of Louis Nizer's "My Life in Court". Certainly he has had his day and evening in court.

The hon. member for Calgary North was right in one essential respect, that we are breaking new ground. We have to refer to the rules as amended, standing order 74, paragraphs (1) and (2) which state:

(1) Every public bill shall be read twice and referred to a committee before any amendment may be made thereto.

(2) Unless otherwise ordered, in giving a bill a second reading, the same shall be referred to a standing committee, but a bill may be referred to a special or a joint committee. A motion to refer a bill to a standing or a special committee shall be decided without amendment or debate.

There is little within the terms of this standing order to indicate whether in making a motion for reference it would be in order for the house to impose conditions on the manner in which the commtitee shall report back to the house. That, of course, is what the hon. member for Calgary North is attempting to do. He requires in the terms of his amendment that the standing committee be instructed to bring back into the house four separate reports; one referring to abortion, another to homosexuality and gross indecency, another referring to gambling and, according to his own omnibus motion, the other report would involve all the other clauses of the bill.

I submit to Your Honour that the reference to the committee under the main motion we are debating is not a question for any general discussion but relates to a particular bill. This is not a general question upon which the Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs is instructed to report from time to time, or to examine a general area such as electronic eavesdropping or wiretapping, but concerns the examination of a specific bill. What has been referred to the committee under the main motion is the bill itself.

That motion gives the committee the discretion, the ability and the capacity to analyze the bill clause by clause—all 120 of them. It gives the standing committee the opportunity of moving amendments to that bill, clause by clause, provided the amendments are relevant to the bill and within the general ambit of the overall amendments to the Criminal Code and the penal law.

The purpose stated by the hon. member in moving his amendment is to enable the house to declare itself severally on the four different aspects of the bill into which he would divide it. The very essence of the committee consideration relates not just to those four aspects, but to the bill itself and to every clause in it. Any amendment that is relevant to any of those clauses; any amendment that human ingenuity could devise that is relevant, may be decided upon by this committee during its clause by clause consideration of the bill.

What is more, under the rule as amended, standing order 75(5), when the committee report is brought back into the house, it is open to any member, not just a member of the committee as I read the rules, after having given Your Honour 24 hours notice, to move any amendment relating to the general scope and ambit of the Criminal Code and related statutes as contained in this omnibus bill. So, the argument of the hon. member that unless you accept this amendment as admissible the members of this House of Commons are not going to be given the opportunity to express an opinion upon any individual clause just does not make sense.

Under the standing rules as they are now amended, both in the committee and particularly at the report stage, no member is denied the right to speak or vote on any particular clause of the bill. On this basis I would urge you, Mr. Speaker, to rule the amendment inadmissible as being redundant.

I think it is appropriate at this stage to recall the well-established principles applicable to second reading and which I submit have not been changed by the recent amendment to standing order 74. It is open to me to argue that these citations which used to apply to the old standing order 77 now apply to the new standing order 74.

According to Beauchesne's citation 381 and following there are only two types of amendments that can be made at this stage of our proceedings. One is a dilatory amendment; the hoist for six months, and the other, is what is called a reasoned amendment where the principle of the bill and only the principle may be opposed by way of a negative proposition.

I think the citations following 381 make it clear that amendments on second reading should not attempt to do what can be done directly in the committee. In other words, my second ground for opposing the admissibility of this amendment is that it anticipates the action of the committee and impinges upon its discretion. It should not be admitted by Your Honour for that reason.

I want to urge a third reason. I respectfully submit to Your Honour that you should not admit this motion for consideration in this house on this third ground as well. If we are to admit this type of amendment where would we stop? How finely could a committee divide its report on an individual statute no matter how complicated? How finely could we divide it? The hon. member suggests that we divide it into four parts, abortion, homosexuality, gross indecency and so on. If his principle were accepted, who is to say that we should not divide it even more finely? Who is to say we could not deal with the gun law separately? Who is to say we should not separate that portion of the bill in relation to the Solicitor General—paroles, penitentiaries and reformatories? Who is to say we should not consider separately that part under the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford)?

I am suggesting that this principle, taken to an extreme, would reduce the procedures of the House of Commons to absolute absurdity. I cannot find the exact citation of Beauchesne, but I do recall having read that it is the government's prerogative to introduce a bill based on the policy it intends to implement. It is the government's prerogative to present to parliament a piece of legislation, grouping together the parts of that legislation it deems consistent and ready for parliamentary scrutiny. It is within the constitutional jurisdiction of government, having regard to usage and the general practice, to enact distinct statutes for distinct branches of law. What my hon. friend from Calgary is attempting to do is suggest that the constitutional discretion of the government ought to be interfered with by reaching beyond parliament into the committee and dividing the bill.

I have another reason for opposing the admissability of the amendment, Your Honour. I want to submit to you that this is an indirect attempt to try to do what cannot be done directly, namely, to divide the bill at the second reading stage. On a motion for second reading, the motions the Opposition may propose are now clearly defined, and so far as I can see they do not include the right to divide the bill. The amendment can be dilatory or it can be reasoned, and reasoned amendments must not be concerned in detail with the provisions of the bill. They must attack the principle of the bill. But the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) reaches into the very details of the bill.

I want to say also that since there is no motion for a resolution before you, in my humble respect, and since the hon. member in his arguments is trying to get by the back door what he could not get by the front door, Your Honour should not feel himself bound by any precedent involving a motion to divide a resolution. I do not think the 1964 decision by Speaker Macnaughton on the flag resolution has any bearing here because second reading of a bill is distinct from the division of a resolution, particularly when the grounds for that division were, in the opinion of the speaker, two mutually exclusive clauses.

Surely there is no mutual exclusiveness in the clauses of a bill put together by the government, presented as one bill to the House of Commons and which stands together on the general reform of the penal and criminal law.

I submit to you that, relying on May's 17th edition, page 544, this type of motion to instruct a committee is not merely in the nature of an amendment but is rather a substantive motion, and being a substantive motion notice would be required according to the rules of the house.

I have one final word to say, sir, as to your own prerogative, if you would allow me to direct my attention briefly to that. It is my submission that since this is not a motion to divide but is an amendment directed to the committee, Your Honour's discretion is limited to admissability, only, that is whether the amendment as an amendment can be admitted to the house for a vote by the House of Commons. Your Honour's discretion does not go to the substantive decision as to whether the amendment should be tagged on to the bill. In other words, even if Your Honour were to decide—

Mr. Woolliams: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): In a moment. I should like to continue now if I may. Even if Your Honour were, in your good judgment, to decide that the amendment were admissable—and I have been arguing as strongly as I can against that point of view —your discretion is limited to the question of admissability only and not to the substantive question as to whether the amendment should be attached to the bill. In other words, it would be up to the house to vote upon it, even if it were admissable.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, after listening to the argument of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) it seems quite obvious that members on the other side do not want to see a vote taken on the basis of each individual question that is raised in this bill. No one for a moment denies the desirability—which seemed to be the implication the Minister of Justice directed toward this side—of the bill going to the committee to be discussed there in the fullest possible sense clause by clause, and for the committee to advance amendments that it sees fit. What the amendment seeks to accomplish is to give to every member of this house the right to voice his opinion on matters that affect the individual conscience just as deeply as did the question of a flag and as did other debates in those days which the minister can well recollect. The minister tried to distinguish between this amendment and the flag question, but that is a precedent which Your Honour is going to find extremely difficult to circumvent. I would submit to the Chair that on that occasion Mr. Speaker Macnaughton split a resolution right down the middle and caused the house to vote on two aspects of it. At that time, this was certainly not the desire of the government nor the intention of the bill which was introduced by the government.

The amendment of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) seeks to do one thing on an occasion which will not arise again in the proceedings on this bill, namely to give directions to a committee which, under the new rules, must consider the bill before it comes back to the house. The directions which the amendment of my friend seeks to give to the committee is that the committee, instead of bringing back an omnibus report on an omnibus bill, is to bring back to the house a report which will permit hon. members the freedom to vote on a portion of the bill. They would have freedom to vote on whether or not they wish to accept the government's views on homosexuality or on the other amendments contained in the bill. This is a freedom which I would like to exercise and which, I daresay, a good number of hon. members on the opposite side and in the rump on this side as well would like to exercise.

This is the only time at which we can make such an amendment. It is an extremely important decision which Your Honour has to make because if the amendment of my colleague is refused, then, in my view, an unduly restrictive interpretation of the new rules will be imposed upon us.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) has attempted to make a case to Your Honour based on the fact that the precedents established under old rule 77 apply here. But I do not see how we can extend these precedents particularly in view of standing order 74 (1) which reads as follows:

> Every public bill shall be read twice and referred to a committee before any amendment may be made thereto.

If one were to stop there, then one must conclude on the strict reading of that subsection, that there is no amendment possible at this stage and that the bill must be read a second time and immediately referred to the committee.

The Minister of Justice, however, did not go on to read the second subsection of that new rule which stipulates.

Unless otherwise ordered, in giving a bill a second reading, the same shall be referred to a standing committee—

Unless otherwise ordered!

I submit to Your Honour that those preliminary words permit the Chair to make an order qualifying the reference to the committee. The Minister of Justice attempted to make a case against the proposition that any possible amendment with respect to the reference is possible at this stage, but if Your Honour will refer to item 40 on today's order paper he will see that under the date of December 19, 1968, the following wording appears:

Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs—

Here we have an item placed on the government order paper which combines not only a motion for the second reading but also a motion for reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This seems to be in keeping with the interpretation with standing order 74 (2) which I have read to Your Honour.

There might be some doubt left in that regard, and I might refer Your Honour to the proceedings which have taken place before in this session and which are reported in Votes and Proceedings for November 15, for example. I am sure that other instances could be selected at random from Votes and Proceedings of this session. At page 228 we find the following:

The Order being read for the second reading of Bill C-8, an Act to amend the Canada Elections Act (Qualifications of Voters and Candidates);

Mr. Stanbury, seconded by Mr. Borrie, moved—That the said bill be now read a second time.

And debate arising thereon;

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale), seconded by Mr. Pepin, moved—

That the motion be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the word "that" and substituting therefor the following:

That the said bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter be referred to the standing committee on privileges and elections.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: What does that prove?

Mr. Nielsen: It proves there is power at this stage for an amendment to be put to the motion which purports to send a bill to a committee. An amendment is permissible in this regard, and if my submission with respect to 74 (2) of the new rules is acceptable, the motion is subject to variation.

The minister put forward the argument that the precedents attached to standing order 77 would restrict any amendment under the new standing order 74, to giving a bill a six month hoist and to negativing the principle. Speaking for this side of the house my hon. friend made it very clear that we are not moving an amendment to give the bill a six months hoist, or one that is designed to negative the principle. He was advancing an amendment which would give hon. members an opportunity to vote independently on those aspects of the bill which strike deeply at the consciences of all of us.

While the minister dealt at some length with the prerogative of the committee, I suggest that the overwhelming interest here is the prerogative of hon. members of this house and of the house itself. Surely, Your Honour, at this stage the house has direction over what it intends to ask a committee to consider. When I recall what the Minister of Justice had to say, I doubt very much whether he could have put forward that argument in all seriousness. He referred, for instance, to the responsibilities of the department in respect to the Penitentiary Act, the legislation controlling reformatories and the several other acts which are affected by this bill. But if his argument in that regard is acceptable, what is to prevent any minister introducing a bill which deals with the Department of Transport, the Department of National Health and Welfare and the Departments of Defence and Defence Production, and lumping them all together to be sent to the committee on estimates with an instruction that it should bring back a miscellaneous report on an omnibus government bill.

I believe there are many hon. members who are especially concerned about at least two of the principles in this bill. I, for one, would like to have the opportunity to exercise an isolated vote on these subjects because I have some strong views on each of them, as have other hon. members. I do not like to be compelled to vote yes or no on a measure which is all embracing without any opportunity to discriminate.

We are simply asking the Chair to accept an amendment which would set a very desirable precedent under the new rules by allowing the house to retain control over the manner in which measures are sent to committees and to retain the freedom of hon. members to vote on questions which come back from the committees after the subject matter has been referred.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): It seems to me I can immediately assist the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in his dilemma if all he is concerned about is the opportunity to vote separately on one or two of the questions which concern him and his hon. friends. I can do this by drawing his attention, as did my colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), to the terms of standing order 75(5) which states:

> If, not later than 24 hours prior to the consideration of a report stage, written notice is given of any motion to amend, delete, insert or restore any clause in a bill, it shall be printed on the notice paper.

Paragraph eight of the same standing order says:

> When the order of the day for the consideration of a report stage is called, any amendment of which notice has been given in accordance with section (5) of this order shall be open to debate and amendment.

Any hon. member of the house, including the hon. member for the Yukon, therefore has an opportunity to move an amendment at the report stage to any one of the 120 clauses of this bill.

An hon. Member: Is a recorded vote taken?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes, a recorded vote with Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Lewis: And it does not split the bill in any way.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): The point is that hon. members will have an opportunity to record their dissent and to suggest changes in the bill. If this is all hon. members opposite are asking for, their argument is met in one stroke by the change in the rules which was made on December 20.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): May I be permitted to make one or two observations on the point of order? With all respect, it seems to me that both the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and the leader of the house have misread the motion. They have based their arguments on the assumption that the motion asks that the bill be split. The motion does not ask for that at all. It simply asks that the standing committee be instructed to bring in four separate reports. We are not asking the committee to change the form of the bill, but to bring in reports upon which we can vote separately. One of those reports would refer to abortion. Those who wished to vote one way or another on this matter would have an opportunity to do so according to their consciences when that particular report was under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: I wish to thank hon. members who have taken part in the procedural debate, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), the hon. member for Cardigan (Mr. McQuaid), and the hon. ministers who were good enough to enlighten the Chair on the important point of order raised this afternoon and this evening by the hon. member for Calgary North. The Chair particularly appreciates the consideration shown by the hon. member for Calgary Noth in giving early notice of his intended amendment. I am not sure whether this has helped his cause or not, but at any rate it provided an opportunity to study the main aspects of the interesting procedural point raised by the proposed amendment.

It is hardly necessary to remind hon. members that the Chair cannot rule on the merits of the hon. member's proposal as opposed to the method supported by the minister in the presentation of the bill. It is not for the Chair to determine whether it is proper or appropriate or politic for the government to present this legislation in the form of an omnibus bill. The only ruling which is within the competence of the Chair is whether the hon. member's amendment is procedurally correct and acceptable at this stage.

What we have to determine is whether it is possible under our rules to move an amendment at this stage which in effect is an instruction to a committee, and whether the effect of this amendment, if allowed, would constitute an instruction to divide or split the bill.

The hon. member for Calgary North argued at length this afternoon, and with great force, that hon. members should not be called upon to vote for or against a motion which contains two or more distinct propositions. The bill would then be divided in so many different motions so that the sense of the house could be taken on each of the propositions individually.

The many aspects of the division of a complicated question were discussed and subsequently ruled on by Mr. Speaker Macnaughton during the flag debate. As pointed out a moment ago by the hon. member for Yukon, on that occasion Mr. Speaker did divide the complicated resolution which was then before the house for consideration. However, as hon. members know, and as was indicated, I believe, by the Minister of Justice in the course of his argument in support of his own point of view, what was before the house when Mr. Speaker Macnaughton reached his decision was not a straightforward motion for the reading of a bill but a complex motion. The purpose of the amendment was to divide a resolution; it was not an amendment to divide a bill. I am not forgetting the very important point raised by the hon. member for Cardigan in this regard and I will come to it in a moment.

There may, of course, be considerable justification for dividing a complicated question stated in a motion as distinct from a bill, because such a motion is essentially a one step proceeding with the Speaker in the chair. There is then no opportunity for the house to consider and to vote separately and individually on the propositions which constitute the proposed resolution.

Again, I repeat that the procedural position is entirely different in the case of a motion for the second reading of a bill. As I stated at the outset, a close scrutiny of precedents and authorities I suggest to hon. members in all humility, leads to the conclusion that a motion to divide a bill by way of an instruction to a committee cannot be entertained at this particular stage of the house proceedings.

In fact, standing order 74 (1) precludes such a motion. It reads as follows:

> Every public bill shall be read twice and referred to a committee before any amendment may be made thereto.

There are well accepted forms that can be used to amend not the bill itself but the motion for second reading of the bill. In particular, it is open to hon. members to move a reasoned amendment; that is, a resolution declaratory of some principle adverse to or differing from the principles, policy or provisions of the bill, or otherwise opposing the progress of the bill. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Calgary North, as he has said himself, is not a reasoned amendment but an instruction to the committee to which the bill is to be referred.

[Mr. Speaker.]

On this point, I would like to refer hon. members to citation 222 of Beauchesne's fourth edition, which deals with the division of bills by instructions to a committee. The citation reads, in part:

> —the right theory is not that the instruction should be given whilst the bill is still in the possession of the house, but rather after it has come in the possession of the committee.

There is, of course, an opportunity to vote on individual propositions when the bill is considered in committee. I readily recognize the objection raised to this point by the hon. member for Yukon, the hon. member for Cardigan and the hon. member for Calgary North. It is not the same thing to vote on the individual propositions in committee as to vote against or for the individual propositions in the house itself.

However, what is much more significant is that under the new standing order the house itself—as distinct from the committee—is given an opportunity to debate, to amend, to oppose or to reject any particular clause of a bill. This is the point that has been made by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald). This new procedure is made possible under the provisions of standing order 75. Thus, every proposition in a bill can be submitted to the house itself for the purpose of obtaining a direct and specific vote on any individual proposition. This decision is taken by the house as distinct from the committee, and it seems to me that in some measure this answers the objection raised by the hon. member for Yukon.

The hon. member for Calgary North has advanced the suggestion that the significance of second reading has been altered by the new rules, and he expounded this view in a very interesting way this afternoon. Although this is not clear from the rules themselves, I would think this is a fair interpretation of the new relevant standing orders. The vote on second reading is less a vote on the principle of the bill and more a decision of the house to send the bill on for further consideration at subsequent stages of proceedings. If this interpretation is correct, it seems it should now be even less difficult for hon. members to vote either for or against the main motion, since such vote would not constitute either approval of, or opposition to, the principle of the several propositions contained in the omnibus bill.

In view of the precedents, citations and rules by which the Chair is bound, I must therefore conclude that the hon. member's motion cannot be put to the house at this time. In reaching this decision I am somewhat comforted, as I pointed out, by the fact that the new rules of the house will make it possible for hon. members to achieve, to some extent at least, a similar result by taking advantage of the report stage proceedings of the revised standing orders of the house.

I should say that I was to some extent disturbed by the suggestion of the hon. member for Calgary North that if an adverse ruling were made on the procedural acceptability of his amendment he would feel he would not have had his day in court. Even though he is an experienced solicitor, a member of the bar of excellent reputation and with wide experience in the country, I am sure that he must have had an occasion or so when he was not successful in court but felt that, even though he had not won the day, he had still had his day in court.

That comment is not part of my ruling, and perhaps I am overstepping the bounds of jurisdiction of the Chair. However, it does seem to me that the hon. member for Calgary North has today had a brilliant and most impressive day in this, the highest court in the land.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, there is one further point that was raised by the President of the Privy Council with which Your Honour did not deal, and that was concerning the matter of notice. For the clarification, particularly of members on this side, I was wondering whether you would deal with the question whether or not notice is required under standing order 75(4).

Mr. Speaker: I cannot, of course, rule in abstracto. The hon. member knows that he cannot ask the Chair to rule on a situation which is not before the house. He is asking the Chair to interpret the rules with regard to a situation which may happen later on if such notice were given. It seems to me, having read the rules, that it is clear enough what is required to bring the matter before the house at the report stage.

Mr. Nielsen: I was not asking Your Honour to rule on a hypothetical matter. The President of the Privy Council did raise the point and put it to the Chair, and I am wondering whether the Chair would rule on it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the reason I did not rule on it was that I did not consider the argument relevant.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Fortunately for hon. members, Mr. Speaker, I do not have unlimited time. Therefore I will try to confine my remarks to the 40 minutes which are allotted me; if I do not succeed it will not be for want of trying.

Before dealing with the substance of the bill, I want to say that my colleagues and I agree that it is proper for the bill to come before this house as one bill. We believe that the new procedure will enable every member who has any particularly strong feeling about any part of the bill to move the necessary amendment at the report stage, to get his views heard and to get those views voted on separately from anything else.

I also want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I listened with interest to the speech of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams). The logic of his argument on abortion escaped me. He first stressed, as I will later show, that the amendments to the code do not really change the law in any basic sense. Then he spoke very eloquently about the need to give opportunity for expressions of conscience with respect to an amendment which brings in no change. Those words left me wondering, Mr. Speaker. I could not follow their meaning.

We welcome this measure as an important one. I emphasize that it is only a partial and rather inadequate revision of the Criminal Code and related statutes. We think these revisions of the Criminal Code should be on the statute books of Canada and are long overdue. I therefore do not propose, nor do any of my colleagues, to move any amendment to the bill at this stage. We shall try to improve the bill in the standing committee and, if necessary, at the report stage. But we want to take no step that will delay passage of this measure. We want even these inadequate revisions of the Criminal Code on the statute books of this country.

Although the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) defended the bill excellently and impressively, if I may say so, I submit that the claims he makes for it are very much exaggerated. The suggestion he and others have made that these revisions of the Criminal Code constitute a tremendously radical reform is a complete and utter exaggeration. In my view important social matters in this bill are treated with timidity or, to use a favourite word of the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), pusillanimity. Certain matters are treated narrowly and inadequately; and this is 1969. Important provisions concerning the public law of this country which ought to be included in this bill are not included. I know of no excuse why they should be delayed. Furthermore, I suggest to the Minister of Justice and to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that many of the proposed amendments in the bill ought to have been included in the Criminal Code of Canada long ago. They were recommended by committees and commissions ten years or more ago. Therefore, the minister must forgive me if I cannot be as lyrical about this piece of legislation as he is.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): We are not on the same side.

Mr. Lewis: I underline that those responsible for this bill cannot claim to be flaming revolutionaries or radical reformers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just "catcher uppers".

Mr. Lewis: They are just "catcher uppers", as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) says. With the indulgence of hon. members, Mr. Speaker, I want to express some general propositions that, in my view, ought to govern public and criminal law in a modern society. I emphasize that in our present society people generally, and young people in particular, are impatient with hypocrisy and cant which are so often expressed in our law and more often seen in the application of our law. They demand, and I welcome that demand, that we show consistency in our democratic pretentions and that parliament show consistency in the kinds of laws it passes.

In our criminal law we ought to amend everything that is a relic of the past and not consistent with modern morality. We ought to amend every provision that does not fit the technological age in which we live. That, it seems to me, ought to be the major guide to the way we revise our Criminal Code.

Also, our law ought to be alive and dynamic. It ought to be responsive to emerging situations in society. At present it is not. We do not amend our Criminal Code as soon as circumstances in our society require that to be done. It takes years of study and argument before we take a slight step in the direction of amending the law, such as is represented by many sections of the present bill.

As a member of the bar, and I say these words with respect to our judiciary, our law does not develop sufficiently through any actions of our courts. That is to say, in our system judges are bound by what lawyers call by the frightful name of stare decisis. They are bound by precedent. That is, they are bound to apply the law as it was 40, 50 or 100 years ago. Every time I am in court and I hear counsel say, "I will now cite the law to Your Lordship and for the benefit of my learned friend,"—my learned friend being what lawyers call each other while hiding their daggers behind their backs—I can be sure that some dusty law will be referred to. When counsel says, "My Lord, may I recite a recent decision," you will find probably that the decision dates back to 1875, or 1850, or at the latest 1900. When a lawyer says in court, "I will now cite the leading case in this matter," it frequently happens that the leading case is 200 or 300 years old. Our habit of binding our courts by precedents of the past has made it difficult and almost impossible for our judges to interpret the law in a manner that will bring it to life and allow it to respond to the needs and developments in our society.

In trying to reform the criminal law we must remember that in 1969 we cannot define as a public crime certain actions which come within the ambit of personal conscience. We cannot define as criminal certain actions which, in another context, may be defined as sinful, or whatever other word one wishes to apply to them. When I studied the history of the law in my university days in England and here, I learned that much of our law developed during a period when society was governed by the church as well as the state. A good many of our laws can be traced to that historic fact. As society develops, and as the separation of church and state developed, the influence of the church in the formation of laws has become less and less. I urge that we do not term public crimes those actions which are matters for an individual's conscience. Behaviour which is governed in private by an individual's conscience ought not to be the subject of any provision in the criminal law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Confusion has arisen because of confusion in the use of words. At some point in his speech the hon. member for Calgary North said that a certain amendment—I forget which one—would legalize something. That was sheer semantic nonsense. The amendment to the section dealing with abortion does not legalize anything, the amendment to the section dealing with homosexuality does not legalize anything. Nothing is legalized. All these sections do is remove the taint of crime to certain actions which are merely personal matters to the persons concerned, actions which do not impinge on the public good or the rights of others because of the provisions in the law. These amendments do not legalize one thing. As I have said, they merely remove the taint of crime from certain behaviour, therefore making it permissible for people whose conscience permits them to behave that way, a way which was formerly prohibited. And it permits those whose conscience does not allow them to behave in this way to follow their conscience. This is all the law does.

Another principle, Mr. Speaker, which I think is relevant in 1969 and on which the bill is inadequate is that every psychological and psychiatric study has shown that penal institutions ought to be concerned with rehabilitation rather than punishment. The idea of punishment, vindictiveness and harshness toward human beings who have committed an offence against society is an old fashioned idea.

I submit to all my colleagues in this house and to all fellow citizens who are moved by deep religious feelings, that the ethics of all religions and all denominations the world over pleaded that we treat those who have fallen by the wayside humanely and compassionately and not with vindictiveness. Our criminal law ought to reflect this. This is the basic concept of Christian and Judaic and all other religions the world over. I always find it difficult to understand people who are sincere in their religion, but are not prepared to approach the public law in this way.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, another principle I would like to mention is that there are very few absolutes in human behaviour. There are some moral absolutes, but very few. I can think of nothing that should more properly fall into the category of the absolute than the duty of the state to protect and preserve human life. I agree this is one of the most important and most pressing duties of the collectivity, but even that, Mr. Speaker, is not absolute.

There is no one in this house, regardless of his feelings toward abortion, birth control or anything else, who would deny a policeman the right to kill a criminal who threatens his life, or to make that a crime. No one wants to remove self-defence in the proper circumstances as a defence against a criminal charge. But more important still, even though the duty of the state is to protect and preserve human life, in certain circumstances we support war and send our young men to kill and be killed, not always even to defend our lives but to defend what may be basically less than our lives, although just as important. We send them to defend those values which we believe deserve defending with our lives. Thus, even the duty of the state to protect and preserve human life is not absolute. The state knowingly and deliberately sends people to kill and be killed for the preservation of those values which collectively the people of a region, country and the world are not prepared to sacrifice.

Another elementary principle we ought to bear in mind, and it is relevant to some of the amendments which have caused a great deal of discussion, is that no law is a good law if in fact it is unenforceable or if when enforceable, it is discriminatory.

The laws regarding abortion, homosexuality and many other offences under the present Criminal Code are in certain respects unenforceable. When they are enforced it is against those who cannot afford the best legal assistance.

The Minister of Justice referred to the fact that he and his advisers have been unable to locate Canadian jurisprudence dealing with abortion covered by the old law in which the medical question had been a factor. The reason is obvious, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): The prosecution was not taken.

Mr. Lewis: The reason prosecution was not taken is that when a medical decision is made, usually it is in relation to people who can afford the funds to acquire the necessary medical assistance and legal advice when it is needed. Only those people are prosecuted who do not have the funds and find it necessary to resort to unethical medical practitioners or to quacks. It is only in those situations where you have prosecution and that is why the other situation could not be found. Therefore, any amendment which makes the law more enforceable and more equitable is an improvement in our law and should be welcomed by everyone.

Finally, there is one more principle I would like to mention. There is an educative value to the law. People think of the law as concerned only with coercion, with enforcement. However, the law also has an educational value. A good law which is in tune with the modern age, reflects modern developments, expresses a good moral objective and serves an immensely useful purpose, has a psychological and educational effect on a community, and amendments which achieve this result are good for the law and for the country. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I want to say that my colleagues and I welcome this bill, that is, so far as it goes. I am going to express on the part of some of us, objection to the short step which has been taken.

But together with my colleagues, and I am sure with other hon. members, I do want to see a public law in this country, and a criminal law as part of it, which is modern, humane, compassionate, responsive to the technological age in which we live, responsive to the fact that we no longer live in little rural communities but in huge urban conglomerations, responsive to the developments in psychology and psychiatry; a criminal law based on compassion and on the determination to give people a chance to rehabilitate themselves and be much less concerned with an eye for an eye, blood for blood, and life for life as being the major objectives of our law.

Now, in the time at my disposal tonight I want to turn to some specific matters which are in the law and some specific matters which are not in it. I want to deal with the most controversial matters first. I therefore come directly to the amendment to the abortion section. In my view, Mr. Speaker, the amendment does not go nearly far enough.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: In saying this I must in all honesty, as the leader of my colleagues in the house, inform the house that there may be one or two of our members who do not agree with what I have just stated. However, I am speaking for the party, for the caucus, for the overwhelming majority of my colleagues when I state this, and of course when I state it I want to emphasize that I have nothing but absolute respect for those who disagree with the position that I put forward.

I appreciate that the question is a matter of individual conscience and everyone must act by his conscience. It would be the height of presumption and cruelty not to respect that, but it would be the height of timidity and political expedience for me not to state fully and frankly the views which I hold.

I say first of all that the hon. member for Calgary North was right when he said that if the old section with regard to abortion is read together with an exactly similar law interpreted by the British courts, courts as high as the House of Lords in that country, then there is no addition to the present abortion law at all. All you have is the word "health" added to the word "life".

The hon. member for Calgary North proved to this house, in a way that makes it unnecessary for me to cite one of the things I have here with me, the fact that the interpretation of a similar section in the English law by the House of Lords—which undoubtedly would be followed by our courts here—meant that life encompassed health, a perfectly logical conclusion, and that therefore the change in this section of the Criminal Code dealing with abortion does not change the law at all.

But what distresses me even more, Mr. Speaker, is that the proposed change in the abortion law will not decrease illegal abortions by one single case. It will not have the slightest effect on the number of illegal abortions in this country. Because the old law made no change, and the new law makes no change in the old law, therefore the new law makes no change—it is a perfectly simple syllogism. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the private bill introduced by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) is the only intelligent and modern way to deal with this question of abortion, and at the proper opportunity in the standing committee we will put it to the test of that committee. It is to remove from the Criminal Code any reference to abortion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: Don't let anyone be shocked by this. The decision should be one which is made by the patient and the medical advice which the patient obtains. It is not a matter for lawyers to decide. It is not a matter for courts to interpret. It is not a matter for legalistic arguments about the meaning of words. I can almost hear the hon. member for Calgary North in court—he is obviously a very able counsel—interpreting health, as lawyers do, in one way and, in another situation where his case requires it interpreting it in another way. When you are dealing with the health and happiness of people in that context, there is no room for that kind of legalism and there is no need for that kind of legalism.

It may be necessary to have a law in the Criminal Code or elsewhere putting certain responsibilties on the members of the medical profession with respect to the advice which they should give in this particular instance, although personally I am not anxious to have even that. But I submit to you it is perfectly reasonable, it is highly moral and in tune with the development of the social conscience to leave the question as to whether or not a pregnancy ought to be terminated to the woman and her medical advisers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: I have often had occasion to disagree with members of the medical profession because of their attitudes, the attitudes of some of them I should say, with respect to medicare and the like. But I do not speak with tongue in cheek when I say to my fellow members who are doctors and physicians outside this chamber that I have complete confidence that all but the unethical members of that profession—and every profession has unethical members, mine as well as other professions—would be as careful about doing an abortion, or advising a woman to have an abortion, as any law on the statute books could require. The very training of the physician from the first day he goes into medical school is a training to preserve life, to improve life and not to do away with it. The attention which the physician gives to maintaining existence for a human being who has passed any capacity to act like a normal human being is evidence of the length to which members of the medical profession go to protect life, not to abandon it.

I am most anxious that with respect to this important measure in our social law there be a real amendment, a real change in our law, not the kind of change which the minister has proposed and that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was originally responsible for, which makes no change in the law at all. It is not an act of radicalism or even liberalism, small "l". It is an act of timidity to avoid the tremendous political difficulties that might be in the way of presenting a more thorough amendment such as modern society requires.

There are social questions that enter into the matter as to whether or not a pregnancy should be terminated, as well as purely medical questions about the life and health of the patient. There are social questions surrounding the family, surrounding the woman. There are psychological questions involved in whether or not a pregnancy ought to be terminated. There are problems related to whether or not the child, when it is born, will be a whole child or a deformed child. The amendment does not even deal with that point. It does not make legal an abortion in a case when the physician is convinced the child would be a deformed child, with all the unhappiness and the misery that that creates not only for the child but for the environment and the family.

All these problems as well are involved in the very soul-searching question as to whether or not a pregnancy should be terminated. The minister does not touch on any of these questions in his amendment. He does not come near any of these questions by the amendment which has been proposed. I welcome the amendment because it clarifies the law a little. It makes it more certain that the health of the woman will be considered. I hope the courts will interpret health to mean the health of the mind and of the spirit as well as physical health. Therefore, I welcome the addition of that word, but it does not go anywhere near as far as in my view the amendment should have gone.

I want to deal briefly with the homosexuality changes which have caused a great deal of discussion. I know that to normal people this practice is an odious one, an unaesthetic one if you like; but to make it a crime in all cases is to be insensitive and cruel because this deviationism obviously is due to certain psychological and other factors. This behaviour requires charity and treatment rather than criminal prosecution. I find it very difficult to see how the change which is proposed in the bill can be seriously opposed except by those who would discard compassion and understanding toward people who suffer from tendencies we may consider unacceptable and undesirable but for which they obviously are by definition not responsible.

We support the amendment with respect to breathalizer tests. I am not personally worried about the intrusion into civil liberties and rights in this case because personal freedom is not absolute either. We constantly require the freedom of individuals and the freedom of their actions to be circumscribed to the extent, and only to the extent, that the public good requires it. The fact that someone may be inconvenienced on occasion is irrelevant and certainly unimportant in comparison with the fact brought out by the Minister of Justice with regard to slaughter on the highways. If this law should enable society collectively to save one life in the next year, let alone several hundred lives, it is worth while and we support it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

I should like to say a brief word about lotteries. I wish to say to hon. members that I have no moral objection to lotteries. I have no moral objection to gambling. I hope hon. members will believe me, although they may easily conclude that I am protesting too much. But I have never gambled. I am not interested. It just bores me.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You are a member of the N.D.P.; you have to be a gambler.

Mr. Lewis: I am told that I ought to be a gambler because I am in the N.D.P. In that sense the hon. minister is right; but I am gambling on the basis of principles which I hope some day to persuade the hon. minister to see.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is a real long shot.

Mr. Lewis: It probably is. So long as it is a long shot we will continue to stand by our principles, something which I would recommend to other hon. members in this house.

I have no moral objection to lotteries or gambling. I do have objection to heads of families gambling at the expense of their families. That is a different question. But if people want to have lotteries I do not have any moral objection to them. I therefore welcome those changes which enable charitable and religious organizations to carry on lotteries for charitable and religious purposes. I see no objection to that at all. I do, however, have considerable objection to a change in the law which would make it possible for states to hold lotteries. I do not object to this on moral grounds but on the simple social ground that—and this is now a word which has been made parliamentary by the Prime Minister—this is a hell of a way to raise money for social purposes.

An hon. Member: What about Jean Drapeau?

Mr. Lewis: He tried it and failed. If we need funds for social welfare we ought to raise them directly from the people who have the funds. They should make funds available to society because they are the people, whether they are in the middle or high income groups, who have made their income, either in a profession, business or wherever, as a result of the collective effort of society. They ought to provide, through taxation, the funds necessary for social purposes. To me it is just simply unacceptable to have gambling or lotteries for that purpose. This would destroy every possibility of planning the economy. As I read this clause I could imagine the minister of finance—either the previous, present or future minister of finance—trying to determine what revenues will be available for social measures. He would consider the revenues he would take from taxes and then have to make some kind of guess concerning the amount of money that would come in from lotteries. He would try to balance his budget on the basis of lotteries. Seriously, it is for reasons of this kind that I object to state lotteries. Gambling is not the way to raise money for social purposes.

I am almost at the end of my time, but I hope the house will let me have a few minutes longer. If I may I should like to say a few words about the section dealing with insanity. I wish to say to the minister that the amendments he has brought in with regard to insanity deal in my opinion—I am not an expert in criminal law—with the least important part. They are very important and very necessary, but they do not deal with the most important section of the Code relating to this subject; that is section 16 itself. What is needed is an amendment to section 16 which defines insanity. That is what is needed. We need an amendment to the law which will get rid of the old outdated, hoary, untenable, no longer appropriate McNaghten rules by which our courts are governed. This just makes no sense at all in 1969. The minister has not amended that at all. He has not touched section 16. The courts are still able to apply completely inapplicable laws that are no longer in tune with the developments in psychology and psychiatry.

What the minister does give us, however, are very useful means of appealing, in certain circumstances and under certain rules, when the question of insanity arises. But I submit that it is much more important that we amend section 16, the definition of insanity itself. I recommend to him a private bill which was tabled during a previous parliament by my colleague, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin). In this bill he applied the rule adopted by the United States court of appeal 14 or 15 years ago.

Finally, I should like to say to the Minister of Justice that my colleagues and I greet with pleasure the amendments to the Combines Investigation Act dealing with fraudulent advertising. Let me emphasize that advertising in our modern society is not the kind of thing it was even several decades ago when the Combines Investigation Act was first passed and these sections were first included in it. I do not remember the year.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): 1936.

Mr. Lewis: I knew it was several decades ago. Today advertising has become one of the major industries in society. It is the means by which people are persuaded to want what they get.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his time has expired.

Sone hon. Members: Carry on.

• (9:50 p.m.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the house give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Continue.

Mr. Lewis: Thank you very much. I appreciate the kindness of hon. members. I was saying that advertising in our modern society does what Professor Gad Horowitz states in a chapter of a recent book. It makes certain that people want what they get instead of getting what they want.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That is Galbraith.

Mr. Lewis: No, that is Horowitz, but since the minister wants Galbraith I will give this to him too. As Professor Galbraith pointed out, and this is why this is important and why I will have something unkind to say to the minister on the subject:

> It is part of the strategy by which firms minimize their subordination to the market; by which they take labour and capital supply, public policy and prices within their broad ambit of control.

He says that in our modern society the individual, instead of being sovereign in our economic system is, in large degree, the instrument of advertising. So that false advertising, fraudulent advertising and improper advertising ought to be prohibited in the strictest possible way. So far as the proposal by the minister is concerned, the strictness appears to me to be there, to the extent I have been able to study the words.

I have in my files a clipping of a statement made in some speech by the minister of consumer affairs and reported in the Financial Post of November 9, 1968. In this speech the minister underlined that he had very few people in his department able to enforce these provisions about false advertising; the amendment he has proposed to the Combines Investigation Act. If that is the case his law is not worth anything. No law, however good, which remains on the statute books without being enforced is worth the paper on which it is written. If this minister, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) and the government as a whole are serious about stopping false and fraudulent advertising, and serious about protecting our society against the manipulations which the advertising industry performs on innocent people, they ought to provide the funds to the minister, or whatever other department may be available, to give them the staff to enforce the amendment which has been presented. Without that, this is a sham and nothing more.

If the minister has had difficulty in getting funds from the cabinet or the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury), as far as my colleagues and I are concerned we hope that he fights as hard as he can to get the necessary staff to enforce the law which is contained in his bill on this point.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): That was in 1967, when I was the minister of consumer affairs.

Mr. Lewis: The minister says it was 1967.

I want to be finished by at least ten o'clock, so as not to take to extreme the kindness the house has shown me. I want to list several things that are not in the bill which make the bill much less useful than it ought to have been. I cannot for the life of me understand why the bill does not contain provisions for the right of an accused to counsel. This is contained in the charter for human rights which the Prime Minister presented to the constitutional conference a year ago. It is still there, therefore the government believes in it. It is obvious that this charter may take a long time to come into being. The gestation period has been a year already, and I think it will be one or two more years. This will not be done in months. In the meantime, why should the right to counsel not be written into the criminal law? There is no excuse for this. It is not too difficult a subject on which to draft an amendment to the Criminal Code. We should guarantee the right to counsel to every person who requires counsel. The absence of this right is what makes one law for the rich and one for the poor. It is the capacity to have the best legal advice which makes the difference in the application of the law.

For the life of me I can see no reason why an amendment dealing with electronic devices and the privacy of the individual should not be in this omnibus bill. There has been a great deal of writing about this and there have been recommendations by commissions. If I remember correctly, the hon. Mr. McRuer made a recommendation on this subject. It should not be beyond the ingenuity of even the junior members of the minister's staff to draft an appropriate amendment on this subject.

Why should it require more than one single line to remove the barbaric corporal punishment laws from the Criminal Code? Why should that have to wait until the future? All it would require is a few words, namely that section so and so be deleted. Why does that require years of study and thought? That ought to be in the amendments before us.

For a long time we have talked about expunging the criminal record which remains on the books against a person, in spite of the fact that for years he has led a clean, decent and social life. Why should this require years of study, and why does this bill not contain a simple amendment to expunge and put aside a criminal record after a period of time? I think it ought to be five years.

Why do we have to wait for months and years before we straighten out the shameful conditions in respect of bail in our criminal law courts? The hon. member for Calgary North dealt with this subject at great length. I have read at least two or three books and, God knows, a dozen or two dozen articles on this subject. It has been written upon to the point that there is nothing left to be said, although academics will still find something to say as they always do. This does not require any long study. There would be no difficulty in drafting something to deal with this subject.

The time urges me to conclude my remarks, and I will end the way I started. The bill before us has many good features. We will support it and we will facilitate its passage, but we feel it is far short of the kind of revision to the Criminal Code that should have been before us in view of the long gestation period which both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice have taken on this measure.

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

[Mr. Lewis.]

We, of the Ralliement Créditiste, agreed willingly to let the parliamentary leader of the New Democratic party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), pursue his speech. We hope therefore the same co-operation will be granted us tomorrow.

Secondly, I would like Your Honour to ask the house for leave to prolong this debate. Since we sat yesterday until two o'clock in the morning, why not do likewise today?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to proceed to the questions to be dealt with on the adjourment motion.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under standing order No. 40 deemed to have been moved.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PROGRAM RESPECTING POLLUTION PROBLEM AT DUNNVILLE, ONTARIO

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, a short time ago I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Greene) a supplementary question regarding a statement on the responsibility of the federal government concerning the pollution problem at Dunnville and the responsibility of the federal government to set federal standards on pollution control. This question followed questions to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) concerning the C.B.C. program "Air of Death" which was shown on channel 6 on October 22.

• (10:00 p.m.)

A portion of the film dealt with the health issue at Dunnville. The pollution problem at Dunnville arose as a result of the operations of two industrial plants, E.R.C.O., which is the Electrical Reduction Company Limited and the Sherbrooke Metallurgical Company Limited, both of which are involved in industrial processes and both of which were involved in the Dunnville pollution problem. As you probably know, Mr. Speaker, as a result of many complaints a three man committee was set up by the Ontario government to study the pollution problem at Dunnville. The committee made a report and made recommendations with regard to the basic problem of pollution to the Ontario government. I am going to read short excerpts from their recommendations. At page 307 of the report they said:

> Since damage to animals, plants, and various materials has been caused by fluorides in the emissions from the ERCO plant at Port Maitland, it is essential that ERCO should install the necessary equipment and modify their operations to reduce dust emissions from the lagoons, and emissions from the curing sheds, to acceptable limits under full plant operation. The payment of even generous compensation is not a substitute for good operational control; compensation payments should be an emergency policy only.

I should point out that arbitration awards in 1965, 1966, and 1967 totalled $271,000 concerning livestock, field crops and horticulture in this area.

A further recommendation was that:

> The Sherbrooke Metallurgical Company should become acutely aware of their pollution problem and should study the advisability of increasing the height of their stacks by a factor of 2.

The third recommendation was that:

> Meaningful standards should be established by government for the permissive concentrations of various pollutants in the air, relative to the effects on human health, livestock, and plants. The standards should acknowledge differences between rural, semi-urban, and urban areas.

Another recommendation is that:

> Because of the high pathogenic bacteria count reported from several cisterns in the area, the use of such water for drinking purposes should be discouraged. If it is necessary to use such water for drinking, residents should be advised to clean their cisterns regularly and to use the appropriate amount of chlorine.

These are a few of the recommendations that were contained in the report with regard to the specific problem of pollution at Dunnville.

But the more basic recommendations to the government are contained on page 311 where they say:

> There were many facets to this ad hoc study—the chief ones being the effects of the pollutants on:
> (a) human beings: this facet was of critical concern. It revealed a potential human health problem and was especially significant to the medical and dental professions, the many specialists within those professions, and the Department of Health.

With regard to:

> —cereal, forage, vegetable and fruit crops: The damage and the potential damage of pollutants on such crops was of the utmost economic and agricultural concern.

Then they dealt with a recommendation concerning:

> —cattle, sheep, hogs, poultry, and bees: The rearing of livestock in a polluted area was of great individual and general agricultural concern.

They dealt with drinking water as follows:

> —drinking water: Whether drinking water comes from deep wells, shallow wells, cisterns or streams, it is a practical and important factor—

Lastly, they say that:

> Pollution is a natural and ingrained fact of life. Pollution control is yet in its infancy. We suggest that the government adopt an even greater sense of urgency in developing "anti-pollution" policies and in establishing the organization to implement them.

I bring this to the attention of the house, Mr. Speaker, because my experience as a member of the standing committee on national resources, and the testimony we heard when the estimates were before the committee recently, indicate to me that the Canadian government shows very little concern about this problem and is reluctant to exercise leadership in helping to overcome it.

[Translation]

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I believe all hon. members share the concern the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Gilbert) has just expressed. It shows his good disposition and his care for the welfare of mankind, that should really concern government authorities.

But we should not forget for all that that we do not live in a unitarian country, but in a country where the distribution of jurisdictions takes place at the municipal, provincial and federal levels, and that the municipalities are provincial creatures. Therefore, the pollution problem in that particular municipality comes under provincial jurisdiction.

However, I do not mean by that that the Department of National Health and Welfare as well as the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources should ignore that serious problem, because air, like water, goes across frontiers without any passport, and is therefore a matter of national concern. The government is now trying, through research, to set up standards, to convince the provinces and to negotiate with them in order to establish throughout this country a standard policy as regards the serious problem of air and water pollution.

I do hope we will soon be able to enter into agreements with the provinces and, as a result, to establish legislation that will remove the serious dangers that have been revealed, especially in the municipality of Dunnville.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

BILINGUAL REQUIREMENTS FOR COMMISSIONAIRES AT MUSEUMS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): I have raised this question on two successive days, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, I asked the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) whether he would review the dismissal of the 15 commissionaires from the national museums located in Ottawa. You will recall that these men were dismissed because they were unilingual. The only assurance which has been given us on this question is that new jobs will be found for them elsewhere.

I now discover that the government has no right to do this, because it is the responsibility of the Corps of Commissionaires to place these men in jobs. I have also found that some of these men have not been placed in new positions. Some have been demoted. I think this information is generally known to hon. members and to the public.

The most disconcerting aspect of this question is that it is hard to find anyone who will accept the blame. Everyone seems to be ashamed of what has been done. Actually, it should be the responsibility of the board of trustees which, since last April, has been in charge of museum affairs. The Chairman, Mr. Jean Ostiguy, recalls no such decision having been made by the board. There was no consultation with the Department of Veterans' Affairs with respect to the veterans' charter and veterans' preference as applicable to employment with the government of Canada. The minister has denied responsibility. The Secretary General of the National Museums, Mr. Charles MacKenzie, said he gave a directive to Mr. Wait who is in charge of the commissionaires in the Ottawa area. Now, there is a further development. Mr. MacKenzie said he received his instructions from the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Gordon Robertson, in a communique last October which urged departmental heads to implement the terms of the official languages bill as soon as possible. Today, in the house, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) admits that he authorized the directive that was sent out by the Clerk of the Privy Council.

I raise the issue at this time because what has been done is patently unjust. When deputy ministers employed in the government of Canada are found linguistically deficient, they are sent on an expensive course at the taxpayers' expense. Some of these courses cost as much as $150,000. But when commissionaires are found linguistically deficient, they are removed from their positions.

All of these commissionaires are men with outstanding military service to their country. Clause 9 of the Official Languages Act bill merely states, to summarize it, that it is the duty of departments to provide services to the public in both languages in certain locations. I also further discovered that commissionaires are specifically forbidden to engage in conversation with the public except in emergencies; their duties are security and custodial only.

I think I can best present the core of this problem tonight by quoting part of a speech made by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to the Kiwanis Club in Ottawa recently. At that time he expressed the two sides of the problem of promoting bilingualism in the public service in Ottawa. He said that the program is designed to correct the injustices of the past, while avoiding the creation of new injustices.

I believe that an injustice has been done in this case. Further, I urge the government to review the whole matter and to see that these employees who have been dealt with unjustly are restored to their positions. As I say, today the Prime Minister further admitted to being the author of the directive that caused the whole unhappy process, and which incidentally was an infringement on all the rights of members of parliament because the Official Languages Act has not been dealt with by this house. It is not good enough to lay the blame on civil servants. I believe that the responsibility lies with the government, and the remedy is in their hands.

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) is to be congratulated on his interest in this subject. Many of us are aware of his constant watchdog approach to this topic. I have listened to his question. The minister answered him yesterday, and I can assure all hon. members that the question of bilingualism in our national museums is of utmost concern to the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier). He has never neglected or ignored this question.

I think that the Secretary of State has shown deep concern about the accusations that have been made. He has asked about reports that some commissionaires have lost benefits or even salary. In view of the statement of the Prime Minister today, I am sure that he too is concerned about any unjust treatment to which these veterans are subjected. We have been assured that this matter will be investigated, and a further report to the house will be made in the near future.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT—NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING FIVE DAY DELIVERY

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question deals with the problem being encountered by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) with reference to the implementation of the five-day week delivery. We have been told that there have been discussions on this important matter. I submit that if discussions have been held, then the message is obviously not getting through. Someone in the communications department is not communicating.

It is now clear that the minister's hopes of last fall have not been justified. The five-day delivery plan is not being accepted. It has been changed in its application, and now rural and urban Canadians are in two different categories. The plan was to cut down expenditure but not to cause anybody to lose his job. There is anxiety on this question. In addition to changing the scope of the plan the minister has had to change the date. Instead of February 1, we now hear it is to be February 17.

Yet there is great unrest. Obviously there is resistance from the employees affected, mostly those who work on the sortation process. Why these matters were not fully and carefully ironed out in the many weeks since the announcement was made is difficult to comprehend.

Previous to the last postal strike which disrupted this country there were signs and portents long before the event. The department showed no sign that it saw what was coming.

While it is agreeable to think big for the future, to dream dreams, to talk about the waves of the future and the ringing of telephones, under the sponsorship of the post office department, it is also prudent to look at some of the knotty problems of the present. The public is interested in knowing what is going on. Will employees work to rule? In today's Ottawa Citizen, Roger Decarie, council co-chairman and President of the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada, is reported to have said:

> There is no question of work-to-rule, . . . We're just keeping track of time.

The same article quotes the secretary-treasurer of that organization as saying that the requested action can be considered:

> —either work to contract or work-to-rule.

Farther down that same article says:

> Adding fuel to the controversy was a departmental memo to postmasters ordering them to remove from post office bulletin boards copies of the council bulletin sent out last week.

That is a very, very serious matter constituting a form of industrial action on the part of the post office.

Field representative Don J. Mowat of the Letter Carriers' Union of Canada said, as reported in the same article:

> At present our boys are in an all-out war with the postal department.

That is a very, very serious state of affairs. This morning's Globe and Mail had this to say:

> The move is not expected to have any effect on mail delivery but may result in postal employees working longer than their 40-hour week and, as a result, claiming overtime bonuses.

There is a danger that the five day delivery week may not be a cost saving project after all. I say to the minister, or his representative, before it is too late it should be pointed out to both sides in this controversy that the public is in no mood for any disruption, dislocation of retardation of mail service. There has been a constant stream of increased charges flowing from the post office. We have had increased charges for stamps, money orders, newspapers, and now rent on boxes is to be increased. Apparently the boxes produce for the Post Office Department revenues of $2.5 million. They cost the department $4.5 million in administration and maintenance, although I do not see how that figure is arrived at. Even the cost of postal box keys is to increase from 35 cents to 50 cents.

Mr. Dinsdale: That is Liberal inflation.

Mr. Macquarrie: In the midst of all this, there is a growing public complaint that although costs are going up and up service is slipping. One hears this too often for one to be complacent about our Post Office Department.

In the face of this, I think all concerned should take warning. If the minister has to backtrack on his plans for five day urban delivery, so be it. But let all concerned beware of making the public one again a victim of the dispute between the post office and its employees. The tolerance point of the public is low indeed.

Proceedings on Adjournment Motion

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) to reply on his behalf to the question raised by the hon. member for Hillsborough. I regret that I can offer no substantial information at this time. Discussions are continuing, as they have been for two weeks, between senior officials of the Post Office Department and the Council of Postal Workers. These negotiations are concerned with the implementation of the five day week, which will come into effect on February 17 and with the institution of what is called single mail processing by which letter carriers will no longer be required to return to the post office in the afternoon for the purpose of sorting mail. In addition, the Minister has met with the leaders of the unions involved.

• (10:20 p.m.)

On the other point raised by the hon. member, namely that of the directive by the unions to their members to enact what he has termed, or some newspapers have termed, work-to-rule, I can say that according to available information no such attempt is being made. No action taken by postal workers has resulted in any delays to mail delivery and service, and the fact that this should be the situation is an indication of the sense of public responsibility of those employees.

A small number of postal workers in a limited number of areas have exercised what they consider their right to return to the post office for a wash-up at the end of their day's work. Such action has no effect upon mail service. The post office disputes the right of its employees to take such action, and I repeat it has been taken in only a few instances. This matter forms part of the continuing discussions between post office officials and union representatives, and will be decided early next month by an adjudicator appointed under the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The motion to adjourn the house is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this house stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.25 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MAJOR—PROTEST CONCERNING STATEMENT OF HON. MEMBER FOR SHEFFORD—OBSERVATIONS BY MR. SPEAKER ON PROCEDURE

Mr. Speaker: I received earlier today the following notice from the hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. Major):

I hereby wish to advise you that, pursuant to standing order 17 (1) and (2), I should like to raise a question of privilege in the house, today, this 24th day of January 1969, at the eleven o'clock sitting.

I take this opportunity to point out to hon. members the provisions of standing order 17 and more specifically, subsection (2) of that order, the terms of which follow:

(2) Unless notice of motion has been given under Standing Order 42, any member proposing to raise a question of privilege other than one arising out of proceedings in the Chamber during the course of a sitting shall give to the Speaker a written statement of the question at least one hour prior to raising the question in the House.

The hon. member, as other hon. members in the past, merely gave notice to the Speaker that he wishes to raise a question of privilege and it seems to me that that interpretation of our standing orders is not quite accurate.

Not only must the hon. member advise the Speaker that he wishes to raise a question of privilege, but he must also reveal its nature. It seems to me the English version is perhaps more specific in that it stipulates as follows:

"—shall give to the Speaker a written statement of the question".

I think it would be preferable, in the future, for the hon. members who wish to raise a question of privilege, under the provisions of standing order 17, to not only advise the Speaker, within the time limit stipulated by the standing order, that they wish to raise a question of privilege, but also to give an indication of its subject matter.

Mr. Robert-B. Major (Argenteuil): Mr. Speaker, since it was very late yesterday when we received the official report of the House of Commons Debates for Wednesday, January 22, this is the first opportunity I have to raise this matter.

On that day the hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) the following question, and I quote:

Can he tell the house if he will make investigations on the mining rights presently owned by some financiers in the far north of Quebec, who are not only interested in seeing the future international airport built on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, in order to meet their needs better, but who have recently paid the cost of a study conducted by a certain firm, in co-operation with five members of parliament, in order to prove that the future international airport should be located at Sainte-Scholastique, in the constituency of Deux-Montagnes?

Mr. Speaker, the report on the study concerning the Montreal international airport, which was submitted to the Department of Transport by the Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes intermunicipal board was commissioned and paid for by that board, in a spirit of co-operation and motivation seldom displayed by public bodies.

The 43 municipalities in Argenteuil realized, as early as last summer, the economic significance for our area of the future international airport.

I take this opportunity to publicly congratulate all the mayor and reeves for their initiative—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand the desire of the hon. member to congratulate the mayor concerned. However, I have to interrupt him at this time. I do not think that there is a question of privilege unless he wishes to move a motion at this time in order to follow up the question which was raised. And, as I do not think this is the intention of the hon. member, I must therefore rule that there is no question of privilege and that there should not be any debate on the matter raised by the hon. member.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

AGREEMENT TO FORGO SITTING ON TUESDAY, JANUARY 28

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, further to the announcement of business I made yesterday, I think there is general agreement to an order of the house that the sitting of the house on Tuesday, January 28, be suspended. Perhaps that could be made an order of the house.

Mr. Speaker: Is it so agreed and ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LATIN AMERICA—REPORT OF CANADIAN GOVERNMENT MINISTERIAL MISSION

Mr. Jean-Pierre Goyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with standing order 41 (2), I should like to table in English and in French copies of the preliminary report of the ministerial mission sent to Latin America from October 27 to November 27, 1968, as well as a relevant press release.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING MAINLAND AND NATIONALIST CHINA

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Speaking on the problem of recognizing China the Prime Minister said on November 8:

> Our concern is that the government of Taiwan not be disregarded in the process.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) was asked on the evening of Tuesday, January 21, if relations would have to be broken with Formosa, he replied:

> I would hesitate to answer that question, but it is quite possible.

Will the Prime Minister now say what the government's policy on this matter is at this time?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The government's further policy will be announced in due course. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs replied in the house yesterday to questions asked on the subject, he repeated what the government's position in this matter is.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question that arises from statements I believe attributed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Is the Prime Minister now in a position to announce that definitive plans have been made to allow the exchange of views between the government of Canada and the new administration of the United States on the matter I referred to in my previous question, as well as on other matters of mutual concern?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker. No definitive plans have been made in that regard yet.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he does not think that the game of uncertainty in connection with the recognition discussions should end, since it is creating difficulty in other parts of the world and particularly at the moment in Formosa. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs last Tuesday night was asked by Mr. Collins on the C.B.C. program "Something Else" if we will have to break relations with Formosa was he stating government policy when he said "I would hesitate to answer that question, but it is quite possible." What is the meaning of those words?

Will the Prime Minister make a statement that will restore a certain degree of hope that the people of Formosa are not going to be sacrificed in any action that is taken?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Trudeau: There is no question of sacrificing the people of Formosa, Mr. Speaker. The position of the government is that the fate of the people of Formosa should be determined by those people themselves. But in the matter of accusing the government of conducting a shell game of uncertainty—

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is what you have been doing.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the right hon. gentleman says that is what we have been doing—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: —yet in this morning's editorial page of the Globe and Mail I read that it was "government-by-surprise." We cannot at the same time as we are conducting government by consultation and discussion be accused of conducting government by surprise. We are not conducting a shell game of uncertainty. We are discussing these questions at great length with the Canadian public, and there is hardly substance there for government by surprise.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the concern of many Canadians with respect to these moves by the government, and the respective interest both in mainland and nationalist China, would the Prime Minister or the Secretary of State for External Affairs very shortly make a statement with respect to our position on both of these countries, and the proposal we plan to set forward, so that we can have increased communications with mainland China and carry on some kind of effective communication with nationalist China?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we hope this will be the result of our policy; but once again I repeat the position of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, that we plan to enter into consultation with the Peking government. This will be done at a time and in a place which we will decide; but until both consultations have begun we do not want to take a position on the government of Taiwan.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I did not clarify my supplementary question enough. I think it is important, as I am sure the Prime Minister would agree, that before any major changes are made—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): —we should have a clear statement from the government.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I have some questions for the Prime Minister relating to the same subject, and asked from the opposite position from that taken by the other hon. members who have asked questions. I would like to know from the right hon. Prime Minister if he would be kind enough to tell us whether the direct discussions with Peking regarding an exchange of representatives have started. I gather they have not started yet and, if so, would the Prime Minister indicate whether any definite date for the commencement of those talks has been set?

Mr. Trudeau: No, Mr. Speaker, the talks have not begun, nor have we fixed a date. We are now in the process of finding a foreign capital to which both Peking and the government of Canada are accredited, and which would be an appropriate place for these talks to take place.

Mr. Lewis: In view of the fact that, contrary to expressions used this morning, the government of Taiwan does not represent any part of China, and in view of the fact that the government of that country occupies the absurd position of having a permanent seat on the Security Council, as a big power—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is this—a speech?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please—

Mr. Lewis: —and since it is not a big power—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps the hon. member would start to ask his question.

Mr. Lewis: With respect, Mr. Speaker, in view of the line which previous questions took, I had to indicate that I am asking this question to make sure that my question is understood in the proper context. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman whether the government is also initiating discussions to have the representatives of Chiang Kai-shek removed from the permanent seat on the Security Council, in order to make room for a seat by mainland China, to which that seat belongs?

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that at the session of the United Nations General Assembly in 1966 Canada's position as stated by the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Hon. Paul Martin, was that this should be done, that some provision should be made—

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Not in 1968.

Mr. Trudeau: I will explain the point if you will be patient. The position was taken that the People's Republic of China should be the China recognized in the charter. We were not able to get off the ground with that position, although we did a great deal of lobbying with some friendly countries. It was then that we decided perhaps the best way to proceed was through bilateral action by Canada; but we cannot persuade the 130 or so countries of the United Nations to do this, with some majority.

An hon. Member: You mean one country.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: No. It is not a vote of 130 to 1. Then we decided to proceed unilaterally. I am glad of the way the question is asked. I know the position of the hon. member on this particular question. I would point out that there has been a good deal of questioning in the house about the position of the government, and I have yet to see the position of the Conservative party on the question.

Mr. MacLean: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question, for clarification. Would the Prime Minister not agree that the recognition of mainland China and the substitution of mainland China for Formosa in the United Nations are two separate and distinct problems.

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, I would, Mr. Speaker.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

REQUEST FOR PUBLICATION OF REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the government house leader.

I should like to ask him if he can give us some explanations concerning the fact that reports nos. 8 and 9 of the standing committee on health, welfare and social affairs which held meetings in early December, have not been published as yet. Could the government house leader give us some explanations about this matter and assure us that the reports will soon be made available, as today is January 24 and we are awaiting the French version?

[English]

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker. I will make an inquiry and report to the house.

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

POSSIBILITY OF RE-INTRODUCING DEATH PENALTY

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

In view of the considerable number of murders in Canada, would the minister tell us whether he considers re-establishing capital punishment?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Apparently there is no reply to the question. The Chair will therefore recognize the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON BASE CONSOLIDATION

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Does he expect in the near future to be in a position to make a statement to the house as a result of the study which his department has been making for the past several months on the question of the consolidation of Canadian military bases.

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all I think I should congratulate the hon. member for his sustained interest in this problem. The decision flowing from the studies that have been made in the Department of National Defence I do not think would call for a statement in the house. That would be in the nature of an announcement or release in respect of administrative procedures, which would follow through whenever decisions are taken.

Mr. Hees: Does the minister expect in the near future to be in a position to make any of the various types of utterances which he has mentioned.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I do expect so, sir.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Do we understand from the minister's answer that the base consolidation study has now been completed?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Yes.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CULTURAL AGREEMENTS BETWEEN FRANCE AND CANADA

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister at an early opportunity report to parliament the details of the implementation of any and all cultural agreements involving France and Canada, including the amounts of any federal contribution, the amounts expended or contributed by France in Canada and the numbers and kinds of personnel exchanged between France on the one hand and Canada on the other?

Mr. Speaker: The question is in order to the extent that the hon. member is asking whether the Prime Minister proposes to make a statement, and may be answered yes or no.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No; I do not propose to make such a statement but I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs might consider one.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether the umbrella agreement signed between France and the federal government is still in effect, and is it the government's intention to renew that agreement?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I know the umbrella is still open, but I do not know whether there is any terminal date to it. I am sure the Secretary of State for External Affairs would be delighted to consider such questions.

THE SENATE

POSSIBILITY OF APPOINTMENT OF MISS LAMARSH

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

As there were many vacancies in the Senate lately, and as there is an additional one due to the death, yesterday, of the hon. Wallace McCutcheon, would the Prime Minister consider appointing shortly Miss Judy LaMarsh, former Secretary of State, to the gilded cage of the Senate?

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER, B.C.—EMPTY SHIPS LEAVING PORT

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Economic Affairs whether he is in a position today to reply to the question raised yesterday, and indicate whether in fact empty ships are leaving Vancouver harbour?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Yes, Mr. Speaker, and the information provided by the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner) was accurate. One vessel has sailed without a cargo, with arrangements having been made for later shipment of the grain. Similar arrangements are being discussed concerning the second vessel.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CLOSING OF OATS, BARLEY AND WHEAT POOL ACCOUNTS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I might use this occasion to say I have been informed by the Canadian Wheat Board that it is their intention to close the 1967 oats, barley and wheat pool accounts on the following dates: Oats, January 31; barley, February 14 and—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, this is not the time for statements like this. If the minister wants to make it, he should revert to motions.

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, I was trying to answer questions that were raised in the house last week but if I am not allowed to do so—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is not a reply to the question asked. It is a smokescreen.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO FORMULATION OF CHARTER

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs stated on Monday, December 9, that he favoured the drawing up by his department of a charter of the rights of the consumers, could the Prime Minister tell us if such a charter will be presented together with the charter of human rights of if both will be merged into a single one?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, there is no question of merging the charters. The question of the economic rights of man will be dealt with when the federal government brief is considered and we shall then explain why this aspect of the rights of the citizen must not be considered together with the one that deals with political and legal rights.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a supplementary question.

I wish to thank the Prime Minister for his answer, and I would like him to clarify it so as to tell us if there will be two different charters of if they will be merged into a single one. Could he dwell a little more on that matter?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: I can only repeat, Mr. Speaker, what I have said. The two charters will not be merged into a single one; there is no question of putting into the charter of human rights, which shall be discussed at the federal-provincial conference, the consumer charter or even elements of it. I have already explained why.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

OPPORTUNITIES FOR UNEMPLOYED TO IMPROVE TECHNICAL SKILLS

Mr. John L. Skoberg (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer received from the Minister of Manpower and Immigration on January 21, in which he indicated that no additional funds would be allocated for vocational training in technical schools, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether, having in mind his statement that with the elimination of the municipal winter works program additional funds would be provided for the upgrading of such technical schools as require it, he would now agree that there should be funds allotted for such a purpose, particularly because of the urgency connected with this situation?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question is argumentative.

Mr. Skoberg: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I do believe there is real urgency and I did not intend any argumentative purpose in asking the question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I cannot interpret the hon. member's intention, I can only interpret the question.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TORONTO—HOLDING OF INDIAN GIRL IN JAIL

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On December 17 I asked him a question regarding an Indian girl who had been incarcerated in Don jail. He replied that he would investigate this matter and report to the house. Is he now ready to do so?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, the minister was called to an urgent meeting. I will bring this matter to his attention and endeavour to have some kind of reply for the hon. member shortly.

[Mr. Fortin.]

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

SIMILARITY BETWEEN NICKELS AND QUARTERS—REQUEST FOR CHANGE OF SHAPE

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I ask him whether, because of the irritation of the public and the confusion caused by the fact that the present issues of quarters and nickels are almost identical, any consideration has been given to changing the shape of either of these coins.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have some doubt whether this is a matter of urgency, but perhaps because of the interest in the question I will allow the minister to reply.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Not at the present time, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

POTATOES—TRADE COMMISSION TO SEEK MARKETS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I wonder whether, in view of the very large volume of potatoes still in storage and the continuing depressed market with regard, particularly, to potato stock and seed potatoes, the minister or his department has received a request for the establishment of a special trade commission to seek out new markets overseas for seed potatoes. If so, is the minister giving consideration to mounting such a trade commission?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, no such commission has been set up in the past. I have not received a request. I shall inquire whether the department has, and we will do our best to help in this matter.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

REPLACEMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, but in his absence I direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the term of office of the chairman of the Atlantic Development Board has expired, would the Prime Minister say whether a replacement has been made; and if not, what is the position of the board now?

Mr. Bell: It is in limbo.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister is not supposed to be in the house this morning, but he is supposed to be here on Monday. I wonder if the hon. member himself was here yesterday, because it is my recollection that the question was answered at that time.

Some hon. Members: No.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE—ATTENDANCE OF PARTY OBSERVERS—POSITION PAPERS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the forthcoming constitutional conference which is to open on February 10. I ask when we may expect advice as to observers at the conference from the various parties in this house. I gather the government party as well as opposition parties would be included. Also, when may we expect to have the federal position papers made public, so we might study them before the conference starts?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): With regard to the observers, Mr. Speaker, a decision was reached for the December conference, and it is my recollection that the same decision will apply to this one. But I will check on that. On the second question, we have followed the same procedure as previously, that is, the previous date which was set. The secretariat has written to the provinces suggesting two dates, one for the publication of the report of the continuing committee of officials, and another for the publication of the position papers of the various governments. I have had no reply yet, but I know these letters were sent earlier this week or last week.

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister recall the dates which were suggested by the secretariat for those two matters?

Mr. Trudeau: In the case of the memoranda, or position papers, of the governments, yes; it is the Friday before the conference begins. We suggested this date because that was what had been agreed in December, namely the Friday before the conference began. Concerning the date of the continuing committee of officials, this technically is not a matter for the federal government but for the secretariat. I do believe, however, that they suggested dates perhaps a week or five days previous to the papers of the respective governments, which would be the Monday before the Friday or something like that.

COMMUNICATIONS

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FRANCE AND QUEBEC RESPECTING SATELLITES

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister on one of the non-social aspects of the current Paris talks. Can he advise if the Canadian government is being kept informed of negotiations between the governments of France and Quebec respecting co-operation in communications satellites, and whether the Canadian government regards communications as an area covered by the so-called umbrella agreement of 1965?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I would prefer that the Secretary of State for External Affairs be asked this question. I do not mind however giving the information as I know it. I do not believe we have been advised of the subject matters of the talks, but this is subject to check with the department. We are taking the position, or we are operating on the assumption, that they are only talks as covered by the umbrella agreement. The hon. member is also asking me, as a matter of opinion, whether communications would be covered by this agreement. It is my understanding that they would not, but once again this is just a tentative answer. This question would have to be asked of the minister, and he would have to take advice on it.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

DISCUSSIONS ON STRATEGY AND PROCUREMENT—TRAINING MANUALS

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. On Wednesday last, in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Malpeque (Mr. MacLean), the minister indicated that the chief of staff during his visit to France would be primarily interested in securing some training manuals in French which the Canadian Forces are trying to procure in Canada. I ask the minister whether these are Canadian manuals translated into the French language, or French manuals which will be used in the Canadian forces; and are they applicable to Canadian training methods?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): No, Mr. Speaker. The problem generally that we are facing is that since we have what we call French designated bases, we have to provide in some very specific trades a manual in French, the translation of which would be quite extensive if it was done from scratch. The idea behind this particular inquiry is to find out whether you could not in some specific trade—like, for instance, in the navy—use already existing manuals in French. This is the only purpose now. We have to ascertain whether these things could be co-ordinated with the kind of operations that we carry out in Canada.

Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Am I to understand from the minister that these are French training manuals, and that they are compatible with Canadian methods of training? Possibly the minister could also tell me what has happened to the unification idea that was so forcefully put forward by the previous minister, because it seems to me that segregation is now taking place in the forces.

DAIRY INDUSTRY—ABANDONMENT OF QUOTA SUBSIDY SYSTEM

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was asked yesterday by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Gleave), as reported in Hansard at page 4714, the right hand side of the page, if the minister would consider tabling the results of the study on the nationalization of the dairy industry. I must say that I was caught by surprise by the word "nationalization"; I never thought my department was that leftist.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Bell: All departments are.

Mr. Pepin: I inquired about the matter and found there has indeed been such a study, but it was concerned with the modernization of the industry. A program designed to encourage the modernization of dairy processing and manufacturing plants was developed, but difficulties with the Minister of Finance forced us to delay implementation of this program. We hope to reactivate it as soon as possible. In the meantime, the document to which the hon. member was referring is still an internal document and will not be tabled.

[Mr. MacInnis (Cape Breton-East Richmond).]

"FESTIVAL"—ALLEGED DEGRADING PERFORMANCES, "NEIGHBOURS" AND "THE BASEMENT"

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State is absent today and I have not yet had an answer to the reaction of the C.B.C. to the two shows the other night, "Neighbours" and "The Basement". Would the Minister of Justice consider placing these two films before the law officers of the Crown with a view to ascertaining whether their pornographic content is of such a nature as, in the opinion of the law officers, to constitute an offence against the obscenity sections of the Criminal Code? I ask this because there is no other way in which Canadians can be protected against one or two producers who flout pornography regularly on the C.B.C.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, for that type of subject I need the very mature advice of my colleague the Solicitor General, who is directly responsible for the police. We will have a chat about that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that the Minister of Justice has bowed to the superior knowledge of the Solicitor General I shall expect a statement to be made at an early date.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Solicitor General): I have tried to analyse the significance of the right hon. gentleman's remarks, and will take his suggestion under consideration.

[Later:]

Mr. Barney Danson (North York): My question is supplementary to that asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert. Can the minister tell us when this disgusting broadcast will be rebroadcast?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

GRAIN

CLOSING OF CROP ACCOUNTS—DATE OF FINAL PAYMENTS

Mr. A. B. Douglas (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Now that the Wheat Board has announced the dates for the closing of the 1967-68 crop accounts, can the hon. gentleman indicate when the final payment cheques will be going out to the farmers?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): By the first week in April, or about that time, Mr. Speaker.

SPORTS

ASSISTANCE TO NATIONAL SKI TEAM

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Last week, I asked the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether the national ski team had made a request for financial aid and, if so, how much it had received. As the Parliamentary Secretary promised me an answer, I ask him if he can give it to us today?

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the presence of the minister will be required in the house on Monday, and I believe he will be pleased to answer the hon. member.

[English]

GRAIN

ADVANCES TO ASSIST IN DRYING OPERATIONS

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Can the minister tell us when he will be in a position to introduce legislation which will provide for further advances to farmers to assist them in the drying of their grain?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): The Minister without Portfolio, who is in charge of this legislation, might wish to answer that question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): It is our hope that we shall be able to do this at an early date.

Mr. Korchinski: Is a month not long enough?

FISHERIES

SEALS—REQUEST THAT OPENING DATE BE SET AHEAD

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Speaker. In his absence today, though I think he is supposed to be here, I will direct it to the Minister of Defence Production, knowing the great interest he takes in the seal fishing industry. I would ask him whether, in view of the fact that veteran sealers believe the opening date for the seal harvest in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, set for March 18, is too late, and want the date set ahead to March 12, the government has given any consideration to changing to the earlier date.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Minister of Defence Production): I would have to take the question as notice and give a reply as soon as possible.

Mr. Carter: A supplementary question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In view of the disastrous condition of last year's fur seal market, due to the tremendous volume of adverse publicity about the annual harvest, can the minister say whether market conditions are expected to improve this year?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt whether this question is in order. It seems to me the hon. member is asking the minister to express an opinion, and for that reason I do not think the question can be allowed.

Mr. Carter: May I emphasize my question, then? Can the minister give the depressed fur seal industry a helping hand by persuading the Prime Minister to buy a fur seal coat to wear on suitable occasions?

Mr. Pepin: I understand that the Prime Minister already has a fur coat.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That will not make him very popular.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I hope you were paying particular attention to that question—by whom it was posed, the type of question, and the portfolio held by the minister to whom it was directed, so that we can in future direct questions to the minister from the Maritimes—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am glad the hon. member brought this to my attention. Ex post facto I declare both the question and the answer out of order.

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF BILINGUAL AREAS

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, according to a recommendation made by the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism, which is dealing with the bill on the official languages, bilingual districts are to be set up in Canada. From what we hear, no bilingual districts would be set up in British Columbia and in Newfoundland. I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider establishing other standards so that bilingual districts might be created in those two provinces which are located at both ends of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: The question put by the hon. member is much too general, and I do not think it can be asked at this time. The hon. member might put it on the order paper.

GRAIN

AVAILABILITY OF EASTERN CANADIAN PORTS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): A question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce for the week end, Mr. Speaker: The next time he gives the house a run-down of the grain export situation in Vancouver, would he make available the latest figures and prospects for eastern Canadian ports, particularly Saint John and Halifax, with regard to grain exports, such ports being ready, available, and—I promise—free from bottlenecks.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed from Thursday, January 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act.

• (11:50 a.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, today, the Canadian Parliament has to deal with a bill to amend the Criminal Code, in matters of morality and private behaviour.

It seems that the papers, as a whole, have been concerned with problems of morals and of sex and with some others which were discussed and examined with the utmost caution.

We are witnessing today a strong trend towards exhibitionism and the public display of obcenities. I was reading yesterday, in a newspaper, an article which made we wonder if here, in Canada, there is any need for amendments such as those recommended by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). I would like to quote this article. The heading reads as follows:

Dutch homosexuals demonstrate . . . peacefully. Yesterday, in the Hague, about a hundred homosexuals and lesbians held a noisy demonstration in front of the Dutch Parliament, protesting against a national law which stipulates that adults of the same sex having relations are liable to a four year jail term.

So, Holland, a country known all over the world for its culture and learning, is imposing a four year jail term with regard to relations between adults of the same sex, while here, in Canada, we seek to legalize such behaviour.

I wonder whether it is not this lack of responsibility which carries with it the right or the power to amend the Criminal Code because at the end of the article, we could also read:

The third sex supporters gave out to members of parliament—

—in Holland—

—small heart-shaped candies on which were inscribed slogans such as: "love", "kisses", and so on.

When we realize that by amending the Criminal Code we make it possible to legalize all these things in Canada, we, of the Ralliement Créditiste, object to it and I should like to say to the Minister of Justice that the Progressive Conservative member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) was right in presenting his amendment because it aroused public opinion which was becoming unconcerned. I thought the minister wanted to divide the omnibus bill.

In fact, the amendment moved by the hon. member for Calgary North made that suggestion because it reads:

(a) referring to abortion;

The government could have introduced a bill on that subject.

(b) referring to homosexuality and gross indecency;

That amendment should not be included in the omnibus bill. A separate measure should have been moved.

(c) referring to lotteries and gambling;

In my opinion, these matters should have been dealt with in a bill. With a free vote which we, of the Ralliement Créditiste have been asking for for several years, all hon. members could follow the dictates of their own conscience. They should not be forced to take a particular stand by the leader of a party or a Prime Minister who even subjects his party to a continuous dictatorship.

Finally, the fourth part of the amendment moved by the hon. member, referred to, and I quote:

We, of the Ralliement Créditiste, were in favour of this amendment and I think it sets a good example to the Minister of Justice. I hope the committee will heed this amendment to divide the omnibus bill in four separate bills.

Moreover, I would ask the Minister of Justice and the members of the committee to give special attention to a comment we received this morning from the Canadian association of automobile drivers to the effect that—

Refusal to submit to the breathalizer test should not be considered a criminal offence.

I think this constructive criticism should be examined very seriously for it would be a shame if an individual who refuses to submit to the breathalizer test were to have a bad record for the rest of his life. I will therefore ask the minister to give serious consideration to this suggestion.

May I tell the minister—I referred to this a moment ago—that there are certainly some very good things in the bill, such, for instance, as the means to control the use of firearms.

We are compelled, at the present moment, to oppose the omnibus bill, for the reasons I mentioned earlier. On the other hand, it has its good points and we would like to see those passed.

I would also like to remind him that, with the youthful drive he has demonstrated in drafting some bills, he said himself that he wanted the bill split, a statement for which I congratulate him.

I might tell him also that, the other day, I met the secretary of an hon. member who told me: "If I had been a delegate to the Liberal convention, I would have cast my vote for the Minister of Justice, to have him as our leader." Had he been chosen, no doubt the bill would have been split, for I am quite sure the orders come from above, from the "big chief", thus bringing dictatorship in the very midst of a party where people, like the Minister of Justice, are not free to say what they think. If it may be of some comfort to the minister, I will tell him that, happily for us, that hon. member's secretary is a créditiste, and she has promised she would go on voting for us.

I thought that the amendment moved yesterday by the hon. member for Calgary North was very responsible and I shall like now to make a few remarks, after listening last night to the parliamentary leader of the New Democratic party, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis).

I am surprised that as a socialist in Canada, the hon. member for York South does not realize that England, with its abusive legislation in every field—according to him the present bill does not go far enough—is courting disaster. As a socialist in Canada, he should understand better, in the light of the British experience, that by passing too strict a legislation, Canada is courting disaster and ruin.

These are somewhat the remarks I wanted to make about what he said, namely that the bill should be harsher.

Since those who spoke before were not lawyers and that I am not one either, I shall quote now an excerpt which I found quite relevant in a letter addressed to the Marquis of Argenson:

The reason I became so disgusted with the law is the abundance of useless notions with which they wanted to fill my mind. "To the point", that is my slogan.

We, of the Ralliement Créditiste, want to be aware of things concerning morality or the various bills which can affect tremendously the life of the Canadian people. Having listened to all those lawyers, I shall say to them: When justice has spoken, humanity must also have its say.

I am part of humanity, as the father of a family.

It is at home that I have the opportunity to exchange views, to discuss things and this is why I think that we should not listen to free thinkers who believe that, with a frank discussion of these things, it will no longer be possible to accuse society of dissimulation and hypocrisy.

We admit that hypocrisy, to cover up sins and moral perversion, has always existed. Men have always secretly attempted to hide every kind of scandalous behaviour for the simple reason that, because what they do is wrong, they prefer darkness to light.

I must say that I am deeply disturbed by the fact that men and women persist in discussing openly these subjects which, for reasons of decency, should not be a matter of bold discussions, particularly in public, between men and women.

The problem of homosexuality and the resulting immorality has, in recent months, been dealt with too freely in the Canadian press. And the obscenities are only starting.

Even now parliamentary debates are crammed with useless details. Even now newspaper reports, public discussions, magazine articles, individual suggestions and advertisements deal freely with sexual and homosexual matters, which are becoming the butt of mockery and buffoonery.

An appeal is made to the avidity and curiosity of the reader, of the listener. Such programs, such writings flood the newspaper, book and magazine market. Now, many modern thinkers argue speciously that one is born a homosexual.

Similarly, some teach that alcoholism is not a sin but a disease. The alcoholic is simply the victim of an appetite for which he is not responsible. Alcoholism is merely an unfortunate thing, a simple result of the fatality which makes man what he is: a being to be pitied rather than blamed for his faults.

Accordingly, the homosexual, we are told, must not be blamed for his perversion. He is merely the victim of fate, and consequently not responsible for his antisocial behavior.

Of course, whether they be alcoholics, gamblers or homosexuals, they all refuse to accept any responsibility for their perversion, yet they give in freely to their appetites, proving that they have no desire to be rid of their passions.

• (12 noon)

In this omnibus bill, we read, among other things, on page 34, clause 14, which I will quote with the note in the margin:

Killing child

Subsection (2) of section 195 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

(2) . . . A person commits homicide when he causes injury to a child before or during its birth as a result of which the child dies after becoming a human being—

The amendment states clearly "after becoming a human being, and subsection (1) of section 195 explains when a child becomes a human being:

A child becomes a human being within the meaning of this Act when it has completely proceeded, in a living state, from the body of its mother whether or not

(a) it has breathed,

(b) it has an independent circulation, or

(c) the navel string is severed.

Now, the bill is amended by providing that an homicide will be committed when it has been established that life is present, and a proper explanation will follow.

Mr. Speaker, my 4-year-old child accompanied us when we went to visit relatives during the Christmas holidays of 1968-69 and getting close to his aunt asked her: "Auntie, may I hear your baby move"? How happy he was when he told us: "Mother, the baby moved!" When a 4-year-old child is able to detect the presence of life in the bosom of a woman who is 5 months pregnant, one wonders why they try to make us believe in this house that the presence of life in a child only appears in the 9th month of pregnancy or at birth. No, Mr. Speaker, we cannot as Christians accept that theory.

At this stage, and like the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who does it often, I would ask: "What does the people want? How could I hold a dialogue with them?

I have here a letter which a citizen of Montmagny addressed to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), who gave it to me this morning. I would like to quote it, because it is a source of reflection and bears witness to real Christian thinking. Here it is:

I take the liberty of writing to you to-night about the omnibus bill that will soon be brought before the House of Commons.

Monday evening, from 10 to 11 o'clock, on the rotten CBC network, we were shown a program that was apparently intended to cause the people to accept the human degradation of those who indulge in homosexuality. The result of this program is that many have been misled and think that these people are sick, while the real reason for their behaviour is an absence of God in their lives.

To prove my point, I refer to page 169 of the Bible, in the Testament, where Saint Paul the Apostle gives the reason for the sexual deviation of these people. Here are some extracts which I advise you to read and to have them read by your leader, Mr. Réal Caouette. I am sure that you will find them interesting, as I know you are an earnest Catholic.

Here are the extracts from the Bible, by the Apostle Saint Paul. They are entitled: "The Universality of Sin", 1.-1, 18:32:

The Gentiles are away from the road to salvation. (20). For the invisible things of him from the creation of the world are clearly seen, being understood by the things that are made, even his eternal power and Godhead; so that they are without excuse. (21) Because that, when they knew God, they glorified him not as God, neither were thankful; but became vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was darkened. (22) Professing themselves to be wise, they became fools. (26) For this cause God gave them up unto vile affections: for even their women did change the natural use into that which is against nature: (27) And likewise also the men, leaving the natural use of the woman, burned in their lust one toward another; men with men working that which is unseemly, and receiving in themselves that recompense of their error which was meet.

(28) And even as they did not like to retain God in their knowledge, God gave them over to a reprobate mind, to do those things which are not convenient. (29) Being filled with all unrighteousness, fornication, wickedness, covetousness, maliciousness; full of envy, murder, debate, deceit, malignity; whisperers; (30) Backbiters, haters of God, despiteful, proud, boasters, inventors of evil things, disobedient to parents; (31) Without understanding; covenantbreakers, without natural affection, implacable, unmerciful: (32) Who knowing the judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them.

So, it is all that. This person, who is following closely the proceedings in parliament, concluded by saying:

I hope that those quotations from the Bible will be for you a new inspiration in the arguments you might bring forward to try to stop this hateful bill which strikes even the child and takes away from him the right to be born.

But in this measure to legalize abortion on health grounds, the government leaves again that term without definition or qualification. This bill which allegedly calls for a minor reform is found to be something else altogether when carefully looked at.

The amendments to the abortion legislation, as they appear in bill C-150, are in my view based on a concept of justice lacking both depth and recognition of the true implications of abortion.

If a human being has any right at all, the most important implied in all the others is certainly the right to live. This right is the very first one and the others depend on it. All the principles brought forward on human rights recognize this implicitly, but the proposed changes in the abortion laws do not.

The universal declaration of human rights states that:

Every one, as a person, has the right to life, freedom and security.

The Canadian Bill of Rights asserts:

The right of the individual to life, liberty, security of the person and enjoyment of property—

These two documents mention also that all men are equal before the law.

Proposed changes to the Criminal Code deny that equality by giving to the medical committees a discretionary life-and-death power over human beings still unborn. They also run counter to that section of the Declaration of human rights, adopted by the United Nations, to the effect that children have a right to be protected before birth as well as after.

The Minister of Justice proposes to ensure a balance between the child's and the mother's rights. However, there is no balance between the life of the child and the health of another person, especially when the word "health" can be interpreted as "happiness".

