OF THE DEBATES

OF THE

HOUSE OF COMMONS

OF THE

DOMINION OF CANADA.

FIRST SESSION—SIXTH PARLIAMENT.

50-51° VICTORIÆ, 1887.

VOL. XXIV.

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE THIRTIETH DAY OF MAY TO THE TWENTY-THIRD DAY OF JUNE, 1887.

House of Commons Debates

FIRST SESSION, SIXTH PARLIAMENT.—50-51 VIC.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 30th May, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

QUESTIONS OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BERGIN Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call attention to the omission from the division list on disallowance of railway charters in Manitoba of the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Purcell), who voted against the motion of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. The hon. member for Glengarry.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. member for Glengarry desired me to bring this matter before the House, and he can explain it himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. The hon. member for Glengarry.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member does not wish to explain, I do not see how I can press him to do so.

Mr. MILLS. I should like to ask the First Minister when we may expect the papers in reply to the motion adopted by this House relating to the resignation of the High Commissioner, relating to the appointment of his successor, and to the object of the late High Commissioner's visit to this country, the time when the residence in London belonging to the country was closed, and who has since occupied it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I promised the hon. gentleman that the information would be brought down at once. I am rather surprised it has not been brought down. I will enquire into it. In regard to the subject brought up by the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Bergin), the hon. member for Stormont has stated that he was instructed by the hon. member for Glengarry to bring up this point, to state the fact that he had voted against the motion of the hon. member for Marquette, and we should like to know whether that was the fact or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The Minutes will tell.

Mr. MILLS. I have information from the west, and I should like to know whether there is any foundation for it or not. I understand the Government have communicated with the revising officers throughout the country, telling them that they are not to act on the law and discharge those duties which the law has imposed on them; and I should like to know whether the Government have made such a communication to the revising officers, and, if so, upon what authority it has been done? I believe, it was customary in the time of Charles I, to exercise a dispensing power.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS. I am putting a question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is more than a question.

Mr. MILLS. That was the position in those days; and I should like to know whether the Government are about to act in like manner now.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has certainly a right to ask a question, but there is another rule which says that questions must not be accompanied by comments.

Mr. MACKENZIE. This is a matter of privilege.

Mr. SPEAKER. As a matter of decorum, the ordinary rule should be followed in this case as well as in other cases.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS. I have no intention whatever of dissenting from your ruling, Mr. Speaker. I know, however, that the English practice is—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MILLS. I am simply stating a fact: that the English practice is for a member to make his question intelligible. I am not dissenting—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. MILLS—from the Speaker's ruling.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, chair.

Mr. MILLS. I have put a question, and I want an answer to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the hon. gentleman will give two days notice, we will answer it.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is the only way to treat the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MILLS. Then, I give the hon. gentleman notice now.

Mr. SCARTH. I rise for the purpose of making a personal explanation. The following is part of the Toronto Globe's report of the speech of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), on the question of disallowance:—

"For instance, the member for Winnipeg stated to the people that if elected he would use his influence with the Government to have the disallowance policy stopped."

Mr. SCARTH denied that he had used such an expression."

Now, I did not deny that statement. The hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) stated that I said on a platform in Winnipeg that I had a telegram from Sir John A. Macdonald saying that he would do away with the policy of disallowance, and that is what I denied. I came here pledged to do everything I could against disallowance; I voted against it, as the House knows—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. SCARTH. I am not at all afraid of the laughter of hon. gentlemen. I know what I pledged myself to do; I came here pledged to do all I could against disallowance; I voted against it, as hon. gentlemen know; I saw every member of the Ministry privately, and endeavored to get them to do away with it—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SCARTH. And every hon. gentleman on this side knows that.

Mr. PURCELL. I want to make one remark. On Friday morning I voted for disallowance, but the gentleman there did not record my name right.

Mr. WATSON. I would just say, with reference to the explanation made by the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth), that I am not responsible for any statements made by the press. The remark I made on that subject, as reported by the Hansard reporters and recorded in Hansard, is absolutely correct. It is exactly what I said, and I think the hon. gentleman will find it correct.

JOHN R. DUNN.

On the Order :

John R. Dunn, returning officer at the last election for the electoral district of the county of Queen's, N.B., to attend at the Bar of the House, to be examined touching his conduct as such returning officer in returning a candidate who had not a majority of votes at the said election.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will please see that Mr. Dunn is in attendance.

The SERGEANT-AT-ARMS. Mr. Speaker, John R. Dunn is in attendance.

Mr. SPEAKER. Admit the gentleman.

Mr. LANDERKIN. He is a nice gentleman.

JOHN R. DUNN came before the Bar.

Mr. WELDON. I move that Mr. John R. Dunn be asked this question: "Were you returning officer for the Electoral District of the County of Queen's, N.B., at the late election; and who was your Election Clerk?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, being a layman I would like to have the assistance of counsel, to protest against these proceedings being taken against me by the House of Commons, and also to advise and assist me in whatever things may be necessary.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move:

That John R. Dunn, who is about to be heard at the Bar, be allowed assistance of counsel to advise him and to argue any question of law that may arise.

I believe it is the general practice to allow persons so appearing to be advised by counsel, and I therefore make this motion.

Mr. WELDON. The question is one of privilege and of examination before the Bar of the House, and, as I understand, the person at the Bar, who is to be heard, asks for counsel to protest against the proceedings of this House, and also to advise him as to what he may say. I think that is an extraordinary position for him to put forward. I do not think he is here to argue questions of law, but to answer questions of fact.

Mr. THOMPSON. The request made by the person about to be examined was that he desired counsel to protest against the House proceeding further with the case, or something to that effect. Of course I do not make a motion directed to that particular objection, but inasmuch as questions of law may arise, and he has applied for leave to have counsel to assist him, I think it would be more convenient to put the motion generally—that he be allowed to have counsel to advise him upon any legal questions which may arise—than to put a separate motion to have counsel to argue any particular question. Of course, if no legal questions arise, counsel will not be required to advise him, but I think it is better to make the motion general in this way.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me that it is not questions of law that we are here to discuss, but questions of fact. We have brought Mr. Dunn here for the purpose of giving us information as to the facts—as to who had the majority of votes, as to whether he was returning officer, and as to whom he returned. If the emergency arises that questions of law are raised, it will then be time enough for Mr. Dunn to make application for legal assistance. In the meantime all we have to discuss are questions of fact.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would suggest that it is necessary, if counsel is to be of any assistance when questions of law do arise, that counsel should be present at the whole examination. And I submit to the hon. gentleman's own judgment this proposition, that if counsel is to be of any benefit at all to the person to be examined, it must be in the discretion of that counsel himself to raise any legal question on behalf of his client that may occur to him in the progress of the examination. It is true, the examination, so far as the House is concerned, will be confined to questions of fact entirely; but if there is a legal question in respect of which the person inculpated can claim exoneration, surely it can only be right that the question should be raised. It cannot be raised by a layman; it can only be raised by a person learned in the law, and if he is to have that assistance, it should be when the question is first raised.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not understand that the gentleman at the Bar has not asked for the assistance of counsel to do for him what the hon. Minister of Justice proposes. I understand that the gentleman at the Bar is here in answer to the Order of this House, and instead of answering the question that the House has carried should be put to him, he asks the liberty of having counsel to protest against the decision which this House has already come to, that he as an officer of this House should attend at the Bar to answer for his conduct. That has already been decided by the House, and this gentleman comes here and asks the assistance of counsel to argue the point as to whether he shall obey that Order. The hon. Minister of Justice proposes that he shall have counsel allowed him, not for that purpose, but for the purpose for which the gentleman does not ask counsel, namely: to advise him in case any legal points are raised.

Mr. THOMPSON. If my hon. friend will allow me to interrupt him for a moment. I understand that the gentleman at the Bar believes that the question raised is a legal question on which counsel should be allowed him. Inasmuch as he thinks it is a legal point on which counsel should be heard, I offer the motion that counsel should be heard on any legal question.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. Minister of Justice has not apprehended the argument I was urging. It was this: It did not seem to me consistent with the dignity of this House that it should now proceed to receive arguments as to the propriety of a decision which it has arrived at and placed on its Journals. The hon. gentleman's resolution does not say this, but the gentleman asks that counsel shall be allotted to him to argue the question—to protest, as he puts it, against our proceedings altogether. Now, I, for one, protest against any such resolution being adopted. This gentleman is an officer of the House. He has acted in a way which appeared to the House prima facie to be a disregard of the Statutes of the land. He has been called, on the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which has been adopted by this House, to answer for his conduct. He may have a good answer to make; I am not going to prejudice his case; but after the report of the committee has been approved and ratified by the House, that we should now hear counsel argue that the whole proceedings are irregular, is, in my opinion, derogatory to the dignity of the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think it will be found, on looking at parliamentary practice, that this is the course that is usually taken, and that ought to be taken. The hon. gentleman says that the House has decided for itself that the party should be brought before the Bar. Well, every time a person is brought before the Bar of the House of Commons in England, it has been upon an absolute resolution, on the supposition that the party is culpable. The right of exculpation is always allowed. Again and again parties have been brought before the Bar of the House of Commons, charged, upon the vote of the House, with having been guilty of certain misdoing. The whole case is heard at the Bar, and the party, as the hon. gentleman knows, is often discharged and the proceedings are dropped on the statement of the party. Now, it is very singular, and I do not see how hon. gentlemen opposite would like it to go to the country, that when a man says he wants to have counsel his request should be refused. This is the only tribunal in Canada where it would be refused; but I am sure Parliament will not refuse it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Notwithstanding the statement of the right hon. leader of the Government as to the practice—and the right hon. gentleman is always ready to refer to parliamentary practice when it suits his purpose—what we have summoned this person to the Bar of the House for is not to question its decisions, but to answer questions of fact as to this transaction—whether he was an officer of the House appointed to perform a certain work, whether he did it, whether he returned a man receiving a minority of the votes against a man receiving a majority. These are the questions we want to ask him, and, perhaps, a few others. Now, the Minister of Justice has stated that questions may, perhaps, arise involving questions of law which, in the opinion of the person at the Bar, may be considered sufficient justification for his course. I think there is a sufficient sense of justice and fair play in this House, that if any question of law arises, on which the gentleman at the Bar should have counsel, no member of this House will refuse to allow him to get counsel. As to the statement of the Minister of Justice that this counsel should be present from the first, it is only necessary that he should be present when the legal question arises, and not before. But I say that the self-respect of this House requires that we should ascertain from the man himself, untutored and undirected either by the minions of a Government or by a counsel, as to what answers he shall make. What we want from him are facts. We want to know whether the freedom of elections to this House is to be suppressed or not. What we want from him is a plain, unvarnished tale, and if he should need counsel at any time, both sides of this House, and the independent party too, will be willing to grant him counsel; but I do not think the time of the House should be taken up by listening to what a paid solicitor may suggest, to defeat the object of this investigation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. First Minister says this is the only court in the country where the the right of a party to have counsel would be questioned. Surely the hon. Minister does not pretend to say that every witness called in court should be allowed to be advised by counsel. This party is not accused. He is called here as a witness only, for the purpose of giving the House information. The House is about to examine him in reference to an election that took place in New Brunswick. We do not know what conclusion the House may come to on that subject, and when the hon. gentleman says that the party at the Bar is entitled to be advised by counsel, he proposes to adopt a line of action in this House that would not be taken in any other court in the country. The man is standing here simply to be examined as a witness. It will be time enough, when any question of law affecting his conduct arises, or when we propose to censure him for any course that he has taken, that he should be advised by counsel.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. It has been said before to-day that liberality and liberalism are not synonymous. I hope my hon. friend opposite will not on this occasion show this remark to be true. I am astonished to hear the hon. gentleman who has just sat down say that the gentleman who is now at the Bar is exactly in the position of an ordinary witness.

Mr. MILLS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Were he in that position it would not probably make a difference, but he is not.

Mr. MILLS. You are prejudging the case.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Has the hon. gentleman forgotten what he and his supporters have been saying in this House, and before the country, for the last three weeks? Has the hon. gentleman forgotten the punishment he was ready to inflict on the witness before bringing him to this tribunal? Has he forgotten that the witness, if hon. gentlemen opposite will call him so, has been branded by himself and his friends as a criminal, as one who, if he received his deserts, would be imprisoned, and who, in England, would be confined to the tower or a dungeon, or in gaol? This man asks, in the most ordinary manner, when a question is put to him, to be allowed to have counsel. Is he not under a restraint? Can he get away from where he is?

Mr. MILLS. No witness can.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. And has he not the right, before answering a question that is put to him, to ask permission to be assisted by counsel to put before us the objections he pretends having against the proceedings to which he is subjected? This man pretends that he can prove to the House, if allowed counsel, that he should not be here, and that the House has no right to examine him. I do not touch the merits of the question itself. If I were to give my personal opinion, my hon. friends opposite would, perhaps, be surprised.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Let us have it.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I will give it in due time; my hon. friends need not be too much in a hurry. This case is one of the plainest right. It is a case of a well understood right, and it would not be a liberal and proper course for this House to take to refuse a man at the Bar, the assistance of counsel.

Mr. EDGAR. It seems to me to be impossible to say now that there is any question before us as to whether we are to examine that witness or not. The House has decided that question already, unanimously, in the language of the first Order of the Day.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. He had nothing to say to that.

Mr. EDGAR. He has said so.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. He has said it in proper time.

Mr. EDGAR. The House has decided unanimously that this witness is to be examined touching his conduct as a returning officer at that election, so that there can be no question raised as to that point now. Surely, every protection will be thrown around this witness, as every question put to him must first be submitted to this House and be adopted before being put. Surely, this man has enough friends in this House to prevent improper questions being put to him, and, after having given his answers to the questions, then he should have counsel to assist him in arguing what the effect of these questions are and what he should do. I beg, therefore, to move in amendment that the following words be inserted after the word "That":—

After the questions submitted by this House have been answered to the satisfaction of this House, Mr. Dunn be authorised to be heard by counsel to argue the question of his responsibility for his conduct.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman has given up the whole case, when he says there ought to be liberty of having counsel some time or other. If there ought to be counsel at all, that counsel ought to be had from the beginning of the proceedings. In days of old, criminals were not allowed counsel at all; afterwards they were. But I do not think it was ever provided that he should have no counsel at all while evidence was being taken, and only have counsel when the sentence is about to be pronounced and the prisoner is asked to say why the sentence of death should not be passed upon him. Then, and not before, hon. gentlemen opposite say counsel should be granted. This is a new theory worthy the liberal policy of the Liberal party. A more indecent—

Mr. MILLS. Order, order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have a right to say so.

Mr. MILLS. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman has no right to apply such an expression to any act or to any member of this House. He has no right to say that the observation or motions made on this side of the House are indecent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I say that the attempt—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am in order. A question of order, like any other, can be argued. The hon. gentlemen wish to prevent even a question of order being argued. They wish to put us down. The minority does not generally put the majority down, especially when the majority is right.

Mr. LANDERKIN. When they have returning officers.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My language was quite in order. I say, a more indecent, oppressive proceeding never was attempted against the liberty of a subject. It is a mere farce to say this man is simply a witness. Why, he is charged with having committed a great malefession, with having not performed, as returning officer, as officer of the Crown and this House, his duties, and he is there before this House, to all intents, a criminal standing his trial before the highest tribunal in the land. Yet, forsooth, he is not to be allowed to have counsel.

Mr. MILLS. There is a question of order.

Mr. SPEAKER. My opinion is that the word "indecent" ought not to be employed as a qualificative of the conduct or proceedings of this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I submit, of course, to your ruling—

Mr. MILLS. And apologise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD—and I say it is not an indecent proceeding, but I say that the motion is indecent, is oppressive, and against the liberty of a subject. I have a right to say that a Bill in Parliament is wrong, oppressive, and corrupt.

Mr. EDGAR.

Mr. CASEY. If you have ruled, Mr. Speaker, that the words employed by the hon. gentleman in reference to the proceeding should not be allowed, it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the hon. gentleman should apologise to the House, and it follows, as a necessary consequence, that the hon. gentleman shall apologise to the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. CASEY. Yes, it even follows, even in this House, even in the case of the right hon. gentleman, that in such a case as this—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh!

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASEY. Even in the case of the right hon. gentleman, who has not a supernatural right to evade all the rules of this House—even in this case it follows, under your ruling, Mr. Speaker, which I have no doubt you will carry out, that he must do what every hon. member of this House would have to do, like those who are now making improper noises under their desks—

Mr. SPEAKER. This is not arguing the point of order. The personality of the hon. member called to order has nothing to do with the matter. If the hon. gentleman will give me authorities in reference to the difference between applying the term "indecent" to the conduct of a member, and applying it to a measure before the House, I will be willing to hear him, but I will not allow him to argue the question of the personality of the hon. member who may have used the language objected to.

Mr. CASEY. Allow me to argue the point you suggest.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CASEY. I call upon you, Mr. Speaker, to keep order while I state my point.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. CASEY. The leader of the House has referred to this whole proceeding as indecent. He has, therefore, applied the term to any member taking part in it, the member who moved to examine Mr. Dunn, the hon. member who proposes an alternative kind of action, and, in fact, to all the members of this House. I think in that case he must not only withdraw the expression, but apologise before he proceeds. When members of this House are charged with indecent conduct, an apology must be made to the House.

Mr. LANDERKIN. I do not object to Mr. Dunn having counsel; but I object to Mr. Dunn, summoned before this House by its unanimous voice, coming here and offering to bring counsel to protest against what the House has done.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. LANDERKIN. That is what he stated. Do not say "no." I am sitting as close to Mr. Dunn as those hon. gentlemen are, and I say that he said he desired to have counsel for the purpose of protesting against the proceedings of the House. There is a proper constitutional way of protesting against the proceedings of the House.

Mr. HAGGART. This is not arguing the question of order at all. The right hon. gentleman was speaking and was interrupted on a question of order, and this gentleman is not speaking to the point of order at all.

Mr. LANDERKIN. The hon. member for South Lanark (Mr. Haggart) does not understand the question. The questions of order have been disposed of, and I am speaking to a motion before the Chair.

Mr. HAGGART. I ask your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, I will discuss the question on the point of order.

Mr. CASEY. It is a question of order we are discussing.

Mr. LANDERKIN. You may be discussing the question of order, but I am discussing the motion.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question now is on the point of order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Well, on the question of order, I appeal to you if it can be in order, when a gentleman has been summoned to the Bar of this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. HAGGART. That is not a question of order.

Mr. LANDERKIN. If that is not a question of order, I do not know what a question of order is. For a man who is summoned to the Bar of this House, to protest, and to ask for counsel to protest against the proceedings of this House—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I quite appreciate the distinction made by the right hon. gentleman as to the difference between qualifying the conduct of a member by the word "indecent" and qualifying the motion before the House, as he might a measure before the House, as indecent or oppressive, as he said; but I do not think the difference is wide enough to enable me to say that the last expression would be in order. I may go a little far, but from the beginning of the Session I have made it a point to try and restrain as much as possible in my power the use of words which would be objectionable in the House; and I think it would be well if the right hon. gentleman would help me in that direction and do what I have exacted from others, that is, withdraw the objectionable word.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In obedience to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the word "indecent."

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen opposite are treating Mr. Dunn as a criminal, and think that, for that reason, he should be assisted by counsel; but on what is that founded? A discussion took place in this House. No doubt he was charged with having done what was apparent on the papers returned to the House, showing that the law had been violated. That was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and, after discussion, a report was made by that committee recommending, among other things, that he should be called to the Bar of the House to be examined in relation to his conduct. In accordance with that report, the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) moved for an Order of the House to summon Mr. Dunn to the Bar. He is now here to be examined on that point, and, as I understand his answer in reply to you, it was not in the terms of the motion of my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice. Mr. Dunn wants to come here and argue that the House has no right to examine into his conduct, that it has no right to examine into the conduct of a public officer, an officer of this House, or to make any enquiry into his conduct. If any proposal were made to censure Mr. Dunn or to punish him on the facts which may be deduced, then would be the proper time for Mr. Dunn to be allowed counsel to argue the case on his behalf, but when the House, which has been characterised by the First Minister as the highest tribunal in the land, ordered that an officer of the House should be, not punished, but examined, giving, if it is possible, a justification of his conduct and explaining, perhaps to the satisfaction of the House, the circumstances of the case, its order should be obeyed. It is due to the honor and dignity of this House that the matter should be investigated, and it is for that purpose that Mr. Dunn is called to the Bar of the House to be examined, and why should he be put in a different position from any witness in an ordinary court of justice? I defy any lawyer in this House to say that he ever saw a witness, when asked a question by the judge, demand to be allowed counsel in order to protest either against the court asking him a question or to assist him. Even—and to this I call the attention of the Minister of Justice—when a witness claims that he should not answer certain questions because they might criminate him, not only is he not allowed counsel, but the counsel for the parties are not allowed to argue the question at all. Mr. Dunn stands at that Bar as a witness, called here on the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to give evidence to the House, to explain, if he can, an abuse, or to show a mistake or an error in the law. We do not desire to prejudge Mr. Dunn, but to ascertain from the returning officer of that electoral district what the circumstances are.

Mr. BURDETT. As the seconder of the motion, I desire to record my voice and vote in favor of a motion that Mr. Dunn should have counsel if he desires it. It is surprising to me that the Minister of Justice, when he moved his motion, should not have been able to furnish some precedent; and it is still further surprising that the leader of the Government should have characterised the amendment of my hon. friend by such a hard name. In my view, whether there are precedents or not, this person at the Bar ought to have counsel, especially when the leader of the Government admits that he is here charged as a criminal. I think all criminals ought to have the right of defence by counsel, in open court, no matter where the court may be, or however much the judges or jury may be biased by prejudice. But I understand, furthermore, that in this case the criminal has severed in his challenge; therefore he may be a witness as well, even against the other criminals. I have no doubt that he needs a counsel, a man who has taken the oath before the law society, who will not violate that oath, and that he will advise this man to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; and unless this person is older in sin than he appears to be in years, he will honestly disclose who the other criminals are, and then we will be able to throw the blame on the proper shoulders. For that reason I earnestly desire this man to have counsel, first, last, and all the time. But I do not think he should have counsel to advise him whether he should answer the questions truly, or not. He should answer the questions unadvised by counsel, even though he may be a criminal.

Mr. FREEMAN. I am astonished that this gentleman who is at the Bar of the House should have changed so wonderfully since we had him here a few days ago. At that time, as I listened to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, they denounced him as the vilest criminal in the country, and if the Hansard is taken up and read to-day you will find that I am correct. Read their expressions with regard to this gentleman, read their statements, and I think it will be admitted by all who examine their statements, that he is certainly a criminal. But what is he here for to-day? To give evidence against whom? Why, certainly against himself. For what purpose is he here, if it is not to give evidence against himself? And, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen have condemned him, and they bring him here to-day to establish the correctness of their condemnation, and out of his own mouth to convict him. It is for that purpose, and for no other. What does he ask? He simply asks what I have frequently heard asked by criminals at the Bar, by men who have never been convicted, men who are simply accused. I have seen scores of men in that position, and does the judge refuse them counsel? Never, Sir. I never knew of such a thing. The judge always tenders them counsel, not that justice may be defeated, but that justice may be had. That man has as good a right to justice as hon. members opposite, and if he is allowed counsel that counsel will see that he gets justice. Now, who has this man to contend against—a young man and a layman as he is? Why, Sir, he has not only one of the best counsel against him, if I am correctly informed, that is to be found in this Dominion, but he has several of them; he has philosophers opposed to him; he has men of ability, not one but a score, to entrap him in every way possible. I say entrap him—certainly, because the hon. gentlemen wish to establish their position that he is a criminal. I say that is the common sense view of it. They wish to establish that he is a criminal out of his own mouth. Now, Sir, all my better feeling revolts against the refusal to allow this man counsel. I never saw him before; I never had anything to do with him; I have no fellow-feeling with him any more than I have with every man, more than I have with every man who is placed in his position; nor have I any prejudices, nor any political feelings in the course I take. But, Sir, I claim for him justice; I claim for him the rights of our common humanity; I claim for him what every criminal is granted, every unconvicted criminal. I think he should have counsel on the grounds of humanity, and I am astonished that hon. gentlemen calling themselves Liberals should take the ground that he should not have counsel to assist him to defend himself.

Mr. GIROUARD. The question seems to me to be one of procedure. Is it usual for the House of Commons to permit a party called to the Bar of the House to be assisted by counsel, or is it usual for the House of Commons to permit parties to be heard by counsel at the Bar of the House on any matters of public interest. I find in May, page 460, the following words:—

“Questions of public policy can only be discussed by members, but when protection is sought for the rights and interests of public bodies and others, it has not been unusual to permit parties to represent their claims by counsel.”

If on a public Bill, parties may be heard before the House by counsel, it seems to me that parties at the Bar of the House in the position of this gentleman to-day, have also a right to be heard by counsel.

Mr. LAURIER. It seems to me my hon. friend who has just sat down, and many of the hon. gentlemen who have spoken on the other side, are forgetting the precise nature of the duty which we have to perform. In order to remember what it is, let me read from the report of the committee, which says:

“It was moved that, in the opinion of this committee on the papers returned to the House, the conduct of the returning officer, John B. Dunn, requires explanation, and that the said returning officer, John B. Dunn, be ordered to appear without delay before the Bar of the House to be heard thereupon, and to answer for his conduct.”

What is the first thing he has to do? His conduct requires explanation, and he is here to give explanation. His explanation may be satisfactory or not. If he satisfactorily explains his conduct, he goes away; if the explanation he gives is not satisfactory, then a motion may be made against him, and upon that he may be heard by counsel; but not until he has given the explanation which the House may require of him. Now, the House should not forget this either, that in the explanations which are to be asked from that gentleman, only such questions will be allowed as the majority of the House will think proper, and when he has answered these questions, if they are answered satisfactorily, and convey the impression that he has acted in good faith, I suppose that under such circumstances he would be allowed to go, but if not, if the explanations are not satisfactory, then a motion will be made against him, he would be brought back before the House, and be liable to censure. Under such circumstances, for my part, I would be only too happy to hear him by counsel, but not until then.

Mr. FREEMAN.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman has just been making out a case in favor of the gentleman at the Bar. We sit here as a court like any other court. When a complaint is made against a person and he is at large, he may be arrested and brought to court, he may be refused bail and may be treated in any way the authorities may order, but the moment he comes before the court and has “to answer for his conduct,” he is never refused counsel. He is here to answer for his conduct. We have decided that he should be examined. Are we going to say that by our own actions, by our own conduct, we are going to prevent the man who is here in the double capacity of witness and accused—are we going to prevent him from saying: I am here to speak, you have brought me up, and before speaking I want to object to your jurisdiction? Had that man the right to say, when we put the question, as to what questions should be put to him? He had no such right; he had no right to object to the questions, and suggest that he did not want to be examined. He was not then before us. When he came before us that was the time to speak; it was the time to speak when the question was put to him. Hon. gentlemen who are accustomed to practice before the courts are aware that when the first question is put the party accused has a right to say, “I object to your proceedings, and I ask the privilege of being represented by counsel.” When our proceedings have commenced, that is the moment when he has the right to speak; that is to say, when the question has been put and he is called upon to answer. I will not say it would be an indecent, but it would be a most immoral proceeding, that a man should not enjoy the fullest liberty of the subject, and that is, to be free in his defence; and his defence is not after the questions have been put and answered, but it begins from the first moment of the examination, because he may come and convince us that we have no right to examine him. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Burdett), for the sake of making a joke, which was good in form, but not correct on its merits, said: “I do not object, and I think he should have counsel at first as well as last, and during the whole proceeding; but I do not want him to be advised as to what answer to give.” We do not know what answer he will give; surely it is time afterwards to raise that point.

Mr. THOMPSON. I insist that this person has come to the Bar in a very different position from that of a witness in a court of justice, and in a position very different from that which a witness at the Bar of the House of Commons or House of Lords in England occupies. But, even if he is simply in the position of a witness, the authorities are abundant to show that sometimes the entire examination and cross-examination of witnesses in the Imperial Parliament is sometimes conducted by counsel. I admit that the ordinary rule is that it shall only be conducted by questions put from the Chair after they have been put to the House; but by the first relaxation permitted members are allowed to interrogate a witness directly, and it is assumed on the part of the House that it concedes that the question should be put. The second relaxation is, that sometimes a cross-examination is conducted by counsel, as hon. gentlemen will see on looking at page 485 of May, where the whole subject is dealt with:

“When a witness is in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, or is brought from any prison in custody, it is the usual, but not the constant practice for the Sergeant to stand with the mace at the Bar. When the mace is on the Sergeant's shoulder, the Speaker has the sole management.”

Just previous to that it says:

“For the sake of avoiding the repetition of each question members are usually permitted to address their questions directly to the witness, which, however, are still supposed to be put through the Speaker.”

May goes on to say that in such cases (that is, when the prisoner is in the custody of the Sergeant) it is usual for the questions to be read by the Speaker, but, with that exception, they are allowed to be put by a member. Then, if the question is objected to, or any difference arises, the motion is put to the House by the Speaker. In Committee of the Whole House any member may, as a matter of right, and not as a matter of convenience, put a question directly to the witness. Then May goes on to say :

"Where counsel are engaged, the examination of witnesses is mainly conducted by them, subject to the interposition of questions by members."

Mr. EDGAR. That is by counsel for the House.

Mr. THOMPSON. Does the hon. gentleman mean that the House would engage counsel against a witness appearing at its Bar? Surely the hon. gentleman does not mean that counsel should be allowed on one side and not on the other? I need not say anything more on that point. The whole practice of hearing and allowing counsel to intervene in the examination of a witness is distinctly recognised by English practice, and I put to the calm judgment of the House this proposition: that, whatever the form may be by which we resolve to hear the examination, this man at the Bar is here in a position altogether different from that of a witness. The motion made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) was merely to fix a day for him to come. In so far as the hon. member for Ontario West (Mr. Edgar) has referred to the language of that motion, it indicates that we are to examine him; but it was founded on the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and hon. gentlemen opposite will find, if they read the language, that it indicates that he was to be summoned here (and he has come to Ottawa in obedience to that summons), to answer for his conduct in returning as elected a candidate who did not receive a majority of the votes cast at such election. What right and what authority have we to summon anyone to our Bar except for a breach of the privileges of the House for which the individual is amenable to punishment. This man, therefore, stands not in the position of a witness, but in the position of a person charged with a contempt against this House, and he is here to-day to answer not only our interrogatories, but to answer with respect to his conduct in the very words of the report of the committee, of having committed what appeared to be a contempt of the privileges of this House. It is true that when he came to the Bar he merely made the request that counsel be heard to argue the question as to the right of the House to proceed further with this business. He fancied that was a question of law. So far I agree with hon. members who have spoken on the other side of the House, that it is a point of law not well taken; but surely hon. gentlemen on both sides are willing to hear before deciding, and that is all the person appearing at the Bar has asked. Admitting that, the opinion of both sides of the House is, as I fancy it is, against his view of the House having no legal right to proceed further, the least we can do before pronouncing judgment is to say that we will hear this man and counsel who can argue the case for him, he being a layman; and as the Secretary of State said, the reason why he should be heard now is because, although there was a resolution that called him to the House, he had no opportunity of raising the question previously, and this House could not in fairness and justice, say that because we had the matter up and decided it yesterday or the day before, it is not convenient for you now to raise it, although your whole defence may rest upon it. If this point is not well taken we, at least, are not wasting time by complying with the forms of justice and hearing him before he is condemned. The reason why I made the motion that counsel be heard on all legal points which might arise, is simply this: It would be inconvenient to put a separate motion on each legal question. He comes to the Bar, and states what he thinks is a legal point in his favor. He asks that counsel be heard on that point—although my opinion is against him on that, I move that counsel be heard on all legal questions which may arise during the examination. It is too late after the trial is over to allow a man counsel, because the legal points are only those which he or counsel instructed by him can suggest. When the question is put to the House whether this question or the next question be put, who is to say nay? Why should we say nay? We are not instructed as to the defence; we do not know what legal questions arise. Why should we refuse permission to any question which an hon. member may please to ask? But if this man has counsel instructed in the details of his case, having made it a study and knowing what the legal defence is, if he has a legal defence, it is for that counsel to rise and argue that such a question should not be put to the witness, the reason for which he may state to the House, and it may be a reason which no member of the House may know. So, as an hon. friend beside me suggests, in relation to the whole proceeding and in relation to each question, it is nothing more than allowing him to raise legal questions, if he has them, and present them by word of mouth in the nature of a demurrer, and these points we will be ready to decide on the spot. Surely we will be observing better the forms of justice, and there will be less probability of doing wrong, and depriving him of any legal rights, if we hear him fully, and we can only hear him fully in his defence by allowing him a person who is capable of arguing the legal questions which may arise touching his defence. Now, the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) suggested that one reason why counsel ought to be heard was, that there were other criminals as well as the one who appears at the Bar. Surely the hon. gentleman does not object to his having counsel under these circumstances. He has already had an indication that gentlemen on this side cannot be very deeply implicated in the crime, when they propose that the case shall be fully heard, instead of being heard after the trial is over, as has been suggested. I would suggest again that the person at the Bar is in the position of a person charged with an offence, and he should, at least, when questions are put to him, have counsel to say whether the questions should be put, and to argue as to any legal questions which may occur.

Mr. EDGAR. With reference to the quotation which the hon. gentleman made, I am not surprised that he dropped the book very suddenly, because if he had gone on he would have found that May does not at all sustain his contention that witnesses examined by the House are assisted by counsel.

Mr. THOMPSON. I read every word bearing on the subject.

Mr. EDGAR. The hon. gentleman did not read the following words:—

"Where counsel are engaged the examination of witnesses is mainly conducted by them,—"

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly.

Mr. EDGAR.

"—subject to the interposition of questions by members."

Now, how can counsel for the witness conduct the examination for the witness? Therefore, May does not show anywhere that the contention of the Minister of Justice is correct, else that gentleman, who is famous for his research, if he is famous for anything, would have found it if it was in the book. One reason why witnesses, when before the Bar of the House, are not allowed to be assisted by counsel in answering questions, is this: That if counsel is allowed, instead of the witness, to discuss each question, we will be in a perpetual wrangle with the counsel. Each member will have the right to discuss every question with the prisoner,—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. EDGAR—with the person at the Bar or with his counsel. There would be no end to it. There would be a perpetual wrangle over every question. I do not know whether that is the object with which the hon. gentleman made the proposal to introduce counsel, but I suppose the motion will carry, and I predict that that will be the result, at any rate. The time of the House will be delayed and objections, perhaps trivial ones, will be raised. We will make no progress, and we may be here till the fall discussing this question. Now, the First Minister spoke of its not being in accordance with English precedent for a person examined at the Bar not to be attended by counsel. Does not the First Minister know that now a days criminals are not examined under the English law—are not called upon as witnesses, and, therefore, it is not until this witness is asked the questions to be propounded to him by the House that we shall know whether he is guilty or not guilty. He may exonerate himself altogether, or he may think he has done so, and then will be time enough to call on counsel to assist him.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hon. gentlemen have rather retrograded from the liberal principles they formerly fought for. In 1873, when Mr. Bell, returning officer, was brought to the Bar he was asked his name, and if he was returning officer. He answered both questions, and he then applied for leave to have counsel, and the House unanimously agreed that he should have counsel. They were not at all alarmed that the whole time of the Session until autumn would be taken up, and I have no doubt, from my recollection in looking at the Journals, that the time of the House was saved. I shall read the entry in the Journals:

"The Order of the House of Monday the 10th March, inst., for the attendance at the Bar of this House, of Richard James Bell, Esq., returning officer at the last election for the electoral district of Muskoka, to answer for his return to the writ of election for the said electoral district, being read;

"The Sergeant-at-Arms reported that, in obedience to the Order of the House, Mr. Bell was in attendance.

"Mr. Bell was then called in, and at the Bar examined, as followeth:—

"By Mr. Blain:—

"1. What is your name, residence and occupation?—My name is Richard James Bell; my residence is Bracebridge; my occupation is clerk.

"2. Were you the returning officer at the last election for a member to represent the electoral district of Muskoka in the House of Commons in Canada?—I was.

"The witness then requested that he might be allowed the assistance of counsel.

"On motion of the right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, seconded by Mr. Duguay, leave was granted to the witness to be assisted by counsel."

