ERICSSON'S PROPELLER COMPARED WITH SMITH'S SCREW

An Archimedean screw, properly speaking is a single thread winding spirally around a shaft as a centre, and terminating at any desired angle at its circumference. It has been familiarly described as-resembling a patent corkscrew. Used as a propeller, an inclinafamiliarly described as-resembling a patent corkscrew. Used as a propeller, an inclination of forty-five degrees, with its axis, must be the best, as one revolution will then give the same progressive as it does lateral motion—that is to say, 31-7th times its diameter.—Constructed with the thread terminating at this angle, (being 5 ft. 9 in. in diam ter.) its length should be 18 feet: such a screw, however, applied to the dead roood of a ship would be inconvenient, hence the necessity of reducing it. The angle of the thread must, of course, be reduced in proportion, and the speed of the propeller increased, 8 feet is the length of the Archimedean screw a, with one length of the Archimedean screw a, with one turn of the thread; but the two threaded screw b is the one now in use (even 8 feet bescrew b is the one now in use (even 8 feet besing rather inconvenient to be exposed to the surge of a ship in a heavy sea.) His Royal Highness the Duke of Sussex, it is stated, was unable to attend from Indisposition. The Earl of Albernarie having to come from the stud-house at Hampton court did not arrive till late in the day, but previous to the birth of the infant, which the medical attendants announced was in favorable progress. In her Majesty's chamber were the Duchess of Kent Prince Albert, and the medical men, with Mrs. Lily and some of the ladies of the bedchamber; while, in an adjoining apartment, the door of which was open, were the other distinguished individuals mentioned. As the day advanced the Palace was kept in perfect quietness, while all noise from without, from quietness, while all noise from without, from the passing of bands or otherwise, was inter-dicted. From those who had the best means of information, we learn that her Majesty evinced a firmness and composure almost in-credible,—at intervals exhibiting a cheerfulness and patient submission to her sufferings in all respects consistent with the well-known attributes of her character.