Our comfort, our security, even our health may be seriously impaired, then given back to us. Moreover, the child deprived of his life, will be for ever deprived of all his other rights.

It seems obvious to us that no bill on abortion has its place in a really just society and that no government really concerned about human rights would force its adoption.

In a remarkable report entitled "Abortion and human rights", prepared by the Alliance for life at the request of its chairman, Mrs. Joan Lusignan, of Hull, one reads:

Those human rights belong to all men, without any exception and, in a civilized society, it should be an obvious truth. However, today, as in the past, in our country as well as in other countries, some human beings are deprived of the most elementary and essential rights. By an irony of fate, it is justice itself which supports that injustice.

One of the ways of depriving man of his rights is simply to declare that some categories of human beings are not after all human beings. Thus, it is asserted in the Criminal Code that a child becomes a human being at the time of his birth only. With such an assertion, one may rationalize abortion, on the ground that it does not destroy a human life.

I gave earlier the example of a 4-year-old child who can detect the presence of life, and we know that life exists three weeks after the conjugal act. If a 4-year-old child realizes that life exists in the womb of his mother, five months pregnant, how is it possible to make hon. members believe that life does really exist only after nine months of pregnancy?

I raise a fundamental question, and yet it is very seldom raised. If parliament wishes to decree that certain human beings are not human, how could a constitution guarantee human rights? What would prevent our legislators to limit these rights by restricting the meaning of the term "human being"?

Some legal fiction may be useful and acceptable, but a legal fiction which can be used for the very purpose of denying fundamental human rights is dangerous and cannot be condoned. No government, no legislative body, no judicial body can assume the right to redefine the term "human being" so arbitrarily.

There are very few assertions as arbitrary as this false statement, though widespread, that life begins at birth only. Its falseness should be obvious to the future mother who has already felt her child moving in her womb. And yet she may not know that these movements began even before she felt them during the second month of her pregnancy. The heart starts beating about three weeks after conception and it is at that time that the mother knows for sure that she is pregnant.

For centuries, there have been numerous discussions as to the time when life begins in the human foetus. However, as in those days one did not have the tools of modern scientific research, most of those discussions turned into sterile speculations. Modern science proves that life begins with conception.

This is not a theological opinion, but a scientific fact. In fact, contrary to what many people think, no Christian church has ever laid down a dogma in this respect. The findings of science in this respect are set forth in a non-denominational book, entitled "The Canadian mother and her child" published by the government of Canada, in which we read on page 24:

> One of those spermatozoa and the ovule meet and unite and a new life begins.

Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that books, distributed all over Canada, contain certain statements and because we are trying to amend the criminal code to legalize abortion, I shall take the liberty, at this stage, to express the opinion of our leader, the member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette) with whom I spoke on his return from a trip to Taiwan, and who asked me to summarize the Créditiste viewpoint.

First, as far as abortion is concerned, we are entirely against it; secondly, we are against homosexuality too. As to lotteries, if the bill was split up, we would be able to look fully into the matter. And finally, we are all in favour of breathalyzers but we urge the government to consider seriously the constructive criticism we have received from the organization I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks.

If our leader takes such a stand, it is precisely because we discussed those matters at length in caucus. I am a faithful exponent of his opinion and, at the same time, I freely express my own. That is why I urge the Prime Minister, if freedom still exists in Canada, to allow a free vote on this question, in order to release the Quebec members who, in addition to being Christians, are like myself practising Catholics. They will vote in favour of this bill which must be passed at all costs.

The Minister of Justice would have preferred to introduce as many bills as the Conservative member proposed in his amendment. He had already mentioned it and I am convinced that were it not for the dictatorship that exists within the Liberal party and the majority government, Quebec members would all vote against that legislation designed to legalize abortion. I therefore ask them, as Christians and as Catholics, to unite and have that section forever removed from the omnibus bill which will be passed casually, but which will really legalize abortion.

On the other hand, we personally doubt that the draftsmen of the proposed legislation realized that in referring to obscenity between consenting adults they were using the same language used by St. Paul in Chapter I of his Epistle to the Romans, in which God abandoned men to a punishment inflicted upon them by themselves, either in a secret and infamous solitude or, what is worse, in a depraved society, by mutual consent.

Today, we abandon God and God has abandoned us. He surrenders us to complete slavery and to the bondage of our own lusts. When man has reached a certain degree of corruption, when he is determined to abandon God and declare Him dead and buried, the only way to cure him, if there is any hope left, is to let him wallow in his excesses and his corruption. No other means are used by God to bring about in man a result that all warnings and previous punishments had been unable to achieve, that is, complete repentance. It is exactly what the father of the prodigal son did, letting his son go his own way. He let this rebellious son go, giving him his share of property, even though that property, in addition to his bad conduct, was to bring upon him a terrible misery of his own making, that is, the excesses of his own lusts. He repented in his conscience and mended his ways. The father of this prodigal son is naturally the sublime image of the Father of all prodigal humans. And if we choose to go our own way, He abandons us to our own desires. God's kindness should lead us to repentance, but when we scorn His mercy, His love, His kindness and we decide to go our own way, then, we are also going to the piggery to learn—perhaps from the pigs—what we do not want to learn from God.

Moreover, we, the catholic people of Quebec—and I include here the Liberal and the Conservative members who would have the various parts of the omnibus bill introduced separately—wish that a free vote be taken in order not to feel tied down. On the other hand, I know that they are now begging the prime minister not to be the shepherd who, with a wave of his hand, would compel his whole flock of sheep to jump into the sea. Those catholic members of the "belle province" would like to be treated as free men, able to speak their mind in a country, where some hope of freedom still remains. Besides, I myself recognize, as those hon. members do, that the Pope is our common leader and that he should be obeyed. Now, this is what the Pope thinks of legalized abortion, and I quote:

> Let it be considered also that a dangerous weapon would thus be placed in the hands of those public authorities who take no heed of moral exigencies.
> Who could blame a government for applying to the solution of the problems of the community those means acknowledged to be licit for married couples in the solution of a family problem? Who will stop rulers from favoring, from even imposing upon their peoples, if they were to consider it necessary, the methods of contraception which they judge to be most efficacious?

And this applies to the subject of abortion mentioned in the bill. And the quotation goes on:

> In such a way men, wishing to avoid individual, family or social difficulties encountered in the observance of the divine law, would reach the point of placing at the mercy of the intervention of public authorities the most personal and most reserved sector of conjugal intimacy.
> Consequently, if the mission of generating life is not to be exposed to the arbitrary will of men, one must necessarily recognize insurmountable limits to the possibility of man's domination over his own body and its functions; . . . limits which no man, whether a private individual or one invested with authority, may licitly surpass. And such limits cannot be determined otherwise than by the respect due to the integrity of the human organism and its functions, according to the principles recalled earlier, and also according to the correct understanding of the "principle of totality" illustrated by our predecessor Pope Pius XII.
> It can be foreseen that this teaching will perhaps not be easily received by all; too numerous are those voices—amplified by the modern means of propaganda—which are contrary to the voice of the church. To tell the truth, the church is not surprised to be made, like her divine Founder, a "sign of contradiction"; yet she does not because of this cease to proclaim with humble firmness the entire moral law, both natural and evangelical. The church did not create that legislation, and thus could not be the arbiter thereof; the church is only a depositary and an interpreter, without ever being allowed to proclaim lawful something which is not, because it is deeply and unalterably opposed to the true welfare of mankind.

• (12:20 p.m.)

> By upholding marital ethics as a whole, the church knows that it helps the establishment of a truly humanistic civilization. It urges human beings not to avoid their responsibility by relying on technical devices, it thereby upholds the dignity of the couple. Faithful to the teaching as well as to the example of the Saviour, it shows itself as the sincere and disinterested friend of men whom it wishes to help, even as they start on their pilgrimage, here below, to share, as would beloved sons, the life of the living God.

This statement is supported by Dr. L. Kessel, Director of the Department of Biology at the University of San Francisco, who by the way, is a Presbyterian. I quote:

> Scientific evidence clearly shows that life starts at conception.

He adds:

> The rapid pace of the embryonic development shows us the human life in its most intensive stage of activity.

Confronted with such statements and such awareness, we as members of Parliament must do our daily duty, we, who are free men who must indicate it by voting freely, are demanding, loud and clear, with the public at large and with those intermediate bodies which will be notified tomorrow and will have to submit some briefs, that this shameful bill brought in the Parliament of Canada be withdrawn.

To confirm what I say I have in hand a statement from our bishops. I think that we, in Quebec, must be given the right to be Catholics and Christians just as we allow others to practise the religion of their choice.

As for us, we accept the Vatican's rulings. We recognize the Pope's authority and that of the bishops. I should like to quote a letter from the Catholic Episcopate of Canada:

> The Catholic Episcopate of Canada, which comprises the Canadian cardinals, archbishops and bishops, has just published a statement denouncing unequivocally the federal bill tending to widen the scope of the legislation on abortion. The document first recalls the traditional way of thinking of the Church, reviewed by Vatican II, which condemns any direct attempt on the life of the foetus and makes it a serious duty to watch over life with extreme care as soon as conception has occurred.

Then, our bishops see the bill tabled in the House of Commons as clearly authorizing direct and voluntary abortion in some definite cases. The letter says: "Not only does that amendment to the law allows a direct and voluntary attack on the life of an innocent, but it invites the widest interpretations". The conclusion is clear and forces itself on us: the amendment is unacceptable, not only from the point of view of the Christian faith, but in view of the requirements of moral standards worthy of man and of public interest.

This article was published in the Quebec Action of February 8, 1968, under the name of Roger Bruneau. It went on:

The letter of our bishops is remarkably clear, concise and realistic. To those who think that life does not exist in the foetus in the sense of a protectable value, our bishops reply that the scientists hold, generally that life in the fertilized ovum has individual characteristics and that, in case of doubt, we are not allowed to destroy a human life.

The extreme cases provided for in the proposed amendment are obviously those which have the greater emotional impact on the population. The Canadian bishops recognize the tragic character of situations when a pregnancy threatens the mother's life or health, but even in those cases, to believe that voluntary abortion is permitted "is to ignore the sacred right of the foetus to live". When it is a matter of allowing abortion in order to protect the mother's health, "then it is the sacrifice of a superior value to a less precious good".

Since it causes the death of an innocent, abortion does not remove the tragic character of these situations.

To be in favour of progress does not permit all licenses. "Must we be inclined to consider as an automatic step forward every measure proposed, sometimes rather strangely, as a liberalization or a broadening of the law?" This question is asked by the bishops who do not fail to make clear that "progress of civilization lies in the ever clearer recognition, both in theory, and practice, of the dignity of man, of its sacred character and inviolability".

This is a fine lesson for the followers of modernism, this theory already condemned by Pope Pius X. Modernists in the doctrinal sense are those who hold that we must, as we please, always redefine the traditional attitudes of the Church on moral and doctrinal matters to adapt to new theories and that the Church then must revise, transform, even abandon the traditional teachings.

This is the difference between orthodoxy and heterodoxy.

Our bishops are not cowed by those who hold that the amendment to the act would result in fewer illicit abortions. The facts registered in other countries, they suggest, would substantiate the contrary. Therefore, the argument does not seem valid, unless reliable statistics are produced. At present they are unavailable.

Legislation has an educational value, for the best or for the worst, and the legislator should not underestimate its power. These days, people stress more and more the need for a distinction between religion and law, but it remains that men readily consider as morally right what the law itself allows.

The document issued by our bishops does more than recall Church doctrine on abortion or confute arguments in favour of a change in our faith. It offers real solutions to this serious problem and, from that angle, our bishops' statement is eminently constructive: the promotion of respect for human life by all possible means; a study on illicit abortions and on measures to eliminate them; some assistance to medical research; the enjoyment by mothers of all the facilities of medicine and psychiatry; a more understanding attitude towards unwed mothers and their children and a better response to their needs; additional help to mental diseases; ways and means of truly implementing a more adequate policy regarding society and family.

Any real emancipation depends on these solutions, which are not the easiest, but the most logical.

Every Catholic, every Christian and every Canadian citizen should make a point of reading and meditating carefully the Episcopate's statement on this matter of abortion. Let us hope that the government will take it into consideration and withdraw this amendment to the abortion act; if not, let us hope that at least the members of parliament will have the courage to vote against it.

Therefore if such articles are published and if they are so logical, I ask the Minister of Justice to seriously consider the few remarks I made on behalf of the Ralliement Créditiste, as a Christian and in addition as a practising Catholic.

I say again that we want a free vote so that each hon. member can vote according to his conscience and can come to his own decision as a free man.

Thus the Minister of Justice should at cabinet meetings seriously consider our remarks, because we are convinced that they are based on logic itself.

[English]

Mr. Gordon Sullivan (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, this bill contains many good and long overdue amendments. However, it has some objectionable provisions with which I cannot agree and cannot support. I specifically refer to the clauses of the bill relating to abortion.

I believe that life itself is a fundamental, basic human right from which all other rights spring. I believe there is no logical point between conception and death to which this right does not apply. I believe that a foetus is logically and biologically life from the moment of conception. I believe that no person can judge the comparative worth of one human being against another.

I believe the law must protect human, individual rights, and particularly defenceless and innocent human life. I believe that if this house does not protect all human life then all human life will necessarily cease to have any secure foundation in law. I believe that any broadening of the abortion laws must have serious and deep-seated consequences for future generations. I believe that this house should not alter the abortion laws at the expense of unprotected human life.

We have heard, read and considered the arguments, the theories presented by doctors, theologians, philosophers, sociologists and just plain parents or prospective parents. The presentations made on behalf of both sides on this vexing question now before us were made with conviction and with the ultimate welfare of the people of this nation kept foremost in mind.

My opposition to this amendment stems from my conviction as a practitioner of the law that if the parliament of this land fails to protect the most basic right of man, the right of life itself, then any and all rights or ultimate welfare are sham and meaningless. The argument that a woman has a right over her own body misses the point involved here completely. She may have a right over her own body but she does not have the power of life and death over another distinct and separate life, that of her own child, even if it is unborn. Medical science recognizes a separate life; everyone does or we would not need this legislation. If it is not life then it is just a tumour or some other growth and no section of the Criminal Code is needed to remove a tumour. We know it is life. The reasons put forward for the taking of that life are not good enough. So let us hear no more of the argument that a woman has rights over her own body. Certainly she has, but she does not have the power of life or death over her child who has a separate life from hers.

I should like to read a letter by a professor of sociology of McMaster University which was written to the editor of the Hamilton Spectator and published on January 10, 1969. It is in answer to a letter from a woman who wrote to the same paper stating that abortion should be a woman's own choice. It is a short letter and reads as follows:

In an article (December 28), Myra MacPherson states that "a theory is evolving that abortion should be a woman's choice and that there should be no restrictive laws". Actually this is basically a very old theory. In ancient Rome, for example, a parent (in this case the father) had the absolute power of life and death over an unborn child.

The father continued to hold such power over his children after their birth. When a boy left his father's household he was more or less free of this domination, but in the case of a daughter, her father transferred his authority to her husband.

The head of a Roman household also held the power of life or death over his slaves. The Romans were very consistent: children, wives, slaves were regarded as property and the master could kill them if he wished—there were "no restrictive laws".

Since that time we have generally come to regard women, children, people of other races and countries not as property but as individuals possessed of full human rights. If this is progress, then we will clearly be taking a step backward by repealing that legislation that supports the human rights of the unborn child over the property rights of the mother.

It is signed by Franklin J. Henry, Associate Professor of Sociology, McMaster University.

I have read with great interest the minutes of proceedings and evidence taken before the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare and the many briefs that were filed before that committee. I am sure that every concerned member of this house has taken the time to do likewise. The discussions and cross-examinations that were permitted by the chairman ranged far and wide. There were differences of opinion that were basic and there was a good deal of hairsplitting which at one stage got to the point of whether or not there was life until five days after conception.

Through my reading of the proceedings and evidence including the briefs and other material it seemed to me that there was an inescapable conclusion that life began at conception. In other words, from the moment of conception a chain of activity was set up which when allowed to proceed would result in the birth approximately nine months later of a child. Opinions were expressed that for some length of time this living organism was perhaps only a potential child, that is, that this living organism did not implant itself on the side of the womb for five days, four days or six days. There was a great deal of hairsplitting concerning when the particular person who was giving evidence felt there was what he called life. The most reliable medical evidence—in fact nearly all the medical evidence—was to the effect that in the opinion of the doctors there was life at conception.

It is obvious that this life is innocent and unprotected. The amendments proposed ask hon. members of this house, therefore, to set a price on the taking of life. It is quite true it is life that we cannot see; but let us not be fooled that it is not life if we cannot see it. Dr. De Veber, Assistant Professor, Departments of Paediatrics and Pathological Chemistry at the University of Western Ontario and Dr. Walters, Professor of Obstetrics at the University of Western Ontario, testified and showed slides to the committee that the foetus was in fact a human being and alive.

Heartbeats have been detected and recorded as early as the 18th day after conception. Blood transfusions have been given to babies in the womb 26 weeks after conception. It has been proven that babies before birth react to pain. In some cases where it has been necessary to give a blood transfusion to a baby before he is born it has been observed that the baby will move away after the needle has been inserted. So far as medical science is able to determine there is some form of life at conception and it continues until death. Death may come to that unborn child before he or she emerges from the womb or it may come, as it will come to us, after we have exercised our right to live.

We must then consider what right we have to kill that unborn child. First of all, the child has a basic fundamental right to life. Second, by declaration in November, 1959, by the General Assembly of the United Nations and by statute enacting the Bill of Rights of Canada, both the United Nations and the parliament of Canada have recognized and declared the right of the child to life, liberty, security of the person and the right not to be deprived thereof both before birth and after birth.

It is an indisputable fact that law recognizes the rights of the unborn. Legal authorities in Canada, England and the United States make this abundantly evident. I shall not take up the time of this house to review these authorities. Let it suffice to say that money and property can be left by will to unborn children; a child injured in the womb in an accident can bring action against the wrongdoer. There are many other examples that I need not recite because this matter is indisputable. How then are we asked in the house to pass this legislation? In essence we are being asked to give some people the right under certain circumstances to take life.

Only a year or so ago hon. members of this house were given a free vote on the question of abolition of capital punishment. This was the taking of a life by the state for the killing of another. It was the taking of the life of an adult who had been found by his peers to have deliberately taken the life of a fellow human being. On a free vote in this house hon. members, and I would agree with their vote, voted against the taking of life.

• (12:40 p.m.)

Let us examine the one prime reason that has been advanced for the alteration of the abortion laws. The proposed amendments ask that the members of this house approve of the taking of life—and I shall quote the section—"if the continuation of the pregnancy of such female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health". I strongly object to widening the grounds to include the word "health". It is all well and good to set up committees in hospitals to define the word "health" but I do not believe on moral grounds that we can sacrifice one life to preserve the health of another person. Health is defined by the World Health Organization as follows:

> Health is a state of complete physical, mental, emotional and social well-being and not merely the absence of disease and physical well-being.

Surely it must be obvious to all that any doctor could legally adopt this definition of health and we would then be faced under the present amendment with abortion almost upon request. I suppose on this wide definition of health an abortion committee could well find that a mother's mental health could be affected by worrying whether her baby would be deformed and grant her application for an abortion. Dr. John McKelvis, professor of obstetrics at the University of Minnesota, poses this very ironic question:

> Do we kill nine babies to save one parent's emotional embarrassment at the production of an abnormal baby, where abnormalities may be reversible? Common sense would say, wait until they are born. Find the ones who are deformed, find the ones who are blind and then kill them. Isn't this much more sensible than destroying normal babies?

Perhaps there are those who believe that a permissive society should indeed condone abortion on request. I cannot accept such an approach as being responsible, and as we watch our society develop I find more and more people concluding that this trend toward permissiveness is just not the answer.

Many socio-economic arguments were advanced for killing the unborn child. It must be the decision and the conscience of every member of this house when he or she is considering voting for this amendment to decide whether or not he or she has the right for an economic reason to kill. It makes it easier to kill something we have not seen, but if we think about it, it is still killing.

We next come to the consideration of the health of the mother. All of the doctors testifying before the committee said that the main reason the health of the mother would be affected would be for psychiatric reasons. Even the psychiatrists called rather poohpoohed the arguments that abortion would help if, in fact, there was a real psychiatric problem with the mother. At least one of them testified that after some reassurance and the pregnancy continued the mother would be better off from a psychiatric point of view.

There are arguments used which can only be described as arguments of expediency. A family would be better off in dollars and cents if it did not have the added responsibilities of bringing up a retarded or deformed child. Some families and even some children might be better off without the unwanted child atmosphere that sometimes develops for economic reasons. But surely this is not a reason to kill. We are not dealing with crops which may be arbitrarily destroyed if considered inferior or surplus. We are dealing with human life even if unborn. We cannot encourage or even condone the destruction of such life merely because it may cost dollars and cents or cause inconvenience. Surely such a step is backward in the context of human rights.

As someone on the committee said, he would like to see the abortion law opened wide but he believed in proceeding bit by bit. So we have already had notice that this is only the start of the movement. If the members of this house permit the altering of these abortion laws as proposed there is no logical reason that can be submitted later why the unwanted, the unproductive, the deformed and the mentally retarded members of our society should not be exterminated.

I believe that, regardless of party affiliation, each hon. member of this house must vote on this issue according to his own conscience, as it goes far beyond party lines or other man made disciplines. For this reason I am opposing the proposed amendment concerning the law of abortion in its present form and intend to vote against this bill. This decision was not arrived at rashly or lightly. Opposition to this clause and the inclusion of this clause in the omnibus bill may distort the meaning of the votes cast by members who feel as I do. It is unfortunate that my opposing vote to this clause must also be cast against so many other clauses with which I concur. Unfortunately my conscience leaves me no choice.

Contrary to some unfounded and untrue reports, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform you and the members of this house that my position on this matter is the same now as it was before nomination day and as it was before the election, and I made this fact known publicly during the campaign. In conclusion I should also like to inform you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this house that at no time did I get any request from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to change or alter my position on this matter, and I would like to thank him publicly for this consideration.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat is a clear indication of the reason the opposition advanced its proposal to the government to separate the various provisions of this bill. I have great sympathy for the hon. member and the manner in which he is torn. He has taken a position which happens to be similar to the position I take.

When one reads the bill, particularly a person such as I who works with the provisions of the Criminal Code throughout the weeks and the years, one finds many useful provisions in it. To be placed in the position of voting against the useful amendments contained in the bill simply because of the deep conviction one holds in respect of the objectionable parts is a very sorry position to be in.

The position taken by the hon. member who has just resumed his seat somewhat belies the position the minister took in saying that the bill had stood the test of a general election. He left the impression that because the Liberals were returned to office with a majority government that gave them a mandate to proceed with the bill as it stands. Not only that, he left the implication that the majority of the electorate in Canada, particularly those who elected Liberal candidates, were in favour of the provisions of this bill. That is not the case in respect of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. He made it quite clear to the electorate of his riding, that he was opposed to the principle of abortion, yet he was elected. The minister is wrong on that count.

I suppose this bill could be called, as the minister has described it, part of the government's social legislation, the Magna Carta of the just society. When one reflects on it and what took place at the last session what have we got? We have divorce, abortion and homosexuality. This government has earned the distinction of dealing with divorce, abortion and homosexuality while the economy of the country is drifting extremely dangerously. It has not dealt with much else. I have raised these points in other debates. I am as broad-minded as the next person, but I cannot help wondering whether the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) really knows what he is doing. He has had no hesitation in identifying himself with the provisions of this bill. He did so in March of last year.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in his introductory remarks yesterday made it quite clear that he certainly is not the father of the bill and that the Prime Minister is going to be—I think this is what he said—indelibly linked with this legislation as its father. This is undoubtedly legislation of the Prime Minister. He is the father, rather than the Minister of Justice, of all these provisions relating to the permissive society. Now the Prime Minister has thrown the torch to the Minister of Justice, who with his usual elan has hurled himself into the breach in order to usher in that bright, new world in which we will all participate and which we all anticipate will come about as a result of these amendments. This is part of the Magna Carta of the just society.

Let us look at this legislation carefully. In its present form it is a mishmash of revision, amendment and redrafting of the Criminal Code. In this legislation, really the brainchild of the Prime Minister, the government opens the door not on the just society but rather on the permissive society. The question that occurs to me and persons like the hon. member who has just resumed his seat is, just how wide should this door be opened, and how wide is it going to be opened?

Let us consider the breathalyzer. The government has introduced compulsion and regimentation through the breathalyzer test. I speak as one—I do not like referring in debate to my background and do not do so very often—who has spent several years prosecuting as well as defending in criminal cases. What the bill says and what the law will say if it is passed in this form is: Take the breathalyzer test or be regarded as guilty. That is the attitude in this legislation. I take the position that such an attitude has no part in legislation passed by a free parliament in a free country operating on the basis of the democratic process upon which our system of justice has been built and is based.

In connection with homosexuality I say bluntly that while the Prime Minister may pride himself on his statement that the state has no business in the bedrooms of the nation, he has in these various measures intruded to quite an extent into the bedrooms of the nation. In effect, so far as homosexuality is concerned the bill renders permissible what was previously a criminal offence. To that extent the Prime Minister, through his bill, has taken the government into the bedrooms of the nation. The basis of this legislation is the Prime Minister's belief that homosexuals will behave like gentlemen and that abortions will only be authorized when there is an overwhelming reason. Let me tell the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice that if homosexuals behaved like gentlemen they would not be homosexuals.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: In fact, they would be gentlemen. So far as abortion is concerned, the reasons for permitting it under any and all circumstances will prove to be as overwhelming as the reasons for inducing it at all. One assumes the Prime Minister feels that as a result of this legislation homosexuality can be restricted to the bedrooms of the nation. What guarantee is there of that? I believe the bill does refer to lavatories.

The government holds the distinction of liberalizing divorce, permitting homosexuality in private places between consenting adults, and allowing abortion under certain conditions. How wide are we going to open this door to the permissive society? The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) has gone on record as favouring a greater degree of permissiveness in narcotics regulation, particularly with regard to marijuana. One is permitted to inquire, or at least to conjecture, what kind of society we will have when all these amendments are in force, if what some of us fear is inherent in statements like those made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare comes about in legislative form.

What manner of society are we producing? Is this the Prime Minister's just society, a society where marijuana smoking, consenting adults, having secured an easy divorce from their previous spouses, childless as a result of repeated abortions, may now be compelled to take breathalyzer tests or be regarded as guilty of drunken driving?

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Nielsen: When we adjourned for lunch, Mr. Speaker, I was talking about the just society as opposed to the permissive society and pointing out how much more usefully the government could be using its time if it would devote itself to meaningful and constructive legislation for the creation of a just society rather than to what confronts us in the bill now before the house. Under this government the just society takes on an increasingly curious image.

In July of 1967 a commission of inquiry presided over by Mr. Justice Morrow was set up to inquire into a situation in the Hay River area. We often hear hon. members of this party, as well as of the N.D.P., speak about the sorry plight in which the Indian people find themselves in matters affecting the administration of justice. The recommendations made by Mr. Justice Morrow as a result of that inquiry have yet to be implemented.

I think it is worth while to bring to the attention of the house the fact that when the docket is dealt with in our northern courts each morning Indians comprise a sad and sorry parade before the justice of the peace or the magistrate. They are fined almost automatically and because they lack the money to pay they are automatically jailed for a myriad of offences. One wonders why the government is not acting on the recommendations which Mr. Justice Morrow of the Territorial Court of the Northwest Territories made almost a year ago.

The first recommendation was that the courts of the justices of the peace should be held either in proper courtrooms or in rented premises separate from police facilities. Imagine the mental impression which the Indian, in most cases uneducated and illiterate, receives when he appears before authority to be dealt with. How much more in the interests of justice it would be if these Indians could be dealt with in premises which do not smack of the authority of the police office.

The second recommendation was that new public buildings in northern communities should include some kind of courtroom with adequate seating for the public, and a minimum law library.

The third recommendation urged:

> That justices of the peace be appointed only after a broad process of consultation among knowledgeable persons, that appointments be for a fixed term, that they receive more assistance and information from the Department of Justice and the territorial government, and that they be paid by fees or honoraria, and not out of court costs assessed against the accused.

The commission next recommended that immediate consideration be given to the appointment of a second legally trained magistrate for the Northwest Territories. I would add that such a recommendation should apply to the Yukon also. The first recommendation was:

> That the government of Canada give formal recognition to the principle of legal aid for indigents—

This is a subject about which we have been speaking in the present debate.

> —in the Northwest Territories, not by the appointment of a public defender but by a system of legal aid by members of the bar for reasonable remuneration, and not dependent on court appointment.

Note that this is not just in connection with capital and semi-serious offences; it applies to all offences. How often a native Indian with limited intellect appears before the courts without even understanding the charge being read to him.

The sixth recommendation by Mr. Justice Morrow was that consideration be given to changing the whole attitude toward drunkenness so that it would cease to be treated as a crime. That falls within the purview of the minister. And so the recommendations go; I do not have time to read them all, but they have been public for a year and nothing has been done.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): May I ask the hon. member whether he is aware that the great majority of those recommendations have already been implemented.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am basing my statement on, if not the last, the last but one issue of a newspaper which was instrumental in the commissioning of Mr. Justice Warren in July, 1967, in the first place. According to the lead editorial on the front page, we in the north are still waiting for the implementation of these recommendations. I do not get over to the Mackenzie very often because it is about 1,000 miles from my home town.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): You are on the wrong side of the river.

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Nielsen: I think I am on the right river though. In any event, the news media in the north are indicating that we are still awaiting the implementation of these recommendations. For example, I do not think that the second magistrate for the Northwest Territories has been appointed, which was one of the recommendations. I do not believe that counsel is now being provided for indigent native peoples in the north, certainly not in the Yukon, and this was another recommendation. I do not want to go down the whole list and embarrass the minister.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Is the hon. member aware that of 74 recommendations about 65 have been implemented.

Mr. Nielsen: All I have here is a summary of 11 recommendations, the central, really important ones, and we are still waiting for their implementation. However, I will leave them with the minister and perhaps he will make some inquiries. I think he will find that at least on this occasion I am semi-accurate.

Now, about this just society. At the same time that the government is trying to create this society the ordinary Canadian, having had his right to possess arms seriously curtailed, will have no defence against the creatures of this new enlightenment if they should happen to invade his privacy. There are in Canada serious problems of reform, both economic and constitutional. These firearm provisions, which require that a person must have a permit signed either by the Commissioner of the R.C.M.P. or somebody delegated by him, cause me to wonder what the Eskimos in our isolated communities in the high north are going to do when they are required to travel several hundred miles to the nearest R.C.M.P. post to apply for a permit to carry a rifle so they can shoot their food. These provisions will be pretty difficult to implement in circumstances such as these.

Parliament must come to grips with the problems that arouse the conscience of Canadians. One of the more serious of those problems affects the living conditions of our Indian and Eskimo people in the north, indeed our Indians throughout Canada. Whether or not we agree with the approach proposed by the Minister of Justice it is in his favour—and I say this frankly—that he has at least attempted to deal with basic social problems. In so doing, of course, we cannot accept solutions which affront the conscience of a majority of our citizens. We have just heard from one member on the minister's side of the house, and there must be others who have similar remarks to make.

By the government having adopted the course it has adopted and forcing us to vote on this omnibus bill, members opposite as well as on this side of the house are placed in the position that they must vote for something this is repugnant to them.

Mr. Flemming: Or against it.

Mr. Nielsen: For example, they may not believe in abortion. Or, as my hon. friend says, they must vote against the measure. This is an extremely untenable position in which to put any member. Any member on the other side of the house who has the intestinal fortitude of the hon. member who preceded me will rise and declare that he is not going to be forced into the position of voting for this bill—after all we are debating the principle which includes all of the bill—because it includes something that he does not believe in, namely, abortion. I wonder how many of these members are going to be absent or behind the curtain when the vote comes.

Mr. Gray: Where will you be?

Mr. Nielsen: I may not be here. I may be at home attending an examination for discovery in proceedings that have been brought against me by the Liberal Association. I am likely to be absent from time to time by compulsion. I do not object to that, but if I am able to be here I am going to vote against the bill. Although I adopt 80 per cent of its provisions, I do not adopt the abortion provisions. It seems to me that the government is being entirely inconsistent. It abolishes capital punishment. We must not kill. But the government is going to kill human beings unborn. I suggest it is adopting an entirely inconsistent position.

I am speaking about the majority. It seems to me that somebody must speak on behalf of the majority. The great silent majority remains voiceless. The government has spent too much time, in my view, in a dilatory pursuit of marginal problems. That statement is not meant to be partisan but factual. It is perhaps a temptation to any government to pursue that which is remunerative in terms of headlines rather than those sober but necessary solutions that the times require.

We can no longer, for instance, put off remedial action to deal with the problems that face not only eastern agriculture but those which gave rise to the long debate last Wednesday evening. We must give serious consideration to the problems of education in a number of provinces and territories. The need for the reform of government in our two northern territories is long past being urgent. Deep and wide cracks are appearing in our national life. It is not a question of patching over; it is a question of getting down to the basic problems.

The need for social legislation covering abortion and sexual aberration is apparent, but it must not blind us to the need for long overdue action in fields vital to our national integrity. The Prime Minister has said that the government has no place in the nation's bedrooms. That is an extremely facile generalization hardly worthy of one whose task it is to lead the nation.

I am going to leave the bulk of the remarks on this next subject to those more familiar with it than I, but I do say that the danger in homosexuality lies not in what occurs between consenting adults but in proselytism. In abortion the question is simply one of destroying human life, under whatever guise you want to give it.

The pattern that we are asked to accept in adopting a more permissive approach, which is creating a situation that is turning us into a permissive rather than a just society, to those things which mankind for centuries has kept under lock and key must be viewed with some scepticism. The argument is that in the electronic and space age human nature has reached a stage of development where we are no longer to be subject to the taboos and shibboleths of a more primitive era. It is a question of how wide we open the door.

Yet permissiveness is always characteristic of a primitive society. It is only in a sophisticated society that self-imposed discipline is tolerated. That is the whole ideal of the Criminal Code, indeed of all our laws that govern living conditions in the society in which we live. Human nature has remained pretty well what it was in the days of the Sumerians, in spite of McLuhanism and a greater facility in communications. We may be lapsing into an era of electronic permissiveness.

The problem we have to face in legislation having profound social consequences and which is both moral and ethical in its implications lies in the extent to which the law should attempt to deal with matters of conscience. It would have been simple for the minister to separate the provisions having to do with mechanical amendments, such as those affecting bail and present sentences, from those dealing with moral aspects of human life. The provisions dealing with moral aspects could have been extracted from the bill so that hon. members who wished to could vote on them according to the dictates of their consciences.

Generally speaking, the law should not deal in matters of morals any more than should medicine. It is the social consequences of legislation which must concern us. We must not legislate to permit activities which are repugnant, morally degenerative or socially destructive. The legislator does not have unbounded jurisdiction over the human spirit. Let me make plain that I do not speak today as an adherent of the Roman Catholic religion, as will be the case with a good many hon. members who will be speaking in this debate. It is hard to separate matters affecting moral conscience and religious belief. In my view, to hold that the legislator has unbounded jurisdiction over the human spirit is to uphold spiritual tyranny.

I now want to speak about abortion. The bill provides for an abortion committee of doctors to be set up in hospitals under provincial or territorial authority. The committee or board would certify as to the need on health grounds for an abortion, following which an abortion could be legally procured. The effect of this is to bring within the purview of legality artificially procured abortions which now take place outside the law. It means that those who under the present law are securing or procuring abortions in a criminal fashion will be able to do so in future within the law in a number of cases. But what of those who go before such boards and are rejected? Having gone to a hospital board and having endeavoured to secure authorization for an abortion on grounds of health or danger to life, what do such persons do if they are rejected by the board? Some will accept the verdict. Others will go ahead and have the abortion anyway, and to do so they will resort to clandestine and illegal means. Therefore I suggest to the minister that the amendments will fall short of their objective in this regard in that they will not necessarily remove the sinister, shady, sordid and dangerous activity of the undercover abortionist.

And what sorts of pressures will these provisions of the bill place on the hospital board? Medical men are being asked by this bill to take in their hands the question of life and death affecting an unborn child. They will be asked to pronounce on human life, to decide whether that child, a human being, is to be allowed to stay alive or to have its life removed. They will be asked to decide whether that child shall be allowed to come into the world and become a person or be checked at the beginning of life. That is a decision which is social, moral, legal and humane. It cannot be divorced from the human and spiritual aspects in which it is clothed.

I ask, will it not in most cases be easier to allow abortion than to force a woman to have a child she does not want? Do we not by the provisions of this bill open the door to unrestricted abortion in fact and in practice? It is hard to reconcile the government's thinking on human life. It says on the one hand, "We cannot take the life of a convicted murderer" and on the other hand, "But we can take the life of an unborn child."

One hesitates to use the argument about the rights of the unborn child, not because it is not a powerful and valid argument but because those who have introduced this bill and support it have already made up their minds that those rights either do not exist or are inconsequential. Are we to take a view on this matter that is purely materialistic, hedonistic or scientific? The view that says the unborn child has no rights and is not to be treated as possessing human life with a claim to personality is neither scientific nor just. Is there any question that if an unborn child, a foetus, were the heir to a fortune or crown the destruction of that foetus for motives either pecuniary or political would be murder? One would have to agree it would be murder. Has not the yet to be born child as great a right to life as, for example, the convicted murderer? The murderer has the right to live, and this government has said so. But according to the legislation before us the child who has harmed no one has no right to be born if his birth will be a cause of mental or physical injury, inconvenience or embarrassment. That is what the question will resolve itself into.

Wherever abortion has been permitted in the past, as in Greece or in Rome, it has contributed to the decline and downfall of that society. In Japan abortion is now practically unrestricted. One asks, how wide are we to open the doors in this permissive society? Taken in context with other adjustments having the effect of weakening a social fibre painfully built up over the centuries—I am speaking of relaxation in divorce, homosexuality, drug addiction, obscenity, and similar provisions in the law—there is a distinct possibility that we have gone a long way toward writing off the future in building a permissive society. The experience of the past has been that certain areas of human conduct hold the keys to destruction and decay. Antisocial practices such as homosexuality, drug addiction, abortion, easy divorce and the toleration of obscenity have led inevitably to the destruction of the society in which they were unleashed. Experience has framed our laws so as not to permit the progressive corruption which such modes of conduct entailed in the past. Practices and activities which if carried out and accepted universally would make organized society impossible to maintain are by their nature antisocial. These are the practices we are today being asked to look upon with tolerance, if not with favour.

There should be no penalty against an unwed mother or her child. Where such children cannot be looked after they should be taken care of by the state, with no contumely attached. Instead of being concerned with the type of legislation before us the government might consider the plight of unwed mothers and their children. If the nation wants to fill a gap in social legislation, in that area there is huge room for improvement. In the handling of children without parents, our society leaves a great deal to be desired. It is an area with regard to which the federal government should sit down with the provinces and work out a program so that across this nation, without discrimination, without fear and without prejudice, the same standards can be applied in the handling of all children who through no fault of their own have been deprived of the love and care of their natural parents, either married or otherwise. Surely it is the children who must be our chief concern.

When I visit some of the hovels and tents in the north I see children of native Indians living in the most abject squalor. It is beyond the imagination. One wonders why the federal government does not meet with the provincial and territorial governments and attempt to solve these problems instead of concerning itself with homosexuality. Surely children in this advanced, modern, enlightened nation, in this space and electronic age, have the right to decent, reasonable treatment across this country regardless of the circumstances in which they enter this world.

Rather than removing the life of an unborn child, is it not more progressive in this of all countries to allow them to enter the world and then to look after them upon a basis of national justice and decency? Nothing is more urgent than that something should be done about the situation of children in this country. Some people call them unwanted. No child in Canada should be unwanted and it is not through the removal of the right to live that we shall solve the problem without other changes.

It is regrettable the government has not seen fit to allow the division or sequestration of the various propositions inherent in the bill. Had this been done voluntarily by the government, it would have been possible to vote in favour of some of the amendments which are reasonable, while opposing those which may well open the door to a host of evils. As it is now, the government has condemned those who vote for the bill to be presumed to be favourable to each and every proposal included therein.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Nielsen: That is the position in which the government by its customary intransigence has placed its own members. They will adopt the easy course of going behind the curtains rather than vote because of a lack of courage to stand up and express their moral convictions and oppose those portions of the bill to which I am sure a number of them must be opposed. By adopting this position the government has made it more difficult for others who favour a measure of reasonable reform to accept this omnibus approach.

An hon. Member: Ominous!

Mr. Nielsen: As my friend said, it is an ominous approach. There is still time for the minister to reconsider and convince his colleagues that the right and moral thing to do, in fact the only thing to do, is to have a free vote on this measure. If it is to mean anything the government must remove the suffocating umbrella which they have placed over their members by calling it a government bill and telling them how they are to vote. There are only four important moral portions in the bill. I urge the government to adopt the reasonable course of allowing members to vote on each portion separately and apart from the mechanical and purely routine amendments contained in the bill.

Mr. Mark MacGuigan (Windsor-Walkerville): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to canvass the whole of this vast bill before us but to make comments only on certain aspects, in particular those aspects which deal with sexual morality.

I believe the omnibus bill reflects an entirely new governmental approach to the criminal law. The criminal law, as that part of the law which regulates conduct in the broadest way and in the most fundamental matters, is the area of law which is most closely related to people's moral beliefs. Moral beliefs, in turn, are largely, though not exclusively, formed by religious beliefs. Whatever the relationship of morals to religion, and there are many theories on this subject, criminal law has traditionally been thought to be merely morals codified and backed by the authority of the state.

Since people's views as to what is sinful change slowly and almost imperceptibly, one would expect that the criminal law would change at the same pace. In point of fact, because of the unavoidable inertia in the legislative process, legal changes usually lag far behind moral changes in society, even though they ultimately come to reflect them. This is emphatically the case with the criminal law in Canada. The first Canadian Criminal Code, enacted in 1892, merely codified the existing common law on crimes. Changes made over the years were relatively minor and there was no general revision of the Code until the 1953-54 session of parliament at which time the revision was more remarkable for its rearrangement and consolidation of existing law than for its innovation. It is no exaggeration to say that the omnibus bill would, if passed, effect the most important change in the criminal law since it came into effect in the form of a Code in 1892.

The bill would bring about a change not only in criminal legislation but also in the philosophy behind it, for it apparently indicates a determination that law shall no longer be thought of as a mirror of morals, and that from now on crime and sin, law and morals, must be distinguished.

If this bill is passed, homosexual acts committed in private between consenting adults will no longer be prohibited. In other words, homosexual acts which do not involve the imposition of an adult will on a child's, or which do not offend against sensibilities through a public display, will be beyond the purview of the law. Similarly, unusual sexual acts will no longer be against the law if they are performed in private between two persons. The rationalization of these changes has been stated to be that the state has no business in the bedrooms of the nation.

The notion of the limited capacity of the law in the enforcement of morals is not a new one in legal theory. St. Thomas Aquinas proclaimed some seven centuries ago that "human laws do not forbid all vices, but only the more grievous ones, and chiefly those that are to the hurt of others." He also insisted that only rules for the common good of the body politic could be made into law.

Venerable as it is in theory, however, it is comparatively new in practice, for by and large legislators have thought it best to forbid all actions which were generally disapproved of at the time. The recommendations of the Wolfenden committee, on which the new Canadian proposals are based, were themselves ignored for 10 years by the parliament of the United Kingdom. It is, in fact, recent theorizing sparked by the Wolfenden report which has helped to better define the desirable limits of legislation.

What are the desirable limits of legislation? The principle of this bill is clearly that the proper sphere of legislation is public behaviour and that purely private behaviour is not a legitimate area of legislative interest. I strongly support this principle because I believe that the competence of the state is limited and that private behaviour is beyond the purview of the state.

But what is public and what is private behaviour? About a century ago John Stuart Mill in his famous book, "On Liberty", chapter 1, said:

> The only purpose for which power can rightfully be exercised over any member of a civilized community is to prevent harm to others. His own good either physical or moral is not a sufficient warrant.

Mill's statement incorporates the laissez-faire economic prejudices of the 19th century; I would not accept it as a complete statement of government power but in this area of criminal law I believe it states the principal thrust of government competence.

Even this principle of harm to others still lacks clarity. Is it physical harm or moral harm? In the context of this bill it must include physical harm, it seems to me, and exclude moral harm. For example, changes with respect to homosexuality could hardly be defended if this were not the bill's philosophy. Yet the harm which the state seeks to protect its citizens from through a criminal law must be somewhat broader than physical harm or we could not justify the fact that we are not entirely wiping the law of gross indecency from our statute books.

It must be moral harm, too, in cases where the other person involved beside the committer of the act is in special need of protection. We are, in the result, very close to the philosophy of the Wolfenden report, and I quote from paragraph 13 of that report:

> "(The) function (of the criminal law), as we see it, is to preserve public order and decency, to protect the citizen from what is offensive or injurious, and to provide sufficient safeguards against exploitation and corruption of others, particularly those who are specially vulnerable because they are young, weak in body or mind, inexperienced, or in a state of special physical, official or economic dependence.
> "It is not, in our view, the function of the law to intervene in the private lives of citizens, or to seek to enforce any particular pattern of behavior, further than is necessary to carry out the purposes we have outlined."

It was on the basis of this philosophy that the Wolfenden committee recommended that homosexual behavior between consenting adults in private should no longer be a criminal offence. If this attitude is, as I believe it should be, the one guiding us here in the area of criminal law, then we have hardly scratched the surface of criminal law reform. Let me give a few other examples of where this principle may lead us in the future.

In the light of this principle, can the offence of blasphemous libel—section 246 of the Code—any longer be justified? Second, can the offence of attempted suicide—section 213—be justified, or is this not possibly an area which should rather be dealt with by psychiatric means? Third, can the offence of obscenity—section 150—be continued unless it can be shown that obscenity is a contributing factor to illegal sexual conduct such as indirect assault or rape, or except as it affects minors? Fourth, can the offences respecting prostitution be maintained in their present form? I ask these questions for the reflection of hon. members of the house.

It seems to me that hon. members will not only have the duty in the future of scrutinizing legislation on the basis of the harm-to-others principle, to the extent that they accept it, but that they have that same duty now with respect to the various amendments which are before us, the most relevant one, I believe, and the one upon which there is most dispute being that with respect to abortion.

In my opinion the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) in his very eloquent address last night begged the question when he took the view that there should be no law at all respecting abortion. He did not directly face the implications of the harm to another principle. Of course I realize that if he had been able to deal in detail with all parts of the bill, with unlimited time, he might very well have met this point head on, but as his speech was delivered this question was not faced.

The human foetus is at least a potential human being. I think we can all begin with that measure of agreement. Perhaps if it is only that, hon. members might consider themselves justified in giving priority to the desires and needs of an actual human being, the mother, over this potential being. But if it is itself an actual human being, how can they logically take that position? Therefore the fundamental question, it seems to me, is whether the foetus is human, whether it is an actual human being.

It has always struck me as rather ironic that, to some extent at least, those who favour abortion oppose killing in war and capital punishment. Surely it is equally ironic that those who oppose abortion are often the same ones who seem to favour war and capital punishment. Perhaps this illustrates how closely we should look at a particular problem to see how our general principles should be applied to it.

Most therapeutic abortions are performed at about the 12th week when the foetus is in a comparatively early stage of development. It is before the time of the so-called quickening, which for some centuries was thought to be the time at which human life began or at which human life manifested itself.

On the other hand, science seems to be showing more and more the continuity of human life from conception to death, with characteristics of individuality perceptible from the very outset. The only sure fact seems to be that neither biochemistry nor medicine has progressed to the point where we can determine with scientific exactitude the time at which human life begins. At present it seems to be largely a matter of definition, of how we define human life. Because this is purely a question of a philosophical character the scientists are not necessarily any more competent than anyone else to give this definition. My understanding of the biochemical and medical evidence, is that the foetus is an actual human being from the beginning, but I recognize the matter is sufficiently in doubt that many hon. members look at the evidence differently.

It seems to me, however, that where scientific evidence is so inconclusive the presumption should be in favour of the foetus and against abortion. If the foetus is an actual human being, the direct killing of this human being would be a greater evil, at least in my scale of values, than any evil which might indirectly befall the mother. In doubt on a matter of such importance the presumption should be against abortion and the onus of proof on those who advocate it. This is an onus which I believe they cannot fulfil in the present state of scientific knowledge.

If this were the whole of the question before us I would be totally opposed to any abortion law reform. But I believe there are several practical considerations of a very important character which must be taken into account, as well as the theoretical considerations which I have advanced.

First, if it could be shown that reform would reduce the over-all incidence of abortion, thereby decreasing the incidence of the evil, this would justify reform. Statistics from other countries which have allowed abortion are not encouraging in this respect, however, and I could not in conscience, as I read these statistics, act on this basis.

A second consideration is that there are a large number of abortions being performed in Canada today outside hospitals and under medically unsatisfactory conditions which sometimes result in the death of the mother. If such abortions could be eliminated by reform of the law this would be a factor in encouraging reform. But again the experience of other countries, as I read it, is not encouraging.

Third—and it is only this consideration which persuades me that some measure of legal reform should take place—there are a large number of abortions now taking place in the hospitals of this country, performed by the best physicians and according to the best canons of medical practice; yet these abortions are all illegal and the practitioners are subject to criminal offences.

I strongly disagree with the hon. member for York South that the bill before us is merely a clarification of the present law. Section 237 as it stands is without qualification or exception. It reads:

> Every one who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person, whether or not she is pregnant, uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.

There are no exonerating words of any kind. The Bourne case in England, which established therapeutic abortion in that country, was based on a different statute, different by only one word, unlawful, but it happened to be the word which the court fastened on to uphold therapeutic abortion. The word "unlawful" is not now in section 237. I submit that the law is as stated by Dr. J. J. Lederman, as set out in 1963 Criminal Law Quarterly:

> The law of Canada contains no provision for lawful abortions in any circumstances... Even where the life of the mother is threatened by the continuation of her pregnancy, and even when consultations are obtained confirming this threat to the mother's life, and even when all consents to the operation are obtained and valid, and even when the operation is performed by a qualified and registered doctor in a recognized hospital—even when all these conditions have been fulfilled, an abortion performed would appear to be, in the present state of the law, as much a crime as any "criminal" abortion.

I believe this clearly states the law as it is now.

The fact that the law now proscribes all abortions makes for a grave situation when probably at least half the people of Canada believe that abortion is morally right, and when abortion is freely carried out by the majority of the members of the medical profession involved in prenatal care. The difficulty is compounded when the Attorney General of the most populous provinces is reportedly on record that he will not prosecute violators of this law. When a conviction for an abortion as presently practised in our hospitals is so repugnant to a large number of Canadians that no prosecution takes place, I think we must admit that the law as it stands is completely unenforceable. If we were to allow this legislation to continue, not only would the law be dead in this area but disrespect for the law would be engendered and might go far toward breaking down respect for the law in general. In some part this has already occurred. The public good is not served by allowing this situation to continue.

I therefore reluctantly come to the conclusion that an absolute prohibition of abortion is no longer feasible. The proposed amendment is not a mere clarification of the present law. It is a reform of great moment. What it does is bring the law into accord with medical practice and popular expectation. For practical reasons I therefore am prepared to accept a limited degree of abortion.

[Mr. MacGuigan.]

I do, however, remain concerned about the language by which the proposed exception is to be recognized. In the light of my theoretical conclusion that there should be no change in the law, which I have varied only because of the impossibility of enforcing the present law, I believe it is incumbent upon us to define the amendment with extreme care. I am not persuaded that the bill now before us defines the exception with sufficient exactitude. I would prefer to see a recommendation that the danger to the mother's health should be a direct and serious threat. I therefore want to recommend in committee the insertion of the words which were in the report of the committee on health and welfare last spring: "seriously and directly impair the health of the mother".

With this qualification I accept the bill with enthusiasm. I believe it marks a great step forward in criminal law. I congratulate the Minister of Justice and his predecessor, the present Prime Minister, for their initiative in bringing it forward and in thus adjusting the law to the conditions of today.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I think the bill before us is a most important one. I have listened to the debate fairly closely. I have agreed with some of the points made and have not agreed with others. May I say first of all that the bill is a far-ranging one. It certainly gives one who has not had too much practical legal experience, at least during the years I have been in the House of Commons, an opportunity to refresh one's memory on various parts of the Criminal Code and criminal law in Canada today.

I was glad to note in the remarks of my friend the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) that the first code was adopted under Sir John Thompson, a native of my province, an outstanding leader of the Bar, and a parliamentarian who would have contributed even more to his country had he not been struck down after having served for a relatively short time in the parliament of Canada.

Many important points have been made in respect of this bill. Certainly one must look at it from his own point of view. Undoubtedly we will hear many speeches on the bill and will hear questions asked before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. As was pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary North, one's view depends a lot on the person himself, his upbringing, his religious background and his dealings with the public.

My remarks today will not be in line with the remarks of the learned member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), although I am always interested in hearing a man who has his roots in Prince Edward Island, close to us across the Northumberland Strait. I enjoyed at least the first part of his remarks in which he gave the background of the criminal law of Canada.

My remarks on the bill will be more of a practical nature based on my personal experience in my dealings with the public not only as a parliamentarian but also as a lawyer before I entered this historic chamber. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) in opening the discussion pointed out that this bill had received popular acclaim by the electorate of this country. I do not think that was the case. I do not think members were elected to this house on that basis. I will not go into the reason some of them were elected, although perhaps the Prime Minister had a part in that. The hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan), pointed out that this was not the case and that this bill should be divided up to give members on both sides of the house the opportunity to vote according to their conscience on these important measures.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEwan: I believe a free vote is called for. I believe ample evidence to support this was given in the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and will be provided by other members who will speak on this bill before it is referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. The consciences of members will be tried in respect of the idea of morality and how far the law should go in dealing with Canadians. I will deal with that in my closing remarks.

I support the position taken by the hon. member for Calgary North as the leading spokesman for this party when he asked that the bill be divided. It should be divided in order to give members an opportunity to deal with these matters separately or at least in four different categories as set out by the hon. member.

I shall deal with some of the provisions contained in the bill. There is the matter of the breathalyzer test. Generally speaking, as a parent who has lived in an area where there have been a great many accidents during the last number of years, I certainly think the problem of the drinking driver must be looked into. I agree that perhaps it should be brought forward.

I am a little unhappy about this proposed section 224. At page 4720 of Hansard for yesterday the minister is recorded as having said:

> Under the bill the driver is not subject to a compulsory breathalyzer test unless at that time, or within the previous two hours, he has conducted himself in such a way that a peace officer, in the words of the bill, "would have reasonable and probable grounds" in arresting him for impaired driving.

The minister points out that the burden would be on the Crown to show this was the case. The bill goes on to state that if a driver does not take a test he must show a reasonable excuse for not doing so. If he cannot provide that reasonable excuse he can be fined and the conviction will be recorded against the individual. That is the part which bothers me. I think the committee should examine it closely. I believe the requirement to take a test infringes the civil rights of Canadians, I have grave doubts about it.

The Crown must prove that there was evidence of impairment before the policeman can ask an accused to take the test, but policemen, whether they be R.C.M.P. or local, are human. Under the law as it stands, the courts must decide what constitutes impairment. I understand the same conditions will apply under the amendment before the house. The idea of forcing an individual to take this test just does not sit right with me. When the committee is studying this provision I hope it will go into this aspect very carefully.

I am afraid I cannot fully agree with the amendments in respect of firearms. I do not agree with all the remarks of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in this regard, but he has his reasons and I have mine. This is why we suggest there should be a free vote in respect of the various parts of this bill. There were parts of the first amendment on firearms introduced by a former minister of justice to which objection was taken by gun clubs throughout the country. The minister has made some changes in this bill. These gun clubs encourage a good sport in this country. I know of one such club in my own constituency which trains people in the handling of firearms. Some of its members have competed at Bisley.

I have in mind individuals like the former member for Colchester-Hants and others. I am sure he would be one of the first to say that we should permit gun clubs in this country to carry out these activities. I am glad that changes were made. The minister has said that we cannot make any foolproof gun law, and that is so. After reading about what is taking place in the United States I have come to the conclusion that difficulties are being experienced in Congress there, just as the minister experiences difficulties here. Certainly, I hope we will go into this matter carefully when the firearms part of the bill is being considered by the committee. We must have regard for the laws as they now stand. Certainly with the increase in crime in this country the matter of firearms control is most important. We must scrutinize it very carefully.

There are some parts of the bill in respect of lotteries with which I cannot fully agree. I think I am correct in saying that under the present law lotteries could be held on occasion for charitable or religious purposes. I recall having a little trouble a few years ago in this regard. A lodge commenced to run a bingo, that well known indoor and outdoor sport in at least eastern Canada, and I think western Canada. I am sure even the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) has played bingo. The local authority felt that this was against the law and an action was commenced. In any event, the law in this regard has been in a questionable state. I hope the present legislation will clear up the doubt. Many organizations, including the Kinsmen clubs, as pointed out by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), sponsor bingo for charitable purposes.

Let me commend the minister for the measure in respect of harassing telephone calls. It has been my personal experience, since I have entered politics, that this type of call is becoming more prevalent. This has certainly been the case in my household. I hope in some way, as a result of this legislation, this type of thing can be stopped. I do not know how this can be done but I have read that telephone companies can trace calls. I do not know what might constitute evidence, but this is something that might be explained in the committee. I certainly support this part of the bill. I do not think any citizen, whether he be in politics or any other field, should be subjected to harassment through these calls. I know of this type of thing taking place, not only at my household but throughout my constituency. We will watch this necessary legislation closely.

The hon. member for Yukon and the hon. member for Calgary North spoke at some length about the matter of bail. I should like to refer to the matter of providing legal aid. I realize this is a costly proposition, yet in the province of Nova Scotia legal aid is being provided in one or two areas, including my own constituency. However, adequate provision is not made for legal aid. Many people come before the courts who are denied their rights, and not given the opportunity to defend themselves. I do not intend to mention any names, but I remember a pretty tough magistrate who grew up in the days when magistrates had to live on the costs they collected. These costs were directly related to the number of accused who either pleaded or were found guilty. After talking to some lawyers in my area, I discovered that on more than one occasion individuals who appeared before this magistrate without the benefit of counsel charged with fairly serious crimes were automatically sent on a trip to Dorchester penitentiary, even though it was the first time the individual had been before the magistrate. I think legal aid should be provided, and I hope that the federal government will give this matter some thought.

Officials of the province of Nova Scotia have discussed this matter and are undoubtedly in favour of providing legal aid. The provision of legal aid is costly but I hope something can be worked out between the federal and provincial governments. Canadians are entitled to be adequately defended before the courts. I am sure such a measure would receive the approval of the people of this country. The minister said in his opening remarks that he would be willing to make further amendments to our laws to keep abreast of the times. I hope he will give some thought to doing so in this regard.

As was pointed out by the Minister of Justice, some of the amendments really come under the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith). The amendments with regard to the Parole Board are most interesting. In the justice committee not long ago we heard evidence from the Solicitor General and the chairman of the National Parole Board. At that time the chairman of the National Parole Board pointed out that in the nine years and ten months the board had been in operation, parole had been granted to 23,000 inmates and 89 per cent successfully completed their parole. That is quite a record. He further pointed out that it was necessary for him to have additional staff and more members of the Parole Board. I note this legislation does just that; it increases the membership of the Parole Board from five to nine.

I think this is a good move, because the chairman of the board indicated to the committee if he had more members on the board, panels of two could be sent to the various provinces rather than have the board sit in Ottawa. Those panels could visit the various institutions of the country and interview inmates on the spot. As I say, this is a good move. It was further pointed out to the committee that putting people on parole means they are not a charge on the public. They contribute to our economy because they secure employment. I shall therefore have no hesitation in voting for this section of the bill.

Another matter falling within the jurisdiction of the Solicitor General has already been referred to, namely the expunging of criminal records. I do not know whether this matter will be dealt with in the proper way. In the last parliament the justice committee heard evidence on this subject. The Solicitor General has set forth his ideas on this question in a memo. He intends, by way of pardon, to expunge criminal records. As I understood it, it was not thought necessary to physically destroy these records, but they would be put someplace where they would not penalize a person in later years. I recall the case of a young man, a constituent of my friend the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. MacInnis), who applied to serve on the municipal council, but it was found he could not do so because of a criminal record going back many years. This certainly penalized him. I have read the Solicitor General's memo, and hope he will take action in this regard.

Mr. McIlraith: This legislation will be coming forward. Work is being done on it.

Mr. MacEwan: That is what I am suggesting should be done, Mr. Speaker. I am not saying that the Solicitor General, who has just come into the chamber, has not done his work; all I am saying is that this is a good step forward. Whether it is based on a pardon being given, or however it is done, it will be important to the people of this country. Canadians with a criminal record should not be penalized because of that record; they should be able to obtain employment the same as anyone else in this country. I am glad to hear the Solicitor General's comment. This is progressive legislation and in it the Solicitor General will work hand in hand with the Minister of Justice. These are two gentlemen who administer justice in Canada.

Another matter, and this was mentioned by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), is that of bail. He stated that it should be possible for those who are poor, as well as those who are rich, to obtain bail. I have seen instances in the courts where, although there were good and reasonable grounds for believing that a man would appear for his trial, bail was set at such a high figure it was almost impossible for the accused to raise it. I think that before long the Minister of Justice should look into the aspect of the law and bring forward changes in the code.

Several other matters were raised by the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan). Many other sections of the Criminal Code need to be amended in order to bring it up to date. I shall not go further into the clauses of the bill except to repeat that the speech of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan), and other speeches which have been made, indicate that many of the clauses of the bill require the members of this house to examine their consciences.

The minister dealt with this question in his remarks. This is all the more reason the bill should be divided into its various parts. I make a final plea and ask the minister, who is a forward-looking Canadian in the younger age group when compared with other ministers opposite, to again take this suggestion that the bill be divided to the cabinet and his caucus. It has been pointed out that the bill will go to the committee and will be reported back to this house. Then, members will have an opportunity to vote on each and every clause. But the catch is, as I understand it, when third reading is given to Bill C-150 members will have either to say they are in favour of the bill or are not. They may have grave reservations about various parts of it. I do not think this procedure puts members in a proper position. I am glad that we in the official opposition will have a free vote on the Criminal Code. This is important because the code concerns every Canadian family and goes into every household in this country. We are in favour of a free vote. Let the government adopt the same attitude and make the necessary changes to this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-150 will certainly leave its mark in the history of Canadian parliament and for several reasons, the most important being the fact that it will show the Canadian people that Canada has come to a turning point in its history and that it is able at last to recognize life as it is now, not on the basis of principles and theories but of facts. I know that this Bill No. C-150 can bring about a lot of apparent division but I do think that it is with a clash of ideas that we shall be able to enjoy in this house a greater unity since we agree on the principle but we do not seem to agree on the terms.

Actually, it is hard to understand what goes on when we want to introduce new things in Canada. We had the example of the flag and today those who were strongly opposed to it proudly wear a miniature flag on their lapels. When they travel in Europe, they are very proud of it. But think of all the speeches, of all the time it took before the adoption of an emblem which, to my mind, is essential to our national pride. Indeed, when we are abroad, what gladdens our hearts? The flag of our country floating on a mast.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (3:20 p.m.)

Mr. Isabelle: Mr. Speaker, my speech will be essentially about abortion, and I shall leave the question of guns to warriors and hunters.

I shall leave the problem of lotteries to those who know that subject better than I do.

Finally, I shall leave bingos to those who have been organizing them for so long in Canada, knowing all the time of course that they were infringing the Criminal Code. But since in Canada, as usual, the central government, as it is called, has always taken a paternalistic attitude, it looked the other way and let parishes, charitable associations and benevolent societies get rich or to fill their tills. The aim was commendable at the time, and this is why one has no right today to tell the people that an existing situation will not be recognized.

This is why I say that many things will be remembered in history, including this famous bill which, fundamentally, tends to unite Canadians and to give them a better standard of living.

Mr. Speaker, I want to limit my remarks to the abortion problem, and I will go over the history of this famous controversy from the beginning. For the information of those who fear remorse, I must say that the law—as everyone says—is permissive. It is not compulsory and this is what makes the just society. It is to allow one's conscience to do what one can do, what one wants to do, what one must do or what one thinks one should do.

Moreover, as would say one hon. member who is an excellent lawyer, the change is not considerable in comparison with the former legislation, except that it is a little more precise. One admits that medicine exists in Canada and that it is the duty of doctors to take decisions concerning health. It is also said that it is the duty of doctors to perform these operations when the life of the pregnant mother is at stake.

This is why we speak of clarification. Indeed, there is no great change, not much is being done. The bill merely clarifies a point, and that, in essence, is what the whole chapter on abortion is about.

There has also been a great show of emotion. Some took great pleasure in using the words "life, health, woman, mother"; some even wondered whether it may not be possible for a man to give birth. That proves just how ridiculous things become when we start dissecting words. There is no single definition of health. I am not saying that there have not been several definitions of the word; I say there is no single definition on which everyone agrees. That is why the responsibility for taking that decision should be left to the medical profession.

Health is a lot of things which together make a man feel well. It is a feeling of well-being. Because a man has had both legs removed does not mean that he is not in good health. It is not the lack of something; it is a whole. So, I will not let anyone come and tell me that there is mental health on the one hand, and physical health on the other. It is true that both exist. But they cannot be considered separately. Some people are ill because they live in slums; others, because they eat or drink too much and suffer from gout, and so on and so forth. But that is not for lack of something. That is why I say that health is made up of a group of coexisting elements.

To cut short this preamble, Mr. Speaker, let me say that a few years ago, just to tackle the subject—this very old but also, paradoxically very new and modern subject of abortion—would have been a matter of high treason or, for a Catholic, a kind of apostasy. But things have changed a lot, as hon. member should know. Individuals have changed, everyone in his own way. Today, it has become possible to comment openly on any historical or other event.

That is why I feel at liberty today to deal with a subject of controversy all over the world, that of abortion. But this is something that must be done. The best would be, as I said earlier, to take a quick sweeping glance at this burning issue.

Before discussing the problems facing us, we might perhaps have a look at artificial abortion, a practice which goes back as far as 4,600 years B.C. In those days, the reason for such a practice was to limit the number of children. Infanticide was sometimes practised, for the same reason.

The oldest known texts about abortion are those from Chaldea, and go back to 2,000 B.C. The Chaldeans had a penalty for the man who had beaten the daughter of a free man—as opposed to that of a slave—and who had messed up her innards. If the girl died, the daughter of the aggressor was put to death. Of course, penalties were always lighter when the woman was a slave.

In the eleventh century B.C. the Hittite code, in Assyria, provided a fine and flogging for a man responsible for the abortion of the daughter of a free man. If the husband had no other son, the aggressor was put to death. The woman who from her own free will, had committed abortion was impaled on a piece of wood and was denied a grave.

I tell you all this to show you the philosophy which has inspired all the countries in the world and led them to accept legislation on abortion.

There is no mention, in the Old Testament, of abortion practised intentionally.

The only reference made is to miscarriage: if men, while quarreling, knocked down a pregnant woman, thus causing a miscarriage, they were fined; the fine was decided upon by the husband of the woman—imagine that—and paid in front of the judges. In case of further accident the rule was: a life for a life, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, etc. In brief, the law of retaliation.

Egyptian texts do not show either any sign of prohibition.

In Gaul the woman is glorified. They are described as: "beautiful and well-proportioned, tall and fiercely brave, prolific mothers and excellent nurses, skilful in the fields and in gestation, sowing crops of children and wheat; in Gallic life they personified the ever-creating force while man was often simply the destroying force".

At the time the Gaul had the right of life and death over his wife and children—all the more that of destroying the unborn child.

Hippocrates, father of medical science, in his oath stated:

> I shall give poison to no one even upon request nor shall I take the initiative of such a suggestion; similarly I shall not give to any woman an abortion pessary.

However, Hippocrates went further and even advised midwives, giving them details of a preparation which could hasten the delivery of a child.

It must be noted that in Hipprocates' times, abortion was not punished since the foetus was not endowed with life.

A lot is still written today on the subject.

• (3:30 p.m.)

Athens followed the most ancient policy of democratically limiting population. Aristotle described this philosophy in these words:

> If a woman conceives beyond this determined number of times, she shall have to have an abortion before animation of the foetus, but it would be criminal to make an attempt on its life, as soon as it has received the breath of life.

Further on, Plato asked that abortion be made compulsory for women over 40. In ancient Rome, this type of abortion was widely practiced, but in a secret way.

About the end of the Republic and under the Empire, it seems that there was some craze for this type of abortion, which became then more and more frequent. It should be noted that in those days abortion on consent was not punished. As I said earlier, the foetus was part of its mother and there was no penalty as long as the child was embryonic or inanimated.

If we refer to those ancient times, Ovid stated that in Rome, women were considered as old at 25 or 30. Therefore, to keep their physical beauty and the nimbleness of their muscles, they should no longer conceive. They wanted to keep their bust young and attractive and their belly flat. However, the State reacted violently, and Cicero is quoted as saying:

> She is destroying the hopes of a father, the pillar of his name and his kind, the heir of his family and, for the Republic, a citizen to be.

He was then referring to a woman sentenced to death for abortion. In the light of the increasing popularity of abortion, severe measures were enforced but still that offence often went unpunished. We had to await the influence of Christianity to see the enactment, under Septimus Severus, 200 years after Christ, of severe repressive sanctions against the woman guilty of voluntary abortion, like death penalty, corporal punishment and temporary exile, because it would be outrageous for a women to deprive her husband of the hope of a posterity with impunity.

In the Middle Ages, Christianity, from the outset, was hostile to abortion. Foetus, as soon as it is conceived, is an immortal being, to stop pregnancy would then be tantamount to killing him without baptism.

Then, there was the era of Saint Thomas Aquinas and his master, Albertus Magnus, who both maintained that the soul was directly created by God, and that it was infused into the embryo, not on the day of conception, but when the embryo was formed enough to receive it.

In the 13th century, Pope Innocent III, in his encyclical letter Sicutex Litterarum, termed abortion of an animated foetus a homicide, but there was no mention of a lifeless foetus. Pope Gregory XIV, in his encyclical letter Sedes Apostolica, also excommunicated only those who were found guilty of abortion of a foetus, after the first movements of life had been felt in the womb of the mother, which is supposed to be on the 116th day of pregnancy.

Saint Alphonse of Ligori said, and I quote:

> Those who say that foetus is animated at the moment of conception are mistaken.

It seems that there were not only saints and popes who did not agree on the concept of life beginning at the moment of conception. Many pagans were also under the impression that life did not begin at the moment of conception.

Aristotle contended that the male or the man—this for those who would not understand—received a soul 40 days after conception, whereas the woman got one 80 days afterwards. I wonder why.

It was said that before such well-defined periods, there was only a kind of vegetative life. The Islamic law discriminated in the same way and stated that life began only 180 days after conception. A fine was the punishment for the provoked miscarriage of a non-viable foetus; the death penalty was the punishment for the expulsion of a viable foetus, whether it were alive or dead.

Let us recognize that current legislation is far from up to date.

Mr. Speaker, in the light of this historical review, we have realized that the question of abortion is not new, but has been a subject of public discussion since the most remote past.

As far as we are concerned in Canada today, let us say that the most important provision of the Canadian legislation on this matter is section 237 of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

> (1) Every one who, with intent to procure the miscarriage of a female person, whether or not she is pregnant, uses any means for the purpose of carrying out his intention is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for life.
> (2) Every female person who, being pregnant, with intent to procure her own miscarriage, uses any means or permits any means to be used for the purpose of carrying out her intention is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for two years.
> (3) In this section, "means" includes
> (a) the administration of a drug or other noxious thing,
> (b) the use of an instrument, and
> (c) manipulation of any kind.

The Criminal Code also imposes a penalty on whoever illegally provides or procures a drug or other noxious substance or an instrument to be used to provoke a miscarriage, when he is aware of this ultimate purpose. The Code goes even further and prohibits all publicity relating to such means, and I quote:

> —commits an offence who knowingly, without lawful justification or excuse offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of preventing conception or causing abortion or miscarriage.

In addition to the abortion offence, described in section 236, the legislator has provided another provision which deems it to be a criminal offence to kill an unborn child. This text differs from section 237 in that the latter prohibits illegal intervention while section 209 provides for the punishment of a person convicted of destroying a foetus. It is to be noted, however, that in subsection 2 of section 209 the legislator enters a reservation in respect of the principle outlined in the first subsection. This reservation is most important since it opens the door to legal therapeutic abortion in certain cases.

In the Canadian legislation as it is now, the so-called legal abortion rests on two essential conditions: it must be practised in good faith, and only if the continuance of pregnancy is an immediate danger to the mother's life. But anyone can do that. Today, the same thing applies to planning: medicine is therefore responsible for these things.

For several years, however, Canadian and British courts have been interpreting the reservation in subsection 209 (2) of our Criminal Code so that it is now generally accepted that to preserve the life of the mother, one does not have to wait until she is in immediate danger of death. In that connection, is there anyone responsible for the treatment of people, who can remain idle when bleeding is heavy and the mother's life is in serious danger before deciding to practise abortion, knowing that the mother is dying?

Those who never had such responsibilities may well speak of principles and theories, but if they had been through as much as those who are responsible for treating sick people, they would never have spoken as they did in the house and in the committee.

In the numerous cases which came before the courts, it was explained that preserving the woman's health meant preserving her physical as well as her mental health, because health is one and indivisible. It is not the absence of one thing.

Despite this liberal interpretation—I am not talking of the party—of the legislation, it is believed in various Canadian circles that this sole ground for legal abortion does not take into consideration today's realities and conditions.

According to certain medical associations in Canada, since nearly all abortions are prohibited by law, thousands of Canadian women may be prompted to resort to criminal abortion. Let me explain. In general, public opinion does not condemn abortions practised for reasonable motives—I would call them, to put my thought in concrete form, therapeutic abortions—as it was the case before. In fact, the main effect of the present act, as of the legislation that prohibits birth control advertising, is to establish class distinctions.

Well-to-do and well-informed women can usually get an abortion from a competent surgeon in sanitary and safe conditions, or even go to a country where abortion is legal; in Japan, for instance, it will cost her $2,000. She will remain in hospital there for a week, and on her return, everything is all right.

However, less fortunate women may have to resort to the services of dubious, illiterate, irresponsible quacks, whose methods will cause infection. It is estimated that in Canada up to 50,000 abortions are being performed yearly, and a great number of them result in death or in a serious disease.

And at this stage I must add that the passage of the legislation now before us, will not help to bring down the rate of criminal abortions. This is not a valid argument, because we know that the implementation of the bill will not bring about such a result. Indeed, it is not the purpose of this legislation. Its aim is to authorize therapeutic abortions.

At its annual conference in 1966, where the idea originated the Canadian Bar Association—passed a resolution proposing the legislation on abortion for three specific reasons, thus allowing doctors to perform abortion whenever they deem it absolutely necessary, without running the risk of being sued. This is the whole philosophy of the section on abortion and the general council of the Canadian Medical Association, numbering about 25,000 doctors, has already taken a similar stand and approved a recommendation regarding therapeutic abortions.

The two main professional groups: doctors and lawyers, who are most concerned with this problem in Canada agree on the need for reform and according to the Canadian Medical Association secretary, Dr. Peart, the council hopes that the recommendation will become law so that under certain circumstances, abortion may be authorized. Here are the circumstances referred to by the Canadian Medical Association:

Firstly, when abortion is procured by a qualified medical practitioner duly authorized, after consultation with a therapeutic abortion committee, appointed by a hospital, and subject to the approval of the latter.

Secondly, if such abortion is procured in the above mentioned circumstances in a public hospital of active treatment. Such an operation can only be performed in a suitable place.

Thirdly, if it is performed with the written consent of the patient and that of her husband or guardian, when the committee deems it advisable.

In addition of all cases where the life or the physical or mental health of the mother are in danger, the Canadian Bar Association would like to add two other grounds for legal abortion. Therefore, the resolution includes the following two reasons: when pregnancy is the result of a criminal offence rape or incest, and when there are high risks of physical or mental disability for the child. Under the present legislation, the victim of rape or incest cannot legally resort to abortion.

On January 24, 1966, a bill was introduced in the house and passed on first reading. Everybody knows that the purpose of that bill was to ratify, with the assent of both houses, a situation that courts had been accepting for several years, and to ensure some measure of protection against criminal proceedings taken against members of the medical profession who were responsible for performing such operations.

The bill does not extend the grounds upon which a pregnant woman may resort to abortion, but an interesting point is that it takes up again generally the Canadian Medical Association's recommendation, especially with respect to the conditions under which abortions must be performed.

Interruption of pregnancy under circumstances outlined in Bill No. C-150 was also included in the recommendation of the report submitted to the Board of Directors of the Ontario Medical Association by its therapeutic abortion committee, which was approved by the Board thereafter. It should be said however that this bill is not binding yet, that the matter is under consideration, and that it will be taken up again by the committee.

In the United States, between one million or one million and a half women are aborted every year, but only 8,000 would be eligible for legal abortion. About 5,000 women die every year as a result of illegal abortions.

But still more astonishing is the fact that 80 per cent of women applying for abortion are married women who have children and are still living with their husband.

According to a recent survey made in the United States, 71 per cent of the women wanted to see the law changed, that is, they were in favor of therapeutic abortion in some very specific cases. I shall not go into the details of penalties for illegal abortion in the United States. Suffice it to say that the law, in the State of New York, for instance—which is one of our neighbour states—is somewhat similar to ours.

As for the mental health of the mother, it is clear that the law will take it into account. However, in the United States and in Canada, the judgments passed on different cases have caused doctors to believe that sexual crimes—rape and incest—the victims of which are young girls, can provoke mental illnesses that would justify abortion.

Here again, it is not for me to go into the details, since it is a very complex subject which would require too many explanations. Let us say, however, that psychiatric causes have become more and more important in this field, at least during the last years, and that, in the United States at least, closer consultations between surgeons, doctors and psychiatrists seem to be the thing. That is why, in many cases, a doctor will make an operation with the advice of one of these doctors.

In any case, it seems that in the United States an important change of attitude is being felt and becomes more and more obvious in relation to this famous problem of abortion.

In England—we have often copied closely British laws—a bill was adopted on the 27th of October, 1967, and came into effect six months later. However, I must say that for us, Canadians, the bill on abortion that was adopted in England would be unacceptable.

In England, I believe, the penalty for such a crime was one of the harshest in the world. With this new legislation, however, Albion is going to be the most liberal of all countries, where abortion is concerned. Abortion can be granted for almost any purpose including cramped lodgings, poverty, inadequate salary, high salary, etc. that is the way the cookie crumbles nowadays in England. Good grief!

In France, the punishments inflicted for criminal abortion make a very long story. In the days of the galant Charlemagne, abortion was punished by death if the foetus had started moving. As you may observe, the same basic principle applies: when the foetus moved, the sentence was death; when the foetus was inanimate—the soul having not yet entered the body—the sentence was much more lenient.

Let us add—surely that will be remembered—that under the Vichy regime, even in the 20th Century, the death penalty was imposed on professional abortionists. Abortions were put on the same footing as sabotage and treason.

The law now in force in France is enunciated in section 317 of their penal code, and it reflects in substance an old article of that Napoleonic Code of 1810, which imposed imprisonment and hard labour as well on the woman as on the abortionist. That act was amended in 1864 to provide that, where an attempted abortion failed, neither the woman nor the agent who had obtained the instruments would be penalized. In 1920, new amendments were made and the words "for the sale" or "the putting on sale" of abortion drugs or instruments, even if they were not used or did not succeed, were added. The laws have become so awkward that today, in France, conservatism prevails in that field; there has been neither progress nor regress; it seems that the status quo is to be maintained. Some of the members in this house want to leave things as they are.

Still, it should be noted that although the original text of section 317 of the French penal code did not contain any provision on therapeutic abortion, a text was introduced in 1939 which reads as follows:

> When the life of the mother is seriously threatened and demands recourse to such therapy as might interrupt the pregnancy, the doctor in attendance must of necessity consult two of the doctors . . . who, after examination and discussion, will attest that the life of the mother can only be saved by means of such intervention—

That provision has been in force in France since 1939.

In spite of this, illegal abortions are still widespread in France. That is nothing new. However, public support seems to favour more liberal laws on abortion, although it has failed to alter the official position which still advocates restrictive laws and their strict application.

Germany substantially amended section 218, initially enacted by the 1871 Imperial Decrees of Germany which carried capital punishment for those involved in illegal abortion. The whole of that Imperial legislation was gradually amended, and with the emergence of Hitler and the Nazi party in 1933, the penalties for abortion were made extremely harsh to the extent of providing for capital punishment in 1943 if the guilty party "had continuously"—and pay attention to this—weakened the vigour of the German race. It was a matter of eugenics, and the Nazi system would not allow abortion except for therapeutic reasons, which was for the first time legally recognized in Germany. And those new reasons were limited to the safeguard of the mother's life or health, and to reasons of eugenics which the new courts had to apply in connection with the "hereditary health".

One can see that almost everywhere in the world, legislation such as the bill before us has been enacted long before we are asked to do so. This bill takes into account the circumstances of our Canadian society and it does not include reasons of eugenics or merely social and economic reasons as is the case in England.

At the end of the war, the Control Commission legislation replaced the German Criminal Code, and capital punishment was abolished, while the therapeutic abortion was retained. But except for those changes, the general provisions of the 1926 legislation, as I said earlier, were restored.

We may say that theoretically Switzerland also has its legislation on abortion. It is considered a criminal offence involving a prison term. However section 120 of the Criminal Code allows therapeutic abortion when it is necessary to save the life of the mother or when her health is threatened. But for the last 15 years the number of abortion legally induced on women, Swiss or foreign (mainly French women), seems to have increased considerably owing to the large number of women coming from foreign countries and to the abuses resulting from that situation, in certain hospitals and clinics in Switzerland. For a few years there has been a tendency to give a very narrow interpretation of the legislation particularly of the section relating to the danger for the woman's health.

In the Soviet Union, let us say that the history of legalized abortion has been marked by two sudden changes of attitude by the government. Around 1936, Russian doctors began to denounce some undesirable secondary effects of abortions. Therefore, the Russian government reversed its stand on two occasions. Nowadays, this is rather fantastic. While abortions, even for therapeutic reasons, were prohibited and all grounds for abortion were restricted, divorces became more and more difficult to obtain. Under Stalin, as we all know, it was sought to increase the population. All remaining laws were then abolished.

However, it is interesting to note that twenty years later, in November 1955, the Soviet Union, following a further change in attitude, established for the second time an extensive program of legal abortions. But we are told that such operations are still being frowned upon.

Sweden, the promoter of several experiences in the field of social reform, was in 1938 the first Scandinavian country to pass a legislation on abortion, the liberal provisions of which took up most of the recommendations made in 1935.

It is needless to refer also to the legislation in Japan which is too vague. It is especially based on eugenics.

Mr. Speaker, I have tried to give a general outline of the history of abortion throughout the world. I did so for the following reason: Every country in the world has sooner or later in its history passed some pieces of legislation, often strict and at times too lenient, but most of the time, those countries have returned to a happy medium, to a fair sense of proportion, which is exactly what Canada is now advocating today under Bill C-150.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the next speaker is called, who I believe will be the member for Winnipeg North, (Mr. Orlikow), could we have an understanding on the plans for today? I have spoken to the chief government whip and he sees no objection to continuing this debate instead of having private members hour, in order to have one or two more speeches.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): Is it agreed that we waive the hour reserved for private members business and proceed with the order now under debate.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): I want to excuse myself to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow). I have an appointment at four o'clock. My parliamentary secretary will listen to the hon. member's speech and I will read it. I hope the hon. member will not interpret my absence as an affront.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, this bill was proposed in its original form by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) when he was the Minister of Justice, and is now being brought forward by the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). This bill has been depicted to members of parliament, the press, radio, television and the public of Canada as a revolutionary bill, a bill to bring the criminal law into the second half of the twentieth century.

This bill includes sections which are improvements that will begin to modernize the Criminal Code, but to suggest that it is indeed very radical is to misread the entire bill. The bill fails to deal with some of the most important matters which the Prime Minister proposed in his Charter of Human Rights when he met with the provincial premiers in February of 1968. This bill, Mr. Speaker, is brought forward by a Liberal government which people expect to be progressive, expect to be liberal with a small "l". It does not meet the recommendations of the royal commission appointed by the Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bertrand, when he was the minister of justice, the first report of which was brought forward this week.

Those of us who do not come from Quebec have been trained, or I might say brainwashed, to believe that the Liberals are really liberal, with a small "l", and that the Union Nationale represents those conservatives with a small "c" who hold reactionary views when it comes to social matters. Yet if one compares the recommendations in this first report of the royal commission with this bill we are dealing with today, one can see how small the steps, how picayune the proposals being put forward in this bill by this Liberal government.

I would like to quote from today's Globe and Mail in which some main thoughts of the Quebec royal commission are summarized.

• (4:00 p.m.)

The article reads:

> The report said Quebec does not have an overall justice policy and calls for basic reforms of laws and law enforcement so as to purge the province's system of justice of its tendency to be repressive rather than rehabilitative.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what this newspaper says about Quebec is true of our system of justice in every part of Canada.

> The commission report rejected as retrograde the prevailing practice in which punitive aspects of the law take precedence over the possibility of rehabilitation.

That is true not only of Quebec but of every other province in the country. Here are some of the things I commend to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and the government because they are not even mentioned in these omnibus amendments to the Criminal Code:

> Abolition of the bail system, or if that is not possible, a reform which would allow a person to go free while awaiting trial with only a pledge to forfeit a certain sum if he does not show up for his trial;

That has been proposed by a number of hon. members but obviously it is missing from these draft amendments.

> A new system of fines which would take the income of the accused into account and which would allow him to make payments on an instalment basis rather than in a lump sum.

The hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has talked about the difficulties which Indians have. Hundreds of Indians go to jail because they cannot pay the $15 or $25 fine which the judge metes out as a sentence. This proposal would give them the chance, which most other citizens of Canada have, of avoiding a jail term.

> The separation of the process of delivering verdicts and handing out of sentences so that judges would continue to pass judgment, but sentences would be imposed by panels of social scientists using the possibility of rehabilitation as a criterion;

Is there anything like that in this omnibus bill? Of course there isn't. When you compare the proposals of this government with the proposals of a Commission appointed buy a Union Nationale government, you can see that this government's proposals are far from being very radical or very revolutionary.

The Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) proposals to the provincial governments, contained in his Charter of Human Rights, were greeted with great approval by the press and T.V. media. There was a great deal of merit in them. Some of us realize that to implement his Charter of Human Rights would require an amendment to the constitution and that such an amendment cannot be obtained without the unanimous consent of the provinces. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, that consent has not yet been forthcoming and I doubt that it will be forthcoming in the near future.

The idea of entrenching the basic human rights and freedoms of Canadian citizens in a Bill of Rights is not a new idea. It was proposed years ago by the former prime minister, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). It was proposed by the former Dean of the Law Faculty at McGill, Professor Frank Scott, and by many other people, but we have not yet been able to achieve that objective.

What were some of the things which the Prime Minister proposed in his Charter of Human Rights and which, because of the objections of some of the provinces, have not yet been implemented? I will quote from some of the press comments at the time. I read from the Ottawa Citizen of February 2, 1968:

> An accused person's right to a lawyer during police interrogation would be established by the proposed constitutional Bill of Rights.
> The judicial ruling now accepted is that even where counsel is denied, evidence obtained during questioning is admissible.
> Not only would the new proposal outlaw the admission of such evidence in a criminal trial but would invalidate convictions "if they cannot stand in the absence of inadmissible evidence."
> Even now a person taken into custody has the right to remain silent. But many persons do not know it and often make admissions to police which might not be made if a lawyer was present during questioning.