There was no discussion upon it all. The Liberals of that day saw the justice of the request, and it was granted without a word.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. It may seem presumptuous for a humble layman to express any opinion on a question of this kind. Still, I wish to use my undoubted right, as a member of this House, to say that I cannot agree with the objections urged against the resolution. They seem to proceed on the assumption that the statement of the gentleman who stands at the Bar is going to prevail, and that he is going to be allowed to refuse to answer questions that may be put to him by this House. Now, Sir, if I understand the matter rightly, he has been summoned to answer those questions by the House, and I have full confidence that the House will maintain its own dignity by compelling him, if he refuses, to answer the questions that may be put to him. Then as regards the merits of the case, the gentleman stands here not only to answer for the procedure in the case of the election, but, if I understand aright, he stands here to answer for his own conduct in the matter, and the humblest criminal in the land, under these circumstances, would be allowed to have counsel. I, Sir, for one, am not going to do anything to deprive him of that privilege.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not at all take exception to the position taken by the gentleman who last spoke. But it is as to the time of granting this privilege that I take exception. When the gentleman at the Bar is put on trial—if he is put on trial—then is the time to ask the House for counsel, and then the House will concede it. But the special pleading of the right hon. gentleman in referring to the authorities read and submitted by himself on a former occasion, and the special pleading of the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State upon this subject—what does it all mean? It goes upon the assumption that this man is upon his trial. Sir, he is not on his trial.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He is.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, he is summoned to this House to give a statement of facts. He is not on trial, and if the examination which this House will put him through should prove that he has been guilty of a gross violation of the law, I hope that he will then be put on trial, and if he is he will be in a position to ask the House for the aid of counsel. But divesting this question of all the legal flummery which legal gentlemen on the other side have thrown about it, the case stands thus: What appears on the face of the documents laid before this House is a gross act of injustice, an act against the liberty and freedom of the election law. That is what appears prima facie, and, upon a report of a committee of this House, the returning officer was summoned to be brought to the Bar, to give an explanation of his conduct and acts. We do not want to try him with a view to punish him, if guilty, but what we do want is information. That information we have the right to get, and to get it, it is not at all necessary that the person at the Bar should employ counsel, nor is it desirable, in the interests of the procedure of this House or in the despatch of public business, that he should have counsel, and, therefore, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not propose that my position in the matter shall be misinterpreted. I, for one, do not object that the person at the Bar, if any charge were brought against him in the course of these proceedings, or any question asked him to the form of which he objected, should have counsel if he applied for counsel. What I objected to in the first instance was that the person at the Bar comes here and challenges the jurisdiction of the court. This House having already argued the case, and decided upon it, I did not think it would be consistent with our dignity that we should re-open it and argue it again. I do not think the case is arguable; I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite think it arguable; and, therefore, the demand made by the person at the Bar seemed to me to be merely trifling with the House. He did not ask for counsel to advise him as to the question, or as to the proceedings. He merely asked for counsel to protest against his being here at all. This House has already decided that question, and I say that it would be derogatory to our dignity, after having decided it once, to re-open the whole question now, and determine whether this officer of the House should answer a single question or not. He was asked one question: "Are you the returning officer?" And he says: "I want counsel to advise me whether I should answer that or not, and to protest against the whole proceedings."

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES. I am sorry that hon. gentlemen opposite dissent, for his language was clear and distinct. He says: "I ask for counsel to protest against the proceedings of this House." If there is any doubt about it, I would ask the Clerk to read the answer made by the person at the Bar to the question that was put to him. It is on that point and that alone, that we on this side contend that it is not proper that he should have counsel. The hon. gentleman smiles. I suppose, having already determined in his own mind, and having voted, that if an officer of this House is guilty of conduct that is prima facie wrong, this House is entitled to call him to an examination—having voted that proposition, he is now willing that we should solemnly sit as a court and listen to arguments whether this House of Commons, the highest tribunal in the land, has power to call one of its officers before it and ask him certain questions as to his proceedings. Legal gentlemen on the other side know that it is an insult to their common sense and intelligence; but if any question is put to the witness that he thinks is not in proper form or as to which he desires legal assistance, I, for one, would be only too happy to allow him to have counsel.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman says hon. members on this side know that what they say is an insult to common sense. I want to know that if that is in order.

Mr. DAVIES. I was reasoning that it would be an insult to their common sense. The hon. gentleman did not make the distinction. I say that the reason we oppose the proposition made by the man at the Bar, is one which hon. gentlemen on the other side have evaded from the first, and they are attempting to thrust on that gentleman what he has not asked, advice as to the legality of the question put to him.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). Would it be in order to ascertain the reason why Mr. Dunn asks for counsel? I understood him to use the words, "to protest against the proceedings of the House of Commons." What the remark will determine my vote. If he simply asks for counsel to advise him as to the questions put to him by the House, I shall willingly vote to allow him to have counsel. I think it would be in order for us to know before the vote is taken whether he wishes counsel to protest or to advise him during the investigation.

Mr. LANDRY. I think all we have to vote is the resolution before the House. I do not think any expression that was made by the gentleman at the Bar ought to influence us in our votes. If we think the resolution is right, and that it is only proper that the gentleman should have counsel, I think that is the question that challenges our votes, and not what he thinks or wants. Suppose he wants something after he gets counsel, that we think he should not have, we will refuse it; but at present we have only before us what is contained in the resolution. I admit that I heard the gentleman use words similar to what the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has attributed to him; and if there is anything that convinces me that he should have counsel, it is that very fact, that he, as a layman, has already used words, not knowing the full force or significance of them, which, in my mind, prejudiced his case. He has challenged the jurisdiction of the House. It is exactly because he is here alone as a layman and has already, by the first word he has uttered, prejudiced his own case, that I am willing to vote for his having counsel. He evidently feels timid in coming here to the highest court in the land, considering his age, and all this shows the necessity of his being represented by counsel, who can look into the questions and proceedings of the House calmly. I think we have only to vote on that resolution, and when the counsel appears before us and undertakes to advise him, that will be the time for us to decide whether the course of the counsel is one we can sanction or not.

NAYS:

Messieurs

Edwards, and Trow.—2.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. According to parliamentary practice, the members who asked for a division should vote nay, in this instance, the five gentlemen who called for division have voted yeas.

Mr. LAURIER. It has not been the practice of the House for those who simply asked for the yeas and nays to vote nay.

Mr. CASEY. If the practice of the House had been that those who asked for yeas and nays should vote nay, the hon. gentleman should, in pursuance of that practice, have voted nay in the previous vote.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So I did.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If my memory serves me right, when the yeas and nays were demanded on one occasion, the right hon. the First Minister took the same objection that he did to-day. I think it was a vote he was not anxious to give, and his objection was overruled by the then Speaker; and, on its being overruled, the hon. gentleman was suddenly called outside when the time came to vote.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. member for Halifax has not voted.

Mr. JONES. I paired with the hon. member for Cape Breton?

Mr. FISHER. The hon. member for North Victoria has not voted.

Mr. SPEAKER. Has the hon. gentleman for Montmagny voted.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. I paired with the hon. member for Quebec West. If I had voted I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. member for Bothwell, has not voted.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. member for Bothwell was not here when the division was taken.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Bothwell not being in the House, I cannot enquire why he did not vote.

Mr. LANDRY.

Mr. SPEAKER. Counsel may be admitted.

Mr. DUNN. Could I have until to-morrow to confer with my counsel?

Mr. SPEAKER. That must be left to the decision of the House.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Simple questions may be put and answered at once; more difficult questions may be reserved.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman, the questions shall be put, and if there is any question on which Mr. Dunn wishes to consult with his counsel, the House will give every consideration to it.

Mr. DAVIES. I am glad both sides of the House concur in that, as that is the principle upon which we voted on the hon. gentleman's motion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am glad my hon. friend has found a principle at last.

Mr. SPEAKER. The question you have to answer is the following: "Were you the returning officer for the electoral division of Queen's, N.B., at the late election, and who was your election clerk?"

Mr. DUNN. I wish to wait until my counsel arrives before answering any question. I am under the advice of counsel, and, therefore, have to act under his guidance.

Mr. MACKENZIE. You must, Mr. Speaker, enforce the Order of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. You have to answer this question.

Mr. CASGRAIN. I think that the witness at the Bar ought to answer at once. I recollect an extreme case before the Bar of the Quebec House, when the witness, in reply to a question as to what was his name, asked for twenty-four hours to consider his answer.

Mr. LYONS (Counsel for Mr. Dunn). Before the witness is called upon to answer any question at the Bar of this House, we, as counsel, wish to be heard as to whether this House has any jurisdiction or authority to call upon Mr. Dunn to come from Queen's county to Ottawa, under a writ or Order of this House, to answer for the offence stated in it, as having returned to this House a candidate from the election in Queen's county having the minority of votes; and we, as his counsel, submit that, while the authority of this House is recognised as far as it extends as a court, Mr. Dunn should no more answer to the question put to him than if the House had summoned him here and attempted to try him for violation of any statute law of the country. While the House of Commons of Canada, under the constitution, possesses many of the powers of a court, we submit and press strongly the objection that it is only a court for the purpose of hearing or dealing with matters of contempt or breach of the privileges of the House of Commons; and, speaking in the hearing of many eminent lawyers in the House, and of gentlemen who are versed in the privileges of Parliament, I venture to assert that the principle, and only principle, under which the House of Commons of England has ever declared any matter to be a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, was the necessity of the case, simply that there was no adequate remedy at law for the redress of the matter of which they complained of as a breach of privilege. The law of the land provides, as we submit it does in this case, for dealing with the offence, if any, with which Mr. Dunn is charged; and if the privilege of Parliament has been, as it were, merged into the law of the land and become part of the statute law of the country, then Parliament will leave this question, as Parliament has always left those questions, to be decided by the courts. If you permit me to give you an illustration of the objection that I urge here, it is simply this: If you, Sir, had been assaulted by anyone within the precincts of this building, there is no doubt that the party could be punished as ordinary offenders are under summary conviction and before a magistrate; but still I have no doubt that the House of Commons would take the matter up, and say that, while that might be some remedy, as far as any personal injury you suffered was concerned, the dignity of the House had been outraged by the insult offered you, Mr. Speaker; and it might be very well contended that the House, in vindication of what it would consider its privileges, should bring the offender before the Bar of the House, try him here and have him punished by imprisonment during the pleasure of the House. But I take it, Mr. Speaker, that if such offences became so frequent that it was found necessary to introduce a bill into this House, and if that bill was concurred in by the Senate, assented to by the Governor General, and afterwards became an Act of Parliament and the law of the land; if that Act provided that, if anyone should insult, or obstruct, or assault the Speaker of this House within the precincts of this House, he should be guilty of a misdemeanor or of a felony, there would be no question whatever that the matter which had been before that a breach of privilege, would now have become a breach of the law, and that the House would leave the matter to the court, and the guilty party, who at one time would have been dealt with as a violator of the privilege of the House, would afterwards be dealt with as a violator of the law, and would be so punished, and punished only by the courts. Would it be contended that, if the House has dealt specifically with any one matter of that kind which heretofore was considered a breach of privilege, the House would afterwards, if it became part of the law of the land, attempt to bring the offender before the Bar of the House, and treat him as for a breach of privilege? Letters written to the Speaker, threatening him for anything he may do, might be considered, and have been considered, a breach of privilege of the House; but, if afterwards the House had concurred in a bill for the purpose of preventing repetitions of such Acts, and an Act was passed for that very specific purpose, surely, I submit as a question of law to the House, it would not be considered that a person should be punished twice, or that a person, after being fined and imprisoned under a statute of this country for that offence, would be brought before the Bar of the House and punished a second time for a contempt and breach of privilege. Dealing with this very case, questions which were considered before as breaches of privilege are now merged into the Statutes and have become breaches of law in reference to elections, and we submit here that under different sections of the Election Act, this very matter into which the House is going to enquire or seeks to enquire is provided for, and adequate penalties are provided for the offender against the law. Section 59, I think it is, of the Election Act, provides that the returning officer shall return the candidate having the majority of votes. If he violates that Act, if he does not do what that Act commands him to do, penalties are imposed by three different sections of the Act. He is liable to a prosecution at the suit of the candidate whose case has come before the court—that is, if the court adjudicates under a petition—and he is liable to a fine of $500 and costs. Then, further, he is liable to a penalty of $200 to anyone who may sue for the same, for the violation of any of his obligations and duties. Then, if prosecutions have been instituted against a returning officer for a violation of the law, would it be right, would it be held proper, to have him afterwards up before the House for what was before considered a breach of privilege? The assumption that the returning officer is an officer of the House, I take it, is unwarranted, any further than you may say that a judge who may try an election petition is an officer of the House. The returning officer is appointed by the Government, appointed for a specific purpose; his duties are defined by statute, and if he violates those duties penalties are imposed. Then, as the House has dealt with this matter by passing the Election Act, and has left it to the law of the land to deal with violators of that Act, why bring Mr. Dunn up here and have him punished for what was considered heretofore a breach of privilege of the House, but what is now a violation of the statute law of Canada? Now, there are other objections.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. LYONS. Mr. Speaker, before Recess I was dealing with one point, and it is the only point I intend to allege as an objection to these proceedings, and it is, briefly to restate it, that Mr. Dunn cannot be guilty of any breach of privilege, because the offence charged against him and mentioned in the summons, is one that is a violation of the public statute law of Canada, and being so, it ceases to be treated as a breach of privilege by the House. I intend to say very little in addition to what I have already said, further than to point, as an illustration of my argument, to the Independence of Parliament Act itself. All the offences mentioned in that Act—if an improper person sits in the House, if a disqualified person takes a seat in this House, if a member of the House receives a bribe, or fee, or reward, if he happens to have a contract and is interested in it—all these subjects were at once dealt with by the House of Commons as breaches of privilege, as the House claimed the privilege to deal with them, and the offenders were brought before the Bar of the House. But I take it, Sir, that since that Act has been passed, you leave all these matters to be dealt with by the courts; you allow parties to bring their actions in the courts against the sitting member, or against a disqualified member for anything he has done in the House, and when the general law of the country provides a penalty for such an offence, it surely is enough to have that one penalty enforced against the party, without bringing him up when there is no necessity for it, and treating the case as one of breach of privilege. I do not for one moment question the right of this House to deal with the members of this House—to say what party shall sit in the House, to take a seat from one member and give it to a candidate outside and bring him in as the member; and I take it that if such was the object of this proceeding, there would be no objection to bringing Mr. Dunn here as a witness. I admit freely that the House has the right to call witnesses to any proceeding before you, but I do not understand, nor can it be contended, that Mr. Dunn is here before your Bar as a witness. I would ask, who is he a witness against, or who is he a witness for? Surely it is not going to be said that you can bring a man before the Bar to make him a witness against himself, to examine him, and after you have examined him, to put him on his trial for something that you learned from his own evidence. If it is a right that the House of Commons should exercise to try the returning officer for any matter that happened during the time he was returning officer, and to say that inasmuch as he returned the wrong person to Parliament it is a breach of privilege of the Commons, then the House has the same right to try any man who is guilty of bribery at the elections, any person at any election, who is guilty of personation. If there is a row at a polling place, for instance, and a disturbance caused there by which voters are kept back, and an improper party gets into Parliament, would the House constitute itself a court to try such a case? There was a time when the House even dealt with these matters as breaches of privilege, because there was a necessity for it, but since the Act has been passed in both Houses and assented to, whereby any person guilty of bribery, personation, and of any offence on an election day, is liable to punishment by the courts, the House has very properly left those matters to the courts and refused to interfere and treat them as matters of privilege. I recognise, too, Mr. Speaker, that the House has the power, notwithstanding all counsel may say, to order Mr. Dunn here to answer any question that may be put to him and try him for this very offence. But I ask whether the House will do anything—I am sure it will not—that is not right and just to the party. If Mr. Dunn would be prejudiced, as he must be prejudiced by being tried in a Court such as this, if the House considers itself such a court for the purpose of trying Mr. Dunn, then look at what a position he is in. The very first thing that is done with this criminal in this court, is to put questions to him as to whether he is guilty of the offence charged, and on those questions he is going to be convicted. Further than that, the very material that will come out in evidence before the House of Commons here to-night would be used against Mr. Dunn by parties outside the House to bring suits against him to make him liable to penalties under the Election Law, and he would be punished a second time for this offence. I take it then that the House should be very slow to go further in this matter unless they feel that it would be just, right and proper to do so. I wish to ask, what other object can there be in this enquiry further than to punish Mr. Dunn? The House has passed a general law to leave all these disputed elections to the courts. In this very matter it has decided by its own resolution not to interfere in the case between the sitting member and the candidate whom it is alleged should have been returned. Then, as I take it, the only other object that can possibly be reached by this investigation, is to punish Mr. Dunn. I submit very respectfully to the House that he has already been punished. He has felt, at least, the power of the House; he has been brought here from his home, a great distance away; he has been put on his trial; he has been forced to employ counsel to take these objections before the House; and I do trust, Mr. Speaker, that, under the circumstances of the case, and in reference to one point—if the House consider it well taken, that the law already provides amply for this very case, and can deal with it better in every way than the House can do—that Mr. Dunn shall be further discharged from this investigation, and be dismissed without being called upon to answer any questions.

Mr. THOMPSON. I presume after the remarks the learned counsel has made for Mr. Dunn, the House has to consider whether the question proposed by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) should still be put. The learned counsel who has argued against the further proceeding of this case, has taken various points against the propriety of the House so proceeding. In so far as his argument has been addressed to the House as a means of persuading the House that it ought not to further consider this question, I submit that that point can be more appropriately decided at the close of the investigation, and after the House has heard the questions which it proposes to put to the person at the Bar. In so far as the learned counsel has contended that it is not in the power of the House to proceed further, I submit that the power of the House remains notwithstanding the passage of the Election Act and the penalties therein prescribed. The argument has been substantially this: That in consequence of Parliament having in the Election Act established certain penalties against Mr. Dunn, he ought thereby to be relieved entirely from the procedure and penalties which attach to a contempt of the privileges of this House. I submit that the establishment of penalties by an Act of Parliament has not that effect. Notwithstanding the general operation of the principle that a man ought not to be punished twice for the same offence, it is a well recognised principle that the enactment of various penalties sometimes has merely the effect of establishing cumulative penalties against the offender, and not substitutive penalties. The effect of that would be, in this instance, that a returning officer who offended against a provision of the Elections Act, would be, in the first instance, liable to the public for the wrong done to the public by indictment, or by any other suitable procedure for an offence against the Elections Act; and he would, in addition to that, be liable for the pecuniary penalties which the Act declares may be recovered by any individual aggrieved, and notwithstanding the establishment of those penalties he might still be liable at the hands of Parliament for contempt committed against its privileges. I might illustrate my view of this question by changing for a moment the offence for which the person at the Bar is charged, by supposing it was a case of libel, in order to give an illustration more familiar to the House. Assuming that you, Mr. Speaker, or any individual member of this House acting as such, had been libelled, it would be quite clear that the offender would be liable, first, to criminal prosecution for libel; second, to a civil suit at the instance of the person aggrieved; and, third, the offender could be summoned for contempt against the privileges of this House. Under these circumstances I, as one member of this House, entertain this view: that this House should persevere in the question proposed; and I only presume to express these opinions now because it may be convenient on both sides of the House, according as questions of law arise, that those conversant with such questions should express their opinions, and consequently lead the House more clearly to a decision.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think the opinions expressed by the Minister of Justice are in accordance with the law and the precedents which were presented before the Committee on Privileges and Elections. We are not trying Mr. Dunn at the Bar for penalties, but he is here simply for the purpose of interrogating him with respect to matters connected with the privileges of this House, and I fail to see that by the statute respecting election trials this House has divested itself of its ancient rights and privileges in that respect. While the judges are entrusted with the power of trying election petitions, a power conferred on them by Parliament, Parliament has not divested itself of the right to investigate into any subject. We find not only by the cases referred to before the Committee on Elections which are on the Journals of the House, but we are also aware that in many cases to which the learned counsel has alluded the House of Commons of England has investigated election matters ever since the Election Act came into force. The person at the Bar is not being cited on any criminal charge. That is a fallacy on the part of the counsel. The House of Commons has considered that this is a subject of public importance and public policy, and that explanation should take place, and for such purpose as subsequently this House may determine; and for that purpose they have required Mr. Dunn, the returning officer for Queen's county, to attend at the Bar for the purpose of giving explanation as to certain matters. With respect to the argument of the learned counsel that the Independence of Parliament Act takes away the right of the House to deal with this matter, I have only to say that the answer to that argument is furnished by the case of Sir Sydney Waterlow. In the case of Sir Sydney Waterlow, who sat for Dumfries, and the cases referred to in the report of the sub-committee, although the petition against him was abandoned in the Court of Sessions in Scotland, yet afterwards the House of Commons took it up and referred it to a select committee, and that committee reported that Sir Sydney Waterlow was disqualified to sit in the House. This goes to show that the power to investigate the question remains. In this case Mr. Dunn stands here as a witness, as a servant and officer of this House, for the purpose of offering explanations to this House for its information with respect, not merely to what took place in that particular election, but with regard to the public policy of retaining and maintaining in its efficiency, and in purity, honesty and uprightness, the election law of the land. It is not, therefore, a matter of this particular election simply, but it is a matter affecting the public at large and the rights of the people, and, therefore, it seems to me that when it is put forth that this person is standing here subject to penalties, or that there is a second charge for a particular offence, I maintain that he does not stand charged with any offence but that under the direction of the House he is brought to its Bar to give explanations as to his conduct. The case referred to by the Minister of Justice seems to me so entirely conclusive upon this point, that any one who has followed the argument must see that the plea that this House has no jurisdiction is one without any foundation, legal or constitutional, to sustain it. I submit that under these circumstances the question I propose must be answered.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not propose to argue the question at any length, but I think it is desirable to state one fact with respect to the remarks of the learned counsel. The learned counsel based his arguments on two principles, one of which was that the House had deprived itself of all its jurisdiction in respect to controverted elections. I think it is well understood by all those who have given the subject any consideration whatever, that the passage of the Controverted Elections Act, vesting in the judges of the land the power to try election petitions, has not deprived this House, as a court of Parliament, of any jurisdiction which it possessed prior to the passing of that Act. In other words, the judges do not possess any jurisdiction which the House possessed before. The judges possess about the same jurisdiction that the Committee on Privileges and Elections possessed before Parliament in its wisdom chose to give it to them. My own opinion has been, and I think it will be borne out by all precedent in the Parliament of Canada, and by the Parliament of Great Britain, from which we draw our authority, and by whose precedents we are to a large extent governed, that this authority has been not only possessed by the House but that it has been exercised. The other point, the learned counsel suggested was, that because certain penalties attached to an act of malfeasance on the part of the returning officer, he may be punished for that act in the courts of the land, and that, therefore, Parliament should not try his action at all here, is an argument which I think is unfounded, and for this reason: The penalties which the law prescribes for any act of misfeasance on the part of its officers, are penalties which are payable to any person who is individually damaged, and they can only be recovered by the person who alleged that he suffers that damage. If the gentleman, who, we think, ought to have been returned in place of Mr. Baird, brought an action, it would be necessary for him first to institute a suit before the judges of the court, and only after we have a declaration by that court of his right to be returned, could he maintain an action for damages. That action is one personal and peculiar to himself: it does not affect the rights of the people, and it does not in any sense affect the privileges of the House, and therefore, so far as Mr. Dunn is concerned, if Mr. Dunn was liable to damages at all, at any time, those damages cannot be recovered against him now, because the time for filing a petition has expired. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind as to the jurisdiction of the House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The objection not having been sustained by the House, you are ordered to answer the question. I will repeat the question: "Were you returning officer for the electoral district of the county of Queen's, N.B., at the late election, and who was your election clerk?"

Mr. DUNN. I was returning officer for the electoral district of the county of Queen's, N.B., at the now late election, and my election clerk was Councillor T. Williams.

Mr. WELDON. I move that the witness be now asked the following question: "Look at number three of the Votes and Proceedings of the House now shown to you: are the writ and letter of Mr. Pope, pages 13 and 14, correct copies of the writ and instructions sent to you; and is the return you made correctly set out on pages 15 and 16?"

Motion agreed to.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it is customary that the party at the Bar should have the question in his hand.

Mr. CASEY. It is being written out for that purpose.

Mr. HESSON. I think the gentleman charged should have had notice of the—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. HESSON. I am quite in order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. HESSON. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot put me down.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. HESSON. I would suggest—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. HESSON. I would suggest the propriety of the gentleman at the Bar having notice of the questions which are to be put to him. Some gentlemen in this House are in possession of the notice, but the gentleman at the Bar may not have notice, and now we have to wait till he gets through with the question and discovers for himself whether or not he thinks it is a correct representation of the case. I say that he ought to have been supplied with the ordinary notice, so as to have a fair opportunity of answering the questions.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have put the question, whether the question which Mr. Dunn now has in his hands will be put to him or not, and the House agreed that it be put. It is, therefore, not now a debatable question whether that question shall be put or not.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair; order, order.

Mr. HESSON. I will speak, and hon. gentlemen opposite cannot put me down. I have my rights in this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. The suggestion which the hon. gentleman is making may very well come up when the next question is put.

Mr. HESSON. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order; Chair, Chair.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Mr. Speaker—

Mr. HESSON. I ask the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) to take his seat, as I have the floor.

Mr. SPEAKER. I beg hon. gentlemen to sit down, as I have given my ruling. When the question is put and answered, and the next question is asked, it will be time enough to raise this point.

Mr. FERGUSON (Counsel). Mr. Speaker. I consider it proper to object to this question, and to the witness answering it, on grounds which might have been urged at the beginning of this examination, but which I consider can more properly be urged now, when this question, the nature of which I consider has a tendency to inculpate the witness, has been asked. I object to the question which is now directed by the House to be put to this witness, on the ground that it will expose him to a prosecution for a penalty under the Election Act; and I need scarcely urge, especially to the legal members of this House, that the privilege which I claim for this witness is one which is acknowledged by the law of the land, and in every court of justice and before every tribunal which has the right to investigate any matter of a criminal or a civil nature. I need scarcely refer to the authorities, which are familiar to you, Mr. Speaker, and to the hon. members of this House who belong to the legal profession. I might refer, however, to Taylor on Evidence, and to Best on Evidence, the last editions, in which it is clearly laid down that any question the tendency of which is to criminate the witness who is asked the question, or to subject him to a liability for a penalty, or anything in the nature of a penal action, he cannot be compelled to answer. I submit that the question which the House has now directed to be put to the witness is of that nature, because it asks him whether the return which he has made is correctly set out on pages 15 and 16 of the volume which has been put into his hands. I submit that the effect of answering that question, if he said yes, would be to make an admission against himself, which could be used in evidence in any action which might be brought under those provisions of the statute which provide for the recovery of penalties against a returning officer or a deputy returning officer, or any other officer acting under the Election Act. The effect would be to make him liable, out of his own mouth, for the penalties provided by those provisions. I refer more especially to sections 101 and 105 of the Election Act of 1874. Section 101 provides:

"If any returning officer wilfully delays, neglects or refuses duly to return any person who ought to be returned to serve in the House of Commons for any electoral district, such person may—if it has been determined on the hearing of an election petition respecting the election for such electoral district, that such person was entitled to have been returned—sue the returning officer who has so wilfully delayed, neglected or refused duly to make such return of his election in any court of record in the Province in which such electoral district is situate, and recover from him a sum of $500.

"Every officer and clerk who is guilty of any wilful misfeasance or any wilful act of omission in violation of this Act, shall forfeit to any person aggrieved by such misfeasance, act or omission, a sum not exceeding $500 in addition to the amount of all actual damages thereby occasioned to such person;

"Every returning officer, deputy returning officer, election clerk or poll clerk, who refuses or neglects to perform any of the obligations or formalities required of him by this Act, shall, for each such refusal or neglect, forfeit the sum of $200 to any person who sues for the same."

In Taylor on Evidence, edition of 1878, vol. 2, page 1223, the right of a witness to claim this privilege is clearly laid down that a witness is not compelled to answer where the answers would have a tendency to expose him to any kind of a criminal charge, or to a penalty or forfeiture of any nature whatsoever. This rule, the author goes on to say, is one of great antiquity and applies equally to parties and to witnesses, and is now uniformly recognised by all British tribunals, whether civil or criminal. In the last edition of Best on Evidence, edition of 1883, the same principle is clearly laid down. And that it applies to the high court of Parliament as well as to any other tribunal, is laid down in Mr. Bourinot's work on Parliamentary Procedure and Practice, page 204:

"In all matters touching its privileges the House may demand definite answers to its questions, but in case of enquiries touching a breach of privilege, as well as what may amount to crime at common law, the House 'out of indulgence and compassionate consideration for the party accused,' has been in the habit of telling them that they are under no obligation to reply to any questions so as to criminate themselves."

The words which are in quotation marks are taken from the English Hansard, vol. 9, 1875. Now, I submit my objection to the question on these grounds. I say that the result of the witness answering this question would be to make an admission against himself which would certainly be used against him in any action which might be brought against him for any penalties to which he might be subject under the Election Act of 1874. I also submit that the question is objectionable on another ground. He is asked to say whether a copy which is placed in his hands is a true copy of a document which has not been placed in his hands. The question is of two branches. The first: "Are the writ and the letter of Mr. Pope on pages 13 and 14, true copies of the instructions sent to you." The witness has not been given an opportunity of comparing the documents, and he is asked to state here whether these are true copies or not. On these grounds, Mr. Speaker, I submit that the question is not a proper one, and that the witness should not be compelled to answer.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know whether the course I took under the former question was acceptable to the House or not; but I would suggest that hereafter it would be more convenient that the objections of counsel should be taken before the question is put to the House, because it is inconvenient, after the House has resolved to put the question, to consider whether it is a proper question to be put or not. The question the hon. member for St. John has put into your hands to be proposed to the witness is substantially whether certain documents which appear on the record and proceedings of the House are true copies of the original documents which have passed through the witness hands. In objection to that, there is first of all put forward the proposition that the answer may tend to criminate him. I presume the members of the House, who are acquainted with legal procedure, understand perfectly well the principles which govern the reception of questions which tend to criminate a witness. As I recollect them, they are these: that the tribunal must first decide whether the question may have a tendency to criminate the witness. If it decides in the affirmative, the witness has the absolute privilege of declining to answer. I submit, however, to the House that, with regard to questions touching a matter of this kind, we are not governed by the rules which apply to evidence in the ordinary courts of law. I quite agree with the contention raised by Mr. Dann's counsel, that if this were an enquiry taking place in a court of law, he would be absolutely privileged, after making the assertion, under the obligation of his oath, that the answer would tend to criminate him; but the House is proceeding with an entirely different enquiry. The House proceeds according to the unusual procedure by which we can interrogate a person who may likely be criminated by his answers, and it would be entirely inconsistent with the fundamental right, which undoubtedly exists in the House, to interrogate the person at the Bar, that he, in respect to the main enquiry should shelter himself from all the questions we may put to him, behind the plea that his answers would tend to make him liable to the penalties which we may hereafter seek to impose upon him. I take it, when the House has the right and power to punish for an offence, and at the same time, to interrogate a person charged with the offence, his privilege, based on the principle that his answer may tend to subject him to the penalties of the offence, is gone; and that, therefore, in respect to the main enquiry, which is whether he has committed the offence charged or not, we have the right to put questions, notwithstanding that the tendency of his answers might be to criminate him. If not, it would be impossible for us to proceed at all. The protection which the person at the Bar has in such a case is in the strong hand of power which the House is accustomed to exercise to prevent an improper use of his answers. It is laid down that:

"While the House punishes misconduct with severity, it is careful to protect the witness from the consequences of his evidence given the House. On the 26th May, 1818, the Speaker called the attention of the House to the case of the King vs. Merceron, in which the shorthand writer of the House was examined without previous leave, and it was resolved, nem con, that all witnesses examined before this House, or any committee thereof, are entitled to the protection of this House, in respect of anything that may be said by them in their evidence; and that no clerk or officer of this House or shorthand writer employed to take evidence before this House, or any committee thereof, do give evidence elsewhere, in respect of any proceeding or examination had at the Bar, or before any committee of this House, without the special leave of this House."

I think that any person who may, from time to time, be called to this Bar, may trust to the exercise of our authority for his protection against undue advantage being taken of the answers he may give. In this instance, every member of this House may decide as to whether this question might be put or not, having in view the just exercise of the authority of this House to prevent any person whatever, whether he be a shorthand writer of the House or clerk of the House or persons present by courtesy to listen to its debates, from testifying hereafter against the person at the bar as to the answers given in the House; and in that respect, the person who stands at the Bar may have the same privilege against the improper use of answers being made against him, as a member of this House is in relation to any remarks he may make in Parliament on any question that may come before it. It is true, there is an authority cited to the effect that, out of consideration and compassion for persons called to the Bar of the House, the House, through its Speaker, occasionally cautions the person that he is not bound to answer questions tending to criminate him. I answer, that that authority applies to questions which may tend to make him liable to accusations or disabilities collateral to those which are the subject of immediate enquiry. For instance, Mr. Dunn, if he were questioned with regard to other matters than the mere question of return, would be entitled to claim privilege on the ground that his answer might subject him to penalties, irrespective of those which attach to the particular offence with which he is charged. I understand the authority cited to be that, with that limitation, questions may be put. The counsel has objected that it is not proper to ask the witness whether the printed paper submitted to him is a true copy of the documents which passed through his hands, namely, the writ and the return thereto. The objection is that it will be impossible for the witness to answer that question fully without comparing the printed documents with the originals. I think that is a question entirely for the witness himself to decide. It is not an objection to come from the counsel that the witness may or may not be able to answer the question, because, if he is not, he can say so.

Mr. WELDON. I agree with the view taken by the hon. gentleman on the first objection. With regard to the second, if Mr. Dunn cannot answer the question, we must have the originals produced. They are supposed to be on the Table, and it ought to be an easy matter to produce them. If the originals be produced, then I will put the question whether they are the originals, and whether the copies are correct. I framed the question in the way I did because I thought this gentleman would be prepared to answer any question with regard to any paper that he had transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. SPEAKER. You are ordered to answer.

Mr. DUNN. Not having the original written instructions and my correspondence with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and my return, I am unable to say that these are, word for word, copies of those returns, &c., but so far as I am able to recollect, I believe they are of the same substance. I believe they are correct, so far as I can recollect.

Mr. HESSON. The gentleman at the Bar has a right to have notice of the question put to him, so that he would, in this case, be in a position to know whether these papers were exact copies or not. Now, we have arrived at the very position I anticipated we would be in. The gentleman at the Bar is unable to give you the evidence you want, because he has not had an opportunity of comparing this with the original papers. Those papers are in the hands of the House, not in his hands. He should have been put in a position by those who are pressing this case, to compare these papers and to answer these questions.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). If we went on in that way in the courts of law, we would be in a very nice position. What I did was with a view to expedite the proceedings. If the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson) persists, I will have the originals produced. I think I have a right to send for them, and then we will see if the witness will not identify them.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. He has answered that satisfactorily.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I do not suppose that the witness at the Bar, who has been here for some days, since he notified the Speaker that he was in attendance, has been so negligent as not to have examined these papers.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). You would not expect any other answer?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). As far as his answer is concerned, I am satisfied with that. I am answering the objection of the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Hesson); and if any such objection is to be raised in that way, I will have the originals placed in the hands of the witness, for I do not want any objection to be raised afterwards on technical grounds. The next question I propose to put is the following:—"Look at No. 9, Votes and Proceedings now shown to you. Is the report of the proceedings of the election set out at pages 73 to 78, inclusive, signed by your election clerk, a correct statement of the proceedings of the election, and are the statements on pages 79 and 80 correct copies of the statements of the returning officers?" I would like to have the original produced.

Mr. BLAKE. They are on the Table technically.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. All those papers are before us.

Mr. MITCHELL. Let them be put in the hands of the witness and let him examine them and have the answers satisfactory.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There is no necessity for that.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). If there is any objection I ask to have the originals placed in his hands.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. My answer to the last question will about reply to this question also.

Mr. COURSOL. Answer that one first.

Mr. SPEAKER. Please repeat in words your last answer.