Many members of parliament have spoken in other debates about the fact that we have one law for the rich and one law for the poor. There is no question that people who have money can afford a lawyer. There is no question that they usually know they are entitled to have a lawyer. There is no question that professional criminals know that they have a right to a lawyer and will refuse to be questioned by police until their lawyer is present. But, Mr. Speaker, there are thousands of ordinary citizens who have never been in trouble with the law previously and they do not know their rights. In many cases when they are questioned by police admissions of guilt are obtained which probably would not be obtained if they had counsel present. That goes on all the time. Let me refer to just two cases that come to mind.

I am thinking of the case of Steven Truscott. It is not my intention today to discuss the guilt or innocence of Steven Truscott but to my knowledge there has not been one challenge of the facts related by Mrs. LeBourdais in her book. She states that when the police came to the conclusion Steven Truscott, a boy of 13 or 14 years of age, might be implicated in the rape and murder which they were investigating, they came to his house. His parents were not present. They took him to the police station and they began to question him.

Some time later his parents came home and found that he had been taken to the police station. They went to the police station and there they were told to wait in an anteroom. The police questioned that boy, who was later charged with murder and rape, for five or six hours without legal counsel being present. I suggest that is a perversion of the most elementary right to justice which any person in Canada has.

I have here a quotation from a column by Ron Haggart in the Toronto Star of July 27, 1966, discussing the case of two girls, one of them a resident of Ottawa. I do not know whether her parents are voters in the constituency of the Minister of Justice or in the constituency of the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith), but they may well be.

This girl and another girl were before a magistrate on a charge of vagrancy. As usually happens in a magistrate's court they had no counsel. I would like the Solicitor General to listen as I read just about ten lines from the transcript of the case to show how the magistrate conducted the so-called trial. I think in fairness I should mention that the magistrate was Magistrate D. F. Graham, and that the case was heard in Toronto on May 31, 1966. Here is part of the transcript:

Magistrate: You have a family in Ottawa; are you prepared to get on the bus and get back to Ottawa?

Ann: No. I can get a job.

Magistrate: You haven't got a job, that is the point.

Ann: Yes I have.

Magistrate: Are you prepared to stay with the Salvation Army for a week?

Ann: Why?

Magistrate: Because I say so, that is why. We are not going to have you girls come to the city—

Ann: Well—

Magistrate: Listen to me when I am talking! I don't have to listen to you, do you understand? I am not your father and I am not somebody on the street, I am the magistrate in charge of this court and you have two choices—to do what you are told, or go to jail, do you understand that? That is your position now. Evidently you were wandering about without any home.

I suggest two things in this regard. First of all, that kind of talk by a legal officer of a court is the kind of talk one might expect in Fascist Germany or Communist Russia. I suggest further that no magistrate would dare use that kind of language if the person appearing before him were represented by counsel. Yet that kind of thing goes on all the time. I believe the government should have included in this omnibus bill a section to deal with the right to counsel.

I am interested in this subject. Several years ago the United States Supreme Court went into this question in great detail. A ruling was brought down which spelled out the right of every person to counsel. This right to counsel did not apply only to appearance in court but to the period during which a person may be interrogated by the police. My colleague the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) had a member of his firm draft a bill which would spell out this right. I have placed a notice on the Order Paper in respect of that bill. I suggest that the Minister of Justice look at that bill. It is Bill C-189, an act to amend the Canada Evidence Act. I will read one of the relevant clauses:

54. No statement shall be admissible in evidence against its author in any criminal proceeding if such statement was made while its author was in the custody of a person in authority unless prior to making such statement its author was duly warned by a person in authority that

(i) he was not obliged to make any statement, and

(ii) if he voluntarily chose to make a statement, it would be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence and,

[Mr. Orlikow.]

(iii) he was entitled to counsel and that if he could not afford counsel, one would be assigned to act on his behalf if he so desired.

It is not a very complicated subject. If this government means what it has been saying, if it really believes in a just society, I suggest that this bill should include the basic right of every citizen in this country to have counsel. That provision ought to be implemented now, not later as the Minister of Justice suggested it might be.

There is another important clause which I think is omitted from this omnibus bill; that is a clause assuring the right of every citizen to privacy. This clause should prohibit, if not completely at least except under very stiff conditions set forth in the law, wiretapping and electronic surveillance. The Prime Minister, in the brief which he submitted following his publication of this charter on human rights spelled out such a provision. I should like to quote from the Ottawa Citizen of February 2, 1968:

The right of the citizen to privacy from snooping would be included in a draft for a Canadian Charter of Human Rights, Justice Minister Trudeau told reporters.

The same thing is spelled out in detail in the Charter on Human Rights. The Prime Minister made clear that he is opposed to wiretapping. This subject has been discussed in this house and outside this house recently. There is now no question that wiretapping goes on in this country fairly extensively. Recently an article appeared as a supplement to the Canadian Bar Review in which this fact was spelled out. The article by Stanley Beck listed cases in respect of which there was complete evidence that wiretapping had been carried on. Also there was the inquiry by the royal commission in Vancouver, B.C. which revealed evidence that wiretapping had been carried on by a private investigator who was recommended by officials of the R.C.M.P. to the person who wanted the wiretapping done. When the royal commission wanted to bring before it witnesses from the R.C.M.P. in Vancouver, the Solicitor General forbade their appearance using the official Secrets Act as his reason for not permitting the members of the R.C.M.P. to appear. This is a fact which I am sure cannot and will not be disputed by anybody who knows that has happened.

There was wiretapping in Saskatoon. Some years ago, as reported in the Saskatoon Star Phoenix, evidence was produced that the only telephone that people incarcerated in the town jail could use had been tapped to permit the police to listen in on their conversations. The police would, of course, be able to hear the telephone call which the prisoner might make to his lawyer in which he might make the most incriminating admissions. Then, there are the recent cases in Toronto, including the case in which one or more magistrates were investigated on the basis of evidence obtained because the police had been listening to the telephone calls of a man they suspected of being involved with the underworld. This was done not for one hour or one day but for two months. For two months, the police had been listening to the telephone calls of Victor Alexander. It was on that basis they obtained information in respect of the magistrate or magistrates who were later put on the carpet.

It may be that wiretapping and electronic surveillance is necessary. I am not a lawyer and I have never been a policeman. It seems to me, however, that it is the duty of the police, the attorneys-general of the provinces, the minister of justice, or the Solicitor General of this government, if electronic surveillance and wiretapping is necessary to combat crime, not to ignore what has been happening. The way to do it is to write into the law exactly what they want. If we want to give the police the right to wiretap, then let us say so in the law. If we want to put limitations on that right and say before the police can listen in on somebody's telephone line they must get an order from a supreme court judge, a judge of the county court or a magistrate, and state the reasons, then let us say so. If we want to follow the example of Great Britain where the police must go to the Home Secretary and explain exactly why they want this right, then let us do it in that way. I say that it seems incomprehensible that we would permit wiretapping to take place. It is not only the police who are engaged in wiretapping. Industrial espionage goes on every day of the week.

Drug companies spy on other drug companies and oil companies spy on other oil companies. I am told that wiretapping is used frequently by one of the parties to a marriage who may want a divorce in order to get evidence against his or her partner. This is the kind of thing that goes on and these are the invasions of privacy against which the Prime Minister has spoken so eloquently and frequently. That being the case, why is there no clause in this bill either outlawing wiretapping or defining the conditions under which it can be carried out?

I suggest to the Minister of Justice that if his officials are having difficulty in drafting such a measure he should consult with the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. Stanbury). If he is not talking to him these days he should look at Bill C-24 which is entitled "An act to amend the Criminal Code (Control of electronic eavesdropping and wiretapping)". This bill was submitted by the hon. member for York-Scarborough and given first reading in this house on September 20.

I am not one who is particularly suspicious of motives. I do not believe that the hon. member for York-Scarborough was anything but sincere in respect of this question when he proposed this bill. I do not believe for a moment that this hon. member, who has spoken in and out of this house about the inequities of wiretapping, did not really mean what he said. I am sure he is really disappointed that the basic principle contained in this bill does not appear in the form of a clause in the omnibus bill. I have news for the Minister of Justice and the hon. member for York-Scarborough. We believe the hon. member's bill is so good that at the appropriate time we propose to move an amendment to add an additional clause to this omnibus bill which will be based on the basic principle contained in Bill C-24. I hope when we move that amendment the hon. member for York-Scarborough and the Prime Minister will be here so that they will be able to vote for that amendment. We are going to give them a chance to put their votes where their mouths are.

I should like to speak about something else contained in the Charter of Human Rights about which the Prime Minister spoke so eloquently and which is conspicuously absent from this bill. Let me quote again from an article reporting on the Prime Minister's briefing in respect of the charter of human rights. This article appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on February 2, 1968 and it reads:

> The main additional legal right proposed in the government's white paper would be a guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures.
> "At present in Canada" the white paper stated, "evidence obtained not only by means of an unreasonable search but by actual illegal means (theft, for example) is generally admissible in the courts.

There are many people who are much more knowledgeable in the law than I who could, and I am sure will, give precedents for this.

One of the main cases in connection with wiretapping involved this principle. The police in Toronto had a search warrant and went into a house to make a legal search. While they were there they installed a listening device. They listened in on conversations which took place in that house during a period of 24 hours and they illegally obtained evidence which they used to charge and convict an individual. The judges were disturbed but they ruled that even though the evidence had been obtained illegally it was proper to use it in the courts in order to convict that man.

The United States Supreme Court has very clearly ruled that evidence obtained illegally cannot be used to prosecute a person in court. I suggest that kind of a clause ought to be included in this omnibus bill. Such proposal was made by the present Prime Minister when he was the minister of justice, and it ought to be in this bill.

Following a federal-provincial conference at which there was no agreement that we should proceed with a constitutional amendment, the Prime Minister was asked whether he would consider carrying out those things he had enunciated by amending the Criminal Code. He said he would prefer not to because it would be much better to put them into the constitution. I agree with that, but it may be another ten, fifteen or twenty years before the provinces will agree to a Charter of Human Rights. I suggest that the time to do something is now. Let me commend to the Minister of Justice that slogan used so effectively for so many years by the national employment service in respect of winter works. Every winter we saw on billboards across the country the message, "Why wait till spring, do it now".

In introducing this bill the other day, the Minister of Justice said that at some later date he would be prepared to bring in a bill to implement some of the things to which I have referred. There is no reason for waiting. The matters I have raised have been discussed for a long time in legal circles, in parliaments and in legislatures. There is no reason for delaying; we ought to do this now.

In the few minutes left to me today, I should like to deal briefly with one or two very controversial matters supposedly dealt with in this bill, and about which there has been a good deal of discussion both inside and outside this house. I am sure there will be a lot more discussion as this debate continues about abortion and homosexuality.

It is not my desire today or at any other time to question the rights of those people who disagree with the provisions of this bill or with me when I say I do not think it goes far enough, I think they have every right, as does every Canadian, to reject the proposals of this bill on the basis of religion, morals or codes of ethics. Every Canadian should have the right to make up his mind on these questions and base his judgment on conscience. I respect anyone for doing so.

It seems to me that the present proposal on abortion will do very little. I wish the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) were here because I should like to pose a practical question which in all likelihood can only be answered by a doctor. The figures I have seen concerning the number of illegal abortions performed in Canada each year are fantastic. They vary from a low of 75,000 to a high of 300,000 per year. I do not suppose anybody knows the actual number, but it is certainly large.

Let us suppose a young girl of 15 or 16 found herself pregnant. Let us suppose also that this part of the bill is made law. If that girl went to one, two or three doctors, whatever the law requires, and said that she was pregnant, that she would have to stay at home or meet the scorn of her schoolmates and the community which would have an adverse effect upon her health, do you really think that the one, two or three doctors would feel they had the authority under this law to approve the legal abortion? I do not think so. Will a married woman of 43 or 45 who has two or three children in their upper teens and suddenly finds she is pregnant, who feels that she really is not physically or psychologically equipped at that age to have another child, be able to get a doctor or two doctors, on the basis of the danger to her health physically or mentally, to approve a legal abortion? I doubt it.

It seems to me, therefore, that much of the debate we are having in this chamber on the question of abortion is to a large extent theoretical and irrelevant. A large number of abortions have been performed legally every year for many years, as other members of parliament have said, by very well qualified doctors, in the best hospitals in every city in Canada. These will continue. There have also been thousands of illegal abortions. I believe that this provision which, if we pass it will become the law, will not change the actual situation one iota.

There has been a good deal of discussion about homosexuality. Maybe the very fact that we can discuss it openly is a sign that people in Canada are finally beginning to face up to the realities of life. We can think what we want about it. We can agree with the old fashioned people who say that it is unnatural, it is a perversion or whatever you want to call it; or we can take the view of the most permissive, the most understanding, modern psychiatrists. The fact is that, like it or not, homosexuality does exist.

Will the proposal in this bill really change anything? I am no expert, but I commend to the Minister of Justice a book which came out in the last week or so, "Sexual Deviations in the Criminal Law." This book was commissioned by the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry, probably the largest and most influential institute of its type in Canada. It was written by Alex K. Gigeroff. What does this book say? It says that a study of 60 prosecutions which took place in one year in Toronto, of people accused of homosexual acts, showed that 59 of those prosecutions would not have been affected at all by this change in the law. Why? Because all the offences were committed in public places, in parks and other places. I do not have to go into that. In fact, under the law as it stands now we have not been prosecuting people and finding them guilty of homosexual acts committed between adults in private. Therefore, I do not believe this change in the Criminal Code will really do very much. It may take away from those people who are homosexuals the fear they may be blackmailed. I cannot see any other effect that this change in the law will have. That is very important, certainly. But again I say that this clause of the omnibus bill, which has been greeted by so many people as being a really forward-looking piece of legislation which will change, if not the mores the attitude of the Canadian people to something that has been going on, I suppose since the dawn of time, really will not mean very much.

My time is almost up, Mr. Speaker. I want to finish by urging the government and the Minister of Justice not to take the attitude which I think they are going to take, namely, that this bill contains everything which this parliament and the Canadian people are willing and ready to accept. I say to the Minister of Justice that the people of Canada, perhaps not the police or the R.C.M.P., are prepared to accept a law which will prohibit or at least limit wire-tapping in this country. The magistrates may not like it.

I remember recently a Toronto magistrate complaining in court that it was three o'clock in the afternoon and he still had half of his cases to hear; that before the Ontario bar and the Ontario government provided legal aid he would have disposed of all his cases before lunch. He was complaining bitterly. I am not too worried about the magistrate. I think the people of Canada would welcome a section in the Criminal Code which would spell out the right of every citizen to have counsel.

I finish on this note, Mr. Speaker. I think the people of Canada are ready to be at least as progressive as the citizens of the United States, who have said to their Supreme Court that evidence obtained illegally cannot be used to prosecute and convict a person accused of having committed a crime. I commend these thoughts and principles to the Minister of Justice. I hope that before we have concluded this discussion he will bring in amendments implementing these three points which were promised by the Prime Minister when he was minister of justice. We have a right to at least expect that the Prime Minister will implement the promises which he made to the people of Canada.

Mr. Colin D. Gibson (Hamilton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, it is with pride that I rise to speak in support of the omnibus bill, a bill which represents the first major revision of the Criminal Code in many years. The remarks made by the previous speaker about eavesdropping and wire-tapping legislation are, I submit, really irrelevant in a discussion of this bill. I commend to that member the wisdom of the Minister of Justice who is treading extremely carefully, with caution and research, into this complicated and difficult problem.

This problem involves electronics; it does not merely involve rules of evidence. It requires the control of electronic equipment, something that should not be hastily thrown into a complicated bill such as this amending the Criminal Code. I commend the Minister of Justice for wisdom and sagacity in not acceding to a last-minute attempt to pile this question into a bill which will require considerable attention, in detail, in the justice committee of this house. Already we have many sections of a long, carefully studied, brilliantly thought out statute to consider at the committee stage.

It is my sincere belief that while the legislation referred to by the last speaker is desirable, it requires more careful consideration and deliberation among the attorneys general of the provinces and the Attorney General of Canada (Mr. Turner). I heartily endorse this bill and urge the members of the house to vote in favour of it. It brings into effect many badly needed humanitarian reforms in the spirit of the just society.

• (4:40 p.m.)

It was inspired by our brilliant Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and drafted under his supervision when he was Minister of Justice. It was endorsed by the people during the last election and I therefore submit it is ready for serious consideration in committee, then speedy adoption.

The hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) suggested yesterday that the bill be split. Splitting of hairs is not desirable. Many of the provisions in this legislation have already been studied by a committee of this house and I therefore consider that making those provisions the subject of separate reports could lead only to delay in their implementation. I am pleased the house has decided to leave the bill as one unit for discussion. I anticipate, with respect, that there will be unanimous agreement in the committee on many of these issues and that the controversial matters for consideration will be restricted to three or four only. These, it is true, will require time for patient study, and I am sure they will receive it in this house.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow) complained that we on this side were delaying matters. The opposite is true. Speaking as one who has had 18 years of trial experience in the courts I believe, as, I am sure do other hon. members, that the wire tapping aspects of this legislation should be given careful consideration and that the necessary time should be accorded to such a study.

I commend the Minister of Justice on the able manner in which he spoke yesterday outlining the bill. In discussing some of the provisions I should first like to refer to the proposals in connection with firearms. I believe these provisions relating to firearms and defensive weapons will lead to a greater measure of public safety for the Canadian people. These are times of turmoil and strife, and it is a fact of life that assemblies and riots can take place unexpectedly, in unexpected quarters. I submit the wisdom and leadership shown by the Minister of Justice in bringing down this forward-looking piece of legislation is particularly apropos at this time.

[Mr. Gibson.]

With respect to driving offences, the spirit of the legislation before the house is summed up by the principle "if you drink, don't drive." The hazards of modern highways compel the exercise of strong control over drinking drivers. The government has had the courage to move in this direction. The presence in the bloodstream of .08 per cent of alcohol will henceforth be considered evidence of impairment. This is tough law, but it is realistic 20th century law in an age when cars are one of mankind's greatest dangers.

With respect to the question of conscience which a number of hon. members have raised, I submit it is hypocritical for anyone to suggest that this bill, or certain aspects of it, should be subject to a free vote. The Canadian people have already endorsed this legislation and it would be a mockery of democracy if the government were to wash its hands of responsibility and say: we shall leave this question to the consciences of individual members. The conscience of the people will be satisfied when the government carries out the mandate which was given to it on June 25 to bring in this forward looking legislation as speedily as possible.

In any event, I feel confident that most members of the house will support at least the greater part of the provisions contained in this omnibus bill. With respect to the proposals concerning abortion, I commend the Minister of Justice for introducing the provision that when the life or health of the woman concerned is in danger, abortion may legally be carried out. I feel strongly that the woman should be in control of this situation. I would go further, myself, and allow abortion on consent. However, I am prepared to support this bill as an important step forward toward the just society. I believe the bill is humanitarian in spirit and in fact, and that this country will be a greater country once this legislation has been passed.

Another significant amendment deals with harassing telephone calls. I am sure almost every member of parliament will be glad to see this clause enacted. The subject of cruelty to animals is also dealt with. These provisions appeal to the hearts as well as to the minds of all Canadian people and represent a forward step. The proposed restrictions on the publication of evidence adduced at preliminary inquiries bring to mind a number of trials which have been spoilt by injudicious publicity in the press.

In the past, great injustice has been caused to individuals by the adverse effect of such publicity. The steps now taken to deal with this situation represent a great advance. I feel the government party is virtually united in connection with all these provisions, and we seek speedy implementation of them.

Mr. Bell: Well, Mr. Speaker, it has been a long week, particularly when one thinks of that Wednesday night session, and hon. members, including myself, seem to be a little tired. I wonder whether Your Honour could say it is five o'clock and I could move the adjournment of the debate?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Richard): It being five o'clock this house now stands adjourned until 2 p.m. on Monday and I wish hon. members an enjoyable and less wet weekend.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The same to you, sir.

At five o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, January 27, 1969

The house met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PROCEDURE

FILING OF NOTICE ON DAY SITTING IS SUSPENDED—RULING BY MR. SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: As hon. members know, last Thursday the government house leader announced the anticipated order of business for this week and, in accordance with his forecast, Wednesday and Thursday were set aside for the purpose of considering an opposition motion.

A question of procedure has arisen in that under a special order of the house the sitting is suspended tomorrow, Tuesday, January 28, in order to enable hon. members to participate in the work of the various standing committees.

Subsection 4(a) of Standing Order 58 provides as follows:

> Twenty-four hours' written notice shall be given of an opposition motion on an allotted day or of a notice to oppose any item in the estimates.

The question that has arisen is whether or not the notice referred to in the Standing Order can be filed on a day when the sitting of the house is suspended. In my opinion it is open to hon. members to file their notices tomorrow or, indeed, on any day when the sitting of the house is suspended as distinct from being adjourned. I would advance the following reasons for adopting this attitude.

In the first place, the Standing Order itself states that 24 hours written notice shall be given. A similar provision is also to be found in subsection 5 of standing order 75 for the filing of notice of amendments to be considered at the report stage of bills. It seems to me it should be open to hon. members to file notices of their questions for the order paper and notices of motions or bills they may have in mind; and, generally, it should also be open to the government to file their notices without losing the day. There is also the desirability of placing hon. members' questions on the order paper, so that it may be circulated to the various government departments concerned without unnecessary loss of time.

In reaching this conclusion I would make the general observation that the house is not in adjournment; its sitting is merely suspended so that hon. members may attend to their committee responsibilities.

In order to conform with the proposed changes Votes and Proceedings will be printed tomorrow in a revised format. There will be no order paper on Tuesday, but Wednesday's order paper and Hansard will be renumbered to reflect the new procedure.

HUMAN RIGHTS

COMMISSION TO ENSURE COMPLETE EQUALITY OF TREATMENT

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-161, respecting Human Rights.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): This act applies to every person engaged in any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada. Its purpose is to ensure him complete equality of treatment as a person regardless of race, creed, colour, sex, nationality, ancestry or place of origin, whether in employment, in residential or business accommodation or in access to other facilities or services customarily available to the public.

This act is designed to further, in Canada, the Declaration of Human Rights determined by the United Nations and marked by Human Rights Year in 1968.

A human rights commission should be set up to administer this act. It should consist of two divisions, one to consider complaints and studies on the basis of sex, the second on the basis of the other listed headings. However, as it is not within the rights of a private member to propose measures involving government expenditures, such a proposal cannot be included in this act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

Question No. 760—Mr. Howard (Skeena):

Questions

CRIMINAL CODE—PRESSURE RESPECTING BILL

Question No. 789—Mr. Matte:

1. Are any organizations exerting pressure upon the government to promote adoption of the omnibus bill?

2. If so, what are the names of these organizations?

3. On which of the three points, homosexuality, divorce or abortion, are the pressures strongest?

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): 1. No. A number of submissions have been received from various organizations expressing either support for or opposition to particular provisions of Bill C-195 which was given first reading on December 21, 1967.

2. Examples of organizations which supported in principle the provisions of that Bill relating to drinking and driving are: Greater Winnipeg Safety Council; Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police; Royal Automobile Club of Canada; Corporation of the City of Winnipeg; Resolution of Legislature of Province of Manitoba; Manitoba Medical Association; Saskatoon Committee for Better Legislation re Driver Impairment; Women's Auxiliary of the Alcohol Research and Education Council; Ontario Women's Christian Temperance Union; Alcohol Education Service (Manitoba); Saskatchewan Conference of the United Church of Canada; Ontario Temperance Federation; United Church Women (Hamilton Conference); Saskatoon Central Women's Christian Temperance Union; Lutheran Ministerial Association of Saskatoon; Robert E. Malkin, Vancouver.

An organization which supported the provisions of Bill C-195 relating to homosexuality is the Religious Society of Friends, Vancouver Monthly Meeting.

Examples of organizations which made submissions in regard to abortion are: Emergency Organization for the Defence of Unborn Children, Toronto; Medical Students Society, McGill University; Ontario Women's Christian Temperance Union; Foyers Notre-Dame Canadiens, Montreal; Knights of Columbus (various regions across Canada); Filles d'Isabelle (various regions in Quebec); L'Association feminine d'Education et d'Action Social, Montreal; Association for the Modernization of Canadian Abortion Laws, Ottawa; Catholic Women's League of Canada (various regions across Canada); Ontario English Catholic Teachers' Association; Le Club de L'Age d'Or de Longueuil, Quebec; Sisters of St. Joseph, Ottawa (supporting brief of Catholic Bishops of Canada); Ottawa Committee for the Defence of Unborn Children, Ottawa; Mouvement des Femmes Chretiennes (various regions across Canada); Canadian Abortion Law Reform Association, London, Ontario; L'Association Feminine de l'Union Nationale du comte de Sherbrooke, Sherbrooke, P.Q.; Association des Bureaux Medicaux des Hopitaux de la Province de Quebec Inc., Montreal (various local councils); Le Groupe d'Action Catholique Rurale de St-Boniface, P.Q.; Association des Parents Catholiques, St. Romuald, Levis, P.Q.; Martha Circle, Knox Presbyterian Church, Ottawa; University Women's Club, Edmonton, Alberta; Saskatchewan Council of Catholic Nurses; Board of Evangelism and Social Service, United Church of Canada, Toronto; Hull-Gatineau Action Committee Against Abortion; Humanist Association of Canada, Montreal; The Pentacostal Assemblies of Canada, Toronto; Mouvement des Travailleurs Chretiens, Secteur de Grand-Mere, Grand-Mere, P.Q.; Federation de l'A.F.E.A.S. de Nicolet & St. Malo, P.Q.; Alliance for Life, Hull, P.Q.

Examples of organizations which made submissions in regard to the provisions of Bill C-195 relating to firearms are: Shooting Federation of Canada; The Dominion of Canada Rifle Association; The Canadian Wildlife Federation; Canadian Affiliation of Gun Owners; Ontario Revolver Association; Quebec Handgun Association; Alberta Arms and Cartridge Collectors Association; South Vancouver Island Rangers, Inc.; Canadian Historical Arms Society; Nova Scotia Handgun Association; New Brunswick Rifle Association; British Columbia Wildlife Federation; Manitoba Provincial Handgun Association and various local shooting and game and fish organizations.

3. Divorce was not dealt with in Bill C-195. More submissions were received in regard to the matter of abortion than in regard to the matter of homosexuality.

ALOUETTE 1 CANADIAN SPACE SATELLITE

Question No. 878—Mr. Schreyer:

1. What was the cost of construction of the Alouette I Canadian space satellite and what was its launching cost as paid to NASA?

2. What was the total cost of construction of Alouette II and of this amount, how much was paid to private contractors and to whom?

3. What was the cost of launching Alouette II?

4. What was the cost of Canada's purchasing a 3½% interest in INTELSAT and since 1964 has Canada spent additional sums in this venture?

5. If so, how much?

6. What was the cost of construction of the Canadian communications ground receiving station at Mill Village, Nova Scotia?

7. Does Canada receive any revenue from renting any of the foregoing facilities to domestic or foreign corporations?

8. If so, how much in each case?

Hon. Eric W. Kierans (Postmaster General): 1. The construction of the Alouette I satellite cost $3,100,000.

The U.S.A. paid for the launching of Alouette I; hence the Canadian government does not know the precise cost; but it is estimated at about $9,500,000.

2. The total cost of construction of the Alouette II satellite was $3,932,400, of which $1,206,000 was paid to private contractors. The prime contractor was RCA Victor, Montreal with DeHavilland Aircraft Ltd. of Toronto as associate contractor.

3. The U.S.A. paid for the launching of Alouette II, hence the precise cost of the launching of Alouette II is not known to the Canadian government but it is estimated at about $10,500,000.

4. Based on original estimates of $200,000,000 U.S., as made by the parties to the agreement signed at Washington on August 20, 1964, Canada's 3.5 per cent investment share in INTELSAT could increase to $7,000,000 U.S., depending on the capital requirements for the system as it evolves. Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation is Canada's designated operating entity and its investment in the project as at September 30, 1968, amounted to $4,025,484 Canadian.

5. See answer above.

6. Construction costs of the experimental communications satellite earth station at Mill Village amounts to $11,785,240.95.

7. Yes, to a foreign entity, namely, the Communication Satellite Corporation, Washington, D.C.

8. As a temporary measure, pending the introduction of a new earth station in the U.S.A. which is now completed and the launching of a further satellite over the Atlantic Ocean in the near future, Canadian Overseas Telecommunication Corporation, which has custody of the station, is leasing facilities at Mill Village to the Communications Satellite Corporation of the U.S. and, up to September 30, 1968, received rental on that account amounting to $1,602,800 Canadian.

*CAPITAL MURDERS SINCE PASSAGE OF MEASURE

Question No. 938—Mr. Fairweather:

Since the Criminal Code amendment abolishing capital punishment for a five year trial period was assented to 21 December, 1967 (a) how many capital murders have been committed in Canada (b) how many persons have been sentenced to life imprisonment?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): The Dominion Bureau of Statistics reports that murders are tabulated according to the year in which they are reported by the police to the bureau.

From December 21, 1967 to November 30, 1968 (latest date for which information is available), 233 murders were reported by police to the bureau. Two of these were capital murders involving the killing of police officers and have not yet been disposed of by the courts. Of the remaining 231 murders nine persons have been sentenced to life imprisonment, up to November 30, 1968.

AID TO OFFSET CAPITAL COSTS

Question No. 942—Mr. Robinson:

Is the federal government contemplating any direct financial aid to municipalities to offset the capital cost of (a) hospitals (b) facilities (c) equipment?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No.

EDMOND JOLY, LOTBINIÈRE—PURCHASE OF PROPERTY

Question No. 971—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

Did the federal government, before September 1, 1967, make an offer of purchase to Mr. Edmond

Joly, of Lotbinière, for his property located in the constituency of Lotbinière and consisting of a large area of forest and, if so, what was the amount offered?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): Yes. $700,000 was offered for the large tract of forest land plus several smaller adjacent parcels.

C.B.C.—FREE POLITICAL TIME

Question No. 982—Mr. Fortin:

1. How much free time on the two National networks did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation grant to each political party during the official period of the 1968 Federal Election?

2. What was the total value of that time, based on the rates then in force?

3. How much free time did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation grant to the candidates of each party during the 1968 Federal Election?

4. What was the total value of that time, based on the rates then in force?

5. What was the CBC's policy concerning political broadcasts during the 1968 election campaign?

6. Will the CBC submit a report on political broadcasts made during the 1968 election campaign and, if so, will this report be laid before the House?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the CBC as follows: 1. The CBC allocated free time for political broadcasts by federal political parties during the federal election campaign as follows on each of the English and French TV and radio networks:

	TV	RADIO
Liberal	1 hr. 30 min.	1 hr.
Progressive Conservative	1 hr. 15 min.	50 min.
Social Credit	15 min.	10 min.
Raillement Créditiste	15 min.	10 min.
New Democratic Party	45 min.	30 min.
TOTAL	4 hrs.	2 hrs. 40 min.

2. The CBC does not sell time for political broadcasting and does not normally attempt to place a monetary value on such broadcasts. However, if commercial rates in effect at the time of the last federal election campaign were applied to the network free time allocated, the cost to each party would have been approximately as follows:

	TV		RADIO
	CBC-owned Stations	Privately-owned Affiliates	CBC-owned Stations	Privately-owned Affiliates
Liberal	$25,177	$ 39,263	$ 5,074	$11,366
Progressive Conservative	20,980	32,720	4,228	9,472
Social Credit	4,196	6,544	846	1,894
Ralliement Créditiste	4,196	6,544	846	1,894
New Democratic Party	12,588	19,632	2,537	5,683
TOTAL	$67,137	$104,703	$13,531	$30,309

3. Free time for political on individual CBC stations is allocated to the parties active in the area served by each station and the parties arrange for their local candidates to appear. The total time allocated locally during the 1968 election campaign was as follows:

	TV	RADIO
Liberal	13 hrs. 33 min.	16 hrs. 49 min.
Progressive Conservative	14 hrs. 2 min.	15 hrs. 20 min.
Social Credit	1 hr. 28 min.	15 min.
Ralliement Creditiste	1 hr. 22½ min.	15 min.
New Democratic Party	10 hrs. 59½ min.	15 hrs. 55 min.
TOTAL	41 hrs. 25 min.	48 hrs. 34 min.

4. If commercial rates in effect at the time of the last federal election campaign were applied to the local free time allocated on individual CBC stations, the cost to each party would have been as follows:

	TV	RADIO
Liberal	$12,362	$ 780
Progressive Conservative	11,985	738
Social Credit	2,567	28
Ralliement Créditiste	1,793	— FM (Commercials not accepted)
N.D.P.	9,789	733
TOTAL	$38,496	$2,279

5. CBC policy for network free time political broadcasts, agreed upon by each of the parties, was for 40 per cent of the available periods to be allocated to the party in power and the balance to be divided by all-party agreement. This resulted in the following breakdown of periods on each of the English and French TV and radio networks:

	TV	RADIO
Liberal	6	12
Progressive Conservative	5	10
Social Credit	1	2
Ralliement Créditiste	1	2
New Democratic Party	3	6
TOTAL	16 periods	32 periods

In addition to the network periods individual CBC stations provided free time locally to political parties active in the areas served by these stations, the time being divided by agreement among the parties.

6. A CBC report has been prepared for the Canadian Radio-Television Commission, in accordance with CRTC circular letter No. 149 dated May 16th, 1968.

QUEBEC—REFORESTATION AGREEMENT

Question No. 1,022—Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse):

INTEREST RATES AND PROFITS OF CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 1,109—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. What were the interest rates of each of the chartered banks, for each year since 1956?

2. What were the net profits declared by each chartered bank, for each year since 1956?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. The rates of interest charged by each bank on its loans and paid by each bank on its deposits are not available for the period 1956-1968. The average rates charged on all loans and the average rates paid on all deposits were as follows:

	Rate of Average Loan Income	Rate of Average Deposit Interest
1956	4.84	1.08
1957	5.25	1.48
1958	5.11	1.52
1959	5.34	1.64
1960	5.59	1.81
1961	5.43	1.81
1962	5.42	1.99
1963	5.42	2.12
1964	5.56	2.23

1966	6.01	2.63
1967	6.17	2.83
1968	6.99	3.45

The interest rate on prime commercial loans in Canada and on Canadian personal savings deposits do not usually vary significantly between individual banks. These two rates have been reported as follows at the end of each year in the period:

		Prime Loan Rate	Personal Savings Deposit Rate
end	1956	5½	2½
	1957	5½	2¾
	1958	5¼	2¾
	1959	5¾	2¾
	1960	5¾	2¾
	1961	5½	2¾
	1962	5¾	3

REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATE BY CHARTERED BANKS

Question No. 1,115—Mr. Robinson:

Does the federal government intend to influence the Bank of Canada in urging the chartered banks to reduce interest rates to borrowers?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Under the Bank Act each chartered bank is free to set the rates it pays on deposits and the rates it charges borrowers. These rates are affected by competition from other banks, other financial institutions and by general conditions in financial markets at home and abroad. The Government of Canada, and governments in many countries, are taking vigorous action to reduce the inflationary pressures which are among the chief reasons for current high levels of interest rates in financial markets. Meanwhile the banks know well enough that Parliament and the government are concerned about the high level of interest rates and will want to be satisfied that competition is effective in ensuring that borrowers are charged no higher rates than are needed in order to pay depositors an appropriate return on their savings.

SEAL KILLING PISTOL

Question No. 1,149—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Has the Minister of Fisheries received any information from Mr. T. I. Hughes, General Manager of the Ontario Humane Society, concerning a humane seal killing shot pistol?

2. Did the Department of Fisheries test such a gun during the 1968 seal hunting season?

3. If so, what decision has been made requiring the use of such a gun or a similar weapon in the seal hunt for the 1969 season?

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries): 1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Regulations will not require the use of such a gun or similar weapon during the seal hunt in 1969; further testing is felt necessary.

*WHEAT DRIED IN ELEVATORS

Question No. 1,150—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. What is the estimated number of bushels of wheat that have been dried in elevators or on the farm (a) in line elevators (b) in government elevators at the Head of the Lakes (c) by farm producers in (i) Saskatchewan (ii) Alberta (iii) Manitoba, in each of the months November and December, 1968, and to the latest date available in January?

2. How many bushels have been dried during said months in interior government elevators?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the reply to this question is as follows:

1. (a) No information is as yet available on the amount of grain dried at line elevators;

(b) There are no government elevators at the head of the lakes;

(c) This information is not available on a monthly basis. As of January 3 it is estimated that the following quantities of grain have been dried on farms: Saskatchewan 16.9 million bushels, Alberta 12.9 million bushels, Manitoba 12.3 million bushels.

The answer to the second part of the question is as follows: November 372,000 bushels, December 1,042,000 bushels, January 833,000 bushels up to January 17.

*SASKATOON, SASK.—ESTABLISHMENT OF TELEVISION STATION

Question No. 1,159—Mr. Diefenbaker:

1. Will the Secretary of State ascertain from the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation whether favourable consideration is being given to the establishment of a CBC TV station in the City of Saskatoon?

2. If consideration is not now being given, will immediate consideration be given thereto?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the C.B.C. as follows: The C.B.C. looks most favourably upon establishment of a C.B.C. television station in Saskatoon and filed an application for such a station some time ago. However, the C.B.C. has asked the Canadian Radio-Television Commission to hold this application in abeyance pending the outcome of current negotiations for the purchase of CHAB-TV, Moose Jaw and CHRE-TV, Regina, which could affect the total C.B.C. service in Saskatchewan.

ARMED FORCES SUPERANNUATION ACCOUNT

Question No. 1,166—Mr. Anderson:

1. How frequently does the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act require a valuation of the Armed Forces Superannuation Account to be laid before Parliament?

2. When was a valuation of the Armed Forces Superannuation Account last made to Parliament?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): 1. At least once in every five years.

2. September 12, 1968.

USE OF GRUMMAN "ALBATROSS" AIRCRAFT

Question No. 1,167—Mr. Anderson:

1. How many Grumman "Albatross" aircraft are in use in the Canadian Armed Forces?

2. Are all these aircraft being used for search and rescue purposes?

3. What is the total all up weight of these aircraft when fully loaded with search and rescue equipment, crew and fuel?

4. What is the maximum operating ceiling when fully loaded?

5. What is the climb rate of the aircraft, when fully loaded, on one engine?

6. What is the maximum ceiling of the aircraft, when fully loaded, on one engine?

7. How many engine or propeller failures have been experienced by these aircraft during the past twelve months (a) in flight (b) on takeoff or landing?

8. What is the operational readiness figure (expressed as a percentage) of these aircraft for the past year?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Nine.

2. Yes.

3. From a prepared runway—36,500 pounds. From water or snow—32,000 pounds.

4. 19,400 feet above sea level.

5. 190 feet per minute.

6. 5,900 feet above sea level.

7. (a) six; (b) three.

8. 1968—53.2 per cent.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

WESTERN NEWFOUNDLAND REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT EXPENDITURES

Question No. 1,053—Mr. Marshall:

1. Of the $7,565,000 scheduled to be expended under Regional Development 1969/70 programs in Western Newfoundland, what is the breakdown as follows (a) listing each project (b) the amount to be expended on each?

2. Of the amount $12,304,280 scheduled to be expended in 1968/69 in the Province of Newfoundland what is the breakdown as follows (a) listing each project (b) the amount to be expended on each?

Return tabled.

JOB VACANCY MONTHLY SURVEY

Question No. 1,056—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Since the Dominion Bureau of Statistics announced by press release that a "New Job Vacancy Monthly Survey" would commence in September, 1967, on behalf of the Department of Manpower and Immigration (a) did the job vacancy survey commence on that date (b) if not on that date, when did it commence?

2. How are vacancies obtained through this survey conveyed to Canada Manpower Centres of the Department of Manpower and Immigration?

3. How many employers does the job vacancy survey cover each month?

4. To date, how many of those vacancies have been passed on to the Canada Manpower Centres?

5. How long does it take the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to notify each Canada Manpower Centre when vacancies from employers are received through the job vacancy survey?

6. Since the job vacancy survey started how much money has been spent on this project by (a) the Dominion Bureau of Statistics (b) the Department of Manpower and Immigration?

7. Is there any duplication between the Dominion Bureau of Statistics and the Canada Manpower Centres in conducting the survey?

8. Are officers from the Canada Manpower Centres participating in the job vacancy survey and, if so, to what extent?

9. Do officers from the Canada Manpower Centres, Department of Manpower and Immigration, call on employers to secure vacancies and, if so, does this conflict with the job vacancy survey conducted by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics?

10. How does the Dominion Bureau of Statistics conduct the job vacancy survey (a) visit to employers (b) mailing of questionnaires to employers (c) both?

11. How long does it take the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to process the monthly survey on job vacancies?

12. What length of time does it take the Dominion Bureau of Statistics to notify the Canada Manpower Centres after the employers have notified them of job vacancies?

Return tabled.

Return tabled.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MAINLAND CHINA—DISCUSSION WITH AMBASSADOR FROM NATIONALIST CHINA—REPRESENTATIONS TO U.S.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Can the minister advise if the ambassador of Nationalist China from Formosa has just called upon him and if he has delivered any message in connection with the decision of the Canadian government to persuade the government of mainland China to enter into closer relations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the ambassador of the government of the Republic of China called on me on Friday to inquire about the meaning of various statements that had been made recently by the government in which the government indicated its intention to have negotiations with the People's Republic of China leading toward mutual recognition.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Would not the minister and perhaps the Prime Minister too—a helpful combination on agreement—agree that discussion of this sensitive issue would be considerably enhanced if the government were to issue a short white paper outlining the options that are open to the government on this issue of recognizing continental China?

Mr. Sharp: The government had stated its intention on a number of occasions. The matter is now before cabinet. I expect a decision one way or the other dealing with the modalities of the subject will be made shortly. At that time I think it might be very useful to have some discussion, perhaps before the Committee on External Affairs, although I should add that I would not want to see so many matters discussed before the External Affairs Committee that none of them receives the attention it should.

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, has the government of Canada communicated to the government of the United States of America its intentions concerning the People's Republic of China? I ask this question in view of the remarks made this morning by the President of the United States at his press conference.

Mr. Sharp: Shortly after taking office as Secretary of State for External Affairs I acquainted the Secretary of State of the United States with the policy of the government. No further decisions have yet been taken. As soon as they are I will of course be in communication with the Secretary of State of the United States, and with representatives of other friendly countries.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is also supplementary, although I could state it as a related question. Will the minister assure the house that he informed the ambassador of the Taiwan government of the Canadian government's intention to proceed with negotiations with mainland China, despite the protests which I assume the ambassador laid before the minister?

Mr. Sharp: I said in reply to the original question that the ambassador came for an explanation, not to protest.

Mr. Lewis: Did the minister during the explanation make clear to the ambassador from Taiwan this government's intention to proceed to negotiate toward recognition of mainland China?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I informed the ambassador of the nationalist government of China exactly what I have told this house, and what has been made known to the public; that is, it is the policy of this government to bring about a mutual recognition between Peking and Ottawa. I told him we had made no change in our policy, and also that the matters of timing and procedure were still before cabinet for decision.

Mr. Lewis: Would the minister inform the house whether he informed the ambassador of the Taiwan government of the same thing the minister was reported to have said on television, if I understood it correctly, namely that if recognition of Peking should mean some break with Taiwan, the government was prepared for that.

Mr. Sharp: It was one of the questions with respect to which the ambassador came to me to seek clarification.

Mr. Lewis: We are in the dark, too.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, in view of the questions and answers which have gone before, may I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether in his view it is necessary for him, the Prime Minister or the government of Canada to consult with or seek the advice of the United States in respect of any decision they are making in connection with diplomatic relations with any country or any government.

Mr. Sharp: I think it is very much in the interests of Canada that we should inform our friends in advance of such an important matter.

SATELLITES—EXCHANGE OF LETTERS BETWEEN FRANCE AND QUEBEC

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, speaking of information from friends, my question is with reference to a question answered by the Prime Minister which I had asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning the Paris talks. Will the minister say if he has obtained advice as to whether or not communications fall under the umbrella agreement of 1965, particularly in reference to the announced intention of France and Quebec to exchange technicians and engineers in connection with the symphonie satellites project, which is an international undertaking? Would the minister undertake to make a statement on this important matter.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have now received copies of the letters that were exchanged between the government of Quebec and the government of France. I am not yet in a position to comment on them, but I suspect there will be other occasions by way of a statement or by way of answers to specific questions when I will be pleased to do so.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO—POSSIBILITY OF CANADIAN WITHDRAWAL—REQUEST FOR HOUSE DEBATE

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the Postmaster General was expressing the view of the government during the week end when he said that he believed Canadian participation in NATO was completely useless?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The Postmaster General was stating a case for withdrawal from NATO, but it was in the context, perfectly explained by him, of the debate in respect of the review which is going on regarding foreign policy. He was stating, shall we say, the antithesis of the thesis being stated at this moment by the Minister of National Defence in a speech he is making here in Ottawa today to the Rotary Club. We, as the government, will have to make a synthesis of these two points of view, and I am sure all ministers will contribute.

Mr. Hees: In view of the statements that have been made both by the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister to the effect that Canada intends to continue its present participation in NATO, is it the intention of the government that ministers shall be free to express views contrary to government policy in this regard?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Defence said today, when addressing the Rotary club of Ottawa:

—continued participation in NATO is essential to Canada's security interests at the present time.

Was he expressing government policy?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, as I said in answer to the previous question, both ministers said that they were stating a point of view. The Minister of National Defence said to the audience:

> I am not going to tell you what the policy will be—we have not decided that yet. It is with the desire to stimulate discussion on matters of serious national import, that I am speaking to you this afternoon.

The Postmaster General used equivalent language. Both ministers are, as we said much earlier in this parliament, asking the Canadian people to reflect on these matters. We realize that these are very important matters and, as I just said, the government will have to arrive at a policy which will be the expression of this government, to which all ministers will then adhere and gladly support.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in view of the answer of the right hon. gentleman, and the speech made by the military expert who doubles in brass as the Postmaster General, does the Prime Minister intend to alter the guide lines which were laid down earlier to permit the uninitiated to distinguish between cabinet dissension and participatory democracy?

Mr. Speaker: I have the impression that on a number of counts the question should not be allowed.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, arising out of the previous questions asked I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs which way he is facing on this "push me-pull you"?

Mr. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would consider setting up an opportunity for debate in the House of Commons in the near future on these important matters of defence, so that official statements could be made by the government as to what the policy is, at least for the time being?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there are two points I could make here. The first is that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has stated on a previous occasion that we will be publishing a white paper on our external policy, from which defence policy follows. I must also remind the opposition that this subject is before the committee now and we are very anxious to hear once again the opposition speak with one voice. Apparently they are not conducting a review: They know the truth, and we would like to hear it.

While I am on my feet—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the Prime Minister wish to make a statement relating to the question now before the house? I understand there is at least one more supplementary question. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Following his marxian dialectical process of reasoning, would it be reasonable now for us to infer that the government's synthesis would be for Canada to remain half in and half out of NATO?

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Does the Prime Minister not think that this kind of kite-flying is confusing and frustrating to our friends in NATO?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Perhaps this would be the right moment for the Prime Minister to make a statement about another matter.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSTITUTIONAL CONFERENCE—ATTENDANCE OF PARTY OBSERVERS

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is by way of answer to a question asked by the leader of the New Democratic party on Friday about the participation of observers at the dominion-provincial conference. I told him I would check on it. I now have. I want to report that the situation will be as follows.

We will have the same number of observers at this conference as we had in February last year, that is, 28 seats. One will be made available to each province. Therefore that will leave 18 for federal use. We would want to apportion these 18 seats on the same lines as last year. There would be one seat for each of the opposition party leaders, making three seats. There would be two seats for the Speakers of the two chambers, and one seat for the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate.

That would leave 12 seats remaining, which would be given to the parties according to their strength, more or less, in the House of Commons. It would be on the basis of six to the Liberals, four to the Conservatives, one to the New Democratic party and one to the Creditistes, over and above, of course, the seats to their leaders. Each party, of course, will determine who within its party will be the observers.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS TO CHINA RESPECTING CONFINEMENT OF JOURNALIST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, during the Prime Ministers conference the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Prime Minister had not heard of the incarceration in Peking of Anthony Grey. Now that the government is aware of this, in any representations to the communist government in Peking will the Canadian government point out the horrible and unjustifiable incarceration of Mr. Grey and ask that his release be provided for?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the Leader of the Opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sharp: I am sorry. I think the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert is mistaken. I have already expressed in the House of Commons, in answer to a question, our concern about this matter. At the time the Prime Minister was asked the question in London, it was put in a rather different context.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Prime Minister should have had any difficulty answering the question. The question asked was not obtuse in any way. The Prime Minister turned to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the answer was in the negative. Will he answer my question now? In these discussions will he point out to the communist government the total disgust of the western world at the imprisonment of Anthony Grey?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must point out that when the question was asked of me I did not say I knew nothing about it; I said the matter would be studied. The truth is that I did know about the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is not what you said at the time.

Mr. Trudeau: But I also knew full well that perhaps the best way to obtain the release of such a gentleman from another government was not to demand publicly that that release be obtained, because this very often is counter-productive. The other government, in order to show that it does not bow down to this great request—from Canada, keeps the gentleman in prison for another few weeks or months. It was for this reason that I did not think it very useful to make this kind of public statement on the matter.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the Secretary of State for External Affairs wants to improve on the Prime Minister's statement, I will sit down until he has finished.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, I just thought I should draw the attention of the house to the reference I made, so that it is on the record. I answered a question about Mr. Grey on December 10, 1968, and it appears in Hansard.

Mr. Diefenbaker: But in London the Prime Minister said he did not know anything about it. I ask him whether, now that he knows, he will adopt some of his very soft-stepping diplomacy and let the government of communist China know that what has been done is shocking to Canadians as a whole?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Did the Prime Minister at any time consider exchanging for Mr. Grey one of the newsmen travelling with himself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Trudeau: In a serious vein, Mr. Speaker, the opposition should know that one of the reasons why Mr. Anthony Grey is being held is precisely because the Peking government wants to make such an exchange for the Chinese journalists who are being imprisoned in Hong Kong. Perhaps this matter of exchange is something that can be settled between themselves, without our having to ask for volunteers from among our people.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister make this statement. Before anything is done in a unilateral way with the government of communist China, with regard to the serious question of the British journalist, will equivalent pressure be brought to bear on the British government for the release of the Chinese journalists being held in Hong Kong?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the advantage of having different parties in the opposition is that if you give them sufficient time, you hear the whole truth. I am glad to hear the other side of the question.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is more than we get from the government side.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON CULTURAL AGREEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND FRANCE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the assurances given by the Prime Minister on Friday last, which have no doubt been brought to the minister's attention, will the Secretary of State for External Affairs give to parliament at an early opportunity a report on the implementation of the Canada-France cultural agreements, touching on the extent of federal contributions, the amounts rendered by France in the form of assistance, and the number of personnel exchanged between Canada and France, with particular regard to the duties and functions of such personnel? At the same time, will the minister deal with the supplementary question which I posed relating to the present status of the France-Canada agreements and their possible renewal?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, my attention was drawn to the question asked by the hon. gentleman and I gave instructions to have a report prepared on the operation of the agreement. I have the agreement before me now. It was concluded for a period of five years, and since it was signed in November, 1965, it presumably goes on until November, 1970. It is also renewable automatically, and can be denounced by either party thereafter six months in advance.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I understand that the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys has a supplementary question.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, would the minister mind answering the rest of the question at the first opportunity?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Vancouver East.

[Mr. Broadbent.]

HARBOURS

VANCOUVER, B.C.—CONSTRUCTION OF SECOND CONTAINER BERTH

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Minister of Transport, but as he is not here and in view of the importance on the question may I ask it of the Minister of Public Works who, being a cabinet member from Vancouver and holding this portfolio, has some connection with harbour development?

In view of the statement made yesterday by Captain Johnson of the Vancouver Harbour Board, that the National Harbours Board officials here in Ottawa have been informed and are aware of the need for a fast decision on the construction of a second container berth in the Port of Vancouver, can the minister inform us whether any decision has been made on this matter; and if not, when will a decision be made and announced to the house?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. A question can be asked of the minister only in his ministerial capacity. It cannot be asked of him as a member of parliament for Vancouver.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, the Department of Public Works handles construction for the National Harbours Board in Vancouver; therefore I think the question is in order.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): In this case an indication was given in Vancouver some months ago by the Minister of Transport that active investigation was under way toward putting equipment into Vancouver to handle this type of freight. Then I think there was an invitation to Japan to see what the requirements might be. The Canadian group was led by Captain Johnson who has now returned to this country, and I think some advice will be available to the department from this source. But my colleague the Minister of Transport certainly made it clear that Vancouver would not be behind in installing the type of equipment which is necessary. That is the policy of the department, and I think it is being pursued.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me the minister is now replying on behalf of the Minister of Transport, and I suggest this cannot be done, according to the rules.

ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I have a question for the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development, Mr. Speaker. Having regard to the concern felt in the Atlantic provinces, is it the intention of the government to appoint a chairman, a vice chairman and two directors to fill the present vacancies on the Atlantic Development Board?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, there will probably be a delay before the members of the Atlantic Development Board are appointed because the structure of the board might be changed when the basic act of the department is examined.

DRUGS

IMPOSITION OF CONTROLS ON AMPHETAMINE TYPE STIMULANTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): My question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. For what reason did Canada refuse to support the efforts of students to impose strict controls in respect of the United Nations narcotics commission on amphetamine type stimulants?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is asking for information which should be given on motions in the form of a statement.

MEDICAL CARE ACT

POSSIBILITY OF AMENDMENT TO INCLUDE OPTOMETRY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare? In view of the fact that the Medical Care Act was amended in order that special services could be included under its provisions at the request of the provinces, and in view of the fact that five or six provinces have requested that optometry be included, will the minister be making an early statement with regard to the government's intentions in this regard?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): I am not aware that the degree of consensus with reference to this matter is as the hon. member has stated, but I would be pleased to look into it and consider the requests.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that the amendment to the act said nothing about consensus, is it not possible for the government to give consideration directly to the requests which have been made?

Mr. Munro: That may be legally possible, but we have decided to proceed in connection with this legislation, through co-operation and consultation with the provinces. As a result of conferences between federal and provincial health ministers a formula for this consultation has been devised, and it has been agreed there should be at least some type of consensus reached before additional services would be provided under the act. This is the procedure we are following at the present time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister check to see if my information is not correct—that five or six provinces have made such a request?

Mr. Munro: Yes, I will, Mr. Speaker.

AGRICULTURE

DAIRY INDUSTRY—QUOTAS FOR WHOLE MILK AND CREAM

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Is consideration being given to the allotment of dairy quotas to people who are interested in entering the whole milk or cream field, having regard to the fact that the present dairy policy is now under review?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): I announced in Quebec city to the conference of the dairy farmers of Canada held last Wednesday that we would entertain applications from producers who had a quota covering between 420 and 1,750 pounds of butter fat and who continued to produce, but who failed to re-apply for the current dairy year. The question of additional applications is under consideration, but no announcement has been made.

CONSUMER AFFAIRS

CHARGES IN REPORT RESPECTING GROCERY PRICES ON PRAIRIES

Mr. S. J. Korchinski (Mackenzie): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Can he indicate to the house when he plans to meet with the ministers of the three prairie provinces to discuss further the charges set out in the Batten report that excessive prices were being charged by chain stores on the prairies.

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): We were hoping to get together on the occasion of a meeting between attorneys general in Saskatchewan at the end of this month, because the date coincided with that of another meeting which we had expected to take place. Some of my staff are in touch with the staffs of the provincial ministers to arrange a date for a future meeting, because the previous arrangements fell through.

Mr. Korchinski: In view of charges by the Consumers Association of Canada that the federal combines branch did not have all the necessary information at the time of its findings on the basis of a study of the Batten report, is a further review of the situation being undertaken, or is such a review contingent upon the results of the discussions to be held between the minister and his provincial counterparts?

Mr. Basford: The allegation to which the hon. member refers is not correct.

ESTABLISHMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRICE STABILITY

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Can the minister tell us when the standing joint Senate-Commons committee on price stability, incomes and employment, will be established?

Mr. Basford: The suggestion to set up this committee was outlined in the policy for price stability which I tabled in the house on December 20. As I stated at that time, I am consulting with various interested economic groups to obtain their views on the white paper, which I expect will be completed next month.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): That is not the answer to the question I asked, Mr. Speaker. I asked whether the minister could tell us the date when this committee will be established.

Mr. Basford: The white paper made it clear that the policies outlined there were for the purpose of forming a basis for consultation, and that process is now under way.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister agree to make a statement in the house, in view of the interest in this matter, after he has held the meeting with the provincial ministers of the three western provinces to which he referred in his earlier answer?

[Mr. Korchinski.]

Mr. Basford: I would have to consider that after I have met with them.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

MOOSE FACTORY—POSSIBLE REPLACEMENT OF HOSPITAL DIRECTOR

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Normally I would make use of other means of obtaining information, but since the people involved at Moose Factory, Ontario, chose to have this subject aired over the C.B.C. last night, I feel I must ask whether or not the minister intends to follow the advice sent to him by the petitioners at Moose Factory to replace the medical director of the hospital, a Dr. Bridge, who is termed by them as a colonial master, with a Canadian doctor who understands the problems of the people in the area.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I did not see the television program to which the hon. member referred, so I cannot immediately say whether this is a matter of urgency or not. However, it seems to me it is the type of question which lends itself to discussion at ten o'clock.

VOCATIONAL TRAINING

REFUSAL ON LANGUAGE GROUNDS OF APPLICANTS FOR RETRAINING

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): I should like to address this question to the Minister of Labour, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister say whether some of the applicants for the 29 vacant places in the eight weeks retraining program at George Brown College, Toronto, are being refused on the ground that they have an imperfect command of English?

Mr. Speaker: Here again, if the hon. member thinks this is an urgent question it might be discussed at the time of adjournment this evening.

PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS

WEST BLOCK—CONVERSION OF CONFEDERATION ROOM TO ACCOMMODATE COMMITTEES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the government planning to alter the Confederation Room in the West Block in any way for the specific purpose of making it into a series of committee rooms?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): I cannot believe that this would be possible, although I heard some rumour to that effect the other day. That room however has special uses. I think it will be in use in February, again, and we must keep it as it is.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MEDICAL FACILITIES IN NORTHERN AREAS

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): My question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In view of a statement by the national director of northern health services to the effect that the most elementary medical facilities are lacking in the north country, can the minister say whether any specific program or course of action is being contemplated by his department to provide these basic facilities?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not accept the premise of the hon. member, but I do acknowledge that there is room for improvement. We have been working for several months now to improve the situation. A greater allocation of moneys is being set aside for that purpose. We are improving and increasing our facilities, and doing so as a matter of urgency. We are also trying to recruit additional and more adequate personnel.

Mr. Schreyer: A supplementary question. When the minister says that he does not accept my premise, is he wishing to indicate that he does not accept the statement that was made by—

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is debate, of course.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SEMINARS FOR DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact that the government has enabled Canadian judges to hold a yearly seminar to permit judges to update themselves on the changes in the law, would the minister consider a similar seminar for lawyers, so that the lawyers may know what the judges are talking about, and a similar seminar for the Canadian public so that the public may know what the judges and the lawyers are talking about?

AGRICULTURE

OBSERVERS FROM POLITICAL PARTIES AT MARCH CONFERENCE

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. At the conference on agriculture which is to be held in March will provision be made for observers from all parties in the house?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is yes. In any event we are working on this, and we hope it will be possible to make the suggested arrangement.

DRUGS

OPIUM AND MARIJUANA—CONTROLS UNDER INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Are present Canadian controls on opium and marijuana in accord with the International Narcotics Convention and, if so, is the government considering the amendment or withdrawal of Canada's support of that convention?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The first question leaves me in doubt as to its validity, in that the hon. member is asking for an interpretation of a statute or law. Perhaps the minister may want to reply to the second question.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, Mr. Speaker, not that I am aware of.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

DISMISSAL OF COMMISSIONAIRES FROM NATIONAL MUSEUMS

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Secretary of State. In view of some questions which were put to him earlier, and also to the Prime Minister, with regard to commissionaires whose jobs and hours have been changed, and some of whom may have been let go—the Prime Minister said the other day he thought not, but I am informed that there may have been lay-offs—would the minister consider making a statement to the house in the very near future on what has happened and what is the government's policy in that area?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I now have the required information; I got it this morning. However, I may have to consult with you. You may find the answer rather lengthy, but with your permission, I could give it now.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The minister is asking me to rule in advance whether his answer is going to be too long. If the minister wants to revert to motions for the purpose of making a statement, which will be subject to comment and discussion by representations of parties in opposition, then it would be up to the house to decide.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Then, Mr. Speaker, I shall risk reading it as it is, without fear of your strictness, and you can always interrupt if you find the statement too long.

[English]

The Canadian Corps of Commissionaires is a private organization, and commissionaires are not members of the public service of Canada but employees of the corps. The government of Canada contracts for the services of commissionaires through the Department of Defence Production, and individual departments and agencies arrange for their requirements through that department. In the fiscal year 1969-70 the National Museums of Canada has arranged for the services of 54 commissionaires for duty in the National Museum of Man, which includes the Canadian War Museum, the National Museum of Natural Sciences, and the National Museum of Science and Technology. The National Gallery of Canada, whose requirements are somewhat special, has a separate contract for security services with National Protective Service Company Limited.

In October, 1968, officials of the National Museum discussed with the commandant of the Ottawa division of the corps the feasibility of supplying bilingual commissionaires for duty in the areas of the National Museums of Canada which are open to the public during the hours they were open. Air Vice Marshal—

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. minister at this time to suggest that the statement he is delivering must normally be made on motions, unless all hon. members are willing to hear the hon. minister's statement as a reply to a question. I do not think the hon. minister is entitled to continue any further.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question. I ask this question of the Secretary of State, particularly in view of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, in regard to the answer that he attempted today. In view of the disquiet that there is about this matter, and particularly in view of the fact that the people concerned were not public servants, and therefore had none of the security and protection that a member of the public service has, or is alleged to have, would the minister seriously and favourably consider answering this question in the form of a statement on motions on Wednesday? If the situation is as good as his face suggested it might be, is there any reason for him to fear comments by opposition spokesmen?

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: I am not afraid of comments, Mr. Speaker, on the contrary, but you will excuse my lack of experience. So many questions have been asked on that subject that I will not so to speak make any statement but rather reply in turn to the several questions that have been put to me and that have piled up.

[English]

EXTERNAL AID

BIAFRA—MANNER OF MAKING RELIEF SHIPMENTS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the imminent shipments of foodstuffs for Nigerian and Biafran relief, would the minister inform the house whether it is still the plan of the government to send a major portion of this relief to Fernando Po, as originally planned?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this was a decision that was made by the International Red Cross. After discussions with us they decided they would divide their shipments into two parts. I am not sure what the position is now because, as the hon. gentleman knows, the International Red Cross has been having some difficulties with the government of Equatorial Guinea. Until those matters are settled probably the International Red Cross itself does not have a view.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): A further supplementary question. I wonder whether the government or the minister have had any consultations with the International Red Cross or their representatives here in Canada—because they have representatives both here and at Sao Tome—to consider the possibility of diverting part of the necessary foodstuffs to the island of Sao Tome?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, we have been in touch with the Red Cross, but up to the present time they have not indicated any such preference.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed, from Friday, January 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act, and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, after reading the various speeches delivered during the course of this debate I felt there were a number of suggestions I might make which, on the basis of experience, may be helpful. During the 50 years since I was called to the bar I have followed the practice of always appearing in court, regardless of fee, when anyone was able to show me that he was in danger of being subjected to a grave injustice. Although my appearances as defence counsel constituted only about 5 per cent of my practice, I appeared in some cases which the press reported in a manner not unfriendly to me.

My first words now must be to congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) on an honour done to him in the last few days. We were in Barbados together and the hon. gentleman there received the distinction of being admitted to the distinguished bar of that country. Should the hon. gentleman decide in the years ahead that he prefers the salubrious climate of the Caribbean the barristers of Barbados will encounter strong opposition if the hon. gentleman appears at their bar.

Sir, I was interested in certain references he made to me in connection with the Berubé case. The minister said that on the basis of representations that were made as a result of that case the law is being changed so that never again will a person innocent of any offence be incarcerated for a number of months. The Berubé case came to my attention in a personal way. When I visited the prison in which Berubé was confined a senior official there said he could not understand why I would become interested in an ordinary man 20 years of age. Imprisonment would do him no harm even if he were guilty of nothing—an unusual viewpoint, to say the least, for anyone to hold.

On the other hand, the minister has said that in his view this bill is one of the most comprehensive reforms of the Criminal Code ever undertaken in our country. On page 4717 of Hansard the minister is reported as saying:

> I speak this afternoon with the confidence that this legislation is the most important and all-embracing reform of the criminal and penal law ever attempted at one time in this country.

I remember when the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) introduced this bill originally. At that time he was minister of justice and held different views. Reporting his views, U.P.I. said on December 21 1967 that "the minister at no time suggested the bill was a radical revision of Canada's criminal law." The report continued to the effect that the 46-year old bachelor said that the changes only "tidied up" the act. There is a wide discrepenacy between the fulsome description of the bill given by the Minister of Justice and the description given by the former minister who now is Prime Minister. But that is not unusual with this government, sir.

We had an example of inconsistencies in connection with the Grey case. When asked at a press conference in London questions regarding Grey's incarceration in Peking the Prime Minister said he had no knowledge of the matter. It had never been brought to his attention and he had no idea what the press was speaking about. He then fell back on that reed, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp), inquired what that minister knew about the matter. He received no information whatever. The Grey incident in London made many pressmen abroad realize that all wisdom did not reside with the two leading members of the present government of Canada.

In his speech the Minister of Justice also said that this legislation had received the approval of the Canadian people. All I can say is that I never heard it discussed. It may have been discussed in the hon. gentleman's constituency, but elsewhere nothing was said about it. I have searched and had the records searched to discover when the amendments contained in this bill became a cardinal matter of consideration by the Canadian people. My inquiries left me in the dark; the records have no information on this matter.

We have a strange situation here. At one time the minister made a clear statement to the effect that since certain portions of the bill had social and religious connotations he would expect the bill to be divided so that hon. members could vote according to their consciences. Now the minister takes a different position. His present position is the Prime Minister's. In effect he says, "This is a government bill; it must go through. Members supporting the government will have to line up behind it. If they do not they will know the consequences."

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): On a point of order, sir, may I dispose of the right hon. gentleman's point. He has referred to a statement I made just after I had received my portfolio. I said it was important for the will of the House of Commons to be tested on each clause. I never said the bill ought to be split.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The will of the House of Commons will not be tested on each clause under the present situation. Although I believe in the necessity of implementing many of the bill's recommendations I cannot and will not support a bill that contains two or three items with which I disagree thoroughly and in all conscience. No Member of Parliament should be required to support an entire bill of this nature which is to be submitted to a committee overwhelmingly Liberal in the make-up of its members. I will not allow myself to be led into a position of supporting an entire bill when I am irrevocably opposed to two of its clauses dealing with sex and abortion. I want to make that clear.

The minister also said in so many words that we would not be handed an omnibus bill. I have looked at what he said and I am sure that my interpretation of his remarks is correct. Yet we have been presented with an omnibus bill which, after second reading, is to be submitted to a committee composed overwhelmingly of Liberal members. Those members cannot call their souls their own if they disagree with the Prime Minister. Never during my period of office did the government take the stand that a bill connected with the criminal law ought to be determined on the basis of a party vote instead of on the basis of a non-partisan vote.

Now I take the bill as a whole and summarize it in a very few words. The section dealing with passports is excellent. As a matter of fact Canada has been a type of communication centre for international passport fixing all over the world. You can get a Canadian passport with almost the same ease that you can walk into the House of Commons, provided you are elected. This is something that was overdue.

The next section deals with firearms. I know how difficult it is to bring about amendments in connection with firearms without denying the bona fide use thereof, but in view of the serious conditions existing in our country I can accept these amendments. The next section has to do with gaming, horse racing, parimutuels and lotteries. With all the difficulties confronting this government, just imagine section after section dealing with these problems and the minister designating what is to be done. This is almost the greatest thing that has happened since Hammurabi's codification of new principles.

Then follows the drunken driver section. I agree that action in this regard is long overdue. Week after week there is a massacre on the roads of Canada, a great portion of which would not take place were it not for drunken drivers or those under the influence of liquor. However, I think we should go a little further. There is nothing that a person operating an automobile fears more than the loss of his licence for a period of time. If you really want to put the fear of the Lord into drivers under the influence of liquor, make provision that those convicted under these several sections will not be in the position of being subject to a suspension of their licence but will actually have their licence suspended for a period of two years. This method has been successful in one or two states. It has had a tremendously beneficial result in preventing those who have been drinking from driving.

The headings, "automobile master keys" and "possession of instruments for breaking into coin operated device", are not very serious matters. They scarcely can be dignified by being expressed. The like of these matters has not been seen in amendments to the Criminal Code since 1892. Then there is the subject of harassing telephone calls. The only way to get around this is to not have your telephone listed. Then you are not subjected to those telephone calls to which some people are subjected.

Then there is the question of juries, court jurisdiction, trial by magistrate by consent, evidentiary value of certain documents and the way proof may be made in the courts. These are all matters of little or no consequence except in so far as an accused is concerned who, not knowing his rights, consents to have a summary trial to save time, which is often the explanation given to him, the result is often a longer sentence than otherwise would have been the case. Then there is the matter of proof of previous convictions, which is simply a matter of a certificate, and the directing of a new trial in the case of a sentence of preventive detention. I think this is a good principle and I would like to see the minister go a little further. I find that among those who are habitual criminals there is a loss of hope on their part once they have qualified to be designated as habitual criminals. They lose hope. I would like to see the addition of a condition by way of an incentive to rehabilitation whereby after a period of five or six years the individual might look forward to a review of the order made and an opportunity for rehabilitation provided the individual in question has shown this desire. The rehabilitation and Parole Act amendments are also worthy of support.

I think that pretty well covers the matters before us. I have scarcely been able to join with the minister in the hallelujah chorus about the wonders of the amendments that have been provided in this bill. Never in my lifetime have I felt the degree of fear regarding current conditions that I feel today. There is public concern in the United States and Canada over the expanding and tremendously developing field of crime. The number of convictions aside from traffic infringements shows a marked increase in our country. In 1957 the number of convictions in Canada, excluding traffic infringements, amounted to 387,437, and in 1966, the last year for which figures are available, 548,533. Crime is increasing two and a half times faster than the population.

Indictable offences increased from 31,000 in 1956 to 45,607 in 1966. In a period of 17 years the number of juvenile delinquents increased by 14,000 or roughly three times. Population in the same period increased by 30 per cent. One is concerned about the disregard for the law. We live in an age when various people join together and become power groups, and law-abiding citizens are in the dangerous position of being subject to the power of a visual minority who deny and defy by force that which the law proclaims to be wrong.

We live in an age in which there is an increase in mob conduct. I believe in the right of individuals to agitate for change, but there is as vast a difference between agitation for change and contempt for the law as there is between liberty and licence. Organized anarchy, which is not being punished within our country and except on very odd occasions is not being punished in the United States, is dangerous to freedom. The right to dissent must be preserved but the right to civil disobedience must be frowned on. It is dangerous to a nation when groups, relying on their numbers, contend that the rule of law must be abrogated for them because it is unacceptable to the groups to which they belong. This has become epidemic. It is epidemic in the United States. We can no longer say it is restricted. That spirit of lawlessness, that spirit of contempt toward police officers is becoming epidemic in Canada. We see it on every hand, in the refusal of passers-by to participate in any way in the assistance of policemen carrying out their responsibilities. This is something that requires the best efforts not only of the minister, not only of the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) but of the Attorneys General of the various provinces and of law officers generally. What are we going to do about it?

At this very time when these things are happening in our country we are permitting second-hand revolutionaries and prophets of political dissolution to come into our country. We have opened the doors to them. Recently in answer to a question on my part the Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) said that even if they come to Canada to advocate changing the government by force, as long as they speak to selective groups and do not make their message one to all Canadians there is no reason they should not be admitted. The United Kingdom has found out otherwise. It has closed the door to several of them. The republic of France has followed the same course. But we have opened the door.

We let these professional agitators come here, people like Jerry Rubin, Rapp Brown and Stokely Carmichael. We allow them to speak openly in Canada about bloodshed, and the Minister of Manpower and Immigration says, "Let them in, don't interfere with them; this is freedom of speech." This is not freedom of speech, Mr. Speaker. Freedom of speech does not permit libel, treason or sedition. And yet they have the blanket approval of the Minister of Manpower and Immigration which might almost be interpreted as, "Come unto us all ye that want to destroy the democratic system and we will let you in." We do not need these infesters of society, these perverters of free democratic institutions.

I suggest that instead of interfering with immigration officers who are trying to do their job by inquiry to keep these people out, the government of Canada should give them every support in making it clear to these individuals who stir up revolution in their own countries that they are not going to find a welcome mat when they come into Canada. To do otherwise is to allow these people to make their speeches to groups of young men and women across the country, incendiary speeches, seditious speeches which if made by Canadians would result in prosecution. I hope there will be some co-operation by the Department of Justice and the Solicitor General with the immigration authorities to let it be known that this type of individual coming into our country to stir up trouble is not welcome.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Throughout my life I have believed in the freedom of the individual. I do not have to mention this. The law reports record that when the freedom of individuals was interfered with and it was brought to my attention I tried to secure justice for the person involved. But to take the stand that apparently is the official stand of the government of Canada, that this type of individual is welcome here, is to lay the foundation for further and greater trouble, indeed, to permit what the Prime Minister warned about some time ago at Queen's University as I recall his speech—the danger of there ultimately being internal disorder and worse.

What are some of the things I suggest might be done? I am rather surprised that there is nothing in this bill in connection with obscenity and pornography. I have made a lengthy study of the law on this subject and I am ready to introduce a bill provided I will not find myself in the position that so many do when they introduce private bills in this house: everybody gets on the bandwagon, says they are all for it, and then talk it out. If the minister is prepared to take a draft bill, submit it to a committee and give his undertaking that if the committee recommends action the government will bring in a bill in this regard, there will be no delay in the introduction of my bill. It is not only my personal view.

One has only to watch television today, or go into stores which specialize in pornographic literature, crime and horror magazines and the like, to know of their detrimental influence on the youth of our country and, indeed, on the minds of all. As of today, according to the latest judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada regarding the meaning of obscenity there is actually a field day of opportunity for distributors of pornographic filth. Today there are no teeth in the law in view of the interpretation that has been given.

In the magazine and book field I think the proper course is to strike at the person who offers these things for sale. This has been found more effective than anything else in the United States. Some of the dealers contend that they have been prevented from refusing to accept this type of thing because of the rule in the trade that unless they accept a certain number of these pornographic books and magazines they will be denied the opportunity to operate as a retail outlet for the magazines they want to sell.

What kind of law would I suggest? There is a very fine balance between what is wrong and what is right within the purview of the expression freedom of speech, freedom of the press. I think that the British act goes a long way to meet the situation. Under the Obscene Publications Act of 1959, which incidentally put an end to the old Obscene Publications Act of 1857, provision is made as follows:

• (3:30 p.m.)

> For the purposes of this Act an article shall be deemed to be obscene if its effect or (where the article comprises two or more distinct items) the effect of any one of its items is, if taken as a whole, such as to tend to deprave and corrupt persons who are likely, having regard to all relevant circumstances, to read, see or hear the matter contained or embodied therein.

The other day I asked a question about the C.B.C. and some of its TV performances. I have not yet received an answer. It is as difficult to get information out of the C.B.C. in parliament as it is for a camel to go through the eye of a needle. They just simply do not give information. We pay and they advertise. Two or three people in the corporation believe they are above the law and they place before the people of Canada the kind of stuff that can only pollute the mind. If you destroy the physical being you are guilty of an offence. If you destroy the inner soul of the young men and women, boys and girls, of this country by this type of thing there is no offence under the present law as I see it.

In order to ensure that freedom of speech shall be maintained there is a saving clause which is an assurance to all those who desire to uphold freedom of speech. At least it is vocally whenever pornography is discussed. The section reads:

> A person shall not be convicted of an offence against section two of this Act... if it is proved that publication of the article in question is justified as being for the public good on the ground that it is in the interests of science, literature, art or learning, or of other objects of general concern.

That section will protect. The state of Michigan brought in legislation which has been beneficial. If you cross the line from Windsor to Michigan and go into a book store there you will see there is a great deal less filthy crime literature than there is in the average Canadian book store. I suggest we must take action in this regard. Day after day men and women across this nation, on their own broadcasting facilities which they pay for, have placed before them sordid things that under no circumstances can be justified as art. They have no recourse. If this matter is raised in the house the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) says he will get an opinion from the C.B.C. I understand that very recently the C.B.C. has been approached to the effect that they ought to be careful about the publicity they give to certain members of parliament, that is, that they are giving too much.

Then we have the revelation made by the former secretary of state regarding separatist control of facilities in the province of Quebec and I think elsewhere. I would like to see her appear before the committee so that we would have not only the benefit of her experience as secretary of state and as a parliamentarian but as well her knowledge of the C.B.C. and its activities. A revelation such as she made deserves that she be given the opportunity to clarify what she meant and to support her contentions. I am sure there is nobody on the government side of the house who would ever suggest she would say anything that was not correct, because she was the head of the truth squad. Who would suggest that this lady would exaggerate? I know none sitting over there would; they sat with her, they know.

Now, sir, I have one or two other suggestions I should like to make. I think it can be said that the minister is trying to the best of his knowledge and his great ability to bring about changes in the criminal law for the benefit of the people of Canada. I am interested in this school for judges. There have been several occasions when I have lost cases that I concluded that a school would have been in order. But I am surprised to read of the enthusiasm with which the judges have embraced this idea. It is a novelty for judges to admit that they have something to learn or to unlearn. If the minister has succeeded in bringing about that attitude on the part of the judiciary, he will have done something that no one has ever done since the same thing was tried on Sir Edward Coke in the reign of Queen Elizabeth.

I should like to see a little action with regard to international crime. This is something that neither this minister of this government—it is the same government with a different face—nor his predecessor have wanted to investigate. I ask that a royal commission be set up on organized and international crime in co-operation with the provinces and with the Attorneys General of the various provinces joining. I suggest that the royal commission be appointed on the basis of joint recommendations federally and provincially for, if what we read is true, two or three cities in Canada are today becoming major sites for international crime and international gangsters.

Second, we hear so much about the need to have a conference of the people interested in public affairs. I think we would learn a great deal regarding these matters if the government would convene a national conference with federal and provincial representatives. A gathering could be convened which could include the Attorneys General and representatives of the Royal Canadian Legion, the service clubs, the women's organizations and church organizations. In this way we could launch in our country a national movement, a crusade if you like, to arouse Canadians to a realization that the spirit of lawlessness rampant in this nation will, unless checked, inevitably lead to a reduction in the moral fibre of the nation and constitute in time a peril to the nation's destiny.

Third, by co-operation between the federal and provincial authorities there has to be, I believe a very considerable increase in the number of police officers. In two or three states of the United States in which crime was rampant, as a result of an increase in police personnel there has invariably followed a decrease in crime.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the right hon. gentleman, but I must bring it to the attention of the house that his time has expired unless he has leave to continue. Is it the pleasure of the house to extend the right hon. gentleman's time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to see consideration given by the minister, together with the provincial Attorneys General to, the passing of a federal or provincial law, or a conjoint one, to protect honest businessmen from the intrusion by organized crime in legitimate business by means adopted today in too many cases of extortion, threat and intimidation.

Those are but a few of the recommendations or suggestions I wish to make. What we are trying to do in this house is to bring about improvements. I regret very much that I conclude where I started. So far as the provisions for the legalization of adult homosexuality are concerned, I am opposed. The Prime Minister for a long period of time has advocated that this law is necessary. He said at one time that the law had no place in the bedrooms of the nation. He had some ideas, too, about the subject of freedom of the press. They were uttered in London but they were contrary to that principle. I cannot quite understand why the Prime Minister of Canada would feel it necessary to have the police search and seek out members of the press in regard to their extramural relations.

I find it equally difficult to understand how the Prime Minister could set up—at least I thought this was the suggestion—an order of the crumb. To me that was most unusual. Members of the press were divided into two classes, crumbs and non-crumbs. That is the way famous organizations begin. I would think there would be a widespread desire, in the event that such an order were officially set up, on the part of those in the press for membership in the organization. In any event, that is just an aside.

What shall I do? I am opposed to these homosexuality amendments. I think they are wrong. I have read the Wolfenden commission report backward and frontward. I know there is no individual more subject to intimidation and threat by the U.S.S.R. as it endeavours to obtain information detrimental to the security of Canada than those who are believed to be homosexuals.

On the ground of conscience I cannot accept the expansion of the law regarding abortion. When it was originally mooted I took it to be much the same as the law which has existed through the years, but it is not. It actually seems to be based on the concept that many abortions are taking place and therefore we ought to legalize them. That is also one of the arguments being advanced regarding homosexuality.

So far as the amendments regarding lotteries are concerned, all of us have our own views. I think the minister has tried his best to bring about suggested amendments which will be generally accepted. In saying that, I cannot personally support the right of the provinces or the dominion to operate lotteries.

Why do we not have a free vote? I cannot understand this. The minister says this is a government measure. Is it something unchangeable like the laws of the Medes and the Persians? Members on the government side know that they do not dare oppose the bill. If they did and the bill was defeated the result would be dissolution unless there was a revamping of the revamping of the constitutional procedure of last February. I read one hon. gentleman's statement yesterday. He said he was in favour of this measure. Another hon. member from Hamilton said that as a result of his Christian teaching he could not accept it. As between those two people, one has qualified to be a minister.

The Prime Minister and the minister say in effect: Support this bill; it is a government measure. To follow that course would be to have legislation by intimidation. Members of this house are not robots to be pushed around and to have their sacred feelings and views of the heart set aside. Members of parliament are not computers into which the Prime Minister puts the message and the computer gives the reply.

Even as I conclude I say to the minister, in the effort he is making to improve the criminal law of our country, do not place the House of Commons in the position that its members will become, as the members of the Liberal party we described in 1957, almost the peons of parliament.

• (3:50 p.m.)

Mr. Hyl Chappell (Peel South): Mr. Speaker, I support the amendments and other changes to our criminal law proposed by this bill. I also wish to compliment the minister particularly on declaring it a government bill. There are many contentious issues, and because of this I believe the government should take the responsibility for leadership rather than leaving it to the uncertainty of a free vote. Since its predecessor, Bill C-195, was given first reading in December, 1967, the subject matter has been discussed, at least in part, I believe, by almost every adult Canadian. Because the content involves our moral and social beliefs, the entire nation has had to revalue its attitude toward individual behaviour and rethink the basis or ground rules for legislative interference with individual freedom.

Many people have made their views known to hon. members and we have had an opportunity to pass our suggestions to the minister. Seldom has proposed legislation stimulated so many to become involved in the legislative process. I have received hundreds of representations with respect to lotteries, control of firearms, the compulsory use of the breathalyzer and other subjects of the bill, and have communicated my thoughts to the minister. Because I have received so many representations, both personal and by mail, in respect of abortion I shall give my views here in this house.

The amendment respecting abortion has raised the greatest conflict. Why is this? Some regard the foetus as a human life. Needless to say, if one accepts this premise it would indeed be difficult to pass judgment as to which life should be saved as between the foetus and the mother. Personally I cannot accept this premise and do not believe it to be a life, certainly not at the stage when therapeutic abortion is possible.

There is no agreed-upon definition of when, if ever, short of birth, the foetus becomes a human life, but by inference the law does not accept the foetus as a human life and regards it as a potential life only. The difficulty arises when individuals and groups adopt their own, and thus differing, definitions as to what the foetus is. Religious and philosophical discussions do not help much. Medicine recognizes there is a life of a kind in the foetus but it is, of course, a wholly dependent life. The law recognizes a potential life which warrants protection and for which one may make provision, but at the same time it clearly recognizes the foetus as only a potential human life. At the other end of the scale, and from a practical point of view, many regard the existence of the foetus as only a physical condition of the pregnant female and that the life and health of the female stand paramount and should be the only consideration.

In the new British act, abortion is referred to as the induced termination of pregnancy, that is, the termination of a condition, which lends support to the view that pregnancy is only a condition of a female. Obviously, if the foetus is not a human life, our only concern from the social or legislative standpoint is the life and, less directly, the health of the mother, the pregnant female. To be diverted from this stand through a prolonged and indefinite discussion concerning the validity of the belief that the foetus is a human life merely prevents us from directing our minds to the real issue, namely, the preservation of the life and health of the pregnant mother.

If the purpose of the legislation is to put the life and health of the pregnant woman first, the age or moral status of the female in question should not make any difference; it is simply a matter of health science.

Until last year the relevant provision of the British legislation read as follows:

> —whosoever, with intend to procure the miscarriage of any woman, whether she be or be not with child, shall unlawfully administer to her or cause to be taken by her any poison or any noxious thing, or shall unlawfully use any instrument or any means whatsoever with the like intent, shall be guilty of felony.

This section came into existence in 1861, and as interpreted by the courts it means that in England since 1861 a therapeutic abortion to preserve the life or health of the mother has been lawful. That was also the law in Canada, as expressed by a court in Saskatchewan in 1909, until by a drafting error the word "unlawfully" was omitted from the Canadian section which was similar to the English section. Did this drafting error throw us back and beyond the law of 1861 in respect of therapeutic abortion?

Since then, although the law in England remained constant until further clarified in 1968, there has been a cloud of uncertainty in respect of the Canadian law. Judicial pronouncement in England recognized that health could be depressed to such an extent that life was shortened, and the continuance of the pregnancy could make the woman concerned a mental as well as a physical wreck. Again, until the change in England in 1968 it would appear that any abortion in England, if done in good faith for the purpose of saving the life or health of the mother, was not a crime.

This could have been the subjective test of a doctor and possibly others. The change in England in 1968 spelled out the need for two doctors to agree, in good faith, that the continuance of the pregrancy would involve risk to the life or health of the pregant woman, which includes her physical and mental health and also the health of any existing children.

What has been and, particularly, what is now the law in Canada? Some take the view that the courts would read into the section the word "unlawfully" so that our law would be the same as it was in England until 1968, and was here for so long. Others are of the view that any abortion would be illegal and the doctor could be charged, no matter the justification from a medical standpoint. In fact, a doctor could find himself in the impossible situation where he could be charged criminally if he performed an abortion and sued civilly if he failed to do so, if such operation might reasonably have saved the mother's life. But even worse is the moral conflict in the doctor's mind. Medically and privately he may feel a duty to end the pregnancy to preserve the life or health of the woman but is faced with a possible criminal charge or at best the public charge of practising close to the line. This would also apply to those assisting the doctor, and the patient could be embarrassed.

One thing is certain, that under Canadian law the uncertainty is such that the medical profession and all its patients have a right to demand that we, the legislators, make the law clear and positive. The amendment would restate the law as it was in England as of 1861, was here for so long and may in fact still be the law here, but it goes a little further. Whereas in England there were no safeguards until 1968, the amendment would provide adequate safeguards similar to those now in force in England, namely, the termination of the pregnancy must be carried out by qualified medical persons, in accredited institutions, after approval by more than one doctor. This, in my opinion, puts the subject where it belongs, in the hands of the medical profession, in hospital, as with all other matters of health.

[Mr. Chappell.]

I have received hundreds of representations arguing with much force indeed that there should not be any restriction, that because it is a matter of health it should be left to the woman in question and her physician, as is the case in all other matters of health. However, this is not only objectionable but offensive to a large portion of our population. Therefore we are faced with two opposing philosophies, those who wish complete freedom and those who would deny abortion under any circumstances.

• (4:00 p.m.)