Mr. DUNN. That so far as I know these are correct copies, I believe them to be correct.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I now propose to ask: "When were you first informed of the objection as to the deposit or that it would be taken? By whom, and how long prior to the 5th March?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. The first information I got that any objection as to the paying of the deposit was to be made was from the newspaper. The 5th of March was on Saturday, and it was some time in the beginning of that week that I saw the editorial in the newspaper—the Sun, I think—stating that the agent of Mr. Baird was thinking of making objections to the nomination paper on account of the deposit being wrongly made.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I propose to ask the following question: "Did you not state at the time of declaration that you had obtained law books from Mr. Currey, and looked into the question? When did you do that?"

Mr. THOMPSON. I would ask the hon. member to state the question a little more explicitly. It is ambiguous as it stands at present.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I will put it this way: "Did you not state at the time of the declaration that you had obtained law books from Mr. Currey and looked into the question? When did you get the law books and look into the question?"

Mr. LYONS (Counsel). Before that question is answered by the witness, allow me to say that I object to it. I do not wish to take technical objections at all, but I submit respectfully to the House that that question is not at all material to the issue. We must draw a line somewhere as to what questions will be put to the witness. If a returning officer consults law books, I presume he is doing something which we would expect him to do; but surely it is not a matter that he is to be examined about, with a view of making a complaint out of it, or as affecting his return. As to conversation which he may have had with third parties, unless they are material to the issue, I submit very respectfully that witness should not be examined upon them.

Mr. MITCHELL. Amen.

Mr. THOMPSON. It strikes me the question may be material, and if it may be material it ought to be put. We are not deciding now whether it is material or not. In examining a witness we must admit every question which may possibly be material. There are many views of the case in which it may possibly be material; therefore, I think we should allow it.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I did not state at the day of declaration that I had obtained law books from Mr. Currey, and looked into the question.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the following question be put:—"Did you obtain books from Mr. Currey or any other person, and look into the question prior to or on the 5th March? If from any other person, from whom?"

Mr. LYONS (Counsel). On behalf of Mr. Dunn I object to this question most strongly. Part of it was asked before in the last one, and now he is asked if he received any books from anybody previous to the 5th March. At what time? During his whole life? I believe he has been a school teacher for some time during his life. Also he is asked from what other person. I submit to the House that this is a question that cannot be material at all.

Mr. DALY. I think hon. gentlemen opposite should employ counsel.

Mr. SCARTH. Perhaps it would be well to appoint a committee on the other side.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Carried, carried.

Mr. MITCHELL. It appears to me that this thing is degenerating into a farce. If hon. gentlemen want to maintain the dignity of this House and conduct this examination properly, an examination of a most serious character involving most serious consequences, they had better allow the questions to be put; and I think if the gentlemen who act as counsel, having taken this objection to one of the questions, allowed matters to proceed without continuing every individual objection we would get along very much better with the business.

Mr. DUNN. Am I supposed to answer this question literally? I do not remember having obtained any books from Mr. Currey. I remember of having bought books ever since I was five or six years old from other people. I am unable to mention the different parties.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Dunn asked the question whether he should answer the question literally. I would suggest that he should answer it fully and distinctly as relating to this enquiry.

Mr. DUNN. I did not obtain any books from Mr. Currey prior to 5th March—that is with respect to this question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Or from any other person?

Mr. DUNN. Or from any other person; although—nor on 5th March.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Although what?

Mr. DUNN. I was going to say that previous to that time I had obtained some; but it was previous to the election. I had obtained some law reports that he had; but it was previous to my being returning officer, previous to my being appointed; but I had no books in relation to this question from him or any other person.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the following question be asked: "Did any one assist you in or point you out any authority? If so, who assisted you in this subject?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. FERGUSON (Counsel). The way the question is put is this: Did any one assist you in this question, and point out to you authority?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). On this subject, with respect to the question of the deposit.

Mr. THOMPSON. I suggest that the question might be put more definitely, as to whether any person assisted him as to the return he should make.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In conducting an examination you must frame the questions as you would in a court of law. I understand that the witness is sufficiently astute to understand the question. But he has trifled with the House; I say so advisedly.

Mr. THOMPSON. I did not make the suggestion that the questions be more distinct for his benefit, but that we might understand them.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The question says: "Did any one assist you in this?" To what are we referring? In regard to whether any person assisted him in coming to a conclusion, examining law books and citing authorities? I can put the question in another way if necessary.

Mr. THOMPSON. The ambiguity is here: Whether the hon. gentleman meant to imply that anyone advised him in regard to the point raised with respect to the deposit, or advised him after the election as to the return made, notwithstanding this defect.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I have not touched the question of return. I have not got there yet. If the witness says he cannot understand the question, I will put it in another shape. I propose to alter the motion as follows: "Did anyone assist or advise you as to this question of the validity of the deposit, prior to or on the 5th of March, and show you any authorities on the subject? If so, who so assisted and advised you?"

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. Prior to the 5th March, no one assisted me or advised me as to the question of the validity of the deposit, but on the 5th March, declaration day, the matter was argued before me by Mr. Currey, agent for Mr. Baird, and by Mr. Gregory, agent for Mr. King.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the following question be asked: "What is your occupation?"

Mr. MITCHELL. Manufacturing members.
Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I am a teacher by occupation.

An hon. MEMBER. Preacher or teacher?

Mr. DUNN. Teacher—a public school teacher.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the following questions be put: "Were you at the time of your appointment as returning officer, or at any time prior, a member of any political association? If so, how long prior, and in what capacity were you therein?"

Mr. THOMPSON. I would not undertake at all to say that this question should not be put, but I submit to my hon. friend whether it is pertinent to the enquiry which is now being conducted. We are examining this person as to his own culpability; and I submit to the hon. gentleman—and I am not presenting this argument as a reason why the question should be voted down, because I should be exceedingly averse to offer any argument, against any question which any hon. member, sitting as a judge, thinks is pertinent—but I ask the hon. gentleman whether we are not now trying merely the culpability of the person at the Bar, and whether that question ought not to be tried distinct altogether from any question as to the propriety or the impropriety of his appointment. The hon. gentleman will see that the appointments of the returning officers are made by the Governor in Council, by Order in Council, and that a question as to whether he was a suitable person to be appointed or not is one for which the Government must be answerable, and in respect of which the person at the Bar should not be answerable at all. If, in the opinion of the House, the selection ought not to have been made of a person who belonged to any political organisation in the county, we are responsible; he is not, and I submit that it would be fairer—considering that we are acting in this matter purely as judges—it will surely be fairer to dissociate the question of the responsibility for his selection from any question of his culpability for what he did after he was selected. His appointment was not of his own choice or seeking; it was our act, for which we are responsible. The question with respect to how he conducted himself thereafter is, I submit, all that we should enquire about when he is at the Bar.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). If the object with which I asked the question was to make the Government responsible, I would agree with my hon. friend, but I do not put it with that view. I think, in a matter of this kind, such a question may be important with regard to the personality of the individual whom I am questioning, by leading up to certain other points, but not with any view of holding the Government responsible for it in the sense in which I put the question. It is true that the Government are responsible for the appointment of a returning officer, but they may be entirely ignorant of certain facts which if they had known they would not have appointed him. Therefore, as far as the Government is concerned, the question cannot, as far as I can see, affect it in any way unless it was known to the Government. But I am not asking the question in the sense of attributing any blame to the Government. I am only asking his position in that respect, because it may affect the right afterwards to consider or question his conduct and acts.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the objection taken by my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Thompson) should be almost conclusive, but, under the circumstances, as hon. gentlemen desire that everything should be explained, I think the question may be put.

Mr. MITCHELL. I agree with the right hon. gentleman. If one has his house burglarised, or if a robbery is committed on his person, and he goes to Scotland Yard, they go a long way round in order to get at the motives for the act. Now, what we want to know is whether political or other influence inspired this man.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Ah, ah.

Mr. MITCHELL. You may "ah" as much as you like, but we want to know what political or other influence existed in this case.

Mr. GUILLET. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he thinks it any crime to belong to either party in this country, unless it be the secession party in Nova Scotia.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. Has the House said that I shall answer the question?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think, Mr. Speaker, that when the House calls upon the witness to answer the question, he should not ask any questions, but should answer the question put to him.

Mr. SPEAKER. You are ordered to answer the question.

Mr. DUNN. At the time of my appointment as returning officer I was not a member of any political association, but I was the secretary of the Liberal-Conservative Association of Queen's county prior to my appointment. How long before I am not in a position to say, because I cannot remember.

An hon. MEMBER. About how long?

Mr. DUNN. I may have been within a month; I cannot tell exactly.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the following question be asked:—"Did you apply for the position of returning officer personally or by letter, and to whom? Were you aware or informed anyone had applied on your behalf for the position? If so, who were you informed had done so?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. SPEAKER. The House has ordered you to answer that question.

Mr. FERGUSON (Counsel). On behalf of the witness I object to the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. Too late.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. According to the ruling of Mr. Speaker, these objections must be taken before the questions are read and ordered by the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will not sit down. I generally get through with what I have to say, and I intend to do so now. I take the objection that according to your ruling any objection to be taken by the counsel for the person at the Bar should be taken before the House orders the question to be put.

Mr. THOMPSON. Strictly speaking, that is no doubt the case, but in this instance I think the question was put to the House and declared carried before it was sent down to be examined, and I think it would be strict to insist upon it in this case.

Mr. McCARTHY. But I submit that the counsel at the Bar cannot interfere until the House pronounces upon the question. He is not sitting on the floor of the House, and cannot join in the debate, and until the question is put by you, Mr. Speaker, it would be irregular for the counsel to open his mouth. The objection must come after, I think.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is not the point. No one supposes that the counsel should state his objections until the question is put, but the counsel did not submit his objection until the motion was declared carried. The counsel had the question in his hands when the Speaker declared it carried.

Mr. DALY. Are we to understand from the remarks of the hon. member for Bothwell, that as soon as you put the question, the counsel is to get up and say, "no, it is not carried."

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not wish to press the objection.

Mr. FERGUSON (Counsel). I object to this question on the ground that the returning officer is called to the Bar of the House to answer for his conduct in returning the candidate, and that this question, inasmuch as it goes into matters which occurred long anterior to his appointment as returning officer, is not within the scope of this enquiry.

Mr. MITCHELL. The objection is taken, and the Chair has ordered the answer to be given.

An hon. MEMBER. Sit down.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will sit down when I get through with what I have to say to the Chair. Therefore, I think the question should be answered.

Mr. SPEAKER. I certainly declared the question carried; but the hon. gentleman has himself stated that he does not press his objection. The case is just the same as when I declare a motion carried, some hon. member rises to speak to it, and by general consent the word "carried" is withdrawn. The question is whether the objection raised on the part of Mr. Dunn ought to be sustained by the House or not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I quite understand that. I withdraw my objection to the counsel taking his objection, but I do not withdraw my objection to the person at the Bar objecting to answer it. That is the thing.

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards the objection raised, I submit to the House that the cardinal rule in dealing with all these questions is what I suggested a few moments ago—not what we consider is material to the enquiry, but what may be material. It may be that I am stating a very wide and liberal principle in relation to the examination of witnesses; but I think it is safer, in consideration both of the dignity of the House and the rights of the person at the Bar, to be exceedingly liberal as to the questions to be put rather than to adhere to a too strict and technical rule. I think we are enquiring, not merely what took place on this occasion, but as to the good faith with which the person at the Bar acted; and in that view I submit that it may be material whether he set out with any design, or whether he performed in good faith the duties imposed upon him.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I applied for the position of returning officer. I asked a certain prominent political man of our county to use his influence to get me the position. I applied to Hugh McLean first, and afterwards I applied by letter to Mr. Baird for the position.

Mr. MITCHELL. A good man to apply to.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The latter portion of that question has not been replied to: "Were you aware or informed of the fact that anyone had applied on your behalf for the position?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I was informed that Mr. Baird had applied for me.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. WELDON. I move that the following question be put: "For what reason, when you made your return, did you not return the ballot papers and proceedings to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery? Did you consult anybody as to your doing so, and who were your legal advisers?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I did not return the ballot papers to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at the time I made my return, because I had been served with a certificate from the judge of the county court for a recount. I did consult a legal gentleman as to my act; the legal gentleman whom I consulted was Ezekiel McLeod, Q. C., of St. John.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the following question be now put: "Had you not refused to act upon the judge's order for the recount? Was not that order served on you before you made any return?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I had refused to act upon the judge's order for a recount. That order was served on me before I made my returns. Am I allowed to give any reasons for my action, upon any of these questions being put to me? I have to answer, yes or no. Am I allowed to give my reasons for so acting.

Mr. THOMPSON. The witness ought to be instructed, as witnesses usually are in courts of justice, that he may add anything to explain or qualify his answer, and is not restricted to merely answering yes or no. But he must not go into matters outside the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. You are allowed to give explanations of the answers you have made, but not to go outside the question put to you.

Mr. McCARTHY. I move that the following question be put:—"Why did you refuse to act on the order of the judge for the recount?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I refused to act upon the order of the judge for a recount, because a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition was served upon me by order of Judge Tuck.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the following question be put:—"Were you a party named in such rule nisi? Was it not on a verbal statement of Mr. Currey as to what Judge Tuck said that you acted?"

Mr. THOMPSON. The latter part of the question tends to enquire whether Mr. Dunn was served with a rule nisi or not, or whether he refused merely on the verbal statement that a rule nisi had been issued. Still you proceed to interrogate him as to what the rule nisi contains. We should first ascertain whether he ever saw the rule nisi.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). When the judge orders a recount, Mr. Dunn shields himself under the rule nisi, and when he is ordered to produce the ballot boxes he shields himself under the order of Judge Tuck. He was no party to or called on to obey that order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a question of law.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). That may be. I put the question whether he did not state, in consequence of what Mr. Currey told him, that he was the party named in the rule nisi. If my hon. friend takes the very sharp practice that the rule nisi is not here, the witness was wrong in referring to it. He based his answer on the fact that we were served with a rule nisi.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not want to take any sharp practice. The hon. member is mistaken in saying Mr. Dunn was served with a rule nisi. If he was, the latter part of the question is wrong, because it asks him if he was not acting entirely on a verbal statement. All I suggested was that we should ascertain whether the rule nisi was served before asking Mr. Dunn if he acted on a verbal statement.

Mr. DAVIES. He stated that, in consequence of a rule nisi, he refrained from acting on a recount then. My hon. friend put the further question: "Were you named in the rule nisi, or was it not in consequence of a verbal statement made by Mr. Currey, counsel for Mr. Baird, that you acted?"

Mr. TUPPER. Did he say a rule nisi was served upon him?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We will find that out when he answers this question.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). To prevent any difficulty I propose the following question: "When you were served with the rule nisi, did not Mr. Currey make a statement?"

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I am not aware whether or not the witness has stated that a rule nisi was served upon him. I notice that the hon. gentleman proposes to ask what was said when the rule nisi was served upon him, but I have not heard the witness state that a rule nisi was served upon him.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I understood that the witness said—

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Let us hear what the witness said.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I asked him—

Mr. McCARTHY. Perhaps the shorthand writer had better write out the answer, and send it up to the Clerk.

Mr. DUNN. I am somewhat tired standing here, Mr. Speaker. Am I allowed the privilege of sitting?

Mr. TAYLOR. The witness has made application for a seat. I move that he be allowed a chair.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the witness be given a chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. Will the Sergeant-at-Arms give the witness a chair. The answer sent by the shorthand writer is this: "I refused to act on the order of the judge for a recount, because a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition was served upon me by order of Judge Tuck"

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is clear.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I propose that the following question be put: "Were you a party named in such rule nisi? Was it not in consequence of something said to you by Mr. Currey, the counsel for Mr. Baird, as to statements made by Judge Tuck that you refused to act on the recount? Did you not state to Judge Steadman that it was in consequence of Judge Tuck's statement as repeated to you by Currey, that you refused to act on a recount?"

Mr. LYONS (Counsel). Before the question is put, I would ask for the information of the witness if the former question is withdrawn, or is he to answer it?

Mr. SPEAKER. It has been withdrawn.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I have the copy of a rule nisi for a writ of prohibition which was served upon me here, and I place it in the hands of one of my counsel, and he may read it here for the information of the House, if the House permits.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Put it in.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. RYKERT. You cannot talk to the witness.

Mr. DUNN. It was not in consequence of something said to me by Mr. Currey, the counsel for Mr. Baird said—it was not in consequence of something said to me by Mr. Currey as to statements made by Judge Tuck that I refused to act on the recount. I did not state to Judge Steadman that it was in consequence of Judge Tuck's statement as repeated to me by Mr. Currey that I refused to act on the recount.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The witness has not answered the first part of the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. He puts it in.

Mr. DUNN. I produce the rule.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He produces the rule.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). That is no answer to the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. It is the very best answer.

Mr. FERGUSON. I will read the rule.

Mr. THOMPSON. I propose this question—

Mr. DAVIES. Before that is done, I would point out that there is a question which has been asked by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), or rather three questions—one question divided into three. The witness has chosen to answer two, and to utterly ignore one.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. DAVIES. Yes; he was asked whether he was a party named in that rule nisi. He has not answered whether he was or not.

Mr. McCARTHY. He puts it in.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. We are practically judges, and any judge can ask a question of the witness.

Mr. THOMPSON. He did not ignore the question, but answered it fairly when he said "I produce the copy of the rule nisi." My hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Weldon), will remember that, when a few moments ago I suggested that he should ask the witness whether the rule nisi had been served, and that, if that was the case, it was unfair to ask any questions as to what was contained in it, he said I was too strict and should not press that point. I felt that I should not proceed, because the witness might not have the papers with him, and my hon. friend might be restrained thereby from enquiring about something that might be pertinent. Now, that he has the paper we may make the enquiry.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I asked him to read it. It is not a part of his answer. He may have stated that he copied the rule nisi, but he did not read it.

Mr. THOMPSON. It strikes me the question was fairly answered, and he offered to produce it. I move that this question be put: "Will you produce the rule nisi served upon you?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I produce the copy of the rule nisi that was served upon me.

"IN THE SUPREME COURT.

"Ex parte, GEORGE F. BAIRD.

"Upon motion of Mr. L. A. Currey, and upon reading the affidavits of George F. Baird and Lemuel A. Currey, I do order that James Steadman, Esquire, judge of the County Court for the county of Queen's, in the Province of New Brunswick, T. Medley Wetmore and George G. King, at the next Easter term of this honorable court, do show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue to prohibit James Steadman, Esquire, the judge of the County Court for the county of Queen's aforesaid, from in any way further proceeding with or to make a recount or final addition of the votes given for said George F. Baird and George G. King at the election held on the twenty-second day of February last past of a member to represent the electoral district of the county of Queen's, in the Province of New Brunswick, in the House of Commons of Canada, and from certifying the result of any such recount or final addition of the said votes to the returning officer of the said electoral district of the county of Queen's, and in the meantime and until further order of this court, let all further proceedings with, on or with reference to said recount or final addition of said votes, and such certificate of the result of any such recount or final addition of votes be stayed.

"Dated, March the ninth, A. D. 1887.

"(Signed) W. H. TUCK

"Judge of the Supreme Court."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Let it be read as part of the answer.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move this question be put: "Are proceedings relating to the recount and the prohibition still pending in the Supreme Court of New Brunswick?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. From report, the proceedings relative to the recount and the prohibition are still pending. The rule was made absolute in the Supreme Court of the Province of New Brunswick, but the case had not been argued.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Made absolute?

Mr. DUNN. The rule has been made absolute. Perhaps I am wrong. I say from report I saw in the newspaper that the rule had been made absolute.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that this question be put: "You refused to act upon Judge Steadman's order for a recount on account of Judge Tuck's order, yet did you not make a return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery without the ballots and proceedings, although you were aware the proceedings were going on in the Supreme Court?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I refused to act upon Judge Steadman's order for the recount on account of Judge Tuck's order, yet on the advice of Ezekiel McLeod, Q. C., and ex-Attorney General of the Province of New Brunswick, or one of the ex-Attorney General's, I made my return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery without the ballots and proceedings, although I was aware by report that the proceedings were going on in the Supreme Court.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move that the witness be asked the following question: "If you believed Judge Tuck's order extended to you as returning officer, how did you, in the face of the peremptory stay of proceedings on it, make a return nevertheless of Mr. Baird, the minority candidate?"

Mr. IVES. The question is hardly a fair one, for this reason, that the order read is a stay of proceedings in the recount, not an order to restrain the returning officer from making a return.

Mr. McCARTHY. I understand the stay of proceedings was to the judge, not to the officer.

Mr. DAVIES. The witness has stated that the reason why he did not return the ballot boxes was because he was prevented by the nisi directing a stay of proceedings. He is now asked: "Do you believe that the rule nisi was a peremptory stay of proceedings extending to you; if so, why did you fly in the face of it and return the minority candidate?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I acted on the advice of Mr. McLeod. I produced the rule nisi for a writ of prohibition when I consulted him, and he told me it was simply against the recount, not against any return.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move the following question be put: "Why did you not forward the ballot papers and proceedings with the return?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I did not forward the ballot papers and proceedings with the return because I was advised not to do so by Mr. McLeod.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I move the following question be put: "Do you know L. A. Currey? What is his profession, and where does he reside? Had you any conversation or correspondence with him touching the objections to the candidature of Mr. King. State the substance of the conversation or correspondence."

Mr. LYONS (Counsel). I object to that question, on the ground, principally, that it is a very complex question. I think it would only be fair to the witness to break it up into three or four questions, if it is to be put at all. Several questions of the same character have already been put, to which I did not object, in our endeavor to have a full explanation, but fault was found with the answers, that they were not full enough. I submit that this is a question which it is very difficult for a witness to answer at one time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) to explain the urgency of the question, which requires the person at the Bar to state the nature of the conversation he had with Mr. Currey about Mr. King.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I might pursue the matter by first asking with respect to Mr. Currey, in order to show that Mr. Currey was not only the election agent, but was the law adviser of Mr. Baird at the election.

Mr. THOMPSON. Assuming that to be so, what have we to do with the opinion the witness expressed to Mr. Currey about Mr. King?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In this way: If we show that he had a conversation with Mr. Currey as to his objections to Mr. King—

Mr. McCARTHY. Why not ask him directly?

Mr. THOMPSON. This is not merely a general question, but the witness is asked to state all the conversations he has had with Mr. Currey in regard to Mr. King.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It is relative to the objection to Mr. King.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I know L. A. Currey. I believe he is a lawyer, and he resides in St. John. On the night previous to the election he walked out to the road with me when I was taking my usual walk, and told me he was going to object the next day—or he was talking about it; but I had no correspondence with him touching the objection to the candidature of Mr. King.

Mr. BURDETT. I move that the following question be put: "Who were the candidates at the late election for Queen's county? Did you receive their nomination papers and accept their deposits and grant a poll; and did a poll take place, and what number of votes were given for each candidate, respectively?"

Mr. THOMPSON. The only objection I have to that question is, that all the information asked for formally appears in the report made by this witness himself. We have it there more accurately and more fully than he can possibly state it. On page 16 he makes a special report upon it, and describes the deposit of the papers with him, the way in which the deposit of money was made, and the fact of holding the election, and subsequently the ballot papers were produced, and we ascertained how the majority of votes stood.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think he does not state the summing up of the votes—what the number of votes were.

Mr. BURDETT. Neither does he state that the return brought down in this report is a correct return. He says he believes it is, but I do not go much on this gentleman's belief. I want the facts. He says he believes that the return in the Votes and Proceedings is correct, but we may be led to the conclusion hereafter that it is not correct; and if he gives a plain answer to that question it can go in Hansard and in the Votes and Proceedings of this House, and then we will know just who were the candidates, whether they paid their deposits, whether they had a poll, and how many votes each received.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman says he does not want anybody's belief, and yet, in preference to the ballots deposited on the Table and counted by the Clerk of the Crown, he prefers to ask the witness what he knows about them. If what the witness believes whom he and his friends have called to the Bar, is not satisfactory evidence, of what value will that be in which he does not believe? The witness answered, as I thought perfectly fair, as regards the correctness of the return put in his hands, as to their being copies or not—he was not allowed an opportunity of comparing them, but notwithstanding that he answered: I believe them to be true copies of the originals. Now I submit they are far better evidence than anything the witness can say about them, both as to the fact of receiving the nomination papers, and as to how the vote stood after a poll was had.

Mr. BURDETT. If the Minister of Justice states that he refuses to permit that question to be asked, and calls on his followers to vote it down—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh; shame.

Mr. BURDETT—otherwise I ask the question and I want it answered.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am not refusing to have it put; I am not asking any hon. gentleman to vote it down; I am not calling upon my followers or anybody else to vote at all. I am asking if it is not better to refer to the record we have in the Votes and Proceedings, as to anything which took place in writing and by the ballots cast in the election, than by asking the opinion of the witness at the Bar as to what the documents contained. I ask that, more especially in view of what the witness answered on a former occasion. It struck me that he answered it fairly, when he said he could answer only from recollection, but that he believed that the paper produced was a copy of the original paper. Can he answer this question more fully? Could we desire anything more than his admission that he believed that the official record of the papers was correct?

Mr. DAVIES. I think there is a good deal in what the Minister of Justice says, but the object which my hon. friend has, I presume, in asking the question, is to have in a succinct form all the material facts upon which hon. members may be guided, in coming to a conclusion hereafter. It is true, they may be governed by what is found in the Votes and Proceedings, away back on the 25th of April, but if the question is now asked the witness, it is not a question of belief. He knows who were the candidates, he is the man who received the money, he knows whether he received it or not; he is the man who had the poll and he knows whether—

Some hon. MEMBERS. We all know it.

Mr. DAVIES. We know it unofficially, as we know many other facts, but not officially.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, we do.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not intend to argue the question; the information may perhaps be fairly gathered from the papers, but there are many hon. members who think it would be advisable to have this information from the witness' own mouth, in a clear, succinct form, as the facts are within his knowledge. My hon. friend (Mr. Burdett) reminds me that these ballot papers never went to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery at all, and, therefore, I think this is a proper time to ask that particular part of the question.

Mr. McCARTHY. Does the hon. gentleman say that the ballots were not sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, they were not.

Mr. McCARTHY. They were returned from him.

Mr. DAVIES. They were ordered by the Order of this House.

Mr. McCARTHY. To the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). But not in a formal way.

Mr. McCARTHY. What is the difference when they came through his hands? What more formal statement could we have than the announcement printed in the papers. If it is important to have a statement from the witness, and if that is to be treated as better evidence than the return itself, then we may have to ask the whole story. Surely we should rely on the written evidence we have as the best evidence.

Mr. THOMPSON. I call the hon. gentleman's attention to page 16 of the Votes and Proceedings, in which the report of the returning officer appears, and then to page 73, where the other documents appear. The question is asked whether he did not receive the nomination papers of the two candidates. Now, on page 73 he not only admits that he received them, but he sets them out in full, and then on page 77 he gives the number of votes cast for each candidate in the election. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that so far as members on this side are concerned there will be no pretence that that record is not before the House.

Mr. TUPPER. Not only so, but on the evidence which has been referred to, and which is found in the Votes and Proceedings, hon. gentlemen contended at great length that no further evidence should be taken in this case; that everything was fully before the House; that the House was seized of all the facts, and should come directly to the conclusion that Mr. King was the candidate who should have been returned at that election—the candidate who was properly nominated, the candidate whose nomination was fully explained by the returning officer's return, the candidate who received the majority of the votes—and they asked the House on that ground to say that there was no reason for enquiry, no further evidence to be produced and to vote Mr. King into Mr. Baird's seat. After taking that ground it does seem odd that they should to-night pretend that this evidence is insufficient, or difficult to be understood, and that we should now begin all over and have the evidence taken orally with these official documents before us.

Mr. DAVIES. Perhaps the explanation may be found in this fact, that the papers may have been in such confusion as they came from the returning officer, as to lead my hon. friend to come to the conclusion that Mr. King did not receive a majority, while they led other hon. members to the conclusion that he did.

Mr. TUPPER. There was no confusion about the facts; the facts were admitted. The decision of the House was in favor of leaving this matter to the election courts, and there was no dispute as to the facts. No hon. gentleman in that discussion raised a single question of fact. The discussion was on a question of law, pure and simple.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Assuming all that the hon. member for Pictou says, I do not think it makes this question an improper one.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have the best possible evidence on this question before us. The hon. gentleman wishes to supplement the best evidence possible by inferior evidence.

Mr. BURDETT. I do not wish to be technical in this question, but the point that occurs to me is this, that the witness does not admit the accuracy of the copy of the original document. He says there may be verbal differences. For all we know, the verbal differences may be that Mr. Baird had the majority of votes, and it may be asserted by the person at the Bar and his friends. If the person at the Bar is willing to admit that the documents in the Votes and Proceedings are accurate, and is willing to be bound by them as accurate, I am willing to withdraw the question; but I want to have no escape from this point—that the minority candidate was returned by this man with the knowledge of what he was doing at the time.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to suggest to the hon. member for East Hastings that his purpose would be much better served by putting the documents in the hands of the witness and asking him to admit their correctness. I think that should be done in any case.

Mr. BURDETT. I am not going to press the question to a vote, because I know the result of it. If the Ministers will not submit the question I will withdraw it.

Mr. DAVIES. I propose this question: "Why did you return the minority candidate Baird instead of the majority candidate King?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I returned the minority candidate Baird instead of the majority candidate King, because after hearing the arguments that had been advanced before me on declaration day, both pro and con, I considered that Mr. King had not been properly nominated, and, therefore, could not be returned by me as the man having the majority of the legal votes; and afterwards, before I made my return, I consulted counsel, Mr. McLeod, and the counsel advised me to make the return that I did.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I propose this question: "Was it under the advice of Mr. E. McLeod, that you returned Mr. George F. Baird as the member elected by acclamation? Was such advice in writing, and when received by you?"

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. It was under the advice of Mr. E. McLeod that I returned Mr. Geo. F. Baird as member-elect by acclamation. The said advice was both verbal and in writing. I am not in a position to say exactly when it was given. It was received by me prior to the time that the return was sent and made.

Mr. THOMPSON. Are there any further questions to be asked by the hon. gentlemen opposite?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I have no further question.

Mr. THOMPSON. An opportunity ought to be given to Mr. Dunn to make any statement, if he has any statement to make.

Mr. LANDRY. I would like to submit one question: "Did you on nomination day, before two o'clock in the afternoon, advise Mr. King, or any one for him, to have a legally appointed agent?"

Mr. DAVIES. Same objection applies to that question which was successfully raised by the Minister of Justice to a question put by my hon. friend behind me. The facts are all stated in the return.

Mr. TUPPER. He says in the return:

"On my calling the attention of Mr. Wetmore to the fact that no election agent had been appointed by Mr. King, I was handed the appointment of John McLean McLean as election agent for Mr. King."

That is not an answer to the present question.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). He states that he did call attention to the fact that no election agent had been appointed by Mr. King.

Mr. McCARTHY. That is only advising him.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The question has been put in the hands of the witness. I find he says:

"On February 15th, at 12 o'clock, I opened court for the nomination of candidates for the House of Commons of Canada. T. Medley Wetmore, Mr. BURDETT.

more handed me the nomination papers of George G. King, of Chipman, Queen's county, New Brunswick, merchant, accompanied by the sum of $200."

That clearly must have been before two o'clock.

"On my calling the attention of Mr. Wetmore to the fact that no election agent had been appointed by Mr. King, I was handed the appointment of John McLean McLean as election agent for Mr. King. At two o'clock I granted a poll and announced the names of the candidates."

It seems to me, in view of the argument of the Minister of Justice, in reference to the motion of my hon. friend from Hastings, that we have it there very clearly that the nomination paper was put in, that the returning officer called attention to the fact that no agent had been appointed, and that at two o'clock he granted the poll. We have the statement here of the superior evidence, according to what the Prime Minister said, and now the hon. gentleman is asking for the inferior evidence.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should say, on reading the papers, that the inference was what the hon. gentleman suggests. The question is designed to ascertain the fact, so that it should not be left to inference.

Mr. BURDETT. My question was to get an answer as to facts, and not to leave it to inference.

Mr. THOMPSON. In that case the documents showed the fact without leaving any inference at all.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So it is in this case.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. On nomination day, before 3 o'clock in the afternoon, I did advise Mr. Wetmore to advise Mr. King to appoint an election agent, as I believed that Mr. King was rendering himself at that time liable to the penalty of a misdemeanor by not appointing him, by not appointing one.

Mr. AMYOT. At what time?

Mr. DUNN. I say it was before 2 o'clock.

Mr. LANDRY. I propose that this question be put to the witness: "Did you know on nomination day that the law required candidates to appoint agents and to notify you of the fact before 2 o'clock, and did you then know or had you considered the legal effect of the deposit being made by anyone on behalf of the candidate outside of the regularly appointed agent?"

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the latter part of that question is objectionable, because the hon. gentleman may draw wholly different conclusions as to what the legal effect of a certain act may be from the conclusions which I would draw, or those which the witness might draw. The hon. gentleman should confine himself to questions of fact. I do not think the latter part of the question should be put.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). It is not a question as to fact, but it is a question as to the legal effect. It is assuming a legal effect, which is a matter of law to be discussed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DUNN. I knew on nomination day that the law required candidates to appoint agents and to notify me of the fact before 2 o'clock; but I did not then know that the non-appointment of such an agent or the payment of a deposit by a person not an agent would have the effect I afterwards judged it would have upon the nomination paper.

Mr. LANDRY. If there be no other questions to ask the gentleman, and if I am in order, I would move that Mr. John R. Dunn be discharged from further attendance on this House.

Motion agreed to.

IMPERIAL TRUSTS COMPANY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 15) to incorporate the Imperial Trusts Company of Canada.—(Mr. Denison.)

On section 4,

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There are two points in this Bill to which I desire to draw the attention of the Minister of Justice. I doubt whether we have power to pass such a Bill, which enables a company to exercise the functions which this company might do, as trustees of estates in the different Provinces, where the company might not be under the control of the courts of the Provinces. For instance, this company may have a head office in Toronto, and do business in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and yet be beyond the control of the courts of those Provinces. It seems to me the matter should be left to the Provincial Legislatures to be dealt with. Then there is another objection, that is, the propriety of incorporating a company of this kind which really deals with local matters within each Province, because there are very few matters which are interprovincial, with the exception, perhaps, of a railway or steamboat company which might have interprovincial lines. There is nothing under this Act that I can see which would not be of a provincial or local nature. It would be an unwise policy on the part of the Dominion to pass a Bill giving a company of this nature powers over all the different Provinces. That is a matter which should be fairly left to the different Legislatures to deal with.

Mr. THOMPSON. My attention was turned to that point and I came to the conclusion that the Bill was one within the power of this Parliament to pass. My reason for forming this opinion was this: The Bill is one to incorporate a company to do business in more than one Province, in fact in all the Provinces of Canada. It is true that if the Bill is of that description, and the company's transactions are of that description, or if its operations were confined to any one Province, it would not come within our power to pass it; but inasmuch as the company seek to do business in all the Provinces of Canada, it is not felt that any Provincial Legislature could pass it, and therefore this Parliament alone can pass it. I think the principle is clear—we have power to legislate over all those matters which are not assigned exclusively to the Local Legislatures. We have incorporated—and this observation I think will answer the hon. gentleman's question, both as to the constitutionality of the Bill and the propriety of passing it—we have passed two accident corporations of precisely the same character, and for precisely the same purposes. The hon. gentleman will remember that we have in almost innumerable cases incorporated companies to do fire, life, marine and accident insurance business in the different Provinces of Canada, and it is only because their operations are extended into more than one Province that we can empower a company to do business of that kind, which, after all, is only authorising them as a company to engage in private contracts. The point was raised in one case which the hon. gentleman will remember, the case of Dobie, in the Privy Council. It was there decided that the question of territoriality, if I may so call it, that is, the extent within which the company was to operate, is to be one test of its constitutionality. I take it, as I said at the outset, that inasmuch as this Bill provides to incorporate a company to do business in more than one Province of Canada, it is one which this Parliament can pass. Of course I appreciate the weight of what the hon. gentleman has said as to the propriety of creating a company to undertake the business of trustees in the different Provinces of Canada, and the danger of doing so, in view of the fact that the company may not have a head office, or even a principal agency, in the different Provinces of Canada. It is not exactly the time to consider the propriety of a policy of that kind, when we have already incorporated two companies who are now actively engaged in that business, as I am informed; and if we decide that we should not incorporate this company, we are simply deciding that it is not wise to incorporate three companies, but it has been wise to incorporate two. If the company acquire any right whatever under this Bill to assume the office of trustee, of its own motion, and by its own authority, I certainly, as one member of Parliament, would oppose it strenuously. But the company can only exercise the office of trustee, or executor, or administrator, on being appointed by a legal tribunal, it can only be a trustee by the action of one of the superior courts in each Province. It would be for the court to consider whether this company should be appointed a trustee or administrator, in view of the fact that its head office may not be within the Province, and in view, likewise, of the fact that it may undertake that office, if appointed to it, without giving any security. At the same time, it is well to bear in mind the other provisions of the Bill, which are in the nature of security, to those for whom the office is undertaken as trustee, namely, the provision as to the payment of capital stock, or investment of a trust fund, and the supervision which the courts are empowered to exercise over it, from time to time.

Mr. WELDON. What two companies were incorporated?

Mr. DENISON. The Union is one, which is for the whole Dominion; and there is another one, which is also a trust company, in Toronto.

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think the Minister is correctly advised.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am. We found that Act, the Union Act, was more carefully drawn than this, and we extracted from it a number of clauses which we substituted for the clauses in this Act. There are two Dominion charters at the present time.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Notwithstanding the position taken by the Minister of Justice that if the Act was Provincial, it could not do business over the whole Dominion, it seems to me that no matter where the company may be incorporated, from that moment it becomes a person in law, an artificial person, it is true, but nevertheless, a person who may do business in any part of the Dominion, in fact it may do business anywhere throughout the world, wherever it may be permitted to do so. Of course it may be legislated against in a Province, but it seems to me to be a very extraordinary policy to incorporate a company with Provincial objects to carry on business over the entire Dominion. I know that rule is laid down in the case to which the hon. gentleman has referred, but it was exceedingly questionable whether that was very fully argued, and whether, if it was reconsidered, it would be followed. It is anomalous, to say the least. We know that by the last clause of Section 92 of the British North America Act everything of a local or private nature belongs to the Provinces, and those not of a private or local character belong to the Dominion. But I do not see very well, if the Provinces were to adopt the policy in regard to questions within their exclusive jurisdictions, how we could create corporations to exercise authority within that jurisdiction. At all events if it were done, it would be an extremely bad policy to adopt, and yet that is practically what we are doing here. If the rule is one that is tenable and can be maintained, the whole functions of the Local Legislature might be brought within the jurisdiction of this Parliament by creating corporations to exercise powers exclusively vested in the Local Legislatures.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Local Legislatures can always prevent that.

Mr. DENISON. These points brought up by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) have already been considered in the committee, and passed upon; and when we bear in mind the fact that a Bill on the same lines as this Bill has been passed by this House, I do not think this House will object to the present Bill.

Bill reported.

On motion for third reading,

Mr. DAVIES. I object, as I entertain some doubts with respect to this Bill, and I desire to look into some of its provisions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You must repeal the other Act if you do not pass this Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not see how this is any excuse for hasty legislation. There have been many cases in which acts of a very dubious character have passed through committee, and we would now be very glad if they had been more carefully considered.

SECOND READINGS.

Bill (No. 99) respecting the Ottawa and Gatineau Valley Railway Company.—(Mr. Wright.)

Bill (No. 109) respecting the Manitoba and North-Western Railway Company of Canada.—(Mr. Scarth.)

Bill (No. 106) to incorporate the Standard Printing and Publishing Company.—(Mr. McCarthy.)

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11:40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 31st May, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

NEW MEMBER INTRODUCED.

The following member having taken the oath, and subscribed the roll, took his seat:

GEORGE MOFFAT, Esq., member-elect for the county of Restigouche—introduced by Sir John A. Macdonald and Mr. Burns.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 117) respecting the Western Counties Railway Company. (Mr. Mills, Annapolis.)

Bill (No 118) respecting the Guelph Junction Railway Company. (Mr. Innes.)

Bill (No. 119) to confer certain powers upon the St. Johns and Iberville Hydraulic and Manufacturing Company. (Mr. Coursol.)

Bill (No. 120) respecting the New Brunswick Railway Company. (Mr. Skinner.)

RULES RESPECTING PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved:

That in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Committee on Railways, Canals and Telegraph Lines in their fifth report, a Special Committee be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the rules respecting Private Bills, in so far as they relate to the incorporation of and amendment of Acts incorporating railway companies; the said Committee to be composed of Messrs. Kirkpatrick, Weldon (St. John), Hall, Edgar, and the mover.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell.)

CANNED GOODS.

Mr. BOWELL, in the absence of Mr. COSTIGAN, moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 121) to amend the Act respecting canned goods. He said: This Bill simply provides that the word "soaked" shall be legibly printed in sufficiently large letters to be seen on packages of canned goods when sold. The present law provides that all packages of fruit and vegetables that are canned shall bear the word "soaked" upon them. It has been ascertained that this word has been placed upon packages in such small letters that it is not observed by the purchaser, thereby imposing upon him an inferior quality of goods, and this Bill simply provides that the word "soaked" shall be printed in letters of at least three-eighths of an inch in width and one half an inch in height.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CONVEYANCE OF LIQUORS ON BOARD HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS.

Mr. FOSTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 122) respecting the conveyance of liquors on board Her Majesty's ships in Canadian waters. He said: By an Act of the British Parliament, passed in 1853, for maintaining better discipline on board Her Majesty's ships, it was provided by section 12 that spirituous or fermented liquors were not to be carried aboard such ships without the master's consent. The substance of this Bill was communicated to the Canadian Government last year, as also to the Governments of the Colonies, with a request that similar legislation to section 12 of that Act should be embodied in the laws of the different colonies and the laws of Canada; and it is in accordance with that request that this Bill is introduced. It provides that every person who, without the previous consent of the chief officer, conveys spirituous or fermented liquors on board Her Majesty's ships, or who sells or gives such liquors to any person on board Her Majesty's ships, is guilty of a misdemeanor and is liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to a fine of $50 for each offence.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COUNTERFEIT AND IMITATION NOTES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 123) respecting the defacing of counterfeit notes and the use of imitations of notes. He said: The provision of the first section is that any person having the receipt or disbursement of public money, receiving a counterfeit note, shall have power to obliterate or deface it. The second section makes it penal to make or circulate any imitation of a bank note.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

QUEEN'S COUNTY, N.B., ELECTION.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Before the Orders of the Day are called, I rise to make a motion with respect to the Queen's County election return. Yesterday the returning officer in that election was examined at the Bar of this House. Although he stated that he had acted on the advice of counsel, I think it must be clear to every member of this House that he committed a gross violation of the law. While the law was clear and plain that he should return the man who had the majority of votes, he clearly did not do so; and he also did what—even if he had the right to exercise judicial powers, which I question—no judge in the land has the power to do, and that is, to reverse his own judgment. He accepted the nomination of the parties; he had given the receipt as required by law, as evidence of that fact; he had declared a poll, and appointed the deputy returning officers; he had distributed the ballots with the names of the different candidates upon them. That poll was held on the 22nd of February, and when he received the returns of the different deputy returning officers, after summing up the votes and discovering that Mr. King had a majority, he then, as I say, in violation of the law—in fraud of the law—returned the man who was the minority candidate. On this matter I do not intend to address the House at any length, because the subject has already been pretty well debated. But we are now in this position, that the time required by the Election law for the filing of a petition has gone by. I may say that Mr. King feels that he has been deeply aggrieved, and that after the strife and trouble of a contest, he should not be subjected to the expense and inconvenience of another contest in the courts of law, which it would be almost impossible for him to attend to. He feels that if this House is powerless to correct the wrong which has been done to the rights and liberties of the electors of Queen's, it is not incumbent upon him as an individual to spend his time and money in endeavoring to vindicate those rights and liberties which he believes it was the bounden duty of this House to do. We stand in this position, as appears from the examination of the returning officer yesterday, that the individual whom he returned, and who sits in this House representing the county of Queen's, was the minority candidate, and a person who was not by law entitled to be returned. I say that was a fraud perpetrated upon the people, and if, with all the advantages which our election system is supposed to possess, such a wrong and violation of the law is allowed to be perpetrated, and this House is powerless to afford a remedy, then we had better return to the old system altogether. That Mr. Dunn has violated the law is perfectly clear; that he was the nominee of Mr. Baird whom he has returned, is also clear; and I think, so far as Mr. Curroy is concerned, the counsel and election agent of Mr. Baird, we can show that to a certain extent he was in communication with Mr. Dunn. In his examination yesterday the returning officer stated that he had had no communication with that gentleman, that he had not obtained his law books, and that he had not stated so on declaration day. Now, I find, in the report of the proceedings held on declaration day, that, at the conclusion, after he had changed his mind—

Mr. FOSTER. What are you reading from?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I am reading from a report in the Daily Telegraph of the 7th of March of what took place in Queen's, by a reporter specially sent there. It says:

"After this there was an attempt to raise three cheers for the returning officer, at which honest men turned away, and then the fun began. Compliments flew around in an uncomplimentary manner, and John R. Dunn was the brunt of the attacking party. It grew so hot at last that he rose and said he had acted according to his conviction."

"Mr. T. N. WETMORE. Mr. Dunn told me only three days ago that he could not decide against Mr. King on the point in question in the nomination paper."

"Mr. KING. Mr. Dunn made a remark of a similar nature to me later than that."

"Mr. DUNN. I, like every other man, am subject to a change of opinion. I did tell Mr. Wetmore what he has said that I told him, but since that time, through the kindness of Mr. L. A. Curroy, I have been able to look at some of his law books and have been led to change my opinion. I have done what I think is right and I will stand by it."

"Mr. KING. I would ask you, gentlemen, not to argue this matter further now. It will be argued elsewhere."

"The crowd dispersed, and it was noticeable from the general tone of the conversation on the streets and in the hotel, that Mr. King had the warm sympathy of every honest Conservative and every Liberal present."

I read that, because I know that while an attempt was made to impugn the veracity of that statement, it was subsequently admitted by persons there present, who were friendly to Mr. Baird and Mr. Dunn, to be a correct statement of what took place on that occasion. Now, it appears also that an order was made by one of the judges of the Supreme Court which did not call on Mr. Dunn to show cause in any shape or form, but which was simply a rule nisi obtained to require the judge of the county court, Mr. Medley Wetmore and Mr. King, to show cause why a writ of prohibition should not issue, in the meantime all proceedings being stayed. In that writ Mr. Dunn was not mentioned at all, and while I am not here to argue whether that rule nisi should have been issued, or whether the Supreme Court had any jurisdiction at all, I do contend that Mr. Dunn sheltered himself behind it to refuse to comply with the explicit direction of the Election Act, to return the ballot papers to the judge of the county court for a recount, and at the same time to make a return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. He did make a return, but not the return required by law. He simply sent a certificate of the return of one of the candidates, stating that the other candidate was not duly nominated. Yesterday, I asked Mr. Dunn how he came to obey that rule nisi, whether it was not in consequence of a statement made by Mr. Curroy, as to what the judge told him at the trial. Now, I find in the Telegraph of the 12th of March a report of the proceedings before Judge Steadman, as follows:—

"It was then pointed out to the court by the counsel that the rule nisi was a matter between the Supreme Court and Judge Steadman, with which Mr. Dunn was not concerned or was his name even mentioned in it, and Judge Steadman was requested to intimate to Mr. Dunn his opinion that Judge Tuck has no jurisdiction in the matter. Judge Steadman then said that such was his opinion and clearly manifested by his being there ready to proceed."

"Mr. Dunn then said that when Mr. Curroy served him with the paper he told him that Judge Tuck had said to Curroy to say to him, Dunn, that that paper was equal to a command to produce this statement and ballots, and he, therefore, declined to produce them."

It is quite clear that the returning officer sheltered himself under that rule nisi for the purpose of evading the requirements of the law and the order of the judge of the county court, and of committing a gross violation of the law. Now, I say that every member of this House, no matter what party he belongs to, must feel that this was a clear violation of a provision of the law, which did not require the assistance of legal advisers to explain, but a clear and plain statement that any man could read and understand. I feel, Sir, strongly with regard to this election, as it took place in the Province in which my own constituency is situated; but I feel further that this is a matter of moment to every man who has a seat on the floor of this House. It is a matter of consequence to every man who has a right to exercise his franchise. It is the right of every elector that is now at stake, because, let us admit that the returning officer may thus violate the law, and the privileges and rights of the electors may be trampled on with impunity. If the law is so defective that this can go unpunished, and that a man who has not been elected to represent an electoral district can still sit in this House for years to come, I trust that the Minister of Justice and the Government will without delay bring in a Bill to remedy this state of affairs and prevent such an outrage—for I cannot characterise it by any other name—being perpetrated on the electors of any electoral district. It is not merely the present but the future we have to look to. I find in this matter, because Mr. King was a Liberal and Mr. Baird a Conservative, that it is made a party question, but I find, and I say it to the credit of the press, that a great portion of the press which support the Government have denounced this proceeding in as strong terms as the press on the Reform side. That shows what the public opinion of a country is. If that is the public opinion, as expressed by the press of both sides, I think it is the bounden duty of the House to give expression to public opinion, and teach returning officers and others connected with elections that the law must be obeyed. When a man has obtained his seat by improper means, although he had the majority of votes, the law is clear as to the course to be pursued to ascertain whether he has rightly obtained his seat or not. After a ballot has been demanded, and a poll granted, and the electors have cast their votes, the question as to whether the candidate who has the majority of votes has the right to the seat is not one for the returning officer to determine, but is left to the tribunal specially authorised to deal with it. The act of the returning officer in this case was an invasion of the rights of the people. To show the opinion of Parliament, I may refer to what passed in 1873, when this Parliament legislated on that subject. That legislation dealt with the only instance in which the returning officer has special authority given him to ignore the candidate who has the majority of votes, viz.: that where a man is a member of either branch of the Local Legislature, at the time he is nominated for the Commons and runs his election, and is disqualified by the law of the Province in which his election takes place, from sitting, on that account, in the Dominion Parliament, the returning officer shall ignore the vote given to him and return the other candidate. That is a special law, and the fact that it is a special law shows to my mind clearly that the views of Parliament were that, without that special power being given the returning officer in that special case, although the candidate was disqualified to be elected and nominated by virtue of an Act of the Local Legislature—without this express provision of our Parliament the returning officer would be bound to return him. I presume upon that principle the Prince Edward Island case may be defended, because the ground taken there was that Mr. Robertson had not ceased to be member of the Local Parliament of the Island and, therefore, was disqualified to be elected for this House. So far as that case is concerned, and it has been cited as an authority, it was founded upon that very Act. I am not going to discuss the question of deposit; all I will say is that even if the nomination had been improperly made, it having been acted upon by the returning officer, his judicial powers with regard to it had ceased, and the only tribunal to deal with the matter was the tribunal created by this Parliament. When Mr. King, who was so nominated, had the majority of votes, he should have been returned. Therefore, I consider this act of the returning officer, viewing it in the position in which it stands, viewing the facts we have before us, as one of the greatest encroachments upon the liberties and rights of the people. It is an encroachment, which, if allowed to go forward as a precedent, will imperil the election of every man who offers himself as a candidate, and, instead of being returned by the voice of the people, it will only be by the whim, or caprice, or the villany—if I may use an expression perhaps too strong—of the returning officer, because the returning officer, blindly shutting his eyes to the law, will seek to exercise jurisdiction where he has no right, and return the candidate with whom he is in sympathy, political or otherwise, or in whose favor he has been influenced through corrupt motives, and who is by no means the choice of the people. I beg, therefore, to move:

That the second report of the Select Committee on Privileges and Elections be not concurred in, but that it be resolved: That, in view of the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, chap. 8, and the duties of a returning officer as therein defined, and also in view of the facts elicited on the examination of Mr. John R. Dunn, the Returning Officer of the Electoral District of the County of Queen's, N. B., at the last election for the said district, and it appearing that nominations were received, a poll granted and held, and that at the summing up of the votes Geo. G. King had 1191 votes and Geo. F. Baird 1130 votes, it was the duty of the said John R. Dunn, at the said election, to have declared and returned Geo. G. King as the member elected for the said electoral district.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a very grave matter, and it would have been well, although not obligatory on the part of the hon. gentleman, to have given notice.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the duty of the Speaker is to notify the member whose seat is in jeopardy—

Mr. WELDON (St. John).

Mr. MACKENZIE. But Mr. King is not here.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Queen's, N. B., may offer any explanations he has to offer on this motion now; and if he has none, he will please withdraw from the House.

Mr. BAIRD. I would take this opportunity of explaining to the House—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I rise for the purpose of suggesting this. This is a very grave question which has been sprung upon the House without notice, and one has not had the opportunity of considering the phraseology even of the resolution now in your hands, and I should therefore desire that it should stand as a notice and be brought up to-morrow.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I have no objection to that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move the adjournment of the debate, and that it should stand on the paper.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). As the first Order to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a matter of privilege and can be brought up at any moment.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned, to stand as the first Order of the Day for to-morrow.

BANFF NATIONAL PARK BILL.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved that the House concur in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 16) respecting the Banff National Park. He said: The amendments are not of very great importance. The first amendment is a change in the name of the park. Under the Bill introduced here, it was called the Banff National Park. The Senate propose to call it the Rocky Mountains Park of Canada. The second amendment has relation to the power of making regulations for the preservation or protection of game and fish, and the amendment is to add after "fish," "and wild birds generally and." The third amendment has relation to the imprisonment proposed to be imposed for an infringement of the regulations. The Bill as it left this House, provided for imprisonment of three months. The amendment is that it shall not be more than three months. The fourth amendment has relation to the promulgation of the regulations. According to the Bill, every regulation was to be published for four consecutive weeks in the Canada Gazette, and the Senate has added: "and in any other manner provided by the Governor in Council." Then there are two new clauses inserted. The first is as follows:—

"Nothing in this Act contained shall affect the obligations of the Government, if any, arising out of the acquisition of the North-West Territories."

This has reference to a question which has been raised whether the Hudson Bay Company have any right in that section at all or not. It being an open question, their rights, if they have any, are simply preserved by this section. The other clause is this:

"This Act may be cited as the Rocky Mountains Park Act of 1887."

The title when the Bill left this House was: "An Act respecting the Banff National Park." It is now a Bill: "respecting the Rocky Mountains Park of Canada."

Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

SENATORIAL REPRESENTATION FOR THE N. W. T.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House concur in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 17) respecting the representation of the North-West Terri-atories in the Senate of Canada. He said: The Senate have added certain provisions. One is this:

"No person shall be appointed a Senator under this Act unless he possesses the qualification provided for by section 23 of the British North America Act of 1867; and for the purposes of this Act, the word 'Province,' wherever it is used, shall be considered to mean the North-West Territories."

This subject was introduced by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) here. The Senate consider that the question of residence is not sufficiently specified. On looking at the British North America Act, I find it declares that a Senator shall be resident in the Province he represents, and this is, in fact, to provide that the term 'Province' shall include the North-West Territories, so far as a Senator coming from that part of Canada is concerned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I did not hear exactly what the hon. gentleman said. Was there not something about the qualification beyond the question of residence?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The proposed amendment is:

"No person shall be appointed a Senator under this Act unless he possesses the qualification provided for by section 23 of the British North America Act of 1867; and for the purposes of this Act, the word 'Province,' wherever it is used, shall be considered to mean the North-West Territories."

We may not have the power in any way, but there is no harm in stating it in the Act. I went a considerable way in the direction of the argument of the hon. gentleman opposite.

Motion agreed to, and amendments concurred in.

PENITENTIARY ACT AMENDMENTS.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 65) to amend the Penitentiary Act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman explain what he desires to do?

Mr. THOMPSON. Perhaps the hon. member was not in his place when I moved the resolutions on which the Bill is founded. The object of the Bill is, in the first place, to make a definite provision for the salaries of the officers composing the staff of the different penitentiaries. It is found that that provision is, to some extent, made in the existing Act, but that Act simply fixes the maximum of the officers' salary. It is proposed in this Bill that all the officers—as hon. members will see on referring to the schedule—shall begin at a fixed minimum, and proceed, the superior officers by increases of $50 a year, and the inferior officers by increases of $30 a year, until they attain the maximum. This will avoid the inconvenience of depending on uncertain circumstances as they occur from time to time. Then another branch of the Bill is intended to make provision for the regulation of perquisites. As I explained to the House in moving the resolutions, the practice has grown up of allowing the principal officers certain perquisites, such as fuel, light, the keeping of a horse or a cow, and a certain amount of convict labor. It is intended still to continue the practice of allowing to all the officers, in so far as it is possible, a house on the penitentiary property, because there is a great advantage to the institution in having the officers close at hand. But it is proposed to abolish all other perquisites, except what are mentioned in section 8, which is, that the house, and grounds and gardens immediately attached to the house, may be kept in order by convict labor. All other perquisites, such as the keeping of a horse and carriage, fuel, and light, are to be abolished. Then there are regulations as to retiring allowances and gratuities. There is no increase in the gratuities which it is proposed to allow, except that the Governor in Council is permitted a discretion to increase the gratuities of an official who has been injured in the service of the institution.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman, I see, provides here, by section 5, a retiring allowance to be paid to any party dependent upon the employé, equal to the salary which the employé receives. Is not that a pretty wide departure from the rule recognised generally in the Civil Service?

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. member refers, I think, to section 6 instead of section 5. But the gratuity is not in any case to exceed the amount of salary for two months next preceding the date of retirement, or three months next preceding that date.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 4,

Mr. MULOCK. I would call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this provision for a gratuity on the basis of the officer's salary. I would ask him whether that gratuity is to be calculated on the salary which he receives at the commencement of the term, the middle of the term, or at what period? The Bill says that he is to receive a gratuity of half a month's salary for the first five years, and of a month's salary for each of the other years of service. Of course his salary is a changing quantity. It is material to provide whether it is to be on the basis of his highest salary, namely, at the time of his retirement, or at some other period.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gratuity is now paid on the salary which he receives at the time he leaves the office. This Bill provides that the gratuity or retiring allowance may be calculated at the rate of half a month's salary for each year of his service up to five years, and a month's salary for each year of service in excess of five years. The salary, it is true, will be changing from time to time, but after the five years the gratuity will be calculated on the increased salary.

Mr. MULOCK. It is open to argument on the text of the Bill on what the gratuity should be calculated. If it is intended that he is to be paid this gratuity, calculated on the highest salary received at the time of his retirement, it ought to be made clear to him.

Mr. THOMPSON. We have no objection to make it so. But the hon. member will see by the schedule that before the five years shall have elapsed he will have obtained his maximum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of introducing the words: "or retiring allowance." If I understand the object aright it is simply to give a gratuity of so many months' salary. I do not see any object in introducing the words "or retiring allowance," because it is not intended to confer any pension.

Mr. THOMPSON. Gratuity and retiring allowance are used as convertible terms, and in the Orders in Council both terms are used.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I desire to enquire whether the phraseology of sub-section 2, with respect to increases of salary in the Department of the Minister of Justice, is the same as that respecting salaries in the other Departments; and, also, whether any more power is granted to the Minister of Justice with respect to increases of salary than is given to any other Minister?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Bill does not confer on the Minister of Justice any larger powers than are possessed by the head of any other Department; but I am not able to say that the words in the Civil Service Act are precisely the same, although the effect is the same.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who are entitled, under the present rules, to receive a superannuation allowance?

Mr. THOMPSON. Only those officers appointed by Order in Council.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How low does that go?

Mr. THOMPSON. The officers included are the warden, deputy warden, surgeon and accountant. The chaplains are mentioned as being appointed by Order in Council, but they are not on the superannuation list.

Mr. DAVIES. Is there any change in the salaries?

Mr. THOMPSON. The minimum is less than at present, the maximum is in some cases greater.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. CHAPLEAU moved second reading Bill (No. 54) to amend "The Chinese Immigration Act."

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CHAPLEAU. As I have already said in introducing the Bill, this measure is practically a repetition of the Bill which passed the House last year on the same subject, with the exception of the first clause, which says that no duties shall be payable under this Act in respect of any woman of Chinese origin who is the wife of a person who is not of Chinese origin, and who, for the purposes of this Act, shall be of the same nationality as her husband. Another clause provides for the passing of Chinese in transitu by railway through the country. The next section provides for the procuring a passport or certificate of leave for Chinese residents of British Columbia, who desire to visit their native country, with the intention of returning within three months. It is also provided that the person who presents a fraudulent certificate shall be liable to a penalty, and that one-fourth of the duties and penalties under the Act shall be paid, after all costs, to the Provincial Government of British Columbia.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman proposes that the Chinese wife of a British subject shall not be treated as a Chinese woman, but under his policy, when a Chinaman is married to a woman who is not of Chinese origin they are both treated as being of Chinese origin. The hon. gentleman has made enquiry into these matters, and he knows what statements are made with regard to the morals of the Chinese, and it would seem to me that this was almost legislating in such a way as rather to militate against the morals of those people.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I refer the hon. gentleman to the report of the Chinese Commission for any information on that subject, but I may say that experience has shown that Englishmen coming from China who are married to Chinese women, were obliged by the Customs officer to pay the duty for their wives and children. It really strikes anyone that the wife of a man who is a Christian and a British subject should not be subjected to that duty, for, according to a law which is higher than ours, being married they are both one, and they should be treated as one.

Mr. DAVIES. As I understood the scope of the question raised by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), it was whether it was not desirable, in the interests of morality, that married Chinese women should be admitted free of this duty.

Mr. THOMPSON.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. As I understand the remarks of my hon. friend, he thinks it would probably encourage the immigration of married people among the Chinese if this restriction were removed. Well, Mr. Chairman, I fear that in that case there would be considerable difficulty. As has already been stated, there was a political difficulty felt in allowing Chinese immigration into America, without certain checks and restrictions, and in the United States that has been recognised to an extent to which we do not feel disposed to go in this country, but I do not think it would be wise at the present moment to prevent Chinese married women from paying a duty in the same way as their husbands do, and thus encourage, instead of preventing, Chinese immigration.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is precisely the point which I would bring under the hon. gentleman's attention, because the hon. gentleman's regulations at present practically prohibit married men from coming into the country, because this prevents them from bringing in their wives. I think there are social grounds upon which that policy ought not to be persisted in. If the hon. gentleman is disposed to exclude Chinese immigration altogether, that is, of course, a perfectly intelligible policy. If he proposes to restrict the immigration by imposing a tax on every male coming from China, that is an intelligible policy; but when he proposes to impose a tax indiscriminately on every Chinese man, woman and child that comes into the country, he proposes a policy which, I think, is not in the interest of public morality.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. There is this inconvenience: when a Christian or a British subject marries a Chinese woman, proof of the marriage can be made which is satisfactory to the authorities. But we know that by the customs prevailing in China not one wife merely is allowed, but several; there the concubine is called the second wife; and when the Pacific coast Province is complaining that Chinese immigration is already too great, and that the majority of the female immigrants are such as should not be encouraged, it is easy to see what abuses and difficulties would result if they were allowed to come free into British Columbia on the pretence of being married.

Mr. DAVIES. That seems to be a fair ground of argument, and perhaps the hon. gentleman is right; but to one who has not had the same opportunity of studying the question that he has had, the very opposite result would appear to follow from his policy. The people protest against the introduction of the Chinese because a class of women who are not desirable come; but the question my hon. friend raises is whether, if you adopt the more generous policy and allow the better class of Chinamen to come with their wives, the objections now naturally felt against Chinese immigration would be materially lessened. I think the subject is worthy of consideration.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The whole policy of this measure is to restrict the immigration of Chinese into British Columbia and into Canada. On the whole, it is considered not advantageous to the country that the Chinese should come and settle in Canada, producing a mongrel race, and interfering very much with white labor in Canada. That may be right, or it may be wrong; it may be a prejudice or otherwise; but the prejudice is universal. Whether it be in the United States, in Australia or in Canada, white labor and Chinese labor will never work harmoniously together, and we shall have the same scenes in Canada, if that immigration is permitted, that we have seen so lamentably exhibited in the United States. The policy of the Act which now exists is to restrict Chinese labor, and therefore any step which is contrary to the principle of the measure which received the sanction of Parliament, I believe, would not be satisfactory to those portions of Canada where Chinese labor has been introduced to any extent. I think my hon. friend the Secretary of State has hit exactly on the objection to the admission of the wives of Chinese immigrants. If that were allowed not a single immigrant would come over without a wife, and the immorality existing to a very great extent along the Pacific coast would be greatly aggravated in Canada. Under the system of Chinese labor as it now exists, the Chinese come over and make a little money and then go back. That is the least objectionable form of Chinese labor; but I do not think it would be to the advantage of Canada or any other country occupied by Aryans for members of the Mongolian race to become permanent inhabitants of the country. I believe it would introduce a conflict between the working classes which would only result in evil. If there could be no other labor obtained than Chinese labor, perhaps the argument of necessity or great expediency might prevail; but now there is not much difficulty in getting white labor in any part of Canada. Under these circumstances, to encourage Chinese labor would be merely to prevent white labor settling in those portions of the Dominion where Chinese labor was settled to any extent. As regards the clause for which this Bill was principally introduced, to allow a Chinese woman married to a British subject, and taking the nationality of her husband, to enter free, that is obviously right. The law worked so absurdly in the case of Mr. Moore, an English gentleman of standing, who married a Chinese lady 20 years ago, that when they arrived at Victoria he was obliged to pay $50 for his wife and $50 for each of his children. Of course, in the case of his children, the money was refunded the moment the matter was represented here, on the ground that the children were British subjects, taking the rank and nationality of the father; and there is no doubt they were not Chinese in the meaning of the Act. But there was no means of remitting the fine on the wife, who was a Chinese woman in every respect; in the opinion of the Minister of Justice, there was no remedy but to collect the fine. I think it would be a great relaxation—a reversal, in fact, of the policy which was approved of by Parliament for the restriction of Chinese labor, to adopt the suggestion of hon. gentlemen opposite, to remove the restriction as respects the wives of Chinese men.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not intend to allow the hon. gentleman to misrepresent my position.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have no desire to misrepresent it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Nevertheless, the hon. gentleman's whole line of argument has been in that direction. I said nothing about relaxation of the regulation proposed, or of the policy on which the Government has entered. I said nothing about the desirability of having Chinese in this country in competition with the labor of the ordinary white settler. If there is any ground of complaint on that score the hon. gentleman himself is answerable for it, for I believe the hon. gentleman refused to allow Chinese labor to be excluded from British Columbia, or to confine those engaged on public works, especially in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, to the employment of white labor. The hon. gentleman has not proposed to exclude the Chinese. He has not proposed to put such a capitation tax on them that would completely exclude them from the country. He permits them to come here under certain restrictions. I do not think that this restriction, except in so far as it acts as a prohibition, is of any advantage to the laboring classes. I apprehend, so far as British Columbia is concerned, that the competition of the white and the Chinese labor there is just as active as it was before the hon. gentleman imposed his restrictions, because there are several thousands of these people within the limits of that Province. If you permit the Chinese to come here at all, you had better permit them to come in as settlers. What does the hon. gentleman say, and what do all those who object to Chinese immigration, say? They say that the Chinese come to this country, enter into competition with our laborers, spend nothing in the country, acquire no real property, and, as soon as they earn enough money, leave the country. That is the chief reason given for excluding them. It is in the moral interest of the Chinese, and of the community in which there are Chinese settlers, that we should allow Chinese women to come in, that we should allow them to bring in their wives, and that we should not impose a tax on the wife as we do on the husband. By imposing such a tax we legislate against the morals of the community. The hon. gentleman may say no, but it is the fact. It would be better to double the capitation tax on the men than to persist in the policy laid down in the Bill. If the hon. gentleman thinks there are too many Chinese in the country, let him double the capitation tax. I do not object to such a tax as will serve to exclude the Chinese, but I say let the tax be upon the Chinaman and let the Chinaman's wife come in free. You will thus as effectually carry out the policy of excluding the Chinese as at present, and, at the same time, you will protect the morals of the community in which Chinese come as settlers.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman complains, and I think without reason, that he has been misrepresented. He should remember that, as a question of principle, it is understood Chinese immigration should be restricted; it is upon that principle that all those who represent the country, especially those who represent British Columbia, object to having Chinese in Canada. That is the principle which has induced us to impose restrictions on Chinese immigration amounting nearly to prohibition. If you encourage the increase of Chinese population in this country you go against that principle, and the proposition of the hon. gentleman would have that effect. As a matter of fact, I can tell hon. gentlemen that if we were to allow Chinese wives, as he calls them, to come in, instead of morality we would have greater immorality. This is known by all those who have studied the question. It has had that effect, as has been, unfortunately, too well proved, in the United States. Take away that restriction, and the worst population in China would be brought to our shores. It is bad enough for the people to have the Chinese here at all, but the commercial interest of Canada and England require that there should not be actual prohibition. The necessities of the times demand, also, that there should be Chinese labor in a new country, but it would be not only imprudent but most unfortunate if the barrier was opened to the extent the hon. gentleman proposes.

Bill reported, and read the third time, and passed.

SICK AND DISTRESSED MARINERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved second reading of Bill (No. 76) to amend the Act respecting sick and distressed mariners.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. FOSTER. The object of this Bill is to remedy a defect in the Revised Statutes. By Act 45 Vic., chap. 19, all fishing vessels were exempted from paying sick mariners dues. By Act 47 Vic., that exemption was taken away as far as Canadian registered fishing vessels were concerned. Act 45 was repealed when the revision was concluded, and that leaves the law at present in this position, that foreign fishing vessels coming into Canadian ports are subject to the duty, so that the law is altered from what it stood before. This Bill is to replace the law in its former position, so that foreign fishing vessels will not be liable for the dues and will not participate in the benefits.

Mr. JONES. I suppose British fishing vessels do not contribute in the United States.

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Bill reported, and read third time and passed.

PROCEDURE IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 19) to amend the law respecting procedure in criminal cases.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. DAVIES. What change does this make in the existing law?

Mr. THOMPSON. The object of the Bill is to make it clear that there shall not be an appeal in criminal matters to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. When I introduced the Bill, I mentioned some of the circumstances which led to its introduction. I think there is very good reason to believe that, under the Statute as it now exists, there is no appeal to the Judicial Committee in such matters, but there has been no determination of the committee that such an appeal does not lie. I need hardly remind the House that very great inconvenience in the administration of the criminal law in a country like Canada would result from an appeal being held to lie to a tribunal so distant as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The result of such an appeal would be that a long delay would be made necessary. There have been one or two decisions of the Judicial Committee under statutes somewhat like that in force in Canada now, and in one of those cases the opinion was expressed that the statute was itself sufficient to prevent further appeal to Her Majesty in Council, notwithstanding that there was no express mention of the prerogative in the statute, but simply an enactment that the decision of the Court of Appeal for the colony was final. In the case of Cuvilier vs. Aylwin, 2 Knapp's P. C. Cases, page 72, it was decided—

Mr. MILLS. That case has been overruled by the Judicial Committee since.

Mr. THOMPSON. Not exactly overruled, but it was stated, in a subsequent case, that it had not been fully considered. The only doubt that arises under the comments which were made on that case is, whether the statute we now have is sufficient to cover the appeal or not. On a recent case, when an appeal was taken to the Judicial Committee, the counsel on the part of the Crown were instructed to raise this point, but the appeal was dismissed on its merits without that question being decided. There are, however, several cases in which members of the Judicial Committee have expressed themselves very strongly against such appeals being considered, in consequence of the inconvenience which would result to the administration of criminal law. In the case of the Falkland Islands Company vs. the Queen, Moore's P. C. Reports, Vol. I, page 312, Lord Kingsdown said:

"It may be assumed that the Queen has authority, by virtue of Her prerogative, to review the decisions of all colonial courts, whether the proceedings be of a civil or criminal character, unless Her Majesty has parted with such authority. But the inconvenience of entertaining such appeals in cases of a strictly criminal character is so great, the obstruction which it would offer to the administration of justice in the colonies is so obvious, that it is very rarely that applications to this Board, similar to the present, have been attended with success."

That, of course, was in a case where it was clear that an appeal would lie, but the Judicial Committee was reluctant to entertain it, because of the inconvenience which would arise from the intervention of the committee. In a later case,

Mr. FOSTER.