At times, and on some issues, compromise is essential. The proposal in this case, though not completely satisfactory to either group, should be acceptable to both. Those who wish greater liberty in making individual decisions would obtain clarification of the law, enabling abortion to be carried out under control. Those who are against abortion under any circumstances would succeed in obtaining a reasonable restriction.

May I remind those who are still reluctant to support the proposal that the law as it now stands is uncertain and confused, and that should abortion be denied when the life and health of the mother are at stake, that is to say, should the mother be denied protection from death because the medical profession is prevented from acting, we would be maintaining a law so inconsonant with today's view of individual rights as to bring it into disrespect and force people not only to hold it in contempt but to disregard it.

We cannot allow personal philosophical interpretations to deprive those who have satisfied their own consciences, and seek protection for their own lives or health, of the benefit of today's medical science. In conclusion, may I point out that no one is required to submit to, or participate in, any termination of pregnancy against her or his will.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy Royal): Mr. Speaker, members of parliament are now discussing a matter which, for some of us, goes to the very depths of our consciences. I wish to say at the outset that I am not here to exchange consciences, and perhaps that is a good admission to make. Neither am I here to choose sides about quality of consciences, although I myself will have no difficulty in supporting all these proposals but one which I shall discuss in a minute and tell hon. members, if they care to listen, why I find it unattractive.

The United States has just been engaged in an election campaign during which many of those who sought solutions to the social problems of that great country took refuge in simplistic slogans. One of the slogans which was trotted out was "law and order". If one reflects upon it, Mr. Speaker, there is presumably a good deal of law and a fair amount of order in any federal penitentiary or in any jail. In other aspects of institutional life, too, there is presumably a good deal of law and order. But those who had the wit and the ability to criticize oversimplified views with regard to the crushing social burdens of our great neighbour, some of which, unfortunately, we share, were quick to point out that law and order without justice is a concept repugnant to civilized man.

Although at times I think our optimism can be challenged by events I do, on the whole, share the view of one who is not always optimistic about the human condition, Mr. Philip Toynbee, when he says the general level of morality is higher than it has ever been in the past. He bases this statement on a general improvement which he has discerned in our concern for others. This is a statement which the minister in his preoccupation with certain aspects of this legislation would, I believe, approve. Certainly I would. I might refer at this point to an aspect of the legislation which has not been discussed very much, the changes in the provisions governing the national parole board. I, for one, welcome these changes.

If improvement is measured on the basis of our concern for others, let us get right down to the tough question, that of abortion. We have been flooded with extreme statements on this issue by those who in their concern or alleged concern for life are so immoderate in their views as to make one doubt whether they really have a fair understanding of the issues which parliamentarians have been asked to face. In the December 7 issue of the Saturday Review I came across what I submit to be one of the fairest statements on this subject that I have read for a long time. It was written by Dr. Robert E. Hall and is one of a series of articles entitled "The Child—What Science Is Learning about Human Personality and Growth". This particular article is entitled: "His Birth Without Permission".

Before I read the paragraph I have in mind, may I reflect on something that puzzles me in connection with this issue. It seems odd that it is always men who appear most preoccupied with discussing this question. I hope, with great respect, that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) will enter the debate shortly. I wish there were 50 or perhaps 150 women members of parliament who could discuss this subject. It smacks of vanity for a man to discuss a topic which concerns something that womanhood should decide. Everyone is hung up on the issue of abortion, although methods of dealing with it represent a relatively new encrustment on both ecclesiastical and civil law. Until 1801 in Britain there was no law on abortion; the right to terminate pregnancy was left with the woman. In the Roman Church until 1865 there was no dogmatic rule concerning abortion. What we are discussing is the so-called civilized man's aspect of a problem that is really a problem of the woman. Having entered that caveat, I find that I can override my own concern for presumptiousness and discuss the issue. A paragraph from the article is as follows:

> Abortion is a medical issue only because it is the doctor who wields the necessary instrument. He is no better able to judge who qualifies for an abortion than the patient's minister, the patient's lawyer, or the patient herself. Who of these four principals would you deem best suited to make such a decision? I would argue that the pregnant woman, with the counsel of her doctor and the concurrence of her husband, should be allowed to decide for herself. Realistically, of course, she cannot. In the final analysis the decision rests with the politician and the priest.

Although I feel that the provision in the bill is too restrictive, a view that remains unaltered having heard not only the minister's speech but other speeches, speaking as one politician I am prepared to shift that decision to the pregnant woman.

As to the issue of homosexuality I have had, as I am sure the minister and other hon. members have, some extraordinarily cruel letters about what is a psychiatric and medical problem. It appears from some letters that the nation as it is about to deal with this problem is headed down the road to hell. I am prepared to take my chance, though that may be a rather profane thing to say. Nevertheless the issue has to be faced. The government of the United Kingdom faced it. The United Kingdom faced it, first of all, in the House of Lords, because it was from there that a committee was formed to study the issue, as a result of which the Wolfenden report made its recommendations.

I for one would have no difficulty with my conscience, if that is the way one judges a vote, in supporting the change proposed here by the minister. I believe that homosexuality or homosexual acts between consenting males, unpleasant as that is to contemplate, are nevertheless a case for the most compassionate, sympathetic understanding on the part of civilized men and women. I think that this bill has that objective in mind.

With regard to gun control, the other day the National Rifle Association Journal contained a message to the widow of the late President John Kennedy saying that they had noted with regret that he had died, and then in an editorial in the same issue discussed the U.S. constitutional provisions with regard to the right to carry sidearms. I do not suppose that any more bitter illustration of a lobby gone rampant could exist.

I think that the changes proposed in this bill are essential. I am glad the bill is now before the house and that some changes have been made in the original proposals contained in the previous bill, C-195. Some provisions I had hoped to see are not included in the bill. I had hoped that consideration by the committee on justice and legal affairs of the issue of wiretapping and electronic eavesdropping would have been farther advanced. I recognize why it has not been, but this problem has to be faced soon by parliament. The proliferation of wanton snooping without any imprimatur of legal or judicial authority is to me most offensive. I hope the government will urge the committee on justice and legal affairs to complete its study of this matter, and that the house will soon have before it a further amendment to the Criminal Code condemning this type of activity.

In his speech the minister emphasized, I think quite correctly, the human rights aspect of the Criminal Code. I hope that on his various excursions about the country to discuss law reform with lawyers, who tend to be conservative types, the minister will be able to prevail upon the bar to accept the traditional right—in fact, it should be more than traditional; it should be a current right—of all members of the public to counsel. It troubles me that the bar has often to be reminded to assume a responsibility that has long been part of its tradition. No one should have to shop around for counsel. When the minister addresses the Canadian Bar Association I trust he will underline the importance of the acceptance of responsibility in this particular area of the law, though those who attend the meetings of the association are usually those who readily do so. But having said that I think there is an obligation upon lawyers to fulfil their duty in this regard. The legal aid systems that have been set up in some of the provinces are looking after this problem, in some cases better than in others, but there are still gaps that need to be filled.

Perhaps I have not given the philosophical arguments for supporting the various so-called conscience sections of the bill. I accept the view of many in my party that it would have been easier to discuss the four major aspects of the bill separately in that we would have readily been able to exercise our individual vote. But that does not in any way inhibit me from supporting the legislation.

The issue I warned the house I had some doubts about is lotteries. I have doubts because I have been in various countries of the world which operate state lotteries. Such a lottery is a most unpleasant feature of their national life and is a very poor way of raising money. For example, the so-called Irish sweepstakes hands over very little of its revenue to the Irish hospitals—I understand about 12 per cent, or 12 cents of very dollar. I think this gives that fine country a poor name in the world, as do the national lotteries of so many other countries. If the state requires money for education and hospitals, then the ethical way to raise it, in my opinion, is by taxation spread fairly among the people. To try to grub for money in this way diminishes, I think, the national prestige of a country. But even though I feel this way I will not resist the important changes contained within the ambit of the bill.

• (4:20 p.m.)

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, no one can fail to be impressed by the serious tone of this debate. Some hon. members have already had a chance to speak their minds on this bill. There are members of my party who share the views of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan) who spoke last Friday. I am glad to live in a country where hon. members such as the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and others can speak their minds on clauses of a bill in such a way as not to leave their constituents in any doubt about where they stand. I am afraid I cannot agree with the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) that hon. members are being muzzled and cannot speak their minds on this bill.

Our leader has made known the general attitude of the N.D.P. caucus to this legislation. Various hon. members of our party will deal with different clauses of the bill in detail, and as a result there will be no repetition by members of this party. As a group we wish to talk about the entire bill, and it is up to the individuals in our party to choose the various clauses on which they wish to speak.

With the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) I was a member of the health and welfare committee which studied abortion in 1967-68. It has fallen to me to deal with the abortion section which, from remarks so far heard in this debate, appears to be the most contentious section of the entire bill. Some hon. members of our caucus, in common with members of other caucuses, are deeply disturbed by some of the amendments. They want no part of legislation designed to deal with abortion. We appreciate their position and honour their adherence to what they believe to be right. Yet we disagree profoundly with them. We also have principles and we also must speak on behalf of those things we believe to be right.

One of the most compelling reasons for one to support the amendments pertaining to abortion is to allow those who believe in the concept of abortion the right to follow the dictates of their consciences and remain within the law. Today they do not have this right. I believe the majority of the Canadian people wish to have that right. According to the only Gallup poll I could find on this question—it was taken in 1965—71 per cent of the Canadian people wanted the abortion laws to be modernized. I cannot believe that that figure is lower now.

Not many members of this house have had direct experience of abortion. I know that neither the hon. member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Fairweather) nor I have undergone an abortion. But that should not prevent our dealing with the question of abortion. Because we may not be in any danger of falling over a cliff should not prevent our agreeing to provide an ambulance for those who have done so.

We have heard much in this debate from hon. members opposed to abortion. Let them think well of what their remarks entail. Do they insist on imposing their views on those who consider it their right to follow their consciences in this matter? No one will force abortions on people opposed to them. No one is proposing to force physicians who do not approve of abortions to perform abortions. Those who oppose the concept of a woman's right to an abortion ought to realize that public crime and private sin are entirely different matters. On this question I commend the insight of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), because he was quite right in saying the law has no business in the bedrooms of the nation.

I agree with the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan) who said that if our statute books contain unenforceable laws the law will fall into disrepute. The law pertaining to abortion is unenforceable. That point was brought home by religious as well as non-religious groups opposed to our party's stand on this question. Our position was that since an unenforceable law brings the law into disrepute the present law on abortion, being unenforceable, bringing the law into disrepute.

Moreover, I submit that as well as being unenforceable the present law is unjust. At present a pregnant woman may obtain an abortion in Canada safely, not legally but safely, if she has the money for the operation. Or she may obtain an abortion by taking a ship or aeroplane to another country where abortion is legal. On the other hand, while the present law is retained the pregnant woman without money has no such option. She must bear her child no matter whether it has resulted from rape, incest, accident or any one of a number of causes ruinous to her future and her health. She must bear the child or seek an illegal abortion with all the attendant risks of infection, mutilation and death. Those are her alternatives.

I am glad the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) is seeking to abolish a law which, in effect, means there is one law for the rich pregnant woman and another for the poor pregnant woman. A law like that ought to be swept away. It makes criminals of pregnant women who are caught in the trap of pregnancy and need to have an abortion. It makes criminals of doctors seeking to help pregnant women. Recently in Vancouver a highly respected doctor was convicted of performing abortions and was evicted from his profession. He performed abortions only because he could not bear the suffering of unfortunate women who could not face the consequences of their rash acts, and I emphasize the fact that they have not done that rash act alone. I point out that in no instance where an abortion has come to the attention of any hospital board has the pregnant woman alone been responsible for her condition. It has taken a man as well as the woman to bring about that condition. Society must deal with this problem instead of leaving, in many cases, poor, ignorant, friendless women to bear the burden of a situation which too often they are obliged to face alone.

• (4:30 p.m.)

One of the "guesstimates"—they were not even estimates—given to the standing committee on health and welfare was the number of illegal abortions performed annually in Canada. The committee heard from Dr. Donald M. Lowe, a former chairman of the Ontario Medical Association's committee on abortion. His figure was that between 25,000 and 75,000 illegal abortions are performed in Canada every year. That is an enormous figure when one thinks of it in terms of the women involved, of their plight and of the cost to society. That estimate was the low one among those we were given. Estimates were also given at several times that figure. But I agree with the statement by the Association for Modernization of Abortion Laws in Canada that there is no need to waste time now on a futile numbers game of trying to guess the number of illegal abortions in Canada every year. The tragedy is that we do not know, nor have we any means of finding out. No steps have been taken to obtain this information and the worst of it is that in the past we just have not cared.

What we do know is that last year Jean Paul Gilbert, Montreal police director, stated in a letter to the committee that authorities in Montreal's major hospitals had reported as follows:

> Hardly a day goes by without a woman coming or being brought to the hospital after an attempted abortion.

What is true for Montreal hospitals is true for hospitals in Toronto and Vancouver and in a comparative degree for other hospitals across Canada. What about the many, many more women all across Canada who suffer mutilation and sometimes even death as a result of do it yourself projects with knitting needles, acids or any one of a dozen other instruments never meant for that purpose? There are also those who suffer at the hands of backstreet butchers who claim to be abortionists.

The choice now before us is not whether we are going to have abortions. That has already been decided. If we refuse to face the present situation and try to sweep it under the rug, pretending it does not exist, illegal abortion is going to continue to grow in this country. We have had much evidence to that effect. It will not be stopped. Ever since the dawn of history women have not been stopped in this matter because the sanctions of society against them are such that they cannot face these situations. They cannot stand them economically or socially and they mean personal tragedies which these women are not able to bear, causing them to seek the abortionist wherever he can be found. If not a legal abortionist, then they must find an illegal one.

One of the French speaking members to my left referred to people who wish to see changes in respect of abortion and other matters, such as proposed in the amendments to the Criminal Code now before us, as those who love darkness, evildoers, and that sort of thing. In my opinion the people who love darkness are those who are closing their eyes to the terrible predicament of women from one coast to the other who are caught in the pregnancy trap and have no recourse because the lawmakers of this country up to this point have given them no recourse. It is our job to change that picture.

I was pleased to hear the hon. member for Fundy-Royal say he wished there were many women in this house. So do I. Thank heaven there are a great number of civilized men in the house who realize that this problem is not merely a case of rushing to the assistance of women. There is that too, but the problem has been tied up for a long time in an impossible situation. Surely it is not a situation that can be met by quotations from religious or philosophical authorities who lived centuries ago. Surely it is an intolerable situation calling for action in line with modern needs and modern thinking. It is a problem with which we have to grapple.

I am not going to get into theological arguments because the committee has had plenty of theology on both sides of the case. The hon. member who preceded me stated there were two sides to this question, those who wanted wide open abortion on demand and those who wanted nothing whatever to do with abortion, leaving it illegal. I believe there are those in between, those who want a reasonable approach to this problem with reasonable measures for solving it.

The amendments now before us clarify the existing law. That is good. They add the word "health" to the existing legislation. At the present time an abortion can be performed only in cases where the life of the mother is gravely in danger. The new amendment will add the word "health". In other words, the fact that her health is in danger can be a reason for a legal abortion. This is very good as far as it goes. There are those in this house and in this country who consider that this amendment goes dangerously far. I know this because I was on the committee. There was a great deal of argument as to the meaning of the word "health". These amendments are important but they are scarcely world-shaking.

At this point I would like to commend the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Isabelle) on his excellent speech last Friday. He is the chairman of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs. There is no one in a better position to know the scope of the abortion discussion which goes back many years. The hon. member's speech was excellent, surveying as it did not only what the word "health" denotes but the whole history of thinking and legislation in regard to abortion.

I have heard discussion in this house as to why the word "health" in this amendment is not defined, that we do not know what is meant by the word "health".

I think the best definition of the word "health" is the one by the World Health Organization which states that it is:

> A state of complete physical, mental, emotional and social well-being—

I think that is how the word "health" should be defined in this legislation and I wish it would mean just that. Before I conclude I will give the Minister of Justice my recipe for making it mean just that. Measured by this yardstick, the amendments now before us fall short in the following respects.

• (4:40 p.m.)

First of all, they make no provision to terminate a pregnancy where it is practically certain that a deformed child will be born. To put it bluntly, I think it is a crime that we have a law which says it is illegal for a physician to perform an abortion even though he knows there is grave danger of a deformed child being born. I do not believe that such an abortion ought to be illegal. Mind you, even in this case I believe that the pregnant woman or the parents ought to have the right to decide. I think a doctor has the right to lay before the woman the consequences of the continuation of her pregnancy and then ask her: "Do you want an abortion or don't you?" I think the woman has the right to decide, and I want to add that in my opinion a great many women faced with the decision of giving birth to and bringing up gravely deformed children would make their decision in favour of healthy life instead of deformity. I believe most women would do that. But this legislation makes no provision for a situation of that kind.

Neither does the legislation make provision to terminate a pregnancy that has been caused by rape or incest. I think this is the logical place to insert a provision making legal the termination of a pregnancy that is the result of rape or incest. I ask hon. members to consider the feelings of those two young girls, recently raped in Toronto by a gang of hoodlums, should either of them prove to be pregnant as a result of that experience. I ask hon. members to consider the feelings and the future of those two girls and to understand how strongly a great many women feel about the necessity of legislation to cover situations of that type.

In such cases these young fellows are sentenced to jail for a few months. But the girl gets life—the ruin of her whole life—as the result of an action of which she is almost always, if not always guiltless. Hon. members may say that a girl should not be consorting with such people, but these little girls in the case about which I am speaking came from the country. They had no concept of what could happen in big cities, of what in fact happened to them.

The proposed amendments do not touch the situation where a mother becomes pregnant accidentally. I am speaking of a woman who is already the mother of a very large family, who has not got adequate means or the prospect of adequate means to look after her family, to feed, clothe, shelter, and above all, educate her children, and where the addition of one more child will endanger the situation of the children already existing.

If we are bringing the Criminal Code up to date on abortion I think it should include at least the equivalent of the British social clause which provides that where the birth of another child will put the family of the pregnant woman in jeopardy, her existing family, it shall be legal to perform an abortion. I believe this legislation should include that option because I believe it is wrong, the way the world is today, to bring a child into it if that child will jeopardize the mother's future and the future of existing children, to say nothing of its own.

However, Mr. Speaker, the proposed amendments are an advance over what we have had. We in this group are going to support them if we cannot get anything better. But we are going to try to get something better, both in the house and in the committee, and I make no apology to hon. members for taking a little time to explain what we want.

As my parliamentary leader explained the other day, we in this group would like to see abortion deleted from the Criminal Code. We would like to see it taken out completely in the same way that birth control, before this session is finished, is going to be taken completely out of the Criminal Code. Neither one of these is a criminal matter. Both are medical matters. They belong in the province of medicine rather than in the province of the law.

I have a bill on the order paper which would provide for this and I hope the minister will consider looking at it from the point of view that I am putting forward. First I had better point out what my bill in general terms proposes. It would leave the matter of abortion entirely for decision by the medical profession, the pregnant woman and anyone intimately concerned with her. The decision is ultimately that of the woman. It cannot be the decision of anybody else. I do not believe in the postcard approach, the demand approach. I believe that the woman should and must approach a physician for consultation. When this consultation takes place I believe that in the majority of cases, where the pregnancy is reasonable, it would be continued.

I have mentioned those intimately concerned with the woman in the matter. The hon. member for Fundy-Royal has referred to including the husband. I believe that in a decent marriage the husband, of course, would be consulted about such a decision. But there are other cases where marriages have broken down and other influences are at work. Even though he is not married to the woman, I believe that very often the man responsible for fathering the child would be a good person to be included in this type of consultation with a doctor. In the case where a girl is very young, is under age, I believe that her parents ought to be in on the consultation. If the girl is friendless I believe that a social worker or someone of that type should take part in the consultation. At all events I believe that the medical profession can well be trusted to make this momentous decision in consultation with the pregnant woman and whoever is closely associated with her in the problem.

What will this approach do so far as the pregnant woman is concerned? It will give her what so many women do not have now, the right to bear healthy, wanted children as a result of her desire to have children. To my mind it is the height of irresponsibility for people to bring into today's world children who are deformed and who cannot be brought up and educated as today's children should be brought up and educated.

What will this approach do so far as the foetus is concerned? I think it will give the foetus the right, in many cases, not to be born. To my mind the right not to be born is very important in a great many cases. At a later date one of my colleagues is going to describe just what it means to be born mindless and deformed, almost beyond human recognition, and having to go on living for years and years as a result of our legislation and the mores lying behind our legislation.

As I say, so far as the foetus is concerned this approach gives it the right not to be born or, looking at it from the positive angle, the right to be a wanted child. Social workers and others who have dealt with many children who have been unwanted know that the right not to be born is an important right in many cases. Until we can provide the right for children to be wanted we should not worry too much—we should not be so proud of supporting the right to be born.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Children who are moved around from place to place, children who are moved from one foster home to another, children who are never wanted and who never fit into things—there are the other kind too—are living examples of the fact that children ought to have the right to be wanted, loved, cared for and born into a home where they are wanted. So far as the doctor is concerned, this stand will give the doctor the right to do legally what his conscience prescribes. I am afraid that under the minister's bill many doctors, if they wish to follow their conscience, will in many cases still have to perform abortions illegally because there are some types of pregnancy whose termination is not provided for under the bill. If doctors are to be large-spirited and humane they will still have to conduct illegal abortions even under these amendments.

I believe that the approach of giving the doctor the right to decide in consultation with the patient would obviate the danger of illegality. No one will force a doctor against his conscience to perform an abortion. So far as society is concerned this approach would give to society the right to have children who will have an opportunity to become good citizens. We might look at the pedigree of those young men who were convicted for a mass rape the other day. Look at the kind of homes they came from and the conditions in which their parents were forced to bring them up. If you look at these things you will understand what I mean when I talk about the need of society to be in a position to ensure children an opportunity to become good and wanted citizens.

The argument has been made that in other countries with wider abortion laws there have been difficulties. There has been a tremendous increase in the number of abortions performed. This is true partly because there had been a tremendous backlog of requests for abortions to be dealt with. There were women who were formerly unable to obtain abortions and who wished to obtain them. In addition, there was a great deal of unnecessary red tape and difficulty in ironing out the bugs in the systems in these countries for dealing with abortion.

I suggest that one of the things we might have is a referral centre or clinic to which women who want and need an abortion could be referred. Such a clinic would have a trained staff including doctors, as is the case in respect of birth control clinics, so that a woman could come there and have her abortion dealt with in the very early stages of pregnancy without waiting for the stage at which it becomes dangerous, difficult and disgusting even to the physician who has to deal with it.

Birth control is the first line of defence. It is not legal in this country, and we need much more widespread knowledge of contraceptives and much more widespread use of them. Birth control would cut down the need for abortion to a great degree but would not do away with the need for abortion. There would still be a great many cases where it would be required.

I conclude by making a plea to the members of this house. I shall do so by quoting from the explanatory notes to my bill:

> In a pluralistic society such as Canada it is possible in a number of matters to allow some people to carry out their own beliefs in action without infringing on the freedom of others to follow a different course of action.

> Such is the matter of abortion. The purpose of this bill is to permit those who believe in the necessity of abortion to seek it legally. Those whose conscience is opposed to abortion may continue, as in the past, to have nothing to do with it.

In view of the fact that we shall never in our lifetime, even in the lifetime of the youngest member here, reach a consensus on this matter, surely we should be thankful that heaven has made it possible for us to have two right courses. There is the right, on the one hand, of people who believe that abortion is criminal and against their better judgment to have nothing to do with the legislation. On the other hand, we can have freedom of conscience and action for those people who believe in the necessity for abortion and who believe in the justice of updating the abortion laws of this country. I do not see any reason why even those members who believe that abortion is wrong cannot weigh very carefully the measures in this bill and then search their consciences to see whether there is anything very wrong in letting an amendment pass which they do not have to be bound by in order to permit those people who do believe in it to have freedom of conscience. Although the abortion section of the bill may be wrong in their minds, they would be voting for many other measures which are long overdue. I ask, what could be fairer than to have the right for both sides in this matter to follow their consciences?

Mr. Ralph W. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate because I feel it is my solemn duty to go on record in opposition to one of the clauses of the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code. I do it even at the risk of being considered uncivilized by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis).

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): No, I said I respected such people.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): It is a privilege for me to belong to a government which respects individual opinion and conscience. There are those in this house who have claimed in recent days that members of the government are being coerced into accepting the whole bill. Nothing could be farther from the truth. If that were the case I would not be standing freely in my place at this moment to express an opinion contrary to the proposals of the government. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said that members are not robots or computers to be pushed around by the Prime Minister. No, we are not computers or robots and the Prime Minister has never at any time insisted that we follow exactly what has been proposed in this measure. He has allowed us a free conscience in this matter as in all matters. In fact I think it is fairly obvious to the country now that not only does the Prime Minister permit us our own ideas but he encourages us to express them. He even sends out little feelers so that people will take up the bait and develop their own ideas. I think this is proper in the new politics we have in Canada and I welcome it.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the house that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—Dominion-Provincial Conference—possible increase in old age security benefits; the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Tétrault)—Solutions to Help Poor in Canada; the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart)—Medical Director—Moose Factory.

It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, public bills.

• (5:00 p.m.)

NOTICES OF MOTIONS

INCOME TAX ACT

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT REGARDING $500 EXEMPTION AT AGE 70

Mr. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act so that the additional $500 exemption presently granted to Canadian taxpayers under section 26 subsection (e) when they reach 70 years of age be granted at 65 years of age and that section 26 subsection (f) be repealed.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on re-examining my own motion this afternoon I notice there is a typographical error as it is printed in Orders of the Day. It should read "under section 26 subsection (1)(e)", and in the last line "section 26 subsection (1)(f)". The figure "1" has been left out in each case, but I think most hon. members who are prepared to debate the motion understand exactly the principle which is being put forward.

This motion requests an amendment to the Income Tax Act to grant the additional $500 exemption at age 65 which is now granted at age 70. The act at present, in section 26 (1)(e), states that a taxpayer can have an additional $500 exemption if he has attained 70 years of age before the end of the particular year. In other words, all taxpayers in Canada are granted an additional $500 exemption when they reach age 70.

A few years ago, in 1965, we added paragraph (f) to section 26(1). That paragraph states that the $500 exemption shall also be given to people who are over age 65 but are not receiving the old age pension. I feel that this law is inadequate. As I said at the beginning, the present law grants an exemption of an extra $500 to older persons. This provision was introduced at a time when the old age pension was given at age 70.

As hon. members know, a few years ago old age pensions of $75 were given at age 70, which meant $900 per year. At that time it was logical to grant the extra exemption at age 70 because the pension was given at age 70. However, under the last government headed by Mr. Pearson amendments were introduced to the Old Age Security Act and several things were done. First of all, a guaranteed income supplement of $30 was provided. Second, provision was made to increase pensions each year in accordance with the cost of living up to a limit of 2 per cent. Third, it was provided that pensions would be paid one year earlier each year until by the year 1970 they would be paid at age 65. This means this year the old age security pension is being paid at age 66 and that next year it will be given at age 65.

With these amendments to the old age security law we have the situation that a person can receive approximately $109 per month this year owing to the increase in the cost of living. This amounts to approximately $1,310 per year. However, if a pensioner is between 65 and 70 years of age he will only have an exemption amounting to $1,100, which means that the poor elderly people who have nothing but the old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement must pay income tax whereas people in the same position over 70 years of age will not have to pay income tax. This is a little complicated so perhaps I should repeat it.

Everyone over 70 years of age gets an extra $500 exemption which makes a total exemption of $1,600, well over the amount they receive from old age security and the guaranteed income supplement. However, people who retire, have no other income than the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement, and are between the ages of 65 and 70, only have the $1,100 exemption and therefore have to pay tax on a small amount. The tax is not much, but for many of these old people it is a great bother to fill out income tax forms since they are getting so little money. They feel it is a great injustice since those over 70 receiving the same income do not pay taxes at all.

Perhaps it has been an oversight in the last few years that there has been no amendment to correct this injustice. I have written to the minister on several occasions suggesting this reform of the Income Tax Act, but so far nothing has been done. I have been informed that the amendment I have put forward is being considered in conjunction with other amendments. However, I felt it necessary to introduce this motion in an attempt to get something done and to remind the government, the minister and his officials of this particular need.

The law as it now stands is not logical. The $500 exemption should be given to all persons over 65 years of age. This is the logical age because most people are retired by their companies at 65, and it is at this age that their earnings decrease considerably. They stop working and no longer receive regular paychecks. Most of them rely on old age security pensions and company pensions. In addition, they are beginning a period of their life when they are on fixed incomes.

People who retire at age 65 may have to live for 10 or 20 years, at least those who are lucky enough to have good health, on the same income they receive at age 65. During the inflationary period we are experiencing, which has been particularly serious in the last few years, the purchasing power of these fixed incomes has become less and less and it has become more and more necessary to provide greater relief for these people. I submit it is most appropriate that this extra exemption of $500 be given at age 65 so that the law will be made logical and reasonable throughout.

I mentioned the problem of inflation in respect of people on pensions and fixed incomes. I have also pointed out that the government has provided a certain increase in pensions each year in accordance with the cost of living, but there is a limit. Personally I would like to see government pensions increased each year without any limit but in strict accordance with the cost of living. Sooner or later this will have to be done. I should also like to see private pensions increased by companies on the same basis. Some of these pensions operate on this basis now, but I am sure the day will come when most of them will have to follow the cost of living index if they are to be reasonable. There are probably other measures which could help the old age pensioners. This is only one specific measure which I hope the minister will seriously consider.

When the guaranteed income supplement was introduced in the house I strongly supported it. I believe that pensions of this type provided by the government should be given to the people who can really use the money. We should give more to those people and less to those who have large private incomes. As a matter of fact, I would probably support a guaranteed income supplement up to $150, with less money going to those who have other sources of income. I think it is scandalous that the most our old age pensioners can get in this year 1969 is a little more than $109, whereas some old age pensioners are receiving the $75 pension from the government as well as large private pensions from their companies and other sources.

I will not spend much time on this measure, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has announced that in the spring he will present a completely new tax act in which exemptions will be rationalized and will be logical in the light of other provisions of the law. Therefore I await his proposed bill and look forward to seeing amendments in it which will give the old age pensioner a more reasonable exemption and a better way of life.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have had occasion to oppose proposals made by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). It is also true that it is a bit of a pattern around here to be critical of propositions made by members of other parties. But both of these approaches can be forgotten on this occasion. I offered to second the hon. member's motion, and except for the typographical errors he has had to correct I support it without reservation. I agree with the hon. member that this is not the only thing we ought to be doing for our old age pensioners. I believe that the basic amount of the non-means test pension should be increased. I believe we will have to establish an escalator provision in the old age security pension based not just on the cost of living but on the rise in the standard of living. As a matter of fact, I still think it was a fundamental mistake when we wrote the cost of living escalator into the Old Age Security Act and did not at that time base the annual adjustment on the wage index, which reflects a little more accurately the rise in the standard of living.

So I might go on with things that I believe ought to be done for our old age pensioners. I also agree with the hon. member—perhaps I might be pardoned for saying I am glad to hear he agrees with me—that pensions generally, both public and private, must be put on a basis so that they go up after people retire, or our whole pension structure may fall to the ground.

Having said that, what is before us today in the hon. member's resolution is one simple proposition that I think the government ought to accept without any delay, namely, that the difference between pensioners 70 years of age and over and pensioners between 65 and 70 years of age, so far as their income tax exemption level is concerned, should be wiped out. I well recall when this extra $500 exemption provision was presented to parliament. I was here then, as I was some years before that time. It was on May 18, 1948, when the Hon. Douglas Abbott, then minister of finance, made this statement as recorded in Hansard for that day, at page 4066:

> In the field of personal income taxes, I am proposing one change of significance which will, I believe, be accepted with commendation on all sides of the house. Having in mind the large number of elderly people living on small fixed incomes, and out of consideration for the particular trials and increased expenditures that usually come with advancing years, I am proposing that an additional exemption of $500 be granted to a taxpayer of 65 years of age or over. Many of these elderly people living on small pensions or other forms of fixed income with no opportunity to participate in the increased wages, salaries or profits enjoyed by other sections of the community, are particularly hard hit by the higher costs of living which present boom conditions have brought about. This group of our citizens is entitled, I think, to special consideration at this time.

Mr. Allmand: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I say to our friend, Mr. Justice Douglas Abbott, who has gone to higher realms, well said in 1948, and it still applies today. As hon. members know, this change was made at that time as a concession to those of us who were trying to get something done about the old age pension. We were trying to get the amount increased and the means test removed. The government had not yet seen its way clear to do what we were asking, so this was a bit of a concession. But even though it was presented in that spirit the statement made by Mr. Abbott was correct, and it applies today. The extra $500 exemption at age 65 stayed that way from 1948 until 1965, when Mr. Pearson came into the house one day to announce something that we welcomed, namely, that the old age security pension was going to be made payable at age 65, although this was to be done step by step.

This was a change from a government plan which had proposed that if you took the pension at an age below 70 you had to take a smaller amount and stay with it for life. Mr. Pearson announced on February 17, 1965, that this plan had been scrapped and that the old age security pension would be at a fixed rate for all ages from 65 up, although it would take a few years to get to that point.

As so often happens here with an announcement that is most welcome, there was a little tail at the end of it, which was that the additional $500 exemption which Mr. Abbott had granted in 1948 was going to be taken away from those people between 65 and 70 years of age while they were on the old age security pension. The record makes it clear that on that occasion, the very day on which Mr. Pearson made that announcement, I suggested that this was not the way to go about it at all, that if the government wanted to make a change the best way would be to increase the exemption for everybody to $1,500 for single persons and $3,000 for married persons, or whatever figure might be arrived at.

That is a brief history of the proposition, indicating why it was brought in in the first place and the way in which it was taken away from those between 65 and 70. But as the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has pointed out, the situation has now been reached where a great deal of suffering results from this plan. The hon. member pointed out, for example, what happens in the case of people who get both the old age security pension and the guaranteed income supplement. If they are over 70 years of age and that is all they have, they have no income tax to pay because of the extra $500 exemption. But people between 65 and 70 years of age who get precisely the same amount and, like their older friends, have the same expenses and are hit by the same increased cost of living, are subject to tax on their income in excess of $1,100. They can receive, as the hon. member said, a total of $1,310.40 a year from a combination of old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, but they have to pay tax on $210.40 of that, which amounts to something in excess of $30.

May I point out another injustice that has been perpetrated upon these people. When something like the social development tax is added it does not hit very hard the people in the $10,000, $20,000 and $30,000 income brackets but it really hits the people to whom I have referred in that they have to pay an extra 2 per cent on the total amount of their taxable income. Thus the type of person to whom I have just referred, who has to pay tax on $210.40, is hit with another 2 per cent, or $4.20. This is being done to people for whom it was said legislation was being brought in to guarantee their income, to bring them up to a certain point. So they are brought up with the one hand and taken down with the other.

I think the whole proposition is wrong and that this distinction should be abolished. I still think the best way to do it would be not simply to restore the $500 to these people but to make it $1,500 across the board. However, if the government thinks it cannot do this it should at least agree to the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce.

I doubt that there is a member of this House of Commons who is without examples of what this does to people. All of us have this drawn to our attention through the mail. Our old age pensioners think it is particularly unfair to treat them in this way. They are feeling the weight of this tax more than anybody else. I hope that members in all quarters of the house will agree to the proposition put forward by the hon. member, and that the resolution before us will pass today in the course of this private members' hour.

Mr. Jerry Pringle (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to associate myself with the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) who has proposed this motion. I should like to thank him for providing the house with the necessary statistics showing just what this means in terms of dollars and cents, and to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) also for his addendum in that regard.

I wish to approach this subject in a somewhat different manner in order to avoid repetition. First, I should explain that by reason of my location I happen to come into contact with more older or retired people than do those who live in most other areas of Canada.

My constituency is located in the lush, green Fraser Valley, in beautiful British Columbia, a province which is without doubt, notwithstanding some other prejudiced views, the most beautiful area in Canada if not the North American continent. Not only are the scenery and surroundings superb but the climate, on the average, is ideal the year round. We enjoy the diversity of changing seasons without the severity of extreme weather conditions experienced in other parts of Canada.

Aside from the fact that it is always exciting to reflect upon the advantages of living near the west coast, I am stressing the point at this time to explain my concern for our senior citizens. The lure of pleasant living conditions in British Columbia increases the percentage of retired people and pensioners in our area compared with other parts of Canada. I am told that members of Canada's armed forces stationed at bases from Victoria to Halifax provide an impressive waiting list of people requesting moves which will entitle them to retire on pension in B.C. A similar state of affairs exists among farmers, business and professional people. Therefore British Columbia boasts a very high percentage of retired Canadians living on pensions. We enjoy the company of many senior citizens who are depending on us for fair treatment. We are happy to welcome those who are becoming domiciled in B.C. and who are contributing the wisdom of their experience to Canadian life in our western paradise.

There was a time in the past, although I confess to some difficulty in recalling the exact period, when retirement was considered a milestone on the road of life, a time when people could relax and participate in recreational activities and other pursuits, a way of life denied to those who accepted sacrifice to assure ultimate educational opportunities for their children. Not too long ago, young men automatically initiated some plan for retirement when purchasing insurance protection for their families. I am sure there are a few members in this chamber today who can recall advertisements in daily papers promising fun and frolic at age 50. Even a young man like myself can recall the pictures of a man and wife, who appeared to be less than middle aged, relaxing in a handsome outboard motor boat, fishing, and convincingly indicating they did not have a care in the world. The caption probably read "You, too, can live like a king on $200 per month for the rest of your life." Now it is almost impossible to believe that the caption could have been valid. Nevertheless, in those days, with no dependents one could live like a king on $200 per month. The alarming fact is that many beneficiaries who sacrificed to save for a planned retirement with a life of ease are today's senior citizens.

Although this dream has long since been shattered by inflation, young people today are still raising families. They still sacrifice to provide a better way of life with adequate opportunities for their children. They still reach the age of retirement.

Old age pensioners, a term I dislike—I prefer senior citizen pensioners—now approach this category with considerable trepidation, if not outright fear. Life savings, regardless of amount, no longer constitute a bulwark against loss of salary on retirement. I do not refer to the relatively few who have amassed large fortunes, a large percentage of whom usually die young. My reference excludes those who have inherited too much wealth. Conversely, I cannot include those in our society who have failed to exert sufficient energy to support themselves and have been content to go through life as parasites, content to live on the dole on the premise that the world owes them a living. I admit that the actual percentage of Canadians within this category is low, even though our welfare costs are staggering.

The majority of Canadians are in the middle and low income brackets. These sincere, hard-working people who try desperately to pay their way are actually tomorrow's pensioners. The Canada Pension Plan will undoubtedly lessen their burdens by providing a small degree of security for future years. However, if it is valid to persuade Canadians that a participating program of compulsory pensions is designed for their benefit at age 65, can we, with any degree of sincerity, deem this small remuneration to be taxable until they reach the age of 70?

Another facet creating an additional burden for our older citizens is the increasing contempt of personnel officers for experience as opposed to academic degrees. Not long ago a man was considered employable until the age of 65. Most people, even though health and mental powers were intact at age 65, were willing to surrender to a younger generation. However, partly as a result of automation many in our society are now unacceptable at an age less than 50. Members of parliament now receive submissions from Canadians in all walks of life who suddenly find that, although they possess the esssential knowledge plus more experience than is required to fill vacancies, they are discriminated against because of age alone.

I mention this now, Mr. Speaker, because we are debating the possibility of partial relief for members of our society who have reached the age of 65. If the economics of productivity indicate that men of 50 or even less are too old to make a satisfactory contribution, is it not possible that this resolution is not only overdue but should include a measure of tax relief before the age of 65?

The gnawing and haunting effect of the steadily expanding inflationary spiral must, indeed, add a burden to senior citizens and pensioners. In this resolution we plead for this parliament to grant a small measure of relief by lowering the age limit for pensioners who will be eligible for an additional $500 exemption before income is taxed.

We are inclined to discuss the serious problems resulting from inflation among ourselves as they relate to fixed income citizens in general, and to pensioners in particular. I am somewhat impatient as I hope that we will soon refrain from discussion and initiate action.

The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford) recently issued a white paper on price stability. He deserves congratulations for the efforts of his department on this problem. We hope that design for action will be fruitful. Inasmuch as my career to date places me in the role of a businessman, I confess to some skepticism. The apparent approach to the problem of inflation control will be through another commission which will function without benefit of teeth. This is most idealistic, but is it realistic? Time will tell.

If we continue on the premise that free enterprise must be controlled by competition, and I firmly believe in this concept, then we surely must adhere to the accepted principle that any additional cost to a product automatically reflects in its selling price. Regular wage increases create regularly increased costs, which create regularly increased selling prices, which in turn perpetuate the inflationary spiral. The result increases the dollar value of Canada's gross national product, which I understand is considered to be justifiable reason for wage increases. The pensioners and fixed income citizens fail to participate in the guideline provided by the gross national product increases and subsequently fall by the wayside. The 2 per cent regular increase to pensioners recently prescribed would be acceptable if all personal incomes could be held to this percentage increase.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote from an article in "The Elder Statesman". The article is entitled "Senior Citizens, the victims of inflation". I quote:

> Senior citizens have long been the victims of inflation.
> The post-war (world war II) price spiral has gone up and up, without let up.
> As wages and prices expand, pensioner incomes shrink. The small monthly cheques they receive buy less and less.
> Wages and prices shoot upward each year. Until now pensions have been fixed, with only slight increases granted at rare intervals. These pitifully small increases to pitifully small pensions, have tended to be "to little", and often, "too late".
> And now—at long last—the government has decided on a regular increase. Two per cent is a small figure related to even a large sum (it is only 1/50th).
> It is no more than a drop in the big bucket of inflated prices which enter into the pensioners', and everybody's, cost of living. The cost of living has been rising at an alarming rate for the past 10 years. But senior citizens' pensions will increase only 2 per cent or $1.50 per month.
> It is obvious that the gap between wage income and pension income will continue to widen. It is equally obvious that with a small increase in income, and a big increase in prices, and cost of living each year, pensioners are dropping to lower depths into the pit at poverty.
>
> Pensioners belong to the not "smug" minority. They are at the lower end of the low income groups in Canada, who make up, we are told, 20 per cent of our population.
> It's high time that most of us became part of a "concerned majority", about the plight of our senior citizens. After all, we'll all be senior citizens some day. Our reward, and theirs, for a lifetime devoted to productive work on the labour market, should be an adequate income, not a mere subsistence allowance, relunctantly "dolled" out. This is the right of every citizen who worked hard and contributed much to making it possible for today's workers to achieve the higher wages and standard of living they now enjoy...
> Some countries are far ahead of us in their treatment of their senior citizens. Germany, for example, has long had legislation which adjusts senior citizens' pensions annually in line with the rise in the cost of living. Canada can do no less.
> We all applaud, and should support, Prime Minister Trudeau in his efforts to build a "just" society in Canada.
> There can be, and will be, no just society in Canada unless and until our senior citizens receive justice as "right" not a handout.

I reiterate that I firmly endorse the resolution presented by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand). I plead that the subject go to committee at once for further study, and that the report recommend prompt action by this house.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) whose notice of motion reads in part as follows:

> —the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act so that the additional $500 exemption presently granted to Canadian taxpayers... when they reach 70 years of age be granted at 65 years of age—

Mr. Speaker, I would like also to congratulate the previous speakers who so eloquently held their own. In my opinion, the fact that such a notice of motion has been put the house and the question brought to the attention of the government is an indication of the dissatisfaction which prevails regarding present government policies. Once more, I congratulate the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who will not give up and who has chosen this moment to discuss the fate of people of 65 years of age and over.

Whether we agree or not, if we consider their background, we realize that these people were born in difficult times, when there was no electric lighting, when houses were lighted with candles and oil lamps. In fact, it was then very difficult, for most people, to receive an adequate education at the little red school house; it was also the time of the economic crisis.

Those people help to build the country by working at the construction of our highways—we know that they did so with the pick and the shovel, the hard way—and our railways. All things considered, everything was difficult, everywhere. Those people contributed twice financially, physically and often morally, to the war effort and some of them, who have now reached pension age, often sacrificed to the army one or two of their sons killed on the battlefield. To-day those very people are abandoned. After having worked hard, after having done their very best, after having financed municipalities and school boards, after having paid taxes and union fees, they are compelled to quit work at 60, because some insurance plans do not protect them from an employer who does not want to take the risk of guaranteeing a job to someone who cannot be insured. This is why I support unreservedly the resolution of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and, moreover, I wonder if 65 is not still too late in life. Indeed, when the bill is referred to the committee, I wonder if it would not be possible to lower the eligible age to 60. Since it is difficult to find employment even for a person of 20 or 25 and that there are many unemployed between 35 and 40, I feel that we should consider the possibility of granting a pension to persons of 60 years of age, while allowing them a tax reduction. I think that by doing so, justice would be rendered. It is not a matter of making a gift to those people nor of giving them an extravagant amount, but merely of giving them their due. As I said before, those people, at 60 or 65, are rejected; they no longer belong to their union, nobody takes care of them. I conclude by congratulating the hon. member who proposed that we take a little time to deal with the problem of those people who built our country. I feel that everything that aims at improving their situation deserves the attention of the government and that is why—and I say this in the name of our party—we fully support the measure.

[English]

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) upon bringing before the house this important and thoughtful measure. Those of us representing ridings containing many old age pensioners are made aware daily of how urgent it is to improve pension conditions for our older citizens. We should be hard hearted indeed if we did not sympathize with the needs of our pensioners. For that reason alone, we ought to congratulate the hon. member for bringing this measure forward, because he has done the country as a whole a service.

[Mr. Godin.]

The pension field is very complicated, difficult and full of surprises. In my mail the other day I had a letter from a very old lady who said that she and her husband live on a pension which is well under $3,000, the amount the Economic Council has referred to as the poverty line, and they both managed quite well. She said that although they do not have a great many luxuries, she and her husband are proud they can get along on their pension and do not want to take anything extra from the government. It was such an unusual letter that I thought it worth mentioning here.

It is important to note, Mr. Speaker, that the deductions or exemptions suggested in the motion before the house would provide a larger tax reduction for those with high incomes than for those with low and medium range incomes. I ask whether that would really help our old age pensioners? I submit that a $500 deduction does not mean very much to a taxpayer receiving little but the old age pension. On the other hand, it represents a sizeable sum of money to someone with a large income. I shall compare some figures if I may.

Let us take the case of the pensioner receiving the basic minimum of $1,310 a year. Without the $500 deduction he would pay $31.08 tax. With the $500 deduction he would pay no tax. At the same time let us take the case of the taxpayer whose income is $20,000 per year. If that taxpayer were eligible for the $500 reduction as mentioned in the motion, his tax savings would amount to $232 a year.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has talked of the problems of our old age pensioners and poor people. I submit that by adopting this proposal we would not be helping our poor. I ask, does this measure tackle the problem of poverty among our old age pensioners in the right way? Surely, we ought to give the most consideration to those persons receiving between $1,300 and $3,000 a year. It has been estimated that implementing this measure would cost the country between $20 million and $25 million a year of badly needed revenue.

Mr. Allmand: Would the hon. member permit a question? I should be interested in knowing the source of the statistics he is quoting to us.

Mr. Howard (Okanagan Boundary): I have done some research on this matter. The figures relating to what this measure, if implemented, would cost the national treasury I believe are reasonably accurate. We must remember that this measure would not help those old age pensioners or old people who have little or no income. Some argue that merely because a man reaches 65 or 70 years of age he ought to be entitled to some additional tax exemption. I do not support that contention. Many in this old age group have far higher than average earnings and are well able to pay the taxes demanded of them. Amounts collected from the people who are better off could go towards helping those in the lower income brackets. I submit that many of our difficulties in this field stem from our inadequate and piecemeal welfare programs. If we want to help our underprivileged, surely it would be better to do so by direct assistance rather than by imposing tax exemptions which discriminate against the poor and favour the rich.

Our welfare legislation needs to be thoroughly reviewed if we are to remedy this problem area. I hope the mere fact this notice of motion appears on the order paper will prompt the government to overhaul our existing welfare legislation. I agree that the situation is urgent, but I do not think that adopting this measure is the best or correct way of helping our people. I say that because I do not believe the solution suggested in the resolution will bring about an equitable remedy of this difficult situation.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I join with hon. members who have spoken in congratulating the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) in bringing forward his notice of motion at this time. His action in doing so is consistent with what I know of his approach to public policy, an approach that is based on concern for people and particularly for those who are in the less advantaged groups.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Watch out! You've had it.

Mr. Gray: Every proposal to change tax law has many implications. In fact, I think we can agree that every proposed change in law creates various effects. To give a proposal of the sort put forward by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce the consideration it deserves would mean discussing it as fully as possible and looking at all the effects created by it.

• (5:50 p.m.)

Let me say at once, Mr. Speaker, this should not necessarily mean that ultimately on balance if it may appear that implementation of such a proposal is the best thing to do under the circumstances, that such a decision should not be made. It may mean rather that if and when such a proposal is put into effect it would be taken with the full knowledge and understanding of all its implications. We must remember that under our rules, whether or not we agree with them in this regard, private members cannot propose bills to change tax laws. Such bills in effect cannot be moved by private members, but instead must be moved by a member of the Privy Council on behalf of the government. This is why if members have proposals of the type put forward by the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, under the rules of this house they must present them as he has done in the form of a Notice of Motion.

It is my understanding that if such a motion is adopted by the house it would not have the effect of actually changing the law in the way it proposes. Conversely, if the motion does not happen to come to a vote in the hour set aside for its discussion, that does not mean a change in the law which is considered desirable by some or all members of the house has been defeated or turned aside. It means only that the time set aside for discussion of the proposal in the Notice of Motion has gone by without all those wishing to speak having been heard. At the same time, it does mean that the real purpose of allowing Notices of Motion to be placed on the Order Paper will have been served. This purpose is to enable the mover to present his views to the house, and therefore to the country, and to enable other members to present their own views on his proposal.

One must recognize, Mr. Speaker, there is more to be done for our senior citizens. In recognizing the need for additional action one cannot overlook the steps forward that have been made in the past five years to aid our senior citizens. There have been increases in the basic old age security pension, reduction over a 5 year period of the eligible age to 65, creation of the guaranteed income supplement and for those who have retired since 1966, the creation of the Canada Pension Plan. As I said, there is more to be done for our senior citizens. In my opinion, the proposal in this Notice of Motion is certainly among the measures that are worthy of additional and serious consideration.

I want to examine, therefore, some of the implications of this very useful proposal. The Notice of Motion urges an amendment to make the income tax deduction for older taxpayers more generous than it is at present. The present law provides deductions from taxable income in the following ways. In the case of a taxpayer who has attained the age of 70 years before the end of the year, the deduction is $500. It is $500 in the case of a taxpayer who before the end of the year has attained the age of 65 years but has not attained the age of 70 years, if no pension under the Old Age Security Act has been authorized to be paid to him for any month in the year.

It is my understanding, Mr. Speaker, when it was decided to lower the eligible age for the old age security pension gradually from age 70 to age 65, a step to which I have already referred, it was also decided by the government of the day that the cost of paying this pension to persons under age 70 would be offset in part by the withdrawl of the special $500 deduction for those wo received the pension and were under the age of 70.

The change to the payment of old age security pensions at ages under 70 added substantially to the cost of providing these pensions. The government felt that rather than impose new taxes to meet this cost it should instead recover a small portion of the additional expenditure by withdrawing the extra $500 deduction from those who receive the pension while under age 70. It was felt that an individual may elect not to apply for the pension if he finds that he would be better off to retain the $500 deduction. It was argued that for the great majority of individuals between the ages of 65 and 70, the lowering of the age at which individuals may receive the pension had a more beneficial effect than the $500 deduction.

This argument implies that when the old age pension is received, or for that matter when the senior citizen is eligible to receive it, it will not bring about any lessening of income. However, some employee pension plans provide in effect that the retired employee's pension will be decreased by the amount of old age security pension he is eligible to receive whether he draws it or not. This means that some senior citizens may find themselves forced to take the old age security pension in order to receive the same amount as before they became eligible for this pension. As a result, they find themselves deprived of the $500 exemption, even though they do not get one extra dollar because of their eligibility for old age security pension.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this particular area of change is certainly worthy of further study. The hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Howard) has already brought to the attention of the house the fact that to put into effect what is proposed by the hon. member in his Notice of Motion would lead to the necessity of the Department of Finance finding other income in the amount of some $25 million. One would have to consider how this income is to be found, what other rates of tax are to be changed and on whom the additional tax burdens are to be imposed.

It is interesting to note that members of the New Democratic party have been proposing that the report of the Carter royal commission on taxation be implemented as a package. However, this commission recommended that only taxpayers between ages 65 and 70 who do not receive the old age security pension should be allowed an additional $500 deduction, and that the $500 deduction for individuals who are 70 years of age and over should be repealed.

Those hon. members may not realize that if they support the proposal of the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce they are, in effect, arguing against a proposal put forward in the Carter Commission report which they say should be adopted as a package.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us where you stand.

Mr. Gray: In my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I think I have made clear my own position in calling for further action to assist our senior citizens.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The hour for consideration of private members business having expired, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton) for the second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs of Bill C-150, to amend the Criminal Code, the Parole Act, the Penitentiary Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act and to make certain consequential amendments to the Combines Investigation Act, the Customs Tariff and the National Defence Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, before the hour appointed for the consideration of private members' business, I had begun expressing some of my ideas, and before proceeding further with my speech, I would like to summarize my previous remarks.

[English]

Before the dinner adjournment, Mr. Speaker, I explained that I felt it was my solemn duty to speak in this debate because I am opposed to one, and only to one of the proposed amendments to the Criminal Code. I said that our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has given us every latitude to express our opinions, not only on this issue but on all issues which affect the government of Canada. He has not only allowed us to express our own opinions but has encouraged us to do so. That is why I do not like to hear people say that we are being muzzled or that we are being treated as robots or computers by having to accept a bill with part of which perhaps we do not agree. If that were the case I would not be speaking in this debate at all.

One of the principles which I uphold is that no one should force his or her religious opinions on anyone else in a pluralistic society. If we want to discuss religion that is one thing, but when we are talking about the natural order which concerns items of public morality I do not believe that has anything to do with religion.

So far as religious considerations are concerned, I am opposed to divorce. I believe that certain sexual behavior among human beings is sinful from the point of view of religion, but I certainly have no right to expect other people in Canada to accept my views. But when it comes to a question of public morality, of the natural law, this is not a question of religion. It is above and beyond it. This is where the question of conscience becomes so delicate.

I make no secret of the fact that I have always been of the opinion, and I have made my views known to our caucus and our Prime Minister, that I would have preferred the portion of this legislation dealing with abortion to be made a matter of a free vote. I would have preferred that because I think it is no less important than the issue of capital punishment, which was decided by this house on a free vote. Legislation on abortion went through the British parliament with a free vote.

However, should the majority in this house decide that this legislation should go through as one bill I see no reason why I cannot support the bill in toto. One cannot reject a complete bill, which I consider to have 125 goods proposals, simply because there is one proposal in it with which I cannot agree.

Those who have studied philosophy and theology will perhaps recall the term "the perplexed conscience", where one is faced with such a situation. I believe that in accord with my conscience I am quite capable of supporting the omnibus bill should it come to a vote as a complete bill, yet still being opposed to one of the amendments. That is why I feel it is my duty to make it known that I am opposed to one of the amendments.

I would simply ask those who support the enlarging or the extending of the abortion laws to be honest in their arguments. We have heard so many arguments that have nothing to do with the bill before us. We have heard how we must do away with backroom abortions, kitchen table abortions, and how we must take care of the young girl who has been raped. We have heard how we must take care of the people who possibly will have deformed children. This has nothing to do with the piece of legislation that is before us.

If people insist in making these kinds of arguments, then obviously they are regarding this piece of legislation as a stepping stone to a further enlargement of the abortion laws. I think we should be consistent in our arguments. If we are talking about this particular law, this particular proposal, then I think we should leave these other arguments out of our discussion.

The main change proposed covers the question of endangering the life or health of the mother. This seems to be the part that is causing the most difficulty. The operative words mention a certificate in writing stating that a "female person would or would be likely to endanger her life or health." I think that that particular clause is the danger point of the whole issue. The words "or health" could mean any number of things.

Criminal Code

The hon. lady who spoke before me pointed out the definition of health as given at the United Nations. She spoke about social health and mental health. For seven years, while engaged in the pharmaceutical industry, I was very closely associated with hospitals. I think I know as much about doctors and hospitals as the committees that are set up which make decisions regarding health. Although I have great respect for the medical profession, I am not one who places a doctor on a pedestal as being a god who can decide between life and death. I know there have been hospital committees in the gynaecological field which have determined whether or not a woman should have a hysterectomy. I know that this decision has depended upon one person because the gynaecologist on the committee was the one most qualified and therefore was the one who decided. We all know that many uteri were removed in this country which should never have been removed. The same thing would apply in respect of this committee which would be set up in the hospitals.

Suppose a committee on mental health should be established. The psychiatrist member of that committee would be the one who would make the decision because he would be the most qualified to decide in matters of mental health. If he decided that a woman should be aborted because of her mental state, that would be it. So, I think this question of relegating these decisions to a doctor is not what it is cracked up to be. I believe that by bringing in this kind of an amendment we are simply doing one thing; we are opening the door to abortion on demand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): If that is what the advocates of this bill want, that is fine. I hear some hon. members applaud. I am sure that is exactly what some hon. members want. I suggest they should say so and not attempt to bring that about under the guise of this particular amendment.

I can do no better than quote my hon. colleague from Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan) with regard to this matter of abortion on demand. At page 4785 of Hansard for January 24 he is reported as saying:

> As someone on the committee said, he would like to see the abortion law opened wide but he believed in proceeding bit by bit.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

Is that what we are doing, proceeding bit by bit to get abortion on demand? Then, the quotation continues:

> So we have already had notice that this is only the start of the movement. If the members of this house permit the altering of these abortion laws as proposed there is no logical reason that can be submitted later why the unwanted, the unproductive, the deformed and the mentally retarded members of our society should not be exterminated.

I think that is a very forceful point my hon. friend has made. It goes right to the root of this problem. Before concluding my remarks, I should like to leave this thought with members of the house. We have seen throughout history that whenever a nation has relaxed its moral code it has opened the door to decadence. We have seen this happen in the history of the Roman empire and we have seen it in more recent times. I believe Canada is on the threshold of greatness. We will become great only inasmuch as we respect life and the right of all human beings to follow their own conscience.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, the Criminal Code of Canada is one of the great pieces of Canadian legislation. By it we can judge the standards that we expect of each other. By it we give some indication of the compassion we feel toward each other. The thoughtfulness that has gone into this debate so far is an indication that this very serious piece of legislation is receiving due and proper attention in this chamber.

I propose in a few remarks to point out three areas of the omnibus bill where I am in quite strong agreement, although I have suggestions for improvement. There are several in respect of which I am in complete disagreement. Then, there is one area where I go through the agony of doubt that I am sure has beset many other members in the house.

First, let us deal with the items that are not in this measure which is before us. I believe that sooner or later we must grasp the nettle of dealing with the question of insanity and bring the provisions of the Criminal Code up to date. Important studies have been made and a good deal of experience and opinion is available to us. We must not allow the criminal law of the country in this regard to become hopelessly out of date. Correspondents of mine have noted that the proposed legislation does not contain a provision that was presented by the previous minister of justice, the present Prime Minister of Canada. Perhaps I might have the indulgence of the house to note that this lack in the omnibus bill is covered in another bill. I am referring to the amendment to section 150(2)(c). This provision which was proposed by the present Prime Minister is now contained in Bill S-15 which was passed by the Senate on November 19 and is before us. I shall read this clause because we all have correspondence and this is a good way to bring the point to the attention of the dozens of people who are concerned about it. The amendment as set forth in Bill S-15 is as follows:

—offers to sell, advertises, publishes an advertisement of, or has for sale or disposal any means, instructions, medicine, drug or article intended or represented as a method of causing abortion or miscarriage,

The words which are being deleted from the present law are "preventing conception".

Voilà, monsieur l'Orateur, as to the bill before us. I agree with the breathalyzer provision. Probably I would not have a few years back, but I think the menace of drunken or impaired drivers on the highways of Canada has become so great that rather drastic measures must be taken by the House of Commons to cure that evil. So I shall have no wrestling with my conscience when it comes to the breathalyzer proposal, although later I will indicate that I am not in favour of making a criminal of the person who does refuse a breathalyzer test.

I should like to point out to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) however that there will be a question of doubt at the magistrate's court level about the value of the breathalyzer test unless there is an improvement in the breathalyzers themselves or some change in the draftsmanship of the particular clause. The reason I say this is that there is expert evidence available which indicates that a reading on a breathalyzer has a margin of error no more than .01 below the reading. It could be as much as .02 above but since we are dealing with minimums I will deal with the .01 below the reading. So, if we are dealing with a reading of .08 on a breathalyzer and agree that this is the standard we should impose by this legislation then the legislation should read .09 because of that margin of error I have indicated.

• (8:20 p.m.)

In order to put my case before the house in better form, I should like to quote from the transcript of a case that was tried in Nova Scotia. I will not give the name of the accused, since I do not suppose anybody enjoys having his name bandied about in Hansard, but I will note that counsel for the crown was Elmer MacDonald, a very experienced criminal trial lawyer, and that counsel for the defence was G. L. S. Hart, who is now Mr. Justice Hart of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. The case was tried before His Honour Martin Haley, who is a magistrate in the Dartmouth courts. The witness whose evidence I am about to quote is Donald Joseph Saturley of the R.C.M.P., stationed at the crime laboratory at Sackville in the province of New Brunswick. Let me quote these questions and answers:

By the Court: Well how did your results, with respect to the direct blood analysis compare to the breathalyzer machine?

A. We found that the breathalyzer machine, essentially, reads lower than direct blood analysis.

By the Court: How much lower?

A. The limited accuracy of the breathalyzer is .01% high or minus .02%. For example, a reading of .15% could be as high as .17 or as low as .14. That is to say the breathalyzer consistently reads low.

Q. It does?

A. Yes, over a large number of—

By the Court: Then how accurate is the breathalyzer?

A. It's accurate to within these limits. In other words a reading of .11% couldn't be distinguished from a reading of .12% because the breathalyzer just isn't that accurate, but it could be distinguished from a reading of .13%.

By the Court: But where are we going to land if Mr. Trudeau's bill C-195 goes through and he says that .10 is going to be prima facie evidence of impairment?

That was the number of the former bill. The answer was:

A. Yes.

By the Court: So the guy could be probably .09 then?

A. That's correct, Your Honour.

By the Court: For my own information, since you're here, what good is that bill to be then if they put in a prima facie .1%?

A. I don't know if that point has been considered in the bill, the accuracy of the instrument used to measure the alcohol level. It's something that will have to be thought about.

I make the point that if we accept as a principle that the reading of .08 is what we are aiming for, and above which an individual should be convicted of impaired driving, then we will probably have to put .09 in our legislation instead of .08 to allow for that margin of error. If we do not make that allowance there will be a class of case which the magistrates will have to dismiss on the grounds of reasonable doubt since they will be seized with the knowledge that the breathalyzer is not absolutely accurate.

Let me now refer to the gun laws. When the original bill was presented I found this subject to be the most contentious in my riding, apart from the abortion provisions. All sorts of gun clubs made representations to my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall), and myself. We have heard nothing from them since as a result of the changes the minister has brought about, so I fully support the measure as it now stands. Indeed, my strong reluctance before was that it seemed to impose perhaps overly strong burdens on members of professional gun associations, those people who would not be expected to misuse guns in any event. As far as the general principle is concerned, I do not believe there is an inalienable or sacred right to carry weapons. I fully support the idea that we must have gun laws and gun control.

Thirdly, sir, I give my wholehearted support to the concept set forth at page 101 of the omnibus bill which involves the question of day parole. This is the first time we have had day parole as such spelled out with reference to the functions of the National Parole Board. It was the magistrate I mentioned earlier, Mr. Haley of Dartmouth, who first used, at least to my knowledge, day parole in Canada. He felt that somebody given a jail term for impaired driving or the like should not have to spend all the time during his sentence in jail because this would impose a hardship on the wife and family. He felt certain persons should be allowed out by day to earn a living, while still undergoing the stigma of being in jail at night.

I believe the idea of day parole probably began in respect of offences under provincial statute. I am glad to see this idea extended as a nationwide principle. I hope members of the committee will invite Judge Haley to come to Ottawa to tell about some of the cases he has dealt with on these terms. This is a far-reaching step in Canada, but it is a method which has been used in other parts of the civilized world, including the state of California where it was perhaps first tried.

Finally, I should like to turn to those areas in respect of which I am in strong disagreement. The first of these concerns lotteries. Lotteries are mugs games or methods of having the people who do not have the wherewithal to pay taxes pay for services that should be paid by state taxes. To my knowledge there has not been such a lottery which has lived up to expectation. New York State is trying one and the revenue is running well below what it was hoped to achieve in this way. The state of New Hampshire has had one for several years, again with the same result.

Getting closer to home, the city of Montreal is trying to run a lottery and is now having to increase the prizes, still without achieving the intended goal. Montreal calls their scheme a voluntary tax measure, but whatever it is called it still smells the same as a lottery. The town of Moose Jaw seems to be getting sucked into this general trend. I hope the people there will have sense enough to turn back before they become embroiled in a venture which will not achieve what they have in mind.

The United States was chock full of lotteries during the last century. Some 60, 70 or 80 years ago federal law wiped out every last one and there were very few, except several skilled promoters, who mourned the passing of lotteries. I suppose the following generation has forgotten about them and now thinks we should give lotteries a try. I suggest this is a mug's game or a method of talking poor people into spending money ill-advisedly on the chance that lightning will, in some pleasant way, strike them. No responsible parliament should give its sanction to this method of raising public revenue.

A British royal commission in 1951, after examining this question came to the conclusion:

> —that there is no important advantage to be gained by the establishment of a national lottery and that there is no reason, in this particular case, to depart from the general principle that it is undesirable for the state to make itself responsible for the provision of gambling facilities.

I turn to the view of two gentlemen who faced each other across the aisle in this very chamber for a long period of time. They were two bachelor Prime Ministers, neither of which was the present Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). In 1934 when R. B. Bennett was prime minister and spoke about a bill to legalize lotteries, he said:

> When I am asked to exercise my vote as a member of the House of Commons of Canada to say that we shall legalize that which has brought the misery to the human race that games of chance and lotteries have brought, I propose to exercise my vote against any such thing . . . If I were to sit upon a jury, I would have to find the evidence against lotteries far outweighs any suppport that can be found either in the past or the present.

• (8:30 p.m.)

From the other side of the aisle Mackenzie King, perhaps agreeing with the Right Hon.

R. B. Bennett one of the few times in his life—I do not know; they certainly both agreed they should be bachelors but perhaps this was another area of agreement—said this:

> I find myself in entire agreement with the Right Honourable the Prime Minister. My convictions in the matter are quite as firm, as profound and sincere as his own . . . I hold that there are very strong reasons why those who have to do with the shaping of public opinion should not further or countenance any measure which, by statute, would publicly encourage gambling.

Mr. Baldwin: Maybe he thought there was a very close relationship between bachelorhood and lotteries.

Mr. McCleave: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) has made a remark which I hope goes on the record. It is a very pertinent one on the possible connection between lotteries, bachelorhood and gambling.

Mr. Nesbitt: I have never gambled in my life.

Mr. McCleave: And the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has never gambled in his life.

An hon. Member: He is a bachelor.

Mr. McCleave: My second area of strong disagreement with what is proposed in the omnibus bill relates to homosexuality. If I were to approach this as a problem to be solved, I probably would not see it either in terms of crime or of punishment but in terms of disease or pathological complaint. I suggest to this honourable chamber that we should take a close look at a new method of tackling the problem, as we should. I hope in time we shall take a new approach to the problem of alcoholism and how we tackle it. I think they are very much the same type of problem. I think it is wrong to deal with them as crimes first, and then crimes deserving of the particular forms of punishment that we have because our forms of punishment are very limited. In any event, my conscience becomes so abhored by the thought of the sanction that we hope to give to homosexuality that I have no option but to vote against the provision.

I would draw the attention of the minister and those members who will be on the committee to the fact that the consenting portion of the proposal before us is somewhat curiously drafted. It is almost on all fours with the portion of the Criminal Code which deals with consent in the case of rape. But instead of using the words "false and fraudulent representations," as are set forth in section 145 of the Criminal Code dealing with rape, this bill uses the words "false and fraudulent misrepresentations." The purists of language in the house might wish to find out the difference between "false and fraudulent misrepresentations" and "false and fraudulent representations".

I draw another matter to the attention of the minister. I do this sort of thing tonight because I suppose there will be a few more days of debate before we get to committee, and this will give the minister's advisers a chance to further study the measure. I suggest that if a homosexual act is procured by duress or force, this should be in the exception feature of the proposed clause. This clause provides that a person shall be deemed not to consent to the commission of an act if the consent is extorted by threats or fear of bodily harm or is obtained by false and fraudulent misrepresentations as to the nature and quality of the act. I am suggesting that somebody's arm may be twisted behind his back to consent to such an act, and therefore this should be added to the other exceptions. In any event, as a matter of basic principle and because I think we have to set standards by which we expect people to live, I could not give my consent to the homosexuality provisions of the proposed omnibus bill.

The third point on which I disagree violently with the government which brought in this measure concerns the clause which would make it an offence to refuse a breathalyzer test if a policeman asks one to undergo it. If a policeman has good and reasonable grounds to believe that you should undergo a test he will probably have enough evidence to support his case against you, and that will be that. There will be a conviction, a fine and the loss of your driver's licence. I think that is fair ball, for the reasons I indicated earlier, namely, that the holocaust on the highways is now so severe that we have to take steps here, whether we like to or not, to do something to cut it down. But I say this provision is going too far because it represents double punishment of a person. I propose, therefore, to vote against the provision.

Finally, I come to the area of extreme and extraordinary doubt. This is the provision that deals with abortion. I have listened to the arguments. I have read a bit on the subject; not as much as I would like, but I will read some more. There are a couple of points that tend to crystallize my thinking. I know the objection of the Roman Catholic church and other religions to the idea of abortion. That objection does not seem to me to be insurmountable or to be a reason in itself why I should vote for that point of view. If a Roman Catholic woman feels strongly enough about her religion, presumably she would not consent to an abortion in any case.

The people concerned have an option; therefore I do not see there is any obstacle to anybody reaching a decision. If a faith has this as an important part of its philosophy, presumably those who live under or by that faith will carry out the dictates of that philosophy. But there are other points on which I am not satisfied with regard to this question and I hope in the committee we will hear some evidence on them.

I realize that the issue of abortion has been scouted in another committee of the house in recent years, but I understand that much of that hearing was concerned with the religious opinion, perhaps I may even call it the emotional opinion, pro and con on the issue.

I also understand that some medical evidence before the committee indicated that a person who is aborted for good reason may find it more difficult in the future to bear children easily or without hazard to herself. It is this medical point that I would like to have cleared up when the committee considers the abortion portion of this bill.

I have two other points, Mr. Speaker. These concern the formula arrived at by the government in bringing this measure before us. The bill refers to accredited hospitals. Sir, only some 50 per cent of the hospitals across Canada are accredited, I gather. The provisions of this bill would probably be quite unworkable in remote areas or in most rural areas of Canada because the type of hospital situated in such areas is not accredited. Accreditation is not something which comes automatically. I understand it can be withheld because, for example, a hospital is too small, even though nothing is said against the standard maintained or the type of care provided. The hospital may simply be of a humble nature, without a large staff or certain types of equipment. I think the government, and certainly the committee, will wish to look at the formula again to decide whether it is even workable.

In the second place, the number of doctors to be involved in the panel referred to in the formula raises a question in my mind. How can places like Churchill, Manitoba, or similar towns removed from large cities, comply with this formula? There would not be enough doctors in such communities to form the committee mentioned. I think the people who drew up the formula, well motivated as they undoubtedly were, simply did not take into account the facts of life in rural Canada.

These are a few of my thoughts on the matter. I look forward to hearing more of the debate and to coming to grips with some of the great problems of our time as expressed in these clauses. I thank the chamber for its courtesy.

[Translation]

Mr. Romuald Rodrigue (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, the amendments proposed in Bill No. C-150 are among the most important changes to the criminal legislation ever introduced in this house. A great number of areas are affected thereby and we are asked to pass amendments having to do with more than 120 clauses of the Criminal Code of Canada. A few of the previous speakers pointed out that more important amendments have been brought in before.

Several of them are distinguished members of the Canadian Bar, including the minister himself, and they all are men of merit. As I am not a lawyer, I shall leave it to them to discuss how important were the changes made in the Canadian Criminal Code at one point or another of our history.

In his introductory remarks, the minister said that he respected the personal convictions of all hon. members. I am quite grateful to him for that.

Mr. Speaker, I respectfully listened to and reread the speeches and arguments of the previous speakers. They spoke with dignity and tried to pass on to us as much of their knowledge as possible without repudiating their own convictions.

The bill before us contains a great deal of valuable and desirable amendments. However, some provisions are unacceptable, and I can neither approve nor support them. Other important changes and clarifications could have been put in but are not included in the measure.

This proposal, important in view of the number of sections it seeks to amend, contains contentious provisions and I think, in particular, of the one that deals with abortion.

In my opinion, the right to live is a basic human right on which depend all the others that every human being is entitled to claim. Without the right to life, we are deprived of all others.

The right to life is a natural right, for all human beings without exception, whether they are rich, poor or crippled. It means that all human lives have the same value.

That is the fundamental point on which rest our notions of justice, that is the recognition that all human beings, from their conception to their death, are equal in the sight of the law and have exactly the same right to live.

Life is the greatest possession given to us by the Creator. How many times have we not heard, from people at the point of death, the following words: I would give everything I own to continue to live or to recover? That is evidence that life is a blessing we all value.

It is a mistake to try to compare the value of life and that of a material good, because property, as human life, has a value. However, it is clear that they are different types of value. Property has value for man and for his aims, but one of the fundamental principles of our society holds that human life is a value in itself.

If we only considered the value of a person in relation to others, any human life could be sacrificed according to this point of comparison.

Such a value given by us to any human life does not depend upon the external appearance nor upon the power nor upon the intelligence of man. The life of a disabled or ill person has the same value as that of a person in the best of health.

We must therefore recognize that the child still in its mother's womb has a full human value and an equal right to live as a human being. The value of such a life before birth is compared to that of the life of a person existing already among us.

Before birth, the child is already living. The only difference is that such a child is concealed in its mother's womb so it is easier to consider it as not existing.

Mr. Speaker, the law must protect the right to live especially the right of the defenceless ones. It rests with the government to pass laws respecting all values and especially the right to live. Otherwise, what could be the value of all the other laws?

The right to live is a basic right and it is up to the legislator to legislate so as to protect such a right. The one who takes the life of another person takes away from that person a possession, a value, in fact he robs that person of a right. We restrict when it comes to thefts of any kind. People are sentenced every day for such an offence. We are shocked sometimes by the more or less strict sentence that is delivered, considering the value of the stolen articles or the frequency of such acts.

And now, we want to legalize a still greater theft, one concerning the life of a person, a value that cannot be replaced. That is surely worthy of our consideration.

All kinds of reasons are being put forward to justify the proposed amendments, especially that the law should be in accordance with our times, that it is required for the well-being of society, that one must recognize life as it is nowadays and that all our laws should be amended and adapted to the technological era.

The generations that have succeeded one another for 2,000 years have heard many proposals of that kind. Scarcely 30 years ago, war was declared; the war that was to be the last one and that was to establish peace forever. At that time, the following slogan was used: Let us save Christendom. What Christendom? I still wonder why and I am not the only one.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to quote historic facts and precedents to make my personal convictions and those of my constituents known. I admit that our Criminal Code and some of our laws should be amended. Moreover, we of the Ralliement creditiste have proved on several occasions in the past that we did not intend to depart from our line of conduct, even if we believe that our laws should be improved and brought up to date, will not accept improvements that go against our personal convictions, natural law and the right to live.

That it may be necessary to elucidate the law, I agree. But when changes are made simply to suit an individual of a group, then I disagree. We are living in a period of protest, good or bad, but in a period in which efforts are made to banish violence from our laws and our lives. However, we are asked to consider abortion as a solution to the social problem of the unwanted child.

We are reminded by history that, not so long ago, some human beings were considered undesirable and had to sacrifice their life; when six million Jews were exterminated by the Nazis. Still nowadays, human beings like us, but of a different colour, are suffering and often lose their life. And what about the millions of political prisoners exterminated by totalitarian regimes throughout the world. Those examples are the reflection of as many social problems which will not be solved by violence.

It is truly ironic to note the situation in our country as far as social legislation is concerned. Shortly after abolishing the death penalty—a measure which has put our country in first place among those that respect human life—we want to pass a legislation which will destroy life instead of protecting it.

Canada and the Canadian people have become champions of the oppressed, defenceless individual. This is the opportunity for us to prove it to the whole world.

It is unfortunate that the clauses concerning abortion and homosexuality have been included in the omnibus bill. Bill No. C-150 contains improvements which we approve and which we would have supported. However, we cannot accept the bill as it stands now, because it is a denial of the right to live and it would legalize violence.

We think that the clauses dealing with abortion should be deleted from the bill and studied in greater detail. The proceedings of the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs show that different views are held on basic issues.

In my opinion, this evidence should have been taken into consideration and the matter studied more thoroughly.

Clause 195 does not mention that human life exists as of the time of conception, thus even before birth, and it is precisely that life which has to be protected. Considering life as an intrinsic value the proposed changes are therefore not acceptable. It is on these grounds that I say that some proposals contained in bill No. 150 cannot be accepted and that certain sections of our Criminal Code are not justified. That is why the bill is contentious.

Certain sections were drafted a long time ago and they come in conflict with today's scientific discoveries.

Bill No. C-150 lists a long series of changes relating to homosexuality, abortion, the prevention of cruelty to animals, the Customs tariff, the National Defence Act, etc. I skip some of them because it would be too long a list. The number of clauses contained in this bill is quite impressive and, as I am not a lawyer, such changes leave me quite perplexed.

[Mr. Rodrigue.]

I am of the opinion that in clause 387 we put too much emphasis on animals and birds. It would be better to consider with greater attention clauses 195 and 209, dealing with abortion, and clauses 147 and 149 concerning acts in private between husband and wife or consenting adults.

I think that the sections I have mentioned deal with different values and should be studied separately.

That is why, following the hon. members for Calgary North and Frontenac (Messrs. Woolliams and Dumont) I would like the committee to submit to the house different reports on each subject.

Moreover, I think that the subjects dealt with are of capital importance for the present as well as for the future of the whole population.

Therefore, it would be fair to grant each hon. member the right to vote freely, according to his conscience, and to take the decision he will think best for society.

[English]

Mr. Douglas A. Hogarth (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the time is quite ripe for an extensive consideration of the many specific aspects of this bill's very comprehensive provisions. The bill is going to receive detailed consideration by the standing committee, and no doubt throughout the sittings of the committee the minister will be extremely interested in the committee's deliberations. It is really only at the report stage, when the bill comes back from the committee, that we can give it complete consideration. In light of some of the remarks that have been made in the house, not only by members on the other side of the house but also on this side of the house, with regard to some of the aspects of this bill I thought it appropriate to make a few comments.

Much has been said, particularly by members on the other side of the house, about law reform, and I cannot concur more with the suggestions that have been put forward from many quarters. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) and the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) are to be complimented in that this bill represents a great step toward the reform of many aspects of our criminal and penal law. In my opinion the criticism of our present parliamentary system that we are failing to keep pace with the demands of modern Canadian society is a valid one, and this is particularly so in the field of criminal law and penal reform. If the failure of our legislators in the past continues into the future, we will bring the criminal law into contempt and disrepute.

Some of the anachronisms in the present Criminal Code are absolutely hilarious. I draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, to the definition of what is known as a game called "three-card monte". I have yet to meet a person who knows what three-card monte might be. However, if you look at the definition of three-card monte in the Criminal Code, or if you are charged with being in a place, or keeping a place, where three-card monte is being played, think of what you have to face! The definition reads as follows:

> In this section "three-card monte" means the game commonly known as three-card monte and includes any other game that is similar to it, whether or not the game is played with cards and notwithstanding the number of cards or other things that are used for the purpose of playing.

That provision is presently in our Criminal Code. It would seem to me that if we are going to amend our gaming provisions, "three-card monte" should be thrown out of the window.

We are also proceeding to amend the provisions pertaining to cruelty to animals. We are greatly concerned about cruelty to animals in our society today, but look what happens to the rooster! Consider the provisions of section 388 (2), which read as follows:

• (9:00 p.m.)

> A peace officer who finds cocks in a cock-pit or on premises where a cock-pit is located shall seize them and take them before a justice who shall order them to be destroyed.

That subsection is not part of a section pertaining to cruelty to animals. A rooster has very little to crow about under the provisions of the Criminal Code. Many other deep and far reaching changes are required and we have heard suggestions about those from hon. members during the last few days of debate. I think the Solicitor General is well aware of what changes are required. The Juvenile Delinquents Act has not been substantially changed since 1929. Its anachronistic provisions have failed to keep pace with modern aspects of society and modern knowledge about the behaviour of juvenile delinquents. In my respectful opinion, and I have had a certain amount of experience in this field, the Juvenile Delinquents Act more than almost anything else in our society today contributes to juvenile delinquency. We need forensic clinics authorized across Canada under federal auspices to deal with those who show propensities towards criminal insanity. In particular, such clinics ought to deal with those who, under our modern ideas, fall into the category of those possessing psychopathic tendencies.

Within the last decade in British Columbia several vicious homocides have been committed by psychopathic juveniles. There are limited resources for detecting and treating such juveniles. If they could have been identified and treated, perhaps these vicious crimes would not have occurred.

Many other reforms are required. Certainly, as some hon. members have said, we require reforms in the fields of bail and contraceptives. Any modern society permitting the provisions of section 150 of the Criminal Code to remain in force is bizarre.

Sections pertaining to corporal punishment and to narcotics and drugs in other legislation will have to be dealt with. Laws pertaining to contemporary problems must be reformed adequately if we are to fulfil in future our commitments to our respective communities.

You see, Mr. Speaker, our difficulty stems from the fact that the house must deal with a good many different problems. We must deal with agricultural problems as well as financial problems. In addition, we must direct our attention to specific aspects of human life. We can only do that by introducing an omnibus bill. It could easily be argued that this bill should be split one, two, three or four ways, and I could concur in that argument quite easily. If the bill were to be split I should want it split into 25 or 30 different sections. But if we did that we should be here for three or four years; debate would be endless, and at the end of that time we should only have taken a few steps towards the revision of the law. Admittedly one can argue in favour of having an omnibus bill just as one can argue against it. I remember a drug prosecutor saying in Vancouver, "You know, My Lord, there are pros and cons in favour of the offence and there are pros and cons against it." The omnibus bill is before us and we must do our job. Naturally, individual people will have reservations about certain parts of the omnibus bill. That must be so when you have a bill with 120 clauses. I have reservations about parts of the bill, in particular about clause 2, the extended definition of the Attorney General. I also have reservations about clause 45 which has to do with the manner of preferring an indictment in the absence of a preliminary hearing. I think it hamstrings a prosecutor. I am deeply concerned also about a number of other substantive measures which have been referred to in the house in the last few days. All the same, I think the bill ought to pass. We must not forget the pledge we made to the Canadian public on June 25. The Canadian people voted this government in with a majority, and we are duty bound to bring in the provisions of this bill. If we do not, we shall have broken our pledge to the people. And keeping our pledge to the people is as much a matter for the individual conscience as the way we vote on any one of the provisions of the bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hogarth: I was interested in the comments of several hon. members. I shall take up what they said in greater detail when the bill goes to committee. The hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) today, and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) by implication, pleaded for a more enlightened attitude towards alcoholics. The hon. member for Yukon was concerned about the native peoples of the Yukon Territory who are afflicted with the all too prevalent malady of alcoholism. The malady is not confined to native people only. It is prevalent in British Columbia as it is in the rest of Canada. Yet in the metropolitan areas of British Columbia, alcoholics are not considered criminals any more. We consider they are afflicted by a malady over which they have no control. We recognize that and deal with them accordingly.

If we deal with alcoholics that way, should we not also deal with homosexuals in a similar way? Should we treat the homosexual as a criminal? Although the homosexual's affliction is not the same as the alcoholics in kind, it is in substance. The homosexual has no control over his behaviour. He is either born that way or develops his sickness at an early age. He cannot change apparently; so why put him in jail. If anyone were to say about homosexuals, "Put them in jail" they would be advocating taking a step back into the dark ages. Although we have talked a great deal about the homosexual's perversions, no one so far as I am aware has spoken about perversions in sexual conduct between males and females. The only case of sodomy in which I was involved during my 20 years of practice concerned a relationship between a male and female.

[Mr. Hogarth.]

Mr. Lewis: Will the hon. member permit a question. May we take it the hon. member was involved as the lawyer?

Mr. Hogarth: I was involved as a lawyer. I will tell the hon. member about the case later. It was fascinating. In any event, I wish to say that immoral as these private relationships may be, I do not see why any statute should classify them as crimes.

There is one aspect of the bill in which hon. members may be interested and about which I am concerned. I am wondering whether amendments to the Criminal Code dealing with prostitution contain provisions which apply to systems of homosexual prostitution. In my own mind I am not satisfied that the soliciting and vagrancy clauses, as well as living off the avails sections of the act, will be found in our courts to have application to systems of male homosexual prostitution. This is something we ought to bring to the minister's attention when the bill goes to committee.

A great deal has been said about the changes to our abortion laws. I concur heartily with the remarks of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), that the amendment is not merely clarifying the existing law. On the other hand, I have never accepted reasons for the amendment as put forward by Jack Lederman in the Law Quarterly Review. Neither do I accept some of the reasons for the amendment as advanced by the Minister of Justice. A doctor or, for that matter, anyone else who is accused, can always say, "I had to operate on this woman so that she would not die. I had to preserve her health." That defence is still preserved under section 7 subsection 2 of the code. In other words, all common law defences are preserved. It must be remembered that the indictment would read, "Did unlawfully procure the miscarriage," etc. It would therefore be up to the court and jury to decide whether the abortion was necessary under the circumstances. The judge will decide whether or not an offence has been commited. In addition, I find it impossible to accept the idea that hospitals in the country should perform these operations under a diagnostic title, such as diagnostic curetage. Some of the hospitals are ridiculous enough to suggest that they are fertility examinations. Hospitals are performing these operations, and they should be stopped. I cannot see any justification for reform on the basis that hospitals are performing these operations. If hospitals continue this practice, what is to prevent the young people from bringing pressure on the government to change the laws with regard to marijuana or taking the law into their own hands. This is absolutely no basis for reform of the criminal law. There is a greater and more pressing need which arises out of the fact that inasmuch as our laws are designed to preserve health, freedom and property, they should be designed to prevent human suffering.

If any one of our laws brings about human suffering, then it should be changed or at least carefully scrutinized to see if it is necessary to preserve social order. Section 237 of the Criminal Code can cause grave human suffering. As an example I cite the case of a woman who is told if her pregnancy continues she is going to die, suffer mental illness the rest of her life, or a grave defect of that nature. I ask myself whether we should continue such a law?

I recognize there are many women who are quite prepared to accept the risk of death in order to have a child. They are quite prepared, on the basis of religious belief, to accept this risk as the will of God and proceed. This is quite proper and they should not be condemned. However, we must bear in mind there are many women in this country who are not of the same persuasion and if they are to be condemned to die how are we preserving human life? Who is preserving human life? These women are being sentenced to death, just as if capital punishment were being inflicted upon them. Surely, this is a case in which life should be preserved. One life is yet to come but the other life is in existence and unfortunately, has tremendous family and other social responsibilities.