Regina vs. Bertrand, Law Reports, P. C. cases, Vol. I, page 530, Chief Justice Coleridge said:

"In all cases, criminal as well as civil, arising in places from which an appeal would lie, and where, either by the terms of a charter or statute, the authority has not been parted with, it is the inherent prerogative right, and, on all proper occasions, the duty of the Queen in Council, to exercise an appellate jurisdiction, with a view not only to ensure, so far as may be, the due administration of justice in the individual case, but also to preserve the due course of procedure generally. The interest of the Crown, duly considered, is at least as great in criminal as in civil cases; but the exercise of this prerogative is to be regulated by a consideration of circumstances and consequences; and interference by Her Majesty in Council in criminal cases is likely in so many instances to lead to mischief and inconvenience, that in them the Crown will be very slow to entertain an appeal by its officers on behalf of itself, or by individuals. The instances of such appeals being entertained are, therefore, very rare."

We have always contended for the principle that an appeal does not lie from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, but there has been no determination of the matter by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and I think it should be settled.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The First Minister has evidently made a great deal of progress since the Supreme Court Act was under consideration in this House. The hon. gentleman then, though the Act did not propose to interfere with the Royal prerogative, nevertheless seemed to think that we were going a very long way in taking away the right of appeal granted by our own legislation. I can see very great reason for refusing to grant the right of appeal in criminal cases to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and I conceive that, in the great majority of cases, if it were proposed to apply to the Judicial Committee for leave to appeal, great inconvenience would arise in the administration of criminal justice. That, however, has been so rarely applied for, the right to make that appeal has been so rarely sought, that no serious direct inconvenience has arisen in this country on account of the prerogative right of appeal. The question is rather one for the Imperial Government than for the Government of Canada to consider, how far they would comply with the hon. gentleman's proposal that the prerogative right to grant an appeal which Her Majesty exercises through the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council shall be abolished. Now, let me take a case of this sort. Supposing someone in this country was tried for a criminal offence which rendered him liable to death, but which was connected with the relations between the United Kingdom and the United States. The Government which would be responsible for the maintenance of peace between the United Kingdom and the United States, might have very serious objection to permit this country to legislate in such a way as to make it impossible for the Imperial Government to protect its own interests by interposing its sovereign authority. Now, if the hon. gentleman succeeds in carrying this Bill through this House—and I admit that it is a very wide departure from the views expressed by the First Minister a few years ago—he may find himself brought, in this particular, face to face with the Imperial Government. They may say that a party might be convicted in Canada of treason, that the act might be one of which the American Government would assume the responsibility, as the British Government did in the case of McLeod, and that it would be in the interest of the sovereign authority of the United Kingdom, that the Imperial Government should have power to intervene and to prevent the law from being carried into execution. Political feeling, or the state of the public mind in this country, might be such as to make it impossible for the Government to interpose by the exercise of the prerogative of pardon, it might be such as that the effect would be that the law would be carried into execution and serious difficulties might arise between our own country and the neighboring Republic. I mention this just to point out cases when the maintenance of the royal prerogative might be a substantial advantage. We have had so very few appeals from the decisions of our courts in criminal matters, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, that it can scarcely be said to be a practical question, or one of such a character as to necessitate the interposition of Parliament.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I agree with the hon. member for Bothwell that such cases may be very rare. But according to this section, if the court in the first instance is unanimous, there is no appeal at all provided for, therefore the party accused would be entirely without remedy, although there is a royal prerogative. The effect of the section will be to take away entirely the right of appeal. In the case to which the Minister of Justice alluded, the court was unanimous; but we find cases where the prerogative had been exercised, and where the decision of the court was reversed, even where there was no appeal. The case of the Queen against Bertrand, in New South Wales, a very important point was raised on which the decision of the Privy Council was entirely adverse to the decision of the Supreme Court of that colony.

Mr. SKINNER. This section says that it shall apply to Courts of Oyer and Terminer or Gaol Delivery. So far as that wording is concerned, it would be applicable to the Province of New Brunswick. Now, the County Courts in New Brunswick are not, in the common law definition of the term, either Courts of Oyer and Terminer, or of Gaol Delivery, therefore they would not be comprehended within that section. I think it would be better to introduce two or three words to cover the County Courts of New Brunswick. I cannot speak with the same information with reference to the other Maritime Provinces, but I can say that, in so far as I understand this section, it would not cover the County Courts of New Brunswick; and a very large proportion of the criminal business in New Brunswick is tried in the County Courts of that Province.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I think the County Courts have concurrent jurisdiction in criminal matters. A large portion of the criminal business is exercised by the County Courts. The judge there has the same power as the judge of the Court of Oyer and Terminer. To meet the suggestion of my hon. colleague, I would propose to introduce the words "or before any other court of criminal jurisdiction."

Mr. THOMPSON. In order to meet the suggestion in regard to the County Court of New Brunswick, I propose to amend this section by making the words in the first line read thus: "Any person who has been convicted of an indictable offence, or whose conviction has been affirmed before any Court of Oyer and Terminer." It applies now to any person who has been convicted, or whose conviction has been affirmed.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The judge has now the power of reserving a case. Under the criminal law it is entirely in the option of the judge who tries a party, whether there is a case reserved or not. If he declines to reserve the case the party has no appeal, or practically none. It is, therefore, within the power of the judge who tries the case to exercise a power that is not correlative to any other power which he holds. I may instance a case which occurred in New Brunswick. A case was tried before the judge of the County Court and objection was taken to the verdict. The case was argued before him, and he refused to reserve it. Eventually it was brought before the Supreme Court by writ of habeas corpus, and the Supreme Court decided that the County Court judge was wrong. A very grave question was raised as to whether the Supreme Court could do that in that way; but the effect was that if there had not been that means of acting the party might have been without resort. Some modification should be made, because power is given to a single judge who hears the case whether he will reserve the case or not. If we do away with the royal prerogative when the court below is unanimous, that would practically take away the right of appeal. Although there are five judges, two may form a court, and the mere fact that the judges below are unanimous does not necessarily imply that the full bench is unanimous. No doubt the Minister of Justice has often succeeded in reversing unanimous judgments in civil matters before the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not see why the same rule should not apply to criminal cases. Since the opening of the court there have been very few criminal cases appealed, but it is in the interest of justice that an appeal should be given, more particularly as the royal prerogative is proposed to be taken away by this Bill.

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards a general amendment in the direction indicated, I hardly like to deal with that matter in a Bill of this kind, although I think the suggestions of the hon. member are worthy of attention. I think the true way to consider this Bill is not with relation to appeals given from the various tribunals of first instance in the Provinces, but rather with a view to the proper conduct of criminal justice, so that there shall be no appeal out of the country to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If the law is not sufficiently liberal at present, it can easily be made so, either by amending the Criminal Procedure Act or by the intervention of local statutes under which the courts are organised. It is quite true that the judges of first instance have the discretion to prevent an appeal by refusing to state a case. I was not aware that in any Province two judges could form a quorum of the court for cases reserved. It is not so, I think, in any other Province except the one mentioned by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon).

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There is nothing in the constitution of our Supreme Court that requires the majority of the judges to be present. Two judges can form a court as well as six.

Mr. THOMPSON. I may mention a case which occurred a year ago in the Province of British Columbia. Ample time had been given for a full examination of the case by the Supreme Court of the Province, and after a further stay had been given in order that every opportunity might be afforded, an appeal was asserted to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If that appeal had been followed and allowed, we should not have got rid of it for something like a year or two. In the meantime the criminal law of the country would have been entirely paralysed in that particular case, and the execution of the law eventually, after the lapse of so long a time, would appear cruel, as public attention would have become disassociated from the crime itself.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). There is a marked contrast between the law here and in the neighboring Republic, for across the border there are too many appeals. I quite agree with the Minister of Justice that the appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council might be done away with, but when we undertake to take away the royal prerogative the hon. gentleman should not leave it entirely to the tribunal of the first instance. As the law stands now, and the hon. gentleman is changing the law, it provides that there is no appeal to the Supreme Court where the court below is unanimous. But there is always the right of petition to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The hon. gentleman proposes to take that away. I would suggest the striking out of the provisions depriving the right of appeal where the court below is unanimous.

Mr. THOMPSON. I cannot do more than promise to carefully consider the hon. gentleman's suggestions. I think we are doing no more than simply declaring what has always been considered to be the law, that the decision of the courts in Canada should be final, and removing doubts in that regard.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

OXFORD JUNCTION AND NEW GLASGOW BRANCH INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY.

Mr. POPE moved second reading of Bill (No. 77) respecting the Oxford Junction and New Glasgow Branch of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. JONES. When this subject was under discussion on a previous occasion, the hon. the Minister of Finance made an explanation with reference to the position the Government had assumed in this matter. He stated on 6th May the course which the Government intended to pursue and the position which the company occupied in the matter. Referring to the company who had undertaken the construction of this road, the hon. gentleman said:

"This company proposed to carry on a grand scheme of communication, intersecting Newfoundland. They had already made a contract for a line across that island, and this was a portion of the scheme for which they were prepared to make a contract. They did make a contract, and I must say, in justice to the company, that the mode in which they expended some $20,000 or $300,000 of their own money, shows that they did it in good faith, and that they intended to complete the line. The contract enabled them to draw a subsidy of $3,200 per mile, on the completion of every ten miles, but they have never drawn a dollar on that subsidy, for, instead of building it in such a way as to be able to avail themselves of the subsidy, they expended between $200,000 and $300,000 of their own money—they say the larger sum—in such a way as not to entitle them to a dollar of the subsidy. They failed in carrying out that great enterprise in which they were engaged, they were unable to obtain the means of carrying it forward, and they stopped work, leaving some $150,000 due to the sub-contractors, which they owed to the men who furnished the labor, the food and the materials which had gone into the line. Under these circumstances, the Government of Canada, feeling that this work must be completed at some time, as the Minister of Railways has said, that it was too important not to be carried out, if it could not be carried out by the company—and they were a long time in making the arrangements in France and England, endeavoring to negotiate the bonds, and professing that they would be able at an early date to carry to completion—my hon. friend the Minister of Railways felt that it was right, as no portion of the subsidy had been drawn, to ask the House to allow him to appropriate $150,000 of the subsidy for the company to enable them to go on and pay the contractors and carry on the work to completion."

The hon. gentleman gave that as an explanation of the course adopted by the Government in paying the sub-contractors. But there are words used in this Bill which do not appear to be quite in accordance with the statement made by the hon. Minister of Finance. The Bill says:

"And whereas the company with whom an agreement was entered into, as aforesaid, for the construction of the said line of railway having represented that they had expended a considerable sum of money in prosecuting the said work prior to failure in carrying out the agreement, it is desirable that they should be reimbursed such sum, if any, as they shall establish in court that they are entitled to for work done, or such sum as may be awarded by arbitrators and approved by the Governor in Council, subject to the deduction hereinafter mentioned."

Now, that is an entire departure, as I read it, from the grounds taken by the hon. Minister of Finance in his explanations to the House on the occasion referred to. The hon. gentleman then stated that the Government had taken part of the subsidy to pay the contractors for the work done on the road, a very proper appropriation of that money, no doubt; but he did not say that in making this a Government work, they intended to ask Parliament for power to refund to the defunct company all the money they had expended in carrying out the contract. I do not wish to be understood as opposing the appropriation for this work. As I stated on a previous occasion, I am very glad the Government have decided to make that branch a portion of the Intercolonial Railway, and have no doubt that in time it will be as remunerative a portion of the Intercolonial Railway as any other. But the hon. gentleman in the Bill now asks this House for authority to pay the representatives of that company whatever money they may have expended on the road. That is a point which I wish to bring to the notice of the House. If the Government propose to allow the company, who entered into an arrangement with them, and who failed to carry out their contract in good faith, to establish such a claim on the Government, it is entirely at variance—and I say it with all due respect—with the principles on which all business or public undertakings are carried on. When a company undertake a contract with the Government or with a private individual, and are not able to carry it out, the other party should not be called upon to compensate them for any losses they have incurred through an error of judgment or through not understanding their business. If these people had not sufficient knowledge to carry on the work or sufficient financial standing to negotiate their bonds or to procure money for the completion of the work, I do not think this House should step in and relieve them from a responsibility which they voluntarily assumed. It is not in any sense to threaten the passage of this Bill, but with the view of protecting the interests of this country against a foreign company that I have ventured to bring this matter to the notice of the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, I think, lost sight of the fact that certain expenditures having been made under a charter which was granted by Parliament, in order to acquire a right to take possession of this work and make it a public work—which I am glad the hon. gentleman entirely approves of—it is necessary to provide that there shall be no infringement on any private rights that exist. It is not admitted here that anything is due to the company. The hon. gentleman will find that the Bill provides that such sums, if any, as may be found by the House, or may be decided by arbitration, shall be paid to the company. Unless the company are able to point to a bond fide claim they cannot receive anything under this Act; but, if by a petition of right they are able to establish in the courts a just claim to any sum, larger or smaller, of course it is necessary to provide that there shall be means of meeting their claim. But the Bill does not admit anything.

Mr. DAVIES. If this Bill passes there can be no possible doubt that the company will be entitled to receive the payment of their claim. The preamble of the Bill expressly recites: that this company having represented that they have expended a considerable sum of money in prosecuting the said work prior to failure in carrying out the agreement, it is desirable that they should be reimbursed such sums.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Such sums, if any, as they shall establish in court that they are entitled to.

Mr. DAVIES. No one presumes that you are going to pay them more than what they are entitled to. But this point is beyond doubt, that no matter what they have expended, whether it is $20,000 or $120,000, you are bound to pay them. The principle that they are to be paid for the work done is adopted beyond peradventure by the Bill, and the amount that they are to be paid is afterwards to be assessed by arbitrators. What I understood the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) to say, was that the adoption of this principle to pay them money for a contract which they had failed to carry out was a principle at variance with the views the hon. Minister of Finance had laid down in his speech; and I think it is well for Parliament to understand that when they adopt the preamble of this Bill, they bind themselves to pay this company what they have expended. Whether this $100,000, or $200,000, or $500,000—it does not matter what it is.

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. DAVIES. It is perfectly plain it cannot be otherwise, because the preamble of the Bill recites, it is desirable to reimburse them whatever moneys they may have expended, and the enacting part of the Bill says, it shall be lawful for the Minister to pay any amount that may be assessed by the arbitrators or the courts in the case of a petition of right. In case the Minister expropriated any private property, they would have the right to have arbitrators assess the value of the property, and experience has shown they would be paid every dollar it cost them, with 50 per cent. additional besides expenses. That has been pretty generally the case.

Mr. POPE. Pretty generally.

Mr. DAVIES. Whether it is right or not is another question; but we ought to understand clearly what we are doing, and we certainly are doing that.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman is entirely wrong. They might have expended $20,000 or $100,000, and their property be of no use to anybody. Would any court say we should pay for that which is of no use to us.

Mr. JONES. Why have you that clause then?

Mr. POPE. We have not it there. All that any court or arbitration could do would be to say that the value was so much to us. It could not say because men expended $500,000, we would have to pay it back to them.

Mr. DAVIES. I submit, with reference to the hon. gentleman, that while that may be his intention, he has not expressed it in the Bill. The preamble expressly recites that it has been represented they have spent a considerable sum in prosecuting the work, and it is desirable they should be reimbursed such sum. The property may be worth the money or not, but what he has expressed in his preamble is the desire that they should be reimbursed whatever money they have expended in carrying on the work. I think the hon. the Minister will find that it will be necessary, if his intention is simply to pay them what value the works are to the Government, that that should be declared in explicit terms. I have no doubt that if he were sitting as an arbitrator, under this Bill, he would feel himself bound to award a sum, not representing the value of the work to the Government, but representing the amount paid by this company in building the road.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). The Bill, on its face, is not so clear to the hon. gentlemen opposite as it is to hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches, but it would be clear to them if they understood some of the facts relating to the position of the company. The hon. gentlemen who criticised a clause of the Bill, approached the subject with the impression that the Government is dealing too generously or desires to deal too generously with the company, and that the company will be, under this clause, enabled to obtain an amount of money that Parliament should not give them in this fashion. I may say that the case of the company is at present in litigation, and the courts, up to this day, have virtually decided that the company are entitled to not a single dollar, notwithstanding the fact, as stated by the Minister of Finance in a recent speech, to which allusion has been made, that the company did expend several hundred thousand dollars in the construction of part of this scheme. I may explain that a Session or two ago this House voted $150,000 to relieve a certain class of creditors of the company, such as laborers, &c., and the Government was authorized to acquire their rights. Now the rights of these creditors were finally protected by mortgage granted by the company, which mortgage was made legal and binding by the Legislature of Nova Scotia; and the Government, in paying these claims, have virtually become possessed of the company's rights in the whole road, and obtained the benefit of their large expenditure for this sum of $150,000 or thereabouts. Now the company claims a much larger sum.

Mr. JONES. Of course.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). They have attacked the mortgage, and the title of the Government is in litigation. The case has been twice argued before the Supreme Court in Nova Scotia, and on both occasions the company were unable to make good their position; so that the position of the Government as virtual owners, under assignment of this mortgage, is at present strong. It would not be right, I take it, that Parliament, when passing title to the Government, should legislate in such a way as to prevent the company having any redress against the Government, in case they had rights which were being interfered with by this Act of Parliament without compensation. This Bill is drawn so as to meet the litigation now in the courts. They are attempting at present to establish a claim, and to enable the Government, if the company establish a claim, which the Government deny they have the right to establish, to protect itself. In the event of the case going against the Crown, the Government would have to come to Parliament and obtain authority to pay the claim, no matter what action the House may take in reference to the Bill. This Bill provides to meet the case of this litigation going on in court, or to meet the case, should the company abandon this litigation, and say: Now, we believe we have a claim, which is perhaps more than we can establish in a court of law, and we make the proposition that you pay us a certain sum representing the value of the work we have done, which you are going to use and which is going to become part of the property of the Dominion of Canada. Under this Bill, I take it, it would be conceded that the Minister of Railways would have the drawing of any reference to arbitration, and the Minister would take good care, under this Bill, which does not bind him to go any further, to submit to those arbitrators that one question, not as to the amount of money these men may have expended in connection with that scheme, whether wisely or unwisely—some of which has been expended in New Brunswick, and some in Newfoundland and elsewhere—on work that the Government does not pretend to appropriate, but as to the value to the Government of the work appropriated. No hon. gentleman on the other side will question that, under this Bill, that reference could confine the arbitration to the ascertaining of the value of the property actually taken, over and above the amount already paid by the Dominion Government for that property, viz., $150,000. So that, I think, if the hon. gentlemen understand the position in which the case now is, they will see this Bill is drawn so as to enable the Government to come to a settlement with that company, or, if unable to come to a settlement, if it is deemed wise not to go on in the courts, but to leave the case to arbitration on that one point, there is no danger of the company obtaining, by any provision here, any greater sum than they are fairly entitled to.

Mr. JONES. I think the argument of the hon. gentleman would go to show how unwise it would be to pass this Act with that clause in it. He stated very correctly that the position of the railway was now before the court and that statement was also made by the hon. Minister of Finance in the speech to which I referred before. He said:

"There were difficulties in the way. When the money was paid, the Government took over a mortgage which had been given to the sub-contractors for the sum of $150,000. That mortgage turned out to be not a legally and duly executed instrument. The company denied the right of their agent to execute it, and so important the Government of Nova Scotia consider this road that at once a resolution was passed unanimously by the Assembly of that Province to entitle the Government of Canada to sell under the mortgage for the money which had been expended for labor to the amount of $150,000."

Now, it will be seen that the Government owned the road already. I suppose they have not taken legal proceedings, but the Government are the owners of that road at the present moment, and, as stated by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), the company were dissatisfied—naturally they were; I am not surprised at that—and they went to the courts to get redress, to get a larger sum. The courts on two occasions have decided against them, and now the Government come in and say, in the resolution before the House, it is desirable they should be reimbursed that sum. That is directly at variance with the agreement and with the judgment of the court, and it appears to me to be opening up a wide field for those gentlemen who are, I have no doubt, prolific enough in resources where money is concerned to such an extent as this, and who could make their claim on the Government without such an additional insinuation as is contained in this Bill, that, if their claim is pressed against the Government, the Government have power to settle it by arbitration, if it is established in principle. I think it is a most pernicious principle to establish, and it is against the principle which was announced by the Minister of Finance. I have no doubt that it will lead to a large expenditure of money, because we know when a claim is put in by companies like this, they will not make it smaller because they are to submit it to arbitration.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I want to explain more fully the position of the case in the court. There is not, as hon. gentlemen evidently have understood, a suit brought by the company against the Government to ascertain what amount is due them, nor is it brought by them on any obligation on the part of the Government, but, in connection with that mortgage which was ratified and made valid by the Nova Scotia Assembly, a sale was about to take place, and the company went into the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia to obtain an injunction. They obtained an interim injunction to prevent that sale. The sale was prevented, and that has been the sole question before the court up to date. The judge in equity dissolved this injunction, and an appeal was taken from that decision to the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia, and the Supreme Court dismissed the appeal, so that the company have failed to establish their right or to establish the invalidity of that legislation passed in connection with the mortgage. It is not clear that they would not be able to establish a claim in some form of proceeding for some money over and above $150,000, and, as was stated by the hon. the Minister of Finance lately, they claim that they have spent a much larger amount of money on this road.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Government at present does not own a foot of this road. The mortgage is not to the Government but to trustees for the benefit of contractors to whom the company owed various debts. The Government have paid the debts of the company, taken an assignment of those debts, and now stand in the position of the creditors for whom the mortgage is taken. I understand that there is no difference on either side of the House as to the principle of the Bill, that it is desirable to build this road as a Government work and to pay the company for the present value of the work, less the amount we have already paid to its creditors; and, if the Bill is not sufficiently guarded in its terms to carry that out, that object can be perfectly attended to in committee.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. POPE. Let us take the second reading before six, as there is no difference of opinion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is a great deal of difference of opinion, as under the Bill you propose to take power to pay all the money they have expended. There is a strong difference of opinion as to the preamble, which I have just been reading over.

Mr. POPE. There is no such intention as that, and, if there is any alteration to be made, we can make it in committee.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). We have been discussing it as if we were in committee.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt we have, and it was desirable to do it. But that particular point is not answered by the Minister, as to the expenditure to which we may be committed in order to pay these people the moneys which they have expended.

Mr. POPE. If the intention is not clear enough, we can make it clear enough in committee. The intention is that, if the courts so decide, we may be able to pay for the present value what it may be worth to the Government, about $150,000, and not more. If that is not clear enough, we can make it clear.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Mr. DAVIES. I think we are entitled to some further information before this motion is carried. This Bill contains several clauses, one of which authorises the Government to expend $500,000 in constructing this branch of road as a Government work, and I understand that that clause is fairly based upon a resolution introduced by the hon. gentleman in committee. But the Bill goes further. How far I am unable to say; how far this House has not yet been informed. This Bill commits the House to an expenditure of an unknown and unascertained sum, in payment of certain works which it is alleged a company, which originally contracted to build the road, have spent upon it. Now, I would like to understand two things from the Minister: In the first place, whether the resolution on which this Bill is based, authorises the introduction of a Bill giving power to him to expend this sum of money at all; and, secondly, I see that the resolution on which the hon. gentleman based his Bill declared that it is right to expend $500,000 for the construction of this road. So far the Bill is based properly upon the resolution, but I do not understand the resolution, on which the Bill is based, authorises the expenditure of an unknown sum to acquire certain works which it is alleged the original contracting company built, and which the Government are taking power to expropriate. Inasmuch as the Bill does not do that, it is out of order, of course. But even supposing that that point is got over, and that the Bill was in order, I think the very least the Minister could do would be to inform the House to what extent this country is to be committed by the passage of this clause.

Mr. POPE. We did that on the resolution.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman did not do so. I have looked over the report, and I have not seen any statement from him whatever, or any approximation towards a statement. If I understood one of the hon. gentlemen who spoke behind him to-day, they doubt if there is any money due at all to this company—it may be a dollar, it may be $500,000. The House is in perfect ignorance. I do not know, it is utterly impossible for me to say, in the absence of information, what the work is, whether it amounts to one dollar or $500,000. I am sure there is not a member in the House that knows; and the House is assenting to the principle of a Bill which involves the expenditure of an unknown sum. The resolution upon which the Bill was introduced does not justify that clause being put in the Bill, and it has never yet been assented to by Parliament.

Mr. THOMPSON. The Bill, I take it, only authorises the expenditure of the money which was voted by the committee. There is already legislation provided in relation to the subsidy, and the expenditure that is contemplated by the first section of the Bill, is to be made by the vote of a subsidy. The third resolution, which proposes to carry on the work, authorised the expenditure of $500,000.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the Minister of Railways ought to give us some information on this point. I do not think the resolution is sufficiently large to embrace this Bill in its present form.

Mr. POPE. I think the resolution was broad enough to cover the money I am asking from the House. I explained to the House at the time, that the estimated cost of this road, over and above the subsidies already granted, was about $1,000,000. When we want more we shall come to the House, as we always do, and ask for it. But I think the resolution covers all we are asking for now.

Mr. BLAKE. I think not. The resolution proposed that a certain sum of money should be granted, half a million, I think, and the unexpended sum of a former subsidy for the construction of a railway. That is the purpose. The Bill proposes that an indefinite sum should be applied towards the reimbursement or the purchase of certain work. There has been no information in the committee as to the application of any portion of the public money for that purpose; there is, therefore, no proper foundation for a disbursement of public money for that purpose. One purpose for which the committee authorised the disbursement of public money was for the building of the road.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman is quite right. It was for the building of the road, and this is as much a part of the building of the road as the rest of the work we have to do, and I think was covered by the resolution. I explained at the time—

Mr. BLAKE. No.

Mr. POPE. I explained at the time that we might have to pay something, or we might have to pay nothing; I could not say. But if there was anything that fairly belonged to the company, I wanted authority by this Act to be able to pay them.

Mr. BLAKE. I have no recollection of any such explanation of the hon. gentleman, and I am quite convinced the resolution does not cover any proposal to pay any private individual one sixpence for money or work already done upon that railway. I believe, in point of law, there is no claim on the part of this company for one sixpence from this Government, and every sixpence that is paid to the company will be a gift. It may be a right thing to give the money, it may be a wrong thing, but the question of the moment is whether the resolution authorised that disposition of the public moneys. The hon. gentleman's explanation, according to my recollection of it, was confined to the proposition that he was about to build and to pay for building, not to buy and pay for buying, the works already constructed.

Mr. THOMPSON. The resolution, I think, is pretty explicit. It reads:

Resolved, That it is expedient that the railway from Oxford to New Glasgow should be completed as a Government railway, and that, in addition to any unexpended balance of the sum of $224,000 granted as a subsidy for the construction of the said railway by the Act 45th Victoria, chapter 14, there shall be granted to Her Majesty, for the said purpose, out of any unappropriated moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, a sum of five hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. BLAKE. That is to complete the railway.

Mr. THOMPSON. Precisely, to complete the railway. Now, as I explained before you left the Chair at six o'clock, the Government at present, although some work has been done in connection with this railway, own no part of it. There is an outstanding mortgage to those who are trustees for the creditors, and it is anticipated that the mortgage in which the Government are interested, will be foreclosed, and under that, in all probabilities, the work may be acquired; or it may be that that mortgage being satisfied, or released, or foreclosure being impossible, it may be necessary to expropriate the works of the company in order to acquire the right of way for the railway.

Mr. MILLS (Bethwell). The resolution does not sustain the position taken by the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Justice. The resolution says that it is expedient that the railway from Oxford to New Glasgow should be completed as a Government railway, and that, in addition to any unexpended balance granted as subsidy by the Act 45 Victoria, chapter 14, there should be granted out of any unappropriated moneys of the Consolidated Fund, $500,000. This is for the purpose of completing this particular undertaking as a Government railway. So far from it being suggested that any portion might be diverted for the purpose the hon. gentleman has mentioned, the suggestion is that there is a portion of the $224,000 unexpended, and it might be applied to carrying forward the construction of the line and completing the undertaking. If the hon. gentleman proposes to apply the money to any other purpose, it should be stated in the resolution, and it is not so stated. I should like it to be decided whether the Bill in its present form can go before the committee.

Mr. THOMPSON. I contend that the resolution contains very distinct language with respect to the appropriation of the amounts named, and that it is impossible they can be diverted to any other purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER. I rule that the expenditure provided for in the Bill is covered by the resolution, and if the hon. gentleman desires to offer any objection it can be done much better in Committee of the Whole, when a motion can be made that the objectionable portion be struck out of the Bill. I, therefore, see no objection to the Bill being read the second time.

Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY—REVISION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House again resolve itself in Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the House to the following telegram, which, it is said in a newspaper I hold in my hand, was received by the revising officer of a county in the Island of Prince Edward:

"Geo. D. Allen, revising officer for Queen's, has received the following telegram:

"OTTAWA, 26th May, 1887.

"To——, revising officer for —— county:

"A measure will be submitted to Parliament concerning revision of lists. Do not incur any expenditure, nor proceed with any work. Will further instruct you later.

"J. A. CHAPLEAU,

"Secretary of State."

It seems to me that this telegram, if sent by a member of the Government to the revising officers throughout the country, is a gross violation of the law of the land. There is no rule better settled since the days of Charles the Second than that the Government have neither dispensing nor suspending power. The Government in this case have undertaken to instruct officers who are appointed for the purpose of discharging certain duties mentioned in the law. Whether the law was wise or unwise, it is a law that was carried through Parliament and received the sanction of the Crown, and it is the duty of those who are appointed under the law to act in accordance with its provisions and to give effect to its provisions. If they are found to be unwise and not in the public interest, it is the duty of the Government charged with the administration of public affairs to submit to this House a measure amending that particular statute. We find that the Government, instead of undertaking to discharge that duty, instead of coming down to this House with a measure to amend the law and remedy any defect, have assumed to do what they have no authority whatever to do, to instruct various important public officers throughout the country to set the law at defiance, to disregard its provisions, and the Government promised legislation upon the subject. I know that the First Minister has for some time assumed that this House is here for the purpose of merely registering his wishes, that he decides beforehand what shall and what shall not be done; and so it may be that he, looking at the past, might be justified in assuming that the law which is now upon the Statute-book and which it is the duty of certain officers to obey, will be repealed. But it would only have been fair to his supporters in this House to have recognised their right of independent judgment and action, and to have refrained from giving any such order until the law now on the Statute-book was repealed. There is no excuse for this conduct. It is not only a highly improper proceeding in itself, but it is a proceeding altogether unwarranted. There was no supreme necessity imposed on the Government in the direction in which they have gone. Parliament has been in session for six weeks. The First Minister has no information he did not possess before the House met. He knew what appropriations were necessary for the voters' lists, to meet the claims of the revising officers, their clerks and bailiffs, and the cost of printing the voters' lists. All this information was in the hands of the Government when the House met. If the hon. gentleman thought it was unwise that this measure should be continued upon the Statute-book, why did he not propose its repeal, so that we might have had a Bill under consideration, which Parliament could have dealt with before the time came that the officers were called upon to discharge certain public duties. Instead of doing that, we have the action taken which is reported in the newspaper; and I find the notice was sent not merely to the revising officer in Prince Edward Island, but I believe it was sent to revising officers everywhere throughout the Dominion. We told the First Minister when he proposed the measure that it was one not in the public interest. We pointed out the appliances which the House could command for the purpose of preparing the voters' lists, and we urged that this machinery was not such as made it desirable that the policy which had worked satisfactorily for eighteen years should be departed from. We pointed out to the hon. gentleman that he would entail very great inconvenience upon members of this House and upon candidates seeking election to this House; also a very serious expenditure upon the country and that the expense was wholly unnecessary, and that even if the expense resulted in the preparation of satisfactory voters' lists, it would not have done more than had been accomplished by the Provincial law. The hon. gentleman disregarded our representations. He was so anxious to secure for his dependents, his wards, the privilege of voting for representatives to this House that he could not forego the opportunity on the eve of the elections of making radical changes in the law. Well, Sir, the hon. gentleman has had an opportunity of trying his experiment, and a trial of twelve months has not resulted in a way so satisfactory to him or his supporters that they feel like continuing to carry the law into effect. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman, instead of coming down frankly to the House at the opening of the Session and admitting that he had been mistaken, and that it was necessary that the law should be repealed or amended, has taken the very extraordinary course of proposing to suspend the law, and giving instructions to public officers to disregard those duties which the law has imposed upon them, because he proposes some time in the future to introduce a measure of repeal. Now, we know that the hon. gentleman is not likely to propose a measure which he does not think is in his own interest—and, when I say in his own interest I am speaking of his interest as a public man, as the leader of a party in this House. The hon. gentleman knows that many of those lists were defective, that serious complaints were made with regard to the preparation of those voters' lists, and he has given instructions which show that he is resolved to interfere with the operation of the law, and impose upon the people of those constituencies where elections are likely to take place, in consequence of the elections being contested, an imperfect voters' list, and to deny the people the opportunity of amending their lists. We know that a large number of persons who are on the voters' lists to-day are no longer even residents of the Province; they reside abroad, and it is only by constantly amending the voters' lists that we can obtain a fair voters' list for the purpose of holding an election. I venture to say that there is scarcely a constituency in this Province where twelve months will not make a change of ten per cent. in the voters' list; and yet the hon. gentleman proposes not only to continue those lists without any authority on the part of Parliament, but he has assumed to instruct the revising officers throughout the country that, instead of proceeding with the work and undertaking to discharge those duties which the law has imposed on them, they are to disregard the law, because, forsooth, he intends submitting a measure to Parliament before Parliament rises. Now, Sir, I say that is a most improper proceeding; it is one which this House ought not to tolerate. But the Government have gone on in acts of usurpation, step by step, until they not only disregard the authority of Parliament but set the law of the land itself at defiance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The objection which the hon. gentleman takes is that the Government have assumed certain despotic powers, trusting to the fact that the House will register the opinions of the Government or my own individual opinion. Hinc ille lachrymæ. Because the majority of the House will not register the hon. gentleman's opinions, therefore he gets up and makes this statement of grievances. As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, the duties of the revising officer do not commence yet; they do not commence until the 1st of June, and as yet, therefore, no harm has been done. Now, I will not be drawn into a discussion prematurely, nor will I think the House favor a discussion at present on the merits of the Bill of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice, with respect to the Franchise Act. The hon. gentleman has made a partisan speech; he made an attack upon that measure. Well, when that measure comes up we will discuss it, and perhaps the House will agree that it is a reasonable Bill; perhaps they will register the decree which the hon. gentleman speaks of, or in other words will express an opinion that it is a reasonable Bill. If that Bill becomes law, there will be no revision of the voters' lists in 1887. That Bill may be right or it may be wrong; the principle objected to by the hon. gentleman we will discuss when the Bill comes up, but if the House really passes an Act declaring that there shall be no revision of the voters' lists for 1887, don't you think it was a wise precaution to state to the different revising officers to hold their hands for a few days until we see whether that Bill is passed or not. If it be passed all that the revising officers would do in the meantime would just mean so much money thrown away, and it was simply for the purpose of saving that money that this was done. We said: If that Bill is adopted all your action and all your expenses will be so much waste, and therefore we ask you to hold your hands. If the Bill is not adopted there is no time lost; there is plenty of time for the revising officers to perform all the duties they are required to do under the Franchise Act of 1885. It was simply a precautionary measure to inform the revising officers that they need not go on appointing their clerks and incurring all these expenses until they saw whether the Bill passed or not. That is the plain common sense of the matter.

Mr. BLAKE. It may be, Sir, if the House adopts the views of the Government, as to the law which is now on the Statute-book being suspended for this year, that some money will have been saved by the notice which, as now acknowledged by the hon. gentleman, the Government has caused to be issued to these officers. It may be, I say, that some money will be in that event saved, but I maintain that a great constitutional principle will have been violated. The law of the land imposes on these officers certain duties. By an Act of Parliament they are called upon to discharge those duties; they are made officers holding their appointments during good behavior, and they are required by the law to do thus and so. But what the hon. gentleman says is: We came to the conclusion late in the day—a few days ago—on the 26th of May, that we would introduce a Bill, and invite the Legislature to prevent the discharge of these duties for this year; and having come to that conclusion, we took it upon our own authority to cause these officers as far as an executive act can cause them, to disobey the law. We told them to deflect their duty; we said: Don't incur an expense or proceed with any work; don't proceed with this work which under the law you are entitled to do—this work which under the law you are bound to do—work which the hon. gentleman says we, although an Act of Parliament has imposed that duty and given that power, we executively command you, we instruct you not to discharge these duties, not to exercise your powers; and he concludes by saying: we will further instruct you later, thus indicating the contention on the part of the Executive Government of this country that they had the right to instruct the revising officers as to what they are to do, and what they are to forbear to do, instead of their being officers under the control of Parliament and discharging the statutory duties which are indicated by an Act to which Parliament has assented. Now, Sir, the great act of Executive Government which gave rise to the discussions—one of the main points upon which the revolutionary system of the United Kingdom turned, was an admirable executive act. No man can read the Declaration of Indulgence of Charles II without agreeing in everything he proposed to do by that Declaration of Indulgence. No man can read it without being delighted to see that the Executive was in advance of the Legislature of the land at that instant, with reference to the principles which ought to be applied as to the relation of the State or the Parliament to religious questions. He declared in that document, which in that respect was in advance of the public opinion of the day, that experience had shown that coercion by the State in religious matters was a failure, and ought not to continue; and he declared that he proposed to give a measure of toleration to the dissenting Protestants and a minor measure of toleration to the Catholic subjects of his realm. But although we all agree to-day in the excellence of the principles which Charles proposed to apply by executive action, we all agree also, I trust, that his attempt to suspend the laws of the land in order to give effect to those principles, however excellent, was an attempt which was dangerous and despotic. And what I say is that my hon. friend was justified at this time, before we go into Committee of Supply, in calling the attention of the House to a grievance of the subject in this, that the Executive Government has undertaken, of its own volition and authority, to instruct statutory and parliamentary officers not to discharge the duties or to exercise the powers with which by the law of the land they are clothed. So that, once again, 215 years after the event, you find an attempt repeated to act by the executive in suspension of the law of the land.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into committee.

(In the Committee.)

Contingent expenses of High Commissioner for Canada in London $2,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As it appears, according to the statement made in the House, that we have no

High Commissioner at present, I do not see the meaning of applying for contingencies for him. If the office be as necessary as is represented to us, it appears extraordinary that for the time being it should be absolutely annihilated.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is for next year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you can dispense with the High Commissioner for six months during the very important period which we are now going through, there does not appear to be any very sound reason why we should not dispense with him altogether.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think we are entitled to some further information with regard to this. The papers which I moved for some time ago, with the view of enabling us more intelligently to discuss matters relating to the office of High Commissioner, and which the hon. First Minister promised to bring down, are not yet laid on the Table of the House. Therefore, in the absence of these papers, we require some information. Now, I asked the hon. gentleman, when was it that the house occupied by the High Commissioner and loaned to him by the country was closed, or whether it is closed, and if it is, who is in possession of it? Is it let to some one else, or is it held on behalf of the High Commissioner that is to be.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt the House is entitled to the fullest information on the subject. The house has not been let. It is being taken care of in my absence, until I return to it, or until my successor returns to it. I shall be very glad to give the hon. gentleman any further information in my power that he may desire.

Mr. MILLS. Is this money for the purpose of meeting the expenses connected with taking care of that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For next year.

Mr. MILLS. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that the house is still in his care and under his supervision. I suppose that he is responsible, and, therefore, it will be well taken care of.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Quite so.

Mr. MILLS. It is the more important because it shows that the hon. gentleman is, after all, receiving an emolument which, I think, disqualifies him from sitting here. The hon. gentleman laughs, but he knows it is an emolument under the Crown; he knows it is regarded as a profit. It is quite as much so as if he were receiving $10,000 a year, and the hon. gentleman in giving this information, which I admit he has frankly given, has shown the House that he is not legally qualified to sit here, and is liable to the penalties imposed by law for every day he does sit here.

Amount estimated to be required for taxes and insurance for High Commissioner's residence including income tax $1,200.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is another emolument.

Mr. McMULLEN. Are we to be called on to pay this tax for the current year? The hon. gentleman is here, and certainly this tax should not be collected in England while he is in Canada.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that this appropriation is for the coming year. If there were no High Commissioner appointed, there would be no person to pay, and there would be no charge for income tax on his salary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Apart from every other question, it seems to me there is no more reason why the salary of the High Commissioner, if we are entitled to appoint a High Commissioner, and if it is in the public interest such an officer should be appointed, should be taxed than the salary of an ambassador.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He should be regarded as standing in the same position. No Government in the world would think of attempting to impose a tax on the salary of an ambassador or foreign representative; and if we have so far progressed as to be entitled to have a representative at the Court of St. James, it is certainly only fair that he should be put in exactly the same position as the representative of a foreign country. We should remonstrate against the imposition of any tax upon the person of our High Commissioner. He does not stand in the position of a simple consul. He has certain ambassadorial functions to discharge—so we were told, at all events, when the office was created—and if he is not to enjoy immunity, if he is to be liable to the law of the country for any offence he may commit, he, at all events, ought not to be liable to a tax of this sort.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Is not that little speech a waste of time?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am inclined to think it is not a waste of time, if my hon. friend will allow me to disagree with him. I entirely concur in the views enunciated by the hon. member for Bothwell. My predecessor raised that question, and it was referred to the revenue board, and I have myself paid the tax on the High Commissioner's salary under protest, on the ground, well taken, that the representative of the Dominion in London ought not to be taxed, but that his position should be regarded in this respect, as it is in almost every other respect, as an ambassadorial position. I can only say that I, when I resume, as I hope to be able to do at an early day, the discharge of the duties of that office, intend to press that point as strongly as I can on the attention of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. CHARLTON. If the salary of the High Commissioner is subject to income tax in England, it will be proper for him to pay that amount out of his salary. He receives a salary of $10,000 a year, and the income tax on it should be paid by him; otherwise our payment amounts to a salary of $10,000, plus all the charges. If a civil service employé's income were taxed, we would not supplement the amount to his salary. It strikes me the same rule ought to apply to this case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That would be extremely unfair. It was not the intention of Parliament, when Parliament fixed the salary at $10,000, that these charges should be deducted. I am not there discharging the duties of the office for myself but for the country. Supposing a war ensued and the income tax were doubled or quadrupled, would the hon. gentleman think it quite right that Canada should receive the services of the party for whom they had appropriated a certain salary, and deduct from that salary a very large charge for income tax, and £63 sterling is, I hold, a large tax on an income of $10,000. The contrary is the view taken by the Government, and it is applied to all the officials serving the Government in England. The income tax on the salaries is uniformly paid by this Government.

Mr. LANDERKIN. This item should not pass. I do not see why the people of England should tax our High Commissioner $1,200 for his residing there. I should think he would become a valuable citizen, and it is scarcely consistent with British freedom to treat our High Commissioner in this way, by imposing a tax of $1,200 on his salary. Our Government tax the Chinese when they come here, but we are surprised the British Government should tax our High Commissioner $1,200 a year, and our taxpayers are surprised that they should be called upon to pay taxes on the salary of a gentleman who gets $10,000 a year. There are contingencies of $2,000. I make these remarks in no capricious spirit or spirit of ill-will to the gentleman who has occupied that position until lately. I think that, while he consents to leave that high and dignified position in Britain—the ambassador of this country in Great Britain—and to return to Canada and accept a salary of $7,000 a year, it will be somewhat difficult for him to make the people of this country believe that there are not some pickings here to make up the difference. It seems so, as he thinks it a hardship for him to pay that tax, but I think there are some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House who would be willing to accept the position, and who would be able to fill it with great ability and capacity, and who would be willing to pay their taxes if the Government would send them there. I have no doubt that some of them think they could do it as well as the hon. gentleman who occupies the position now. There is another matter in regard to this. I find that the taxes were paid for a year. The High Commissioner has been here for half a year, so that this country has been short half a year on account of these taxes. I should like to know if this is to be recouped to the country. How is this to be? Is the money of the country to be frittered away in this manner? I think, if we have a High Commissioner, he should either stay there all the time or stay here all the time, so that we should not be paying these taxes all the time in advance. I think some arrangement ought to be made so that we should only pay three months in advance or six months in advance, at all events, or something of that kind, and that we should not be paying over and over again. There are people in this country getting a dollar a day who are working as hard, perhaps not with as much ability, but as hard as the High Commissioner, and they have to pay their own taxes. I feel that I would be an untrue representative of the people of this country if I did not protest, in the most solemn manner, against the payment of the taxes of a gentleman who receives from this House $10,000 as salary and pickings to the tune of $5,000 or $6,000 in addition; and I say that, in view of the depression which is abroad and the taxes on everything which the farmer and the laboring class have to buy, this is an improper course to pursue, and the gentleman who occupies that position—with ability, as no doubt he does—would make the matter come before us with a better grace if he struck that item out altogether.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must say, while I very frequently agree with my hon. friend in the motions he makes in this House, I do not agree with him in regard to this matter. I cannot think that any one on this side seriously objects to the payment of these taxes. Possibly the object of these remarks is to get information. I was not in the House when the discussion commenced, but I think that must be the object. Everyone knows that the High Commissioner, while in England, has done yeoman service for this country. I recollect an instance when he went to Liverpool, and took his coat off, and rolled his shirt sleeves up, and went in a professional way to save the cattle interests of this country, and I think that Canada owed him a debt of gratitude in that matter. Besides that, Canada is indebted for having at present the beneficent Government presided over by the right hon. gentleman, to the hon. member who has occupied the position of High Commissioner and came out here to save the country from the rule of the unfortunate Grits. Looking at the members on this side of the House, I do not think there is an hon. gentleman who will object to these taxes being paid, for the High Commissioner has rendered good service to Canada abroad and at home.

Mr. JONES. I think the ground my hon. friend took with reference to the services of the High Commissioner in London might entitle that gentleman to our high approbation, but the other ground, in reference to his having returned to Canada to assist in reinstating the Government which might not be in that position without his services, is a point on which we may be allowed to differ. However,

I did not rise to refer to that, but to say that, after the experience which the hon. gentleman has had in that exalted position, I think he ought now to be able to form an opinion as to what the incidental expenses of that position would amount to, and I think it would be much more dignified for us to put the salary at that total sum, and so to avoid the discussion on the incidental expenses, on taxes and other small items of that kind. I would prefer to see the amount placed at such a figure as to cover all the expenses, and then we would not have to go through such a discussion as this.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may explain for the information of the hon. gentleman who has drawn attention to the practical question of these taxes, that I think I can relieve his anxiety and that of the poor farmers of this country as to their being particularly pressed for the payment of any taxes for me. That hon. gentleman will be glad to learn that since I was first charged with the duties of High Commissioner for Canada in London, I have saved in salary to the people of this country $14,000; that the discharge of the ministerial duties which have been imposed upon me, and the discharge at the same time of the duties of High Commissioner for Canada in London, has resulted in there being drawn out of the Treasury of this country $14,000 at least less than would have been drawn under ordinary circumstances, if I had not been charged with these duties, and the High Commissioner for Canada had been continued in London. I will not say anything as to the manner in which I have been enabled to discharge those duties further than that my best efforts have been given on all occasions to doing all that I found it possible to do in the interests of Canada. And further I will say, as the House knows, the salary was placed at $10,000 and an amount of $4,000 was voted for contingencies in addition to that salary. My predecessor, who went to London and took a suitable residence, a residence such as the High Commissioner for Canada ought to occupy in London, found himself unable to live at that amount of $10,000 for salary and $4,000 for contingencies. He addressed a letter to my right hon. friend to say that, unless the salary were increased, he must give up the office. The Government declined to increase the salary; he left the residence, which was a suitable residence for a High Commissioner to occupy, and went into private lodgings in London. I have no hesitation in saying that I could have done the same, if, when I was appointed to that office I had considered it properly discharging my duty to Canada. I could have gone into private lodgings, and lived upon the salary and contingencies without any inconvenience whatever. In fact, I could have saved a considerable amount in connection with it. I did not think that it was the right thing to do under the circumstances, and my right hon. friend and the Government having come to the conclusion that it was necessary that the High Commissioner for Canada should occupy a suitable and appropriate residence, directed me to select one, which was purchased for the purpose; and the amount of $2,000 a year out of the contingencies voted by this House for the High Commissioner, was deducted from my contingencies and charged for the rent of that house. The house is an appropriate one. It is well situated for the purpose, and I pay or have paid, out of the appropriation of $4,000 for contingencies formerly made, $2,000 a year for rent, and there is not a farthing of taxes charged on that residence which is not paid by the owner of any furnished house who rents it to another person in London. Wherever a gentleman in London rents a furnished house, the landlord pays every farthing of the taxes; so the Government of Canada who are the owners of this house, and have charged me $2,000 a year for the rent of the house, naturally and properly I think, pay the taxes. But, as I have said, this has not increased the burthens of the country because, by the great exertions which I have made in order to discharge the duties imposed upon me in connection with the ministerial duties and the duties of High Commissioner, without neglecting either more than was absolutely necessary, I have been enabled to save no less than $14,000 since I was charged with the performance of those duties.

Mr. MILLS. The hon. gentleman, I think, has not taken into consideration all that he has saved. I might be disposed, and the committee might be disposed, to question that he has saved $14,000 in the way he has stated. But the hon. gentleman has saved to the country a very considerable sum, both during the current year, and in one or two former years, by being absent, and the large amount of saving, the genuine saving, I think, has been when the hon. gentleman has not been in London. In fact the hon. gentleman's savings reminds me very much of a boy's composition written in the high school, where the boy said that pins had saved thousands of people's lives. "How," said the teacher, "is that possible?" "Why, by not swallowing them," answered the boy. And the hon. gentleman has saved to the country thousands of dollars, but I do not think it has been in the way he has stated. It has been saved because the hon. gentleman has not been in London for the purpose of discharging his duties, and is not therefore drawing a salary.

Post Office and Finance Departments—Contingencies

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are these sums paid, in addition to the regular salaries, to certain of these officers? Because, if so, I think, as a matter of practice, it would have been better to have added the amount to the salaries in those Departments, than to have taken special votes. A good deal has been said while the hon. gentleman has been away, and a good deal has been very properly said, as to the inexpediency of allowing men to draw two distinct salaries from the public chest for different species of work; and although the amounts are not very large, and the work is considerable, I think it would have been better to have added indirectly to the Finance and Post Office charges, that is to say, if you are paying double salaries.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is only an increase of $100 here.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not the increase I am speaking of, because that may be fairly accounted for by the additional amount of work; there is no doubt a larger amount of work in consequence of the increase of deposits. I am speaking of the practice of paying certain officers of the Finance and Post Office Departments their regular salaries, and then to make them special allowances besides. I say I would prefer to see these amounts placed against the separate Departments in place of putting them in this particular way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is for specific services, to pay officers of the Savings Bank and Post Office and Finance Departments engaged in balancing the interest of depositors' accounts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am aware what it is for. I am not objecting so much to the charge as to the mode of putting it. If the hon. gentleman has had time to examine the Auditor General's report, he will observe that there is an immense number of officers who receive, so to speak, two salaries, and it appears to me that practice is liable to abuse.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will look into that point and bring down a memorandum.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In all these cases, although I do not see the names of these officers, I take it for granted that practically they are receiving the ordinary salary as officers in the Department. Now, that cannot very well consist, as a rule, with their doing the full amount of work for their salaries.

Mr. McLELAN. The hon. gentleman will understand that it is a special work which requires a particular class of officers, and if you fix at an increased rate the salary of a certain number of the officers, who are expected to do this service, it might be that when the period for this work arrived, these men may not be at hand to do it, or may not be available, and it is left to the Superintendents of the Savings Banks and the Post Office Departments to select their best men when this work is required to be done, and pay them. The question about paying for extra services is being considered by the Government, and we are attempting to diminish such payments as much as possible. But in these two services, the Government Savings Banks, and the Post Office Savings Banks, it is thought the services are entirely exceptional, that they should be paid for as extra work, and that the officer should have authority to select his men when the period arrives for making this calculation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is not very convenient to put these matters off to concurrence, because, when concurrence arrives, we may not have the information before us. Moreover, as the hon. gentleman knows, the House is apt to be extremely impatient at concurrence, and very often we do not care to delay about trifling matters. Now, I think we ought to have had information about this, although I do not press the point, because there is something in what the Postmaster General has said. It may not be possible in this case, to add an official to each of these Departments, which I would have recommended in ordinary circumstances. I suppose these amounts are made up twice a year?

Mr. McLELAN. In the Post Office Savings Bank they are made once a year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under these circumstances it may not be possible to have a separate staff for that, but my reason for calling attention to it was more particularly this: That year after year we find a very considerable number of our officers are getting into the habit of having large sums paid them, that is to say, large sums taking into account their original salaries, in the shape of extra work. Now, that is liable to be very much abused.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is being steadily reduced.

Administration of Justice $64,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Miscellaneous justice, including North-West Territories $20,000—I see later on that we have added considerably to the expenditure for the North-West Territory. Is it necessary to have this vote of $20,000 in addition to all the other votes we have for that purpose? Looking at the total population in the North-West Territories, the sum total that we have voted for judicial purposes there is very large indeed. Here are $20,000, $4,000, $20,000 and $2,500, and I think some allowances besides—nearly $50,000 for a population of 23,000 whites and some Indians. In addition to that there are large expenditures for gaols, &c. This seems a very considerable figure for judicial expenditures.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see that in this item the only increases are four statutory increases of $50 and $5,000 for the maintenance of Prince Albert gaol.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This amount of $20,000 was voted at a time when we had a very small vote for the salaries of judges, &c., in the North-West Territory, and in proportion as you increase the regular salaries, I should have thought there would have been a reduction of this vote for miscellaneous justice, out of which I think in former times stipendiary magistrates were paid. My objection is to the sum total for judicial expenditure, which appears large for so small a population.

Mr. THOMPSON. The salaries were not included in the $20,000; they were voted separately. Besides, the hon. gentleman will find that this amount includes a large sum for the maintenance of prisoners, the expenses of witnesses and jury fees, amounting to $15,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe there is a special vote of $5,000 for Prince Albert gaol. What is the policy of the Government with respect to this matter? Have they decided on erecting a number of gaols in the North-West, or is the gaol at Prince Albert to be the gaol or penitentiary for the whole of that region?

Mr. THOMPSON. One gaol has been erected at Regina, and this at Prince Albert is the second gaol. Hitherto, prisoners have been confined in cells at the police barracks.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am aware that in a country like the North-West, where the population is very much scattered, it is not unreasonable that a considerable expenditure should be incurred. But when you come to examine the different items and find the total of $61,500 for judicial purposes, it appears an extravagant expenditure for the population, and unhappily there does not appear to be any great probability of an early reduction.

Supreme and Exchequer Courts of Canada $45,600

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total salary of the registrar?

Mr. THOMPSON. $2,600.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much does he receive in his capacity of editor of the reports.

Mr. THOMPSON. $100.

County Courts, N.B. $16,200

Mr. JONES. The salaries of the County Court judges in the Province of New Brunswick are: one at $3,000, five at $2,400; whereas in the Province of Nova Scotia the salaries of the County Court judges are only $2,400. The county judge in Halifax has a very large business to attend to, and I believe he deals with more cases than any other county judge. I, therefore, bring to the notice of the Government the position in which he stands. I believe representations were made to the Government some time ago with respect to increasing his salary, as he is a very competent judge, and performs a large amount of work. I cannot understand on what principle his salary is less by $600 than that of a similar judge in St. John.

Mr. THOMPSON. The salary of the County Court judge at St. John was fixed by statute and no such statute has been passed in relation to the Halifax judge, and, therefore, no additional amount has been placed in the Estimates. The hon. gentleman is aware that all such matters are regulated by statute. No doubt the reasons given were ample when the increase of salary was given to the county judge at St. John. County judges in New Brunswick have a very large criminal jurisdiction, which is not the case with Nova Scotia county judges. When the time arrives, and the Government see their way clear to increasing judicial salaries, I shall be very glad to see an increase made in the salary given to the county judge at Halifax among others.

Mr. MITCHELL. There was a very sufficient reason given at the time that this increased salary was given to the county judges at St. John. The appointment made was that of a very distinguished man, one for whom the people have very great regard, Hon. Charles Waters. He received a larger sum because his duties were more onerous and his position a more important one. I am satisfied the hon. gentleman will not expect as high a salary for the County Court judge at Halifax as for the county judge in the important commercial city of St. John.

Mr. JONES. After having brought this matter to the notice of the Government I hope they will remove the difficulty by placing the county judge for the city of Halifax in the same position as the county judge at St. John. I have in my possession some statistics of a number of cases the former had before him during the last twelve months, and I believe he fills the position with acceptance.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I desire to say a word with regard to the disparity of salaries at different places. In Quebec Vice-Admiralty Court, the registrar and marshal receive twice as much as the registrar and marshal at the Vice-Admiralty Courts in Halifax and St. John respectively. A return was brought down some Sessions ago showing that the amount of work was not at all in that proportion in the different Vice-Admiralty Courts, and when several hon. members brought the matter to the attention of the Government, they were told that the attention of the Government had been called to the desirability of passing legislation so as to place those courts on some new basis; and this question of the salaries would be then taken up. I do not know in what position those negotiations now are. I believe it was stated at the time that there was some correspondence between the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada with regard to the jurisdiction of these courts. But in whatever position the matter may be, it does seem unfair, or at any rate irregular and anomalous, that these officers in these different courts, where the work is pretty much the same, should be paid such disproportionate salaries.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I agree with my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Tupper) with regard to the salaries of these judges, and I agree with him also with regard to the other matter to which he has referred. I hope the Minister of Justice will do something towards giving a larger jurisdiction to the Vice-Admiralty Courts—giving them, in fact, the same jurisdiction as the High Court of Admiralty in England. This increase of jurisdiction was nearly consummated at one time, and if it had been carried out it would have been a great boon to the shipping interests of the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. JONES. I think the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) might have gone further and drawn attention to the fact that the judges, in Nova Scotia particularly, and in New Brunswick, are not paid the same salaries that are paid to judges in similar positions in Ontario and Quebec. I have always contended that the judges from these smaller Provinces were entitled to the same salaries as the judges of the larger Provinces, and so long as the present state of things remains, the judges of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick are placed, if not in a position of inferiority, certainly in a lower position than those of the larger Provinces. We have, I presume, equally eminent men on the bench of those Provinces, their time is equally taken up in the discharge of their duties, and I think their salaries should be equalised with those of the judiciary in the other Provinces.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like the Finance Minister to explain the increase of $2,000 in the vote this year for junior judges.

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards the Vice-Admiralty Court the inequality which has been brought to our notice by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) is one of long standing. If I mistake not, it existed before the Union of the Provinces, and was continued in consequence of the Vice-Admiralty Court judge of the Province of Quebec holding no other office, while in the Lower Provinces they were engaged in other judicial proceedings. The inequality may be explained in that way, although I admit it is not satisfactorily explained. I think the only reason which can be given for the subject not having been dealt with before is our expectations that the control of the Vice-Admiralty Court would be given entirely to this Parliament by a measure to be passed in the Imperial Parliament. A complete understanding was arrived at on that subject more than eighteen months ago between the two Governments, and the precise form of the statute to be passed by the Imperial Parliament was also agreed upon. I can only account for the delay in passing it, considering the cordial good will of the Imperial Governments, both present and past, by the extraordinary pressure of business upon the Imperial Parliament. The increase in the amount for salaries of County Court judges in Ontario is owing to the fact that one additional judge has been appointed in the county of Perth.

Mr. DAVIES. With regard to this matter of the salaries paid to the judges, I would like to mention the fact that the judges of the Province of Prince Edward Island are singled out and paid salaries very much smaller than judges performing the same duties in any other part of the Dominion. I think this is most unfair and unjust. The salary of the Chief Justice of Prince Edward Island is $4,000, and of the assistant judges $3,000, while in the neighboring Provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, the salary of the Chief Justice is $5,000, and the salary of each of the puisne judges $4,000. The salary of the Chief Justice of Manitoba is $5,000, and of puisne judges $4,000. The Chief Justice of British Columbia gets $5,820, and the puisne judges $4,850. It may not be fair to make a comparison between Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, because the reason given for the fact that the judges receive larger salaries in British Columbia than they do in any of the other Provinces, is that the cost of living is understood to be so much greater. But as between Prince Edward Island, and either Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, I think every hon. gentleman will agree that is most unfair and unjust that such a marked discrepancy should exist between the salaries paid on the island and those paid in the adjoining Provinces. The puisne judges in Prince Edward Island, receive the same salaries as are paid to the County Court judge in the city of St. John. That is something which cannot be defended on any possible grounds. The qualifications required of a judge in Prince Edward Island are just as high as in the adjoining Provinces; the duties they have to discharge are equally onerous, when you consider the number of judges who are on the bench in the other Provinces as compared with the island. There are only three on the island as compared with seven in Nova Scotia and six in New Brunswick. I do think the Minister of Justice should consider this question with a view of equalising the salaries of our judges with those of the judges of other Provinces. It just happens in the Province from which I come that some of the distinguished gentlemen who have sat on the bench there are men of private means and advanced in years, and by drawing on their private means they manage to live very comfortably; but no member of the legal profession, unless incapacitated by ill health, would leave anything like a good practice for $3,000 a year; he could not live upon it. In the salaries of Lieutenant Governors no such discrepancy exists. We pay the Lieutenant Governor of Prince Edward Island the same salary, I think, as the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, and why should such a difference exist in the salaries of the judges? It is utterly indefensible, and I hope the matter will engage the attention of the Minister of Justice. I believe he possesses some knowledge of the personality of the judges of Prince Edward Island, and I should like to hear from him whether he is prepared to defend the present system, or to recommend that they should be put on an equality with the judges of the other Provinces. This matter was brought to the attention of the Government by a memorial—which I believe was unanswerable—from the judges of the island three years ago, at the time the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) asked for a committee to consider the salaries of the judges of the different Provinces. He contended at that time, and I think with a great deal of justice, that the salaries paid to the judges of Ontario were too small, and not such as to obtain for the bench the best talent at the bar. I do hope this matter will receive the attention of the Government at an early day, and that some endeavor will be made to put the judges of Prince Edward Island on an equality with those of the other Provinces.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). Before this item is passed, I wish to call the attention of the Government to a circumstance in the county I have the honor to represent. Last year when the Franchise Bill was brought into operation, it was thought necessary that a junior judge should be appointed, so that he could act as revising officer. Before his appointment, the Government asked the senior judge of that county whether he wanted an assistant, and he replied that he did not, that he was quite competent to perform the duties of the position. He is a young man, in the prime of life, and quite qualified to perform all those duties; but when the Government made up their minds to put into operation the Franchise Act, they took the precaution to appoint a junior judge. Now, when the First Minister proposes to suspend the operation of that Act for a year at least, and consequently the services of the junior judge will not be required, I think it would be only right that he should be dispensed with, and that the salary now paid to him should be saved to the country. I can assure you there is no necessity whatever for a junior judge for that county, unless it may be as revising officer. And I may say further that I do not think the Government could possibly have made a more unsuitable appointment than the one they made. The junior judge is a man of 65 or 70 years of age, and the senior judge is about 35 or 40. The proposition was recently made by a member of the bar of Chatham, and a Conservative, that the members of the bar should unite and pay this senior judge to take the Division Court cases, and allow the junior judge to retain his salary and do nothing. It has been represented to me by all the members of the bar there, that the cost to the county and to litigants is largely increased by the appointment of this junior judge. He is a man that every member of the bar has admitted to be not at all qualified for the position; and now the Government in proposing to suspend the operation of the Franchise Act, are really proposing to take away the ground on which the junior judge was appointed, and I think it would be only right and proper that the country should save the large expense now entailed on the county by dispensing with his services.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the hon. member inform me when the appointment was made?

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). About a year ago.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will state for the hon. gentleman's information that no such letter as he refers to was ever received from the senior judge of his county; nor since I have had the honor of filling the office I occupy, has any junior judge been appointed to any county in Ontario or anywhere else where any representation by any reliable authority has been made that his services were not required. In all cases, when appointments have been made, strong recommendations have come from the bar, and in nearly all cases from the senior judge, of the necessity of appointing a junior. But I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that the appointment of junior judges in the Province of Ontario is not by the exercise of any arbitrary power on the part of this Government. There is a statute of the Province of Ontario which authorises us to appoint a junior judge in any county where the population reaches 40,000; but instead of exercising the full patronage which that statute gives us, we have passed an Order in Council stipulating that there shall be at least a population of 60,000 before the appointment of a junior judge shall be made; and in the particular case he refers to, not only were there strong representations of the necessity of appointing a junior judge, but we had 50 per cent. more population to be provided for judicially than the statute of Ontario required. I have not the pleasure of being personally acquainted with the person who has been appointed; but from the representations made with regard to his standing in the profession I must differ from the hon. gentleman as to his qualifications. From my own knowledge I can say that the hon. gentleman is not strictly accurate in stating that the profession in his county have unanimously agreed that he is not qualified for the position, because I have had representations of a different kind from them. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island has expressed his strong wish to hear from me on the subject of the judicial salaries in his own Province; but I am sorry that I can say nothing that will be very gratifying to him with regard to any increase in judicial salaries this year. I quite understand the inequalities he refers to. I can only say that the inequality in the salaries of the judges in the Vice-Admiralty Court is of very long standing. When our predecessors in office undertook to deal with this subject and to increase the salaries of the judges, they continued the inequality that existed between the salaries paid in the larger Provinces and those paid in the smaller. I am not prepared to say that I entirely concur in the wisdom or fairness of the discrimination that was then made; but in reply to the hon. member for Prince Edward Island, I must say that while very strong and very just representations have been made from various quarters in regard to judicial salaries, and these representations have been strongly pressed from the Province of Ontario, I am not able to promise that this year, at any rate, any provision will be made for an increase.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am a little surprised to hear the statement of the Minister of Justice that no communication emanated from Judge Bell in reference to the appointment of a junior judge. I have the statement from the senior judge himself that he told the Government he did not want an assistant. It is a well known fact that he did not want one, and he has told me since, on different occasions, he would a great deal rather the Government had not appointed a junior judge. So far as the members of the bar are concerned, I am satisfied the Minister of Justice does not know the feeling of the bar in the county of Kent. I am satisfied that nine-tenths of the members of the bar there are of opinion that the junior judge is not at all fitted for the position.

Mr. O'BRIEN. As this question of judges' salaries has been raised, I wish to take the opportunity of expressing the opinion, which, I believe, in Ontario, at any rate, is shared in by all educated people, both within and outside the profession, who give any thought to the subject, that the salaries of the judges, as a rule, are not adequate to the importance of the duties they have to perform, and to the class of men who are competent to perform them. I am sorry, therefore, to hear the hon. the Minister of Justice say that the Government have made up their minds that for this year, at any rate, this subject is not to be taken into consideration. I think there is a general feeling in the country that the character of the bench, both in the County Courts and the Superior Courts, is certainly not improving, and I believe the cause is felt generally to be that the present salaries are too low to enable the Government to command the services of the class of men whom the public at large would like to see occupying those positions. It is felt that the salaries of the judges are not at all in proportion to the incomes made at the bar by the sort of men we would like to have on the bench. If there is one thing the country has always had reason to be proud of, it has been the character and standing of our judiciary, and no worse economy can be practised than that which will have the result of lowering the standard of our judiciary by not giving our judges salaries adequate to their position and duties. I take this opportunity of expressing this opinion, not merely because it is my own, but because it is that of all those who have given any thought to the subject.

Mr. MARA. I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice to the great dissatisfaction that exists in British Columbia, but more particularly on the mainland, as regards our courts. About seven years ago the County Court work was thrown on our Supreme Court judges, with the result that they could not take time to do the work of both courts. I do not mean to infer that they have not performed their duties honestly and faithfully, but there must be a great deal of friction, delay and inconvenience when both Supreme and County Courts are called for the same day, so that the County Court suitors have often to wait four and five days until the Supreme Court business is finished before their cases can be heard. Another objection to the system is this, that at present we have five Supreme Court judges and only one County Court judge. The five have to be present in Victoria twice a year to attend the Court of Appeal; and as one of the terms occurs in the middle of the winter, the judges are tempted to remain there the greater portion of that season. Take the present winter for example. In the district of Yale I do not think there will be a County Court for six months; and the district of Kootenay may not have a County Court for six or seven months. This is not a proper state of affairs. The system either ought to be changed, or we ought to get more County Court judges. Take the districts of Yale and Kootenay, which are very large districts. One judge cannot do the work there, properly belonging to both County and Supreme Courts, and, therefore, those who would like to take their cases into the County Court have not an opportunity of doing so. If the Minister would give this his attention, he would possibly be able to get over the difficulty, so far as Yale and Kootenay are concerned, at all events, by appointing another county judge.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will give the best attention possible to this matter, and see if a remedy can be applied.

Kingston Penitentiary $111,185 30

Mr. THOMPSON. The Committee is aware that the Government have asked Parliament to abolish the system of perquisites in the various penitentiaries. The officers already appointed are exempt from the operation of the Bill passed to-day; it is not to affect their salaries prejudicially. At the same time, I think the disposition of Parliament, as evinced by its ready acquiescence in that Bill, is in favor of the abolition of the system of perquisites. I need hardly say that the system has gradually grown up into very irregular proportions, and it was felt by my predecessor, and has been likewise, from time to time, felt by myself that it was exceedingly desirable to abolish these perquisites. Inasmuch as existing officers cannot be dealt with under the terms of the Bill, I propose to ask Parliament to make provision in these estimates for the commutation of perquisites which are received by the various officers now in the penitentiary, so that I will not have to wait, for the coming into operation of the Bill passed, until all the existing officers have resigned or been removed. That would postpone to a very remote period the accomplishment of the object we have in view. I think it is very desirable to carry that out, both in regard to economy and in regard to discipline. I placed in the hands of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) a few weeks ago, a statement of what these perquisites were estimated to be worth. Taking up the vote for the Kingston penitentiary, the warden has been in the receipt of a salary of $2,600. It is proposed to increase his salary to $3,000, but the additional $400 is a commutation of the perquisites he now receives, which consist of house, fuel, light, and keep of horse and cow. We propose to continue the use of the house on the principle I mentioned this afternoon, but for the rest of the perquisites we propose to make a commutation of $400. I may say, for the further information of the committee, that the officers who have been accustomed to receive these perquisites have rendered a statement of what, in their estimation, their perquisites were worth, and some years ago the practice existed of allowing an officer to base his superannuation allowance, not merely on his salary, but also on his house rent and other perquisites; and it may be owing to a supposition on the part of those officers that the enhancement of the value of these would increase their superannuation allowance that the sums which I will state to the committee have been estimated by them. The estimate of the warden at Kingston of his perquisites is $1,200 a year. That includes his house rent. We propose to continue to him his house, and to allow him $400 as a commutation of his other perquisites. Then, the deputy warden has been estimated at $1,400. I propose to allow him $100 in consideration of cutting off his fuel and light. He has had no horse or cow. There is also an increase estimated for in the allowance to the accountant. He receives at present the maximum salary which can be paid to an accountant. He has been a long time in the service of the institution. He is said to be an exceedingly valuable officer, and very diligent in the performance of his duties; and, inasmuch as it is not proposed in the Bill which I introduced to-day to give him any augmentation of his salary, I thought it only just, considering his long service and the value he is said to be to the institution, to propose an amount of $100 additional salary to him as an exceptional allowance, which is not to be permanent for the office. I think the salary of $1,000 in the Bill introduced to-day ought to be sufficient as a maximum salary for an accountant, and this increase is only asked for on account of long service and efficiency. There is also an increase for the engineer, but it is not an increase of the engineer's salary. The engineer has heretofore received two allowances, the regular salary voted in the estimate for him as engineer, $750, and $550 which has been paid to him by the Minister of Public Works as an officer of his Department, because the engineer, as well as some of the other officers of the penitentiaries, who are immediately connected with the public works, is appointed on the nomination of the Minister of Public Works. It has been considered desirable, and I think the committee will agree with me that it is desirable, that the salary should be combined in the vote, and that any officer of the penitentiaries should hereafter receive only one salary, which would appear in the estimate for the penitentiaries. The same remark explains the increase in the salary of the chief trade instructor. There is likewise an increase of $1,500 in the allowance for keepers. Representations have been made of a very emphatic character, that an increase in the staff of keepers and guards is absolutely necessary. The warden represents that this is to some extent owing to the fact that heretofore between eighty and ninety of the prisoners have been employed at lock-making, and of course prisoners who are employed in indoor work can be guarded with a less force than when they are engaged in outdoor work. He represents that, in view of the very large prison population, and it being necessary to find employment for them out of doors, he cannot guard them with the present force. In fact he has asked for a considerably larger increase in the force than I have decided to give him. It is proposed to appoint three additional keepers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does the hon. gentleman propose to employ these convicts? As I understand, the lock-making is discontinued. What are the convicts now employed about? To the best of my recollection only about one hundred or so can find employment on the farm.