I am not unmindful of the history of the law of abortion and the fact that even in the eyes of the church it has not always been a sin or against the law. It is only in comparatively recent times that abortion has become a sin in the eyes of the church. The church has always moved, and I hope always will, to preserve the life of the unborn. Quite apart from being influenced directly by any religious organization or religious dogma, our law has always been directed to the protection of the unborn. There are countless ways in which this could be demonstrated. It is inherent in many aspects of the civil law, such as the rule against perpetuities advanced in the case of Shelley. I do not think we should treat the conceived child as something less than unique in human experience. It is not an animal, it is something new because it is going to become a part of society.

I could never agree with the suggestion that the unborn child should be destroyed merely at the whim or fancy of the mother because I think responsibility for the unborn child lies in the field of social order. Despite the very eloquent pleas raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis) and the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis), I do not see how we can say that the question of abortion should be left entirely to the mother and the doctor. I believe society has a responsibility to acknowledge that unborn human life has always been entitled to some protection. In my experience the problem has not been the 16 year old girl who finds herself in trouble and wants to get rid of the child. She might well want to, but she is still dependent upon her parents. She is subjected to tremendous pressure by father, mother, Uncle Charlie and particularly her boyfriend to get rid of that child. Despite the fact this child may have been immorally conceived a girl may be anxious to fulfil her own life by having this child. She should be given the protection of the law and I suggest unborn children should have that same protection.

From time to time when dealing with women involved in matrimonial difficulty, we have been told that they have aborted their third child. Many of us have heard them say, "I would have had the child, I wanted the child, but the old man said get rid of it or get out." It seems to me these women are deprived of the protection of the law. I do not think that should be done in the interests of the social order in the community of the people we represent. There must be a balance. We cannot go whole hog. The Japanese did this and they are now regretting it. There is no other nation in the world with the exception of Japan that has gone so far as to say it is a matter between the mother and the doctor.

It may be the committee will have to scrutinize carefully the word "health". That word is very vague and broad in meaning. Possibly its implementation in the law is not going to carry out the design of parliament and the committee might give this further consideration. With the greatest of respect to the minister, I am equally concerned that the amendment does not go so far as to protect women who have conceived as a result of rape, girls under the age of 15 or imbecilic women.

A woman should not be required to prove that she is going to be a mental or physical wreck or that she is going to die in order to be able to rid herself of a pregnancy she does not want as a result of a crime against her body. I am of the view that is a simple right that should be given to women as members of our community. Apart from abortion, and one could go on very extensively on that subject, there are a great many aspects to be considered.

I think one of the most fascinating aspects of this bill is the provisions of section 16 dealing with the compulsory breathalyzer test, I am somewhat appalled at the members on the other side of the house. They have a Perry Mason over there and I am surprised he did not cut this section to shreds, as it has some incongruities in it.

• (9:20 p.m.)

But in any event before I get into what those incongruities might be I would like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that we have a responsibility to take some very firm steps to prevent carnage on our highways. The minister's statistics about the serious accidents being caused by impaired and drunken drivers are absolutely correct. These statistics are borne out by the experience of almost every lawyer in Canada who has had familiarity with these types of cases.

The statistics quoted by the minister might well be bolstered by the fact that in 1966 over 30,000 people in Canada were arrested and convicted on impaired or drunken driving charges. That figure was up from the year before by about 3,500. There has been another increase since and some firm steps have already been taken.

In British Columbia the attorney general gave grave consideration to the imposition of compulsory breathalyzer tests and after very extensive consideration the department rejected the idea. We have adopted, if I may respectfully submit, a far more Machiavellian system. In British Columbia if a police officer, upon stopping an accused person, has reasonable and proper grounds to believe that the man is impaired, he automatically arrests him. The man is taken to the police station and is given the option of taking a breathalyzer test or refusing it. Usually the officer is somewhat sceptical if he refuses it.

Where the police officer does not know for sure that the man is impaired, but knows he has been drinking, he forthwith on the highway gives him an option to do one of two things. The man can thereupon give the officer his driver's licence for 24 hours, or alternatively he can go down to the police station and take the necessary test. If the man takes the breathalyzer test and his reading is .08 or more, his licence is subject to suspension. It is not very long before he gets a letter from the superintendent of motor vehicles telling him his licence has been suspended for three months.

In the year 1967 when this system was introduced out of 3,900 drivers stopped on the highways of British Columbia, 3,750 walked home. You can see how reluctant they were to submit themselves to the test. I think you can see, Mr. Speaker, how efficient this system is in getting these people off the highways.

Mr. Lewis: For 24 hours.

Mr. Hogarth: Suspended for 24 hours.

Mr. MacEwan: And they can walk home and get the second car.

Mr. Hogarth: Just wait until I finish my remarks. I suggest that we compel them to take the test. I think that is a good idea, and is one of the reasons I am supporting this bill. However, I suggest that if the test shows a reading of .08 or more, then they should get an automatic suspension of their licence.

The reason I say this is that those of us who have dealt with impaired drivers have found the critical factor is not the ignominy of being convicted or the fine. It is the fact that in nine out of ten of these cases the magistrate suspends the licence and, if he doesn't, the superintendent of motor vehicles does. This is the thing that hurts. If you take a good look at the proposed section 16 you will see that is pretty well trial by machine anyhow. There are not a great many defences that I can think of that could be raised. But even in the system I put forward if there were defences you could give the accused an opportunity to appeal to a magistrate, as in the gun provisions, if he felt he had been dealt with unfairly. This is something the minister might consider during the course of the deliberations of the committee.

I do not propose to comment much further on this proposed breathalyzer test, except to one aspect. I notice that under the breathalyzer provisions in the bill the police officer who is giving the test shall offer to the accused a sample of his own breath. The provision stops there. What in the world is he going to do with it? I have tried to figure this out.

I spoke with the senior prosecutor in Vancouver at the week end, Mr. Stewart McMorran, and we discussed what the man would do with this sample. We had several colourful suggestions to offer but none that would lead to any cogent defence to a charge under this section. I am sure the minister will agree that probably that section should not be brought into the law until we have a good idea as to where an accused can go with the balloon full of his own breath. If he is found leaving the police station with a balloon in one hand, he will probably be arrested again for being in a state of intoxication in a public place. There is nothing he can do. He can sing, "Hi ho come to the fair," and leave it at that.

So far as this proposed section is concerned somebody will have to take a good look at this provision relating to the accused getting a sample of his own breath. By the way, Mr. McMorran had discussed the matter with Mr. Fennell, the city analyst in Vancouver, and so far as they know a balloon is the only thing that will hold human breath. However, the balloon will not stay blown up for more than two hours. I suppose the accused could run from the police station to the R.C.M.P. station out at Burnaby, or out in my riding, and hope to get some help from another breathalizer tests, but I doubt if this would get him very far.

There are some other defects in this proposed section that I am amazed some of the other Perry Masons on the opposition side have missed.

An hon. Member: We want to give you a chance.

Mr. Hogarth: That is very good of you. I waited until today to speak because I wanted to let everybody else go first. There is the matter of the two hour provision. This is something the standing committee will have to consider. I am sure the minister has the answers, but these are things that we should bring before him for his attention and consideration.

I could speak on the lottery and gun provisions included in the bill for quite some time this evening, but I shall reserve my remarks until a later stage because these provisions are quite complex.

I would not want to conclude my remarks tonight without some mention of those aspects of the bill which deal with penal reform, as opposed to reform in the penal law. There are probably about three very cogent provisions. One can look through all the proposed sections and subsections but I think one ends up with three basic changes. The first is the extension of the power of the court with respect to the imposition of suspended sentences. Certainly not the least of the contributions that are being made to reform is the fact that we are wiping out any suggestion that if the person involved has a previous conviction he cannot get a suspended sentence. This is something that has plagued lawyers for a number of years.

The second thing we should take careful note of is the fact that the parole board is going to be expanded. The result of the expansion of the parole board will be that it will be empowered to sit in Panels throughout the country. Those of us who served on the justice and legal affairs committee and heard the Solicitor General (Mr. McIlraith) and the Chairman of the National Parole Board were pleased to see that penal reform in this country is taking the direction of further parole. It is all very well to put a man in jail to rot when he has been convicted of a criminal offence. It is all very well to teach a thief to be a tinsmith, but under the old system if you teach a thief to be a tinsmith and nothing more then when he is released all you have is a tinsmith who is a thief.

Mr. Lewis: A far more qualified thief.

Mr. Hogarth: A far more qualified thief if he requires the use of his tinsmith skills. But what we have to do is to consider the welfare of the community because we are dealing in these instances with some extremely vicious men. Let us not pretend that they are all nice guys gone wrong. Some of them are inherently vicious. Some of them when released at the conclusion of their terms are homocides going somewhere to happen.

There are things to consider here in relation to the prisons themselves, but the best way to achieve reform is to get a man back into the community under the supervision of competent penologists. These are called probation officers. They are the men who do the most good. This is the direction the law has taken. You will note the extended definition, as the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. McCleave) mentioned, of day parole. That hon. member spoke about Judge Haley's actions in this regard. The day parole is one of the interim steps toward reform. We are now doing no more than defining some of the steps that have been rather vague in the past, even though they were taken by prison officials.

• (9:30 p.m.)

This will be of great benefit. It is being done now in the province of British Columbia. It is paying off, because men are slowly being rehabilitated rather than to being shoved out the prison door with someone saying, "There is your suit and $35, find a job". This is part of the rehabilitation process and I could not endorse it more.

As much as I might have reservations about some aspects of this bill I think, by and large, the bill will move us ahead. We have been a long time getting ahead with these amendments. I sat on the original committee of the British Columbia Bar which dealt with the matter of abortion in 1962. Here it is 1968.

Mr. Lewis: You are a good Liberal; you are only one year behind.

Mr. Hogarth: In any event here it is 1969, and we are just now introducing these changes. Although I have reservations about certain aspects of the bill, I realize there are so many more reforms which must come about that we should take these interim steps now. They might not all be satisfactory to all of us but let us take this much now. If I wished to include rape, incest and carnal knowledge in the provisions of this bill, I could bring these things up later; but let us take these steps now because it takes so long to get even the most modest measure through. That is one of the reasons I am 100 per cent behind the provisions which are before us.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) who has just taken his seat. I noted with interest that he prefaced his remarks by stating that he had reservations about this omnibus bill, Bill C-150. Then, having expressed his reservations concerning the bill, he went on to state that he intended to support it. I find this a little difficult to comprehend. I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member and found nothing to reconcile my comprehension of his initial statement that he had reservations about the bill because it seemed to me he intended to support the bill with a great deal of enthusiasm.

I do not think the hon. member who just took his seat could have been present in the house when his colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Sullivan) made his speech because, in trying to justify his support of the bill notwithstanding the fact that he had reservations about it, he went on to say as did the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner), in his introduction of the bill that the government had a mandate from the people of Canada to introduce this legislation in its present form. That is not the way I understand it. With respect, I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that is not the way the people I represent understand it. I submit also it is not the way the Minister of Justice initially understood it. If my memory serves me correctly it was the government's intention to introduce this bill broken down into at least four parts. In other words, we would then not find ourselves in the awkward position we are in today. Some of us are in the invidious position today at least of having to vote against the bill, notwithstanding the fact that we support the greater portion of the bill.

I am not one of the Perry Masons referred to by the learned gentleman who just took his seat. I am not a barrister or a practitioner of the law; but I do think I represent a great number of Canadians who are very much disturbed over the fact that we are introducing this legislation in this form. I am concerned about it. I am concerned about it as a parent, as a Canadian and as a benefactor if you like of the Judaeo-Christian traditions. I am concerned about it because I ask, where does it end.

We have before us a major piece of legislation dealing at once with the very sacred laws of life itself and the rather mundane laws of lotteries and gun control. I support with a great deal of enthusiasm those clauses of the bill which would amend our Criminal Code of Canada to make it possible to eliminate the carnage on the highways because of drunk driving. I support the breathalyzer test. All Canadians are in favour of that. I support the amendment to the Criminal Code which would make lotteries possible in Canada. Indeed, I support that particular amendment very strongly. I support the amendments which would at least take a step toward some measure of gun control in Canada, because we are all greatly concerned with the violence in our country. We are aware of what is taking place south of the border to which eloquent reference was made today by the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). We are concerned with all these things and we support them. We support the government's move to provide amendments to our laws to make these things practical and possible.

So far as the amendments to the Criminal Code concerning permissive homosexuality between consulting adults are concerned, I could not care less. It is a matter of complete indifference to me. I submit it is a matter of great indifference to the vast majority of Canadians; they just could not care less. But, Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain I am greatly concerned with the clause in the bill dealing with abortion. I am concerned because it pricks at my conscience. I shall not detain the house tonight with a long speech.

We have listened during this debate to members of this house who are distinguished members of the bar. As I understand it, the hon. member who just took his seat is a distinguished member of the bar of British Columbia. It is also my understanding that the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain is a distinguished member of the bar of Ontario. I am not going to repeat the arguments of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, relevant and important though they may be. Nor am I going to repeat that very cogent arguments presented to the house by the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I am going to present my own views.

I am not going to quote any authority but I should like put on the record the fact that I subscribe to the view of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain and not to the view of the hon. member who has just taken his seat or the view of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner). The latter members tried to justify to this house the failure of the government to split this bill by saying they had a mandate from the people of Canada to present it in its omnibus form. The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) said the government had no alternative because they had a mandate from the people of Canada. The hon. member could not have been present in the house when his colleague, the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain, made his speech. His remarks appear at page 4785 of Hansard and I quote:

> I believe that, regardless of party affiliation, each hon. member of this house must vote on this issue according to his own conscience, as it goes far beyond party lines or other man made disciplines. For this reason I am opposing the proposed amendment concerning the law of abortion in its present form and intend to vote against this bill.

The hon. member then continues, again recorded at page 4785:

> Contrary to some unfounded and untrue reports, Mr. Speaker, I should like to inform you and the members of this house that my position on this matter is the same now as it was before nomination day and as it was before the election, and I made this fact known publicly during the campaign.

He was indicating to the house, and I am not putting words into his mouth, that he had the full support of his party when, before the election, he stated his opposition to the amendments concerning abortion. He concludes by saying:

> In conclusion I should also like to inform you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of this house that at no time did I get any request from the Minister of Justice (Mr. Turner) to change or alter my position on this matter, and I would like to thank him publicly for this consideration.

Whose view should we accept on this? Do we accept the view of the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain who spoke so eloquently and conscientiously in the house, or do we accept the view of the hon. member for New Westminster who also spoke eloquently but, I suspect, not so conscientiously? I am a little perplexed, but I am not bothered because I know what I am going to do.

I am not going to take up the time of the house tonight because all the things I would like to say were said in a most eloquent way by the hon. member for Hamilton Mountain. I am in a position where I am going to oppose the bill. I am going to oppose it because, notwithstanding the fact that the bill contains many measures I would enthusiastically support, this bill contains a provision which tears at my very conscience. In my humble estimation, it contains a provision which tears at the very root of life itself. I submit to you that it ill behooves any member of this house to make lightly of this matter, although the sections of the bill dealing with the breathalyzer test and lotteries, to bring humour to the debate, are tempting, indeed. When the bill contains provisions relating to what I consider to be the very essence and sacredness of life itself, I say it ill behooves any member to make lightly of it.

I speak as a member of this house and I believe firmly in what I say. My words are dictated by no dogma or pressure group, but are merely dictated by my own conscience. They are dictated by my own feelings for the sacredness of life itself. I speak from my limited experience, not being a barrister or practitioner of the law. I speak as a parent, as the father of six children, and as one of a family of 15 children. I speak with all of the honesty I can muster. In doing so, it is my hope that other hon. members will speak in the same vein and will perhaps understand why there are those in this house who cannot find it within their conscience to support this bill. Regrettably the government, notwithstanding the views or the wishes of the present distinguished Minister of Justice, chose to present this bill in its present form including clause 18, which to many of us is repugnant.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, a good deal of the debate that has taken place regarding bill C-150 has revolved around the procedural situation in which we find ourselves. This was the crux, indeed, of the speech by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. He like others has complained that the bill is before us as one piece containing things that some members like and others that they do not like. I believe I can say that it is not my practice to let any government, Liberal or Conservative, put anything over on me procedurally. Whenever I have felt that the government of the day was trying to do something wrong by violating our practices or procedures I have said so in the clearest language I could use.

I want to say quite categorically that I do not think the practices of parliament are being violated by what is now before us, but rather some of the members who have been complaining about having to vote for this bill in one package will get a rude awakening when we come to a stage in our proceedings that was brought into effect by the rule changes we made just before Christmas. I thought that we debated those rules at considerable length. I thought that members were aware of what we were doing. But it seems to me that some members just do not realize what happened.

May I remind this house, and particularly those members who are still calling for the splitting of the bill, that we did two or three things about the legislative process when we altered the rules. First of all, although we did not in my view downgrade the second reading debate, we did downgrade the vote on second reading. We said: From now on at second reading we are not voting for the principle of the bill as though it were sacred and not to be changed thereafter. We are merely voting to consider what is involved in this bill and to pursue it through further stages.

We decided, in fact, that the point at which an ultimate decision is taken should be later in the process, and therefore we upgraded the third reading vote and coupled with the words "that the bill be now read a third time" the words "and pass". But in between those two stages of second reading and third reading we instituted a report stage. That stage is a very important one and it will come into play on this very bill in a way which I think will answer those who have said that they are being treated unfairly.

What is going to happen? This bill, after it has had second reading, as I am sure it will, will go to the standing committee on justice and legal affairs. In that committee it will be considered clause by clause. Granted, only a handful of the members of this house will be there. If that committee makes no changes—for example, if that committee does not change the section with respect to abortion and it comes back to the house in the same form, members might say that was just a case of going through the motions. But when Bill C-150 comes back from the standing committee to be considered at the report stage, I ask hon. members to face what is going to take place.

Just as sure as I am on my feet tonight, there will be amendments moved by members. That will be done, as provided by the rules, to the clauses having to do with abortion, homosexuality, breathalyzer tests and half a dozen other things. Motions to amend the bill with respect to these particular subjects, these particular clauses, will have to be put to the house.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): As a whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute. These amendments will have to be put one at a time.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): To the house as a whole.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry; yes, to the house as a whole. If there are several amendments that are alike, Mr. Speaker will have the power to select which ones are to be placed before the house.

But each and every one of these contentious subjects will be before this whole house—not a standing committee, not a committee of the whole house, but this whole house with Mr. Speaker in the chair.

Let us take, for example, the provision regarding abortion and let us suppose the standing committee does not change it and the bill comes back with the clause in it which would provide for the changes the government has suggested; there will be members in this house who do not want to support those changes. I am sure that one of them, with a seconder, will move that Bill C-150 be amended by deleting that clause. That amendment is debatable with Mr. Speaker in the chair. There is a certain limitation in that the first speakers can speak for 40 minutes, and after that members may speak for only 20 minutes. But at the end of that debate the bells will ring and a vote will be taken.

What will that vote be? It will be a vote on the issue of abortion by itself. I may say that those of us who do not think the abortion provision in the bill goes far enough will be in a position to move another kind of amendment, that the abortion provision be made more in keeping with modern understanding of this problem. That amendment will have to be voted on. So I might go on with regard to homosexuality; it will be singled out and voted on by itself. If there are people who do not like the proposals regarding breathalyzer tests, there will be an amendment moved that singles out this subject by itself.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): If the house so chooses. If a member so chooses.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): So long as there are two members who want to see a change, one moving a motion and one seconding it—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Exactly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —there will be a vote on that issue. I, for one, like some others, am strongly opposed to the idea of state lotteries. I have already planned to present an amendment, if the standing committee does not do it, to delete those portions of clause 13 of the bill which provide for state lotteries. When the vote comes on my amendment, if I have the privilege of moving it, that will not be a vote on a whole package. It will not be a vote on several things some of which a member may like and some of which he may not like; it will be a vote on the issue of state lotteries by itself, just as if it were a separate Bill. So I say that every contentious issue in this bill, every issue about which hon. members have strong feelings, will come up for an isolated vote, a vote by itself.

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Can come up.

An hon. Member: Yes, can come up.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My hon. friends are saying, can come up. They are right, technically speaking. But I suggest that if there is a strong feeling about it, members will make the amendments and in that sense the votes will come.

• (10:00 p.m.)

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Any member who wants a vote, and can find a seconder, will get a vote.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is absolutely right. I suggest that those members who now say they will not be able to vote for this bill, because although there are some things in it which they like there are others which they do not like, will not be able to use this excuse when it comes to voting on specific amendments at the report stage. As the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hogarth) said, you cannot take a bill like this and divide it into 120 bills; in a matter like this you have to deal with it in a package. But particularly under our new rules there will not only be the opportunity but the obligation to stand up and be counted on every one of these contentious issues. I think we should not have any more of this nonsense about our not having the opportunity to vote separately on these issues. We will get the opportunity when we reach the report stage of the bill. It is an opportunity members will not be able to escape.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not like split speeches any more than I like split infinitives—

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Or split bills.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): — but I see it is ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under standing order 40 deemed to have been moved.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE—POSSIBLE INCREASE IN OLD AGE SECURITY BENEFITS

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Some hon. Members: Again?

Mr. Turner (Ottawa-Carleton): Now I understand.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on Monday, January 20, as recorded in Hansard at page 4489, I put a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) on the basis of a federal-provincial conference of welfare ministers that had been held some days earlier.

I asked the minister whether he would soon be making a statement as to the government's intentions regarding pensions, allowances, the guaranteed annual income, and so on. I concluded my question with these precise words:

Can he also state at an early date whether it is the government's intention this year to increase the basic amount of the old age security pension?

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) gave me a reply containing about 12 lines, to the effect that the whole matter was under review by the government. Whereupon, I put to him this supplementary question:

Does that review include a study of the possibility of increasing the basic amount of the old age security pension?

The minister replied:

It is a factor which will be included in the review.

It is nice to know that in a general, academic way the question of the amount of the old age security pension is part of this general review which the Minister of National Health and Welfare is making of social welfare policy. As a matter of fact, we are getting so many of these reviews by the government it is just about time we set up a task force to review the review committees to see how they are making out.

I want to express tonight the belief that reviews do not make life any happier for the old age pensioners of this country. We had something of a debate on this question under another heading between five and six o'clock this evening when hon. members on all sides said that what was proposed at that time was not enough, that we needed to take positive steps to improve the position of our old age pensioners. My question the other day related specifically to a positive step which I believe is a very urgent need, that of increasing the basic amount of the old age pension from the present figure of $75 which has remained constant for several years, except for the 2 per cent annual adjustment.

One senses in this parliament great difficulty in getting any kind of response to these pension questions. Whether we are pleading the case of veterans living on war veterans allowances or drawing attention to the plight of retired civil servants or of old age pensioners generally, we are put off with answers to the effect that the matter is being considered, that the position is under review, and so on. Times are moving on, Mr. Speaker. Wages and prices are rising. For some, our society is becoming more affluent. I think it is no credit to our society, no credit to our government and no credit to this parliament if we cannot do something for our old age pensioners to keep them in the main stream of our society, and I put my question to the government very simply: is it not time that consideration was given to increasing the amount of the old age pension from that $75 figure to a figure much higher? As I indicated earlier this session, I myself think the guaranteed income supplement should be incorporated into the basic pension and the whole amount raised to at least $125 a month.

While we are asking for these matters to be considered, Mr. Speaker, we also have certain fears because of the occasions on which the government talks about passing various welfare programs over to the provinces. There was a suggestion earlier this session that in five years medicare would be turned over to the provinces. Question marks have been raised in connection with family allowances as well as other welfare and assistance programs. This makes some of us wonder whether the present government is dismantling the whole social security program which has been built up over the last 40 or 50 years.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare did say something the other day to members of the press which was somewhat reassuring. He was asked whether there was any likelihood of the old age security program being turned over to the provinces, with the federal government getting out of that field. His reply was that the federal old age security program was the lower deck, of the total program, the Canada Pension Plan being the upper deck, and therefore it could not be surrendered. It is good to know that there is something that protects the old age security program, that it cannot be done away with but that it has to remain as a base for the Canada Pension Plan.

I would remind the government that when we were discussing the Canada Pension Plan and asked whether the bringing in of that plan meant that old age security had to stay at $75 a month for the rest of time, we were told that this was not necessarily so; that as time went on, as wages and prices went up, it was quite possible to raise the amount of that basic old age security pension to a higher figure with the benefits of the Canada Pension Plan being in addition thereto. I do not want this to wait until today's old age pensioners are dead and gone. I think that the time for action on this matter is now. In all this talk about the just society, there should be some place for our older people.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary, or whoever is going to answer me tonight, will be a little more precise about the possibility of an increase in the basic amount of the old age security pension during the course of this session. This really is a must.

[Translation]

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, needless to say the government does not intend to repeal the social security programs it has set up, but on the contrary to establish standards in some cases and to give provincial governments, if necessary, enough authority to carry out these programs, even though insofar as we are concerned we could open up new areas in the field of social security.

I already answered a similar question raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. MacInnis), and I would like to thank the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for his concern for our older citizens—a concern shared moreover by all hon. members.

In this regard there are several points I should like to bring to the attention of the hon. member. Firstly, the amount of the basic old age security pension has been increased in two successive years as the result of a rise in the pension index. In January 1968, the amount of the basic pension was increased from $75 per month to $76.50, and in January 1969 the amount moves to $78 per month. If the cost of living continues to rise, further increases will take place.

Recognizing that a number of older people had little or nothing beyond their old age security and, further, that they could not benefit under the Canada Pension Plan, the government introduced the guaranteed income supplement program. This provides a supplement to the basic old age security pension of now up to $30.20 per month. Eligibility is based on a simple test of income. By virtue of this amendment to the Old Age Security Act, it is expected that in January 1969 some 800,000 old age security pensioners will benefit under the guaranteed income supplement program. Many will receive the maximum, which means their total benefit will be $109.20.

I am sure the hon. member and his colleagues agree that the contemporary guaranteed income approach is the most effective and most responsible approach to a just society.

Realizing that a number of pensioners need supplementation beyond the maximum of the combined old age security-guaranteed income supplement, the federal government, through the vehicle of the Canada Assistance Plan, makes this possible. Under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government will share 50 per cent of the cost of any supplementation made by a province to an old age security pensioner. There is no ceiling on the amount of such supplementation, eligibility being based on a test of need.

Finally, I should like to re-emphasize what the minister has already said on a number of occasions, that is, that all our social security programs are under intensive review at present by the government. When this review is completed, if firm conclusions are reached, they will be announced to the house. In the meantime, I want to assure all hon. members the government is desirous of Canada having an overall social security program designed to meet the needs of various segments of our population, keeping in mind the resources which are available.

MEDICAL DIRECTOR—MOOSE FACTORY

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, when I raised a question earlier today about a petition sent to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro) having to do with the medical director in Moose Factory, I raised the question because of the national coverage the matter received last night on the program "The Way It Is". I think it is unfortunate that people, before trying to solve their problem in the normal process, seek widespread publicity in order to bring one side of the story before the public. Such actions sometimes arouse prejudices in the minds of those who would like to take an unbiased view of what is happening.

The members of the native band at Moose Factory sent the minister a petition. They sent a copy to me, to the C.B.C. and to others. The petition reads:

> We the people of the Island of Moose Factory hereby present this petition to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Rt. Honourable John Munro M.P., and we demand that the Medical Director of Moose Factory General Hospital, Dr. C. K. Bridge and Assistant Zone Director, B. H. Funston be removed forthwith. We feel that we have legitimate reasons for this demand and will cite the following which are only a few examples of the misconduct and flagrant disregard for human dignity by these two men who have set up themselves as Colonial Masters of our Island.
> 1. Dr. Bridge refused to give medical treatment to the Indian population for which he is responsible.
> 2. The Minister must be aware of the death of Mrs. Minnie Cheechoo an Indian woman of the Indian reservation on December 12th, 1968. We feel that the death of this woman who left four young children is due to the direct cause of the gross negligence of Dr. Bridge.
> 3. After the death of Mrs. Cheechoo one of her sons were taken ill and again this child was refused ambulance service.
> 4. The Assistant Zone Director, Mr. Funston who is also the Administrator indulges in discriminatory practices in hiring Indian Personnel.
> Again we reiterate our demand for the removal of these two men and request an investigation into their misconduct.

I have received representations from others about the operation of the hospital at Moose Factory. Perhaps the minister would be willing to allow an investigation of all these charges to be conducted. I take no sides in the matter, although I think the program last night showed one side of the story without covering adequately the other side. Certainly, when stories start to develop in small communities like Moose Factory they become exaggerated. I know the program left the impression in the minds of many that Mrs. Cheechoo died as a result of not being taken to hospital. Others claim that is not the case and that Mrs. Cheechoo would have died in any event. The latter allegation was not included on the program.

It may or may not be true that Dr. Bridge is behaving like the colonial master of the island.

[Mr. Stewart (Cochrane).]

The truth can only be discovered if the department investigates the charges. Certainly, it would not be the first time that a man from "back 'ome" has displayed an imperialistic attitude towards Canadians. I think we all have had that experience. As I say, the facts of this matter ought to be looked into.

Nevertheless, we ought to condemn no one just on the say so of one group of people. I think it is our duty to look into all aspects of this situation. Perhaps the C.B.C. which is quick to go after sensationalism will be on hand after the investigation is completed, so they can give a full and unbiased account of all the fact. I would ask the representative of the minister to give some indication as to what is being done in this regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for the concern he shows more particularly for those who rank amongst the most unfortunate and forsaken in life and who, for that very reason, are in greater need of attention. I also congratulate him for putting this serious problem to the house with such calm.

I know the minister feels very deeply about this situation. He already has visited the Great Canadian North on two or three occasions, and he intends to complete his tour so that he might have visited all the areas which fall within his jurisdiction. Such visits may lead to favourable results for those who are in need of those services.

Still, it must be remembered that the Moose Factory hospital serves a large group of Indians who live partly isolated, on islands, where extremely harsh climatic conditions doubtless add to the tension and their feeling of frustration. But, because of the physical location, of the hospital, at times it is difficult to recruit personnel. Indeed, it takes great missionary spirit and much generosity to accept such isolation and devotion to the sick in underdeveloped areas.

I know that the doctor in charge is very well liked by his staff who give him their wholehearted support. Everyone recognizes his qualifications. Perhaps because he is temperamentally reserved it might be a little difficult for him to establish rapport with the local community. Still, the minister has understood the inconveniences caused by the fact that transport by ambulance was limited to daylight hours only. Those restrictions have been cancelled so that ambulances are now on duty 24 hours a day.

The hon. member mentioned the case of Mrs. Cheechoos: the reports we have on hand state that the fact that transportation was delayed did not cause death.

It must also be remembered that there is no discrimination towards the Indians, since a large number of them, roughly 50 per cent, work for the hospital. We hope to follow closely the administration of those hospitals so that the Indian population will not suffer from delays. I wish to point out that recently an additional doctor was added to the staff in the person of Dr. Loftus.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry but I must interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND ORGANIZATION—CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the special committee, that is to say, of the Striking Committee, to constitute the members of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization, with copies in English and French. By leave I propose to move the adoption of the report later this day.

[Later:]

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, by leave I move, seconded by Mr. Davis, that the third report of the Special Committee presented this day be now concurred in.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Isn't that the Striking Committee?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes.

Motion agreed to.

PROCEDURE

MOTION TO EXTEND POWERS OF STANDING COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE AND ORGANIZATION

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the house will recall that on December 20 last, at the time we adopted the rule changes, it was proposed that the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization should be given further powers to review certain matters with relation to the changes in the rules. If the house is agreeable I would like to move the following motion:

That the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization be instructed, and hereby is instructed, to review the operation of the house under its present standing orders, and that, without restricting the generality of the foregoing, the committee be, and hereby is instructed, to give special attention to (1) the way the several standing committees study the estimates, (2) the means by which the position of the chairmen of the standing committees can be made somewhat more comparable to that of the Chairman of the Committees of the whole house, (3) the matter of ministerial attendance at the meetings of the standing committees, and (4) the means of meeting the need to make available to the standing committees stronger and more extensive support facilities.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the said motion?

• (2:10 p.m.)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Macdonald) is quite correct in saying that this motion has been agreed to by representatives of the parties. One matter, however, has arisen since the motion was drafted. I wonder whether I could put it to the President of the Privy Council in the form of a question. Does he regard this motion as including authority for the committee to study the question of having the minutes of proceedings and evidence of the various standing committees produced a little faster than is now the case, in order to expedite the work of the committees?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Yes; we would regard that as being included under the fourth section of the motion.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—PROTEST FOLLOWING EXECUTIONS OF PERSONS OF JEWISH FAITH

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am certain all members of the house have been shocked by the recent events in Iraq. The Canadian government, and I know many Canadians, are deeply disturbed by reports that 14 Iraqi nationals, nine of them of the Jewish faith, have been publicly executed on charges of espionage. As the Secretary General of the United Nations has pointed out, mass trials and executions are always to be deplored. They are, however, particularly abhorrent and dangerous when they inflame passions and stir up blind hatred. The Canadian government associates itself fully with the statement made by the Secretary General and with the action he has taken. What must be of particular concern to all of us at this time is the report that the Iraqi government is contemplating a further mass trial of 35 persons, of whom 13 are said to be of the Jewish faith, on similar charges. I hope this is not true. In addition to the basic humanitarian considerations, the Canadian government is profoundly concerned by the effects these events may have on the search for peace in the Middle East. Actions of this kind can only retard and obstruct the achievement of a just settlement in the Middle East. Despite the understandable dismay these events have caused in Israel, I would ask the government of Israel to refrain from retaliatory measures.

The round of bloodshed, violence, reprisal and renewed hostility in the area has gone on for too long and must be broken. It will only be broken by a peaceful and accepted settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute. The Canadian government strongly urges the great powers, which have a special responsibility under the United Nations charter, to ensure the maintenance of peace, to engage fully in the process of conciliation and actively to support the efforts of the Secretary General's special representative, Ambassador Gunnar Jarring, to bring about a just and lasting peace. The attainment of a settlement rests ultimately with the parties themselves, but the assistance of the great powers may be essential if the present deadlock is to be broken.

The views of the Canadian government are being brought to the attention of the Iraqi government through the Canadian Ambassador accredited to Iraq.

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, of course, like the minister and like the Secretary General of the United Nations we deplore the brutal killings in Iraq. The world hardly needs another reminder of the dangerous situation in the Middle East, and the urgency of a solution.

The recent proposals by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics deserves careful and sympathetic study by the United States, and of course other countries of the world, for unless the super powers of the world—to use an ugly phrase—can agree on a solution and guarantee peace in that part of the world, then no lasting peace is possible.

If it is not presumptuous of me, I should like to compliment the new President of the United States who, in a public statement he made a day or two ago, took what I felt to be a very sensible, calm and open-minded attitude toward the Russian proposal for a Middle East settlement. In the meantime we agonize with our Israeli brethren, and are touched by the further evidence of man's brutality to man; brutality, of course, of which Jews have borne far too great a share in man's history.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, of course we join with the minister and the Secretary General of the United Nations in deploring the mass trials and executions in Iraq. I want to congratulate the minister for having quickly expressed his protest against these trials and executions. Despite the fact that, as hon. members know, I myself am a Jew, I also want to support the hon. minister's statement urging the government of Israel not to retaliate in this case, as it has done in other cases.

It seems to me that the primary need in the Middle East now, as has been the case for many years, is a search for peace. Attacks and retaliation, even though the retaliation may be justified, cannot forward the cause of peace in that area. In speaking on this subject I cannot help but feel despair at the fact that the situation in the Middle East would not be nearly as dangerous for the peoples there, and for the peace of the world, were it not for the deliberate big power action of rearming, particularly the Arab states in that area since the June war, which has made them feel that they can again act in such a way as to wipe out the state of Israel from the Middle East. It is surely this rearmament of these states in the Middle East that has given encouragement for attacks and counterattacks, and encouragement to refuse to sit down with the state of Israel to discuss the possibility of peace. Surely this is making the job of mediating in this situation almost impossible.

I think that the members of this parliament, and every other parliament of middle sized or small countries throughout the free world, ought to protest in the most vigorous fashion against the deliberate, divisive and dangerous policy of the super powers in the Middle East to the detriment of the future of the peoples there, and of peace throughout the world.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, the news reaching us from Baghdad is spreading confusion and great concern not only in Canada but throughout the world. We see the frailty of world peace and how heavily the threat of a nuclear war weighs upon the world.

Mr. Speaker, as long as violence is the main weapon used to build peace, to guarantee the security and freedom of individuals and peoples, it is nothing but illusion to think that peace can some day become a reality.

We, of the Ralliement Créditiste, deplore such executions that beget hatred and stir limitless currents of violence.

According to the latest news, 35 other prisoners, 13 of which are Jews, will be brought to trial accused of spying and sabotage. In other words, this is only the start of the ravages.

Mr. Speaker, I think that a peace settlement worked out through the United Nations will only be possible and durable inasmuch as the big powers will stop putting their own interests foremost and will be more concerned about the precariousness of world peace.

I would urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to support wholeheartedly the appeal made by U Thant, secretary general of the United Nations, who asked the big powers to co-operate in order to find a quick solution in the Middle East. We hope that such a solution will settle efficiently the problem of peace in the Middle East which, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs put it, has been suffering for too long, thereby indicating that the present situation is in fact a cold war rather than a true state of peace.

Housing Task Force Report

HOUSING

TABLING OF REPORT OF TASK FORCE ON HOUSING AND URBAN DEVELOPMENT

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table two copies in English and two copies in French of the report of the task force on housing and urban development.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: We have read it in Time.

Mr. Hellyer: Yes, it is in time, before the end of January, as I promised you months ago it would be.

Mr. Bell: Just in Time.

Mr. Hellyer: This report culminates the work of a task force appointed by the government last August and which since that date has travelled more than 25,000 miles to visit 27 centres across the country. As well as holding formal hearings in each of these centres, the task force made on-site tours of various housing projects and sponsored a series of public meetings to discuss housing and urban problems in a more informal setting with Canadians in general.

In tabling the report I would like to express the appreciation both of the government and of myself to the six distinguished Canadians who participated with me in this inquiry. A word of thanks is due, too, to the many organizations and individuals across the country who took the time to give the task force their views and recommendations on these important subjects.

While this inquiry was carried out within a relatively short period of time, I believe it does represent the most comprehensive review of housing and urban problems undertaken in Canada since the Curtis inquiry almost 25 years ago. As such, I am sure this report, and the work which preceded it, will contribute to greater public discussion and understanding of the many issues which face our country in this area. As minister responsible for housing, I intend very shortly to place before the government recommendations on some of the matters arising out of the report on which I believe urgent action is required.

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, we are glad to see that the Minister of Transport is recovering from his cold. Most of us know how he has been feeling. The minister's career is an illustration of Murphy's law: If something can go wrong, it will. The minister or one of his staff obviously supplied Time magazine with an advance copy of the report, presumably for publication on the anticipated day of release. Unfortunately for the rights and privileges of parliament, his cold could not stop the presses of Time magazine. Unfortunately, also, for the members of the press gallery, who do not like to see ministers giving pet privileges, the leak to Time was a "Luce" practice.

The chief failure of the report, a failure which may undo much of the minister's hard work, arises from its attitude toward the provinces, and provincial involvement. The task force, I suggest, would have been better informed, and its report would have been better received, if the studies had involved more provincial consultation and if the task force had better reflected all three levels of government.

One of the main recommendations calls for direct federal-municipal dealings. There are no references to provincial housing corporations although these were, after all, established to deal with problems which may be unique to their provinces and municipalities.

The second area of weakness concerned the attitude toward interest rates. In this respect the report is very weak indeed.

In the suggestions there is more hope than realism. Under no circumstances should the government allow the ceiling to be removed from interest rates for housing until there is an adequate supply of money available, so that there can be a firm assurance that rates will drop—not "may be expected to drop", but will drop.

We have been stung too often in the House of Commons on the matter of interest rates. So far the government has shown no indication to do its part to restore the economy to the point where interest rates may be held at an acceptable level, other than paying a minimum amount of lip service.

The third area of weakness is the failure to come up with a better program of housing for rural Canada.

Recommendation No. 30 is that C.M.H.C. should exercise particular care to ensure that rural areas have adequate mortgage funds. This is simply a pious declaration. What is needed is a whole new approach by C.M.H.C. to the regulations it imposes for construction in rural Canada.

Members of my party are pleased with the suggestions for the land bank assembly, the elimination of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, the proposed setting up of a department of housing and urban affairs, and with the suggested use of existing housing stock for public housing purposes. These are good Conservative policies which we have consistently advocated. I suppose that it is only human if I point out to the Prime Minister, (Mr. Trudeau), to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), and to other members of the Liberal party that they have attacked us over and over again, charging us with irresponsibility in some of these proposals. Now that they have found respectability on the government side in the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), I hope that members there will support their minister. We certainly will in these four areas.

I am pleased with the suggestion in the report that there will be worth-while measures to bring housing within the reach of the lower income groups, and I am also pleased with the special program for Indians, Eskimos and Métis people. Our one man task force, Mr. Heward Grafftey, has pointed out graphically to members of my party that there are shacks in northern Canada housing as many as 13 Indians. The conscience of Canadians will surely support the minister in an all-out attack on this kind of injustice.

I would like to note briefly in passing that the task force was apparently never told that land developers do in fact pay income tax on their operations. The task force recommendations in this area are therefore suspect for creating a bogey that in large measure does not exist. It is however a popular bogey.

Finally, I should like to make two suggestions. The first is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) change his position of not presenting a budget this spring and bring one in immediately, or at least bring in a measure to eliminate the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials. I make a special plea to both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance in this regard.

Second, I would suggest that the subject matter of the report be immediately sent to a committee of the house for study so that this house will be in a position to act at quick speed when the minister is ready with his legislation. In that respect we wish him well, and we hope he will be able to get it before us soon.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the report of the task force on housing and urban development constitutes a colossal fraud on the Canadian public.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gilbert: It took an outrageous amount of money, time and effort to inform the Canadian public of something that they already knew, namely that we have a housing crisis in Canada and, second, that the federal government should accept a leadership role in solving this crisis. The Prime Minister scored a big zero at the Commonwealth Conference—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gilbert: —and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer) scored a double zero in this report, with his recommendations.

• (2:30 p.m.)

The solutions to the crisis offered by the government are pitiful and pathetic. They expand the old fallacies of the past which produced the housing crisis. As to the urgent problem of public housing and urban renewal, they have replaced them by a research department. No concern has been shown for persons whose incomes range between $4,000 and $7,500, who are obliged to pay high prices for homes, and face high interest rates. Little thought has been given to people in this situation, and there has been no consideration of a subsidy on the interest rates charged to them.

No real housing target has been set—for example, a target figure of 250,000 homes, to make up for the shortage brought about by poor building performance in past years. There is to be no increase in construction sufficient to bring down the price of homes. Certainly no consideration has been given to providing a proper "mix" of the types of homes needed.

One feels the government is condoning present exhorbitant interest rates and taking no action, either with respect to the financial institutions or with respect to their own policy, which would have the effect of bringing down these excessive rates. It strikes me as strange that we in Canada can build a sufficient number of cars, television sets and radios to meet the needs of our population, while we cannot build sufficient homes to give people the basic social right of decent housing. This report, in our humble submission, constitutes a shameful approach to the housing crisis in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to express my views on this reform project of the National Housing Act. I had my first look at the report this morning and I want to thank those who made it available to me.

At last, we are dealing with a rather important program. Construction has fallen, which has resulted in a housing crisis, and the people are very much concerned. On the other hand, from a moral point of view, I am convinced that the Commission will really have reached its goal, because I feel that royal commissions are probably the most efficient way to lull the people today.

During the last few years, everything has been done to bleed the Canadian people white through higher income tax deducted at the source, higher industrial income taxes, higher excise taxes, higher sales taxes, both from the wholesaler and the retailer. It will be recalled also that to ram down our throats the famous 11 per cent tax on building materials, the whole thing had to be done in three successive stages.

The high cost of money has been added to all those taxes which contributed to increasing the cost of living. What else could we expect since, on March 21, 1967, the Canadian parliament passed Bill No. C-222, that, in addition to removing the 6 per cent ceiling on bank loans, enabled them to make ten-year loans at any rate they saw fit.

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand why the Progressive Conservative party is complaining about that increase in interest rates since I noted—and I have here a photograph in support of my statement—that on the day Bill No. C-222 was passed 70 Conservative M.P.'s were absent. They preferred to stay away since banks contribute to the elections funds of the two old political parties.

In any event, in view of the high rate of interest, the high cost of capital, and the increase in all kinds of taxes, our economy has reached its saturation point, so that everything is now at a standstill.

Agriculture, trade, commerce and construction are in a slump and the present government, with its well-organized program, keeps pulling in the same direction. I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, since the government still has its thinkers and advisers, and the goal will ultimately be reached, I imagine.

Strangely enough, though, all the problems created by the government become practically insoluble. Then the government hires a group of understanding commissioners who tackle those problems and travel across the country to study them.

Mr. Speaker, without any reflection on your integrity, since you were chosen as an independent member, let me rate among the best Canadian actors the liberal members in office at the present time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

To give assistance to England or the West Indies, we need make no inquiry. We offer credit at the rate of ¾ of 1 per cent for a period of 50 years, as well as grants, and, as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) would say, in the case of foreigners there is no problem, but as far as the Canadian people are concerned, we need a task force, to study the problems that have been created.

Mr. Speaker, I hope the members of the Commission had a good time. As for the chairman, I am convinced that following the program proposed to us, those who have contributed to his election funds will soon get their money back. In any event, while the commissioners were considering the housing problem, the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, which is a federal government agency, allowed the rate of interest to climb to 9⅜ per cent.

Mr. Speaker, if I wished to borrow $30,000 at 9⅜ per cent for 30 years, it would cost me about $45,000 in interest. It seems strange to me that the government should find a small 11 per cent tax on housing materials satisfactory in order to finance social allowances and all kinds of benefits. Should a Canadian citizen build himself a $23,000 home, the government would get only about $2,000 or $2,500 while, on the other hand, it takes upon itself to draw off from the taxpayers, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, $45,000 in interest charges for the same house.

Mr. Speaker, one must recognize that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has been of great assistance but one must also admit that it has become a collection agency. In fact, in order to borrow at a rate of interest of 9 to 10 per cent, one must earn at least $9,000 per year. Now, as shown by experience and surveys, 90 per cent of the Canadian people earn less than $9,000 per year, which means that the people on welfare, the unemployed and low income citizens will not be able to benefit from the present legislation.

The agency came to the conclusion, Mr. Speaker, that it could still make loans to about 10 per cent of the population, the portion it still thinks capable of paying back the money lent. And in a few years from now, we shall perhaps realize that these people were left to their fate.

[Mr. Godin.]

I conclude my remarks, Mr. Speaker, by drawing to the attention of the Prime Minister that if he really wants to help the Canadian people, he just has to resort to the methods used in the case of underdeveloped countries. Since the 11 per cent tax is always deducted from the price of the building material that is sold abroad, I think that we should do away with that 11 per cent tax and have it replaced by a 10 per cent rebate when the material is sold in our country.

I would propose, secondly, that the sum be put at the disposal of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation at the same rates as those which are allowed to foreign countries.

The group suggests also that money be drawn from the Canada Pension Fund. Mr. Speaker, I think that these funds should be left to the provinces, who really need them to develop their natural resources.

In short, we are not asking for preferential rates. We simply want the same treatment as is extended to foreign countries. Therefore, let us use new credit, let us make use of the Bank of Canada.

I have read a newspaper article—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member in order to remind him of the provisions of our Standing Orders to the effect that in the House the comments of an honorable member following the statement of a minister, should be brief.

I appreciate the significance of the subject under consideration, however, I remind the hon. member that, a while ago, he said that he was concluding his remarks.

Mr. Godin: I am concluding my remarks, Mr. Speaker. This is because I was talking about social credit. It is a matter of monetary reform and I know that the Prime Minister wants to go further now.

The Prime Minister stated in England, and I quote:

> —that he favoured true communism as the ideal solution. His definition of true communism is that everyone should give to others the best of what he owns.

Mr. Speaker, I will not go that far. I would not ask the Prime Minister to give away his own millions to the Canadian people. But I ask him and his colleagues in the cabinet to put the people's bank at the service of the people.

PETER AYKROYD—PAYMENTS BY CENTENNIAL COMMISSION

Question No. 719—Mr. McIntosh:

1. What payments have been made to Mr. Peter Aykroyd by the Centennial Commission in the last four years?
2. Is he presently in the government service?
3. If so, in what capacity is he employed?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Prime Minister's and Privy Council Offices and by the department of the Secretary of State as follows: 1. From 1964 to 1967 inclusive, the Centennial Commission made payments of $71,510.39 to Mr. Peter Aykroyd.

2. Yes.

3. Program Administrative Officer, level 8 (Privy Council Office.)

OFFICE SPACE OF CABINET MINISTERS

Question No. 768—Mr. Schreyer:

1. In the case of each of the Ministers of the federal Cabinet, what is the total area of office space provided for the Minister and all those Assistants attached directly to his office?
2. In each case, what is the lease price per square foot or construction and furnishing cost on a per square foot basis?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Public Works): 1. The total office space occupied by each Federal Cabinet Minister combined with that occupied by each Parliamentary Secretary, Executive Assistant, Special Assistant and Research Assistant attached to each Minister's office is detailed on the attached list. The figures do not reflect accommodation provided in the Parliamentary buildings.

2. Owing to the variation in ages of the various Crown-owned buildings providing ministerial accommodation, it is not possible to give figures in answer to this question, that will provide an accurate basis for information or comparison.

LABRADOR—SUBMISSION OF LITIGATION TO SUPREME COURT

Question No. 979—Mr. Fortin:

1. Is the government considering the possibility of submitting to the Supreme Court of Canada the litigation between the Province of Quebec and the Province of Newfoundland concerning Labrador?

2. Is the government considering the possibility of allowing the Provinces of Quebec and Newfoundland to submit the matter of Labrador to the International Court of Justice in The Hague?

3. Has the government received any correspondence, briefs or other documents relating to the matter of Labrador?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the office of the Prime Minister and the Department of Justice as follows: 1. The Government is not aware of any such litigation.

2. By Article 34(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, only States may be parties in cases before the Court.

3. Yes, but none since 1964.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FINANCIAL STRUCTURE

Question No. 981—Mr. Fortin:

Have consultations taken place between the Canadian National Railway and the government with a view to revising the financial structure of the CNR and, if so, what are the results of such consultations?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): The management of Canadian National Railways advises as follows: Yes; the matter is still under consideration.

RICHMOND, QUE.—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE CONTRIBUTIONS

Question No. 1,065—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. What was the total amount of contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Fund paid by citizens of the federal constituency of Richmond in 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968?

2. What portion was paid by employers?

3. What portion was paid by the workers?

4. What portion was paid by the government?

5. What amount has the Unemployment Insurance Fund paid in benefits in 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968 (a) in Canada (b) in each province (c) for the federal constituency of Richmond?

6. To how many claimants in each of the provinces and in the federal constituency of Richmond were benefits paid?

[Translation]

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): The Unemployment Insurance Commission advises: Items 1, 2, 3 and 4: There is no information available which shows a breakdown of contributions to the Unemployment Insurance Fund by federal constituency. In Richmond, as elsewhere, employers and employees contribute an equal amount, and the government contributes an amount equal to one-fifth of the combined employer-employee contributions.

5. The attached table shows the amounts paid in benefits on a national basis and by provinces for the fiscal years 1964-65, 1965-66, 1966-67 and 1967-68. No information is available concerning the amount of benefit paid to residents of the constituency of Richmond.

6. No information is available concerning the number of individuals who receive payments by provinces or in the federal constituency of Richmond.

*RECIPIENTS OF ORDER OF CANADA

Question No. 1,100—Mr. Coates:

1. How many Canadians have been given the honour of being designated as (a) Companion of, and (b) Service Medal recipient of, the Order of Canada?

2. Of these, how many in each of these categories had been, or were, civil servants at the time of appointment?

3. Have any former Prime Ministers been granted Companions of the Order and, if so, which former Prime Ministers?

Mr. J. E. Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am informed by the Registrar of the Order of Canada that the answer to starred question No. 1,100 is as follows: 1. (a) There have been 76 Companions appointed to the Order of Canada to date, of whom seven are deceased; (b) There been 146 recipients of the Medal of Service, of whom four are deceased.

2. (a) There were 11 Companions in the employment of the Canadian government at the time of their appointment to the Order of Canada. This figure includes: Crown Corporations, 2; Expo, 2; National Defence, 1; States Visits, 1.

(b) There were 22 recipients of the Medal of Service in the employment of the Canadian government at the time of their appointment to the Order of Canada. This figure includes: Crown Corporations 1; Expo 8; States Visits 2.

3. Since only those persons who are no longer active in politics are eligible for appointment to the Order, only two former Prime Ministers have been made Companions —The Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent and the Right Hon. Lester B. Pearson.

PLACE RADIO CANADA CONSTRUCTION

Question No. 1,120—Mr. Fortin:

1. What are the reasons for the delay in commencing the construction of Place Radio Canada?

2. What is the work schedule for the construction of Place Radio Canada up until the completion of the work?

3. Do the contracts granted by the CBC for Place Radio Canada require the approval of (a) the Cabinet (b) the Treasury Board?

4. Was there any delay in obtaining approval and for what reasons?

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows: 1. The Corporation originally planned to call for tenders for Phase II (building construction) of Place Radio-Canada before completion in December, 1967, of Phase I (excavation and foundations). Phase II was deferred to allow for thorough review of the scope of the project. The closing date for tenders, originally August 30, 1968, was extended until October 1, 1968, at the request of the contractors who required additional time to complete their bids because of the complexity of the project.

2. Commencement of building construction mid-January, 1969. Completion building construction, July 1971. Start of operation, April, 1972. Completion of installation, October, 1972.

3. The contract for management/contractor services for construction of Phase II, excluding supply and installation of equipment, required and received approval of Treasury Board and Privy Council (Order in Council P.C. 1968-25/2278 dated December 17, 1968).

4. There was no undue delay in obtaining approval. The normal time was required for processing the request for authority, study by Treasury Board and final approval by Order in Council.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK TERMS OF REFERENCE

Question No. 1,171—Mr. Saltsman:

Is the Government of Canada considering the expansion of the terms of reference of the I.D.B., and the cancellation of the Department of Industry loan programs?

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the departments of Finance and Industry, Trade and Commerce as follows: No.

INDUSTRIAL DEVELOPMENT BANK LOAN PROGRAMS

Question No. 1,172—Mr. Saltsman:

What are the terms and conditions of financing of the loan programs under the Industrial Development Bank?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Section 15(1) of the Industrial Development Bank Act states that the Bank may make a loan where credit or other financial resources would not otherwise be available on reasonable terms and conditions, and where the amount invested or to be invested in the industrial enterprise by persons other than the Bank, and the character of that investment, are such as to afford the Bank reasonable protection.

The President of the IDB stated in his annual report for 1968 that as larger term loans appear to be more readily obtainable elsewhere than smaller loans, the IDB's rates of interest are graduated upwards with the size of the loan; this helps to screen out applicants who might be expected to have access to funds elsewhere on reasonable terms and conditions. Terms and conditions of loans vary from borrower to borrower depending on the circumstances.

AGREEMENTS WITH ST. PIERRE AND MIQUELON

Question No. 1,174—Mr. Robinson:

Does Canada have any direct agreements with the island group of St. Pierre and Miquelon in the fields of (a) trade and commerce (b) fishing industry (c) agriculture (d) defence?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No. The islands of St. Pierre-Miquelon are a part of the overseas territories of the French Republic and treaties concluded with respect to these islands would not be concluded direct with St. Pierre-Miquelon but with France.

*MILITARY PERSONNEL FROM FRANCE IN CANADA

Question No. 1,179—Mr. Scott:

1. Are there any military personnel from the Republic of France now instructing Canadian Forces?

2. For what purpose were they engaged?

3. How many are there at the present time?

4. Where are they located?

5. When were they engaged?

6. How long is their anticipated stay?

7. What remuneration do they receive and from whom do they receive it?

Hon. Léo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the answer to this question is as follows: 1. Yes.

2. They were posted to Canada as part of an exchange officer program.

3. Two air force officers.

4. One is at the Canadian Forces Base, Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, the other at the Air Navigational School, Winnipeg, Manitoba.

5. The officer at Moose Jaw came in February 1967, and the one at Winnipeg in August 1968.

6. Two years from date of arrival in Canada.

7. These officers receive military salaries from the French government.

PATRICK ASSELIN—EMPLOYMENT IN DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Question No. 1,183—Mr. Beaudoin:

1. Is Mr. Patrick Asselin in the employ of the Minister or of the Department of Agriculture?

2. If so, what position does he hold?

3. What is his yearly and monthly salary?

4. What are his exact duties?

5. Are parts of his salary exempted from tax?

6. Are his expenses paid?

Hon. H. A. Olson (Minister of Agriculture): 1. Mr. Asselin is a member of the staff of the Minister of Agriculture.

2. Administrative assistant.

3. $7,529 yearly; $627.41 monthly.

4. Administrative duties, dealing with correspondence and policy matters with particular responsibility for liaison with producers and producer organizations in the province of Quebec; other related duties.

5. No.

6. Yes, when incurred on government business or on behalf of the Minister of Agriculture.

HISTORIC SITES AND MONUMENTS BOARD DIRECTOR

Question No. 1,184—Mr. Moore:

1. What is the name of the present Director of the Historic Sites and Monuments Board?

2. When was he appointed?

3. What was his position previous to this appointment?

4. What is his present salary?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): 1. The Historic Sites and Monuments Board of Canada does not have a director. However, the Chairman of the Board is Mr. Allan Turner, member of the board for the province of Saskatchewan.

2. First appointed to the board in 1964, he was named chairman in May 1968.

3. Mr. Turner was, and still is, Provincial Archivist for the province of Saskatchewan.

4. Neither the members of the board nor the chairman receive salaries for serving thereon. For each day spent on board business they receive a per diem allowance, presently set at $20, plus living and travelling expenses while on board business.

Questions

TRANSACTIONS UNDER GOVERNMENT ANNUITIES ACT

Question No. 1,197—Mr. Caouette:

1. When did the Government Annuities Act come into force officially?

2. What is the purpose of this Act?

3. How many annuities were in force on January 1, 1965, 1966, 1967 and 1968?

4. What was the maximum annuity which could be purchased in 1968?

5. Does the government intend to increase the maximum for an annuity?

Mr. Jim McNulty (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): 1. September 1, 1908.

2. To promote habits of thrift and to encourage and aid Canadians to make provision for old age.

3.

Fiscal Year	Annuities Under Payment	Annuities that have not reached maturity
		Individual	Group	Total
1965	93,342	90,340	205,332	389,014

1968	101,987	81,067	181,864	364,918

4. $1,200.00.

5. No.

Note: Contracts in force at March 31 are given rather than January 1 as statistics are maintained on a fiscal year basis.

SUFFIELD, ALTA.; CHEMICAL WARFARE TESTS

Question No. 1,209—Mr. Lewis:

1. Is the Canadian Government co-operating with United States and Britain in conducting secret chemical warfare tests at Suffield, Alberta?

2. If so, what does this co-operation consist of?

Mr. D. W. Groos (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): 1. Yes.

2. Examination of many defensive aspects of chemical operations which are of common interest.

TARIFF ON ACRYLIC PLASTIC SHEETS

Question No. 1,213—Mr. Lewis:

Is the government now considering a tariff on Acrylic Plastic Sheets which is currently manufactured by only one United States owned company in Canada?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): The Budget Resolutions proposing amendments to the Customs Tariff which were tabled in the House of Commons on October 22 included a provision for a 10 per cent British Preferential and Most-Favoured-Nation rate of duty on acrylic sheets (tariff item 93902-83) as recommended by the Tariff Board in its report on chemicals under Reference 120. Bill C-131 which implemented these resolutions was passed by Parliament. The 10 per cent duty on acrylic sheets came into effect on January 1 of this year.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yves Forest (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, notice of Motion No. 66 for production of papers is acceptable to the government.

Mr. Speaker, would you kindly call notice of motion No. 62?

I ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand.

[English]

NORTHUMBERLAND STRAIT CROSSING—ENGINEERING FEASIBILITY

Motion No. 62—Mr. MacDonald (Egmont):

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency praying that he will cause to be laid before this House a copy of all surveys, reports and enquiries respecting costs and benefits and engineering feasibility of the Northumberland Strait Crossing project received by the Government of Canada since September 1, 1967.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, previously the hon. member had agreed to drop this motion if the Stanford Research Institute report was tabled. This report and its supplements will be tabled with the return for the Motion for Production of Papers No. 61. Therefore I would request that the hon. member for Egmont withdraw his motion.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion, subject to the conditions and reservations referred to by the minister, or is it to be dropped? Agreed?

Motion withdrawn and order discharged.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO REDUCE OR ELIMINATE BUILDING MATERIALS TAX

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the recommendations contained in the report of the task force I should like to ask the minister whether it is his intention to bring legislation before the house reducing or eliminating the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials used in housing construction?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, anything that the Minister of Transport proposes I will study with care. I have no present intention to do what the hon. member is suggesting.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question. In view of the fact that the recommendations of the task force included some relating to provincial taxation, has the minister any intention of discussing provincial taxation on building materials with the appropriate provincial authorities?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that this report will be studied very carefully by the government.

SOCIAL SECURITY

REQUEST THAT WELFARE POLICIES BE REFERRED TO SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and is based on the release made today by the Canadian Welfare Council of its document entitled "Social Policies for Canada". In view of the fact that some of the best social legislation that we have ever had came out of a parliamentary committee—and I refer to the old age security committee of 1950—would the government consider referring the whole question of its review of social welfare policies, old age pensions and other matters to a special committee so that we might all become involved in any proposals in regard to changes in this field?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be premature at this time to give any indication that this would be the course of government action, but I would be pleased to take the suggestion of the hon. member under consideration later on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the minister whether in considering this matter the government will take note not only of the document released today by the Canadian Welfare Council but also the new proposals regarding old age security which have been put forth in Britain?

Mr. Munro: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question arising out of the report. Will the government undertake the implementation of the recommendation of the report that a study be made of appropriate methods to implement a guaranteed income?

Mr. Munro: I believe this concept, along with all other ideas and concepts in the whole social welfare field are under review and I believe that has been indicated to the house previously.

SPORTS

ASSISTANCE TO NATIONAL SKI TEAM

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare or to his parliamentary secretary.

Last week I asked a question about a federal grant to the national ski team. Would either one be in a position to answer this question today?

[English]

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Fitness and Amateur Sports Council has approved, and I have approved, the grant of some $198,000 from their fund for the Ski Association and I am informed that this represents approximately 45 per cent of their budget.

HOUSING

REQUEST FOR ASSURANCE RESPECTING URBAN RENEWAL PROGRAM

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): I have a question for the Minister of Transport, Mr. Speaker. In view of the growing concern of several municipalities which have commenced urban renewal projects because of the possibility of cut-backs in the federal commitment, can the minister assure this house, the nation and particularly the municipalities that there will be no cut-backs so far as those urban renewal programs which have already been started?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give blanket assurance at this stage, but I can assure my hon. friend this is one of the matters which I will refer to the government for consideration and decision at an early date. There are inevitably certain projects which must continue. I think if one were looking at the priorities involved he might conclude a certain postponement would be in the national interest until we can provide adequate housing for all our Canadian citizens. I think the best thing to do is take a look at the subject immediately, and then be in a position to reply definitively in each existing case.

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it the intention of the minister to enter into a dialogue with either provincial or municipal authorities before reaching any definite conclusion in this regard?

Mr. Hellyer: There certainly will be adequate opportunity for discussion. I think informal talks will be held with provincial ministers some time later. I know the Canadian Association of Mayors and Reeves are studying the report very carefully, and will be putting forward some representations with respect to it. Naturally all representations received will be given thoughtful consideration.

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): A supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the priorities he mentioned, can he tell the house when he intends to make the announcement of a proposed $36 million housing project in Corner Brook, Newfoundland?

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR ISSUE OF COMMEMORATIVE COIN

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): My question is to the Minister of Finance, and I know Your Honour will immediately recognize my reason for seeking co-operation. Could the hon. minister advise the house in general, and in particular the members from British Columbia, when a decision, favourable we hope, can be expected on the issuance of a commemorative coin to mark the 100th anniversary of the addition of British Columbia to our great Confederation?

Mr. Speaker: I am not sure whether this is a question which can be asked verbally. It seems the type of question that normally should be put on the order paper.

Mr. Winch: I ask the question because of the time involved. The Numismatic Society advises me an early decision is required, if it is going into effect.

Mr. Speaker: I suggest an early decision could be made in writing.

[Translation]

EDUCATION

RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Gaetan-J. Serré (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

Could he tell the house if he has examined the recommendations of the Franco-Ontarian Committee on cultural life which were presented to the Ontario Minister of Education last Monday?

If so, does he intend to answer favourably their request that the C.B.C. establish French radio (AM and FM) and television stations wherever there is a sufficient number of French-speaking people in Ontario?

Mr. Speaker, such a service is necessary, not only for the French-speaking people of Ontario but also for the increasing number of English-speaking people who wish to get a better knowledge of the French culture.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

[English]

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

EFFECT OF INCREASED RATES ON TRADE PAPERS PUBLICATION

Mr. Barry Mather (Surrey): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General. Having in mind the publication today of the Survey which states that a large number of trade union papers are discontinuing publication, due to the very heavy postal rate increase, could consideration be given to a review of the situation in which those non-profit papers find themselves?

Mr. Speaker: The first part of the question may be placed on the order paper. However if there is immediate urgency the matter might be discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Mather: Ten o'clock.

AIR TRANSPORT

MERGER BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Is the government planning a merger between Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Airlines? I ask this question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent suggestions by Air Canada advocating such a proposal.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the government is studying the whole question related to air policy, and the future corporate structure of Air Canada, in a general sense. I think I indicated some weeks or months ago in answer to a question that this suggestion which has been made is not a matter of urgent study. It is not the subject of a specific task force or anything of that nature. Nevertheless I think one has to look in a methodical way at the future of Air Canada and its corporate structure, financing and all related aspects, and then in due course perhaps to make some conclusions or recommendations which could be considered by the government. The chairman of Air Canada was stating a personal view I understand; he was not flying a kite for the government. This is one point of view. If the President of Canadian Pacific Airlines had been speaking he might have put forth a different view.

Mr. Nesbitt: A supplementary question. Can the minister tell us if any directors of Canadian Pacific Airlines, either present or past, have been consulted by himself or the government in connection with this merger possibility?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I have had informal discussions with numerous people as to what merit if any they think the idea might have. I am sure the Minister without Portfolio has as well. These have been informal conversations of the type I might have had with my hon. friend or any other hon. member on the same subject.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport a question regarding this task force, the chairman of which is the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson) from Manitoba. In view of the fact that, during the election campaign this minister came out in favour of the amalgamation of Canadian Pacific Airlines and Air Canada, does the minister think that hon. gentleman will be able to look at this problem objectively—free from prejudice?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Richardson) is not only one of the most thorough but one of the most objective people I have met in many years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hellyer: Also, if I may so, he is one of the most selfless, public spirited citizens I know of in Canadian public life.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: No commercials.

Mr. Hellyer: I am sure that when he approaches this problem he will approach it with only the interests of the Canadian people in mind.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Now that the minister has placed a halo about the Minister without Portfolio, will he answer the question? What possible objectivity can there be in one who took such a strong stand? That is what I want to know.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suspect the right hon. gentleman would agree with me that this question as asked is argumentative.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not argumentative, factual.

[Mr. Nesbitt.]

AIRPORTS

EXPANSION OF ADJACENT HOUSING DEVELOPMENTS

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. During the Minister's review of air policy, will he be taking into consideration the question of the expansion of housing developments adjacent to our airports, such as that which necessitated the change in policy for Toronto, and which may cause a change in location of the air terminal?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I can assure my hon. friend that, as a result of the experience in Toronto and Montreal, I have asked for a full report as to what the consequences of this kind of development might be in the future in respect to our other airports in the other cities. Now is the time to look at it, before the encroachment has reached a stage where it, too, would have to be moved or limited, as far as that expansion is concerned.

We are trying to learn from our experience and project into the future as best we can the information now available to us, so that, where we can, we will protect existing facilities through co-operation with the provinces, or through some other method. We want to see that this is done before it is too late.

HOUSING

TECHNOLOGICAL IMPROVEMENTS IN CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Transport.

Since the minister has tabled his report, could he now tell the house whether he intends to suggest technological improvements in the field of public housing, in order to meet the urgent needs of this industry?

Mr. Speaker: I regret to advise the hon. member that his question is too general. The information he is asking for should normally be given by the minister on motions.

UNITED NATIONS

INVESTIGATION BY CONTROL COMMISSION OF INFILTRATION

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of a statement yesterday by Mr. McCloskey, the White House press representative, which no doubt has been brought to the minister's attention. Has the International Control Commission, on which Canada is represented, been requested at any time in the past six months to investigate allegations of North Vietnamese massive infiltration into Laotian territory and, if so, what were the results?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take notice of that question.

TRADE

WHEAT—REQUEST FOR RENEWED SALES EFFORT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Has the attention of the minister been called to the fact that there has been a large wheat sale by Australia to China, worth $137 million? Will the government now persuade the Canadian Wheat Board to renew its efforts to make other sales to China and other countries, and will the government give some assurance of the fact that, aided by constructive proposals from this side of the house, the problems with regard to storage and transport will indeed be solved?

GRAIN—RESTRUCTURING OF MARKETING POLICY

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the announcement made in Quebec by the Minister of Agriculture that a chairman has been appointed for a National Grains Council, does this indicate a restructuring of government policy with regard to the marketing of western Canadian grain?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker. The National Grains Council is a council that we had talked about a great deal during the election, and this is the fulfilment of the promise we had made.

Mr. Gleave: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, would the government at an early date give the house some information on the terms of reference and the financing of this council?

Mr. Trudeau: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I believe the Minister of Agriculture will want to make public some information on this subject.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN FILM DEVELOPMENT CORPORATION

MICHAEL SPENCER—ENTITLEMENT OF PARLIAMENT TO INFORMATION

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Is the minister aware of the position of Michael Spencer, acting secretary of the Canadian Film Development Corporation, that parliament is not entitled to information about the way this agency is spending money? Will my question on the order paper, No. 1,188 be answered in due course?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps the second question might be answered by the Secretary of State.

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): In due course, certainly, Mr. Speaker.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FRANCE AND QUEBEC RESPECTING SATELLITES

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Is the minister aware of arrangements made between the French government and the Quebec government concerning the Symphonie satellite. In the affirmative, could he tell us if he has approved them?

[English]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, a similar question was asked on our last sitting day. I said we had been furnished with copies of the letters that were exchanged between the government of Quebec and the government of France. These are now under study in the department and I expect I will either make a statement or answer questions after the study has been completed.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a question to the Prime Minister.

Having in mind the problems which appear to crop up concerning the satellite project, would the Prime Minister be in favour of a tripartite agreement between Quebec, Ottawa and France to work things out?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not feel that we have reached the stage of a tripartite agreement yet. An umbrella agreement has been concluded by the French and the Canadian governments allowing the provinces to do certain things. In the light of international law, the minister, as he said, is now in the process of establishing whether the letters that were exchanged in Paris fall under that agreement.

For my part, I am surprised that the province should have enough money to concern itself with things that do not fall within its jurisdiction. If it has millions of dollars to invest in the field of satellites, I am convinced that the Minister of Finance will be pleased to hear about it.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question.

I did not ask the Prime Minister whether the stage had been reached for a tripartite agreement, but whether he would favour the idea?

Mr. Speaker: The question then becomes hypothetical.

[English]

ESTATE TAX ACT

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION RESPECTING LEGISLATION

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance when he is going to present to this house the often promised and long dreaded legislation on taxation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this first-rate legislation with regard to estate taxes will be presented to the house tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

TRANSPORT

LEASING OF WATER LOTS ON CANAL SYSTEMS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Is it still the department's intention to pursue its program with respect to water lot leasing on the Trent and Rideau canal systems?

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this question might be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Scott: Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

HIGHWAY SAFETY

REGULATIONS RESPECTING SNOWMOBILES

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the government giving any consideration to providing regulations for the operation of snowmobiles owing to the fact that they have been responsible for the death of quite a number of people and have now become a menace to pedestrians and other traffic?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): This would be a matter strictly within provincial jurisdiction, unless or until these machines become engaged in interprovincial or international traffic.

Mr. Noble: Mr. Speaker, this is the same answer I got when I raised the problem of highway safety in this house. I think the minister and the government will still have to look after it.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

SASKATCHEWAN—LOCATION OF TELEVISION OUTLET

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Secretary of State. Can he advise the house whether the negotiations by the C.B.C. for the acquisition of a television outlet in Saskatchewan have been completed? Can he make an announcement now, or when will he make an announcement as to where these facilities will be located?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I answered that question three or four days ago and I have nothing to add to the reply I gave then.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN FRANCE AND QUEBEC RESPECTING SATELLITES

Mr. Bernard Dumont (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister said that Quebec had millions of dollars to spend for the Symphonie satellite. Is he not aware of the fact that France is giving it free of charge?

[English]

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

NOVA SCOTIA—ARDA REPORT RESPECTING NORTHERN COUNTIES

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the parliamentary secretary to the minister for rural development. On January 15 I asked the minister regarding the possibility of making public the ARDA task force report on the nine northern counties of Nova Scotia. The minister at that time said that he would take the question under consideration and answer later. Would the parliamentary secretary look into the matter and give an answer tomorrow or the day after?

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, the minister was here earlier. I will bring the question to his attention.

AIRPORTS

OTTAWA—CONDITION OF ACCESS ROAD

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the question asked by my colleague the hon. member for South Shore of the Minister of Transport. I am not sure whether my question should be addressed to the Minister of Transport or to the minister who is responsible for the National Capital Commission. My question is whether any minister of the cabinet or any cabinet committee is looking into the matter of the condition of the road from the airport to the city of Ottawa. Is any work being done on this with the proper civic authorities?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question should be placed on the order paper.

Mr. Nowlan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I quite appreciate that during this question period questions must be of national importance and urgency. Unless something is done pretty soon we will not be able to drive from the airport to the city because of the potholes which are showing up in the road at a rate that would not even be usual in the Yukon Territory.

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not a question; it is a grievance.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NATO AND NORAD—REQUEST FOR POSITION OF MINISTERS ON POLICY

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of National Defence, who is in charge of the defences of the nation. When he made the statement giving his full and undivided support to NATO and its continuance, was he speaking for the government and, if so, would he post a letter to the Postmaster General to remind him of that fact.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest that a question relating to statements made outside the house can only be directed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I shall ask it without referring to anything outside the house. Is the minister taking a stand on behalf of the government, a most statesmanlike stand too, that NATO shall be preserved for the defence of this nation? Can't the minister answer?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): I was stating my personal conviction. Of course I can.

Mr. Jack McIntosh (Swift Current-Maple Creek): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence. Is the minister stating current government defence policy when he says that the present policy is that laid down by the white paper of 1964?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I do not believe I said that, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIntosh: I will rephrase my question.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question asked by the hon. member and the question asked by the right hon. member for Prince Albert point up the difficulty in asking a minister about statements made outside the house. The rule is quite clear that the only reference that can be made to such statements is by way of a question to the Prime Minister, asking whether such a declaration represents government policy.

Mr. McIntosh: May I rephrase my question. Is current Canadian defence policy the same as that set out in the white paper of 1964?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member is asking the minister to give a statement on policy. I have the impression that this kind of statement should be made on motions. But if hon. members want to allow the minister to reply, I have no objection.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Within the limitations placed by Your Honour on the questioning of ministers within their own competence, I will address my question to the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is aware of what was said by the Minister of National Defence. Does that reflect present government policy with regard to NATO and NORAD?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I answered the question on Monday. I read from the statement of the minister wherein he said that present policy was under review and he was not stating his conclusions as to what the result of the review would be. This is a matter for the government to decide. I realize there is quite a bit of distress in the opposition ranks about our policy, but if it will reassure them I can tell them that we are pursuing our review and will come to a policy which all cabinet ministers will support wholeheartedly.

An hon. Member: Or else they won't be there.

DRUGS

IMPOSITION OF CONTROLS ON AMPHETAMINE TYPE STIMULANTS

Mr. Louis-Roland Comeau (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, on Monday I asked a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding drugs. Perhaps the ruling that this question should have been placed on the order paper may have been given because you, Mr. Speaker, did not understand the question, since it is reported incorrectly in Hansard.

The question should be: For what reason did Canada refuse to support the efforts of Sweden—not of students—to impose strict controls, through the United Nations narcotics commission, on amphetamine type stimulants.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the revised question is more acceptable than the first one, but I am afraid that even with the change I must rule that it should be placed on the order paper. If there is a matter of urgency, it could be discussed at the time of adjournment.

CRIMINAL CODE

AVAILABILITY OF AMENDING BILL

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address this question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the large number of requests I have received, as I am sure other members of this house have, regarding extra copies of the bill to amend the Criminal Code, Bill C-150, would the minister use his good offices to make more copies available to members.

Hon. John N. Turner (Minister of Justice): That is a good idea, Mr. Speaker.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT RESPECTING GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the tremendous uncertainty regarding the economic feasibility of prosecuting the 1969 fishery operation, could the minister give some definite indication of when and what type of governmental program will prevail in this coming 1969 season?

Mr. Speaker: I am wondering whether perhaps the hon. member is asking for a statement which should be made on motions. This is the impression I have.

Mr. Lundrigan: Then perhaps I might ask at what definite date we might expect an indication of the nature of the government's program to be announced for the coming season.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): The answer very briefly is that this matter is under active discussion with the representatives of the fishermen and with the companies at the present time.

Mr. Lundrigan: A number of hon. members have received a tremendous number of inquiries from people who plan literally to quit the fishing operation altogether. We have heard this same answer on a number of occasions. I would like a more definite indication.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is a supplementary, directed to the Minister of Fisheries. On January 21 the minister announced, in reply to my question, that he would be announcing the policy in this regard within the month. Does that still stand, and when can we expect an announcement, since January now is just about over?

Mr. Davis: Certainly before February 21, Mr. Speaker.

ESTATE TAX ACT

INFORMATION TO GOVERNMENT SUPPORTERS RESPECTING LEGISLATION

Mr. Craig Stewart (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister provided confidential information concerning changes in proposed estate tax laws to government members of this house for transmission to their friends?

Mr. Speaker: Need I suggest to the hon. member that the question as asked is either a charge or an accusation, and therefore cannot be accepted, phrased in that way.

DISCLOSURES BY HON. MEMBER FOR PORTAGE AND HON. MEMBER FOR PROVENCHER RESPECTING LEGISLATION

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he can advise the house as to any confidential information which may have been given to any member of this house regarding the proposed estate tax legislation?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the resolution and a full explanation of it was given to the whole house and to the country. Since the resolution was introduced in the house, I have had discussions with members of my own caucus and members of the opposition in respect of their ideas about what should happen to estate tax law. Indeed, the Leader of the Opposition has said I should withdraw the legislation entirely and not benefit the women of the country. Apparently he is against women.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question simply was, has any confidential information been given to any members of the house in respect of the estate tax proposals or changes?

Mr. Benson: I do not really know what my friend means by "confidential information", but—

An hon. Member: Oh, yes you do.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, among the great amount of mail the Minister of Finance has received concerning changes to the estate tax laws did he receive a petition from the Liberal association of the Wellington riding asking him to withdraw it?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this type of question cannot be asked at this time. This would open the door to many similar questions.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, would it not be easier for the minister to table all the letters of criticism that he has received, although not here in the house because they would fill this chamber?

Mr. Benson: I would be glad to table the compliments I have received, and they are very numerous.

Mr. Bell: You will get more letters when the people hear about that.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would the minister advise the house whether he authorized the hon. member for Portage and the hon. member for Provencher to disclose that he was going to make certain changes and would bow to some of the opposition to the bill?

Mr. Benson: No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Is the minister then saying that the disclosures made by those hon. members were incorrect?

Mr. Benson: I have not seen them.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the increasing opposition to the proposed change in respect of estate taxes, of which I am sure the minister is aware, can he now state that he is prepared to change this measure in order to make it more realistic for Canadians who want to work and save in the future?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is argumentative. I suggest to the hon. member that this type of question should be asked during the course of his speech when we are considering the legislation.

Mr. Alexander: May I rephrase my question, Mr. Speaker? In view of the many representations which have been made to the minister through letters, and statements this afternoon, can he now state that he is prepared to change the estate tax bill?

Mr. Benson: The legislation will be introduced tomorrow and my hon. friend will see exactly what is in the bill then.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. May I remind the house that other members would like to ask questions. There have been quite a number of supplementary questions on this subject, but I will allow another by the hon. member for Edmonton Mest.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, will the changes about which discussions have taken place include a change in the date when the estate tax bill comes into force, an increase in the ceiling exemption and the allowance of a period of five years over which the estate tax may be paid under the new provisions?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is wrong on most of his queries.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSING

ADVANCE COPIES OF TASK FORCE REPORT—ACTION OF TIME MAGAZINE

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, this question is addressed to the Minister of Transport. It is in respect of a matter concerning which I had thought a question would have been asked before this. Did the minister make available advance copies of the housing task force report to the press gallery, on orders they keep silent about its contents until the two o'clock deadline.

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bell: Did this apply to Time magazine?

Mr. Hellyer: They might have had one this morning, Mr. Speaker. They did not have one earlier. If you read their report carefully you will realize that they could not possibly have had the report.

Mr. Bell: Do I understand the minister to say this did apply to Time magazine?

Mr. Hellyer: Maybe for next week's edition, not for last.

Mr. Bell: Did they have access in any way to information on the housing task force report?

Mr. Hellyer: To the best of my knowledge, they did not have a copy of the report. The task force reports were all locked up at the Queen's Printer until Monday night, after Time had gone to press.

They might very easily have had access to someone who had knowledge of what was in the task force report. That is the only explanation I have for the two direct quotations they have. I can make inquiries as to what happened and provide an answer for my hon. friend.

Mr. Bell: Will the minister make inquiries along this line, to make certain that nobody in his department had any contact with Time magazine on this subject, in advance?

Mr. Hellyer: My department is so large, Mr. Speaker, that would require a big inquiry.

SHIPPING

REQUEST FOR LOWER RATES ON ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the minister of Transport. In view of the many protests by shipowners, grain and ore shippers and lock users, with regard to the high toll rates on the St. Lawrence Seaway, would the minister say whether he is considering a reduction of these rates in order to make water transportation more economical?

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the hon. member's question tends to be too general. The hon. member asked the minister to make a statement with regard to the general policy of his department or the government and I think that such a statement should be made on motions.

[English]

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the government house leader whether, as a result of yesterday's experience with committee meetings, especially the meeting of the fisheries committee, he can confirm that explicit orders were given to his colleagues to vote against all constructive amendments moved by members of opposition parties?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

HOUSING

REMOVAL OF TAX ON BUILDING MATERIALS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Transport whether the recommendations of the task force to remove the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials was taken from the Conservative election platforms of 1965 or 1968?

Mr. Hellyer: It was in spite of that.

WATER RESOURCES

LONG HARBOUR, NFLD.—INVESTIGATION OF WATER POLLUTION

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Fisheries whether he can inform the house about what steps are being taken to investigate evidence of a serious pollution problem in the waters around Long Harbour, Newfoundland, where a quantity of dead fish have been found floating near the beaches?

Mr. Speaker: It is difficult to decide from here how urgent this question is. I would think perhaps it might wait until the hour of adjournment.

Mr. Carter: It is very important to the fish, Mr. Speaker.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Mr. Speaker: Before calling orders of the day, I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-25, an act to amend the Export and Import Permits Act, to which the concurrence of this house is desired.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

FIRST ALLOTTED DAY—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PRESENT ECONOMIC PROGRAMS TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this house regrets that the government is not presenting programs to achieve a rate of economic growth which will reduce unemployment and also ensure that the economy will be able to absorb the large number of new entrants into the labour force this year.

Mr. Speaker: Before the Leader of the Opposition is allowed to proceed with his motion, may I mention that I have had the opportunity, with the co-operation of the hon. gentleman, to consider the proposed motion. I should like now to make the following comments for the assistance of hon. members. Let me draw the attention of the house to the wording of this proposed motion in view of previous decisions of the house during the current session.

I specifically refer to a subamendment moved by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) during the address in reply to the speech from the throne, which motion was decided in the negative on December 17, 1968.

Hon. members will recall that on that occasion the Leader of the Opposition had moved an amendment to the effect that the government had refused to recognize or respond to Canada's current and urgent economic and social problems and had failed to provide parliament with an agenda of priorities to define and implement the just society. Thereupon, the hon. member for York South proposed a subamendment to include the question of housing, urban development, unemployment and poverty.

There is a similarity between what is being proposed today and what was decided on September 17, 1968. I merely draw this to the attention of the house, not with the intention of refusing the motion proposed today but in order to caution hon. members that a problem does exist which perhaps they may wish to reflect upon when occasions arise to move motions of non-confidence and set forth grievances under our new rules.

Supply motions should relate to specific matters and should not be an effort to cover a multitude of subjects in one motion. Amendments, of course, should be strictly relevant to the main motion, and when the main motion is drawn in general terms it becomes exceedingly difficult to limit amendments that may be proposed.

I should point out to hon. members that in the course of an ordinary session about 40 days will be provided for the moving of non-confidence motions or the raising of grievances against the government by opposition members, according to the new rules of the house. I need not expand on that except to say that as this session progresses it will become very difficult to draft motions which will not violate the well established rule to which I have referred.

Having drawn this problem to the attention of hon. members, I will now put the motion to the house. Mr. Stanfield, seconded by Mr. MacEwan, moved:

That this house regrets that the government is not presenting programs to achieve a rate of economic growth which will reduce unemployment and also ensure that the economy will be able to absorb the large number of new entrants into the labour force this year.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, this is the first of the so-called opposition days provided under the new rules. Opposition days give us an opportunity to honour one of the most important obligations of a parliamentary opposition, that of focussing a public spotlight on problems which the government would otherwise avoid discussing. That is certainly the case with our immediate and even longer term economic problems, because the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) has proposed, save only for some unforeseen emergency—and of course we are getting used to unforeseen emergencies developing—not to discuss economic problems or economic policy in any coherent context, which is to say in the context of a budgetary statement from the government, until the spring of 1970.

Mr. Benson: Who said that?

Mr. Stanfield: Opposition days provide an opportunity for parliament to draw public attention to problems which the government is failing to meet. In the case of the present government at this stage of its mandate, the obligation upon the opposition is, I suggest, especially important because, for better or worse, we will have this government with us in Canada for another three and a half years or so in the normal course of events. It would be tragic for Canada if the present uncertainty in economic policy continued; tragic if the parliamentary opposition allowed the government to get away very much longer with the sort of bland, complacent, almost indifferent attitude toward government responsibility for economic progress. So, this motion on this opposition day will have performed a very useful public service if we succeed only in shaking the government out of some of its complacency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: What did the Canadian economy accomplish in 1968? It was a tremendous year for exports, and I gladly acknowledge it. More than 86 per cent of the increase in exports was accounted for by exports to the United States. The copper strike there and the threatened strikes in the iron and steel industry played a significant part in increasing our exports to that country. So, the increase has to be seen in that context. Nevertheless, the total increase in exports during 1968 was outstanding. It was much higher than anticipated, something of the order of 18 per cent or more. I think the increase was 18.7 per cent for the first 11 months of 1968 as compared with the first 11 months of 1967.