Mr. THOMPSON. I had a report a few weeks ago from the warden in reply to a statement which appeared in the public press as to the non-employment of prisoners. I am not now in a position to make a statement as to how they are being employed, but the warden assured me that every man was usefully employed in connection with the prison. He stated then—and that was at the beginning of the season—that he could find employment for them on the farm, and that up to that time they had been employed. There are two or three propositions under consideration with regard to the useful employment of convicts which may not interfere with any industry which exists in Canada now. I cannot mention them now with any confidence, but I may say that one of them is mat-making, at which industry convicts are very largely employed in the United Kingdom, and some appliances are being imported now in order to see whether an industry of that kind can be set on foot in our penitentiaries without causing any improper competition without outside labor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I saw a report in the public press that it was under the consideration of the Government to shorten the sentences of a considerable number of these prisoners, if not the great majority of them, in this jubilee year. I should like to know if that report has any foundation in fact.

Mr. THOMPSON. The statement has no foundation in fact. I have endeavored to give the best consideration possible to any representations which have been made on behalf of prisoners, for commutation of sentences, but in my opinion it is not proper that any general consideration should be given to the fact that this is the jubilee year in dealing with the criminal class.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not at all disposed to question the reasonableness of the hon. gentleman's decision myself, but I desired to know what decision the Government had arrived at on the matter. However, I may take the opportunity of calling his attention, and also the attention of the House, to this fact, which, I presume, has come under the notice of a considerable number of members besides myself. There does appear to be an enormous inequality in the sentences inflicted by the different judges for precisely similar offences committed, as far as it is possible to learn, under precisely similar circumstances. Has that point been brought under the attention of the Government? and does the Minister of Justice think that it is a matter which should be taken into consideration? Of course, we all know that in certain phases there is a very wide range, properly, in the punishment inflicted; but I speak of the difference in the sentences inflicted by different judges. One judge would give a sentence of 14 years—I have known such cases, not unfrequently—where another judge will be content with five or even three years; and it does appear to me that this extreme inequality must have a more or less mischievous effect upon the minds of the public at large, or on the minds of the prisoners, which is a matter not altogether to be lost sight of.

Mr. THOMPSON. The matter does occasionally come up, and it is generally brought to our notice by philanthropic persons who are surprised at the inequality of the sentences which are reported in the press. Whenever such matters are brought to my notice I take some care to investigate the causes, and enquire from the judges imposing the sentences as to the reason for the severity exercised, or the inequality, as compared with other convictions occurring at about the same time. It generally transpires that circumstances have entered into the consideration of the judge imposing the sentence, which were not understood by the persons reporting it to the press. Occasionally there are circumstances connected with the case which give it an aggravated character, or mitigate the criminality, but occasionally there are circumstances outside of the record which the judge has to consider, as, for instance, the record of the criminal, his previous convictions, the hopelessness of a light penalty making a due impression on him; and in many cases it has been found that sentences somewhat severe, have been called for by the state of criminality of that particular kind, and its prevalence in a particular district; and occasionally in cases of that kind, the judges have intimated that the imposition of a heavy sentence has had a beneficial effect in deterring crime, and they have recommended that the sentence be subsequently reduced. As far as possible all these cases are investigated, and I recognise it to be my duty to investigate them when they are brought to my notice. I may mention in this connection that there exists not only this apparent inequality in the sentences imposed by the same judges, but there is a marked inequality between the sentences imposed in the various Provinces. In the Maritime Provinces, for example, it is nothing unusual to see crime punished with nearly double the severity that is employed in Ontario and Quebec. On that subject I took occasion to mention to some of the judges in the Maritime Provinces the practice of their colleagues on the bench in the larger Provinces, and intimated that they might be punishing crime with greater severity. However it would be rash in me to state that instances have come to my knowledge that will justify me in saying that undue punishment is in any case awarded. I think the inequality which the hon. member refers to, has been repeatedly noticed in Great Britain, and investigation is very commonly made by the Home Secretary on complaints of that kind, whether made in the press or in Parliament, and it is almost always found that circumstances such as I have mentioned—the state of the crime in the neighborhood, the prevalence of that particular crime, the bad record of the prisoner, or aggravated circumstances connected with the case, and which did not appear in the press at all—have occasioned the inequality which was somewhat startling.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a delicate subject, and I do not press it, although I suspect there is one consideration which the hon. gentleman, properly, perhaps, did not allude to, and that is the varying temperament on the part of the trying judge. That has a good deal, in my poor opinion, to do with the different sentences. As I understand the Minister of Justice, he does not propose to employ in future any of these convicts in indoor work except such work as may be considered to be domestic.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That would leave to the warden a large number of convicts to find employment for. The hon. gentleman intimated just now that there was some scheme under consideration; I would like to enquire of him whether he has considered a scheme of employing convicts, as they have been employed in other cases, in the construction of some sort of public work in the vicinity of the penitentiary. I am not speaking in the interests of the good city of Kingston, I am speaking in the interests of the convicts for whom it is very desirable to find employment, and it has occurred to me that they might be usefully employed in the vicinity of the penitentiary in some work which could otherwise be undertaken, but on which, if you have plenty of convict labor at your disposal, and also quarries and similar sources of material available, you might usefully employ them.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is one of the projects that has been under consideration. A delegation came from the city of Kingston about a month ago to press for the employment of convict labor for the construction of a public work in that city, but engagements connected with the Session have prevented me from laying the matter before my colleagues.

St. Vincent de Paul$82,339 51

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As the report connected with this institution has not yet appeared, I would suggest that this item be allowed to stand. It is impossible to discuss St. Vincent de Paul intelligently without the information which was asked for and which was promised.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Could not that be done upon concurrence? The same latitude will be allowed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is inconvenient to take up an item of that kind now. The hon. gentleman is, perhaps, not aware, having been absent from the country, that there were grave irregularities connected with the administration of St. Vincent de Paul, and they would be discussed in a more or less imperfect manner if the item goes on now.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am sorry those papers have not been brought down. They were put in the printers' hands before the opening of the Session, and I expect them in a day or two.

Mr. LAURIER. I noticed that in another House some papers connected with this institution have been asked for and brought down; could we not have the same papers brought before this House, in order to enable us more intelligently to discuss this item?

Mr. THOMPSON. There can be no objection to having such papers laid on the Table. I may say, however, that the papers laid before the other House were composed mainly of an abstract of papers which will be submitted in full to this House. I did not lay the abstract on the Table, because I expected the blue-book, containing the information in full, would have been ready. I expect, nevertheless, that the day after to-morrow the book will be ready.

Dorchester Penitentiary$45,750

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is no alteration of any moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No; the amounts are decreases.

Manitoba Penitentiary$48,021

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is a decrease.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see there is a considerable increase in the salaries.

Mr. THOMPSON. The warden has been voted heretofore $3,000. He has received house, fuel, light and rations. We propose to commute fuel, light and rations for $100. The deputy warden has received $900, and we propose to commute his fuel and light for $100. The accountant and storekeeper received $1,000; $100 is allowed as commutation for fuel and light. The steward has received as perquisites fuel and light, and we allow $50 as commutation. To the engineer who has been receiving fuel and light we also allow $50, and to the hospital overseer the same amount. All the officers in fact have been allowed fuel and light; and it is on account of this fact that the cost of fuel for this penitentiary has been so large, exceeding that of any similar institution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Why is it proposed to allow the guards, who already receive $600, $650, which is largely in excess of the sum allowed at other penitentiaries.

Mr. THOMPSON. Because up to the present time they have been receiving fuel and light.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The arrangement made with respect to the payment of salaries, &c., was made at a time when the cost of living was very much higher than it is today, and when there was some ground for giving the officers larger sums than were paid in the other Provinces. I desire to ask whether any complaint has been made to the Government in regard to Mr. Bedson by Charles Bremner, or by anyone in his behalf, in connection with the North-West troubles. Charles Bremner was a half-breed who was in the habit of trading with the Indians, and who had accumulated considerable property. He was invited, I think, at the time when Poundmaker had taken up arms against the Government, to come within the protection of the forces stationed at Battleford. He did not consider he was in danger. He had been in the habit of trading with the Indians for many years; and when the rebellion broke out, I think, he was made prisoner by Poundmaker's band and taken to the place where was fought the battle of Cut Knife Creek. He made his escape, and as he was suspected of having been in sympathy with the Indians, he was sent as a prisoner to Regina, and when the time for his trial arrived nothing was found against him and he was discharged. I have said he had been for many years a trader with the Indians. He had a considerable quantity of furs on hand, and these were taken possession of by some members of the volunteer force. I thought I had the names of the parties here who gave me this information, but I find I have not. I was told that the furs were divided between Mr. Bedson, Mr. Hayter Reed and the General who was in command. The party who gave me the information said there was no doubt whatever with respect to it, and that he was ready to give evidence before a committee of the House of Commons whenever called upon. I should very much like to know whether any complaint was ever made by Charles Bremner, or on his behalf, to the Minister of Militia or to the Minister of Justice against the General, the warden of the penitentiary or Mr. Hayter Reed, and whether any compensation has been given to Charles Bremner. I understand that when Bremner was taken and sent to the gaol, his furs were worth about $7,000, and when he returned he was penniless, and that those who ought to have extended to him their protection, appropriated his property. My information is so direct, so circumstantial, that I have had in my own mind no doubt whatever with respect to the accuracy of that information, and I should like to know very much what redress has been given, and whether any enquiry has taken place. For it seems to me that a party who could be guilty of such a proceeding is not one worthy of being retained in the public service. I have already given the names of the parties; Mr. Hayter Reed, Mr. Bedson and General Middleton.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In so far as the charges which have been made by the hon. gentleman are concerned, I can only speak from the information which has come to my Department. I have never heard any complaints made against General Middleton in the case mentioned or in any other case connected with his proceedings in the North-West, and I can state, moreover, to the hon. gentleman that if during those troublesome times there had been any grounds for a charge being made against them, no doubt the Department would have heard from the parties interested. It has never been brought under the attention of the Department; we have never heard anything so far as the administration of my Department is concerned which could in any way commit the General to an act such as that mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

An hon. MEMBER. Then there is not a word of truth in it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Quite so.

Mr. THOMPSON. So far as I am concerned I never heard of the complaint before.

Mr. DAVIES. The Minister of Militia did not say there was not one word of truth in it. What he did say was that nothing of the kind had been brought to his knowledge as the head of the Department.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I know nothing about it, and consequently cannot say anything as to the truth of it.

British Columbia Penitentiary $45,771

Mr. ELLIS. Can the Minister of Justice give any explanation as to why the penitentiaries in small Provinces like Manitoba and British Columbia cost so much compared with Dorchester penitentiary. Is crime so rampant in those western Provinces?

Mr. THOMPSON. In the first place, the Dorchester penitentiary is very convenient of access. It is situated in a village, and has railroad communication near by. The penitentiaries at both of the other places are remote, and the one in Manitoba is, I think, in a very inconvenient place. But, as I explained before, the increase is principally due to the fact that we have been in the habit heretofore of making allowances to the officers which we did not make in the other Provinces. For instance, in the case of fuel, the allowance began at a time when fuel was very scarce and high in price, and it was continued until the present time. That is another reason why a larger per capita cost appears in the management of Manitoba as compared with Dorchester and other prisons. Another circumstance likewise is the fact that we are obliged to pay higher salaries for these inferior officers than we can get men for in the older Provinces. We can get, of course, a warden or a deputy warden or accountant, or any of the superior officers to whom pretty good salaries are paid, but we find it practically very difficult indeed to get efficient persons in Manitoba and British Columbia as guards and other officers of that kind for the sums that we can get them for in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Salaries and contingent expenses of Senate, $59,488

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is an increase here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It arises from an increase of $2,000 to the Senate Debates, by a resolution of the Senate in the Session of 1885, and a few statutory increases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does anybody ever read the Senate Debates? I know nobody ever listens to them.

Salaries, House of Commons, as per Clerk's estimate.....$63,750

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I see there is a decrease here.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The salary of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and contingencies are transferred to the Privy Council.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is quite correct, but the Clerk of the Crown does not come under the salaries of the House of Commons; he used to be a separate item by himself. I see there is a decrease in the chief clerk.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The statutory increases are $800, and the changes made and the superannuations make up the difference.

Mr. JONES. Is this reduction made by the dismissal of Mr. Wade?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, his place has been filled.

Mr. JONES. Was there any reason for Mr. Wade's dismissal?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is Mr. Wade of Digby. I am sorry to say that he so far forgot the position he occupied as to go out and take a prominent part in holding public meetings and denouncing the Government of the day. I think there is no gentleman in this House, on either side, who will say that any public officer holding any office under the Government or Parliament should adopt such a course, or that, if he does adopt it, that he should be retained in the public service, if we are to carry on public affairs in the way in which I am sure hon. gentlemen on both sides would like to see them carried on. There is no doubt that public officers, especially under the ballot, have a perfect right to go to the polls and record their vote for or against any person, as they may please, or as they may consider it their duty, but I do not believe any gentleman in the House will sustain any public officer in going out and taking an offensive course in reference to the Government of the day, whoever may be in power. There is undoubted evidence that Mr. Wade took that course, and that he went to the furthest extreme to which any person could go, and under the circumstances the Speaker was asked to supersede him.

Mr. JONES. I think the hon. gentleman has been misinformed as to the extent of Mr. Wade's action during the election, so far as my information goes. However, be that as it may, I am disposed to agree very much with what the hon. gentleman has said with regard to the conduct of public servants in this respect. But I think that in order to be consistent in the view which the hon. gentleman has pronounced, he should have exercised the same discretion in other matters. The hon. gentleman must be aware that there is hardly a railway official in Nova Scotia but has been an active, open, violent partisan of the Conservative party.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). That is a different thing.

Mr. JONES. I suppose it is a different thing, because it applies to hon. gentlemen opposite and they were the Government of the day. I have always laid down the doctrines that a public employé, as long as he had the right to vote, should exercise his franchise in a quiet inoffensive manner, but the civil servants in Nova Scotia exercised their franchise in the same way as Mr. Wade is said to have done at Digby, and so far from their having received a warning from the Finance Minister, who has Nova Scotia under his particular charge, one of the Customs employés at Halifax who was sent down there to take an active part in a political campaign against the Local Government of Nova Scotia, has been rewarded by having his pay raised from $750 or $800 to $1,250, without any change in his position. Now, I submit if the hon. gentleman takes so exalted a view of the public service, and I may say that I am very much disposed to acquiesce in it, his conduct has not been consistent in summarily dismissing Mr. Wade, the son of an old member of this House, who was long a supporter of the hon. gentleman himself. And I must say I think it was a very ungracious act on the part of the hon. gentleman to permit the dismissal of Mr. Wade on the report of his having taken a part against his party in the recent election. If he lays down the principle that officials can only interfere on one side, we know what that would lead to in a short time. But I hope the hon. gentleman intends to take a broader view than that. I say that the officers of the public service must exercise their franchise inoffensively. If that view were to prevail, the hon. gentleman would have to dismiss every official connected with the Intercolonial Railway in New Brunswick; he would have to dismiss nine-tenths of the officials in the post office and every other public office in Halifax, and I think the hon. gentleman is hardly disposed to go that far. I must express my regret that the hon. gentleman should have been led to adopt so extreme a course towards the son of an old supporter, who I think only expressed his own political opinions, as everyone has the right to do, and not in the offensive manner that the hon. gentleman has been informed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman mistakes what I have said if he supposes that I took the ground that a public official could not give an active and open support to the Government of the day. I hold that, especially under the Ballot Act, every public official is entitled to go to the polls and record his vote for whomsoever he pleases, and that no Government would be justified in interfering with an officer, however high or low his position, even if they knew that he had voted against a Minister. But I hold, at the same time, that a public officer has a perfect right to take an active and open part in support of the Government of the day. I may say that when the party now in power went to the elections in 1878, it was brought to our notice that all over the country public officers were taking the most open, violent and in many cases insulting course towards ourselves who were then in Opposition. Yet when we came into power we refused to take any notice of a single case or to disturb a single officer on that ground; because we said it was an entirely different thing for these gentlemen to actively support the Government under whom they were serving from what it would be to oppose the Government. I draw a very marked distinction in that respect, no matter what party is in power. If any public official comes out and publicly denounces the Government which employs him, I regard that as an act of insubordination, which I think ought to be followed by his dismissal from office. It was an extremely painful thing for me to concur in the dismissal of Mr. Wade, who was placed here at my own request, and whose promotion and advancement in his position I had advised. It was extremely painful for me to know that he took a course which made it impossible for me to favor his retention in office, and he was dismissed. That is the practice that prevails in England as well as in this country, whichever party is in power. I may say that one of the colleagues of hon. gentlemen opposite so understood this matter, for I happen to hold in my hand a letter sent by the Minister of Militia, a predecessor of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) in that office, to a subordinate officer, which is as follows:—

“ DEAR SIR,—I must inform you that the Government expects every man it employs to vote for its supporters. This being the case, I wish you to proceed to the Sydney mines and poll your vote for Mr. W. L. McKay.

“ Yours, &c.,

“ WILLIAM ROSS,

“ Minister of Militia.”

That was the policy propounded by hon. gentlemen opposite when they were in power. I would not go so far as that.

Mr. JONES. If my memory serves me rightly, I think that letter was proved to be a forgery.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Not that; the letter of Mr. Vail.

Mr. JONES. I am speaking from memory, but I think that was a subject of discussion in the House subsequent to the date mentioned, and Mr. Ross denounced it as a forgery, saying that he had never written it at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think not. At all events, I think the principle I have laid down has been the recognised policy of all parties in this country.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman is greatly mistaken as to the facts regarding the employés of the Intercolonial Railway. I know places where the employés numbered 100, but where there were not fourteen votes out of the 100 given to our candidates. I know great exertions were made; and the members of the Opposition did without doubt get a majority of the Intercolonial Railway employés to vote for them. These gentlemen did not hesitate to put forward their claims on these men. Here is a letter sent out by one of the supporters of hon. gentlemen opposite, and circulated amongst the Intercolonial Railway employés:

“ We have learned that you have the intention to vote for the ministerial candidate, in your county, on the 22nd inst.

“ We believe it our duty to give you notice, kindly, and to put you on your guard against such a determination, because we are informed that the future Blake Government will put outside the door all employés who have been hostile to it.

“ Thus, if you will not vote for the candidate of the Opposition, and if you are forced to vote, there is still a means of saving your position without compromising yourself, that is, in making a cross opposite to the name of each candidate.

“ In this manner you will place yourself outside of all suspicion on the part of your chiefs, and you will not be exposed to lose your place, for, be well assured, the Government is going to fall.”

Mr. DAVIES. Who is that from?

Mr. POPE. It is a circular that was sent all around amongst the employés.

Mr. DAVIES. Who is it signed by?

Mr. POPE. It is not signed; but it is one of the means hon. gentlemen took to secure the votes of the Intercolonial Railway employés, and they did secure a pretty large proportion of them. I think my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Jones) had something to do in convincing the employés that they were going to be placed under the authority of hon. gentlemen opposite in a short time—that they were going to be their masters. I think he had a good deal to do with it. Now, the gentleman who, I believe, wrote this letter was a former member of Parliament, and is at present a man that occupies a prominent position. This letter was circulated among all the employés.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman refers to the Intercolonial Railway again. I will give him an illustration. In 1878, after the elections took place, I left for Ottawa to consult with my colleagues with reference to our retirement after the verdict of the country had been pronounced against us. The hon. member for Cumberland, now Finance Minister, was about going to Halifax, and orders came from the head of the Department at Moncton to the Department at Halifax—this was before the Government of which I was a member had resigned—to make preparations to receive the conquering hero from Cumberland. He was accompanied by other members from the adjacent counties, and the Intercolonial Railway Department was decorated and illuminated by the employés, who were holding office under the Administration of which I was a member. There never was a more indecent—and I think that expression is parliamentary as applied to such conduct as that—a more improper exhibition of political feeling on the part of men who had been left in their places by the Government of which I was a member, although they were Tories and Conservatives appointed by the previous Administration—there never was a more ungrateful exhibition made by the public service of the country than the Intercolonial Railway employés made on that occasion; and from that moment down to the present hour there has been a most direct open hostility on the part of every one connected with that department, and the public departments in Halifax as well, to the Liberal party. I am sorry the hon. the Minister of Finance has taken the ground he has. I have always taken the ground that an elector, so long as he has a right to vote at all, should exercise his vote freely, but he has no right to exercise it offensively against either one party or the other, because he is the servant, not of the public, but of the country who pays him; and if the doctrine which the Minister of Finance has laid down to-night comes to be understood, there will be an agitation excited to place the civil servants in a position in which they cannot be tempted to act for one party or the other. The hon. gentleman should remember that one-half, perhaps more, of the sheriffs in Nova Scotia to-day are active political partisans against the Local Administration, and will the hon. gentleman point any one case in which the Nova Scotia Government, for that reason, displaced one of these officials? I remember a scene which took place in the county of Shelburne, the other day, during an election contest there, when one of the candidates, Mr. Mackay, was so publicly insulted by the sheriff that it almost led to a breach of the peace. Yet the Local Administration did not dismiss that man, although his conduct was outrageous. I am sorry, therefore, the Minister of Finance has been led into an act, which, in his calmer moments, he will regret.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). My hon. friend from Halifax seems to think that hon. gentlemen in this House have the very short memories which he, in the early part of the Session, showed he possesses. I am amazed at the boldness of the hon. gentleman in repeating the statement he has made as the enunciation of his ideas and opinions in reference to the rights of civil servants, whether employes on the Intercolonial Railway or in any other department, to exercise their franchises. He repeats the statement, which I confuted, not long ago, by reading a report of his own speech, when he spoke with some reason to induce those who heard him to believe he would carry out the threat he then made. He spoke at that time, of course, with some effect as the coadjutor of the then Minister of Militia, Mr. Ross, whose letter was read here to-night.

Mr. JONES. It was not his letter at all.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). The hon. gentleman pretended that was a forgery, but it was curious that the same views expressed in that letter were expressed by the hon. gentleman himself in the same year. That letter was dated February, 1874; and, strange enough, similar sentiments were expressed by the hon. gentleman in this House on 9th January, 1874. I have read his language already in the House, and I will read it again, as the hon. member for Halifax seems to have forgotten it, when he makes the statement that he had always considered members of the Civil Service should be free to exercise the franchise as they thought proper. He said:

"So long as they served the State they were protected in their offices, but if they disregarded that practice and took a part against the Government, whose subordinates they were, they took their offices in their hands, and would stand or fall with the party."

Therefore, this language, most insulting according to the hon. gentleman's views of to-night, is the language he then used in his own county in addressing his electors. The hon. gentleman will have to explain how it is comes that such a change has come over the spirit of his dream. The change, probably, is due to the fact that the hon. gentleman speaks now as a member of the Opposition, while then he spoke as a member supporting the Government. I think it is most unfair on the part of the hon. gentleman to fling at the Civil Service of Nova Scotia the wholesale charges he has cast at them to-night, especially at the hard working branch of the Government service, namely, the Intercolonial Railway. The charges he has made he has substantiated in no shape or form. Those men employed on the Intercolonial Railway are most efficient men, who, when they do leave the Intercolonial Railway, command special positions on private railway companies, both in Canada and the United States, and the hon. gentleman has no evidence to prove his wholesale charges. He himself would not, on reflection, say that the employes on the Intercolonial Railway acted in a violent manner in that election. All that can be said is that they took an active part so far as discussing the questions of the day were concerned, that they took an active part so far as being interested and concerned in the result of that political election, in which they had a right to poll their votes. I saw as much of the Intercolonial Railroad employes as the hon. gentleman opposite. To a large extent that road runs through the county of Pictou, and I saw no violence on their part. They pursued their ordinary occupation, they performed their duties properly and efficiently, and they were most orderly. In fact there were no electors during that contest who conducted themselves with more decorum than the employes of the Intercolonial Railway; and I say it is unworthy of the hon. gentleman, without being able to bring a specific charge against some individual, such as the charge which has been brought to-night, and which is pertinent to the discussion, without being able to bring such a charge against any individual in the Intercolonial Railway service, and to take the responsibility and to follow up the charge, to state in this general manner that the Intercolonial Railway employes conducted themselves in a violent, and partisan, and offensive manner during the elections. Since the hon. gentleman makes that charge, I deny it, and I am in just as good a position as he is to know. I say they conducted themselves properly, and considering the importance of the issue in which they were as much interested as the hon. gentleman himself, I think the very fact that they did perform their duties efficiently at the same time is much to their credit. The real reason why the hon. gentleman is excited and annoyed, is that these men, having tasted and known what it was to be under a Reform Government, were most excited and fearful lest they should be placed in that position again. They had had five years of it; they had existed during that five years, but I dare say they doubted if they could pull through another five years, or if that Province, in which they had as much at stake as any other electors, could pull through. I know of my own knowledge men in the Intercolonial Railway service, some of whom—I do not believe the majority—voted against the Government. As far as the county of Pictou goes, I know the majority did not, because they felt it was to their interest, or to the interest of the county, or of the Province, that the present Government should not be upset; but I do know men who are enjoying their positions still who not only voted, but worked against the return of my colleague and myself. I believe that was the case in other parts of the line, but no doubt they considered the very offensive language which was used by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) in the previous election, and I have no doubt that that language induced many of them to take a stronger part with the Government of the day than they intended to take previously to that. I have no doubt that the spirit in which the hon. gentleman acted towards them did not give them a pleasing assurance of how the service would be conducted, or how they as employes would be treated if that hon. gentleman were by any accident returned to power or were to become of any political importance. I do not think the House is interested in the hon. gentleman dragging it continually down to the Province of Nova Scotia to listen to these wholesale and reckless charges against the electors of the Province or branches of them. I do not think it is pertinent to the question here. The hon. gentleman was quite in order and was treating the House fairly in dealing with the specific matter which he brought up. It was a matter which we could discuss satisfactorily, but I do not think the attempt he is continually making of going back to the old fight in Nova Scotia, and making charges against the men who could not support him in this hap-hazard way will commend itself to the approval of the House.

Mr. JONES. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for one thing, and that is for his reference to my speech in 1874. Of course, I should feel deeply grateful to him for the lesson he has endeavored to teach me as to the propriety of discussing any matter in this House. Any member who has been as long as I have been in the House should, of course, be willing to receive a lesson from a young gentleman of his age and experience, so I will take it in the way he has intended to give it. But the hon. gentleman has quoted my speech, which he quoted once before, as having been delivered in 1874. Now, that speech bears out exactly and correctly the sentiments I uttered during the late election in Halifax, and the sentiments which I have delivered here to-night. I said, according to the hon. gentleman's quotation, and I presume he is correct, that, "as long as they served the State they were protected in their offices, but, if they disregarded that principle and took part against the Government whose subordinates they were." What did I say to-night? I accorded them the perfect right, as long as they had a vote, of exercising the franchise freely, but I said that, when they went and worked openly against the Government or the Opposition, one side or the other, they were going outside of their duty and their position, because they were not the servants of the Government of the day but of the country, and were bound to pay that deference and respect to the public sentiment of the country, whose servants they were. The hon. gentleman says he saw no violence in Pictou among the railway people. I have not accused them of violence at all. The hon. gentleman seems to work himself up into a fit of excitement, and attributes to me what I never uttered. I said they were political partisans, placed there by the Government which he supports. No doubt he found them very convenient. He says he was conversing with them. The hon. gentleman knows full well that he and the Minister of Finance and the Postmaster General had the full run of the Intercolonial Railway, and were bringing up men from all parts of the Province to vote in that election. Men were brought from Spring Hill over the Intercolonial Railway to vote for the hon. member for Pictou. And who paid? Does anyone suppose that these men came of their own accord? I know of my own knowledge that railway passes were distributed to people in Halifax to go and vote for the hon. member in Pictou. I know a man in my own employ who had a railway pass sent down from Pictou to go and vote for the hon. gentleman, but he preferred to remain in Halifax and voted there. Ten days' after the election was over he came to me and said: I have a railway pass which was sent down to me to go and vote for Mr. Tupper in Pictou, and, as I have some friends in Pictou, and it does not cost me anything, I think I will go up there; and he went up.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I deny that absolutely.

Mr. JONES. I will give the hon. gentleman his name.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). If you give me twenty names, I will deny it.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman cannot deny it.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I deny that I sent any such pass.

Mr. JONES. It was sent by the hon. gentleman or by his friends.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). The hon. gentleman said that I sent these passes. I deny that absolutely.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentlemen and his friends sent these papers all over the country, with new books and passes, and placed them in the hands of private individuals. There are passes in existence to-day in Truro and Pictou written out by some large firms there supporting the present Administration, and not by the Railway Department at all. These passes were distributed and these papers were sent down to these men in Halifax to induce them to vote for the hon. gentleman. The man I refer to remained in Halifax and voted there, and then went up and made a visit to his friends, after the election was over, at the country's expense. That is what I denounce. I say these gentlemen made use of that railway for bringing men up and down the line, from one port to another, with free passes, day after day and week after week, and every man who was required to go, in the interests of the party, from one county to another to vote for gentlemen supporting the Government, were given free passes over the Intercolonial Railway. That is only one instance which I brought to the notice of hon. gentlemen to-night. No doubt they found these men very complacent; they were put there by the Government and they will remain there. I did not expect that they were going to put good Liberals there at all, but what I did expect, and do expect still, is that these men will be allowed to exercise their right of franchise freely and uninfluenced by the Government. If they vote for the Government, I do not object, but I contend that it is not in the interest of the public service in this country that the civil servants and railway employes should be identified so strongly with one political party or the other. That is the ground which I took in the speech the hon. gentleman has referred to; that is the ground which I took during the late election in Halifax, and that is the ground I take to-night.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). As the hon. gentleman has spoken three or four times, I may, perhaps, be allowed to trespass a little further upon the attention of the House. My youth seems to distress the hon. gentleman, since he has twice alluded to it upon this and another occasion. I think in respect to age, I have a slight advantage over the hon. gentleman, and I only hope that when I reach that advanced age in which the hon. gentleman seems to revel, that I will remember better than he does the speeches I make before coming to the House, so as not to contradict myself when I reach the House. I am glad that though the hon. gentleman is an old member, he has seen the errors of his ways in the short discussion that has taken place to-night. He has receded entirely from the position he took in the first place, and he has retreated in considerable disorder. Under cover of criticising the dismissal of Mr. Wade in the county of Digby, he made a charge against the Intercolonial Railway employes and the civil servants generally. He winds up to-night by saying that all he denounced was giving passes to people in the city of Halifax, Springhill and elsewhere, which enabled them to go over the railway and vote in the election. Well, Sir that was not the position the hon. gentleman took in the first place. That is the position that he takes now, and that is the way he endeavors to explain away the language that he used in the beginning of the discussion. He has started an entirely new issue and pretends the only denunciation he delivered was against the granting of these passes. That subject was not before the House until the hon. gentleman's last speech. He began an unfair attack against the civil servants in Nova Scotia and the employes on the Intercolonial Railway. But I am glad to see that after reminding him of certain speeches he delivered in that Province on this question, and calling upon him to give a specific instance in which any man on the Intercolonial Railway or any civil servant has conducted himself improperly—I am glad to see that he recognises that discretion is the better part of valor and he has retreated. He says that all he said in 1874 is what he states now, namely, that these men in the Civil Service are servants not of the Government, but of the country. I will call his attention to the language that he used in 1874. He said then that these men were “the subordinates of the Government”; and his organ, the Morning Chronicle, of Halifax, the next morning, in printing his speech said, in alluding to those officials:

“They are certainly not free to vote against Mr. Jones or Mr. Power, and if any one of them votes, canvasses, or in any way opposes the Government of which he is the subordinate”——

The language of the hon. gentleman himself—

“he will do so at his peril. This is explicit enough.”

According to this language of the hon. gentleman and his organ at that time, these men were not servants of the country but they were the subordinates of the Government, and were threatened to vote for the Government candidate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think, if the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) wishes to recommend himself to this House, he will do well to consider the propriety of speaking a good deal less and thinking a good deal more, for the future.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). Will the hon. gentleman mind following that road himself?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not disposed to enter into a discussion as to what was done on the Intercolonial Railway; that will come on with propriety a little later. I was sorry to hear the Minister of Finance lay down one proposition—I hope I did not understand him distinctly. He stated that, in his opinion, it was right to dismiss a Government employé who actively opposed the Government of the day—in which I concur. I have done it myself, and I would do it again, if I were called upon, I can assure the hon. gentleman of that. I know he will keep his word and he knows I will keep mine. But I think the hon. gentleman has done a dangerous thing for a person in his position when he laid down the doctrine, if I understood him correctly, that the members of the Civil Service throughout the country were justified in actively supporting the Government of the day. Now, that is a very dangerous doctrine. Most undoubtedly if that doctrine is affirmed, coolly and deliberately, by him and other persons in his position, we will, under one form or another, have the American system introduced here, and a change of Government will be the signal for the dismissal of a very large number of officials who have actively interfered in the elections. I myself should deplore that. I have always regarded it as a great blot on the American system that members of the Civil Service of that country were taught and trained to regard themselves as members of a particular party and not servants of the State. I have never hesitated to express my opinion that the members of the Civil Service, as a whole, would be better off if they had no votes. That is my individual opinion, but I am aware that on that opinion there is a great deal of room for discussion pro and con. But I do not think it is a wise thing for an hon. gentleman occupying his position to virtually indicate to the civil servants of this country that the Government expect them to be their active political supporters, and that construction will undoubtedly be put on the words he has used to-night. If he does that, I repeat that he may regret the assertion, because sooner or later, if they or any considerable number of them act upon that opinion, they will find they took their lives in their hands when they attempted to support actively the Government of the day. If the hon. gentleman be correct as to what he said touching the conduct of certain officials in 1878, against the party with which he was then in concert, all I can say is that to the best of my knowledge my friend Mr. Mackenzie invariably stated to all civil servants with whom he came in contact when he was Premier, that he did not expect them to take part in elections on behalf of the Government, and I know myself that when I was a Minister of the Crown I constantly advised civil servants not to interfere on the ground I have stated to the House to-night. I should hope that the hon. gentleman would, on consideration, modify the statement he has made, the outcome of which might be of a very serious consequence. We cannot tell what may occur in a very few years. Hon. gentleman opposite appear to be safely seated now, but I have seen much stronger governments reduced to a very great extremity in a very short time, and we may see it again.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I said I repeat, that it was the recognised policy of all parties to permit the public officials to support the Government. I have shown the hon. gentleman that his own colleagues actually place that statement over their own official signatures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will permit me a word. I have in my recollection also that letter of Mr. Ross, to which he has referred, and I think he will find—we had no Hansard, unfortunately, in 1874—if he refers to the journals of the day that Mr. Ross entirely disputed the correctness of the letter read.

Mr. JONES. It was a forgery. I recollect it now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will not undertake to speak as to the authenticity of the letter further than that it was placed in my hands, and I supposed it to be authoritative. I do not remember it being established as a forgery. I think, however, the fact of so prominent and leading a supporter, the leader of the hon. gentleman's party in Nova Scotia, who sits behind him, using language, and it could hardly be stronger than he used on that occasion in 1874—a gentleman who afterwards became his own colleague—in which he distinctly stated that persons who opposed the Government, not persons who took an active part in elections, took their political lives in their hands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman explained that he never objected to their voting.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am now speaking of their opposition to the Government. That was the principle the hon. gentleman laid down; he laid it down as clearly and as distinctly as it was possible to lay down any proposition. The organs of the party of hon. gentlemen opposite in New Scotia, Ontario and everywhere laid down the same principle, and that was that the crime was not in taking part in elections but in taking part against the Government; the only time when they took office in their hands was when they took part against the Government. I quite agree that it is most desirable that civil servants should abstain from taking an active part in elections for or against the Government. While I think they run a chance of dismissal if they take part against the Government, I do not think it is desirable that they should take an active and open part in favor of the Government, but I draw the line very strongly as to it being an act of subordination or insubordination in supporting the Government of the day and giving it a violent opposition.

Mr. DAVIES. I was very glad to hear the qualifying remarks which the Finance Minister has given to his first speech. As I understood his first speech, it was an open invitation to members of the Civil Service to take an active and violent part if they choose against the Opposition of the day, and in doing so they could act with perfect impunity, whereas if any civil servants acted openly against the Government their conduct would be met with dismissal.