Canadians are of course delighted with this increase. However, our total exports depend on one market, that of the United States. Over 66 per cent of all our exports went there last year. This fact does raise serious questions about our dependence upon one trading partner, but that is a subject for another day and another discussion. The increase in exports is important in two respects to the case that I want to establish this afternoon. First, I do not think even the most optimistic forecaster would predict that our increase in exports in 1969 will make nearly as important an over-all contribution to our economy as it did in 1968. Second—and I suggest this is very significant—the fact is that despite this almost phenomenal increase in exports in 1968, Canada's rate of economic growth still fell short of the target for growth set for Canada by the Economic Council of Canada. That council has made it clear that Canada requires an average annual rate of real economic growth of something like 5½ per cent if we are to create enough jobs to absorb the new entrants into our labour force each year.

Canada has failed, and failed conspicuously, to attain that minimum objective. In 1968 the rate of real economic growth was estimated to have been in the order of from 4 to 4½ per cent, well short of the target minimum set by the Economic Council of Canada. The record for the year 1968 has to be viewed against the poor performance of the year 1967, when we achieved a rate of economic growth of 2.8 per cent. I do not want to belabour this point because our relatively poor showing in terms of employment and economic growth, and also in terms of inflation during the last couple of years, has been conceded in the white paper tabled before Christmas by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford). But the cumulative effect of this failure to attain the minimum potential in economic growth for three years running is now staring us right in the face this winter.

All the while we have suffered from this extraordinary combination of lagging rate of growth plus unacceptably high inflation. Again, and this has an important bearing on our problems relating to employment and growth, the Economic Council suggested that we could tolerate a rate of annual increase in prices of between 1.4 per cent to 2 per cent per annum, whereas in fact in 1966 the actual rate of increase in prices was 3.7 per cent. In 1967 it was 3.5 per cent, and in 1968, the year of the great war against inflation by this government, the increase was 4.2 per cent.

Price increases in some years have been more than twice as high as the maximum tolerable. Unemployment in some years has been as much as twice as high as the maximum suggested by the Economic Council as tolerable. The rate of growth in some years has been less than half the target set by the Economic Council.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Employment and unemployment figures for January will not be published for another few weeks or so. Perhaps the January figures will belatedly shake the government out of some of its complacency. In the middle of December, when one would expect the stepped up activity in the consumer sector of the economy to be reflected in employment figures, the labour force itself has declined by some 75,000 persons in a single month. Unemployment has increased by some 35,000 persons, and this is in addition to the shrinkage in the labour force. In the middle of December, 373,000 Canadians were unemployed, some 4.7 per cent of the labour force, and the situation will be worse when the January figures are published in some two weeks time.

These figures show a failure in policy. The present Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Sharp) spoke about inflation almost three years ago when he was minister of finance. There is no point in detailing his shameful record of performance in this connection. We all remember the phoney war against inflation, and the way the government tried to cook the books to show spending cuts that were never in fact made. The present Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), when he was president of the treasury board, was the instrument of that deception. He was the instrument of that false and misleading forecast about the monetary situation less than a year ago. As the former minister of finance put it, they let a little slack into the economy to try to fight inflation; they cut back on job producing programs. These policies have failed to accomplish their purpose. The evidence is before us. Inflation has not been brought under control. Unemployment is still unacceptably high and rising as a result of a deliberate government policy to fight inflation by deliberately inducing a little slack in the economy.

There is no point in detailing the faults of the government in the past few years except to plead with them to try to learn something from their failures in policy. We also plead with the government to realize how crucial is the factor of confidence in Canada's economy and confidence in the government's management of this economy. We have a policy of deliberate unemployment and deliberate slack because of the failure to cope with inflation by other means.

What is the government doing about inflation since the policy of slack has failed, failed by the admission of the government's own white paper? It has recognized the failure of its existing program. For more than a year, the government has been saying that the existing methods for fighting inflation are inadequate. Having recognized its failure, what is the government doing to take the slack out of the economy without unnecessarily increasing inflationary pressures?

It said it was going to appoint a continuing royal commission, an independent study group, to produce solutions, perhaps some years hence. In the meantime, is the Canadian nation doomed to limp along for years suffering excessive inflation and excessive unemployment, suffering the risk of a loss of its competitive position in the world markets. Are we to run the risk of renewed currency difficulties, all the while suffer from the lack of opportunities for all our people? Is this the government that not many months ago was trying to give the people the impression that it would never settle for anything but the best, and yet is now accepting apparently excessive inflation and excessive unemployment as a policy? I say certainly the government should continue the studies which it wants to undertake, but in the meantime it should also take positive steps to reinforce voluntary programs of restraint.

I notice that an advisory group to President Johnson in the United States recently recommended to him a guideline policy for the consideration of both management and labour. The government should try to establish such a policy so that normal expansion can proceed and so that the government can abandon its policy of deliberate slackness in the economy and thereby avoid condemning our country to severe unemployment and inflation.

When is Canada going to start catching up? When do we begin to make up for the cumulative failure to achieve our economic potential, much less attain that minimum potential in any one year? The results of the government's policies are staring us in the face this winter, and unless the economy is put in order, unless the government acts decisively to restore confidence in the economy, the situation may well get worse before it gets better.

Where will the economy be next spring? So far as we can now tell, the rate of economic growth will still be below the minimum acceptable rate, inflation will still be unacceptably high, and unemployment will still be high. So far as we can judge from many of the things the Minister of Finance has said, a year from now we will still be waiting for some kind of budgetary statement from him giving us an idea of where the country stands. All this against the background of the preceding three or four years when the performance has been far short of the potential of our country.

The December unemployment figures are bad enough on the national average when compared with the figures for the previous month. But when you have a 7.1 per cent unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces and a 6.8 per cent unemployment rate in Quebec, surely that adds to the seriousness of the problem. I am well aware that unemployment rates in the Atlantic provinces have been traditionally high, but surely it is intolerable for the government to temporize any longer with the policies promised now for seven or eight months in the field of regional development.

The Prime Minister and his associates were glib enough about regional disparity during the election campaign. There were promises of a Marshall plan for the slow growth areas. Where are these policies? When we ask straightforward questions about regional disparity in this house and about the high level of unemployment in Quebec and the Atlantic provinces, we are told by the minister responsible that he will deal with these matters when he brings in his bill establishing the new department. I say to my hon. friends: Bring it in now. What is the government waiting for? This house has dealt with a wide variety of legislation, some of it important, some of it rather routine and less urgent in terms of the impact upon the suffering of thousands of Canadians. If there are policies that this government has to help overcome regional disparity and to fight the particularly high unemployment rates in some parts of the country, we are entitled to see these policies, and the government is obliged to implement them without further delay.

So far, we have heard rumours that the Atlantic Development Board is to be dismantled and turned into some kind of anaemic advisory board. It is time that the minister and the government put an end to the speculation and gave an honest statement of their intentions. The views of this party, its program with regard to regional development, are well known, and I would be happy to elaborate on them at any time for my hon. friends.

There are other regional problems in the country. There are the acute problems of western agriculture and they affect employment in that part of the country and in the country as a whole as the problem backs up. The agricultural community in western Canada does not yet believe the government is even concerned about their problems. Consequently, confidence in the future of agriculture is wanting. I simply say today that in terms of the economy of the whole country, as well as in terms of that part in Canada, it is important that the government act to restore confidence. This requires an end to the uncertainties surrounding the economic policies of the government. I hope this motion carries with it clearly the implication that confidence in Canada's economy, confidence in the competence of the government to manage the economy, is very much at stake at the present time.

This motion demands the disclosure of the economic policies of the government. It demands to know how the government proposes to go about the urgent task of getting the country into a position where we can attain our reasonable potential for growth this year and in the years ahead, as well as making up some of the ground lost in the last few years. The country neither expects nor requires a flawless and detailed blueprint for economic success, but surely it is entitled to know the main outlines of the government's economic policy after nine months in office of this so-called new regime.

Surely, it is not enough to abandon existing programs, whether in connection with winter works or in the fisheries field or in science, citing their shortcomings which everybody knew about, and then begin to look for new programs. Surely, it erodes confidence to talk about restraint and then to produce an accounting in which the deficit is higher by hundreds of millions of dollars than had been expected. Surely, in this vital area of economic policy, involving the question of confidence which is so closely related to growth, it is foolhardy to try to get by with bland statements that trade policy is under review that regional development programs are under review, and so on.

Especially is this so when the country has come so dangerously close to a crisis of confidence as has been the case in the past couple of years. In our economy, growth and employment require sound leadership and decisions by the federal government. Active and progressive participation by the provinces is also needed. They must have the confidence and the ability to play an active part. Resourceful private citizens, groups of citizens and private corporations, must fulfil their dynamic role in the area of private entreprise. And we must not overlook the importance of the provinces in developing employment and growth throughout the country.

This government, far from meeting the provinces, settling priorities and working out a co-operative program to develop the country, has declared financial warfare on the provinces. Instead of co-operation and resulting confidence, we find uncertainty on the part of the provinces as to their future. This, of course, affects their ability to plan in a forward way and their ability to play their full part in developing the economy and in increasing employment.

Their activities are, of course, affected, too, by the bond market. Despite high interest rates, an inflationary psychology has developed which makes more and more Canadians reluctant to invest in long term bonds. There is a lack of interest in bonds. I know there has been some recent improvement in the prices of some bonds in Canada but this does not reflect very much. The market has not been tested. The feeling today is that the market remains very uncertain and that most borrowers would receive an uncertain welcome in terms of medium or long range issues. This restricts the ability of the provinces to play one of their essential roles.

It is important that the government change its policy toward the provinces and, by means of the active anti-inflationary role which I have suggested, help to bring stability to the financial efforts of the provincial governments. The ability of private enterprise to do its forward planning in terms of development is similarly affected with regard to making specific arrangements on the bond market. We ought not to be fooled by the upward surge in certain parts of the stock market because this, too, reflects in substantial measure an inflationary psychology.

These matters are of urgent importance to the government and there are other uncertainties which this government has created for private citizens and private companies whether they are engaged in fishing, farming, mining or manufacturing. There is the alarming possibility of an insipient tax war between this government and the provinces, the possibility of a tax jungle developing. Does this not tend to create confusion and lack of confidence?

The Minister of Finance himself generates uncertainty about the government's policy on tax reform by indicating that when he does bring in his proposals they will be published by way of draft legislation rather than by way of a white paper as the Liberal government originally promised. How does that sound to the people, to the investment community which is already only too wary about the tendency of this government to lay down the law with little discussion and little regard for the problems and complications which may result? What will this attitude do to confidence in Canada, necessary as such confidence is to the creation of adequate employment? What is the country to think of a Minister of Finance who announces changes in the estate tax law in October but who still has not produced any legislation at the end of January? We have not yet seen the legislation, although it is true we have now been given a promise that we shall see it tomorrow. I hope we shall. But what does this do to confidence?

I could talk, Mr. Speaker, about the need for international monetary reform and how disappointed I am about the negative attitude taken by the Minister of Finance; about his tendency to treat the crisis relating to the franc, for example, as a strictly European problem when this country should be taking the lead. In terms of employment or future development no country has a greater reason for taking the lead in monetary reform than has Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanfield: In the face of all this uncertainty, in the face of growing unemployment and rising prices, in the face of the challenges which have to be met this year and in the light of the blow to confidence resulting from the incredible nature of last October's budgetary accounting, the Minister of Finance now has the audacity to inform the country, in a statement made outside this house, that he might not bring in another budget until the spring of 1970. Yet in the face of all this, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) airily assures Canadians that government policies are working well and that everything is going as he had planned.

Throughout Canada one responsible press commentator after another and one editorial writer after another is wondering about the competence of this government in terms of economic policy. They are wondering in terms that have grown from uncertainty to alarm.

I am not going to quote all of these editorials because I do not want to embarrass the Minister of Finance unnecessarily.

• (4:00 p.m.)

Mr. Lewis: Why not?

Mr. Stanfield: I should just like to quote one, and it is the last one that I read. It says things about the minister that I would not quite put that way myself. This editorial appeared in the Financial Times for January 13 and relates to the minister's speech about the bond market. It also refers to the speech made at the annual meeting of the banks, and reads:

Mr. Benson sounded last week like a mystified child—

Mr. Benson: Did you start to say "Senator Benson"?

Mr. Stanfield: I do not want to create any more confusion; there is far too much now. I am referring to "Mr." Benson. The article continues:

—like a mystified child groping through a grown-up world—

I admit that sometimes the minister has me confused.

—Mr. Benson has been incredible ever since his October budget, but last week's talk about the bond market was astounding in its bland unawareness. Before, he had lost credibility but was presumed to retain some perverted hold on reality. After the performance in Toronto, he seemed to be living in some cloud-cuckoo-land.

Prime Minister Trudeau has a lot of important plans and problems on his plate. But none of them is as immediate as the crisis in public finance ... this deserves his very first attention. If he cannot recover some of the lost financial confidence, he might as well kiss good-by to his other cherished goals.

That is one of the tie-ups between the questions of confidence, growth and employment.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. gentleman to bring to his attention and also to the attention of the house that according to the provisions of standing order 58(13) the hon. gentleman's time has expired, unless he has consent of hon. members to continue.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, perhaps I might just sum up what I am saying. In addition to adopting an aggressive policy against inflation, I suggest that the government invite business, industry, labour and other governments to co-operate in preparing guidelines which will lead to a policy of general expansion. Unless the government stops its warfare with the provinces and co-operates in determining priorities so that the provinces can plan and play their full roles; unless it restores the confidence of investors and entrepreneurs in the bond market; unless the minister indicates his willingness to bring in a budget and have a proper discussion of the financial affairs of the country as they relate to the economy; unless he is prepared to bring in a white paper on taxation reform which can be properly discussed before the country is committed; unless the government is prepared to proceed with its program of fighting economic disparity and restoring confidence in Canada, the outlook is for additional failure, for continuing unemployment.

The purpose of the resolution is to call upon the government, in the name of the people of Canada, to produce policies that will provide this country with the rate of growth that it requires, provide the employment that is necessary for the oncoming work force and reduce the unnecessarily high unemployment that exists. It is for this purpose that I present this motion to the house at this time.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, you will no doubt recall that some days ago I attempted to place before the house a motion to adjourn the business of the house under standing order 26, a motion that you found unacceptable under the rules. Therefore, I do not have to emphasize the fact that my colleagues and I fully approve of and support the motion that has been put before this house.

During the early part of his remarks the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) emphasized at one point, I seem to recall, that one of the criticisms he had to make was that the present rise in unemployment was the result of deliberate policy by the government. I agree with that, and it is on that basis that I propose at the end of my remarks to move an amendment to this motion, adding words to it that will underline the responsibility of the government for the unemployment situation. I suggest it is not the result merely of something that is beyond the control of the government; it is the result of the government's deliberate intentions and of policies that have been pursued over the past few years.

Sitting in this august chamber it is easy to forget what the Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures in connection with the frightening rise in unemployment really mean, and to look at them merely as figures. Forgive me if I remind hon. members of this house—not that I think they need reminding, but in order to place our discussion in the proper context—that what we are talking about are hundreds of thousands of human beings. We are talking not only about people who themselves are unemployed but also about people who depend on employment. These unemployment figures represent human tragedy on a large scale. They represent fear, want, hopes dashed and confidence undermined. That is what we are really talking about today. We are not talking merely about a rate of growth that is one percentage figure or another percentage figure. We are not talking about mere figures of 300,000 or 400,000. We are speaking about the immense and continuing suffering, deprivation and spiritual degradation of hundreds of thousands of people as a result of deliberate government policy.

This is why I cannot discuss this subject with any equanimity. This is why I agree entirely that a government, or anybody else for that matter, that is complacent about this kind of situation is guilty of shameful insensitivity. Any member of a group that is responsible for such unconcern who speaks to me today about the just society appears to me to be about as great a hypocrite as I could ever hear or read about.

During the election the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) said that the employment outlook was good. He said that if we were to get high unemployment, he believed that the government would have to prime the economy, but that that would not be appropriate at that time. How high is high, Mr. Speaker? How high does unemployment have to climb before the Minister of Finance considers it serious enough to take action?

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

I should like to draw the attention of the house to a recent report in the Toronto Star for December 30, a time, we must remember, when unemployment across the country was already 4.6 or 4.7 per cent, seasonally adjusted. The Minister of Finance is reported as having said that unemployment in Canada was then higher than he would like to see it—how kind of him to say that—but that it was not intolerably high.

• (4:10 p.m.)

On behalf of my colleagues and myself, and I am certain I can speak on behalf of every thinking and feeling person in Canada, I say that an unemployment rate that is almost at 5 per cent seasonally adjusted is intolerably high, and that no excuse can be made for it. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the Economic Council of Canada has indicated that 3 per cent should be the ceiling for the unemployment rate in Canada. A figure that is almost twice that is surely catastrophic enough to move even the present Minister of Finance. I read a speech of his, Mr. Speaker, and I cite this not because it presents a solution but as an example of the muddy and incomprehensible thinking of a very important Minister of the Crown. I read the text of a speech of the Minister of Finance to the Canadian Club in Toronto. In this speech the minister said, "While unemployment has been higher than we would like, it can now be seen more clearly as a reflection of the rapid growth of the labour force rather than as a result of slow rate of job creation." What in heaven's name does the minister mean by that? Job creation must be related to the size of the labour force. If the size of the labour force increases more jobs have to be created. When this is not done it is a reflection of a low rate of job creation. This is the kind of thinking which has caused our present very serious difficulty.

This government has deliberately pursued policies to increase unemployment and has pursued these policies on the basis of an outdated and false concept; that is, in order to avoid inflation if you increase unemployment, you will accomplish your objective.

We in this corner of the house have said on many occasions that this is a false theory; that in effect prices are no longer subject to the ordinary rules of the market. You cannot control prices in the country by increasing unemployment and hope that a decrease of aggregate demand will serve the purpose of lowering prices. This is simply not relevant to a modern economy and that is why this country now has the worst of both worlds. It has an unacceptably high rate of unemployment and an unacceptably high rate of inflation, both at the same time and both as a result of the same policies. I say the government has deliberately brought about these conditions, Let me indicate just a few points which support this proposition.

As has been pointed out, there was a cancellation of the winter works program on the ground that the program was abused. To my knowledge the program was not studied by a committee of this house. No report was published, no evidence given and no information was supplied to this house, to the municipalities, or to the people of Canada. We have no knowledge that in fact it was abused, the extent or ways in which it was abused. There was no information whatever given to parliament, the country or even to the municipalities involved. Suddenly one day an announcement was made that the program was cancelled because it was abused, with no alternative program presented.

I do not know of any other action which demonstrates the total lack of concern and appreciation of the problem of unemployment during the winter months than that action by the government. I would like to know to what extent the program has been abused. I can think of one or two ways it may have been abused to some extent. However, I have seen no evidence, nor has this house or anyone else in Canada, that this program was abused or that the government was justified in increasing unemployment in the urban centres of this country by the total and complete cancellation of that program.

We have been told that the alternative for the winter works program would be action by the Department of Manpower and Immigration. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) is in the chamber and I challenge him to rise in his place during this debate and tell this house what his department has done, even one little thing, to deal with the increasing rate of unemployment in Canada. I say, Mr. Speaker, his department has done nothing to deal with the situation! As a matter of fact, according to a recent story in one of the newspapers, the grants for vocational and manpower training have recently been cut by millions of dollars or have been brought down to a low figure. No program of training can deal with the unemployment situation in Canada.

There is a substantial proportion of unemployed people who do not have the education or skill required to take advantage of the training program. As a matter of fact, some 24 per cent of those unemployed in December had been unemployed for four months and were unable to take advantage of the training program. It is obvious the training program can meet some problems and present opportunities for some of the unemployed. It is equally obvious that anyone who talks about the training program meeting the problem of unemployment is deliberately misleading the people or simply does not know what he is talking about.

Another way the government has deliberately increased unemployment in this country, Mr. Speaker, has been by cutting back on government capital expenditures. I will deal with some general philosophy with which perhaps the members of the Conservative Party may not be entirely in agreement. It is not in a time of high unemployment that you cut back government expenditures. It is precisely at that time that you try to maintain or even increase the rate of government expenditures, particularly if they can be increased in areas which have a multiplier effect on the economy.

Today, we had the tabling of a report on housing. I do not want to deal with the contents of that report, but it does disclose that there is a critical need for housebuilding. As one travels across this country speaking at universities, it is obvious the facilities of the students are criminally inadequate. The buildings, opportunities and facilities for research are insufficient. Even the number of books in the libraries is inadequate. There is a tremendously critical need for added expenditures for the construction or expansion of universities and colleges. In this field of construction this winter the government could have stopped, or lowered the rising unemployment rate to the 3 per cent or less, which is the figure the Economic Council of Canada advises is the maximum we should tolerate.

If the government had the imagination to make available large sums of money for the construction of homes and educational facilities across this country, they would deal with the unemployment problem in a very immediate and practical manner.

Instead of that, public expenditures were cut and taxes were increased, both of these steps impinging upon the ordinary working people of the country. This lack of understanding of modern economic theories, this total rejection of the government's responsibility to maintain full employment I suggest is tragic not only to the people who are affected but it is also a severe blow to the unity of the nation, as I have pointed out on many occasions and as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) emphasized today. Although we have a seasonally adjusted figure of 4.8 per cent unemployment across Canada in the middle of December, we have a figure of over 7 per cent in the Atlantic provinces and about 7 per cent in the province of Quebec.

If we are to go by past performances, I draw your attention to the fact that in January 1967 and January 1968 the unemployment figures across the country generally, but particularly in the Atlantic provinces and in the province of Quebec, were much higher than they had been in the preceding December months. I forecast, if I may with some trepidation in case I am proven very wrong, that the unemployment rate in the Atlantic provinces for this month of January may go to 10 per cent, 11 per cent or even 12 per cent seasonally adjusted, and that it will go to 8 per cent or 9 per cent in the province of Quebec. I forecast, too, that unemployment across Canada will be more than 5 per cent.

How then can one expect to eliminate the feeling of abandonment which people in the Atlantic provinces have, which sections of the province of Quebec have, which indeed sections of the province of Ontario have? If you go to some of the northern communities in this province of Ontario you find that the local rate of unemployment is much higher than the average national rate. How can one avoid giving those people a feeling of abandonment, a feeling of grievance against our community and our society, by policies of this sort?

And in that total picture I also want to add, because I think it is relevant in the year 1969, that you have the young people of Canada unable to find jobs during the summer in order to help them pursue their education. Those who are badly off and who need to supplement the little income they have are unable to find jobs during the winter. These young people have been unable to obtain the scholarship money which had been promised, and yet people condemn the young people on the campuses and all over the country for feeling desperate and alienated; for taking actions of which I do not approve, of which no mature person can approve, but actions which are totally explainable in the terms of the abandonment which they suffer at the hands of governments across this country, and particularly and especially at the hands of the federal government.

In the last few minutes at my disposal this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, whom one learns to like more and more as one gets to know him more, that in my estimation he would not improve the situation any more than the present government has done. I want to point out that the policies which are supported by both traditional parties in this country invariably lead to the kind of situation in which we find ourselves today.

An hon. Member: And have had for 100 years.

Mr. Lewis: We have had, as one of my colleagues mentions, 100 years of them, and we have always had this kind of situation.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Tell us about Saskatchewan.

Mr. Lewis: Unemployment goes up and prices continue to go up as well. The reason for that, and I suggest that hon. members consider my proposition seriously, is that the corporate power in this country at the present time controls the market, controls the prices, and through undistributed profits, retained earnings, controls the largest part of the investment pool of this country. The result of this is that there is no allocation of investment, that there is no direction of the investment that takes place.

I put this proposition to hon. members of the Conservative party who represent constituencies in the Atlantic provinces, that the problems of regional disparity will never be solved in those provinces until all of us are prepared to accept a massive role by government in direct public investment, in public investment joined with private investment if that is desirable, in order that there be some priority to investments in this country. We have to accept a massive role by government in order that we do not have large office buildings going up while housing stands still, or the building of service stations across the country which are totally unnecessary or duplications of services already existing while other construction does not take place. These things occur at a time when it is still possible for a company to come to this House of Commons asking for an increase in its capitalization of hundreds of thousands or of millions of dollars, and members of the two established parties are prepared to let them have this added capital.

Where would this added capital come from is a question that has been asked in this house. It would come from the same market in which the government has to raise its capital. Everybody in the Conservative party and in the Liberal party thinks there is nothing wrong with private insurance companies and private loan companies getting more capitalization. There are companies whose services are not indispensable to the people of Canada, whose services really result in straitjacketing more people into a long and binding debt position from which they will never emerge. But when you say to the government and other hon. members of this house that it is necessary for the government of Canada directly to invest hundreds of millions of dollars in order to build factories, in order to build secondary industries, in order to build tertiary industry to provide employment for the people of the Atlantic provinces, you are a raving mad socialist. Well, if that makes me one I am glad that I am one.

In my opinion you cannot control inflation in this country unless you are prepared to have the courage and the imagination to take some direct action, subject to the problems of the constitution which of course I know about, to say to the large corporations which increase their prices to no purpose that they must invest for social purposes also.

There is not a single corporation of any importance in Canada at which I have looked whose profits have not been immense in 1968, large in 1967, too large in 1966, and whose profits will probably be just as large in 1969. From where does this profit come if it does not come out of unjustifiably increased prices?

I am sure that my injunction is not going to stop anyone in this house rising in his seat to say that this was the hon. member for York South spouting the old cliches of the socialists. I say they are not old cliches. I say they are as valid today as they have ever been. Indeed, the need for public responsibility, for public investment and public involvement to meet problems of unemployment and problems of regional disparity is greater than it has ever been before. There is no other way in which these problems can be solved.

I do not want to give the impression, because I do not intend to, that I would be able to solve all these problems by waving a wand and in 24 hours implementing some of the policies I have sketchily outlined, or that then the economy of the country would fall into place. This of course would be totally irresponsible. I appreciate that the development of these policies would require time but I am struck by the fact—and this is my final point before I move the amendment I said I would move—for example that there is one agency which the Liberal party has suggested to the country is necessary. I may say, too, Mr. Speaker, this is an agency that the N.D.P. proposed at its founding convention in 1961. The one agency which the Liberal party has suggested to the country is necessary in order to garner savings and in order to promote proper investment, namely, the Canada Development Corporation, was first proposed in 1963, if I remember correctly and correct me if I am wrong. The reference to this agency has appeared in every throne speech that successive Liberal governments have presented since 1963. We have again been promised such an agency this session, but we have not seen it yet.

The point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is that one of the major ways in which it would be possible for the government to meet the problem of unemployment and to meet the problem of regional disparity over a period of time would be to set up some kind of organism through which the government would garner the savings of the people. Then, through that agency if necessary, the government could compel existing lending and investing institutions to invest some portions of their available funds in that agency so that the government would have at its disposal a large pool of investment capital to do the things that need to be done for the people of Canada.

This is characteristic of the Liberal party and its government. The new government has made no change so far. One of the most important policies it had to present to the people of Canada is still on the shelf. I suggest it is on the shelf because the implementation of that policy would mean a challenge to the seats of economic power in Canada and this Prime Minister's government is no more ready to challenge those seats of power than was the preceding prime minister's government.

In conclusion, I should like to say that I think the unemployment situation in Canada can be explained only by the insensitive unconcern of this government. I say it is the result directly of the government's policy and that the government has deliberately planned it. No words of mine or anyone else's can adequately condemn the government for this sort of thing.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the motion be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words: "and that, instead, the government has slowed down public investment and has pursued fiscal and monetary policies deliberately designed to increase unemployment".

[Translation]

Mr. G.-A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to avail myself of this opportunity to say a few words on the amendment moved by the Progressive Conservative party, which reads as follows:

That this house regrets that the government is not presenting programs to achieve a rate of economic growth which will reduce unemployment and also ensure that the economy will be able to absorb the large number of new entrants into the labour force this year.

That motion, Mr. Speaker, deals with two specific matters: reduce unemployment and absorb the new entrants into the labour force this year.

I am pleased, Mr. Speaker—and I wish to emphasize it—to see that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) is here, as there is something we have wanted to tell him for a long time.

We could write to him but it seems to me that when he is in the house, when he appears in public to the knowledge of everyone, it has a different effect not only on the minister himself but also on the whole staff of his department. I believe it prompts officials to find more realistic solutions, for if I have any critics to make this afternoon, I should like them to be most constructive. Indeed, I should like to offer suggestions, not only critics. I should like especially to suggest to the minister and to the department a few solutions to certain cases.

I intend to speak mainly about my riding because they are mainly cases I come across during the Christmas holidays. All hon. members probably had the same experience. There are many unemployed in my area as well as in the whole a Quebec. Well, as a matter of fact, I hardly took a day's rest during my vacation. The rest of the time, I spent in my office, even on Sundays, seeing people out of work.

They were all lining up in quest of information, inquiring about this or that form. I could not help thinking that, if the government fails to take action, hon. members should have in their own office a full time representative to act as an agent of the unemployment insurance people.

Unemployment is growing and, to provide it, I will read a few excerpts from an article published on January 24, 1969, under this heading: Unemployment. It was written by a chap who is very well known in the House. I quote:

160,000 unemployed in Quebec.

That is an impressive figure indeed.

Out of six million inhabitants. Don't you think it is too much? It comes close to being the highest total in industrialized countries.

There was a time when we had winter works but they went down the drain.

There was a time when we had $500 allowances to build houses in winter, but they went down the drain.

There was a time when we had premiums for hiring unemployed people over 45, but they went down the drain.

The only thing that didn't come down is the number of unemployed. No wonder: our governments are much too busy elsewhere.

Yes, indeed, we have two governments, one in Ottawa and one in Quebec. They are so busy fighting each other, quarelling, bickering, that they just don't have the time to think about the unemployed. We have two Ministers of Labour, two Ministers of Public Works, two Ministers of Manpower, one in Ottawa and one in Quebec, with the result that there is nobody left to bother about the unemployed. Besides, how could they find the time? They are too busy tearing each other apart.

It is indeed a mad game, that game of two governments.

If only they complemented each other, but no, they destroy each other.

Mr. Speaker, I have no time to read the whole article but that gives you an idea of the climate in which the workers in Quebec live. I think that reflects faithfully the opinion of the workers in Quebec, in general.

Mr. Speaker, there are many unemployed people in my constituency. I think that if we do not break the record it is because the Maritimes are still in a worse position than we are. In my constituency, the percentage of unemployed people is very high. The government often says, when we talk about the high percentage of unemployed, that it is the result of the newcomers on the labour market.

Mr. Speaker, I intend to deal with two distinct subjects: unemployment and the labour force.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

• (4:40 p.m.)

The fact is that in my riding as in other parts of the province of Quebec and throughout Canada, there are three categories of unemployed: those who are registered, those who are waiting to be registered and those who are not registered.

The official statistics on the percentage of unemployed take into consideration only those who are registered for unemployment benefits. That is the reason why I strongly dispute the accuracy of these reports, because an unemployed worker who is waiting for permission to receive benefits is unemployed as much as the one already in receipt of them. Furthermore, the one who has not enough stamps in his book, not being registered, is more truly unemployed than the first two.

That is why, when speaking about unemployment, we must always include the three above-mentioned groups in order to assess accurately the increase of unemployment in a given area.

When registered unemployed have met the statutory requirements, everything is all right. However, those who are waiting—and it is on that point that I draw the attention of the minister—have registered with the regional office by letter. Now a letter may take two or three days to reach Chicoutimi; we must apply to the Chicoutimi office; because all unemployment insurance offices have been closed in our communities. The officials at that office have to get in touch with the head office in Montreal, and that may take a few days more. When the answer comes, sometimes a small detail is missing and everything must start again from the beginning.

During the Christmas season, I have seen—and I am not speaking through my hat—people who had to wait five or six weeks before being advised whether they qualified or not for unemployment benefits. I think a change is imperative.

The government thought that general centralization in Chicoutimi was the right answer. When previously we had Unemployment Insurance offices in Dolbeau, Roberval and Saint-Félicien, now everything is centralized in Chicoutimi. When the case is too complicated, the unemployed are told: "Come and see us." They must then travel 125 miles, in order to find out whether they will be given $35 or $36. This is not funny for the poor guy who has not earned a cent for the last five or six weeks. He has to go either by taxi—because he has no car—or by bus, in order to see those people and explain his case to them. Incidentally, I wish to point out that the people in charge, in these offices can not be blamed. I have met all these people during the Christmas season I have even contacted the authorities in the Employment offices. They are all full of goodwill. However, there is something wrong with the system. They say so themselves. It is imperative that the system be improved because distances are too large and communications too slow. And so, the unemployed worker feels cheated for two, three, four or even six weeks, and thinks of his family which must be fed.

Mr. Speaker, wonderful suggestions have been made to me, especially at the Employment Offices level, because in our areas we still have three Employment Offices, and I have passed on those suggestions to the hon. minister.

I think that the best suggestion made to me was that the minister consider the possibility of posting someone in each of the employment offices of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, an employee whose office would be located in that of the Department of Manpower and who could each day get in touch with the head office.

It would not require the rental of offices nor additional expenses. One or two employees of Chicoutimi could visit once, twice or three or four times per week the offices of Dolbeau, St. Félicien or Roberval and that would considerably improve relations with the unemployed.

I have spoken about the matter with the representatives of Chicoutimi and those of the Department of Manpower whose offices are now vacant. There are three in Dolbeau with telephones and all required means of communication. Now, they are only used on certain occasions to receive people from Chicoutimi who come two or three times. It would take at least five or six months to correct that situation which I feel is now quite bad. Indeed, as soon as I arrive in my constituency, my home fills up so that on a single Sunday afternoon, I had to deal with 52 complaints.

Mr. Speaker, it shows the extent of the work which must be done in those unemployment insurance offices of our areas. I like to welcome people and to help them, but I would rather not perform the work of civil servants. I know that this is the job of public employees and I am sure it has been brought to the attention of the hon. minister, because he has received letters in that regard, I have also received protests. I shall read only this one here, so that I do not take too much time.

Not long ago, the municipal authorities of St-François-de-Sales sent me the following resolution in protest against the situation:

I am writing personally because the situation has become alarming in my riding of Roberval.

The copy of the resolution of the Municipal Corporation of St-François-de-Sales, enclosed, expresses the feeling of all workers in Roberval riding, since the unemployment insurance office was moved to Chicoutimi.

Please note that I do not blame the employees, who have done all they could to eliminate the delays which affect the unemployed.

I raise the matter for one reason only; to find a way of improving the service of that office.

In that respect, may I submit a suggestion made to me by the officials of the manpower centres of Dolbeau and Roberval, that is to have an official of the unemployment insurance office—

The municipal authorities of Félicien have sent me a copy of a resolution passed at a meeting of the municipal board. I quote:

Considering that many citizens of St-Félicien have complained of considerable delays in the reception of their unemployment insurance benefits;

Considering that since the closing of unemployment insurance offices in Dolbeau and Roberval, they have no means of accelerating the reception of those benefits;

Whereas the St-Félicien City Council was under the impression that those offices had been closed down with a view to improving the efficiency of that service;

Whereas the council members now wonder whether or not the closing of those offices really gives the expected results;

As far as efficiency is concerned, I am not ready to disapprove the objectives set by the minister and his department because I believe some concentration is necessary in an area so that all information may be gathered and all unemployment insurance books collected. But I believe that their present suggestion to appoint a representative in every manpower office is logical.

● (4:50 p.m.)

I am convinced that the minister, judging by the replies he gave me, will seriously consider the matter, and I would not be surprised if he complied with the recommendations of the office heads who have been in charge for a fairly long period of time and who know which reforms are more likely to increase the efficiency in their area.

I should now like, Mr. Speaker, to deal with the second part of the motion concerning the absorption of new entrants into the labour force. What steps did the government take in an attempt to absorb those new entrants? It is up to us to prepare the way for these young people who have sacrificed everything, who are getting an aducation and who have spent several years of their life acquiring more skills.

What does the government do at the primary and secondary levels of industry? I believe they are, at the present time, the only two markets to which the government should give full support in order to guarantee jobs to the hosts of young people who will join the labour force tomorrow.

At the primary level, there is still much to be done in Quebec. As far as the secondary level is concerned, everything remains to be done, I think. First of all, the government should stop emptying the pockets of small industrialists in order to give them a chance to expand their industries. I often hear departmental officials and the minister himself say one must invest. As far as savings are concerned, Canadians must invest. Yes, under the present system, we are not through stressing that need because all the time the governments are urging people to invest, they are emptying the pockets of those who should invest.

Mr. Speaker, how can you expect that an individual will invest $2,000, $3,000, $10,000 or $20,000 in a new industry when he pays that much a year in taxes? When one has deducted his taxes—I know what I am talking about, since I have been a merchant for thirty years—there is nothing left. After that, how can one invest? We are urged to invest. Well, the government ought to stop emptying the pockets of the eventual investors.

I believe that if we fail to develop our secondary industries, there is no point in having our children attend technical schools. Their education only leads them across the border.

Mr. Speaker, that is where the problem lies. In my opinion, the government has qualified technicians in that field to make a complete study. I will add that if the government takes the trouble and if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) stops bleeding the people and gives them a chance to help one another, the problem will disappear.

There was talk of foreign aid; that is all very well and I am for it, but charity begins at home. I do not know if once and for all we can put that into our heads. Our government should start by strengthening our industry, helping secondary industry, developping it as much as primary industry, in order to give work to the people who will soon be on the labour market. In my opinion, that would be very beneficial to our country. We must not only think of taxation.

Mr. Speaker, when I meet workers, farmers or wage earners who make just enough to live, I find it difficult to understand how it is possible to tax them. The necessaries of life are being taxed. The taxing of luxuries is immaterial but now even the necessaries of life are taxed. And those poor people are told: "You do not invest, that is why we are not getting anywhere".

Well, there is a great deal of unrest, and not in the lower layers of society. It prevails at higher levels and the ministers know it very well. If the Minister of Finance wanted to be frank, he would tell us to what extent he is the servant of those trusts which are crushing our population today. He knows it, but he cannot talk. People today tend to rebel, especially the younger ones, because our generation is less rebellious since they are used to be pushed around. But the young people today are more aware of the problem. They are more revolutionary than we are because they are more reluctant to live like outcasts in an affluent country. I think the government has something to do and must seriously consider the matter. It must stop dealing adversely with the economy. I have been told that the economy should always promote the welfare of the population, rather than the interests of the trusts of the country. When we decide to achieve the proper goal of the economy, especially as far as the human being is concerned, we shall then be able to say that we have a democratic government and that we can at last live in a better society.

[English]

Hon. Bryce S. Mackasey (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, faced with an amendment to the motion, I would like to say just a few words on the amendment. I think I speak not only for myself but for all members of the Liberal party when I say that this government at no time in its fiscal and monetary policy has deliberately set out to increase unemployment as a solution to the problems that face this nation. I think there is nobody in this house, let alone in this party, who appreciates unemployment. It exists. It is something with which we are occupied. It is a problem about which we are determined to do something. It is such a grave and serious problem that we are determined to have the courage to introduce permanent solutions to unemployment rather than ad hoc solutions that are designed more to alleviate the plight of the unemployed, to provide them temporarily with financial assistance. I will have a little more to say on that point, Mr. Speaker. But I think I should make it very clear that nobody in this government has any objective in mind other than to reduce the incidence of unemployment.

A great deal has been said today by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and the official spokesman for the New Democratic party about unemployment. If you were a newcomer to the house and were sitting in the gallery, you might have been left with the impression that unemployment was something we had deliberately created, or that had never before existed in the economy of the country. So, this afternoon I took the trouble to look at the relevant unemployment figures. I found to my amazement that 1963, the very best year when the Conservative party was in power, was worse than the worst year under a Liberal regime since 1963.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: I have here facts and figures to substantiate this statement. I dislike statistics, but they have been used in quantity today so I will put these figures on the record.

• (5:00 p.m.)

In 1958 the rate of unemployment in Canada was 7 per cent; in 1959, 6 per cent; in 1960, 7 per cent; in 1961, 7.1 per cent; in 1962, 5.9 per cent. In 1963, we reduced those figures to 5.5 per cent; in 1964, to 4.7 per cent; in 1965, to 3.9 per cent; in 1966, to 3.6 per cent; in 1967, to 4.1 per cent; in 1968, to 4.8 per cent. These are the figures of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, and I think they speak for themselves. I must emphasize that the lowest figure between 1958 and 1962 was 5.9 per cent.

We came to office in 1963 face with that challenge. The Liberal party having successfully rectified the situation then is quite capable of doing it again under the dynamic leadership of the present Prime Minister of Canada.

Allusions have been made today, with a great degree of validity, to the plight of the maritimes. I have a tie with the maritimes; it is not a strange land to me. However, I would like to read the record of unemployment in the Atlantic regions between 1958 and 1962. I know the Leader of the Opposition was very familiar with the problem of unemployment in the maritimes during those years. In 1958 the rate of unemployment was 12.3 per cent; in 1959, 10.9 per cent; in 1960, 10.5 per cent; in 1961, 11.2 per cent; in 1962, 10.7 per cent. When the Liberal party, under Mr. Pearson, came to office, we reduced unemployment in 1963 to 9.5 per cent; in 1964, to 7.8 per cent; in 1965, to 7.4 per cent; in 1966, to 6.4 per cent; in 1967, to 6.6 per cent; and in 1968 it went up half a point to 7.3 per cent. Let me point out again that in 1968 it was 7.3 per cent as compared, for instance, to 10.7 per cent when we took office in 1962 and to a high of 12.3 per cent in 1958. Again, this speaks well for the ability of the Liberal party to cope with the intolerable problem of unemployment.

Nobody is happy with unemployment. No one in this party says that 2, 3 or 4 per cent of unemployment is acceptable. Nobody that I know is quite that callous. But if we are going to be blamed for unemployment—and that is fair game because this is a debating arena, which is as it should be—if we are going to be accused of not providing enough jobs, then by the same token we should be given credit for the jobs that have been provided. Here I have some specific statistics which I am sure hon. members will wish to peruse at their leisure. In 1962, the total labour force totalled 6,615,000. In 1968 there were 7,919,000, a total increase of 1,304,000 people in Canada. We were able to find 1,312,000 jobs, thus reducing the rate of unemployment by almost 50 per cent of 1962. If we are to be blamed for not finding enough jobs, then I think we should be commended for finding over 1,300,000 jobs to look after the ever growing labour population of this country.

How were these jobs generated? There is no use for the Opposition or the New Democratic party saying that it was an accident and that these jobs would have become available by themselves. If we are going to use that argument, and it is said you cannot control the fabrication of jobs, then we cannot be accused of not providing sufficient jobs. We cannot have it both ways, as the New Democratic party seems to want.

If time permits I may point out that between 1963 and 1968 we did a lot of things in this party to create jobs. We are faced with the fact that Canada's problem is unique in the western world if only because of its vast size, the geographical problem of the Atlantic region and the western areas. The fact that we are underpopulated is a fact of life. So is the fact that we thus cannot generate a large domestic market and thus we must compete at a growing pace for exports, despite the fact that we have the tremendous problem of transportation in a country of this dimension.

We set up the Economic Council, to which everyone in the house alludes as to a bible. It is a source of reference probably for most of the speeches that have been made or will be made in this debate. It was the foresight of the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson, to establish this council and to name the responsible people which form it. Then, we were able to set up the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce which, for instance, had enough foresight to establish the auto pact which in turn generated directly almost 50,000 jobs and God knows how many jobs indirectly in this country. Yet the New Democratic party and other members of the house accuse us of having no vision and of not planning for tomorrow or for the next day. We put some money into the Atlantic Development Board which had not been done before, in fact $100 million more than had been made available. We activated the FRED program, and we gave ARDA new dimensions and a new scope. We took an exceptionally fine idea and we applied it to regional programs. All these things have resulted in one million and three hundred new jobs. But we have done more than that. We have analysed the reasons for unemployment. This is very important. I have some statistics which would be useful to members of the house who are objective about the problem of unemployment. We set up the Department of Manpower as distinct from the Department of Labour and we did this for a good reason. It was very obvious to those people who studied the problem of the chronic unemployed and who realized the geographical problems of this country that to a tremendous degree, Canada was suffering from a lack of money in the field of education during the depression days and this has affected, more than people realize, those who are out of work today in the 50 and 55 age bracket. These people were not able to continue their education during the depression. They then served the country in the war years and now are faced with the uncertainties of technological change and the insecurity of jobs disappearing overnight.

Those people are not armed with the basic education needed to adjust to the new industries that spring up as a result of those same technological changes. Realizing the needs and complexities of this country and realizing that unemployment is, to a great degree, a geographical problem, or at least that geography adds so much to it, we promised in the election campaign—and we are carrying out that promise—to set up a department of forestry and urban redevelopment primarily to deal with the particular and unique problems of people who because of the size of this country are so far away from the main stream of industry and from the central provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Their problems require special attention. If I may pay a compliment to a particular colleague, I may say that I know of no minister better suited for this particular job than is Jean Marchand because of his labour background and because of his ability.

I could go on and on, but most members are aware of all these programs and it would be a very partisan member indeed who would not care to admit that the foresight in setting up the Department of Industry and the Department of Manpower, the foresight of entering into the auto pact—though the move was widely questioned at the time—has been abundantly justified in terms of jobs for the workers of this country.

The Economic Council has again drawn attention to some of our problems. I do not wish to keep repeating them, but as I pointed out earlier we must continue to export and we are meeting increased competition from other industrial nations of the world, such as Japan, Sweden, and from Britain with its devalued pound. What has been our record in this field? It is all very well for the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) to talk as he does. He is an astute politician. I recognize some of his ploys; I have used them myself on occasions. He has noted our activities in the field of trade and commerce; he has said that next year might not be such a good year.

I have looked carefully over the record for the six years during which this government has been in office. In fact, I went back to 1961, because in all fairness I think the momentum may have begun then. In 1961-62 there was an increase of 8.2 per cent in the value of our exports. In the following year, the increase amounted to 10.3 per cent. In 1963-64 it was 16.1 per cent, in 1964-65 it was 6.5 per cent. In 1965-66 the total value of our exports increased by 16.5 per cent, and in 1966-67, by 12.3 per cent. The indication at the end of the first nine months of 1967-68 is that the value of our exports was almost 14 per cent higher than in the comparable period of the preceding year. So, here again we have not only met the objective set by the Economic Council but we are surpassing it.

I say to prophets of gloom and doom that this is one psychological weapon we can do without for the next few months. There is an old saying about figures that is there are statistics, statiticians and liars, in that order. We can look at statistics and become very optimistic, if we want to. We can look at the same statistics and be pessimistic. In recent months some newspapers, perhaps using statistics of the dominion bureau, have printed somewhat pessimistic headlines.

For my part, I do not think I can be blamed if my attention was attracted to an article written by a young lady—I assume the author is a young lady—called Judith McMahon. She used the same statistics but instead of publishing the figures of the labour force without analysing them she went to the trouble of analysing the monthly statements of the Dominion Bureau of Statistics. She analysed unemployment weighing regional factors and seasonal factors—students going back to their studies, fishermen who are normally laid off in winter—and wrote an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen on December 13 under the heading: "Boom is Opening Up Jobs". I was attracted by this headline. I got hold of the same sources of reference and studied them. I suggest that all hon. members should do so, because I do not think I could do justice to this article if I were to try to read a lot of statistics into the record. The author did draw attention to something of distinct importance. She wrote:

> A general rise in economic activity has opened up thousands of new jobs in trade, services, manufacturing and public administration. Some of the laid-off workers who frequently do not work all winter were able to find jobs in these industries.

If one takes the trouble to look at the statistics on a regional basis, this is precisely the fact. True, the overall picture is not as bright because of increased unemployment in certain other areas. I thought, then, that since we are at the beginning of a new year and since there are some fairly accurate year end figures now available I should, as Minister of Labour and as a member of the cabinet, ascertain where the problems are most acute in order that we might perhaps do something about them. I found, for instance, that the number of unemployed in the Atlantic region increased during the whole year by only 3,000. That is an optimistic way of putting it; it is no consolation to the 3,000 people concerned. But it does represent an almost stable situation.

In Ontario, despite the fact that the labour force grew by 99,000, we were able to absorb not only the 99,000 but 4,000 of the unemployed. On the prairies, significantly, there was no change at all. Sixty thousand entered the labour force and 60,000 found jobs. In British Columbia, 38,000 entered the labour force and 43,000 found jobs. In Canada generally, 243,000 people entered the labour force in 1968 and 223,000 found jobs. I have left out one province, but I shall refer to that later. In other words we were short by about 20,000 jobs. That is not really a bad record when one considers that in 1968 was a "catch up" year after the centennial, after the flurry of EXPO and the boom in the construction industry in the greater Montreal area.

Now we come to the one really black mark. I am not going to draw any conclusion as a Quebecer; let others do that. But in the Province of Quebec, 51,000 people entered the work force for the first time and we were able to find in that province only 25,000 jobs. In other words, 26,000 more people were unemployed in the Province of Quebec than at the beginning of the year, though there were only 20,000 more unemployed across the whole of Canada.

It goes without saying that had we been able to balance the figures in Quebec we would have reduced unemployment across the whole of Canada. What are the factors which have generated such a degree of unemployment in my own province? Some people would write it off by saying "separatism". I do not believe it is separatism; I believe international corporations are too callous to be concerned about domestic problems. But uncertainty is one of the factors—lack of leadership, lack of strong statements by Quebec leaders both Liberal and belonging to the Union Nationale. Either they intend to stay in confederation or they intend to get to hell out of it. Unless they know the situation investors are not going to spend money in the province when they can spend it in other parts of Canada where the economic climate and the political situation is more stable. As a Quebecer I would have no hesitation, if I had a million dollars to invest, about investing it in Quebec because I think the results of the last election show without a shadow of a doubt that the overwhelming majority of the people of that province, both French speaking and English speaking, intend and wish to remain in confederation.

Capital, however, is a very flighty thing. It fears socialims. It fears the uncertainty of the situation in Quebec just as much. So I suspect that when the uncertainty in Quebec has disappeared, perhaps as a result of some strong statements by the political leaders of that province—and I have confidence in their integrity and in their loyalty to this country—the climate of uncertainty will disappear and the capital needed to generate more jobs will be provided in increasing abundance. If that is not the explanation of the situation in Quebec, I am not prepared to say what is. The facts are there and hon. members can read into them precisely what they will.

There was an increase in the total labour force of 51,000 in Quebec. In spite of 25,000 jobs being found, unemployment increased by 26,000. This is a disastrous situation and, as somebody in this debate said, it weakens confederation. Unemployment generates dissension, resentment, lack of morale, frustration, fear and uncertainty. These things warp our good sense of judgment. They are things that make the labour force of Quebec susceptible to separatism or other ridiculous philosophies.

We all have a stake in the province of Quebec, not only the Quebeckers. We should all be interested in keeping the country together and in seeing to it that money goes into the province. When we vote moneys for capital expenditures in the Quebec regions, as we will have to do, I will look upon them as an investment in the future of this country.

As usual I wandered away from my notes but I do want to put on the record some statistics in which I think everyone should be interested. I have before me a breakdown of unemployed groups by occupation. Needless to say, not every group is below 5 per cent. The office and professional class represents 1.7 of the unemployed; the transportation, service and recreation, primary and craftsman, production and related workers are all around 5 per cent. The craftsman group is 5.4 per cent. However, the labourers represent 13.2 per cent of the unemployed.

I should like to couple with this the age groups of these people who are unemployed. We find that 9.1 per cent are between the ages of 14 and 19. That, I think, is a pretty sad commentary not only on the federal government, but on the provincial governments, the municipalities and civic authorities, all of whom should realize that people between the ages of 14 and 19, people facing the problems of technological change and attainment of the skills required for the future, should be at school instead of seeking work.

Those between the ages of 20 and 24, people who are presumably just leaving high school, represent 6.1 per cent of the unemployed. Those between the ages of 25 and 34 represent 3.7 per cent; those between the ages of 35 and 44, 3.6 per cent; between the ages of 45 and 54, 3.5 per cent; between the ages of 55 and 64, 4.6 per cent. Finally, those over 65, people who consider themselves employable and want to continue working, represent 5.9 per cent of the unemployed. This balances out to around 4.7 per cent.

I should like to make a point made often by the Economic Council. The word "productivity" seems to dominate each one of the five issues. Productivity is supposed to solve all our unemployment problems. I agree that the word is very important in today's context, because without increased productivity we cannot meet growing competition from countries that do have a greater productivity than we. It is not that our workers are less capable or less skilled; on the contrary, everything being equal, they have shown their ability to produce quality and numbers as well as any other country.

As a result of technological change and automation it is possible to reduce a work force from 100 to 10 and double or even triple productivity in certain highly automated industries. Whether or not we like it, the age of cybernation is not too far away and we have got to start thinking about it. Those who are somewhat more reactionary than others should not get too excited if sooner or later workers in these highly automated industries start talking about shorter hours, a shorter work week. This will not be the end of the world because ironically, and perhaps fortunately, this does create new industries, industries that in the final analysis may be the solution to the problems of people in certain parts of this country and in the United States where geography plays such a big role in unemployment. A shorter work week would create more leisure time, which in turn would create new industries. For example, I think of snowmobiles, outboard motors, tourism—hon. members know them all.

The biggest mistake we could make in this country would be to ruin some of the beauty spots in this great country of ours by forcing industry into areas which cannot support it under normal circumstances. Perhaps in five, 10, 15 or 20 years' time these unspoilt areas of Canada will be our greatest investment and source of wealth, the basis of a tourist industry that invites Canadians to travel and discover their own land.

In conclusion, as a member of the cabinet I view the unemployment figures with concern. Tomorrow the minister of manpower will be dealing with them and with some of the progressive steps that he has taken to alleviate some of the problems I have outlined, such as education, vocational schools and retraining. The minister of forestry and his department are looking after the particular problem of regional development. But the one thing that none of us wants is a doom and gloom philosophy, because psychologically that is not good for the economy. We will not solve our problems by whistling in the dark. Neither will we solve them by being continuously pessimistic about our ability to work ourselves out of the problem of unemployment. In 1963 we faced the same problem and solved it. We are facing it now and in a comparatively short time will solve it once more.

I listened to the speech of the hon. member from the New Democratic party and I did have a lot of wonderful notes to refer to but will not bother because I realize I have spoken long enough. He said nothing that was very significant. I do not say that in an abrasive fashion. However, I was rather pleased to see a subtle change in his approach when he suggested a shift from socialism to a more liberalized economy. After telling the Liberals and Conservatives that we did not have the answers, the hon. member went on to say that what we required was government capital and planning mixed with amounts of private capital.

I do not think that this approach is any different from the approach we have taken for some years. Certainly this was the formula that led to the great petroleum boom in the north and is a philosophy that both major parties have endorsed for many years. If our good friends in the New Democratic party are finally coming round to the more enlightened philosophies of the Conservatives and the Liberals, then I am very pleased to see it. However, if they are not—as I rather suspect is the case—then I hope they will not suggest that we adopt a pattern that is now being proposed to solve current problems in England.

The Labour party in England has had a wonderful opportunity to do something for a country that has been in bad financial straits. The editorial that appeared the other day in the Toronto Star is an indication of what the Labour government intends to do to labour in England. The article to which I refer is headed "Labour government cracks down on labour". It points out that there will now be a "cooling off period" of 28 days and refers to other curtailing factors which the N.D.P. would no doubt consider anti-labour. Although the philosophy of the major parties may not be the best in the world, it is still much better than that of the New Democratic party.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I must inform the house that the minister's time has just expired. Does the house give unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

• (5:30 p.m.)

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope there is time for one short question. I realize that the minister has been dealing mainly with figures and percentages that are rather large. But I wonder if, before he resumes his seat, he would comment on the situation which still faces people who come under his responsibility, namely those in the Unemployment Insurance Commission who have been told they are going to lose their jobs. In particular, will the minister explain why it is that if there are only 50 to be laid off across Canada there are 14 of them in Manitoba? We don't usually share that well.

Mr. Mackasey: The unemployment figures in the west are considerably better now than in the days when Tommy Douglas led the Socialists in Saskatchewan.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mackasey: There is now less need for unemployment insurance offices in that part of the country. However, that is not the full answer. I wish it were.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I trust the minister has an answer to the question.

Mr. Mackasey: Yes, it is long and detailed. I have been anticipating the question and I can read the answer if you wish. We are proud of the fact that a potential lay-off of 800 people will be reduced to less than 50. I am not aware of the location in Manitoba of the 14 people who are to be laid off and I am not sure the hon. member is either. However, I am sure he obtained his information in good faith.

I have been advised by the Unemployment Insurance Commission the people who will be laid off will be notified officially as of February 28, which is still a month hence. It is difficult to say just where these people are located. People employed by the Unemployment Insurance Commission who are to be laid off will be given six months' notice, whereas a public servant receives only three months' notice. This is what will happen.

The Unemployment Insurance Commission has decided to issue six months' notice as of February 28, 1969 to all redundant staff who would have been merit listed according to the Public Service Employment Act and were not placed in alternative employment by that date. The hon. member will understand this gives a particular person, or persons, an added opportunity to find work once they are so classified. I, personally, hope that in the six month interval alternate work is obtained for all of the 35. I am sure the employment market during the next six months will be buoyant enough to absorb these people.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When a person has been a civil servant for 25 or 30 years, is it any easier to accept unemployment after a six month notice than after a three month notice?

Mr. Mackasey: We can debate this all day. If the hon. member would give me a specific example of a person working for the Unemployment Insurance Commission for 25 years who is to be laid off, I will personally see it does not happen.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I shall do so.

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): It is my purpose today—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the minister.

An hon. Member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. member for Compton (Mr. Latulippe) would like to put a question, but I wish to point out to him as well as to the other members that the time of the minister has already been up for several minutes.

If the house agrees—

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Latulippe: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

The minister indicated that an increase in productivity in Canada would solve the problem. Now, we have had increases in production since—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The house authorized the hon. member to put a question, but not to make a speech.

Mr. Latulippe: I do wish to put a question, Mr. Speaker.

I am going to refer to the statistics for 1968. Canadian production was valued at $68 billion. We have—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. Would the hon. member put his question?

Mr. Latulippe: Here is my question, Mr. Speaker. One must use certain words to put a question.

Our production was valued at $68 billion and consumption at $40 billion. Who got the $28 billion difference? That is what I would like to know.

Mr. Mackasey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member received an indemnity of $18,000, which, of course, is paid out of the citizens taxes and, just like me, he benefited from that amount. Moreover, he is a business man, he operates several businesses, and he no doubt benefited from the prosperity in his riding.

[English]

Mr. Cliff Downey (Battle River): It is my purpose today, Mr. Speaker, to bring to the attention of the house and the country the tragic gap between performance and practice of which this government has been guilty. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) has given some statistics on unemployment, both past and present. In view of the continually changing circumstances in this country, Mr. Speaker, if the minister derives any comfort from these statistics then he deserves less credit than members of the opposition give to him.

The hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) stated that neither the Liberal or Conservative parties, did much to alleviate unemployment. Under the hon. member's concept of democracy, the government would become the prime employer. It would seem the government is rapidly trying to become a prime employer when you look at the increase in departmental staffs. I would ask the people of the nation to judge for themselves if this is the best way. We all have to acknowledge the fact that there are countries with very little employment, but how many people in Canada would trade places with the average person in China?

I recall, as we all do, the bright, sparkling days of kissing and high-diving, of grappling with the nation's problems which characterized the first few months of the present regime—

Some hon. Members: Those were the days.

Mr. Downey: —to the point where the incompetence of the Pearson government was almost forgotten. Except for a few changes, the governments boasts the same personnel as the previous government and I might add is still committing the same blunders.

We are in the degrading position where in the midst of a drifting economy, sky high taxes, falling grain sales, confusion about priorities, rapidly increasing unemployment, unconscionable interest rates, the only matter which seems to impinge upon the Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) euphoria is the way in which the Prime Minister's private life is covered in the press. This is hardly a matter of national concern, nor will its resolution do much to assist Canadians.

Does the Prime Minister know that in this country there is a growing number without work? Does he know that there are Canadians ill-fed, badly housed and improperly cared for? Does he have any concern about the pensioner and the aged, whose paltry income is eaten away by government-created inflation? Does he care about the small businessman or the farmer whose modest competence now becomes a prey for the tax gatherers, as a result of the most iniquitous legislation ever presented in a legislative asembly? I refer to the succession duty tax.

The private life of the Prime Minister, however fascinating to the pundits, however agonizing to their perpetrator, is of no concern to the Canadian who is trying to make ends meet.

I am asking this government to come back to reality, to stop treating this nation and its problems as a stage for one man's artistic performance; to deal with real problems, rather than the fringe benefits of social misfits, such as we have been having.

• (5:40 p.m.)

In view of the government's promises and propaganda, its failure to deal with the problems is a sad betrayal of the confidence of the people. We have a government which will not look after the plain, elementary housekeeping, and therefore we have an economy gathering dust like a machine somebody forgot to oil, and unemployment is growing steadily every month.

The way in which the government has mismanaged the wheat situation is almost incredible. Members of the government sat on their hands all summer while a strike dragged on. They made no move to allocate box cars with the result that millions of dollars were taken out of western farmers' pockets by the tie up in Vancouver. When the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Korchinski) placed the matter before the Canadian people, the government woke up and box cars moved. But why were they not moving before?

Our trade department has allowed a complete breakdown in the movement of grain. Demurrage charges alone on the vessels sitting in Vancouver harbour are costing the people of this nation almost $1 million every 18 days.

Unless there is a complete change in the government's attitude towards agriculture we will never solve our agricultural problems. Canadian agriculture is one of the leading consumers of manufactured goods. If the state of agriculture is allowed to depreciate, if it is allowed to continue on its present path, if its strength is sapped by further taxes, then I submit we will not have an increase in jobs in this country. Unemployment is far more closely related to the state of agriculture than most people, including a great many enlightened people, would suppose.

In the west we have no market for our wheat. The prospects are for lower beef prices in the spring, increased taxes, higher machinery prices and narrower profit margins. In order to stay in business farmers and ranchers are working 16 to 18 hours a day, resulting in a loss of jobs for other people. Thousands of extra people could be employed on the farms if profit margins were sufficiently high to allow farmers to stay in business and still work normal hours.

As a result of the inaction last summer, damp grain has become a major problem. It will have to be fed to cattle this winter, or at least a large portion of it, and I think we can look for a drop in beef prices in the spring—possibly, in the prices of all meat products. That is another thing for which the western farmers, and the economy in general, can thank the government.

Where is our national policy? Stimulation of the oil industry would have created employment and expansion. Instead of policy we have a vacuum of indecision. Instead of western oil being delivered to eastern Canada, we have Venezuelan oil coming in there. Is it any wonder we have regional disparity and growing unemployment when we have artificial barriers maintained between parts of Canada as a result of government lethargy?

Instead of dealing with real problems we spend our time dwelling on the miscues of society and the new code of personal conduct handed to us by the new Solon, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who goes his merry way regardless of the problems affecting Canadians.

The leader of this party has shown in his statement that unemployment is a serious and growing evil, and at the present rate will soon be uncontrollable. Yet the government has produced no remedy; it has offered no encouragement; it has shown no awareness. How long can a government go on living in a cacoon of indifference to national problems?

One of the most serious problems in the nation today is housing. It has been treated with disdain and disregard, the object of a publicity seeking barnstorming tour by the responsible minister—at least we hope he is a responsible minister. This problem is now being dealt with in a hastily thrown together report which is simply a cry of defeat on the part of the federal government. Was it really necessary to spend a million dollars to produce a report which comes out not with a bang but with a whimper, and which does nothing to deal with the basic problems, the high cost of housing and the unavailability of low interest mortgage money? This report is simply a piece of window dressing. It is an admission by the government that the problem it faces is beyond its resources.

What is needed is an effort on a mass scale to produce reasonably priced, utilitarian housing blocks at a unit cost that Canadians can afford to meet, possibly by the entry of the government housing corporation into the housing field. There is no real reason why, with drastically new construction methods, advances in building components, a revamping of our building codes and union regulations, better and cheaper housing cannot be provided, with resultant increases in jobs.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

We all remember the bright days of promises and pride when Trudeaumania was going to be the cure for all our problems. It hasn't quite worked that way. Whatever happened to the Marshall plan for the maritimes? What about the promised plans and programs for eastern Ontario agriculture? They seem to be still on the drawing board. These, and numerous other policies, if implemented would have assisted in wiping out regional disparities and stimulating the economy.

Far from stimulating the economy, the government has allowed it to run down. In Newfoundland the fishing industry is being quietly allowed to die, and in the maritimes the shipbuilding industry is slowly suffocating. I might interject that on a recent trip through the maritimes, vacant farms were much in evidence. But the Prime Minister appears on the list of best dressed men. This may be satisfying to him, but it does little to alleviate the uncertainty and fear that are brought on by economic hardship.

One recalls the general disappointment across the nation at the throne speech which opened the new parliament. It is now apparent that it was an accurate reflection of the government's inability to recognize or deal with the basic problems of economic growth and full employment. The government's legislative program is one of the skimpiest in years. We have had no sign from the government that it is prepared to act to deal with the problems of housing, taxation and interest rates, and the growing gap between the well-to-do and the depressed as outlined by the Economic Council in its last report.

It is not because the government has not had the benefit of good ideas and suggestions that there has been an almost total dearth of activity.

• (5:50 p.m.)

One recalls the suggestion last March by the then secretary of state for external affairs, who has now been moved to the other place, which called for a national conference to co-ordinate economic development and combat regional disparity. Mr. Martin's suggestions were never acted upon. Along with dozens of others, they were cast aside by this rather curious government. But the throne speech, weak and uninspired as it was, was still more glittering than the actual performance has been. It is safe to say that the government has done nothing to deal with unemployment, to stimulate expansion, increase growth, deal with disparity, bring down interest rates, build homes or deal with any of the thousand and one urgent problems that are pressing in on us at this time.

As an example, last September's throne speech promised a prices and costs review board. Where is it? Surely, this would have been a simple and routine matter to implement. Why was it not done? Where is the policy for regional development? We have had theories, reports, task forces by the dozen in the areas of agriculture, housing, transportation and taxation, but nothing concrete has been done. I say let us have fewer task forces and more positive policies. Let us have fewer reports and greater implementation of the reports we have. Let us have at least the shadow of an attempt to bring the power and resources of the government to bear on the problems that affect Canadians from coast to coast. Among them is unemployment which is rapidly becoming serious and endemic.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to this motion which is before us. At the outset, I might say that I propose to relate my remarks to those people who form one of the largest groups of unemployed. I refer to those between the ages of 14 and 19 and 20 and 24; namely, the students, graduates, undergraduates and those who are looked upon as drop-outs.

Before proceeding with my main remarks, may I say that although I consider myself to be a very non-partisan member of this house I cannot sit here and let the statements of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) go unchallenged. He told this house that the per-percentage of those unemployed continued to decrease the minute the Liberals took office. Other members of this house know that when the Liberal party took over from the Conservative party they received built-in programs which they were able to keep in force. They were able to govern by using the same programs.

I might ask who instituted some of these programs in those recession days when we took over. Who brought in the great housing program, the vocational training program and the great shipbuilding program? Consider what is going on today since this government let that shipbuilding program lapse. What about the great sales of wheat that the Conservative party made and the great trade crusade that was launched by the then minister of trade and commerce, the hon. George Hees? What about the roads to resources program and the Bladen report which was the forerunner of the automotive pact? What about the Atlantic provinces adjustment grant? Ask the people in the maritimes who introduced that adjustment program and what it did for the Atlantic region? Therefore, I say it is not right for the minister to rise in his place and say that the Liberal party was entirely responsible for reducing the percentage of unemployment. I bring this to the attention of members of this house so that there will be no misgivings about this point.

The Minister of Labour spoke about the introduction and setting up of the department of industry and what a great thing it was. It only lasted for about five years and they dismantled it. They blasted it apart. Although they started off with a nominal staff they ended up with over 1,000 employees. Talk about employment! That was one of the greatest ways to employ people—build up an empire in the department of industry.

When I listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and others speak about this motion I was struck by that empty and barren thing, the just society, of which we have heard so much. Here it is, the first month of a new year and we face the prospect of seeing more than half a million Canadians out of work and with little prospect of things improving except seasonally. One of the most unpleasant aspects of a very unpleasant subject is that the unemployment figures serve to emphasize the regional disparity under which we suffer in this country. The correction of this regional disparity, we were led to believe, was to have been one of the chief concerns of this government. Nothing has been done.

It is almost six months since this parliament met. We have had dialogues ad nauseam, task forces too many to count, promises galore and even international fashion shows, but no government action. I do not believe the figures on regional unemployment have been entirely placed on the record although I believe the figures for the Atlantic region were given. The figures of regional unemployment are as follows: 7.1 per cent in the Atlantic provinces; 6.8 per cent in the province of Quebec; 3 per cent in Ontario; 3.4 per cent in the prairies and 5.4 per cent in British Columbia. These certainly bear out the lopsided nature of our national economy.

No one likes unemployment. We all realize the seriousness of unemployment. Today, with this fire of inflation which is spreading and engulfing everybody, this government in spite of the war on poverty keeps throwing log after log on the fire of inflation. Unemployment becomes more and more important. The cost of living has gone out of the reach of millions of Canadians. When one is out of work the cost of living becomes even more and more important. The saddest thing that could happen to any family is to see the breadwinner unemployed.

This government must face up to the problem. It must look ahead and plan. Members of the government can fool nobody by postponing their actions. We had some programs that were of great benefit to the country. There was the winter works program. Where has it gone? There is nothing to substitute for it. The municipal loan fund was a great help to the municipalities. Where has that gone? Where have the subsidies in respect of winter housebuilding gone? Then there was the public works program. That has been discontinued. Has there been a replacement? No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock the house stands adjourned until Thursday at 2 p.m.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, January 30, 1969

The house met at 2 p.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PRIVILEGE

MR. BALDWIN—ALLEGED IRREGULARITY IN TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege at this time which I think affects in a very substantial way the privileges, rights and prerogatives of all hon. members of this house. I have given notice, of course, in accordance with the appropriate standing order.

My question of privilege deals with a paper tabled yesterday by the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) which purports to be presented and given on the records of this house under standing order 41(2), a new rule which has just come into effect this year. The document in question is simply headed "The Commissionaire Affair." It has no other heading and is not signed.

This document of course deals with a question which has been a very controversial one. I assure Your Honour it is not my intention to recapitulate the details of that, other than to say there is no question about the fact that the issue was the subject of very considerable questioning in this house and controversy in and out of the house. It touches not only the individuals concerned, but a very important issue which involves the people of this country. For this reason, it is no light matter which was discussed. The document in effect purports to be an explanation, I would assume by the Secretary of State, of his side of the argument on the controversy which took place.

It is my submission that the document should not have been tabled under the circumstances it was tabled yesterday. It might well be said that I should have dealt with this matter on a point of order yesterday but it was utterly impossible to do so because the document was tabled and no previous notice was given. It is only after documents have been tabled that hon. members are in a position to obtain copies and come to a conclusion as to whether the document in question is one which a minister or a parliamentary secretary is entitled to table under the terms of the pertinent standing order.

I have looked at this matter very carefully, sir, and it is a very important matter which involves a new rule. Your Honour will no doubt come to a decision in this regard, and probably lend your name to a leading case, as you will no doubt do during a number of situations as these new rules develop. For this reason I am going to take a little time to outline the matter in detail, and my reason for rising on this question of privilege.

Standing order 41(1) replaces standing order 40 and provides that a return, record or other paper required to be filed by statute or a regulation may in fact be filed by being tabled in this house. That is a prerogative right which is given to ministers of the Crown. The practice has also grown over the years whereby documents which do not fall within this description, but of an official nature, have been tabled by consent or leave of the house. There is a very sound reason for this.

On one or two occasions before the Christmas recess, and I am dealing with this chronologically, attempts were made by ministers of the Crown to obtain the leave of the house, under the guise of that particular practice to table what were in fact press releases. At that time I suggested it was an iniquitous practice and should not be allowed. Of course leave was not given.

This matter came up for discussion during the course of meetings of the procedure committee. A proposal was made, which was subsequently reduced to writing and became standing order 41(2), to the effect that with the leave of the house a minister or parliamentary secretary would be entitled to table the document or to use the exact wording, "any report or other paper". There was no condition precedent requiring the consent or leave of the house.

It is my submission there are very definite limitations to that right. Certainly when this matter was considered in the committee I made my opinions quite clear. I believe this opinion is shared by others and is the general consensus of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition. The idea that any minister should table press releases, or statements that are self-serving or exculpatory through the medium of this rule, should absolutely not be considered. If this were allowed our procedure would degenerate to the level of that followed in other countries, particularly that followed in the United States—and I will not deal with the situation there—where documentation may be placed on the record without being the subject of a speech. Certainly it was never the intention of this house or the procedure committee that this should be done.

The question for Your Honour to consider involves an interpretation of the rules. Under these conditions it is my submission that standing order 40 provides for the tabling of a document which is required by statute. When we come to the new standing order the words "return, report or other paper" must be considered in the same light; that is a document of an official character which, while not being required to be tabled by statute, is a subject for which a good case can be made for tabling in the house.

But if we let the rule go beyond this, where do we stop? Any document or any speech could be included: the Postmaster General could table in this house the speeches he has made.

An hon. Member: Oh, no!

Mr. Baldwin: Papers of any kind at all could be included within the provisions of this rule. If we adopted the interpretation which would be called for in order to uphold the legality of what was done yesterday, the words "other paper" could be given the widest possible meaning. I am sure this would not be a desirable practice in the house, and I therefore ask Your Honour to consider this question and come to some decision on it.

It may well be that, because the question has been raised for the first time, Your Honour might like to reserve your position on it. I say this because if Your Honour does come to a decision that the words "other paper" could include the right of a cabinet minister or parliamentary secretary to table any document, any paper at all, self-serving or argumentation, without in any sense its being an official document published under the authority of a government department, this house might well want to review the position it took on the rule and revise it.

If on the other hand Your Honour comes to the decision, as I hope you will and as the facts and precedents justify, that the words "other paper" must have a restrictive interpretation placed upon them, I think the government will have to review its position. I suggest it might well have to consider giving to hon. members of the opposition parties and Your Honour, well in advance of the time they intend to table the document, the document itself so that a decision may be arrived at as to whether it does or does not in fact conform to the rule.

I therefore ask Your Honour to give this matter most careful consideration, because I think what happened yesterday could degenerate into an iniquitous practice which would be most restrictive of the rights and privileges of members of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all agree that, for the most part, our new rules are working very well. I think we will grow in our appreciation of them as time goes on. Even so, if any apparent infraction has taken place in connection with one of the new rules, I agree with the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) that it should be looked at by Your Honour without delay.

Like the hon. member for Peace River, I realize that this is a point you may want to look at and on which you may wish to reserve your judgment. But I would like to support the contention of my hon. friend that the change in the rules that we made did not contemplate the kind of document which the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) asked permission to table yesterday. I accept the correction of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), who has just said that the Secretary of State did not seek permission, because under the new standing order, if the document fits the wording of the order he does not have to ask permission. That is the whole point.

As Your Honour must be aware, the new rules have put many more responsibilities on you than existed heretofore. We were quite deliberate in the recommendation that there be what is now known as standing order 41 (2), which reads as follows:

A minister of the Crown, or a parliamentary secretary acting on behalf of a minister, may, in his place in the house, state that he proposes to lay upon the table of the house, any report or other paper dealing with a matter coming within the administrative responsibilities of the government, and, thereupon, the same shall be deemed for all purposes to have been laid before the house.

All we sought to do when we drafted this rule was to get around the situation that has occurred on occasion, not too happily, when something that it was legitimate to table but was not required by an act was denied tabling because there was not unanimous consent. We tried, as I say, to get around that situation by the drafting of this rule. But I am sure we still meant this rule to apply only to official kinds of papers, to formal documents, and not to just any old paper that any minister of the crown might wish to table.

I realize that this raises the whole question of what is a kind of paper to be tabled. Your Honour knows that this question is dealt with at some length on pages 134 and 135 of Beauchesne's fourth edition. The citations there relate to kinds of documents that have to be tabled, and whether or not a document that has been cited must be tabled.

As a matter of fact these citations were read only last week, and Your Honour took the position that the mere reference to a paper did not constitute a reason for tabling as set out in those citations. I think it is also clear, from the material on the pages to which I have referred, that the only kinds of documents that must be tabled are those that have some kind of official status, some kind of official or governmental significance. I suggest that when a minister tries to table a document which simply represents his answers to a number of questions, answers that he does not want to make verbally, Your Honour has to review the situation. I am not asking that we go back to the old system under which unanimous consent is required to table a document, but I am asking that the import and the purport of the rule shall be observed.

I draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that when this matter came up on Monday of this week during the question period what happened was that the Secretary of State (Mr. Pelletier) sought, during the oral question period, to answer a number of questions that had been put to him on this subject. He admitted at the start that it would be a lengthy answer, but Your Honour suggested that he start and that you would rule later. He had not gone very long before you saw it would be lengthy and you interrupted him.

These are your words as recorded in Hansard of January 27 at page 4832:

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. minister at this time to suggest that the statement he is delivering must normally be made on motions, unless all hon. members are willing to hear the hon. minister's statement as a reply to a question. I do not think the hon. minister is entitled to continue any further.

Then there was a supplementary question by my parliamentary leader, and the Secretary of State made a reply at the end of which he said:

So many questions have been asked on that subject that I will not, so to speak, make any statement but rather reply in turn to the several questions that have been put to me and that have piled up.

Surely that was a commitment on the part of the Secretary of State, who realized that the questions he had to answer in a normal way could not be answered by a speech but could be briefly answered one by one; and there was your instruction, Sir, that it would be better if it were done on motions.

The Secretary of State sought yesterday to do indirectly what he was not permitted to do directly. He sought to bring into the official records of the house, by having it tabled, a lengthy document which consisted of answers to questions which Your Honour would not let him make during the question period but which Your Honour said he should make on motions.

If I am speaking rather critically, I do not mean it in that vein, but I am concerned about this procedure, because I can see that if this is allowed, all kinds of things will be tabled, not only the speeches that the Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans) is making around the country, but any kind of document; and what could be a real abuse of this rule would be for ministers to file statements that are argumentative on behalf of a certain piece of legislation before it is debated, or at a stage when it cannot be debated. So the rules of the house could be circumvented in this way.

I therefore feel very strongly that this is something that Your Honour will have to study. I say again that I do not want us to go back to the old practice of requiring unanimous consent for the tabling of any document, but precisely because we have done away with that requirement, the responsibility rests upon a minister to make sure that it is a proper paper that he is tabling. If there is any doubt about it, it is up to Your Honour to decide, and of course it is still a matter for a point of order. Therefore, as I say, I welcome the improvements we have made in the rules and I think this was a good one, but I plead that it be not abused.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): I do not want to take the time of the house at any great length to belabour the point. I think everyone here will recognize that the rules were drawn up with the idea, in principle, of fairness to both sides of the house and to all hon. members. It is axiomatic that they should be used fairly. I need not go on to say that they should be interpreted fairly, because that is a matter of course. What I wish to emphasize is that they should be used fairly. I would point out that if this practice were to grow it would become commonplace for a minister merely to rise and table a document which touches upon the administrative responsibility of his department, and it would be admitted. It could be a contentious document. It could be a mendacious document. It could be any kind of document. No member of this house would be able to comment upon it. Yet it would be a matter of record. I would point out also that the document is not tabled at that very moment; the minister merely states he will be tabling it at some time. Then hon. members have to go and get a copy.

I would suggest to Your Honour that procedures are about to be initiated under which debate will not take place on certain stages of legislation. The practice to which I have referred would give an opportunity to a minister or his parliamentary secretary to put in a full statement or a full argument, which in effect would be his statement at that stage of debate, thereby gaining an unfair advantage over those in the house who cannot reply.

This is the only point I wish to make. Certainly, I agree with my hon. friend from Peace River and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the spirit of the amendment was to eliminate unnecessary requests for leave to table a document, and that it should not be used as a general door for the funnelling on to the record of parliament by the ministry of any and all papers, at the discretion of ministers. I submit, therefore, that this rule must be interpreted narrowly, to the extent which has been indicated this afternoon.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): I should like to deal with this point, since this is the first occasion the amendment to standing order 41(2) has come before parliament. I might say it would have been useful—and perhaps the hon. member for Peace River might bear this in mind in future—if, when questions of privilege of this kind are raised for the first time, notice could be given, so that I might have an opportunity to look at the authorities—particularly, in this case, at the minutes of the Special Committee on Procedure.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Baldwin: I will table the next one.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Since the hon. member has not given me notice I shall have to proceed on the basis of my recollection, subject to confirmation after examining the minutes of the Special Committee on Procedure. I do recall quite definitely the question put to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre as to whether or not this encompassed press releases, and I indicated that in my opinion it did. I will do the hon. member the justice of saying that I do not recall what his response was, but I think he will agree he knew precisely the position we took. Perhaps other members of the committee can confirm this, but I cannot recall that the hon. member for Peace River said anything about it at that time.

Mr. Baldwin: Nonsense. On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, I deny categorically—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There is already one question of privilege before the house.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Rather than burden Your Honour with this we shall leave it to the record of the committee as to whether the hon. member did or did not; but I think you might dispel from your mind any suggestion that there has been some kind of trickery involved here. This is exactly the type of thing we had in contemplation when we brought about the change in the rule.

• (2:30 p.m.)

While standing order 41(1) is really quite precise as to the documents referred to, standing order 41(2) is in the broadest possible terms. It permits a minister or a parliamentary secretary to lay on the table of the house any report or other paper dealing with a matter coming within the administrative responsibilities of the government. I believe that the Chair should give the widest interpretation to those words. I also believe that it is in the interests of the house generally to have these documents, which deal with the administrative responsibilities of the government, laid on the table and made available to members.

The hon. member for Edmonton West suggested that the answers could be contentious or that they might be mendacious, and that hon. members would not have an opportunity to respond. If that were the case, then they could respond by way of a question of privilege. I should like to point out that the answers here would be in no different category from a return that is made in response to an order of the house which had resulted from a question. Certainly there would be no immediate opportunity to reply in that case. In addition, I think that the Chair would acknowledge the fact that it would not be desirable to have a lot of mini-debates on all these questions.

The final observation that I would make is that if this new restrictive interpretation is to be given to the word "papers", as is suggested by the hon. member for Peace River, then I think Your Honour would also have to consider whether, in the same way, papers that are subject to tabling under a notice of motion for production of papers brought by hon. members opposite should not equally be given a restrictive interpretation. Therefore, if the word "papers" as it appears in the Standing Orders is to be severely cut down in its meaning, then it would similarly be restrictive of members on the other side of the house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Ottawa West.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to present to the house my comments on the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Peace River.

May I thank hon. members for their advice as to the interpretation that ought to be placed by the Chair on standing order 41(1) and standing order 41(2). I will study the matter as closely as I can and take into account the views that have been expressed by hon. members who have taken part in the discussion. In view of the fact that there may be occasions, either today or later on, when ministers will seek the right to table similar documents, I will try to bring this decision down as quickly as possible.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND INCOME TAX ACT AND ESTATE TAX ACT, PURSUANT TO S.O. 60(1)

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on October 22, 1968, I gave notices of four motions relating to taxation and customs duties, which I proposed to move in Committee of Ways and Means. Two of these have been dealt with by the house, but under the new Standing Orders it will not be necessary to consider the remaining two motions in Committee of Ways and Means. I therefore wish to inform the house how I propose that we should proceed.

In accordance with the new rules, I propose to give notices of new motions under the provisions of standing order 60 (1). Because the gift tax and the estate tax proposals are closely interrelated, consideration of these proposals would be greatly facilitated if they were placed before the house in one bill. Therefore, I now propose to table a notice of motion to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act. The portion of the motion concerning the Income Tax Act will refer only to gift tax amendments. If the motion is adopted by the house, one composite bill to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act will be introduced based on the motion.

I propose on a later date to table a further notice of motion to amend the Income Tax Act to deal with the remainder of the income tax proposals announced in October. The preparation of these income tax amendments has been delayed, while some very complicated problems related to the taxation of life insurance companies and their policy holders have been under discussion with the companies concerned.

The motion of which I now propose to give notice will be based on the October announcement, but it will incorporate some changes of a kind that under the previous house rules would have been announced and explained by moving an amendment in Committee of Ways and Means. Since the new rules do not permit a speech to be made at the time of giving notice of a ways and means motion, or on moving adoption of such a motion, any explanation of these changes will have to be made by providing written material to the members and to others, rather than by a statement in the house. As soon as I table the notice of motion to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act, I plan, pursuant to standing order 41 (2), to lay upon the table of the house a paper explaining the motion and giving some illustrations of the consequent changes in taxes.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to standing order 60 (1) I lay on the table of the house notice of a ways and means motion to amend the Income Tax Act and the Estate Tax Act in English and in French; and pursuant to standing order 41 (2) I lay on the table of the house a paper explaining the motion and giving some illustrations of the consequent changes in taxes.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I might have to enter a caveat in relation to the nature of the statement that the minister is tabling under standing order 41 (2). If this is an explanatory notice of motion, then personally at the present time I would have no objection to it. On the other hand, if it is a general denial, or argument, or criticism of either of the proposals along the lines of those appearing in the press or some other arena, then I would immediately enter a caveat. In effect, as I said in another speech, this is happening at a time when a speech is not allowed.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a word on the caveat or point of order that has been raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West. The minister says that he is operating under standing order 60 (1) and under standing order 41 (2). Standing order 60 (1) reads as follows:

A notice of a Ways and Means motion may be laid upon the table of the house at any time during a sitting by a minister of the Crown—

That is what the minister has just done. It continues:

—but such a motion may not be proposed in the same sitting.

In other words, the minister cannot move it today, unless of course he were given unanimous consent to do so.

If you go further, Mr. Speaker, and look at paragraph (10) of standing order 60, you will note that it reads:

When an order of the day is read for the consideration of any motion of which notice has been given in accordance with section (1) of this order—

That is what has been done here.

—a motion to concur in the same shall be forthwith decided without debate or amendment—

In other words, we have made it a clear rule that at the resolution stage of a tax bill, as separate from a full dress budget debate, there is to be no debate on the proposed resolution.

The minister says that under standing order 41 (2) he is tabling a document. Like the hon. member for Edmonton West, I have not seen it. If it is only a matter of explanation, then I will not press an objection. But if—

Mr. Lewis: —it is a debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If, as my colleague says, putting into my mouth the words I was going to use, the minister is tabling a debate that he has put in writing, then I suggest that this combination of the use of two rules is not the kind of thing that should be allowed.

• (2:40 p.m.)

It is very clear we have done away with debate on the resolution stage of tax bills, yet the minister proposes to get around this by producing his side of a debate in the form of a document. That is, instead of debate he produces a document. Then he cites standing order 41(2) as his authority for tabling a document he should not have presented to the house at all. If he wants to send a memorandum to members of the house through the mail, telling us what this document is all about, well and good. Perhaps he wants to hold a press conference, and no one can stop him from doing that. But for him to try to circumvent the rules of the house in this way is I submit quite unfair.

I have not seen the document; I see the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) has a copy, as has my leader. He has handed it to me and from what I see I am convinced that what I have said is correct. It is debate. We have a rule saying there shall be no debate in the house at the resolution stage of a tax measure, and I do not think the minister can be allowed to break this rule in the present manner. It is good that the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) raised his point of privilege today. We should not have debate from one side when it is not allowed at all.

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I need say too much, except that we are not circumventing any of the rules. The rules are there and are being given effect to. Really, the hon. member is inventing new restrictions. The rules speak for themselves and I think Your Honour can summarily reject the hon. member's objection.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I suggest the tabling of the document by the Minister of Finance in this way is improper, and that that tabling ought to be withheld until Your Honour has ruled on the matter.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Unless hon. members wish to present further argument, I wish to say now that I agree with the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition. Because of the very serious point of privilege raised earlier by the hon. member for Peace River, the Chair indicated that the matter would be taken under advisement. I do not think it would be proper for the Chair to allow the tabling of the document at this time. With the agreement of all hon. members I will simply hold the document—I am not sure whether it will be held on the minister's desk, on the table, or in between, but it will not be considered as having been accepted for tabling at the present time.

Mr. Benson: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Since this is an important matter, perhaps there will be unanimous consent to giving the bill first reading at this time, or taking a vote on first reading.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the government not circumvented enough rules already, for one day?

Some hon. Members: Do it tomorrow.

PRAIRIE GRAIN ADVANCE PAYMENTS ACT

AMENDMENT PROVIDING EMERGENCY PAYMENTS TO MEET DRYING COSTS

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, last week the house debated at length the question of assistance to western farmers with respect to appropriate measures to be taken to assist them with tough and damp grain. As my colleagues indicated, the government intends to present a measure to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. I think there is agreement to what I am about to propose from all sides of the house; at least, up until about one hour ago there was agreement. I request leave of the house to waive the provisions of standing order 42(1) with respect to 48 hours notice for the introduction of a bill, so the bill may be given first reading at this time and then proceeded with at the first possible opportunity which will be tomorrow. We wish to give every assistance possible to our prairie farmers.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to waive the rules, as we always are for good cause when we can help our fellow citizens in the country.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We have already agreed to this, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, we have also agreed to postpone till tomorrow the debate on the wheat problem, and whenever a similar problem arises some day for the Eastern farmer, we trust we will be given the same co-operation.

[English]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-162, to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: I wonder whether the house might allow the Chair to report to a bill introduced a moment ago by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. My understanding is that the royal recommendation has not yet been filed with the Clerk of the House in this regard. I take the liberty to remind the minister responsible for the proceedings on this bill that this is a requirement for the consideration of the bill, since the purpose of the bill is to provide for emergency advance payments.

Mr. Baldwin: Is the government going to waive the B.N.A. Act next?

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CIGARETTES—MEASURE TO RESTRICT TAR AND NICOTINE CONTENT

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Lakeshore) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-163, to restrict the tar and nicotine content of cigarettes.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, for some time now it has been established that there is a connection between tobacco users and deaths caused by cancer, due to the tar and nicotine contained in cigarettes. A table was recently issued under the authority of the Minister of National Health and Welfare setting forth the tar and nicotine level in most of the cigarettes used in Canada.

The purpose of this bill is to enact that the tar and nicotine level in cigarettes manufactured and sold in Canada shall not exceed lowest level to have been found as set forth in the table, namely 8 milligrams of tar and 0.5 milligrams of nicotine.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

• (2:50 p.m.)

WARNING ON TOBACCO AND CIGARETTE PACKAGES

Mr. Kenneth Robinson (Lakeshore) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-164, respecting tobacco as a health hazard.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to make certain that tobacco and cigarette users are aware at all times that their use constitutes a health hazard. It is therefore proposed that a written and graphic warning be placed on all packages of tobacco and cigarettes. I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether this bill could also be referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs?

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[Mr. Speaker.]

EXPORT AND IMPORT PERMITS ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING APPLICABILITY TO CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION ACT

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce) moved the first reading of Bill S-25, to amend the Export and Import Permits Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

EXHIBITIONS

MAN AND HIS WORLD—DECISION TO DISCONTINUE—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 26

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I ask, seconded by the member for Frontenac (Mr. Dumont) leave to move the adjournment of the house, under standing order 26, to discuss an urgent matter of national importance, namely the decision of the Montreal Executive Council to cancel the operation of "Man and His World" because of the financial risk. It was announced last night that the Exhibition Island and St. Helen Island would be closed down.

That is to say that all the capital invested in achieving Expo 67 will be, so to speak, a total loss. Because of the magnitude of such a gigantic undertaking as "Man and His World", because of the generous financial participation of the federal government towards its realization, because of the disastrous consequences of such a decision for the prestige of Canada throughout the world, it is imperative that a debate be launched today in this house to study that matter of national importance and find a solution to it.

The closing of Expo 67 is a national disgrace. The city of Montreal is hard-pressed for money.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. member that he must limit his remarks to the statement made to the Chair, and that he is not allowed to make a speech.

The hon. member for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau), as I just indicated, has given the Chair the notice required under standing order 26(2). According to the hon. member's statement, the matter he is moving for discussion is based on the decision taken by the executive committee of the City of Montreal, to discontinue operation of "Man and His World".

In deciding whether a matter should have urgent consideration, the Speaker must consider the extent to which the matter comes within the administrative responsibilities of the government. The hon. member should read standing order 26(5) about this point.

In my opinion, the motion of the hon. member for Shefford does not meet this requirement since the subject matter as proposed clearly does not come under the administrative jurisdiction of the federal government. I regret, but I must come to the conclusion that this motion may not be allowed in the house.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE MINISTRY

PUBLIC DEBATE BETWEEN MINISTERS ON GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister arising from the encouragement given by him to public debate between cabinet ministers on defence policy. Is it his intention to encourage public debate between the ministers in his government on other matters of policy still in the process of being determined as, for example, economic policy generally, and particularly the report of the task force on housing that was tabled in the house yesterday?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we have no objection to public debate on the subject of economic progress of the country or the way in which ministers think it could be improved. There is no provision in our government against such debate.

Mr. Stanfield: As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, may we expect that debate will be encouraged between the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Transport on the removal of the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, in view of the fact that the recommendation of the task force, of which the Minister of Transport was chairman, is in favour of removal and the indication is that the Minister of Finance is opposed to such action? May we look forward to such a debate?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to make something clear. I am never against the reduction of taxes in Canada. I simply said we cannot afford it at the present time.

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in line with the Prime Minister's wish to generate debate within the cabinet, within the house and within the country in order to decide what government policy should be, is it the government's plan to adopt the tactic used by the late Mackenzie King of ascertaining which gate the sheep intended to use in order to leave the pasture and then leading them through it?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The rules do not allow the hon. member to encourage debate in the house in this way.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): As a further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, is it the Prime Minister's intention to arrange for Canada to become a two-policy nation?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Like your two-leader party?

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PROVISION FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF CLAIMS COMMISSION

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Some time ago he said he would table the bill to establish an Indian claims commission before the end of this month. Since today is the 30th of January, is he now ready to table it and, if not, can he tell us when he will be ready to do so?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I said I hoped, but, unfortunately, my hope has not been fulfilled yet.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, could the minister indicate when his hope may be realized and whether he has met obstacles to presenting the bill in the form of advice as to its constitutionality? If so, can he tell us what he is doing about it?

Inquiries of the Ministry

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, after introducing the resolution concerning the establishment of an Indian claims commission, I received representations from some organizations. Some remarks were also made to me in the course of subsequent discussions I had with Indians in Canada. Therefore, I consider it desirable to make a thorough study of such representations before I announce definitely the government policy.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, the minister has still not answered part of my last question. He has been giving us vague dates progressively later throughout this entire proceeding. Can he indicate now when we can expect that bill?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: As soon as possible, Mr. Speaker.

EXHIBITIONS

MAN AND HIS WORLD—DECISION TO DISCONTINUE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question to the Prime Minister.

Since he is aware that the closing of Man and His World was announced yesterday, could the right hon. gentleman tell us whether he intends to consult with the provincial and municipal authorities in order to find a solution to this serious problem as quickly as possible?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there have already been consultations, which went on for several months, at the request of the City of Montreal, with the federal government and also, I think, with the provincial government. Following those talks, the City of Montreal has reached a decision that comes under its jurisdiction. We have nothing else to say.

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question.

Like the authorities of the City of Montreal, whose decision we heard about last night, does the federal government propose to do something to save Man and His World?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, Man and His World does not come under our authority; we cannot do anything on our own initiative. I repeat that we have discussed the matter with the officials of the City of Montreal every time they requested it.

[Mr. Lewis.]

[Later:]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question about the closing of "Man and His World".

Could the Prime Minister tell us if his government would take part in a tripartite commission: federal, provincial and municipal, in order to take over the financial matter of "Man and His World" and to allow the general public to benefit from it?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question is rather an hypothetical one. The City of Montreal would first of all have to think about setting up such a commission. The house knows that the World Exhibition ended almost a year and a half ago and that it is the City of Montreal that assumed the responsibility of continuing its operation. It became a thing which was amenable to it and not any more to us. On the contrary, for a long time the government has been considering solutions to liquidate its commitments with regard to the Expo 67, that is to liquidate the company which, I think, is called the Canadian Corporation for the World Exhibition. The solution is not our concern any more. It is up to the city of Montreal to judge whether or not it wants to continue the operation of that municipal exhibition and, if it wishes to call on other financing sources, to propose what it would like.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I wish to put a supplementary question. The Prime Minister said that my question was hypothetical, but the financing of the World Exhibition is also hypothetical at the present time. Does he want to say that the federal government is trying to settle the matter? Does that mean that it would not be ready to buy "Man and His World" or the Corporation involved?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question has never been put to us. We have not been asked to buy "Man and His World". If the city of Montreal makes an offer, we will consider it, but if the hon. member wants to have the government say that we think we must devote a substantial part of the federal budget to recreate "Man and His World" or to operate it, I will say to him the we have unfortunately, to deal with other priorities and that, according to us, that one is not the first.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

MIDDLE EAST—REACTION OF IRAQ TO CANADIAN GOVERNMENT PROTEST

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the very perilous condition of affairs in the Middle East and the serious potential threat to world peace, action is needed. The minister stated that a message was being submitted by the Canadian ambassador to the government of Iraq protesting against the terrible series of virtual atrocities which occurred in that country recently. What was the reaction of the government of Iraq and what generally is the government of Canada doing to bring about conditions whereby the serious situation in the Middle East will be to some extent diminished?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we have not yet had a response from the government of Iraq to the representations we made yesterday. On the second part of the question, our main effort has been directed to supporting the efforts of Ambassador Jarring who is acting for the Secretary General of the United Nations to bring about a settlement of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I think it only fair that he should have the opportunity of explaining whether or not there is any basis in fact to a report in The Christian Science Monitor for Thursday, January 9, to the effect that the Prime Minister advised Foreign Minister Riyad of Egypt that "Israel is clearly an expansionist country" and that the western world must wake up to this before the Middle East blows up again.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The right hon. gentleman knows the question should be asked directly rather than by way of confirmation of an article.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Knowing now what the article and John Cooley's report says, I am sure the Prime Minister would welcome the earliest opportunity to deny such a preposterous conclusion.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think the right hon. gentleman is doing exactly that, denying such a preposterous conclusion. I do not know where the blame should lie, whether it should be with The Christian Science Monitor, with its reporter or with second or third hand information, but I never said anything closely resembling that. My thoughts are not at all along those lines.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

FINANCE

POSSIBLE INTRODUCTION OF CAPITAL GAINS TAX

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Finance. In view of persistent rumours today in the financial markets that the government is contemplating the introduction of a capital gains tax in the near future, I am sure the minister would like the opportunity of denying what I hope is a preposterous rumour.

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, as a former creator of rumours, knows that no one should pay any attention to them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: I am very glad to know that this rumour is not nearly as well founded as those I used to create.

ESTATE TAX ACT

INQUIRY RESPECTING BASIC EXEMPTION AND RATES

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I too should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has he now increased the basic exemption under the estate tax from $20,000 to $50,000 and have the rates been modified since he disclosed the change in his budget?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): No, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

TORONTO—HOLDING OF INDIAN GIRL IN JAIL

Mr. A. P. Gleave (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. On January 24 I was promised an answer to a question I had asked about an Indian girl who was incarcerated in the Don Jail in Toronto. Is the minister now in a position to reply?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am now in a position to answer the question directed to me by the hon. member the other day, with respect to the holding of an Indian girl in jail.

That Indian girl left her reserve in British Columbia and travelled across Canada. Unfortunately, she was put in jail on a theft charge and was held there for some time. She did not inform the department and did not ask for assistance. We learned about her incarceration in the press.

We have services available to Indians who get into situations such as that one but we have to be informed before taking action. Unfortunately, the departmental officials were not aware of the plight of that poor girl.

[English]

Mr. Gleave: Would the minister, together with the appropriate departments of justice, set up some procedures that would take care of such situations?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible for us to know the whereabouts of every Indian in the country, even if he is incarcerated. In this case, the person concerned was a girl of full legal age who had changed her name. Unfortunately, we were not informed of her sad situation.

The department has services available to Indians who find themselves in such desperate situations but, unfortunately, the girl in question did not consider it necessary to resort to them.

[English]

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Did the minister ascertain during his investigation whether or not the girl in question was made aware of her rights and given an opportunity to get in touch with him or his department?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think that this question should be asked of the people in charge of the administration of justice within their province.

STUDENT LOANS

CURTAILMENT OF GRANTS TO FOREIGN STUDENTS ENGAGED IN DISORDERLY ACTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether the government is giving consideration to the curtailment of grants to foreign students attending Canadian universities under government auspices who engage in activities involving breaches of the peace, bloodshed and other acts of disorder?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the question is of a general nature. If the hon. member feels there is urgency he may wish to have it discussed at the time of adjournment.

Mr. Nesbitt: Mr. Speaker, I might add that I have reference particularly to the unfortunate events which took place this morning at Sir George Williams University in the city of Montreal.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. If he will come forward I will ask it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. While the minister proceeds forward, the Chair recognizes the hon. member for Huron.

ESTATE TAX ACT

INQUIRY RESPECTING BASIC EXEMPTION

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he can now say he intends leaving the estate tax exemption at $50,000 instead of changing it to $20,000?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that is not the case at all. I tried to table the explanation but hon. members opposite did not want it.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You tried to confuse the issue.

Mr. Benson: I should like to point out also that copies of this explanation will be available in the members' lobby as soon as they leave the house. What has happened is that estates under $50,000 will not be subject to estates tax, but there has been no change in the high exemptions. The high exemptions that were in the estate tax provisions are still there, that is, $20,000 plus $10,000 for every—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think this kind of detailed discussion is the type which should take place when the bill is before the house and is not now in order.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's answer, and I know he did not intend to mislead the house, is it basically correct that estates under $50,000 will not be taxed and that the old rate which existed prior to October is being restored?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Let me suggest to hon. members that this is precisely the debate which I assume will take place when the bill is before the house. I do not see why exceptions should be made to the general rule in respect of something which has obviously been made an order of the house.

Mr. Woolliams: With the greatest respect to Your Honour, I think there may be a misunderstanding as a result of the minister's terminology in answering the question. He left a rather ambiguous impression in answer to the question, "would it not be correct...?" I think he appreciates that fact and I hope Your Honour will, with your great wisdom, give the minister an opportunity to make a correction.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is difficult to resist such a plea.

Mr. Benson: If I may speak to the point of order, I believe my answer was quite correct. The exemptions have not been raised and estates under $50,000 will not be reduced because of estate tax. This is similar to the situation which existed before. Under the new system the high exemptions have not been changed. If someone has four children, for example, there may be a $100,000 exemption plus anything left to the wife, which is also exempt.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER, B.C.—EMPTY SHIPS LEAVING PORT

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce whether he can indicate to the house that the reports of grain ships leaving Vancouver harbour empty are accurate?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have already answered that question on an earlier day when I confirmed that indeed two ships had left or were about to leave. In one case arrangements were made for the ship to return later to pick up the grain.

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, does the minister expect that he will soon be in a position to announce a new sale of Canadian wheat to red China in proportion to the recent sale by Australia amounting to $137,500,000 for 2,250,000 tons?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, the sale by Australia proves that there is a constant demand for wheat in China. The Wheat Board will be continuing its effort to get a fair share of that market. I should point out "en passant", as Sir John A. Macdonald used to say, that under the agreement with China I announced a few months ago, Canada is selling seven million bushels a month to China compared with 6,600,000 sold by Australia. This also demonstrates that China believes in a two-source system.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, could the minister advise the house when his explanations and rosy promises will be replaced by new wheat contracts?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The supplementary question is argumentative.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

VILLENEUVE, QUE.—SUBVENTIONS IN 1967

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Finance indicate what municipalities in the constituency of Villeneuve received subventions in 1967, and the amount of these subventions, in respect of buildings owned by the Crown, erected on lands covered by 99-year lease arrangements—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Tétrault: —accorded by private companies as well as for Crown-owned buildings—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Tétrault: —erected on lands belonging to the Crown?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member's question should be placed on the order paper.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

SECURITIES COMMISSION—ISSUING OF TREASURY SHARES

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, last October the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and his officials had meetings with provincial authorities concerning a national securities commission. He indicated that a decision in respect of legislation would be forthcoming. Has a decision been made and will the legislation cover the issuing of treasury shares without the protection provided by a prospectus?

Hon. Ron Basford (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the meeting to which the hon. member has referred we agreed to bilateral discussions with the provinces. As I announced, we are preparing a securities measure for discussion with the provinces and presentation by this government. I think it would be quite inappropriate for me at this point to suggest what may or may not be in the bill or covered by this measure.

WINTER WORKS

DEPARTMENTAL ACTION ON REFORM PROGRAM

Mr. John Lundrigan (Gander-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Manpower and Immigration. In his consideration of the brief from the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities did the minister decide what action his department will take on the reform program mentioned in that brief to replace the winter works program?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Minister of Manpower and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it is not intended to introduce a new program at this time.

Mr. Lundrigan: Mr. Speaker, will the minister indicate whether this information has been communicated to that body, that is, that the government is not acceding to the recommendations and proposals contained in the brief?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into this point and see that this body is advised.

RESEARCH

UNIVERSITIES TAKING OVER MOUNT KOBAU OBSERVATORY

Mr. Bruce Howard (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Acting Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources what answer the minister is prepared to give to the universities of western Canada which recently requested an opportunity to take over the Mount Kobau observatory?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this subject—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure that the matter is of immediate urgency. The hon. member might want to discuss the question at the time of adjournment.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—DEPORTATION FROM UNITED STATES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question. In view of the circumstances under which Hal Banks received a form of absolution from the secretary of state of the previous United States administration, and the fact that I am informed this matter is now being considered in the United States Senate, particularly having regard to the $100,000 paid to the Democratic party campaign funds immediately after the order, will the government now give consideration to asking the present United States administration to review the order made by the previous administration so that Hal Banks will be given the opportunity to secure justice in Canada?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure, again, whether this is a question of immediate urgency, but I hesitate to ask the right hon. gentleman to return at ten o'clock tonight. Perhaps it might be easier to allow the right hon. Prime Minister to reply.

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I plan to be here at ten o'clock anyway; there is going to be a vote. But perhaps it is just as well to get this over with. Our position on this matter was stated to the previous administration. We are taking the view that the government of the United States, in spite of the fact that there has been an election, is still the government of the United States, and decisions taken by the previous administration will continue to be respected by us. Of course, if the present government of the United States wants to do things on its own initiative we will be anxious to co-operate, as the right hon. gentleman says, to ensure that justice be done.

Inquiries of the Ministry

EXTERNAL AID

BIAFRA—AVAILABILITY OF AIRCRAFT FOR RELIEF PURPOSES

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In light of the fact that the United States government has recently made four Globemasters available to the churches' relief operations from Sao Tomé to Biafra, will the government consider doing likewise so that the massive starvation in that country may be relieved?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the government has no such intention at the present time. As the hon. gentleman knows, our relief efforts are being centred on the International Committee for the Red Cross. That continues to be government policy.

Mr. Brewin: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government given consideration to making Hercules aircraft available to the newly organized Red Cross airlift from Dahomey into Biafra?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it would be helpful all around if the Biafran authorities would agree to daylight flights. Then a great deal more food could be provided, and the Hercules aircraft provided by the Canadian government would be available.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there seemed to be some confusion the other day about the actual disposition of the food supplies at present being loaded for Nigeria and Biafra. Could the Secretary of State for External Affairs clarify where the shipments will be deposited for eventual unloading in Biafra? Will it be Fernando Po, Dahomey, or where will these food supplies be going?

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that the International Committee for the Red Cross have given up any further efforts, at least temporarily, to make use of the equatorial Guinea airport. They have now obtained the approval of the Dahomey government to use an airport there, which is about the same distance as Sao Tomé from the needy areas. I am sure they will rearrange their food supplies so as to be able to deliver them.

WOMEN

INFORMATION RESPECTING PRESENTATION OF REPORT

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State related to the question I asked him on January 20 regarding the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. Has the minister now had an opportunity to look into the matter, and, if so, can he advise the house when he expects to have a report from this commission?

[Translation]

Hon. Gérard Pelletier (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, I am not better informed about when the report will be submitted than I was when the question was first put to me.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister looked into the matter? The way he has answered my question leaves me in some doubt in that regard.

[Translation]

Mr. Pelletier: Mr. Speaker, I wonder why the hon. member should have any doubt.

[English]

BILINGUALISM AND BICULTURALISM

BROADENING OF INQUIRY RESPECTING LEAKS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister whether he will discuss with his colleague, the Solicitor General, the possibility of enlarging the inquiry which the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is making into the leakage of documents from the B. and B. commission to cover the leakage of documents filed by the task force on housing, and also seconding the Minister of Transport in order to facilitate any inquiries which may be made?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, if this is a formal demand by the opposition I would be very glad to consider investigating it.

RESEARCH

PAIT—CHANGE OF PROVISIONS AND TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Recently, in answer to a question I put on the order paper, the minister indicated that he is considering changing the provisions and terms of reference of the PAIT civil development program. Would he consider making a statement on motions in the near future regarding when we may expect changes in this research and development program?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest, with respect, that this might be a good subject for discussion when the bill relating to the reorganization of the department is introduced, or at ten o'clock.

Mr. Lewis: When will that bill be introduced?

Mr. Broadbent: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister care to indicate when we may expect that development?

Mr. Pepin: Soon, Mr. Speaker.

SPORTS

HOCKEY—GAME BETWEEN RUSSIAN TEAM AND MONTREAL CANADIENS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's well known interest in sport and the fact that the Russian national hockey team is playing the Canadian national team in Ottawa tonight, will the Prime Minister use his good offices to arrange an exhibition game between the Russian team and the Montreal Canadiens before the Russian team returns to Moscow?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that I am more interested in football than in hockey.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

NATIONAL PARKS

BONNE BAY, NFLD.—SUSPENSION OF OPERATIONS

Mr. Jack Marshall (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, of which I have given notice. In view of the urgent representations with regard to the suspension of operations in the proposed national park in the Bonne Bay area of Newfoundland, can the minister give me the reasons for this shutdown and can he also disclose whether work on the park will restart this year?

[Mr. Broadbent.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure whether this is the type of question that should be answered now. However, the minister seems very anxious to reply and perhaps hon. members would agree that he might do so.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question.

The discovery of silica deposits in a particularly important area of the projected park incited provincial authorities to launch an intensified mining exploration program. Until the exploration work is completed, the staff of the national parks branch has stopped working in that area and has undertaken other tasks.

As soon as the provincial authorities have completed their assessment of the region's possibilities and decided what area can be put aside for a national park, that is to say late in 1969 according to their forecasts, the Historic Sites and Monuments Branch will study the project in the light of information given by the province.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM "FESTIVAL"

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State. Could the minister tell us why the C.B.C. television program "Festival" was suddenly cancelled last night shortly before it was scheduled to be shown on the air?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this question should be placed on the order paper.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

MANITOBA—OPTOMETRIC AND CHIROPRACTIC SERVICES IN MEDICARE PLAN

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare and is based on the announcement that Manitoba will enter into the medicare plan on April 1. The minister was here but in his absence perhaps I could ask the question and his parliamentary secretary will take note of it. In view of the report that the cost to Manitoba for the first year—the figure has been given in the report—includes coverage of optometric and chiropractic services which are to be covered by the established premiums, could the minister confirm whether the federal government has agreed to this, and at the same time could he comment further on my question of Monday, January 27?

• (3:30 p.m.)

[Translation]

Mr. Rosaire Gendron (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I shall take this question as notice and the minister will no doubt be able to reply to it Monday.

[English]

SHIPPING

CLOSING OF LACHINE CANAL

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport or to whoever is acting for him today. There is an element of urgency in the question because an interim injunction relating to the matter in question expires either today or tomorrow. Does the minister plan to take any action to ensure that the Lachine Canal is not closed off and filled in?

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, perhaps in the absence of an answer I could address a supplementary question to the government house leader. In view of the fact that no one appears to be available who has any responsibility in the field of transport, would the minister take whatever steps he has at his disposal to see that this matter is referred to an appropriate committee for a thorough examination?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): I think I can reply to that question, Mr. Speaker.

In fact, steps have been taken to terminate projects which had already been discussed in connection with the Lachine Canal and, according to my information, nothing will be done to change the present situation during the next few months.

[English]

In other words the proposed changes are being delayed for reassessment.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, may I be permitted to ask the President of the Privy Council what the order of business for the remainder of this week and for next week will be.

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we propose to call a vote on the estate tax resolution which was presented today. Then we will call second reading of the bill to amend the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act, and further stages if possible. When that is disposed of we will deal with the bill to amend the Customs Act, which is under the direction of the Minister of National Revenue. On Monday next we will call the report stage of the bill to amend the Aeronautics Act, to be followed by the report stage of the bill to amend the Navigable Waters Protection Act. On Tuesday we will call second reading of the bill to amend the Estate Tax Act, and we contemplate calling that measure on Wednesday and Thursday if that is necessary in order to dispose of all stages of the bill. If we find we are making better progress, I will make a statement later in the week.

Mr. Lewis: I have a supplementary question. The President of the Privy Council, in answer to questions regarding when we might expect the government reorganization bill or bills, has said more than once that he would be able to tell the house today, I think, about that legislation, which is obviously of tremendous importance and to which ministers continue to refer. Can we have word on when that bill or bills may be expected?

Mr. Macdonald (Rosedale): I am very hopeful of having it in the house within two weeks.

[Later:]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister which is supplementary to the question I put earlier to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Would the Prime Minister care to make a statement now or in the near future on whether the government intends to establish a ministry of science?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no question of our establishing a ministry of science.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

SECOND ALLOTTED DAY—NON-CONFIDENCE MOTION—ALLEGED FAILURE TO PRESENT ECONOMIC PROGRAMS TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT

The house resumed, from Wednesday, January 29, consideration of the motion of Mr. Stanfield (p. 4901) and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lewis (p. 4911).

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington): Mr. Speaker, when the house adjourned last evening we were debating the non-confidence motion put before the house by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), and in order to have some continuity in the debate it might be wise at this time to read the motion. It reads as follows:

> That this house regrets that the government is not presenting programs to achieve a rate of economic growth which will reduce unemployment and also ensure that the economy will be able to absorb the large number of new entrants into the labour force this year.

An amendment was moved thereto by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis). I had been speaking particularly about the young people who are facing very bleak employment propects this summer. I refer to the graduates of universities and community colleges, to the undergraduates and to high school students as well as those young people who have left school and are called drop-outs. This group of people constitutes the largest percentage of unemployed in Canada, namely, 15.2 per cent.

I closed my remarks last night by bringing to the attention of the house some of the wonderful programs that were started by the party I represent to overcome and to alleviate the unemployment situation. I referred to the winter works program, the municipal loan program, which we give credit to the Liberal government for introducing, the subsidies to the winter housebuilding program, which the Conservative party introduced, and the great shelf of public works programs which we left for the incoming administration. All these programs have disappeared. They are gone and there is nothing to replace them.

There are many disparities in unemployment in various regions, but the one disparity on which I propose to speak this afternoon in the short time available to me concerns the young people, as I said earlier. Possibly this came to my mind because I represent an area where many universities are located. In my riding there is the University of Guelph. Fifteen miles distant is Waterloo University and Waterloo Lutheran University, and 30 miles south is McMaster University. So it is a very well serviced area so far as universities are concerned. Naturally my concern, therefore, is for graduates, undergraduates and other young people, as well as for all unemployed people, of course.

Eight days ago the Leader of the Opposition asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) whether he would submit to the house on motions what plans the government has to take care of this vast number of people who will soon be on the labour market. The Minister of Finance replied as follows:

> I believe that Canada will be able to absorb all the good young people whom our universities can produce in the future.

If he means that, we want him to come forward with some programs and ideas on how he proposes to do this. It is incredible to me that a government which has boasted of its appeal to youth and its desire to involve youth in national affairs could be so callous as to turn its back upon youth and in fact say to these young people: "Look after yourselves". I am afraid the only involvement of youth under this government is likely to be involvement in unemployment. Certainly students have no bright outlook for job prospects this summer.

The employment picture for Canadian students is "very bleak", according to W. H. Rutledge, president of the University Careers Planning Association, when speaking last November. He and his association have urged the government to set up a national student summer employment program, with which I heartily concur.

Let us think of the number of ways in which this government can project some ideas and some ways in which to employ students this summer. I am thinking of the municipalities across this country which have summer recreational programs under way. They cannot get the people to lead and direct these programs because they do not have the money with which to pay them. Some government assistance in this direction would help. There are government research programs that could be extended which could employ many of these students. We must also think of the large national parks system of the federal government and of the great amount of work there is to do in developing and extending these national parks, work in which many of these students could be employed.

• (3:40 p.m.)

Something should be done to persuade industries, if possible, to reconsider their decisions to close down completely for two weeks at a time.

There are three main groups of young people about whom we should be especially concerned. There are the students who will graduate from universities in Canada this spring, an estimated 88,000. To this number should be added graduates from community colleges, who will add another 18,000 young Canadians to those seeking employment. Then there are the undergraduate students who need summer employment to enable them to continue their education. According to D.B.S. figures there are 204,000 of these students, and they will be on the labour market this spring. Last year, 74,000 of them never found jobs. I am sure we have all noted the growing numbers of students who need summer employment so as to meet, or partly meet, the cost of their education. It is true some of them are fortunate enough to have scholarships or well to do parents, but the great majority require at least part time summer work to pay for their board and tuition fees which in Ontario amount to approximately $2,000 a year.

Then there is the problem presented by young people who cannot be classed in any significant number among university undergraduates or graduates. Figures supplied to this house by the Department of Manpower and Immigration in relation to this group indicate the proportions of the difficulty of finding work for them. The figures I am about to put on record relate to unemployed persons in Canada between the ages of 14 and 19. This age group roughly covers high school students and so-called drop-outs. In June of last year there were 153,000 unemployed in this group. By July the figure had fallen to 143,000. Of the 153,000 unemployed in June, 13,000 were in the Atlantic provinces, 14,000 in the province of Quebec, 30,000 in Ontario, 14,000 on the prairies and 19,000 in British Columbia. This total figure of 153,000 had risen from a total of 111,000 in June, 1967. It is estimated that the figure will increase to more than 180,000 in 1969, and it is quite conceivable that it will be as high as 200,000. When these unemployed youths, largely non-students, are added to the number of undergraduate job seekers and graduates seeking permanent employment, a formidable figure is reached and it becomes apparent that the youthful unemployed pose a problem of major proportions.

I would be interested, as I am sure all hon. members would be, to hear what plans the minister and his colleagues have to meet this huge and legitimate demand by Canadian youth for a place in the economy. If the minister can announce some concrete program in this regard he will be setting an example for his party, and we shall be looking forward to hearing his plans concerning this vital bread and butter issue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hales: A survey taken by the Financial Post last fall disclosed that this year the increase in available jobs would run well behind the output of graduates. To make matters worse, potential employers are becoming very selective. The demand has narrowed to three or four faculties such as business administration, computer science, geology, mining engineering and the like. Student graduates in general arts and social sciences, civil, mechanical and electrical engineering face narrowing prospects.

What does the government propose to do about this situation? Should there not have been greater co-operation between the universities and the government? I suggest the government should have asked the universities to tailor their courses to meet the employment demand. However, little seems to have been done in this direction. Mr. V. C. Martell, manager of the Canada Manpower Centre at Dalhousie University, is reported as having said:

> It looks as though the general arts students, particularly the girls, are the ones who will suffer most. And we are producing more of them than anything else.

What we should like to hear from the government right now is evidence that hon. gentlemen opposite have a plan to meet this situation. We want positive action, a crash program. For goodness sake don't tell us that another task force is to be set up. We have had enough of them. We want action. Jobs for students cannot be regarded as a form of aid. Jobs for students represent an investment in Canada.

The Economic Council of Canada has brought this question sharply into focus by saying it is imperative to educate our young people and then put that education to the fullest possible use. This is as important to us as are the calls of national defence. Last year the government was the principal user of Canadian graduates, hiring some 650. What will the number be this year? The forecast is that only 250 students will be hired all over Canada. Why is there this reduction at the very time we should be going all out to find jobs for as many Canadian students as possible? I hope we shall not be told that there is no money available for this purpose. If the government had not been so careless with some of the money it has dissipated, money would have been available to provide these jobs.

Consider one or two examples: First, the National Arts Centre in Ottawa, estimated to cost $10 million but now to cost $50 million, $40 million more than had been estimated. If we gave students jobs, say at $1,000 for this season, which would be like pennies from Heaven for them, $40 million would create 40,000 student jobs. Just think of it! What about the cost of operating the Prime Minister's office which has increased by some $200,000—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired, unless he has leave to continue beyond his allotted time. Is that agreeable?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hales: Thank you. This subject is dear to my heart and I should like to expound on it further for a minute or so. I was about to say that had the increase in the cost of running the Prime Minister's office been applied to providing jobs for students it would have given employment to 200 students at $1,000 each.

Industrial employers also are not hiring as many students as formerly. The reason is partly to be found in changes in techniques, in products manufactured and in the structure of many industries, particularly those concerned with service. But these are changes of which the authorities have been aware for some time. The Minister of Manpower and Immigration (Mr. MacEachen) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) have known about them for a long while and should have been taking steps to solve the difficulties which are now confronting us.

Our young people are faced this year with a situation in which fewer firms are hiring fewer people. It is as simple as that. The government has failed lamentably to meet the challenge presented by our eager young people. It has filled the air with inconsequential issues, with dialogues and promises. Its members have had new offices built for them, have buttressed themselves with large staffs made up of defeated candidates and have given handsome salary boosts to their key officials. And this at a time when young people will be looking for jobs this summer, positions which they are entitled to find.

In the meantime we have watched our fishing industry sink into ruin. The once great flow of Canadian export wheat has slowed to a trickle, and struggling family farms and businesses are now threatened with extinction by taxation. The tabling today of the proposed changes in the Estate Tax Act may help the situation, but this tabling has been brought about by the pressure applied by the opposition, the press and the public generally. Incidentally, I am pleased to see that the Minister of Finance is present in the chamber.

Although there are practical difficulties, if the right thinking is applied I am sure they will be overcome. However, many of our young people have been promised so much by Liberal governments but have received so little. For example, about six years ago the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Mr. Pearson, stated that all students in Canada would be given an opportunity to benefit from 10,000 scholarships of $1,000 apiece. This promise was made in each subsequent election campaign. Surely some of that money can be used in overcoming the problem of summer unemployment.

In conclusion, I urge the house to start thinking about people as human beings for once and to stop trying to shuffle them around and regiment them as though they were only figures in a ledger. I suggest a good place to start would be with our young people. A practical and effective program for the young Canadian job seeker would be the best way of starting. I will have no hesitation in supporting the motion of non-confidence which is before the house at the present time.

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in the debate on the motion and the amendment thereto because it gives me an opportunity to discuss in depth the housing policies that this government has failed to present, as well as those policies that are conducive to a climate of full employment and economic growth.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, you will recall that I made some remarks about the task force on housing and raised the hackles of some government members when I suggested that the report was a colossal fraud on the Canadian public and an outrageous expenditure of time, effort and money to underline for Canadians something they already knew, namely, that we have a housing crisis in Canada and that the federal government should take the role of leadership in attempting to solve it. The disappointing feature of the report of the task force on housing and urban development is that it constituted a position of "stand-patism" by the government. It retained old methods of financing and fixing interest rates and continued to ignore the groups that need help the most, namely, our senior citizens and those in the lower income brackets.

The recommendations in the report to the effect that public housing would be held up in order to conduct research into economic, social and psychological issues and that no further projects would be undertaken until the study was completed and, further, that urban renewal would be stopped until housing starts increased, came as shocking news not only to the members of this party but to all interested and concerned groups across the country. When we heard the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson), in reply to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), say that he would study, and that was all, the recommendation regarding abatement of the sales tax, it reinforced our thinking that little or nothing would be done in this session to solve the housing crisis.

When one reads the report of the task force on housing and its declaration of principle that every Canadian should be entitled to clean, warm shelter as basic human right, certainly one is touched. When one reads the statement of the Canadian Welfare Council declaring that all Canadians have the right to be adequately housed whether or not they can afford it, again this principle is underlined. We in the New Democratic party state that housing is a basic necessity of life similar to education and medical services, and that all Canadians are entitled to decent housing, whether they can afford it or not. It would appear that most Canadians are in agreement with these general basic rights, and this brings up the question: Why the shortage of housing today?

I am going to enumerate very shortly five reasons which I put before hon. members for their consideration. First of all, the housing shortage, I submit, is due to the failure of the government to accept the leadership role in housing. In the past the government has played the role of the friendly banker only and has sheltered under the umbrella of the constitutional defence in order to take little or no action in this important field.

Second, the government has failed to assess our national housing needs and to ensure adequate financing. It appears quite obvious that the minister was far more successful in twisting the arms of the military in regard to integration than he has been in twisting the arms of the financial community in regard to adequate housing.

The third reason is the failure of the government and its policies to control interest rates. Yesterday I heard the Leader of the Opposition urge the government not to lift the ceiling on interest rates, which does appear to be the attitude and aim of the government, and I am wondering just how high interest rates can go. At the present time the government rate is 9⅜ per cent and conventional rates range between 9½ and 10 per cent.

My fourth reason is the failure of the initiatives, incentives and policies of the government in regard to public housing, urban renewal, senior citizens housing, co-op housing, and special housing projects for our Eskimos and Indians. The failure of the government to enunciate its policies in this connection was underlined at the federal-provincial conference last year, and in the meatime the government has taken little or no further action.

My fifth reason is the failure of the government to develop a social conscience toward the need for adequate housing. The government's selfish and limited view that housing should be regarded only as an economic regulator or as a private profit-making industry has caused some stress and shortage in the housing field. These, Mr. Speaker, are the five main reasons for the failure of the housing policies of the government in Canada today.

• (4:00 p.m.)

The report makes many recommendations, most of which will have to be implemented by municipal and provincial governments. However, some of them could form the basis of a federal housing policy, and the government ought to act on those immediately.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

One may ask what the New Democratic party would do to solve housing problems if it were in a position to do so, and I shall tell hon. members some of the steps we would take. Hon. members will recall that the report of the task force on housing says that the housing needs of most Canadians ought to be met through the private market. The past performance of the private market shows that it can only meet the needs of about two-thirds of our people. The other third cannot buy homes because of high land costs, high material costs and high interest rates. They are left to the four winds of heaven when it comes to housing. Roughly one-third of our population cannot afford houses. We in the New Democratic party say that all Canadians ought to be entitled to houses as a matter of right. Housing is a basic human right, and whether or not a man can afford a house he is entitled to be housed.

We submit that 250,000 new homes ought to be built in 1969 if we are to take care of present needs and the housing shortage which has accumulated throughout previous years. The Economic Council of Canada said in its report that we ought to build 200,000 homes a year, that we need 190,000 homes a year to take care of present needs and 10,000 to replace older homes which need to be torn down. Yet the record of this government in the housing field has not been too good. In 1966 about 134,000 homes were built, in 1967 the figure was 164,000, and in 1968 it was 196,000. It is obvious that Canada has a shortage of approximately 150,000 homes. That is why our target for new homes for this year is 250,000.

The New Democratic party would ensure, through legislative measures if necessary, that a steady flow of money from financial institutions is made available to meet our housing needs. Many financial institutions have not been investing in mortgages but in other fields. The housing report indicates that insurance companies invest 50 per cent of their funds in mortgages, trust and loan companies 60 per cent, banks 3.3 per cent, and pension funds 9 per cent.

Recent statements by insurance companies show they are reluctant and hesitant to invest in mortgages. There is no assurance that they will in fact invest in the mortgage field. We ought to make certain that an adequate proportion of the funds available from financial investment portfolios is applied to the mortgage field. Financial institutions ought to invest more of their funds in mortgages. At present 42 per cent of the moneys needed for community investment in housing comes from private financial institutions. Forty per cent of housing costs are met through down payments and other means of private financing, with the government meeting the other 18 per cent. We feel that the contribution of 18 per cent by the government ought to be increased to at least 25 per cent.

The report indicates that the government is satisfied with the 42 per cent supplied by private financial institutions. We are not satisfied with that figure and we do not think that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), by exerting gentle persuasion on the financial institutions, can ensure a steady flow of moneys into the mortgage market. I say that because of past performances we have witnessed. The minister invited representatives from a number of private financial institutions to Ottawa not long ago, the idea being to persuade them to invest more money in housing. He did not persuade them and in September had to obtain $170 million from the Canadian people to invest in housing. Our performance in housebuilding has not resulted from the performance of our financial institutions; it has resulted from government initiative in this field.

The New Democratic party also feels that churches, trade unions and other social organizations should be asked to harness their financial resources to help our nation's human needs. The National Housing Act has performed poorly in supplying homes for our senior citizens. Too little housing falling within the limited dividend category has been built. I am disappointed with the record of the churches. Their contribution toward the financing of homes has been poor. I am also disappointed with the performance of our trade unions in this field. They have made too little money available for housing. All these organizations ought to take a far more active part in this field in the future than they have taken in the past.

Present-day interest rates are nothing less than usurious. Interest rates are determined, apparently, by what the market can bear and not by the supply of money. I recall attending a symposium in Toronto set up by the former minister of labour, Mr. Nicholson. We heard Mr. David Mansen, one-time president of C.M.H.C., say that in this country mortgage money has never been in short supply. He said Canadian financial institutions have money flowing out of their ears. High interest rates have tended to limit borrowing. Many of our institutions have priced themselves out of the market by asking for too much interest on loans. In short, people are just not buying.

The New Democratic party says that no Canadian ought to pay more than 5 per cent or 6 per cent interest on any mortgage loan. If any Canadian must pay more than 5 or 6 per cent on his mortgage we submit the government ought to subsidize the home owner by an amount equal to 50 per cent of the extra interest the home owner has to pay. Such a provision ought to apply to homes up to $25,000 in value. If a man had to pay 10 per cent on a first mortgage the government would pay half the difference between 6 per cent and 10 per cent, or 2 per cent. Economists say that such a program would cost the government only $50 million to $60 million a year, an insignificant amount when we consider the $1.5 billion we spend on defence every year.

Of course, our high interest rates are in part also caused by our fixed rate of exchange. It is said that high interest rates attract foreign capital to this country. Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, that very little foreign capital entering Canada is applied to the housing field at the present time. I think it will be conceded by some that we ought to have a floating exchange rate. At any rate, that is our party's position on the question of interest rates.

High land costs have been and still are a significant factor in housing costs in Canada. The policies of this government have encouraged land speculation. At the same time the government ignored the recommendations of the Carter commission with regard to taxing capital gains. When I heard a Conservative member ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) this afternoon about the possibility of the government introducing a capital gains tax, and say that this was a preposterous idea, I wondered whether he was expressing the opinion of some of the members from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia where there are areas of great poverty. How do those members feel about a capital gains tax? We in the New Democratic party feel it is necessary to propose such a tax in order to cut down on land speculation.

We in the New Democratic party also feel that a land bank is necessary. The government should use huge amounts of money to acquire land and make it available to cities and other municipalities which, in co-operation with their planning departments, would be able to establish regular building schemes to take care of their particular needs.

Our party's insistence on the setting up a Crown building corporation is one of the striking features that separates us from the other parties. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that during the debate on the drug bill one of our main planks was the setting up of a corporation to manufacture a certain number of drugs in order to stimulate a competitive price situation in which Canadians could get drugs at a reasonable cost.

We feel that a Crown building corporation should be established to specialize in senior citizens housing, public housing and research. Very little or no research is being done in the building field at present. We must take government action to set up a research department to incorporate all the new building techniques and materials into a building scheme. Private builders have neither the time, the money nor the inclination to develop this field. To say the least, their attitude with regard to public housing and senior citizens housing has been discouraging. This is why there is a shortage of housing for our low income groups and senior citizens. We propose the immediate establishement of a Crown building corporation to take care of these needs. We do so because it will require a large corporation to assume this responsibility and to get away from the row upon row of strawberry boxes that some builders erect nowadays.

When I read the recommendations of the task force on housing with regard to urban renewal and public housing it made me feel sad to think that a group of people could travel across the country, spend a few days in various cities, and come up with such recommendations. The task force recommended that no public housing projects should be continued until a full study is made of the social, economic and psychological factors involved in public housing. This totally ignores the successful public housing projects that have been undertaken in Great Britain and other European countries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. member continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

Mr. Gilbert: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, I shall take only about two minutes to conclude. The government's attitude to public housing is disappointing, to say the least. It is directly contrary to the trends that prevail in Great Britain and other European countries, and directly contrary to the policies enunciated by the United States.

The task force described public housing developments as ghettos. I say that was a wrong conclusion for it to reach. I have here a statement issued by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities which says:

—the Federation wishes to make clear that:

—sweeping generalizations to the effect that public housing is a ghetto (in Canada) and that the majority of public housing residents are unhappy and dissatisfied with this form of housing assistance are without foundation;

—to deplore the high cost (per unit) of public housing projects and to conclude from this that less costly public housing only should be approved and financed by the public purse (through elimination of "trimmings", by providing fewer complementary amenities, etc.) is to move in the reverse direction to that which should and must be followed if public housing is to continue to exist in our arsenal of housing policies;

The task force's recommendation that urban renewal projects not be continued until an increase in the housing stock is available is also discouraging. It gives the impression that any urban renewal scheme involves the bulldozer approach, that a bulldozer goes in and knocks down all the homes in the area. This is not so. In fact, in my riding only part of an urban renewal area was treated in this way and loans were made available to the remaining home owners so they could improve their homes. To give the false impression that the bulldozer approach has always been applied and has produced bad results is again disgusting and disappointing.

I have had only a short time to set forth some of my criticisms of the report made by the task force and some of the policies that we in the New Democratic party would put into effect. I have not covered them all and I hope that shortly I will be able to spell them out more fully.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Marchand (Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Mr. Speaker, all my life I have been interested in the unemployment problems, at first as a union man, then as Minister of Manpower and Immigration and now as minister designate of regional development.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

I have studied unemployment problems affecting not only Canada, but other countries such as England, France, Holland, Germany and Italy. I have tried to find out how various governments attempted to deal with this plight afflicting our economic systems, especially our free economies and even those which are somewhat less free.

Like everyone else, I realized that, among the many types of government, whether they be socialist, liberal, conservative or even coalition, the only people offering an effective solution to the unemployment problem are those who are not in power, that is the opposition. This is true not only here in Canada, but in every other country. The opposition has adequate solutions. But naturally, once in office, they are faced with the same difficulties and, understandably, the solutions prove to be more difficult. In fact, I can very well understand the position of the opposition and I know what I would say if I were sitting across from here.

Ever since Confederation, the unemployment situation has been a continuous problem in Canada. The different governments have tried various methods to solve it. Attempts have been made to provide equal employment opportunities from Halifax to Vancouver and in Newfoundland, since it joined the Confederation. Mr. Speaker, the first step taken was to build railroads to join the eastern and western parts of the country in the hope of eliminating regional disparities and of creating new jobs. This was intended to achieve full employment.

We came to realize that this very generous and even brilliant idea of the Fathers of Confederation did not allow them to achieve the purposes they had intended. Then came the 1929 recession combined with unemployment which lasted from 1930 to 1940. In short it was only the war which made it possible to solve the chronic unemployment problem in Canada. An attempt was then made to discover new ways.

Following the report of the Rowell-Sirois commission, it was advanced that through a better distribution of the tax basis, and a larger share of the revenues to the provinces, we would no doubt restore that balance which was inexistent in our country and which was responsible for the development of certain areas and lack of it in others.

After a few years, we came to realize that even that formula was not satisfactory. It is then that the governments—Conservative as well as Liberal—tried to set up special programs.

An attempt was made to create bodies which would enable us to restore the much sought after balance, which would reduce unemployment and which would mainly eliminate seasonal unemployment. All sorts of programs were developed, ARDA, FRED, PFRA in Western Canada and, special programs for the Maritimes. We endeavoured with all sorts of programs to alleviate regional disparities and seasonal unemployment, even to create a state of nearly full employment. After all these experiments, all these efforts, we realize that we have not yet struck at the root of evil since it still persists.

The situation is not perhaps as desperate as it was described. Of course, when one person who wants to work is unemployed it is a tragedy, but when 300,000 persons are involved it is a greater tragedy yet. However, if we admit that in an economy such as ours, a 3 per cent unemployment rate is acceptable, then a 4.7 per cent unemployment rate is not a tragedy for the country as a whole, in view of the excessive unemployment which prevails in the Maritimes and in the province of Quebec.

The tragedy exists in the Maritimes and in the Quebec area, below Trois-Rivières. A real human tragedy exists there and I agree with the opposition on that point. But I do not believe all the alarming statements made yesterday in this house are well-founded as regards the rest of Canada, where there is of course unemployment and underemployment, but where the situation has not yet reached the proportions of a crisis.

The efforts made have not proved satisfactory. The establishment of the Atlantic Development Board has undoubtedly been of great assistance, but that agency was also unable to solve the problem in the Maritimes.

It was therefore essential to find something else and that is what we have been striving at since the government asked us to look after regional development. And I say "us", as I was not the only one concerned, since efforts were made by the whole department. This is not simply a matter of creating a department with a reference to regional development in its name, but mainly of considering the passing of new legislation, of a new policy, in order to solve the problems that have proved until now unsolvable in spite of the willingness shown by the various governments that dealt with them.

There have been fragmentary efforts, such as the creation of DEVCO, to cope with underemployment and unemployment in a particular area of this country. There was the DOSCO experience, with the co-operation of the government of Nova Scotia, to prevent the situation from deteriorating, and the experience was a worthy one. But in spite of all those efforts, of unequal value, unemployment still exists in Canada.

I tried to go through the laws we are now administering. There is for instance the industrial development legislation, enabling us to promote industrial development in certain designated areas.

This law has been useful in the past but everybody realizes today its defects and its shortcomings.

For example, some cities that are relatively prosperous are located in a designated area and can get grants from the federal government.

The reverse situation is also possible. Indeed cities that suffer from economic depression cannot get grants from the federal government, because the area in which they are located cannot be designated.

We know that several millions were wasted in some areas of the country because our policies were inadequate. It was an experiment and if we had to do the whole thing over again, we would certainly not make the same mistakes. And here, I am referring to all the governments, because such attempts were sincere. When some hon. members state dramatically in this house that the government never did anything to fight unemployment, that it was not concerned about the jobless, they are indulging somewhat in demagogy. If they tell us, however, that it is not perfect, that the instruments are not sufficient and that the effort is not big enough, this I will concede immediately. This is what we shall attempt to do.

If the government is accused of doing absolutely nothing about unemployment and the unemployed, this looks more like demagogy than like serious argumentation.

No doubt remains when one studies the progress of social security in Canada and when one examines our whole social legislation. All this is intended to protect the workers against the possibility of unemployment, of disease and against the risks of life, in general. All the same, the situation in 1969 is different from what it was 25, 30 or 50 years ago.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

Governments have passed a great number of laws, and labour is no doubt better protected today than it used to be. However, things are still far from perfect and will probably never be. I therefore share the fears of the opposition.

I do admit it might be possible, now, to improve the situation. So, how are we going to tackle this new regional development? I think our attitude is going to be slightly different from that of the federal government, so far, whether Conservative or Liberal.

Our efforts will probably aim—I am not referring to the possible content of a bill, but to some ideas that sometimes come into my mind—at developing centres of growth rather than expanding our resources in a huge area, at the risk of losing them. We should indeed try to concentrate our resources so as to provide each and every area, with poles of growth towards which those who seek employment would normally be attracted.

For instance, I find it absolutely unbelievable that almost all the Maritimes should be designated areas, except Halifax and a few other centres such as Dartmouth-Halifax and St. John, which had a normal trend toward development. Those cities were the only ones to be denied government grants for industrial development.

The same thing is happening in the province of Quebec. One of the most important human communities in the Quebec area, I mean the city of Quebec, is not developing though it is the natural center of a huge area that extends as far as the Lower St. Lawrence region. But the city of Quebec cannot benefit from the subsidies granted by the federal government.

The situation is the same for several other cities in the Maritimes, and in Newfoundland, of course. That explains the delay. We are seeking a new philosophy, to see if there may not be new ways of putting an end to unemployment in Canada or, at least, of reducing it, and seeing to it that its impact on human beings is not as severe as it has been in the past. I doubt that these will be magic measures.

I read the speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) in which he says: At last, we have the formula. I know the Progressive Conservative program, and I admit it has some good points. However, I feel that the Leader of the Opposition is being very optimistic when he is so sure that those measures will produce the results he mentions. If it were possible, I would put him in office for three months to try out his formulas, after which time we might be able to have a more objective discussion. But, in any event, we will not run that risk. If that is the result of progressive-conservative party thinking, so much the better. I am even willing to use as a source of inspiration the good ideas suggested by the opposition. But, I doubt that anyone has found the magic formula, especially in Canada, which is a huge country, and very difficult to govern.

Some claim that a speedier or stronger intervention on the part of the State could put an end to unemployment. I should like to ask Mr. Wilson, the Prime Minister of England, how he managed to solve the unemployment problem in the United Kingdom, because, at the time of the monetary crisis he was forced, no less, to create systematic unemployment in England. I do not blame him. He was forced to do it and I suppose any other responsible government would have had to take similar steps. However, we know that Mr. Wilson's speeches, when he was a member of the opposition and told the government how to put an end to unemployment in England, and those he delivers now as head of the government, are different. It is the same man, undoubtedly as honest and as intelligent in both cases, but he is now faced with difficulties, and he does what he can.

One can accuse the government of not having found the magic formula and, I think, rightly, because we have not found it. But we cannot be accused of not making the necessary efforts to solve that problem.

I do not intend to speak of considerable economic planning, or to establish far-reaching programs which would apply from Halifax to Vancouver, to create in our country prosperity and growth on a permanent basis. However, I intend, when the department is created, to introduce in the house new measures which will enable us to grapple more realistically with that crucial and fundamental problem which has not yet been solved.

Partial attempts were made when I was Minister of Manpower. We amended the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act so as to be able to look after a new type of unemployed, the technological unemployed laid off because there are no more jobs for them. Not only that, but their trades are no longer useful in a modern economy.

So the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act was amended in such a way as to make it a lot more generous than the previous one. The new act enables a worker to be retrained, but as the honourable member for York South (Mr. Lewis) said, a single piece of legislation is not enough to check unemployment. It is true that the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act does not systematically fight unemployment. It is rather aimed at fighting one type of unemployment and, even within that type, a given category of unemployed, namely those who can be retrained or rehabilitated.

It is a partial solution. We have never suggested that we could put an end to unemployment through this measure, but it has enabled us to rehabilitate thousands of Canadian workers who would have been not only unemployed but also unskilled. If we have succeeded through that legislation, Mr. Speaker, in giving new hope to 25,000, 30,000 or 50,000 Canadian workers, that legislation will have achieved its aim. I feel that instead of trying to downgrade it, we should endeavour to improve it and make it more efficient, in order that it may achieve its object. But once again, such legislation was never meant to put an end to unemployment in Canada. Whoever makes such a statement has never read it.

To my knowledge, no hon. member on this side of the house has suggested—

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Would the minister permit a question? Do I understand the minister is suggesting that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) was attempting to pull down the manpower retraining program when he suggested it was inadequate to deal with the broader problem of unemployment?

[Translation]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I only say that the hon. member for York South has been very hard on this legislation and on the former Manpower Department which, he says, has not succeeded in eliminating unemployment in Canada. I cannot refer precisely to his text, but that is what I can remember from it.

Not even the Manpower Department is intended to fight general unemployment in Canada.

My new department will have a much greater opportunity to achieve that end. The Department of Manpower has employment and rehabilitation services. The only program which really grappled with seasonal employment, was the winter works program. The other branches of the department are not at all engaged or trying to remedy the situation —it is not their function nor their purpose. However, the necessary instruments to fight that particular type of unemployment and to rehabilitate the workers are available to the department.

An attack against that legislation or the department once again would be of no avail because we have to consider unemployment as it is. If we want to fight it, not only one measure but a series of measures have to be introduced. First of all there is the kind of unemployment which is due to a lack of general growth in the country and which can be, I confess, the result of the general policy of the government, of its financial, fiscal or public expenditures policy. This is the unemployment phenomenon which, at a given time, appears all accross the country.

I believe the problems to be real at that level but I do not think that the situation could be described as a tragedy. The tragedy lies in the field of seasonal and regional unemployment which prevails especially the Maritimes, in eastern Quebec, in northern Ontario, in the northern part of the western provinces. These areas are really confronted with serious problems. We are trying to come up with and develop formulas which might alleviate this kind of pernicious unemployment, which will not go away in spite of all our efforts, and which of course is a source of tremendous problems for those who are affected by it.

What we will try to do with this new department is to think in new terms the whole philosophy of regional development in our country.

I cannot promise the house we are going to work wonders, but I can give it the assurance that we shall make serious efforts. In fact, we shall bring radical changes, for certain laws, well thought out at the outset, are no longer effective and some of them were even detrimental in some way to the workers.

For instance, the industrial development legislation, or ARDA, has often been used to bring about excessive development in some industrial fields, the result of which was to saturate the market and create an unemployment problem that we cannot solve anymore. There are therefore defects to be corrected and we are aware of that.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

I hope that within two weeks, as was mentioned by the house leader, we shall be able to introduce in this house the new legislation concerning rural development. I also hope that, before next spring, we shall have a more precise, more adequate legislation, so as to be able to abolish regional disparities especially and provide all the citizens of this country with equal employment opportunities and almost equal opportunities to increase their income. Such is the goal we set ourselves and are efficiently trying to reach, I hope, and we even count on the support of the opposition, if they really want to help the workers, as they say they do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before the house is not intended, as some hon. members might think, to express the opinions of the opposition only or for the sake of opposition. It is recognized that a serious problem exists both by us and the government members. With this thought in mind, I think that our joint consideration of this situation should be adequate proof for all members that, as members of the opposition, we realize the extent of our responsibilities and I hope that we will be able to participate efficiently in the administration of the country.

As I listened to the remarks of the minister, I felt that once this new department is established, we will be in a position to improve the present situation in a remarkable way. We will be glad to welcome this new minister and I think that yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Stanfield) was asking for the establishment of this department as soon as possible. We all agree that if this legislation were presented within the next few days, we would gladly approve it as we feel that it would prove most beneficial to the workers.

• (4:40 p.m.)

Mr. Speaker, yesterday I heard the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) say, that we will not achieve anything through lamentations and complaints. I quite agree with him, but since we have certain measures to propose and are in favour, the implementation of some projects, I think it would be improper to keep silent and to ignore the present difficult circumstances.

The arguments of the minister were somewhat weak. Indeed, he simply gave me the impression that he was pleased with the present situation, in view of the particularly difficult years we are now going through.

[Mr. Marchand (Langelier).]

To my mind, the motion for a debate on this urgent problem leads us to recognizing the existence of a need and of a danger.

As for the argument of the Minister of Labour yesterday, to the effect that we have known more difficult times, I take the liberty of questioning that. Of course we have known more difficult times, but is that any reason for getting used to this intolerable situation? He gave us figures on unemployment, but as they seem to apply more to years past than to the present, I feel that we were justified in asking for a debate.

Indeed, this debate has a double object, that of recognizing not only that the situation is difficult, but also of finding solutions to unemployment, for in December there were 373,000 unemployed, that is 20,000 more than at the same time last year.

In January 1968, there were 464,000 unemployed and at the present rate of increase there will be about 500,000 unemployed this month. And the worst thing is that 164,000 married men are now without work, that is 18,000 more than last year. In the category of the most productive workers, that is the workers between 20 and 60 years of age, the number of unemployed reaches 300,000. As for those who have been unemployed for over three months, there are 100,000 of them.

In Ontario, unemployment decreased by 4,000 while it has increased by 26,000 in Quebec. The rate of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces was 7 per cent, compared to 6.8 per cent in Quebec and 3 per cent in Ontario. The increase in the number of persons employed in Ontario was 103,000, in the Prairies, 60,000 and in British Columbia, 43,000.

The government must recognize that the rate of unemployment in the province of Quebec remains at a higher level than elsewhere. Several workers in that province will continue to feel the effects of economic discrimination. It is obvious that the students of that province who could not find work had reasons to protest by organizing demonstrations.

This is a national problem, in Quebec as well as in the Atlantic provinces; and as long as the federal government does not show any concern about it, the parties which suggest sensible answers will have a better chance of winning the support of the people.

The situation in Quebec the plight of the Atlantic farmers, rural poverty and manpower retraining, such are the problems which deserve a priority they have certainly been denied under the present government however serious these problems may be.

In the province of Quebec, a huge amount of the provincial revenue is allocated to the reform of the school system. That makes sense as long as enough jobs are provided to keep up with the growing labour force. The effort toward education reduces the funds available to meet the needs of agriculture and to fight rural poverty.

That is the reason why the federal government should acknowledge the serious situation in which a great number of Canadians living in Quebec and in the Maritimes find themselves.

Perhaps the situation could have been improved if some commitments had been respected to a certain extent.

Were we told the truth, three or four months ago, when the public was made to believe that the economic situation was sound and when there was talk about a very urgent need to stabilize the budget and about co-operative federalism.

As for co-operative federalism, we are indeed obliged today to reproach the present government with having neglected to co-operate with the provinces.

It was decided, for example, to cancel the winter works program, but today, the increase in unemployment during the winter months shows clearly that putting an end to that program increases considerably the number of unemployed, particularly in the province of Quebec. Indeed, in a brief that was sent to all hon. members, the Canadian Federation of Mayors admits openly that the cancellation of the winter program creates a very thorny problem for several municipalities.

I remember asking the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) if the provinces had been consulted, and I was told simply that the provinces should have expected it. But, in fact, the provinces were not ready, because the municipalities had not been consulted. It was quite well known that the budgets had been prepared on the basis of these subsidies and all of a sudden the municipalities are deprived of every hope, because a lot of works are cancelled by this very fact.

I admit with the present government that this winter works program was not perfect, because it would have been necessary, I think, to select these works properly by accepting only those that were absolutely needed, such as the construction of municipal buildings and certain public utility works. But to go as far as refusing all these works, that was another matter. We must recognize, if we are objective, that the cancellation of this program increased the rate of unemployment, particularly in our province and in the rest of Canada.

I should like also to say a word about housing, mainly about the report which was tabled yesterday. It is all very well to talk about home building in Canada, but it must be kept in mind that under the existing legislation, the interest rate charged by the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation represents a very serious problem for the people who have an irregular or average income.

The new legislation on housing provides for bigger loans and for an extension of payments over a longer period. This is not, in my opinion, the kind of measure likely to help the citizen with an average income. Let us be objective, let us recognize that it is absolutely necessary to abolish the 11 per cent tax on building materials so as to make the building costs of a house a little more acceptable. If wage-earners with an average income are not assured of a suitable interest rate, they will be unable to secure loans. In fact, anyone who earns $6,000, $7,000, $8,000 or $9,000 cannot borrow at more than 5 or 6 per cent and I think that the government would benefit by giving him a rebate proportionate, of course, to his income.

This is one way of doing it. I am sure there are many others because I am suggesting one at the moment. In this way we could get the economy going again in the housing field and check any adverse effects which might be felt in the forthcoming year.

As to the report which was tabled yesterday by the minister, it simply reflects the recommendations of the Canada Economic Council. This report was already discussed today in some editorials which recognize that the suggested solutions are not terribly new. However I am thinking of that very important rebate and of that 11 per cent tax which should be abolished. These are concrete measures which might promote housing. When we refer to housing in Canada, we know that many things are connected with that field which has a tremendous effect on our Canadian economy.

• (4:50 p.m.)

Those are suggestions. I do not want to take up the time of the house by merely criticizing and accusing the governments that have done nothing. I am not among those who think governments do nothing, but I believe that all together we can do more and do better.

I already dealt with the possibility of enabling the farmers to benefit from cheaper labour through the help of Unemployment Insurance offices. At the present time we are paying people to do nothing on account of our unemployment insurance system and the farmer needs workers of one kind during certain periods of the year and of another kind during the whole year.

That would enable him, I believe, to get cheaper labour, while the government would not have to pay a cent more. Whenever one requests something of the government, he can always be answered in the following way: who is going to pay?

We know of working people earning $50 per week while some others who are not working are paid weekly benefits of $50. It is important to make our population and our unemployed people productive. I thought farmers could pay a sum equal to the unemployment insurance benefits, thereby helping someone willing to work for a reasonable salary. As a matter of fact, a worker would get double what he is getting unemployment insurance benefits without the government paying a single cent. Thus, the producer's or the farmer's production costs would be lower and the consumer would benefit by it.

Another idea comes to my mind that I should like to offer as a suggestion to the government in order to have them adopt helpful measures for the population.

Unemployment Insurance offices were centralized, which to my mind does not lead, at least in my constituency, to the expected results and complaints were made as to that. Reasons of economy were given and perhaps justifiably so. As for the service given, it is obvious that it is very poor at the present time. Actually, how can you expect unemployed people to make long distance telephone calls or to travel 25 or 30 miles in order to collect their benefits?

I will give you some facts. In my riding, people are now compelled to go to St. Jerome. On the other hand, Sorel residents, though not residing in my riding, have to travel to Longueuil.

In my opinion, these regulations are not very impressive, but they would be very useful to the unemployed. This policy should be re-examined in order to assist the unemployed who are eligible to benefits and the employers who are often in need of information.

In spite of all, let us hope Canadians will not become disenchanted. They could easily lose faith because, in the course of an election campaign, the bright prospect of a just society was held out to them, but today's reality is a far cry in relation to what they had hoped for.

There have been talks of a department of regional development and it is still a current topic. Such a department was to bring about important advantages for the people.

There were discussions about an economic situation that was seemingly quite healthy but it was immediately realized that there were some problems to be solved.

Three or four months ago, it was felt that things were not quite right. Our friends would not admit it then, but now the Minister is finding out that problems do exist. He also agrees that solutions are not always easy to come by and that the members of the opposition seem to know what should be done.

We do not propose to offer magic solutions or to have all the answers to the present problems, far from it! However, we acknowledged the problem, four months ago, though the government members denied it. That is why the people are disappointed. The fleeting dream is becoming more and more of a nightmare. They cannot help feeling that way, for, no later than yesterday night, we were told about the closing, in Montreal, of "Terre des Hommes" because of growing difficulties. This decision, made by the responsible authorities, will probably cause more unemployment for the city of Montreal.

Will the federal government do something about it? The question was asked this afternoon. The right honourable Prime Minister's view seems to be that this does not fall under federal jurisdiction. But why should not the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin) invite those concerned to discuss some kind of master plan to try to find an answer that would be acceptable to the federal and provincial governments and to the city of Montreal.

After all, we must admit that the city of Montreal has some bearing on the economy of Canada.

As a matter of fact, there are over 56 members from Quebec in the government and a good number of them represent the city of Montreal. I appeal to all hon. members from Quebec to take a look at this increase of 26,000 unemployed they have now in their province. All the government members from Quebec should consider the situation and I would be only too glad to co-operate the best I can. The province of Quebec is entitled to be adequately represented and the federal members should do everything in their power to compel the party in power to give special consideration to their province.

It has often been said that the situation of Quebec is different, but it is hard to have it recognized in practice. Unemployment, however, is acknowledged as a special problem. In my opinion, the federal members from Quebec have every right to tackle this very serious matter.

Yesterday, for instance, I was listening to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) when he said that were the opportunity given to him of investing a million dollars in Quebec, he would be glad to do so, since the last elections have proved beyond any doubt that the overwhelming majority of the French and English-speaking people of the province of Quebec wanted to stay in Confederration.

I was very glad to hear the Minister of Labour express that view. However, we should co-operate through a better representation and by passing laws which will affect not only the province of Quebec but Canada as a whole. Better legislative measures should be adopted in order to satisfy a province which surely has needs just like every other one.

Mr. Speaker, allow me, in closing, to recall the words—with which I fully agree—of the Leader of the Opposition when he said that the motion before us was meant to prove to the government members that we also recognize the difficulties, that our interventions were designed to solve a situation which cannot be allowed to last.

This proposal asks the government, on behalf of the Canadian people, to adopt legislative measures which will guarantee the country the rates of growth required to give labour the necessary employment in the future and to reduce the unduly high rate of unemployment.

This was the object of the motion moved yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition, and as far as I am concerned I support it. To the Minister of Labour who said: "We are determined to act," I say we are ready to act, to do more and to do better.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

• (5:00 p.m.)

[English]

Mr. Allen B. Sulatycky (Rocky Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to take part in this debate on economic matters. It has been a good debate up to this point. Several hon. members have attempted to paint a black picture of the economy of Canada. I take exception to many of their comments along this line.

I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lewis) that we cannot treat unemployment callously; we cannot talk of unemployment simply in terms of figures. I agree that there is a human element involved. I also agree with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) and with the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Downey) that there are serious problems affecting western agriculture. I am equally in agreement with what is said by hon. members from the Atlantic provinces when they outline in the house the serious difficulties faced by the people in that part of the country. I can agree also with the point of view expressed by hon. members from Quebec, though I am in accord, too, with what was said by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in his sound analysis yesterday of the situation in that province.

The Leader of the Opposition spoke of the economic problems of Canada and of rural development practically in the same breath. I am somewhat concerned that more and more members should be speaking increasingly of rural development in terms almost synonymous with mass government welfare assistance. The Leader of the Opposition also talked about unemployment in the west and related it to the difficulties in agriculture. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition was revealing his ignorance of the west while at the same time seeking excessive consideration for that part of the country from which he comes. I hope this is not the case but the facts point to this conclusion.

The western part of Canada is not dependent simply upon agriculture although in most parts of that region agriculture is the major element in the economy. Let me draw attention to a few facts to set the record straight. The rate of unemployment on the prairies on December 14, according to the latest available figures, was 3.4 per cent. This was second only to Ontario. In Alberta, I am pleased to say, unemployment was the lowest in Canada at 2.9 per cent. Perhaps some of the hon.

members from that province would inform the Leader of the Opposition of this fact.

The Leader of the Opposition was critical of the government with regard to the rate of growth of our exports, and the volume of exports going to the United States compared with the volume going to other countries. I should like to point out that in my constituency alone within the last few weeks contracts have been signed for the export of more than $1 billion worth of coal to Japan.

How is this correlated with rural development? It is obvious that in Canada there are certain growth areas. It is equally obvious that there are areas where serious economic problems exist. I submit that the concept of rural development must take account not only of current unemployment statistics but of economic potential. Rural development means looking at our areas of strength, not only at our areas of weakness. It may mean moving people into areas of economic strength from areas of economic depression.

If I may go back into history I should like to point out that this is not a new concept to Canadians. While civilization in this country was started by people who were willing to move, willing to travel over distances which were in those days unimaginable in order to start a new economy in another part of the world. The western regions of this country were built up by people who, similarly, were willing to move.

Despite the fact that we are living in a day and age when our population should be more mobile, it is in fact becoming more static. I submit that the government is on the right track when it brings in programs of retraining, programs of adult education, programs which will make our population more mobile. It is a provable fact that a person with less education is less likely to move to areas of greater economic opportunity.

I have touched on the solutions. One of them is the mobility of the labour force. Another is the retraining of the labour force, and a third is the education of our people to higher levels. Perhaps the last two requirements are prerequisite to the first. A fourth solution, and one which I believe this government is following, is the introduction of a system of regional development based on economic potential. It does not make sense to jump ill-prepared into programs which it is hoped will produce long term benefits. I suggest that programs undertaken without sufficient thought fail to produce benefits of this type.

[Mr. Sulatycky.]

Various programs have been undertaken in this country in an effort to bring economic benefits to particular regions. We have resorted to programs which were not sufficiently well thought out, ad hoc programs which failed to produce the long term benefits intended. Most of the programs that we have seen implemented to date in this country have been of minimal lasting benefit. I am pleased that the government is now giving a great deal of thought to methods to correct economic disparity.

• (5:10 p.m.)

The fifth solution to our economic problems, I submit, is to develop the proper attitude and mentality among the people of Canada. I deplore those who erode the confidence of Canadians, those who plant the seeds of doubt, who ask for excessive assistance and who paint a gloomy picture of the present and future of this country. I suggest that these people do a disservice to Canada. If that is what the Leader of the Opposition is attempting to do by moving his motion yesterday, then I congratulate the people of Canada for not voting for him in greater numbers at the polls last June 25.

I have faith in the economic future of this country. I have confidence that the government is contemplating at the present time a reasoned and logical program for regional and economical development, and I am pleased to say that I shall have to vote against the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, as seconder of the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield) I have what I consider to be some pointed remarks to make on the motion which is to be tested by this house tonight.

I listened with interest to the speech of the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand). His speeches are always interesting and his oratorical style always fiery. But what he said seemed to take me back to the days when I sat in this house with some of those who once sat across the way, including the former member for Bonavista-Twillingate, though I was not here when Mr. Howe was in the house. I thought that with a new government and with a just society the minister, especially in view of his labour background, would have had more to say about what could be done in regard to unemployment in this country. I thought he might have dealt with that part of the motion referring to university students entering the labour market. This subject was dealt with by my colleague this afternoon and should definitely have been dealt with by the government.

Another matter that I understand is close to the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development and which certainly involves areas of the country such as the Atlantic provinces and the west coast is shipbuilding and unemployment in our shipyards today. I believe that today a cabinet committee, composed of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Pepin), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer), and I think the Minister of Defence Production (Mr. Jamieson), is meeting the Canadian Shipbuilding Association, and I hope that as a result some policies will be brought forward to arrest the very heavy unemployment existing at present in our shipyards.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has suggested from time to time that our shipyards should be rationalized. I think they have been to as great an extent as possible. I recall that in previous debates in the house I put forward suggestions to assist in formulating a policy to create employment in our shipyards. For example, I suggested that the subsidy on steel trawlers, which has been cut back from 50 to 35 per cent, should be reinstated in the case of fishing companies that are attempting to replace obsolete equipment. Another suggestion concerned something that is done in other countries by way of long term financing and depreciation allowances, and also investment allowances which I believe are made in the United Kingdom. I think the minister might have dealt with these questions, but nevertheless I hope that some policy will be forthcoming at an early date in connection with our shipyards and also the establishment of a merchant marine in this country.

Before I deal with other points, one other mattter that was dealt with by my colleague, the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), was the submission put forward by the Federation of Mayors and Municipalities. I will not go into this question fully in view of the short time I have, but I think the submissions they made, as outlined in their release of December, 1968, bear repetition.

The federation pointed out that the winter works program was discontinued without prior notice to the municipalities. As the brief states, the cancellation was announced without warning 60 days before the commencement of the expected 1968-69 program. The federation points out that it believes a replacement program should be brought forward by the government to deal with, for example, the installation of water mains and other major waterworks projects, the installation of trunk sewers and other sewage collection projects and, third, storm sewer installations. In their brief they suggest that these projects could be implemented by amending the National Housing Act. They further point out that these projects will provide winter employment and that these services are essential in housing construction.

The figures for unemployment in Canada have been related by a number of speakers in this debate. I listened to the speech of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) who put a lot of statistics on the record. I do not intend to duplicate them, but I do think he should have dealt with certain matters and certainly have admitted that there is a serious unemployment problem. I think that the minister of rural development was quite fair in his remarks in this regard.

The minister of rural development should also have seized upon the opportunity today to give the house and especially people in the Atlantic area some idea when his new department will be set up. I know this is subject to the business before the house, but I hope it will be soon because there is a lot of uneasiness in the Atlantic provinces, especially in regard to the Atlantic Development Board. Although we hear stories and rumours about it, I hope that the board will remain a separate entity, that it will continue to do necessary work in our area and not become a sort of advisory board to the minister. What I am afraid of is that the board, which was set up by the previous Conservative government and carried on by the succeeding Liberal government and until this date by the present government, will be lumped together with other boards or with some other branch of the ministry of rural development and in some way become lost. I hope this will not be the case.

The Minister of Labour pointed out that the government, through the offices of the Department of Manpower and Immigration, is going to introduce vocational training for Canadians. I believe in this in the long run, but I think that the remedies that have been proposed should have included assistance for workers in our shipyards during this especially tough winter season. The vocational training schools program introduced by the government which I had the honour to support was very successful. The government paid 75 per cent of the construction costs of such schools in my constituency and the schools have been a godsend. The schools are doing good work in helping to train our youngsters who are leaving high school and our adults who have been working for some time. The government of that day did not introduce that program as a mere housekeeping measure. It introduced it in order to help in the fight against unemployment.

• (5:20 p.m.)

To emphasize the seriousness of the present situation I wish to quote the words of a serious and thoughtful Canadian spoken in 1959 when I was sitting in the seats now occupied by the uneasy. I refer to hon. Paul Martin, who played no small part in the policies of the Liberal party. His remarks are reported on page 2135 of Hansard for March 23, 1959. He was raising his voice on behalf of the unemployed and said:

> I submit there is no problem of greater emergency in our country at this time than the fact that we have almost half a million people out of work. This problem persists in spite of government policy and in spite of government assurances of amelioration.

The difference between the government of that day and the present government is simple. That government had a policy in this field. Today we have no government policy and we have no assurance that the situation will be improved. We have asked the Prime Minister, the Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Labour to indicate what programs this government has to deal with unemployment. So far we have had no indication that any program whatever is to be instituted.

To emphasize once more the seriousness and gravity of the situation I wish to turn once more to the words of that tribune of this nation, hon. Paul Martin, who has recently been elevated to the other place. These words are reported at page 646 of Hansard for February 2, 1960, and are as follows:

> When we talk about this matter—
> Unemployment.
> —we should recognize that the statistics on unemployment are not made up only of figures; they consist of men and women on whom many others depend for their maintenance and welfare.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

That statement was made when the Liberal party had a heart. If the statistics of that day covered men and women, they cover men and women today to no less an extent. They are the same types of men and women who have similar responsibilities. If unemployment was undesirable and a national emergency then, it still is now. Senator Martin recently said:

> Unemployment makes a man seem useless, not wanted, without a country; it makes a man live in fear and from fear springs hate.

Those words apply forcefully today and lead to this question. At what point did widespread unemployment cease to concern members of the party opposite? That question has been asked before, and I ask it again now. The former minister of finance has said on a number of occasions that we can tolerate a certain amount of unemployment as an antidote to inflation. But now we have both unemployment and inflation. We have unemployment because the government has siphoned off too large a portion of the national income from the private sector. The construction industry, which in normal years employs one million Canadians, has been starved by the government because the tax on building materials has put housing beyond the reach of middle-income Canadians.

Right now a tug of war is taking place between the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Finance. It is the public that will suffer or benefit from the result. We shall have to wait and see whether the Minister of Transport and his boys can persuade the cabinet to come over on their side. Although I have never taken sides as between these ministers, I hope the Minister of Transport wins.

The government's policies have produced unemployment. Its incentive destroying taxes have placed enterprise in a strait-jacket.

I share a problem with many other hon. members in that there are homes in my riding where the doors have been darkened by the spectre of unemployment since this government took office. Across the less-favoured regions of this vast nation gallop the twin spectres of unemployment and inflation. They are two horsemen of the Apocalypse and are hotly pursued by the third horseman, the former secretary of state who has written a book. I apologize; I should have said horsewoman. Her work is a valuable addition to the library of Liberal literature. We had Walter Gordon's contribution, "Troubled Canada", and now we have the postscript describing the cabinet as a gilded cage. But the present cabinet is a cage without gilding.

In this country unemployment is higher than last year; 20,000 more people are unemployed than at the same time last year. At present 164,000 married men are without work, 18,000 more than last year. This is serious. Those in their most productive years, between 20 and 60, form one of our largest groups of unemployed. In that group 300,000 people are unemployed. That is serious. Those who have been unemployed for more than three months now number almost 100,000. That is very serious.

I wish to talk about the Atlantic provinces now. The labour force in the Atlantic provinces declined by about 5 per cent, yet unemployment has risen by 3,000. That represents a total loss of 8,000 jobs over last year. Figures for Ontario, Quebec, and other parts of Canada have already been quoted. It is clear that the policies of the present government have not succeeded in removing regional disparities. Instead, they have accentuated them. Many of us recall the bright words of hope uttered by the Prime Minister in the Atlantic provinces during the election campaign. He promised us a Marshall plan. We do not know what that plan is. I suppose we shall have to wait until the minister responsible for regional development tells us about it. We wish to see policies introduced that will bring our employment levels up to those enjoyed by the rest of Canada and our income levels up to those enjoyed by provinces like Ontario, British Columbia and some others.

I have already dealt with subsidies for vessels. Since the subsidy for the construction of wooden fishing vessels was discontinued the Atlantic region has suffered from greatly increasing unemployment. The government should have maintained subsidies of between 35 and 50 per cent on the cost of constructing wooden fishing vessels. The government's action has serious crippled our maritime shipping industry. I hope the government will implement policies that will help shipbuilding in Canada generally and in the Atlantic region in particular. I think the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Davis) probably would agree that such subsidies are a good idea and would help the fishing industry. It could well be said that this government has presided over the liquidation of the Atlantic fishing industry. Certainly the closing of the Newfoundland outports has been a serious blow leading to the liquidation of a way of life going back 300 years.

Another point I wish to raise, which was dealt with by the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle), is that the government has adopted policies which have led to eastern Canadian farmers being driven off their lands and into the welfare offices of the cities. Although the government has been told repeatedly of the plight of our farmers its reaction has been that there is no problem. The government's actions in this field have led to large-scale unemployment.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has set up regional desks to deal with regional problems and to keep him fully informed. Not long ago a Toronto member was reported as saying, with reference to these regional desks, that Liberal members of parliament now might as well stay home, smoke their cigarettes—unless these have been banned in the meantime by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Munro)—put their feet up on their desks and draw their salaries because these people manning the regional desks would be telling the Prime Minister what to do in the various areas. One can only conclude that it is time to clear out some of these desks because apparently the people behind them are not telling the Prime Minister the facts, or he is not interested.

The government is cannibalizing the Canadian economy to further abstract schemes which have failed to produce any benefits whatsoever. The government, by its vast, unco-ordinated expenditures is battening on the economy like a giant parasite, taking far more out than it is putting in. Where are the programs of national development? Where is the blueprint for expanding our efforts in the north?

We have been presented with minor programs and projects which cannot even be dignified by the name of policy. Other than that we have had an attitude of hands-off aloofness, a kind of non-policy, a sort of political Fen, which allows the nation to drift while the Prime Minister and his colleagues drift and dream. Drifting and dreaming is their theme song.

A government which in six months has failed to acknowledge much less deal with high interest rates, high taxes, growing inflation and increasing unemployment, cannot be said to have a grasp of the country's problems. As I see it the whole situation can be put in a nutshell. This government, on matters of domestic interest and domestic necessity, just has not done its homework. It has given agriculture no hope. It has given the fisherman no encouragement. It has given industry no incentive. It is a government which has been sleep-walking since June.

During the election campaign we were told that so much would be done. It has not been done yet. We saw pictures of the Prime Minister diving into a pool. I think it is time he and the cabinet came to the surface and acquainted themselves with the real issues of this nation. Canadians are concerned about jobs; they are concerned about paying bills; they are concerned about educating their children; they are concerned about a future holding a hope of security and progress. They are not concerned about slogans, meaningless schemes and headline hunting gestures. That is why this motion has been put forward and why I naturally support it.

In conclusion, sir, may I refer to Hansard for November 21 last year. At that time I referred to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) of the Prime Minister. He asked about the rate of unemployment and what steps the government intended to take to combat unemployment in this country. This is the quotation directly from Hansard of the Prime Minister's reply:

> Mr. Speaker, we had quite lengthy statements on this matter during the budget debate, and we will have a chance to make others on the estimates next week. As you prophesy, I could make a lengthy answer to this question to indicate that this increase in labour force unemployment is due to many factors—

Then he went on to say:

> Actually, Mr. Speaker, I have a lengthy answer here.

I am asking today that the Prime Minister follow up what he said in November last year. Let him dig out his statement and bring it before the House of Commons. Let us hear from the Prime Minister before this debate is concluded.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. J.-A. Mongrain (Trois-Rivières): Mr. Speaker, I should like, for a few minutes, to make a contribution to this debate which has been going on for a few hours.

First, I feel the motion of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), is a good one because it enables us to discuss a problem which certainly concerns the government. I support it, I would even vote for it if only the seven following words were changed, and I quote the English version of the said motion:

[English]

> That this house regrets that the government is not presenting—

I suggest that if those words were taken away and replaced with the following:

> That this house invites the government to present programs to achieve a rate of economic growth which will reduce unemployment and also ensure that the economy will be able to absorb the large number of new entrants into the labour force this year—

I would go for that any time.

[Translation]

I know, Mr. Speaker, that this mania which consists in blaming the government for all the evils of mankind is part of the democratic game, but there are still some cases where it lessens the value of an otherwise constructive suggestion.

Mr. Speaker, I think that economic development concerns not only the federal government, but also every level of government. It is a field where those three levels of government should try to co-ordinate their efforts.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the minister and the house that such a movement has been started in my area, and I am glad to hear the minister say that our area, from Trois-Rivières on, suffered from regional disparities and needed the help of the governments. That is correct.

The mayors of the area I represent as well as those of some surrounding constituencies set up a regional organization a few months ago and developed a common program in order to help the provincial and federal governments fight unemployment and stimulate the economy. That organization, the conference of the mayors of the St. Maurice valley, includes some 85 mayors of the ridings of Trois-Rivières, Champlain, St. Maurice and of part of the riding of Berthier. Some even come from Joliette and from part of the riding of Richelieu, which was in the riding of Nicolet before the new redistribution.

These mayors met and set up a program to create first of all a regional economic development agency or board comprising of course full time experts and which would have sufficient credits to hire the necessary personnel to take efficient and constructive action.

This regional economic development board would require a budget beyond the potential of the municipalities. So, they are about to ask the provincial and federal governments to participate in the preparation of this budget, the proportion of their contribution to be determined later on. The experts suggest, for instance, that the federal government, should provide 40 per cent of the funds, the provincial government 40 per cent also, and the participating municipalities 20 per cent.

That economic development board would, for example, help existing industries. We have noted that some firms were doing badly and, sometimes, had to close their doors. Very often, it was a situation which could have been adjusted if we had been aware that the federal and provincial governments could offer certain services. In fact, some manufacturers might have profited by the assistance of people conversant with those matters.

The board would find additional markets for existing industry. That would apply especially to small industries, which have not always the means to find new markets.

That economic development board intends also to set up a sort of industrial fund, through public subscription. I like the attitude of our mayors who are not always counting on the government for everything, while doing nothing. They are ready to make the first move and to prove that they have confidence in the future of their area. A regional industrial fund, made up through public subscription, would help existing and future businesses. It would be administered by competent people. This clearly shows that they have no wish to remain inactive in a given situation but intend rather to use all the means likely to boost their regional economy.

That regional economic development board would also have the task of promoting intelligently industrial, business and touristic opportunities in our area. It would specifically promote tourist industry, organize recreational centres, sports centres, tourist centres, in an area rich in possibilities, and would then publicize its achievements in areas, other provinces, other countries, in order to get the most out of them.

Such a board would of course help new ventures as much as possible and might even serve as a referee in cases where the life of a firm is jeopardized by disagreement between labour and management or problems of a different nature.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is expedient to give such an example, because I am one of those who believe that the federal government alone will never be able to check unemployment in a reasonable proportion, no more than the provincial government could. Every citizen, each town and each region will have to make up its mind and take the matter in its own hands and establish a regional economic development body.

I presume, without knowing the details of the legislation mentioned this afternoon by the hon. minister that its purpose will be to help these organizations of regional economic development which will have given evidence of being serious in their work and have shown that they have competent people in their service.

To the minister who spoke this afternoon, I submit the request of the mayors in my area —the members of the Mauricie Mayors Conference—who wish to be able to expect assistance from the federal government. They have also requested aid from the provincial government and they are expecting a definite reply within a few weeks. I believe that this reply may arrive at about the same time the federal legislation comes into force.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to stress that blaming the government for an unemployment situation about which we are all concerned, even if it is not as serious as it has been in the past, is not enough. We should rather propose constructive measures and for my part I would suggest that we try to synchronize the efforts made by the federal, provincial and municipal governments.

I know that the Canadian Federation of Mayors, of which I was a member, has been concerned for several years about that problem and has been suggesting for quite a long time that the municipalities should be invited, when the federal and provincial governments meet to discuss problems dealing with municipalities. But in certain circles, some objections have always been raised, because the municipalities are deemed to be the instruments of the provincial government. Nevertheless, I think that the municipal governments, through the mayors, should be called at least as observers to know exactly what happens. I know that in many cases they would have suggestions to make which would help to complete the efforts of the federal and provincial governments in order to cope with unemployment.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

I could perhaps make very briefly another suggestion. It concerns all Canadians, who should buy Canadian. It would already be a way of revitalizing the Canadian economy. I have already acquired the habit, Mr. Speaker, of looking where the products which pass through my hands are manufactured and I am astonished to note how many products sold in Canada are manufactured in Hong Kong, Japan, Formosa or Czechoslovakia. I feel that there is too much indifference among a great number of Canadians who buy those products manufactured elsewhere, when we could find the same products here. When the fact is mentioned, we are told: "Yes, but the are less expensive." It is true that they are less expensive but afterwards we have to pay for increasing unemployment, social welfare for the unemployed, because in certain sectors our economy is threatened by some sort of dumping from abroad.

I would like to make another suggestion, Mr. Speaker, for the economic development of the country, to prevent our firms—

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Mongrain: Yes, with pleasure.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the member also suggest that all those countries to whom we sell goods adopt the same policy of buying only in their country?

[Translation]

Mr. Mongrain: My honourable colleague is evidently a real perfectionist. He would like to force this government to improve all the other governments in the world. I know that international trade must exist and that charity begins at home. Surely, there are cases where we must import but we have in Canada industries which manufacture products that are just as good. Canadians should remember that charity begins at home.

This seems fundamental to me. We are not here to support other countries unless they are underdeveloped.

Here is my last suggestion, Mr. Speaker. I think that in order to keep Canadian industry strong, union leaders should be convinced to accept a kind of truce in those endless disputes that cause the ruin of some businesses, push employers towards automation and consequently staff reductions, and in certain cases force businesses to close down.

In my region, a business is in danger of closing on account of a strike that I find unjustified and unjustifiable and that has been going on for months.

So, I think we should ask the union leaders who are conscious of their responsibilities to try and bring a respite in labour-management disputes to give all levels of government concerned the time they need to enforce the measures they consider essential to improve the economy and reduce regional disparities.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister of the co-operation of 85 mayors in my region, who are members of the Mauricie Mayors Conference. They are looking forward to his complete legislative program and they will be in a position then to come and discuss with him how it meets the needs of the region I represent.

Mr. Roland Godin (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the hon. member who has just sat down. Since the hon. member for Trois-Rivières (Mr. Mongrain) is all in favour of Canadians buying Canadian products, can he promise to vote against bill C-102, that is a bill providing for larger imports of pharmaceutical products?

Mr. Mongrain: I have not seen anything in the bill, Mr. Speaker, that says we must have larger imports of drugs. I think this is a gratuitous assumption on the part of my hon. friend.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and one hon. member opposite.

An hon. Member: A lot more than on that side.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak specifically to the amendment to the motion which is before the house. This amendment asserts that the government has slowed down public investment and has pursued fiscal and monetary policies deliberately designed to increase unemployment. Other spokesmen for the New Democratic party have suggested earlier in this debate what perhaps could and should be done about the early alleviation of unemployment. I wish to say something about the reason the government has pursued the kind of policy it has, and why we request a different approach. More specifically still, I wish to suggest why we need a significant expansion of public enterprise and a change in our current monetary policy.

To begin with, however, it is perhaps worth noting that the extent of unemployment levels in this country is beyond dispute. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) in his speech yesterday acknowledged that we have severe unemployment and that the severity increases significantly in certain regions of Canada, particularly in our Atlantic provinces and in Quebec where it reaches levels between 7 per cent and 10 per cent. It is also acknowledged that this situation is not new in Canada. For the past decade we have had levels of unemployment which exceeded those of any advanced industrial nation in western Europe for example.

Using the Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures, I have come to the conclusion that the average level of unemployment in Canada for the past decade has been almost 5 per cent. This means that while the rest of us have been enjoying unprecedented material well being, thousands of Canadians have been experiencing material and, therefore, spiritual deprivation.

Why is this, Mr. Speaker? The Liberal government does not consists of malicious men. Other things being equal they would certainly prefer that all Canadians be employed. The point is, of course, that things are not equal. Successive Liberal governments have had to make choices. As we all know, any government, no matter which party is in power, must make political and economic choices, and this involves deciding between having either one of two or more desirable things or one of two or more evils.

In broad terms, recent governments in this country have had to decide between having price stability or full employment. No economist that I know of believes that you can have both. Our Liberal governments, and our Conservative predecessors, have favoured programs aimed at achieving price stability and, as one of my colleagues has pointed out, they have failed even in that regard. In a recent article John Deutsch, former chairman of the Economic Council of Canada, contrasted the economic performance of western European countries with that of Canada and the United States. The former, he pointed out, "have been highly sensitive to unemployment, and they have used monetary and fiscal policies very actively to keep the unemployment rates at low levels". In this article which appeared last year John Deutsch said:

> Over the past ten years ... they have generally succeeded in keeping the unemployment rate within a range of 1 to 2½ per cent of the labour force.

He noted that in Sweden, unemployment in the past decade has rarely exceeded 1½ per cent. He stated that during the same ten year period our level of unemployment was three or four times that level, or an average of about 4 per cent or 5 per cent.

What is important to note in this context is that governments choose policies quite deliberately with the foreknowledge that the results will be more or less employment. Therefore, contrary to what the Minister of Labour said yesterday, I reafirm the truth of the New Democratic Party's amendment to the motion put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield). The present government, like its predecessors, is deliberately pursuing a deflationary policy; it is deliberately creating unemployment and doing so with the stated objective of achieving price stability. The evidence of this is overwhelming. The policy adopted is aimed at achieving price stability rather than full employment.

This situation was to be seen in last December's white paper entitled "price stability". Why do we not have a white paper entitled "policies for full employment"? I think the absence of such a paper is indicative. Most countries in western Europe have produced such a document. This same attitude was to be found in last fall's lamentable budget presentation by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson). Then, as yesterday in his assertion that he did not favour abandoning the 11 per cent sales tax on building materials, the minister took the approach that public expenditures must be curtailed. He also felt that taxes must be kept at high levels in order to balance the budget and therefore restrict consumer demand. The effect of these measures, he hopes, will be to check rising prices. However, he did not state, or failed to point out yesterday, that one certain effect of these measures, as every economist in this country and indeed in the western world knows, is that they are an encouragement to unemployment.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

It is now universally agreed that the high levels of unemployment during the period when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was Prime Minister were primarily due to the lack of aggregate demands in the economy. There was, of course, near the end of that era, a revolt by Canada's economists who made a determined effort to have the then governor of the Bank of Canada removed. The present government, I would suggest, is making the same basic mistake that was made during that period. Instead of encouraging expansion and increasing public demand, expenditures are being restricted. In doing this, the government is promoting unemployment.

Even with this policy decision a further bias on the part of the government is revealed. The government is restricting the expansion of government services and projects which have, in the main, a direct consequence on the well being of the citizen as a non-consumer. These expenditures are primarily in areas like buildings, hospitals, schools, parks, museums and perhaps even a film industry. Expenditures in these areas are being curtailed to achieve price stability. At the same time the government allows private corporations which, under the kind of economic structure we have, understandably have as their prime motive the recreation and maintenance of man as an infinite consumer, to have unrestricted access to available supplies of capital with an unrestricted right to expand.

The New Democratic Party does not believe that price stability is the main economic problem at the present time. We believe the main problem is unemployment. However, our method of dealing with price stability would be quite different from that of the existing government, and I should like to say something about this matter.

If we regarded it to be an economic necessity to cut back on investment, then we would apply the same restrictions to the private sector of the economy as we applied to the public. This is nothing new. This is a very common principle adopted by governments in western Europe. We would say to the private sector, including petroleum companies, insurance companies and others, that they should not expand in a given year because public needs and requirements were greater. We would then take a greater share of the available capital to provide for greater social needs.

Let me make it perfectly clear that I am not saying my party believes in a negative attitude at this time toward business. In this mixed economy we say that when we restrict capital investment a serious decision must be made in respect of a set of priorities. At certain times a decision should be made that the consumer industry should be discouraged and the public sector encouraged. We would make decisions affecting capital flows to bring that about.

My point is that the present government, as preceding governments, is bound by the old ideological framework which suggests that when we cut back expenditure we must always do so in respect of the public sector. I suggest that we should tell certain companies who are spending millions of dollars on expansion in Montreal to cut back on expenses for a year or two because we need the capital that is available on the market. This government will not do that.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, in addition to establishing directing guide lines on investment policy both in the private and public sectors, the New Democratic party would establish a prices and incomes review board which would have the power to authorize or prohibit price increases proposed by companies in a monopolistic or oligopolistic position in our economy. Members of both the old parties have frequently been amused by referring to what they call "socialist myths". All of these I would like at some time to debate with them, but this opportunity will present itself on another occasion. However, I would like to point out to them that they, too, have their myths. The most notorious of these myths is that we live in what they like to regard as a free enterprise economy. The truth is that we live in an oligopolistically dominated economy.

Hon. members, of course, do not need to take the word of a socialist for this; they just need to read the work of almost any contemporary economist. Perhaps they should begin with that expatriate Canadian liberal, Galbraith, and read his work "The New Industrial State".

Given the fact that we live in an oligopolistically dominated economy, even those committed to a predominantly privately-owned, market economy must honestly face the economic consequences of this fact. These consequences are that the leading firms in the major oligopolistic industries, steel, automobiles and chemicals, for example, can and do charge what they wish in our economy without fear of competition. The consequence of this, in turn, is that all other industries which depend upon their products are affected by their pricing policies and, of course, in this context, by their price increases. They in turn must raise prices. The cumulative effect is that the consumer in our society must pay.

It is quite accurate to say that today big corporations are in the position of virtually being able to tax the population at their will. I suggest that the absence of any market check on the pricing policies of these large concerns is one of the principal causes of increased prices today. Again, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) need not take my word for this; I suspect that some of his advisers have told him the same thing. If they have not, there are a number of economists in the country who would be only too pleased to point it out. We require, then, a public body with real power to provide the kind of checks which at least in some respects were provided by the conventional capitalist marketplace.

Another important cause of high prices is the high cost of money itself; that is, high interest rates. The government, because of its policies, is caught in a vicious circle in this regard. We in Canada have now an established fixed rate of exchange vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar. Also, we have a branch-plant economy whose industrial core is substantially owned by United States corporations. These corporations, in the main, refuse to sell their shares on the Canadian market. This means that although Canada has one of the highest per capita rates of saving in the world, a very large amount of our capital is in fact invested abroad; and a high percentage of that is invested in the United States. The consequence is that in order to maintain the level of our dollar vis-à-vis its U.S. equivalent, we are constantly and increasingly in need of attracting investment from the United States.

In order to do this, the Canadian government must always ensure that interest rates in Canada are at a higher level than those which prevail south of the border. Thus our interest rate is ultimately dependent upon the U.S. interest rate. We have in effect lost control of one of the main aspects of monetary policy. In order to regain control we require two interlocked policies: The first is to abandon our fixed exchange rate. The second and related requirement is to extricate ourselves over a period of years from our overwhelming dependence upon the U.S. economy. Time does not permit me in this speech to suggest how this can be done. My party does have programs which aim in this direction, and if implemented over a number of years, even within the framework of a mixed economy, we could have the desired degree of economic independence. What is required is the political will to make this a reality.

What I have attempted to suggest here, however briefly, is that the government, through both its monetary and fiscal policies, is responsible for existing levels of unemployment. It is pursuing policies which require change. If it wants a significant improvement, dabbling will not work. The government must break out of its own self-created vicious circle. Perhaps, in financial affairs as well as in foreign policy, the government could begin by listening to the speeches of its own Postmaster General (Mr. Kierans).

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I think that all of us have wondered during the past twelve months or so why it should be necessary in a prosperous country such as this to have, month in and month out on a seasonally adjusted basis, unemployment amounting to about 5 per cent of the work force. What worries us even more is the realization that, the way the indicators all point at the present time, this unemployment is going to increase during the present twelve months. I think all of us who have studied these matters have come to the conclusion that 3 per cent unemployment is an acceptable figure with which we can live. Naturally, we would like to have every single person in the country who wants to work able to have a job. However, when you consider the practical realities of the situation, it becomes apparent that when 3 per cent of the work force is unemployed that looks after those who are changing jobs, those who are retiring and those who are sick or are temporarily unable to fill a job. Therefore, a 3 per cent figure is acceptable. But we would also all agree that the present 5 per cent level of unemployment is unacceptable.

The question we must ask ourselves is: What can we do about it? First of all, it is necessary to examine the industrial indices. When you examine the figures showing, first, the early growth of industrial production which is, as we know, by far the greatest employer of labour; second, the work force, and third, unemployment, we see that there is a definite relationship between these three factors year by year. After this examination we find that if we are going to be able to keep unemployment at a figure no higher than the acceptable 3 per cent of the work force, industrial production must increase each year by about 8½ per cent a year. Last year industrial production increased by only 4.8 per cent, or about half of the necessary increase over the preceding year to keep unemployment at a reasonable and manageable level. To bring unemployment down to this reasonable level of 3 per cent from the present 5 per cent which we are experiencing, we must find out how to increase industrial production by about 8½ per cent this year over the previous year or find some way to have it increase during 1969 at about double the rate of the preceding year.

How are we going to do it? It is obvious that to produce more, first of all, we must be able to sell more. If we are to sell more, we must be able to convince more customers in Canada and abroad that Canadian products are a better buy than the other products that are offered to them on that particular market. This requires an improvement in three things: Design, quality and price. First of all, I am going to deal with what I believe must be done to improve quality and design. Improved quality and design are the product of industrial research, and we should ask ourselves at this point: Has Canada been doing enough industrial research during the past to ensure that our products are of the best design that we can devise and of the best quality? Are we producing enough new products year by year to attract new customers? There are two people who, I believe, are in the best position in this country to answer the question whether Canada is doing enough in this regard. The first is the president of the National Research Council. The second is the man who for five years held the position of minister of industry and who had the prime responsibility for improving design in this country. He also had responsibility for seeing to it that industrial research is being carried out at a satisfactory level to provide the increases in production necessary to provide jobs for those who enter the work force each year.

The minister who held this responsibility for five years is at present President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Drury). The president of the National Research Council said, in a speech which he made last September, that Canada is far behind her principal competitors in industrial design. As recently as two days ago, he said that Canada's research programs are too modest and too restricted. That is his opinion of the industrial research program that we in this country are carrying out.

Now, let us turn to the President of the Treasury Board who, as I said, until six months ago had the responsibility for five years for our progress in industrial research. Let us see what he said about this subject. In a speech which he made in Montreal last September 24 he said the following:

> Canada must more than triple its expenditure on research to become a really scientifically advanced nation.

Then, he went on to say this to the group to whom he was speaking, a three nation chemical engineering conference at the Queen Elizabeth Hotel at Montreal:

• (8:20 p.m.)

> More than ever, co-ordinated research and development by Canadian governments, Canadian universities and Canadian industry on a vastly increased scale is mandatory if we even hope to keep pace relatively with the acknowledged leader in technological innovation, the United States.

At that time the present Minister of Industry asked the following question:

> Are the present tax incentives which the government is offering sufficiently powerful to induce the amount of research this country needs?

I believe the statement which I quoted to the effect that vastly increased research is mandatory, answers the question which I have just put on record. Indeed, there can only be one answer and that, of course, is a resounding no.

It is obvious that the government's incentive program falls far short of what is needed to provide the research which must take place in this country if we are to achieve improved quality, improved design and the new products which a country has to produce year by year in order to attract a sufficiently increased number of new customers on the basis of which sales can increase, production can increase and increased opportunities can be provided for the employment of the additional Canadians who are entering the work force year by year.

As we know from the figures, our work force is increasing by about 3½ per cent each year. In the light of the increased unemployment figures which I quoted in the first part of my remarks, it is obvious we are not getting even close to employing these new entrants into the work force. The two authorities I have quoted are not members of industry. They are not members of the opposition. They are people closely connected with the present government, people who should know most about whether or not we are doing all that should be done to achieve the amount of research this country needs. I refer, of course, to the President of the National Research Council and to the President of the Treasury Board who for five years has had responsibility in this field.

I should like to deal, now, with the question of what we must do to bring down our costs, and hence our prices, so as to place our products in a better position in competition with other industrial nations. The most important factor in controlling costs is, as you know, productivity, which is production per man hour or per dollar. During the 20 years between 1945-1965, due to the introduction of new machines and new techniques, industrial productivity increased by an average rate year by year of 3.4 per cent. However, during the past three years the increase has been dropping slowly until today it is increasing over the previous year at about half the rate I mentioned a few moments ago. This is the principal reason for the failure of our sales to achieve the volume necessary to stimulate additional production sufficient to absorb the new entrants into the work force.

Those who control industry, the employers of this country, need to be offered an incentive sufficiently attractive to make it worth their while to invest in the new machines and production systems which will make it possible to reduce costs to a point at which they can markedly reduce prices and attract additional customers. The government refuses to offer these incentives. It offers no program to induce the producers of this country to make these changes which would result in the increased productivity we obviously require. I say that such tax incentives would not cost the government anything in the long run. In fact, they would be the best investment it could make. Increased productivity, and increased sales, would provide more income tax because more people would be employed and become liable for income tax instead of receiving unemployment insurance. More revenue would be received from commodity taxes because more articles would be sold subject to sales tax. More corporation taxes would be paid because there would be more profits for the government to tax. No doubt, in the first year there would be a temporary tax loss, but this would be regained many times over in the longer run.

I have mentioned two steps which would materially increase sales and, in turn, make possible the employment of a larger number of people. These are things which could be done. These are things which must be done. But these are things which are not being done by the government at the present time although it must be obvious that action along these lines is needed, particularly since the chairman of the National Research Council and the former minister of industry (Mr. Drury) have both indicated that our research program is not sufficient to keep this country competitive. It is obvious that our productivity is falling year by year, that it is not increasing at the rate necessary to pave the way for the employment of new entrants to our work force.

This government is showing a mixture of arrogance and complacency. Hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches opposite feel they are in office for four or five years and refuse to listen to any suggestion made by anyone but themselves. They answer questions about their policy in this field by saying that everything is in a satisfactory condition and that all the country has to do is to put its hand into the hand of the government and have confidence. It would be fine if we could do so, but we cannot, because it is obvious that unemployment is increasing, that productivity is decreasing and that the men best able in this country to know about the condition of our industrial research believe we are not doing nearly enough to keep abreast of our competitors.

This government was elected on June 25 to do a job for this country, and this job they promised to do. I say to them once more; snap out of your complacency, lose your arrogance—if you can—and get on with the job that you were elected to do.

Mr. Mark Smerchanski (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, some members of the opposition have taken a very pessimistic approach to the economic problems facing Canada today. They have adopted an attitude which is not only corrosive but very abrasive indeed. I shall leave this approach to the members of the opposition, since it appears to be their field of endeavour.

Present conditions in Canada are very much on the bright side. Canada is a wonderful country, and if anybody feels that he has no faith in Canada's future let him pack up and leave because others will be glad to come and take his place. I have the utmost faith in the achievements of this government. It has been able to give the country solid and realistic guidance.

Not one member of the opposition referred to any of the positive programs that the government has introduced. I appreciate that we cannot solve all our labour problems; nor can we solve all industrial and economic problems because of constantly changing conditions. We are asked on this side of the house to lose our arrogance; I submit we are far from arrogant and we are also responsible.

It is true that some operations of the government do require alteration. But this is progress. Progress requires change, reorganization and improvement where necessary. Admittedly, there are areas of distress such as the setbacks in agriculture with sagging wheat sales; the recent grain handlers strike at the Lakehead, the settlement of which imposed a further financial burden on the western farmer; and conditions in respect of the wheat itself that have hurt Manitoban farmers far more than those in Saskatchewan and Alberta. I am not in completely happy with the economic conditions that exist today, but I know that with hard work and proper constructive criticism we can go forward and achieve much.

I should like to mention a few facets of Canada's electrification program that some hon. members have purposely avoided mentioning. This program is one of the most creative advances made in the field of electrical transmission by any country in the entire world. Canada's applied knowledge in the field of electrical power production is second to none in the world today. We have hydro-electric power development in Canada which is developing some 132 million kilowatt hours. We have thermal electrical power producing some 32 million kilowatt hours, and nuclear power that is producing 140,000 kilowatt hours.

Atomic Energy of Canada has worked out one of the most impressive, imaginative and vital trans-continental links in the dominion of Canada. The western system has enabled us to have a direct power hook-up with Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan. The western system is shortly to be tied in with that of Quebec Hydro, and in this manner, through the efforts of Atomic Energy of Canada in conjunction with every provincial hydro commission, we will be assured of no more blackouts in Canada. In addition, Atomic Energy of Canada has made a further breakthrough in one of the most advanced and exciting fields of endeavour in the world.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Smerchanski: After I am through. Atomic Energy of Canada, jointly with Manitoba Hydro, are engineering a project that will transmit power from the northern parts of Manitoba to Winnipeg under direct current transmission instead of the usual alternating current transmission that has been in use in Canada. This system for the transmission of direct power is the only known use of this type of operation in the world. The additional power that will come into the southern parts of Ontario, Manitoba and Saskatchewan will create more jobs and industries.

The Nelson River development in northern Manitoba will provide isolated areas in northern Manitoba and northern Ontario with a microwave network which will enable the residents of these areas to enjoy television service. It will also enable the Manitoba Hydro to operate hydro power installations by microwave, and will enable the transmission, distribution and operation of the entire hydro-electric complex to be controlled remotely.

In addition, I forgot to mention one other important feature. Atomic Energy of Canada, jointly with Quebec Hydro, have been able to establish the first power research laboratory in the province of Quebec. This particular research institute is located at Varennes, Quebec, and cost $28 million. It is the only establishment of its kind on this continent that is able to undertake electrical power research on such a large scale. People from all over the United States come to the institute to learn methods of electrical transmission. I think this augurs well for the aggressive approach the government is taking to the development of research and industry.

A tremendous development of coal mines is taking place in the foothills of Alberta. Judging by what has happened in the last six months, approximately 2,000 additional coal miners will be needed to work the new mines. Apparently there are too many coal workers in Cape Breton. It is only natural that we should shift those coal miners to another part of Canada where they are needed, and that this being done under the manpower mobility program. As a result, I can see no foundation for the arguments hon. members of the opposition have raised to the effect this government is doing nothing to help our workers.

Mr. MacEwan: You just want to move us all out.

Mr. Smerchanski: As reported on page 4908 of Hansard for January 29, the parliamentary leader of the New Democratic Party asked a member of the government to name even one little thing the government has done to deal with the increasing rate of unemployment in Canada. His remarks implied that the government is doing almost nothing to solve Canada's unemployment problems. Those remarks are tommyrot. For instance, at Thompson, Manitoba, new mines are being developed at a tremendous rate; the number of operating mines may soon double. The International Nickel Company will require 2,000 additional employees for those mines. In addition, the company is laying 48 miles of new railway line.

All these activities are developing Canada and are creating new jobs in Canada. I wonder how many hon. members of the opposition are aware that 48 miles of brand new railway line are being laid in northern Manitoba. I doubt if any of them know about this. Some may, but only very few. If we have surplus labour in Newfoundland, I suggest that these workers could find gainful employment with the International Nickel Company at Thompson, Manitoba.

Many other new developments are taking place in Canada as a result of this government's foresight and imagination. We have the Panarctic oil development which has excited and stimulated the imaginations of scientists and engineers of Canada as well as many other parts of the world. Therefore, I say that the opposition charge that this government's attitude toward labour problems is arrogant is not true.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

I also wish to mention the fantastic, gigantic development taking place in and around the port of Vancouver. From Port Moody, New Westminster, North Vancouver and Roberts Bank, not less than 25 million tons of concentrate will be shipped by 1975. Present shipments of minerals from those places amount to approximately 6 million tons. The principal items of export from Roberts Bank will be potash from Saskatchewan, coal and sulphur from Alberta and from the interior of British Columbia as well as large quantities of copper concentrate, molybdenum concentrate and nickel concentrate. These products will go to foreign markets. All this will mean the creation of new industries and new jobs. New jobs will be created directly, and each job that is created directly will create three or four other indirectly. Every time one man becomes employed in primary industry several other men become gainfully employed in ancillary industries. This kind of development is taking place today in Canada. It is development of which we can be proud. Nevertheless, a gloomy view prevails among hon. members of the opposition.

What are traffic trends on the west coast, Mr. Speaker? The potential development of traffic on the west coast is tremendous and almost beyond the bounds of the imagination. Japan is constantly seeking more of our coal. We have seen a spectacular increase in potash exports from Saskatchewan, and our sulphur exports are increasing at a fantastic rate every year. For instance, in 1961 the total exports of sulphur amounted to 21,000 tons. In 1967 this figure had reached 2 million tons and is increasing at approximately 500,000 tons per annum. The movement of all this potash requires a great deal of planning because the tonnage exported is doubling about every four years. Those exports are leaving the country through the port of Vancouver. All this development, of course, has been made possible as a result of the foresight of the officials of our present Department of Transport and of our Minister of Transport (Mr. Hellyer). The government has been able to plan the development of Roberts Bank and make all this development possible.

I have been speaking about real developments, real changes which this government has introduced. These are the kinds of development which will create new jobs, new industry and new sources of taxes for the government of Canada and the provinces. As I said, the four major developments on the west coast have been made possible through the foresight of the government. They are the realization of a dream of the Minister of Transport and officials of his department.

Perhaps there have been some errors; yet our accomplishments far outweigh any errors that may have been committed in planning or designing. Hon. members of the opposition keep telling us that Canadian manufacturers need government help to design and improve their products. That is simply not true. Manufacturers merely want the government to create an atmosphere conducive to industrial development. Industry can take care of itself and will build up this country. Our industrialists will employ increasing amounts of labour. After all, the creation of jobs is a function of industry.

I should like to go on and say something about mining and exploration in Canada, but time does not permit. May I bring to your attention, sir, the accomplishments of our geological scientists who, under the auspices of the present government, are doing tremendous work. No doubt some hon. members are acquainted with the developments in mining taking place in Rouyn and in the Noranda area.

• (8:50 p.m.)

Let me bring to your attention very briefly, Mr. Speaker, the fact that this area has been prospected since 1927. So many drill holes have been spotted in that area in the quest for ore that it resembles Swiss cheese. Yet more recently, with modern geophysical tools—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Does the house give unanimous consent for the hon. member to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Smerchanski: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. More recently an anomaly was investigated and our Canadian engineers discovered and developed what is known as the Delbridge ore body. One of the most interesting parts about this discovery program is that it was headed by an engineer, Julian Boldy of Ireland, who came to this country in 1966.

Mr. Paproski: Hurrah for the Irish!

Mr. Smerchanski: This engineer wanted to contribute to the development of Canada and discovered several million tons of copper ore approximately two miles northeast of the Noranda operation. This discovery will enhance the development of that area by some $20 million. Much of the money will be used to purchase materials for the development of the mine. Work opportunities in the area will be provided and indirect benefits to industry will be created because additional machinery and mining equipment will be required to develop the project.

At present, mining activity in Canada is at its highest peak. Never in the history of Canada has mining experienced the type of development that is taking place today. A large part of this development is due to the foresight and planning of the government. I say that it is this imaginative, aggressive type of program that will create more jobs, more industry, and a larger source of tax dollars for the Canadian government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hales: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Smerchanski: Certainly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): The hon. member's time has expired, unless there is unanimous consent for this question. The hon. member for Hamilton West.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I believe that this motion the Opposition has put forward for debate deals primarily with, and is concerned about, the equality of life of people in this great land of ours, and also with the equality of our economic development. But, Mr. Speaker, we have to come back to the basics, and that is people. People are the greatest asset that we have and because of this all our attention, our energies and our resourcefulness should be primarily concerned with them. We must continually keep our ears receptive to the legitimate aspirations of people. If the Canadian people are concerned in any area, government should be concerned. If people demand action, government should give them action, and if people express the need for leadership the government should give them leadership. This is what participatory democracy is supposed to be about.

Just a short time ago I heard an hon. member state that the Opposition thinks the government has to solve all the problems. We don't want them to solve all the problems, just let them solve some of them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: This is what their mandate is about, Mr. Speaker. We cannot tolerate an indifferent or complacent attitude to the disparities in the quality of life being experienced by individuals, which are unquestionably obvious, nor can such an attitude be accepted as a philosophy of life. It is senseless and useless to express great theories for national unity if within this country there are some 4 million people on the poverty line, and yet we still remain indifferent. These are the have-nots, Mr. Speaker, and their potential strength as one voice is indeed a force to be reckoned with.

The aptness of the motion now under debate is not only demonstrated by the frightening figures on national unemployment, by the bad state of many of our primary industries and the dangerous condition of our commodity exports but, even more clearly, by the lethargic approach of the government to these problems and the futility of what little action it has taken to solve them.

The government's chief fault, in my view, is its consistent refusal to tackle the gut issues that face Canada and which, every day, weigh upon the minds and purses of ordinary citizens. After almost six months in office, the government has totally failed to come to grips with the real issues of concern to the average Canadian citizen. We have yet to learn of any legislation designed to widen and improve the employment prospects of thousands of young Canadians who will be coming into the labour market. There has been nothing suggested to assist workers already in the labour force to adjust to the changed conditions of that market. I have heard members of the opposition continually ask the government to state their policies, ideas and intentions, and members of the government continually state "This is under review" and "That is under review." This is a time for action, Mr. Speaker.

The latest figures on unemployment prove that the government has been able to do nothing to arrest the perennial economic scourge of unemployment, let alone cure it. We cannot allow an accumulation of grievances to grow in the fields of unemployment, poverty, slum conditions, rural poverty, urban waste, inflation and higher taxes. Grievances, if allowed to smolder and simmer over long periods of time, can have disastrous results.

When one thinks that by 1991 the province of Ontario alone is going to have some 10 million people in it then, I would respectfully submit that we have to be concerned, and this government must give leadership. When one thinks that 80 per cent of our population will be living in urban areas by 1981, we have to be extremely concerned. I believe that these fundamental problems existing in Canada appear to have escaped the imagination and attention of our government.

Prior to June 25 last the government promised little, and to date has delivered less.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Alexander: Members of the government promised not only to govern, but to create. They were going to create a new Canadian society, the just society, in which we all would have hope, in which we all would have a life of decent quality. But in my view, Mr. Speaker, any society, just or otherwise, can only develop on a foundation of healthy economic growth. Healthy economic growth means job opportunities, decent annual incomes, steady demand and steady production and, last but not least, equality of opportunity to share in national development and national prosperity.

No society can be termed just that contains within it the regional disparities that we find in Canada. No society can be truly just that can callously write off, for the sake of convenience, primary industries that happen to have fallen on evil days and whole sections of the population who happen, through no fault of theirs, to be forced to share this condition. I am thinking of the fishing industry, of the farming industry and of the steel industry which, incidentally, is claiming that the anti-dumping legislation is too little and too late. People in the steel industry are concerned about whether the government is prepared to advise the people of Canada to buy Canadian, because this seems to be their only hope.

But this government is obsessed with abstract things. It has no time or inclination to tackle unpleasant emergencies such as exist in the Atlantic provinces among fishermen, in eastern Canada in the agricultural industry and across the wheat producing prairies. The government has less inclination to tackle the urban problems and the transportation problems that are coupled with these other problems. We are asked to treat as urgent, and this is what concerns me, such problems as constitutional reform, amendments to various acts covering social behaviour, language rights and the reform of parliament. All these may have a place of importance, but I tell this government there are other areas in this country which ought to have greater priority and which require their immediate attention. The title of the latest report of the Economic Council of Canada is "The Challenge of Growth and Change". This is a challenge that has been ducked by this government, just as it has ducked the recommendations of that body. In reading the reports of the Council for recent years one is struck by the number of times the expression "full employment" crops up. Invariably, this phrase is coupled with a strong affirmation that it is one of the principal keys to Canada's future.

I suppose everyone has read the latest report of Canada's Bureau of Statistics on Canada's labour force. I read it and I was appalled by what I read. Here we are, a nation spending close to $11 billion a year on our central government and taking in well over $10 billion in revenue, with an export trade reckoned in the multi-billions. This Country is the envy of many underdeveloped nations and not a few industrialized nations. It has a high standard of living, is supposedly possessed of space, uncounted natural and human resources and a merciful detachment from the problems created by unfriendly neighbours. Yet with all these advantages, with all our achievements, our affluence and our potential, we must admit to an inability to gainfully employ close to 5 per cent of our people who are able and willing to work. This is what we must be concerned about. In spite of all these advantages, we are still in trouble. Surely, the solution of this problem presents sufficient challenge for the most imaginative and dynamic government, which this government says it is.

This figure of close to 5 per cent unemployed, 4.7 per cent to be exact, is bad enough in itself. But what is worse is the regional breakdown. Here, we find a rate of 7.1 per cent for the Atlantic provinces; 6.8 per cent for Quebec; 3 per cent for Ontario; 3.4 per cent on the prairies and 5.4 per cent in British Columbia. The Economic Council of Canada states that the level of unemployment in the Atlantic provinces, and to a lesser degree in Quebec, is persistently higher than the national average at all times. The Council further points out that when the national level of unemployment falls, the level of unemployment in these regions also falls but their share of total unemployment tends to rise. Should we not be concerned about the apathy and complacency? Such a condition points to the need for flexible policies applicable in differing degrees to regional needs rather than blanket policies which take no regard for regional needs and only accentuate regional disparity.

Everyone will remember that one of the promises of this government was to tackle and overcome this problem of regional disparity. The only regional action taken by it so far has been the setting up of regional desks in the office of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). This is hardly action calculated to equalize economic and social opportunities across Canada. The people know about this situation and want to know why we are not solving these problems rather than proceeding in the pussy-footing way in which this government seems to have become so very adept. You may wonder, Mr. Speaker, why, representing an urban Ontario constituency as I do, I should be concerned with farmers and fishermen in the maritimes or wheat producers on the prairies. The answer is quite simple. I believe this is a united country, one country, and that what will benefit a Canadian in one region will benefit Canadians in all regions; what weakens one region of Canada is bound to weaken the whole national structure.

My chief concern right now is that we are not doing adequately the things that should be done to provide the most employment. Figures are available in abundance to show that our universities, technical and vocational schools and other specialized training establishments have not been able to keep their output of employable Canadians in gear with the rapidly changing demands of the job market. Nor do I believe that our present policies covering labour mobility, retraining and placement, are in step with the tremendous changes that have taken place and are still taking place at an accelerated rate in the demand of the Canadian economy for workers. I believe our most pressing need is for priority government action that would coordinate support of the labour force and those seeking employment to ensure maximum efficiency in the future use of Canada's labour force.

The situation today is that we are turning out too many people who are skilled in areas where demand for their services is falling off and are not turning out enough in areas where demand is growing rapidly. This is a major problem which faces the 88,000 young Canadians who will graduate from universities this year. The same holds true in the case of craftsmen and skilled workers in the manufacturing, construction and processing sector of industry. We are trailing change in our efforts to help those who want to give work and those who want to find work. We must ensure that our national labour force is equipped to meet changes in the demand for their services.

Something of this problem may be seen in the figures supplied in the 1968 report of the Economic Council of Canada. There it is stated that in 1946, 60 per cent of the workers were employed in goods producing industries and 40 per cent were employed in service industries. Twenty years later, in 1966, these figures had been reversed. Forty per cent were employed in industries producing goods and 60 per cent in service industries. This is the problem which I hope the government will be able to appreciate and in respect of which I hope it will be able to come forward with the necessary solutions. In the same period, the old reliable primary industries accounted for a smaller and smaller percentage of the labour force. Agriculture went down from 24.8 per cent to 7.4 per cent and forestry and fishing went down from 2.3 per cent to 1.4 per cent. This is the key to our problem.

This acceleration of employment in service industries is an international experience, but is far more pronounced in Canada than elsewhere. Also, it is more significant because in Canada the labour force is growing at a rate far ahead of that of any other western nation and will continue to do so beyond 1980. I am concerned about the effect this will have in terms of the population in the 1980's. This is why we must all be concerned. We need policies, we need direction and we need leadership. This must come from that side of the house which was given that great mandate, and which they think is the be-all and the end-all. If they do not take advantage of this mandate in terms of solving the basic problems, then I believe they know what the answer will be. I notice that the minister looks at you, Mr. Speaker, with some concern. This is the name of the game; if you do not produce you are out.

Mr. Benson: You fellows have had a lot of experience.

Mr. Alexander: I shall not take too much more time, but in conclusion I should like to say that these are basic national problems. I wish to emphasize the desperate need for government action not only to overcome unemployment but to ensure future employment. We have been told in the past 15 minutes or so that this is the most pressing of the national tasks facing this government. Let us hope that within the very near future we will see some sign that the government appreciates this situation and intends to act. I do not mean "soon" in the sense the government uses that word. I mean tomorrow, if they have that ability. I hope the government appreciates the situation. I do not want to be nasty, but I am concerned. Let us have some policies from this government. Let us have some intentions and then I can truthfully perhaps believe in the just society. If we do not have some of these things, Mr. Speaker, we are lost.

• (9:10 p.m.)

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when I read the wording of the motion "That this house regrets that the government is not presenting programs to achieve a rate of economic growth which will reduce unemployment and also insure that the economy will be able to absorb the large number of new entrants into the labour force this year", and the wording of the amendment which added the words "and that, instead, the government has slowed down public investment and has pursued fiscal and monetary policies deliberately designed to increase unemployment", I found them both interesting and provocative. They led me to think that the opposition benches would put forward a serious discussion of the basic economic issues facing the country, and especially some ideas of alternative policies which would clarify their real position. I regret, and I am disappointed, that nothing like this has been forthcoming in this debate.

Instead, all we have had has been a catalogue of platitudes from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Stanfield), which does nothing more than establish that he is for economic as well as moral virtue. One could never have any doubt about the hon. member in respect of the latter, but it is also good to have reassurance that he also stands for the former, even if he is lacking in new ideas and proposals in spite of his vastly expanded staff. On the other hand, from the far right, and I speak politically when I talk about the right corner of this house, the routine folklore of the economic bogeyman hiding under everyone's bed has come forth; the familiar economic superstition which haunts every speech of the N.D.P., namely, the suggestion that we spend our way out of inflation.

It is amazing that the opposition speeches show an almost complete lack of awareness of the potential conflict between full employment and price stability; the so-called trade off problem which has dominated the economic literature of the past decade and which was thoroughly researched and documented in Canadian terms by the Economic Council of Canada. However, even if the opposition is so patently lacking in knowledge and understanding ideas or proposals, this debate provides an opportunity to put forth an up to date appraisal of the performance of the Canadian economy, and this is what should have happened. It provides an opportunity to take a further look at developing trends and proposals for 1969, and to review and confirm the broad policy posture of the government.

Before turning to an appraisal of the current situation and prospects for 1969, I think it is important and instructive to put the question of the growth of the economy in its true perspective. The fact is that throughout almost the whole of the 1960's the Canadian economy has been enjoying the longest and most substantial period of growth in modern history. The economic expansion that began early in the decade has continued for an unprecedented span of years. Although the pace of growth slowed in 1967-68, and the rapid rate of new job creation eased up to some degree, this period of adjustment was so short and so mild that even the worst pessimists, including the Leader of the Opposition, have been unable to call it a recession. The period of expansion has been so strong and so extensive that most Canadians now seem to take for granted that we can sustain a widespread, general prosperity and an unflagging growth in employment, as well as a rapid gain in living standards.

It is this very success that has given rise to new aspirations and new expectations among all Canadians. There seems to be a widespread notion that the economy can do anything it is asked to do. It is this very success and the explosion of expectations, however, that is in danger of creating entirely new problems and the need for sober, practical appraisal of alternative objectives. The cost of these alternative objectives is very great. Neither idle prattle about economic platitudes nor doctrinaire tilting at windmills is very useful in dealing with the present state of the Canadian economy.

[Mr. Benson.]

Looking back over the most recent five year period, we can get a real measure of the progress achieved since 1963 when the Liberal party formed the government after five years of Tory rule, and which underlies the heightening of our goals and aspirations.

Between 1963 and 1968 total output of the economy in real goods and services, without considering any increases in prices, increased by some 30 per cent; that is, by an average of 6 per cent per year in real terms. It thus overshot the target originally suggested by the economic council back in 1964. In 1967, therefore, the council lowered its target rate of growth to 5 per cent annually over the remaining years to 1970, a fact of which the Leader of the Opposition seemed to be unaware in his speech.

In terms of employment, we added 1,134,000 new jobs between 1963 and 1968. This was an average of 227,000 new jobs every year, again well over the target rate of job creation suggested by the economic council in 1964. The overall gain in real production meant that on a per capita basis real living standards rose by 18½ per cent, not far short of 4 per cent annually over the five year period.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Tell us about old age pensions.

Mr. Benson: They have gone up by an even larger percentage. This rate of real growth was almost twice as great as that achieved during the preceding five year period from 1958 to 1963. That unfortunate period, of course, is well remembered as one of economic stagnation and frustration in Canada when unemployment averaged 6.4 per cent per year, some 50 per cent higher than the average rate of the past five years during Liberal government.

This look backwards over the recent past gives us a perspective to judge where we are at present, and where we are likely to go in 1969. Everything that has developed and come to light since the budget message of last October helps to confirm the accuracy and soundness of the economic analysis and the broad fiscal policy proposed in that budget. It is apparent that the temporary easing in expansion experienced in 1967 had ended by the end of that year and that since then the economy has re-established a strong forward momentum which it is expected will continue. The most recent data suggests an acceleration of growth in the final quarter of 1968 which will be reported soon.

In the October budget, I forecast a gain in the gross national product of about 8 per cent. It now appears that the growth rate will surpass 8 per cent and push the G.N.P. for 1968 to an all-time high level, well over the $67 billion level. Further, as my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mackasey) mentioned, and it was also mentioned yesterday by the Leader of the Opposition, the latest monthly figures on unemployment have fallen below 5 per cent. They help to confirm a declining trend in unemployment since last mid-summer.

It is also clear that productivity rose significantly, and our ability to compete in our main foreign markets, far from deteriorating as alleged by several speakers opposite, actually improved during the past year. This is attested to by the remarkable upsurge in exports, which even the Leader of the Opposition has had to acknowledge in some sort of unhappy and sad way. The result has been a highly favourable trade balance for Canada in the past year, which coupled with the continued inflow of investment capital has reinforced the basic strength of the Canadian dollar. As hon. members know, our dollar has been trading at or close to its upper limit for many months now.

Further, since the government successfully renegotiated the arrangements with the United States, we continue to enjoy preferred access to United States capital markets without the limitations of any numerical target on our foreign exchange reserves. We have undertaken not to borrow from the United States for the purpose of increasing our foreign exchange reserves. However, our reserves are free to move in accordance with the needs of our domestic economy, and we have secured greater potential flexibility and freedom in the operation of monetary policy in this country. In recent months our reserves have increased and are, I should point out to hon. members, in an extremely healthy position. All this reflects the high degree of confidence in Canada and its economy to be found in the outside world.

It is remarkable that among investors outside Canada, those who can stand back and observe our performance and prospects in a straightforward, objective manner—those who are not subject to the neurotic fear of impending doom which seems to infect the opposition benches—there is nothing but the strongest degree of confidence in Canada and the Canadian economy—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Baldwin: Is that why they are cashing in their bonds?

Mr. Benson: —and an appreciation of the soundness of its economic policies.

Mr. Nesbitt: We heard the same speech ten years ago.

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, an hon. member said that he heard the same speech ten years ago.

Mr. Nesbitt: And written by the same people right up there in the gallery.

Mr. Benson: But I assure the hon. member that he did not hear it seven years ago, when he was a member of the party in power in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: Needless to say—

Mr. Nesbitt: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, the minister went out of his way to make an observation concerning myself. That is fine; but on a question of privilege I should bring to Your Honour's attention that a few moments ago the minister made a point of saying that the great boom and prosperity started in the 1960's.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order. The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Benson: I was simply stating the facts, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: That is quite a change.

Mr. Benson: I would like to look forward to what I think will happen in 1969. Needless to say, I share the confidence and optimism of these detached, outside observers who have confidence in the Canadian economy, rather than the gloom and fear of members of the opposition who really have not any faith in this country of ours and the opportunities that lie within it.

Mr. McIntosh: We have no faith in the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Benson: You do not even have any confidence in the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacEwan: When do you intend to balance the budget? Give us a rundown of that.

Alleged Failure to Reduce Unemployment

Mr. Benson: I can confirm now the prospect suggested in the October budget that 1969 should be a year of strong and better balanced growth. All the indications at present point in this direction. One of the most important is the expectation of a vigorous upturn in business capital investment. This is likely to be in the order of 8 or 9 per cent. This will be a strong element in the expansion of demand in 1969, and I think answers the question put by the Leader of the Opposition regarding what offset was in prospect to make up for a return to a more normal rate of growth in exports during the forthcoming year. This upturn in investment is also particularly important in its relationship to the creation of new job opportunities in Canada, not only in construction and the capital goods industries but to the continuous rise in production and service employment.

In this connection, it is important to note that the growth in investment was foreshadowed by the strong recovery in business profits in 1968, which was abhorred by members of the New Democratic party. This recovery was of course necessary and was related to the squeeze on profits in the period preceding 1968, when they fell below their historically normal level as a percentage of the national economy. It is important that a reasonable level of profits be earned to sustain the high level of investment necessary to provide the rapid rate of new employment creation in industries of high productivity in Canada.

All the other elements of demand in the economy, personal consumption, housing, which will continue at record levels, government and exports, remain strong. This very strength of demand in fact underlies the main problem in economic policy over the year ahead, the need to restrain demand and combat continued inflation. I have spoken before on the problem of inflation.

An hon. Member: You certainly have.

Mr. Benson: I dealt with this at some length in the budget of last October. But the evidence of accelerating strength in the economy lends increasing importance to the balanced range of policies we are now following, I think to good effect.

As I said in my budget, "the most urgent need now is to check further the continuing increases in prices and living costs." I noted at that time that the burden of inflation falls with greatest weight on those lacking the bargaining power to protect themselves against inflation; that inflation undermines the whole basis of an efficient competitive economy and disrupts the smooth flow of savings and investment through capital markets in our country.

[Mr. MacEwan.]

A resolute fight against inflation does not mean that we are ignoring the basic goals of full employment and rapid job creation. On the contrary, our policy is to look forward to a substantially larger increase in jobs in 1969 than was the case in 1968. Even a high rate of job creation, however, may not lower unemployment to the minimum levels we would all like to see. I am sure that all of us would like to see this country achieve the position where everybody who wanted a job could find one, and indeed this will continue to be Liberal policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Benson: However, it must be remembered that we are in the midst of an unprecedented boom in the growth of the labour force. Our rate of increase is easily the highest of any western industrialized country, and as the Economic Council has pointed out, is much larger than the entire labour force growth being experienced in Britain, West Germany and Italy all put together. Further, as the regional statistics referred to in yesterday's debate make clear, the problem of structural unemployment is probably growing more severe and does not lend itself to solution by fiscal stimulus. There is, of course, a real problem of short-term conflict between our goals of full employment and price stability.

• (9:30 p.m.)

But as I said in my budget speech, and repeat again today:

> We should not delude ourselves into thinking the choice is between either policies of fiscal ease to counter unemployment or policies of fiscal restraint to fight inflation. In our present circumstances, unchecked inflation would precipitate the kind of economic disruption in which unemployment would surely increase and we would end up with more of both of these evils.

In summary, the growth of the economy is accelerating and the prospect for 1969 is for a further period of strong expansion in the Canadian economy. The main danger is that the forces of demand may set off a new round of inflationary price and cost behaviour, which sooner rather than later would result in severe economic disruption and hardship to the people of our country.

The government is seeking in its policy to find the right balance in supporting the forward thrust of the economy, in maintaining high employment, and in striking hard at inflationary forces. Briefly stated this means that we intend, first, to put first priority upon a relatively balanced budget in 1969-70; second, to hold down aggregate spending—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): I regret, but I have to interrupt the minister.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, we are perfectly willing to allow the minister to complete his speech. After 20 minutes of platitudes, we will allow him one more minute in which to give us some facts.

Mr. Benson: I thank the Opposition house leader very much and may I tell him that after listening to two days of platitudes I am sure he could stand 20 minutes during which I expressed what is happening in Canada.

An hon. Member: Tell us about the cost of living.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to point out to you that we have no objection if, with the unanimous consent of the house, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson) wishes to go on with his speech, but I should like him to leave us at least a few minutes since one of our members would like to make a few comments.

[English]

Mr. Benson: I will finish in two or three minutes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You finished before you started.

Mr. Benson: You fellows in the N.D.P. were finished 20 years ago, and the sad fact is you are beginning to realize it. Let me continue, Mr. Speaker.

Briefly stated, this means that we intend to put first priority upon a relatively balanced budget in 1969-70; to hold down aggregate spending, but deploy the direction and location of expenditure as much as possible to reduce regional unemployment; to continue strong support for the wide range of supply oriented measures which increase the mobility, training and efficiency of the labour force; to support the central bank in a firm but flexible monetary policy in support of orderly economic expansion; and, finally, to provide adequate resources to the Prices and Incomes Commission in its work of research, education and exposure of inflationary price and cost pressures.

With these policies I am convinced that Canada will move forward in 1969 and that despite the relative lack of interest in this economic debate in the last couple of days, which may indicate that most hon. members are satisfied with what is happening, I can assure all hon. members that we on this side of the house will not be satisfied until the economic goals of relatively full employment in an economy where inflation is limited and price and cost increases are limited, are finally achieved.

Mr. Stanfield: I wonder if the minister would permit a question?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Béchard): Order, please. The time allotted to the minister has expired, unless there is unanimous consent of the house to allow him to speak further.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance whether he would not agree that the white paper tabled by his colleague, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Basford), states that the policies of the government have not successfully curbed inflation or reconciled a sufficient price stability with an adequate rate of employment, and that none of these policies has led to that end.

An hon. Member: Put the question.

Mr. Stanfield: This is my question. I am asking whether he would not agree that whenever adequate levels of employment have been reached, government policies have led to excessive inflation. I am asking the Minister of Finance whether he is putting forward any additional policies which would offset this finding.

Mr. Baldwin: Another cabinet split.

Mr. Benson: What is happening in the Canadian economy is that since the Liberal government first came into power in 1963 there has been a tremendous expansion and such a wonderful spirit of optimism that most Canadians have come to feel that there is no limit to what can be done by our economy. We must all learn, as Canadians, that we cannot take more out of this economy through increased personal incomes or increased business profits—with which my hon. friend is familiar—than we put into it through increased productivity, or else prices are going to increase.

[Translation]

Mr. Oza Tétrault (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words on the unemployment which prevails in Canada, in the province of Quebec, and more particularly in the constituency of Villeneuve which I have had the honour to represent here since the 25th of June last.

Mr. Speaker, like several hon. members I have lived through the economic crisis of the 30s, and I think that what was to blame at that time was the monetary system. For almost 25 years the Ralliement Créditiste has been trying to make that clear to the old political parties of Canada.

At that time, people knew nothing whatever about the machinery of national and international finance. It was a young country and, like today, everything had to be built. However, at that time, like today, we did not apply the necessary measures to finance the projects in question, which would have given work to the unemployed, which would have contributed to build a Canada where it is good to live.

Mr. Speaker, people rebel against a system as inhuman as ours, and they are right. Everybody knows that Canada can feed 100 million people, without too much effort. Labour is not scarce, thanks to modern technology which makes it possible to produce a lot.

We could easily give to each and everyone a decent living and moreover, help the developing countries.

Mr. Speaker, recently, while visiting a small town in my riding, I met unemployed people who were unable to purchase the bare necessities of life.

I even visited a family where the father has a heart condition. He can no longer work and provide for the needs of his family. He is reduced to living miserably in a small house. His ten children sleep in beds without mattresses and without blankets. They are cold and they cough. How can these people believe that they live in a rich and beautiful country like Canada.

How can we feel fortunate to be living in Canada.

[Mr. Benson.]

Today, in 1969, Mr. Speaker, unemployment in Canada is so serious that two persons out of five are ill-fed, badly housed and badly clothed. Undoubtedly, as many people know, 80 per cent of the world's wealth is controlled by 18 per cent of the population. If war broke out today or to-morrow, the Minister of Finance, who said a little while ago that the opposition had no solution to offer, would find a solution quite rapidly.

This afternoon, the Minister of Forestry and Rural Development (Mr. Marchand) said that the opposition had magic solutions. I do not believe that the two ministers are in agreement, because the Minister of Finance told us that the opposition has no solution to offer.

We in the Ralliement Créditiste party, have been repeating over and over again for a long time, the solution is to use the Bank of Canada, which is controlled by the government and could easily finance its projects, as well as those of the municipalities and provincial governments. However nobody seems to listen to us. We are supported by economists who have thoroughly studied the question. Personnally, I have been in the Ralliement Créditiste for 25 years and I sincerely believe that the government should make use of the Bank of Canada to help our population.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to all kinds of speeches this afternoon. People were wondering whether there was enough credit available in Canada, enough machinery, enough building materials to speed up construction and give work to the unemployed. Let us consider the case of Val-d'Or, for instance, where there is one hospital which has outgrown the city's needs. There is sufficient land to build two hospitals such as the existing one but patients are waiting in line to be admitted. Doctors have great difficulties to practice medicine. They say there is no money to build a hospital. What they do not ask themselves is whether there are bricks mortar, manpower, machinery. It is still the powerful dollar which is controlling the world as it has been doing for the last 100 years.

Today, it is still the same old story: the two old parties are passing the buck to one another. In my view they are acting in the same way. As a matter of fact, I myself have lived with the Progressive Conservative party and with the Liberal party, and the more things change, the more they stay the same. Today the party in power is—

Mr. Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member rises on a point of order but I remind him that this is the hon. member's maiden speech and according to the tradition of the house, he should not be interrupted.

Mr. Roy (Laval): My point of order, Mr. Speaker, deals with the definition of old political parties. I think that—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Villeneuve.

Mr. Tétrault: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall continue my remarks to try to bring solutions to the problem of unemployment in Canada, and I believe that the only solution, as I said a moment ago, is to tackle our monetary system. It is the source of all injustices in Canada.

The Bank of Canada is serving the whole population and I believe it would be wise on the part of the federal government to consider the advisability of using it to finance our works.

Mr. Speaker: It being 9.45 o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section (9) of standing order 58, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put every question necessary to dispose of the proceeding concerning the motion now before the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, January 31, 1969

The house met at 11 a.m.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BROADCASTING, FILMS AND ASSISTANCE TO THE ARTS

REFERENCE OF REPORTS OF FILM BOARD AND C.B.C. TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Donald S. Macdonald (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there have been certain discussions among representatives of the parties in respect of the work of the standing committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the arts. I think it is regarded as being desirable that the committee might have the opportunity to continue its studies before the estimates are brought down and, in particular, to travel to Montreal for the purpose of considering questions affecting the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and also the National Film Board.

Perhaps if the house is agreeable I could make the following motion:

That the report of the National Film Board of Canada for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968, tabled on January 27, 1969, and the report of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1968, tabled on January 30, 1969, be referred to the standing committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, and that, for the purpose of its inquiry, the committee be empowered to adjourn from place to place within Canada and the clerk and the necessary supporting staff be authorized to accompany the committee.

Perhaps if the house is agreeable to giving leave in this regard we could make it an order.

Mr. McCleave: Mr. Speaker, it is acceptable.

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

STATEMENT RESPECTING EXCHANGE OF LETTERS BETWEEN QUEBEC AND FRANCE

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have now had an opportunity to examine the letters setting out the arrangements concluded between the governments of Quebec and France on the occasion of the visit of Quebec government representatives to Paris last week. These documents could not of themselves constitute international agreements, and in this connection I have since noted the statements of representatives of the Quebec government that the documents were not intended by Quebec to constitute intergovernmental agreements. We shall be reiterating our position to the French authorities.

[Translation]

The Canadian government understands the desire of the government of Quebec to strengthen its ties through cultural, educational and scientific exhanges with France as contemplated by the 1965 cultural agreement between Canada and France. This is a desire which the Canadian government fully shares and in the fulfilment of which it is more than willing to co-operate.

[English]

Two of the exchanges contemplate activities extending beyond the framework of the cultural agreement, notably in the fields of foreign investments and international telecommunications by satellite. Certain of the programs envisaged by these arrangements will require consultation with and the cooperation of the Canadian government. These matters should have been the subject of prior consultation with the Canadian government. We intend to pursue this point with the French authorities.

With regard to French investments, the Canadian government naturally welcomes the prospect of further increases in foreign investments in Quebec as in other parts of Canada within the framework of government policy on this question. Such investments could provide a significant contribution to the development of our expanding economy. I would not have thought, however, that arrangements of this kind would require to be embodied in an exchange of letters, as evidenced by what happened in the United Kingdom during the same trip. I assume that the two governments simply wished to underline the importance which they attach to co-operation in this area.

Quebec and France Exchange of Letters

The French and Quebec authorities also contemplate co-operation in the use of the Franco-German Symphonie experimental satellite and envisage studies relating to a possible France-Quebec communications satellite.

In this connection I should reiterate that the Canadian government has adopted, in the matter of space communications, a very active policy consistent with its exclusive responsibilities for telecommunications and with the interests of the country including those of Quebec and of French Canadians throughout the land. I might mention, as is well known to members of this house, that a third Canadian satellite was put into orbit just a few days ago.

We have established ourselves as pioneers in space research and have had exchanges for years with a number of leading countries in this field, France included. As a matter of fact three French engineers have come to Canada for training. As for the Symphonie program, we have long since indicated to the governments involved Canada's willingness to consider the extent to which Canadian co-operation might prove beneficial to all concerned. What is required in my view is a willingness to approach in a generally co-operative spirit the various projects contemplated in this field where the Canadian government has an essential role to play. This will guarantee maximum effectiveness in achieving the common objectives of the government's concerned and, I may add, maximum economy which I am sure appeals to the government of Quebec just as much as it appeals to the Government of Canada.

In this instance it seems to me that as the participation of the federal government will be required in any satellite scheme and therefore consultations will of necessity be involved, it would have been preferable for the Quebec government to be willing to take into its confidence the government of the country and to disclose its intentions before making them known and including them in letters of intent to the government of another country. This is all the more true since the plans concerning the visit to Paris and the satellite arrangements were apparently approved by the Quebec government months ago.

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I received the text of the minister's remarks just as I entered the house. They concern a subject of some complexity and consequently my remarks may not be quite as profound as they usually are on a subject of this sort. But there are one or two points I would like to make in a constructive manner, and not so as to contribute in any way to an escalation or a deepening of the difficulties that already exist. Certainly I want to make the point beyond any doubt that whatever happens the essential authority of the government of Canada in connection with foreign policy and diplomatic relations must be preserved. But there has obviously been a dispute for some time between the government of Quebec and the Government of Canada as to the circumstances and the degree to which it is proper for a provincial government to have dealings abroad. There are some real doubts in this field, some of which cannot be satisfied. As I understand it, for example, it is not possible today for the government of Canada to sign an international agreement which involves a provincial legislature to carry out such an agreement. I do not think we can regard such a gap as entirely satisfactory in a country such as ours.

I think there is also a genuine question as to how we really achieve representation abroad in a field entirely within the provincial jurisdiction and how we really establish a delegation that can represent Canada in this area. I do not ask these questions to be controversial but simply for the purpose of stressing the importance of these matters being seriously and urgently discussed. I hope that the federal-provincial conference in February will discuss these matters between the Government of Canada and all the provinces, not simply in the form of a confrontation but with a view to de-escalating the dispute that has been taking place, and to try to reach a firm and satisfactory understanding in these areas under dispute.

It would be difficult to exaggerate the importance of this matter being resolved. I do not for a moment minimize the difficulty about reaching a complete solution, or expect a complete solution to be reached in the course of one federal-provincial conference, but I do stress the hope that this subject will be on the agenda and that any discussions which take place at the federal-provincial conference will be seriously followed up. We do want genuine co-operation; we do want to eliminate all possible areas of dispute between the federal government and the provinces; we do want to eliminate any grey areas which may exist and which may lead to further disputes.

It may not be necessary, but I should like to urge upon members of the government the importance, first of all, of trying to settle these matters in discussion with the provinces generally, the importance of trying to reach a satisfactory settlement, and of course the importance of recognizing that the spirit of co-operation must work both ways if it is to be effective.

I am confident that the members of this government will in fact try to work out this problem in a co-operative way, but I draw attention to the urgency of working it out in advance, so that it does not recur time and time again in the form of disputes over specific questions which have the effect of generating heat and making an ultimate solution more difficult as time goes on.

Mr. David Lewis (York South): I cannot but note, and note with approval, the careful language and the mildness of the reproof to the two governments involved, contained in the statement made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, particularly to the government of the great and friendly nation of France. Perhaps, since I am not a member of the government, I can say as one Canadian that I am beginning to be rather irritated by the way in which the mischievous old man in Paris seeks to add to our difficulties in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Lewis: I wish to join with the Leader of the Opposition in emphasizing, if emphasis is necessary, that the entire question of international relations in respect of areas which are under provincial jurisdiction does require continuing study with the provinces, and a solution which is of a general nature so as to avoid these confrontations from time to time. I have always felt unhappy as a Canadian that there should be many conventions and the like to which Canada has subscribed at various international organizations, but has been unable to ratify or implement because of the nature of jurisdiction inside this country.

May I say that I was a little surprised that the Secretary of State for External Affairs seemed to feel there was something undesirable about the letters exchanged in connection with investments. There is nothing new about provinces seeking foreign investment. Many of the provinces of Canada have been doing this over a long period of time.

We do agree entirely that in an area of exclusive federal jurisdiction like telecommunications, it is important for the government of Canada to remain and to be firm, to insist that in that field the government of Canada must be consulted, that it must have the initiative and must continue to have exclusive jurisdiction, even though in practice part of the exercise of that jurisdiction may be delegated to the provinces within their own exclusive field.

Therefore we approve both of the firmness which is implied in the statement, and the necessarily careful language in which that firmness was expressed.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, the minister stated yesterday, I think, in answer to a question, that he was studying the correspondence between Quebec and France regarding their latest arrangements and today he made a statement to the effect that he has studied those agreements.

Hon. members have not had, like him the good fortune to study the correspondence exchanged by the governments of Quebec and France, but I think that, reading the statement made this morning by the minister, one cannot help but feel that we are a little sensitive when Quebec has dealings with France.

The minister recognized that the signing of those agreements between the governments of Canada and France dates back to 1965 and that the latest arrangements made between the French government and the government of Quebec are meant only to continue those agreements.

It seems that two criticisms are implied in the minister's statement. When France plans to invest more in Quebec, we think it is normal and when it means that Quebec will get into debt, even if the investments come from France, we think that it is logical and that the government of Quebec has not gone too far.

However, when the French government signs letters of intent with the government of Quebec, regarding education, we become a bit nervous. I feel that we get nervous a little too easily, as the next federal-provincial conference will have to settle the question of telecommunications which comes within the jurisdiction of the federal government, and the question of education which comes within the exclusive competence of the provinces. If today the minister seems to say that the government of Quebec should have put more trust in the government of the country, I think that cuts both ways because the federal government has been interfering in fields of provincial jurisdiction long before today. I will quote one example only which comes to my mind this morning, since we have very little time.

It is about the adult education program set up by the Department of Manpower, and under which those who are in charge of courses in the various provinces have to follow the instructions of the federal government. The Quebec government and other provincial governments have suffered, in several circumstances, from the fact that the central government had interfered in fields outside its jurisdiction, and had taken unfair advantage of its rights as the central authority, because it was the first to do something. In my opinion, the Quebec government is getting nervous, and it was anxious to make the first move to make sure that education by satellite would at least be carried out between France and Quebec.

Now, nothing prevents the federal government from putting into effect any technological progress in the field of satellite communications, since it concerns telecommunications. If, on the one hand, the federal government deems advisable to take an interest in that field because it feels that it can afford it, and if, on the other hand, it doubts, as the Prime Minister said in the house a few days ago, whether Quebec is still financially in a position to meet the cost of the Quebec-French satellite, then it should take action because, in my opinion, Quebec has been one of the provinces in Confederation that has paid its share and has not been among the least taxed.

Today, one is amazed that Quebec is still in good shape financially, which, in my view is insulting for the French Canadians and the Quebec population. The Quebec government went rather far—let us admit it—on a matter which has not been settled yet. We are speaking of satellites, a field which falls within the jurisdiction of the federal government, and of education, which falls within the jurisdiction of the provinces.

Provinces are given responsibilities with regard to roads, education and in many other fields, but the federal government holds the purse strings. In fact, it has the power to tax and to control money whilst administrative responsibilities in several fields fall on the provinces. That is when conflicts arise, not only in the field of satellites, education or telecommunications, but as far as financial matters are concerned. The provinces have responsibilities, but the power to fulfill such responsibilities remain in the hands of the federal government.

I therefore hope that at the close of the federal-provincial conference which is to take place within a few days, we shall get something more than a press release stating: We have found out that problems exist in Canada, but we are expecting to come out with a solution at the next federal-provincial conference.

ORAL QUESTIONS

EXPO '67

USE OF SITE TO HOUSE INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT CENTRE

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether his government intends to implement a suggestion made by the former prime minister, Mr. Pearson, that the site of Expo '67 should be used to house a centre of international development? Also, has any progress been made in implementing a decision announced in the Speech from the Throne opening this session regarding an international development centre in Canada?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, to answer the first part of the question, we learned only yesterday that Montreal would not continue with Man and His World. It is too early for us to know what should be done with this area. To answer the second part of the question, the Centre for International Development has been the subject of a great deal of study by the Department of External Affairs, and especially by the Canadian International Development Agency. When we present our white paper on external policy I think we will be in a position to suggest what we wish to do with the Centre for International Development.

Mr. Stanfield: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I realize the Prime Minister has not had too much time overnight to consider the matter, but is the government prepared to consider seriously the suggestion of Mr. Pearson about the use of the site of Expo '67? Is the government prepared to look into this matter seriously at this time?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I can only repeat that overnight I have not had a chance to give any consideration to this question. The land itself, except for a very small portion of it which is federal property, belongs to the city of Montreal. We cannot make any suggestions now about what we want to do with this city of Montreal land. If the city is prepared to dispose of it in some way, then we will consider the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, since the question of Expo is brought up again, this morning I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

Does he think that Quebec is in a good enough financial condition to take over the operations of Expo 67?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I doubt that the question as asked is in order.

[English]

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the Prime Minister not agree that the grinding to a halt, under a long series of deficits, of Man and His World reflects accurately man and his world as exemplified by Canada at the present time, and the way we are living in Canada?

Mr. Benson: We are not finished by any means.

[Translation]

Mr. André Fortin (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary question to the Prime Minister.

When a problem occurred in Nova Scotia about the coal industry, the federal government invested $30 million to assist 4,000 laid off employees. The federal government—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member must ask a question and not deliver a speech.

Mr. Fortin: Since the federal government, as I said a while ago, had then decided to take an emergency measure—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must remind the hon. member that he must ask a question and not make a speech.

Mr. Fortin: Agreed, Mr. Speaker. Could the Prime Minister not take a similar attitude about "Man and His World" at the present time?

Mr. Trudeau: I fail to understand Mr. Speaker, how I can take a similar attitude about "Man and His World". The question does not make sense.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Lotbinière on a point of order.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, my question may not make sense, but it is very simple.

In the past, in cases of major problems, the federal government has helped by way of direct financial assistance and I wonder whether such an intervention would be possible for "Man and His World", and if the government will do something as it did before in Nova Scotia for the coal industry?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member does not raise a point of order, he repeats the same question. Perhaps the Prime Minister wishes to answer.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member refers to an intervention from the federal government; I presume he believes that the government should offer a subsidy. I would like to remind hon. members what they already know, that the federal government has made a substantial contribution for the success of Expo. In fact, I think the share of the Canadian people in Expo reached over $140 million. If we were to renew those contributions, the hon. member would have to agree that we spend less money in his riding, in the Gaspé region, that we cut expenses for the international airport, etc.

We do not print money no matter what the hon. member thinks, and the point is to know whether the continuation of Expo has priority over all other government policies. If the hon. member suggests that we should stop a present undertaking in the province of Quebec, in order to help Expo, we shall think about it.

Mr. Fortin: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

I should like to ask the Minister of Labour or his parliamentary secretary if the federal government intends to take special steps to assist the employees to be laid off due to the closing of "Man and His World"? That is a federal matter and the government will have to print money to extricate itself.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

PLANS TO DEAL WITH HOUSING FOR NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. David Lewis (York South): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Since there is growing and disturbing evidence of very difficult housing conditions among our native Indian peoples, will the minister tell the house whether his department is giving particular and urgent attention to this problem and whether concrete plans for dealing with it are being developed?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, there has been for several years a program for the construction of houses for the Indians of Canada. Under this program, in force for the last three and a half years, 5,500 new houses have been built and we expect to complete it during the next three years. The government's purpose is to give decent housing to each family within this period of time. The program, which was to be for five years, was extended to seven years.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: A supplementary question. In view of the fact, Mr. Speaker, that the program has obviously proved inadequate and that some 500 homes cannot possibly deal with it, is the minister and the department considering allocating a much larger amount of money and creating more effective agencies to increase the number of homes for the Indian people?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the situation. I am deeply concerned and we are endeavouring to formulate perhaps more effective policies with a view to ensuring better housing conditions. However, I should like the hon. member to recognize that we have made considerable progress in that field in the last few years.

[English]

Mr. Lewis: Another supplementary question. This is directed to the Minister of Transport in his capacity as the minister in charge of housing. May I say, Mr. Speaker, I do not quite agree he has made much progress, even though he did make some. In the report which the minister tabled the other day he recognized that the native people who do not come under the department of Indian affairs are suffering from shameful housing conditions. In view of the not very concrete recommendation in the report—and I have other adjectives which are not in order—

Mr. Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to ask his question.

Mr. Lewis: I am coming to the question. I would like to ask the minister whether he is considering allocating more adequate funds for the building of homes for the native people of this country?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): There are two pilot projects under way at the present time, which are being pursued with dispatch. I think we have to engage in projects in these areas because there was inadequate research to really know exactly what should be done. I think it is a good idea to carry out these projects, and then to evaluate them, before going into a program of master building in these areas. As was recommended, this should be a continuous process; but I do think there is so much to be learned in these areas one should be very careful to make sure each program is evaluated before making it the basis for a wide program.

Mr. Lewis: We need homes.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

PRESS REPORT CONCERNING DELAY IN ARMED SERVICES PENSIONS

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence in order to allay consternation which I am sure is rampant in the armed services this morning, due to a news report in the Globe and Mail apparently quoting the Auditor General. This article is to the effect that it is the intention of the government to delay payment of armed services pensions to retired members of the armed services until they reach the age of 60. Since there must be some error in this, would the minister give us the facts?

Hon. Leo Cadieux (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the article could not be more inaccurate, I am sorry to say. With regard to pensions, there is no change planned in respect of servicemen retiring after 20 or more years service or reaching retirement age, according to their rank. What we are planning to do is give an additional option to serving members who retire after 20 years service. The only choice they now have is the return of contributions. We want to give them the option of a deferred annuity at the age of 60, which is a far cry from what the article states.

Mr. MacLean: The minister stated this option was open to personnel who have served 20 years or more. Did he not mean personnel who have served for 10 years or less?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I thought I said 10 years; in any event I mean between 10 and 20 years.

Mr. MacLean: Yes.

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): I think I should also state that at the present time the only choice for personnel retiring voluntarily is the return of contributions. This new option allows for a deferred annuity, if this is preferred. It must be pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that this would have to be in the form of legislation introduced in the house, and is now under government study.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if progress is being made in connection with his stated hope that by spring something would be done to increase the pensions of those already retired?

Mr. Cadieux (Labelle): Progress is being made, I am sure, by the Department of Finance, which is co-ordinating our efforts.

Mr. Stanfield: Very little.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the Minister or Finance make a statement on the progress being made by him in connection with the pensions of all our federal superannuates?

An hon. Member: Come on Scrooge!

Hon. W. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are still examining the problem.

FINANCE

POSSIBILITY OF HAVING MR. TOWERS BEFORE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Benson).

Inquiries of the Ministry

In view of the fact that Mr. Graham Towers, the first governor of the Bank of Canada, said yesterday that the federal budget is clearly out of control, does the Minister of Finance intend to call Mr. Towers before the committee on finance, trade and economic affairs to find out what his grounds are?

Mr. Speaker: The member is obviously alluding to the proceedings of a committee and I doubt that the question can be put to the minister himself in those terms.

AIRPORT

QUEBEC—LOCATION OF INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Transport.

Does he intend to announce soon what site has been chosen for the new international airport?

Mr. Speaker: I suggest that this question, almost word for word, has been put several times in the last few days.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

IRAQ—REACTION TO CANADIAN GOVERNMENT REPRESENTATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, is the Secretary of State for External Affairs now in a position to inform the house and the country of the reaction of the government of Iraq to the representations made by the Canadian government in connection with the slaughter of a number of persons during the last week?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not yet in that position. I have not yet received a report.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I would ask the minister, in view of the seriousness of the situation, does he not think that communication should be a little faster at a time like this? Is it not about time to make an announcement on the part of the government?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He's going too slow for me.

Inquiries of the Ministry

SHIPBUILDING

CANADIAN VICKERS—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING LAY-OFFS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): A question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Is the minister in a position to give a report to the house on the progress of discussions reportedly going on between Canadian Vickers and the Government concerning 800 lay-offs in the shipbuilding industry?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): We had a meeting yesterday with the Shipbuilding Association, of which Canadian Vickers is a member, and reviewed the situation of shipbuilding in Canada. Two things were decided: First, that the government would recognize the importance of shipbuilding in Canada, and we do; second, that a committee of industry and government would be formed to study the situation as it now exists and will be in the next year or so. We agreed and the committee will make recommendations to the government.

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): May I ask if the Minister of Transport attended this meeting? If so, did he put forward the case for the merchant marine as forcibly as did the government during the last election compaign?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Translation]

[Later:]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I find that I did not give an adequate answer to a question asked earlier by the hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). I gave a general answer without mentioning the Vickers in particular.

I should like here to refer the hon. member to a statement made yesterday by the president of Vickers—it was published in Le Devoir on January 30—to the effect that he recognizes the difficulties the shipbuilding industry is going through. He says however that the maintenance and repairs side of it is doing very well and that 50 per cent of his company's business comes from its industrial branch, which gets help from the federal government.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

HOUSING

PROVISIONS TO ASSIST LOW INCOME CANADIANS

Mrs. Grace MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport in his capacity as the minister responsible for housing. In view of the opinion stated today by the Canadian Welfare Council that proposals of the task force on housing contain no proposals to help poorly housed Canadians—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member should ask the question directly.

Mrs. MacInnis (Vancouver-Kingsway): I am ready. Could the minister say what proposals if any he has in mind to help the one million Canadians with incomes under $5,500?

Mr. Speaker: The question as asked by the hon. member is very wide in scope. I would think she is asking the minister for a statement on policy which should not be made at this time.

POWER

NELSON RIVER, MAN.—ALLEGED HARMFUL EFFECTS OF DEVELOPMENT

Mr. E. B. Osler (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. Has the federal government been given an opportunity to evaluate a so-called secret report submitted to the government of Manitoba concerning power development on the Nelson River which report reputedly claims that present plans may be harmful to at least four viable communities including the port of Churchill—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member should ask his question. He should not make an argument.

Mr. Osler: Has the minister had an opportunity to see this so-called report and evaluate its harmful effect on at least four communities?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): It has not been brought to my attention, if it exists, but I would be glad to make inquiries.

GRAIN

VANCOUVER, B.C.—MOVEMENT TO LOAD SHIPS IN PORT

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce in reference to grain. I wonder at this time whether he can assure the House of Commons and the country whether there is now sufficient No. 2 northern grain being moved to Vancouver to load the ships which have been lying idle for so long.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): That is the purpose of the operation that is taking place now, but I will have occasion in the next three or four days to see for myself. I will make a more specific answer when I return.

Mr. Woolliams: I wonder whether, when the minister makes the trip and the investigation, he will assure the house that we have not lost any of our markets, particularly the Japanese market.

FISHERIES

B.C. SALMON—ACTION TO RESTORE STABILITY TO INDUSTRY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct this question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the crisis in the British Columbia salmon fishing industry and the imminent closure of coastal salmon packing operations affecting the livelihood of over 600 workers will the minister say what action is planned by the government to restore some stability to the industry in which two pioneer firms have been driven out of business?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is asking the question in a very general way. He is asking the minister to make a statement of policy. I doubt whether the question as asked is in order.

Mr. Crouse: I would like to ask what action the government is taking in this regard.

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): I should like to make clear that the salmon fishing industry on the west coast, over all, is in good shape. However, some areas are in difficulties. We have been holding discussions recently with the Indian people who live in those areas.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question which I should like to direct to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Arising from the meetings held in Terrace, British Columbia, by the minister, and the representations made to him by Indian workers affected by the lay-offs at the packing plant, and by the 3,000 people in those families, will the minister say whether he is making any recommendations to the government to accelerate its economic development program for Indians in that area.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, on my return from Terrace I immediately got in touch with the Minister of Fisheries. We discussed that problem and we are trying to find a solution for those 300 Indians who may suffer from the after-effects of automation. We are also considering schemes that would enable us to promote other economic activities in the area.

RESEARCH

AVAILABILITY OF REVIEW OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAM

Mr. J. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that a nuclear physicist from the University of Toronto suggested last weekend that scientific research in this country is in a very unfortunate state, I wonder whether the Minister without Portfolio—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It seems to me that hon. members are getting into the rather bad habit of prefacing their questions by allusion to statements made outside the house. I would think this is not good practice. The hon. member should ask the question directly.

Mr. Broadbent: I will do so, Mr. Speaker. Will the Minister without Portfolio from Saskatoon-Humboldt inform the house when he anticipates his review of government scientific research programs will be complete.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister without Portfolio): I have a little difficulty understanding which review the hon. member is referring to.

Mr. Broadbent: I was not aware that the minister was conducting more than one review on scientific policy. If so would he tell us which review he intends to report on first.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

AVAILABILITY OF POSITION PAPERS AND AGENDA

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question relating to the forthcoming federal-provincial conference. Is he prepared to release to the house and to the country generally the federal position papers, so that the members of the house and the country will be more fully informed and be able to follow the discussions. Also is the Prime Minister in a position to release the agenda for the conference?

Right Hon. P.-E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker. In answer to the leader of the New Democratic party, earlier, I believe I indicated some dates we were proposing. These dates have been accepted by the general consensus of the provinces. The result will be that on Monday next the secretariat will release its report of the committee of officials, and also the agenda, whereas most of the provinces will be releasing on the following Thursday, next Thursday, their position papers on various propositions they will submit at the constitutional conference. One or two provinces may not observe this particular deadline, but that is the one that has been reached in agreement with most of the provinces—next Thursday.

EXTERNAL AID

EXPEDITIOUS DISTRIBUTION OF ASSISTANCE TO DEVELOPING COUNTRIES

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Fundy-Royal): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Will the minister explain the lag reported by the O.E.C.D. between preliminary appropriation of external aid and the actual distribution of the aid to developing countries, and will he reassure us that measures will be taken to ensure that Canadian assistance approved by this parliament for developing countries reaches them more expeditiously.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I would have thought that would be an excellent question to discuss on the estimates of the department. We will certainly be ready at that time. It is the object of the government to try to reduce this lag which has arisen for reasons, some of them very important reasons, and to ensure that our program is carried out well and quickly.

Mr. Fairweather: In the light of the report by the O.E.C.D. that private Canadian contributions to international development have slackened, has the government any plan to encourage greater involvement by the private sector in international development projects.

Mr. Sharp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Stanfield.]

STUDENT LOANS

CURTAILMENT OF GRANTS TO FOREIGN STUDENTS ENGAGED IN DISORDERLY ACTS

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I posed a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs concerning foreign students who are here under our aid programs. I am wondering whether the minister is now in a position to answer the question. Apparently it took him a bit by surprise.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I am still caught by surprise, Mr. Speaker. I did not intend to be here today.

RURAL DEVELOPMENT

NOVA SCOTIA—ARDA REPORT RESPECTING NORTHERN COUNTIES

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the parliamentary secretary to the minister for rural development whether he has an answer regarding the ARDA task force report.

Mr. Russell C. Honey (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry and Rural Development): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The report to which my hon. friend refers I think is in respect of a joint study for the federal government and the province of Nova Scotia. There must be concurrence on the part of the province in respect of making the report public. It is the joint opinion of the federal government and the government of Nova Scotia that publication would be premature.

The main finding of the report is that progress for these counties will depend on developments in the rest of the Atlantic region, and therefore there is more research for us to do jointly with the province, before development plans can be prepared.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the importance of this report I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary might confer with the minister and consider publication of those parts of the report which might be helpful to the over-all program of regional development?

Mr. Honey: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to confer with the minister. The hon. member will understand, of course, that we would have to obtain concurrence from the government of Nova Scotia, but I will take this up with the minister.

HIGHWAY SAFETY

HAZARDS CREATED BY THROWAWAY CONTAINERS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs but in his absence I will direct it to his parliamentary secretary. In view of the minister's concern about the dangerous hazards created by throwaway containers strewn about our highways and beaches, will he inform the house whether there have been any further negotiations on this matter between his department and the provinces?

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will bring the hon. member's representation to the minister's attention.

HOUSING

COMPLAINTS RESPECTING PROPOSALS OF ONTARIO HOUSING CORPORATION

Mr. Robert McCleave (Halifax-East Hants): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. May I first thank the hon. gentleman, as I meant to do on Wednesday, for his courtesy in providing opposition spokesmen with copies of his task force report. Has the minister studied the complaints of Mr. Suters of the Ontario Housing Corporation that some of its proposals have gone through C.M.H.C. to the Privy Council office and disappeared there, and what is being done to correct or explain this situation?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, there has been no official word in respect of this matter. If my hon. friend is referring to a newspaper article, I can only say that there are, of course, some projects in the pipe line which are being studied. In the normal course, their disposition will depend on any policy decisions which may be taken in the meantime.

POSSIBILITY OF REFERRING TASK FORCE REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. John Gilbert (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport and part time minister of housing. Is it the intention of the minister to refer the report of the task force on housing to the appropriate standing committee of the house in order that it may examine the outrageous recommendations in respect of housing and regional development?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

TRADE

POTATOES—COMMISSION TO SEEK EXPANDED MARKET

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I might put a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce which I asked last Friday but which seems to have resulted in some confusion in Hansard? It relates to the possibility of the minister's department establishing at the earliest possible date a trade mission for the purpose of seeking to expand the seed potato market, which is of vital importance in view of the very depressed market at the present time in the Atlantic region.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, there has been no such request for a mission at this time, but there is provision in the department's promotional programs for an incoming trade mission on seed potatoes to take place this year. We also have plans to undertake additional trade missions to promote this commodity. I might mention that the total export movement of all potatoes thus far this season shows some improvement over the same period last year, and I have here statistics to demonstrate that.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): At what price?

SALES OF HAIR SEAL SKINS

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, may I also answer quickly a question asked by the hon. member for St. John's West having to do with sales of hair seal skins. They have improved markedly in the past few months. Reports from the most recent auction sale indicate that prices have advanced 20 per cent since September, 1968, and that demand is strong.

FISHERIES

SEALS—REQUEST THAT OPENING DATE BE SET AHEAD

Mr. Walter C. Carter (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on January 24 I directed a question to the Minister of Defence Production in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries. My question related to the opening date of the seal harvest in the gulf of St. Lawrence. Is the Minister of Fisheries prepared to make a statement as to the possibility of pushing that date ahead?

Hon. Jack Davis (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, current plans are for the Harp seal hunting season to open on March 7 this year in the gulf of St. Lawrence and on March 12 on the Atlantic front. Further details as to quotas, hunting practices and so on will be announced at an early date.

Mr. Melvin McQuaid (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the right hon. Prime Minister. I wonder whether the right hon. gentleman would now stop beating around the bush and give us a—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. McQuaid: —clear and unequivocal answer—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

BUFFALO NARROWS, SASK.—ACTS OF VIOLENCE

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, in light of the alarming reports of repeated acts of violence affecting Indian and Métis people in the region of Buffalo Narrows, Saskatchewan, will the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development report to the house on conditions in Buffalo Narrows and indicate any special measures his department intends to take?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the matter raised by the hon. member. I shall inquire and report to the house next time I am in attendance.

MALNUTRITION IN PRAIRIE PROVINCES RESERVATIONS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I brought an instance to the attention of the minister of Indian affairs this morning and I do not want to repeat it, but I should like to ask whether he will have an immediate survey made of the Indian reservations in northern Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba with a view to ascertaining whether by reason of the long, cold winter many of the people on these reserves are suffering from malnutrition and have insufficient to eat?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. member for Prince Albert for telephoning me this morning. I immediately contacted my deputy minister and asked him to investigate the matter. This is very bad news and I do hope that it is unfounded.

At any rate, I shall report to the house early next week, and if anything needs to be done, we would take the appropriate measures.

TRANSPORT

ATTENDANCE OF MINISTER AT MARITIMES COMMITTEE SITTINGS

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Lancaster): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of housing and part time Minister of Transport. Will the minister—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether questions could be asked in a way which could make it easier for the Chair to accept them.

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I will ask the well known and favourable Minister of Transport whether he plans to attend any of the transport committee hearings which are to be held in the maritime provinces in the way he attended the meetings of the housing task force?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of Transport): I had not planned to do so, Mr. Speaker, but now that I know I am welcome I might give some consideration to the idea. I do plan to visit two or three maritime centres during the course of the next couple of months to review some matters of mutual interest to my hon. friend. I do not know whether this will coincide with the trip of the committee. Perhaps I will have to meet my friend down there on some other occasion which will have to be determined.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, in view of the meetings of the transport committee in the Atlantic region I wonder whether the minister has been in contact with his counterpart, the secretary of transport, or officials of the state of Maine, to consider the possibility of a corridor road, in view of various considerations that will be given by the transport committee during its hearings in that region?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I am afraid anything I might say in respect of a corridor road or other matters concerning the possibility of changes in maritime transportation policy might be considered a leak. This is a project of fascination, Mr. Speaker, and I will be very pleased to look at its possibilities and discuss it with my hon. friends when we are considering transportation policies some time later in March.

EXHIBITIONS

INQUIRY AS TO DISPOSAL OF MAN AND HIS WORLD SITE

Mr. Gilbert Rondeau (Shefford): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Can he tell us whether he was speaking on behalf of the government when he stated yesterday that even if the City of Montreal wanted to give Man and his World to the federal government, the latter would not even consider it.

Is that the official policy of the government—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have never made such a statement.

HOUSING

REMOVAL OF LENDING RATE CEILING

Mr. Ed Schreyer (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance to indicate whether his department has under formal review or has given sympathetic consideration to the proposal that the ceiling on N.H.A. lending rates be completely removed? Could the minister say whether this is under review at the present time by his officials?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this would require a change in the National Housing Act which, if it were to occur, would be proposed by my colleague the minister responsible for housing.

Mr. Schreyer: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I gather from the minister's reply that I should direct it to the Minister of Transport. I ask the Minister of Transport whether systematic consideration is being given at the present time to the proposition that the N.H.A. lending rate ceiling be removed entirely.