While I heard such a declaration made by such a prominent Minister with regret, I heard his qualification with some degree of pleasure. But I think this is so important a question that a word or two might be said with respect to active and offensive interference against the Opposition. I must say, speaking as a humble member of the Opposition, that if the whirligig of time brought about political revenge to us and we came into power, I would refuse to support a Government that did not insist on the dismissal of every civil servant who acted in an active and offensive manner to our party. I think a civil servant has a perfect right, under our constitution, to give his vote for whomsoever he pleases.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not say anything to justify offensive action against anybody.

Mr. DAVIES. It is pretty difficult to draw the line as to what is offensive and what is not, but open, active, offensive interference at public meetings against a candidate certainly comes under offensive political conduct, and I maintain that any civil servant who adopts that line of conduct takes his civil life into his hands, and if his opponents come into power they would be poltroons of the worst kind—and I hope the party to which I belong are not—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not his civil life but his official life.

Mr. DAVIES. His official life as an officer of the Government. I maintain that they are not officers of the Government in the sense of the term used to-night; they are simply officers of the State, not owing any allegiance whatever to the Government of the day; and if they act as the large mass of the Intercolonial Railway employes acted during the last election at Moncton, at which place the officers of the company form a hot-bed of political propagandism, they can only expect one result to follow if the Opposition comes into power. Not only were they active, violent and offensive in their opposition, but it is a question of public notoriety that the leading officers of that important branch of the public service dragooned the subordinates in the Department, and compelled them at the point of the bayonet to go forward and vote against their convictions. The hon. gentleman smiles. He may not have spent much time in Moncton. It is a matter of public notoriety that the men were not allowed to vote as they pleased, but they were dragooned to vote in a certain way on peril of dismissal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. JONES. That is true.

Mr. DAVIES. It is a matter of fact within my own knowledge. I have heard it from a number of servants, who were compelled to vote in a certain way on pain of dismissal.

Mr. KENNY. Was it open voting?

Mr. DAVIES. No, but precautions are taken, so that it is known as to how they vote.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. DAVIES. I admit that some hon. gentlemen opposite quite understand the ropes. The men are given to understand that it will be known for whom they vote; and as I have heard it stated in this House, and I believe it to be a fact, in very many constituencies paper is used of such a material that the manner in which they vote is known. The men are instructed that if they dare to exercise their franchise in the manner which their conscience directs, they will do so at the peril of losing their offices. That being the case, I hope the Minister of Finance will use his influence to introduce a reform in the system on the Intercolonial Railway, and that he will have carried out in practice the principles he has laid down tonight. But I must say that if any inference was to be drawn from his remarks by any civil servant in the country, it would be that he could take an active, open, notorious and offensive position against the Opposition with impunity, and I hope the hon. gentleman's later remarks will remove that impression. I am quite satisfied that so far as I am concerned, the Opposition would not tolerate—for it would not be human nature to endure such conduct—such conduct if they came into power. I thoroughly believe in every civil servant having the right to vote if he pleases, and, perhaps, his position may require him to do more than vote, he may speak to a friend; but he has no right to take an open and offensive attitude against either the Government or the Opposition.

Mr. LANDRY. I was very much surprised to hear the remarks made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. I am not in a position to contradict what the hon. gentleman has said, because in these matters either he or I, actively engaged in politics as we have been in our respective districts, must take such matters as he has been speaking about, from what we are told rather than from what we know ourselves. But if the hon. gentleman is sincere in the assertion which he makes about the political influences that were at work in the town of Moncton—as I have no doubt he is—then I can only say that my information is entirely astray. I live much closer to the place than he does; I venture to say that I am better acquainted with Moncton and with the civil employes of Moncton than he is, and yet I say that if he is correct my information must be very far astray indeed. My information is—and I can only assert that I believe that information—that a very large majority of the civil employes of the Intercolonial Railway, in Moncton, voted against the Government candidate at the last election. I believe that to be the case and I say it here where I know it will reach them, and reach the people of Moncton. I believe they voted against the Government, not because they believed a change would be better, not because they desired a change themselves, but because by some unknown means—perhaps by means of such a circular as we have heard read to-night—they had become convinced that the Government would fall. They felt sure of the Government being defeated, and, therefore, they thought they would be on the safe side with the incoming Government, and would be retained very more readily if they could say that they voted for that party than if they had voted otherwise. I believe that that opinion controlled a large majority of their votes. Now, we have proof of that fact, if we can call anything of that kind proof of such a matter, by the result in the localities where these people live. It is well known that the district of Moncton, where a large majority of these civil servants reside, is the district where the Opposition candidate received the largest number of votes. This is well known—not by watching how they voted under the ballots, but by the result in these districts. I do not say this in the way of reproach on these people, because I believe that civil servants should be allowed to vote as they please, like anybody else. But if they take it upon themselves to act a violent part against the Government, then I believe the Government has a perfect right to say to them: You must share the fortunes of your party and go with them. On the other hand, I think that, if the Government falls, the Opposition have also a perfect right to dismiss men who have been taking an open, active part in favor of the Government and have the right to bring in other men. That is my doctrine. I assert it with some degree of hesitancy, inasmuch as we have been told here to-night that we younger members should think more and speak less, but I think that, if we have the good fortune to remain longer in politics, we may have the same privilege with the older men, and we may also be permitted to change our minds when we grow older, as some other hon. gentlemen apparently have changed theirs. Holding that opinion, I do not hesitate to say that the civil servant who thinks it incumbent upon himself to take an active part one way or the other, must expect to stand or fall with his party. And if I have any reproach with the Government—I do not say I have—but if I have any reproach to make against the Government it is that they have not discriminated sufficiently between their friends and their opponents, in the promotion of officers in the employ of the Government.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANDRY. Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but I repeat that if I have one reproach against them it is that I believe that, in many instances, our opponents have had a more speedy promotion, and have, in many instances, even been originally engaged more readily than our friends have been. I may be wrong in this, because I know that civil servants, as a class, are very apt to be wrongly accused; some hon. gentlemen here to-night have accused them, as a class, of supporting the Government almost unanimously, while, on the other hand, I have accused them of having voted for the Opposition. I dare say that hon. gentlemen on the other side are as sincere as I am. I do not hesitate to say that where everything else is equal—I do not say you should appoint or promote men who are manifestly unfit for the office—but where persons are equal in ability, equal in other respects, equal in honesty or integrity, I say that the Government should favor their supporters in preference to their opponents.

Mr. ELLIS. I think the hon. gentleman is insatiable. Apparently he does not get offices enough for his friends, and he is not satisfied with the rate of promotion on the Intercolonial Railway. I do not propose to quarrel with him about that. I would not have spoken on the matter at all but for a remark the hon. gentleman has made with regard to the Intercolonial Railway officials. How the Intercolonial Railway officials have voted I will not pretend to say, but that the Government, or somebody in their interest, used every possible influence to get them to vote for the Government; and that all the influence which the railway could bring to bear on the officials to vote for the Government were brought to bear, is an undoubted fact. As I was once in the Civil Service myself, knowing the risks which surround it, I kept as clear as possible of the Civil Service men in my canvass; but I may say that, in 1878, when I was postmaster of St. John, and had many subordinates, I was not applied to by the Mackenzie Government, nor by Mr. Burpee, with whom, I may say, I was in constant contact, to use any influence of any kind or sort, nor was a single official in the post office at St. John canvassed for the Mackenzie Government, so far as I am aware. But, with regard to the late election, there is no doubt that railway officials who might be supposed to possess particular influence, were sent to every point where they might be of the greatest use in assisting the Government candidates. Some were taken from their regular positions and sent to one place and another, because they were supposed to possess influence at these particular places. More than that, they were asked, and I presume they were compelled, to stand as representatives at particular polling places for particular candidates of the Government. I do not say whether they were asked to do so for my hon. friend—

Mr. LANDRY. Not with my knowledge.

Mr. ELLIS. But if there was a railway man who was supposed to be capable of performing a particular service, I am satisfied he was sent to Kent—or at any rate they were sent to St. John, or wherever else they might be supposed to be able to support Government candidates. Perhaps it is not worth while disputing about that; I am not finding any particular fault, but the facts are beyond dispute. With regard to what has been said by the Finance Minister, I do not think it was well to encourage civil servants to take an active part in elections, as speech-makers or canvassers, because it is only human nature that, if the Opposition party at any time come into power, they will cut off the heads of these men; and while it may be that it would be a better principle to change all the employés of the country when a new Government comes in power—and I do not say it would or would not, because I have my own ideas with regard to men who are constantly in the Civil Service, and get blue-moulded in it—yet that is not the principle adopted in this country, and it would not be well to encourage it at present by any ministerial utterances.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise only for the purpose of calling attention to one statement which was made this evening, that a Customs official of Nova Scotia has opposed the Local Government, and that his salary was increased from $600 to something like $1,250, without any change of position. I should like to ask his name.

Mr. JONES. I was informed that Mr. Morris, a clerk in the Custom house, who was receiving a salary of $650 or thereabouts, was directed by the Department here to go along the eastern shores, and take part in an election against the Local Government; that he was provided with fishery warrants to distribute along the shore where he had been fishing. I am informed that his salary has been placed at $1,200 or $1,250, and that he occupies the same position in the Custom house that he had previously.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not know what Mr. Morris's action in connection with politics has been, but I can assure the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken as to the action of the Government in regard to him. Mr. Morris was not in receipt of $600 a year; he was in receipt of $800. He receives $1,200. His position has, however, been changed. He has received a higher appointment. In occupying that higher position, he has received a smaller salary than the person he replaced, and he has been promoted to that position at the urgent request of the head of the Customs service at the port of Halifax, namely, the Hon. William Ross, who was one of the hon. gentleman's colleagues, and he was recommended to the position before the general election. He passed the usual qualifying examination to obtain it, and was entitled to the promotion in every way, both by the examination and by long service.

Mr. JONES. My information came from one in the Department, that although his position, to a certain extent, had been changed, his duty in the Custom house to-day was the same as when he drew a salary of $800.

Mr. THOMPSON. I repeat that the hon. gentleman has been entirely misinformed. Some time before his regular appointment and pending his promotion examination, he was appointed pro tempore to the office.

Mr. JONES. I think the Minister of Justice has been misinformed.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, I have not. I got the information from the department in Halifax, and subsequently from the Minister of Customs.

Mr. JONES. Does the hon. gentleman say that he did not go along the shore with the fishery warrants?

Mr. THOMPSON. I have been informed, and very credibly, that the hon. gentleman was mistaken on that point, too.

Mr. LANDERKIN. After the Minister of Railways read the circular he did read, he disappeared from the House. I think it would be well if we had that circular placed on the Table of the House to be examined. I have an idea that he was reading one of his own circulars, because I do not believe that anything of that kind emanated from our friends during the election. Nor do I agree with the policy laid down by the Minister of Finance in regard to officials. I believe that when an official enters the Civil Service he should then abandon politics. I shall not go so far as to say he should not vote, but I say he should not act offensively either for or against the Government, or for or against the Opposition. I think that when a person goes into the service he should then feel that he is going into the service of the country for life. Neither do I approve of the conduct of this Government in reference to the treatment of the officials who were appointed by the previous Government. It is well known that, soon after they came into power, they took away by an Act of Parliament the offices of a great many who were appointed by the preceding Government; I refer to the inspectors of weights and measures. By an Act of Parliament they were struck out of existence on a not very proper plea, the plea that it would be a saving of public money. After their heads had all been cut off by that act of legislation, only a short time afterwards their places were filled again by another Act of Parliament, and we find now that the money expended for the purpose of maintaining inspectors is nearly equal to what it was at that time, because, in addition to inspectors of weights and measures, they have inspectors of gas, of adulteration of food, and for other purposes. I wish the Minister of Finance would send for the Minister of Railways. I would like to see that circular. I think he will find that it was one issued by the heads of the departments, and he must have been reading one of his own circulars, for I hardly ever heard him read anything so well before.

Mr. WELDON (St. John.) With regard to the remark of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Landry) that there was no influence used in Moncton, it must have been the only exception. I know that in the late election greater pressure was put on the railway employes than on any other class as to how they should vote, not only in the Federal elections but in the Local elections. I have in my mind a prominent official who stood at the poll and watched the railway men to see how they voted. The railway was used to convey them to the polls without expense, and the men on the train were sent back to vote for the supporters of the Government. I know from my own personal experience that, during the canvass, a man in the employ of the Government was afraid to speak to my friends because he was watched by certain individuals. In the election of 1882, when the late Mr. Burpee was running with me, men told us that they were afraid to be seen speaking with us because they would be marked men. It would be far better that men in the Civil Service should be relieved of the franchise altogether. I believe, if they were asked the question to-morrow, the majority would be quite willing to be relieved of the franchise on account of the difficulties in which they are placed. Of course, if they choose to go out and canvass, they take their offices in their hands. I have known the pressure to go so far, in some instances, that it has been threatened, not only that if they voted, but that if their friends took an active part in the election, it would be remembered against them.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to this circular that has been produced by the Minister of Finance, I think it is unfortunate that a letter of that kind, which has been pronounced to be a forgery both by the person supposed to have issued it, and by members on this side of the House, should be brought up to do duty on this occasion, especially after the man supposed to have issued it has retired from public life. I think it should be a lesson that such things should not be used in the future. With regard to my own constituency, I know that every official of the Government there exercised all the influence he possibly could against me. In one case, the postmaster is president of the Conservative Association in the town where he lives, and he took a very active part in opposition to my candidature. I know of another case in which the Minister of Justice was called upon to exercise the clemency of the Crown towards the prisoner; and I know that a member of Parliament, who was the sitting member, wrote to this person and friends urging that, as the Minister of Justice had exercised the clemency of the Crown towards him, he and all his friends should support the Government.

Publishing Debates, House of Commons..... $40,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that cost $80,000 last year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will hope for better things this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hope is excellent. I have not the least objection, if it were within his power to control it, that the hon. gentleman would cut down that item. There is no particular use in putting items here which are apparently very inadequate for the practical maintenance of the service. If we spent $50,000, as we appear to have last year, although I notice some portion of that appears to have been a balance carried over, I doubt whether we can get through for $40,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It has been carefully estimated by the officers of the House.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). We could get through more quickly if the hon. gentleman would follow the rule he laid down, and think more and say less.

Salaries to Officers of the Library.....$16,900

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a statutory increase of $300 for the clerk appointed at $1,000 and estimated at $750, making $550 increase in all.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice in last year's account a curious item. Mr. Decelles is put down for $2,940, and differential pay, $1,143.34. How came that?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will make a note of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The sum total paid appears to be $4,073. You will find it on page 123 of the Auditor General's report.

To meet expenses of Franchise Act.....$200,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I propose to strike that out. There is a Bill to avoid any expenditure this year.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12:05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 1st June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 124) respecting the Ontario Pacific Railway Company.—(Mr. Rykert)

Bill (No. 125) to incorporate the Manufacturers' Accident Insurance Company.—(Mr. Small.)

RULES RESPECTING PUBLIC BILLS.

Mr. HALL moved :

That the Special Committee appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the rules respecting private Bills, in so far as they relate to the incorporation and the amendment of Acts incorporating railway companies, be also authorised to make provision in the said rules so as to more clearly define the practice respecting Public Bills that may be referred to any of the Select Standing Committees charged with the consideration of private Bills, in accordance with the recommendation of the Select Standing Committee on Banking and Commerce.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I would ask my hon. friend to allow that to stand until to-morrow, so that we may have an opportunity of reading it.

Mr. McCARTHY. I would explain to the hon. First Minister the object of the motion which my hon. friend has made. We find that when public Bills are referred to the standing committees, which are really only, properly speaking, charged by the rules of the House to deal with private Bills, that we are in this position: that we go through the Bill first, step by step and clause by clause, before we deal with the preamble; and when we come to the preamble, we may find that the sense of the committee is against it, and the whole time spent on the Bill has been lost. If the standing committees are to deal with these Bills, there ought to be rules specially framed with reference to them. For instance, a Bill was before the Committee of Banking and Commerce this morning, relating to bankruptcy. The principle of the Bill was not discussed, but when we came to consider the preamble, the committee voted that it was not proved; and as the preamble was that "Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows," our proceedings seemed rather absurd. If the standing committees are to deal with Bills relating to public matters, there ought to be special rules for that purpose. I move the adjournment of the debate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The motion is more important than it first appeared to be. I think the hon. gentleman had better leave it over for several days until we have an opportunity of considering the whole matter.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

CHANGES IN STANDING COMMITTEES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. member for Restigouche, who has succeeded his brother, is, of course, not on any standing committee. On consultation with hon. gentlemen opposite, it has been agreed that he should be put in the place of his deceased brother on the committees.

KINGSTON GENERAL HOSPITAL AND ST. CATHARINES MARINE HOSPITAL.

Sir DONALD SMITH asked, 1. What is the aggregate of the moneys that Parliament has from time to time voted to the General Hospital at Kingston and to the Marine Hospital at St. Catharines, during the term of years from the date of Confederation to the present time? 2. What is the total sum that has been paid to the said hospitals by virtue of the said votes? 3. To what particular fund or account have the moneys so paid been charged in the Government's or Department's books? 4. Under what provision of the Statutes has the said expenditure been so charged?

Mr. FOSTER. The aggregate of the moneys that Parliament has from time to time voted to the General Hospital at Kingston and to the Marine Hospital at St. Catharines, during the term of years from the date of Confederation to the present time, is $9,000 for St. Catharines, and $7,000 for Kingston, making in all $16,500, being a grant of $500 each per year. The total sum paid to the said hospitals by virtue of the said votes is $16,500. The moneys so paid have been charged in the Government or Department's books to the appropriation for Marine Hospitals and Sick and Distressed Seamen. This expenditure has been charged under no particular provision of the Statutes, the appropriations being made by Parliament from year to year.

SHELBURNE HARBOR ISLAND.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) asked, What policy the Minister of the Interior proposes to pursue in reference to the islands in Shelburne harbor formerly controlled by the British Government, but transferred by it to the Department of the Interior some years ago? Are these islands now under lease, and if so, to whom and upon what conditions? If sold or leased to private parties hereafter, will the Department ask for tenders, or will private arrangements be made?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Commissariat Island has been leased upon the usual conditions. The other islands in the harbor have been handed over to the town of Shelburne for a nominal consideration, upon the understanding that the natural beauty of the islands shall be protected.

BARRACK LANDS AT SHELBURNE, N.S.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne) asked, What disposition the Department of Militia propose to make of the barrack lands at Shelburne, Nova Scotia? If leased to private parties, will it be done by public tender?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The barrack lands are occupied by Mrs. Mackay, under lease given to her husband, Donald Mackay, at the nominal rent of one shilling. The lease was given by the Imperial authorities. Mr. Mackay died, aged 107, before the transfer of the property to this Department.

REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to give to the several justices of the peace in the Dominion a copy of the Revised Statutes, or only an abridged copy? If only the latter, what will be the difference in the cost of the abridged copy and the revised edition?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not the intention to distribute the Revised Statutes. It is the intention to distribute an abridgment containing the criminal laws of Canada. That will be distributed gratuitously. The cost of production of the abridgment is about one-fifth that of the Revised Statutes.

POSTMASTER GENERAL'S REPORT.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to distribute any more copies of the Postmaster General's Report, and if so, when?

Mr. McLELLAN. There have been some delays in distributing the report, in consequence of the sheets having been sent to the vaults of the House for storage, and other matter having been placed on top of them they could not be reached for some time. They are now in the hands of the printers and will be distributed in a few days.

CLAIM OF PATRICK DELEHANTY.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent) asked, Whether the Government have ever received a claim for injuries sustained by one Patrick Delehanty, on the post office building which was recently erected in the town of Chatham, Ontario?

Also, whether they have considered such claim, and whether they intend to allow the claim or not ?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Such a claim was received, and was referred to the Department of Justice for advice. The Department of Justice said that the Government were not liable, and of this Mr. Delehanty was informed.

MR. RUFUS STEVENSON.

Mr. MALLORY asked, Whether Rufus Stephenson is still in the employ of the Government? What are his duties? What is his salary? What travelling or other expenses (if any) are allowed him?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. Stephenson is in the employment of the Government as inspector of colonization companies. His salary is $3,000 per annum. He is allowed the same travelling expenses as other employes of the Government in Manitoba and the North-West receive.

EXPENSES OF RETURNING OFFICERS.

Mr. McMULLEN asked, When the Government expect to pay the returning officers for their services during the recent election, and why the matter has been delayed so long?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Three-fourths of the accounts are now paid, and the remaining fifty will be paid within a few days.

Mr. LANDERKIN asked, Have the expenses of the late Dominion election in South Grey been paid yet? If not, why not?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. McDougall, the Auditor General, informs me that these expenses will be paid tomorrow. I may take this opportunity of saying that, if any gentlemen are interested in this matter, if they will be good enough to call at the office of Mr. McDougall, the Auditor General, he will give them any information they may require.

RESIGNATION OF THE LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR OF QUEBEC.

Mr. RINFRET asked, Whether the Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec has tendered his resignation, on the grounds of ill-health or for other reasons? If his resignation has been tendered, on the grounds of ill-health, have the Government offered him leave of absence? If his resignation has been tendered and accepted by the Government, has his successor been appointed? If so, who is he?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Lieutenant Governor of the Province of Quebec has tendered his resignation, on the ground of ill health. The Lieutenant Governor has not asked for leave of absence, and it has not been offered to him. His resignation has not yet been accepted.

CHISHOLM'S DAM ON THE RIVER TRENT.

Mr. MALLORY asked, Have any applications been made by any person or persons to the Government, since the year 1884, for the privilege of placing "Bracket" boards on Chisholm's Dam, on the River Trent, so as to raise the water above said dam? If so, by whom, and when were such applications made? Was such privilege granted? If granted, how high were the Bracket boards to extend?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I may answer for my colleague, the Minister of Railways, and myself that there are no applications on record in our Departments for that purpose.

RECIPROCIITY TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Whether the Government, with a view of obtaining an arrangement of a Reciprocity Treaty or a commercial trade arrangement with the United States, have received any propositions, either written or verbal, from the Government of the United States or any member thereof, or any other person connected with the said country, and if so, from whom have such proposition or propositions been received, and if so, what is the nature thereof; and have the Government of Canada, or anyone on their behalf, made any proposition or propositions to the said Government of the United States, or anyone on their behalf, and if so, what is the nature thereof?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Both the Imperial Government and the Government of Canada are doing all in their power to promote a friendly adjustment of the fisheries difficulty, and a reciprocal trade arrangement, a favorable reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States, but it would not be in the interests of the public service that anything more definite than that should be communicated at present.

PIERS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. TROW, in the absence of Mr. WELSH, asked, Has the dilapidated condition of the piers at Vernon River and China Point, Prince Edward Island, been brought to the notice of the Minister of Public Works, and will the necessary repairs be at once ordered, so that these piers may be used for shipping purposes?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The dilapidated condition of the piers in question has been brought to the notice of the Department. It will require probably $1,000 to repair the Vernon River pier. The state of the other is being enquired into.

TRENT VALLEY CANAL WORKS.

Mr. BARRON asked, Is it the intention of the Government to proceed this year with the construction of the works of the Trent Valley Canal? Does the Government intend this year to enter upon any fresh work not now under progress? And if so, at what point or points on the route of the canal?

Mr. POPE. It is the intention of the Government to complete, during this year, all the works that have been begun. It is also the intention of the Government, during the recess, to appoint a commission to examine and report upon the balance of the work that the hon. gentleman speaks of.

DREDGING IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

Mr. ROBERTSON (King's) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to send the Prince Edward Island dredge to operate in Murray harbor, or any of the harbors of King's County, during the present season?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The services of the dredge in Prince Edward Island will be required to complete the work at Tignish in Prince county. Therefore, the Department will not be in a position to send it to other places.

LOSS OF REGISTERED LETTERS MAILED AT BEAUHARNOIS.

Mr. HOLTON asked, Is the Government aware that a number of letters, including twelve or fifteen registered letters, mailed at the post office of Beauharnois, on or about March 2nd, 1886, never reached their destination? Has an investigation into the loss of those letters been demanded, and if so, is it the intention of the Government to order such an enquiry?

Mr. McLELAN. The Government has been informed that a package of registered letters, mailed at Beauharnois on the 1st March, which should have reached Montreal on the morning of the 2nd, was lost, but no trace of it has yet been found. Every effort has been made to ascertain what has become of the package in question, but without success.

Mr. HOLTON. The latter part of my question remains unanswered. I asked if an investigation has been demanded into the loss of those letters, and if it is the intention of the Government to order such an enquiry.

Mr. McLELAN. I say that effort has been made, and is being continued, to ascertain what has become of the package in question, but without success, up to the present time.

Mr. HOLTON. I can hardly accept that as an answer to the question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You must accept it.

Mr. HOLTON. I think I am entitled to a fuller answer to the question which I put. The latter part of the question is still unanswered. I ask if an investigation has been demanded, and if so, is it the intention of the Government to order such an enquiry. The Minister has not answered that part of the question.

Mr. McLELAN. I do not know that any special demand has been made, but the matter has been brought to the notice of the Department, and an investigation has been instituted, and has continued up to the present time, but without success.

ANNUAL DRILL OF THE 9TH BATTALION.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) asked, Whether orders were given to the 9th Battalion, during the month of March last or about that time, to discontinue their annual drill? Had this battalion at that time received official sanction to carry on the said drill? Was any reason given to the said battalion for the said discontinuance; and has the battalion been informed of the motives or causes for this discontinuance? What were the causes which effected this discontinuance? Is such discontinuance an ordinary proceeding?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) I have the honor to state that the battalion was to commence its annual drill on Monday the 28th of February. A question was raised as to the unsatisfactory state of the accounts between the battalion and the Militia Department, which accounts resulted from the campaign in the North-West. Consequently, it was deemed expedient to discontinue the annual drill until these accounts had been examined and settled. On the 27th of February orders were issued to discontinue the annual drill, until the accounts between the Department and the battalion had been examined and settled. The order for the discontinuance of the annual drill seems to have been transmitted on the 28th of February, but in consequence of a snow storm that order was delayed on the way for three or four days, and in the meantime the battalion commenced its annual drill. When once it was found that the order had been given for the drill to take place, and that drill in question had even commenced, the Minister of Militia at once gave instruction to allow that drill to continue and gave instructions to suspend the order prohibiting these annual drills.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation). I asked, Mr. Speaker, whether any reason was given to the battalion for that discontinuance. I have had no answer to that part of my question.

Mr. HOLTON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) I could not say whether the reasons were communicated to the battalion, but they were communicated to the commander of the battalion.

REPORT OF GENERAL STRANGE.

Mr. AMYOT (Translation) asked, Whether General Strange, who commanded a portion of the Canadian army in the late North-West expedition, has made a report on the part taken therein by the 9th and 65th Battalions, whether as a special report or embodied in another? Has the said report or partial report been received by the Militia Department or any officers thereof, and by whom; has the same been published in the official reports, or one of the official reports, of the Department, and in which; if the same has not been published, what is the motive of the omission; and if not published, is it the intention to publish the same, and when?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. (Translation.) The only written reports received from General Strange on the part taken in the North-West rebellion by the 9th and 65th Battalions have appeared in the general report which was published by the Militia Department on the suppression of the troubles in the North-West, and these reports from General Strange appear as Appendices D and A, pages 48 and 51 of the said report.

PROTECTION FROM CHOLERA.

Mr. AMYOT asked, Whether the Government propose to take any steps to protect the Dominion from the attacks of the cholera, which is, at the present moment, raging in South America, and what is the nature of these protective measures?

Mr. CARLING. It is the intention of the Government, by its quarantine service, to treat all vessels coming to ports of the Dominion from South America, on either the Pacific or the Atlantic side, as susceptible of introducing the disease of cholera, and to cause to be applied the most approved measures of disinfection, coupled with the detention of all vessels found to be infected.

HOMESTEADS WITHIN THE RAILWAY BELT.

Mr. MILLS, in the absence of Mr. BLAKE, asked, How many homesteads have been entered and remain uncancelled within the Canadian Pacific Railway Belt, up to 31st December last, between:—1. The first and second Principal Meridians; 2. The second and third; 3. The third and fourth; and 4. The fourth and fifth?

How many acres of their land grant have been finally accepted and taken over by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, within the Canadian Pacific Railway Belt, between:—1. The first and second Principal Meridians; 2. The second and third; 3. The third and fourth; 4. The fourth and fifth; 5. In southern Manitoba, outside the Railway Belt; 6. Elsewhere outside the Railway Belt?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). In answer to these questions I may say that on notice being given, I at once asked the officials of the Department if they could give the information, and the answer I got is: "The information that is asked for will take some days to get ready as many registers have to be gone through. The compilation, however, is now being pushed forward." I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that, with the consent of the House, he allow these questions to stand as orders, and I will have the papers brought down at the earliest possible moment, giving the information.

SALARIES OF REVISING OFFICERS.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether the salary of the revising officers has been fixed, and if so, what is the amount thereof? If not, when will the same be fixed, and what is to be the amount?

Mr. THOMPSON. The salaries of revising officers have not yet been fixed. I think I am able to say to the hon. gentleman that they will be fixed at a very early day.

QUEEN'S, N.B., ELECTION.

Mr. WELDON (St. John), moved:

That the second report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections be not concurred in, but that it be resolved, That in view of the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, chapter 8, and the duties of a returning officer as therein defined, and also in view of the facts elicited on the examination of Mr. John R. Dunn, the returning officer of the electoral district of the County of Queen's, N. B., at the last election for the said district, and it appearing that nominations were received, a poll granted and held, and that at the summing up of the votes George G. King had 1,191 votes and George F. Baird 1,130 votes, it was the duty of the said John R. Dunn, at the said election, to have declared and returned George G. King as the member elected for the said electoral district."

Mr. SPEAKER. If the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) has any explanation to offer, let the hon. gentleman give it now, and then withdraw during the debate on this question.

Mr. BAIRD. I do not know whether a further attack is intended upon the seat of the member for Queen's, or whether censures are intended to be made on the returning officer. I do not suppose this matters much, but I have some explanations which, perhaps, are pertinent to this question. Mention was made of my name in connection with the appointment of John R. Dunn as returning officer for the electoral district of the county of Queen's, and I may say, by way of explanation, that it is a fact that the sheriff of the county of Queen's was passed over at the last election, and that John R. Dunn was appointed returning officer. If there is any blame to be cast in the matter, that blame should fall on myself; the responsibilities are mine, and I am willing to bear them. In regard to that appointment, the explanation I would offer is this: After I had accepted the nomination of the Liberal-Conservative party of the county of Queen's to contest the late election with Mr. King, I went into the county to see what the chances would be of my election. I found there arrayed against me the two members of the Local Parliament, the sheriff of the county, the judge of probate and clerk of the peace, the registrar of deeds and wills, the warden of the municipality, in fact every local officer was there except registrar of probate. Taking these facts by themselves, no fault could be found. Those gentlemen had the same right I had in regard to the political views they held. They had a right to vote as they liked, and, perhaps, to work as they liked. But we go a step further. I then found that the electoral lists of the county had been revised under Liberal management. Complaints came to me from every section, that a large number of Conservatives had been left off the lists. Hon. members may ask me "how that was done?" It was explained to me in this way: That when the registrar of deeds, who acted as revising barrister's clerk, took up the old list in order to make up from it the new list, and found there a person whom he knew to be an avowed supporter of the Liberal-Conservative party, with whom it would be safe to tamper, his name was left off the list; and it is well known that persons living in the outside districts do not look after such matters; that farmers who have voted twenty or thirty years expect they will always be entitled to vote. I could not say much to that. Again, complaints that when young men, those who would give their votes for the first time, the farmers' sons and tenants and persons under that qualification, had made application on the Conservative side and their notices and affidavits were received by the gentleman who acted as the revising barrister's clerk, if it was possible to find fault with them at a late day, such was done, and they were marked as bad and sent back. In many instances they made a second application with like results—they were sent back as bad. Some were not sent back until it was too late to renew their application, and this explains why a large number of Liberal-Conservative names were struck off. In answer to that, I could not say much. All I could say was that the matter should have been better looked after by the Conservatives, and they should have been smarter. They considered it was the duty of the officer to attend to that matter, and they stated that they applied to the judge and to his clerk, but could get no satisfaction. The matter goes a step further yet. I found that the parishes which give large majorities for Mr. King had been revised by the revising officer himself, that is, by the Hon. Judge Steadman, and that he had then deputised a person not having the legal qualification, not being a barrister of five years' standing, to attend to the revision of the lower parishes, generally called the Conservative parishes. Here was a serious difficulty to me. I knew very well that if I carried a majority from those Liberal-Conservative parishes, it would not avail me; I knew the lists were not legally revised, and that I could not avail myself in any way of such a majority. In my native parish a majority of ninety, and in other parishes of eighty or ninety, was given to me; still the legal effect was entirely worthless. Now, I do not for one moment insinuate that the honorable judge did this thing intentionally, I hope he did it inadvertently; and so far as Mr. King is concerned, I do not say that his hand was in it. I do not wish to say anything against him; I always met him as a gentleman and always treated him as a gentleman.

Mr. MILLS. No, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Shame!

Mr. BAIRD. I am free to say that in dealing with Mr. King I have always dealt with him as a gentleman, and always approached him as a gentleman. In trading transactions I have always found him possessed of honor and integrity becoming a gentleman, and when we dealt with each other, politically, we did so without any abuse, and the last time I saw Mr. King I parted with him in a friendly spirit, and that was since the declaration was made. Early in the contest I knew there was a difficulty before me. My first move was to see Mr. King; I talked with him; I told him there was a probability of a legal difficulty after the election. I proposed to him, or I asked him if he knew any way by which we could get over the difficulty. I told him I would be willing to enter into the contest, and whoever got the majority there the matter should end, and that there should not be any legal difficulty hereafter under our agreement, if one was made. Mr. King appeared conscious of his power and of my weakness. Although he talked friendly, still he said: "I cannot make any such arrangement; I am afraid my party would not stand by it. I have this to say, that there is no doubt if you are elected no stone will be left unturned to unseat you." I applied to him three times according to the tenor of that conversation, and at last I told him that if any way could be suggested up to the nomination, to let me know and I would be willing to fall in with it. But Mr. King gave me no answer to any of those proposals. Another difficulty arose before me. It was announced to me that the sheriff of the county, who was then expected to be returning officer, when he came to make the declaration would cast aside all the parishes not legally revised, and would declare upon the majority in the parishes revised by the revising barrister. I heard of this difficulty, and then, for the first time, I made an application for a change of returning officer; and the answer that came to me was, in effect, that it was not advisable to pass by the sheriff who usually held that office. I communicated with my supporters in the county. I saw as many of them as I could, and they all appeared to be aware of the trap which was set for me, and they were of opinion that a claim should be made. I saw the Minister of Marine; I laid the case before him, and I asked him for some instructions, and he said if it was possible that it would be better to allow the sheriff to continue as the returning officer. I then said I would go and see the sheriff, although I had to drive a distance of about fifty miles; I will put the proposition to him squarely, and if I find that he intends to declare according to the returns from all the parishes, the sheriff may remain there. I drove those fifty miles, but found that the sheriff had left the shire town and would not return for a fortnight. Then, in further talk with my supporters, they urged me not to rely upon him, and I sent my unqualified request for a change in the returning officer. Now, if there is any blame in the matter, it should fall upon me and me alone; the Administration were not to blame; and I say there was no alternative for me—with these facts staring me in the face, knowing that my certain defeat had been determined upon—there was no alternative but to ask for a different returning officer. I could not be content that the sheriff, who was going on the stump against me, should act as returning officer. Now a brief explanation as to why Mr. John R. Dunn was appointed. It was not because he was a supporter of the Government, as has been insinuated; it was for a different purpose and from a different standpoint. It was because there was no man that stood higher in the esteem of the people of Queen's county than did John R. Dunn; it was because he was a member of one of the oldest and most respectable families in that county; it was because he was a graduate of a college and the principal and teacher of a grammar school—a young man whose character, up to that period, for truth and integrity, no man had dared to assail.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BAIRD. Some hon. gentlemen may laugh, but if there was a possibility for fault to be found with John R. Dunn, why has it not been found? Has there been anything left untouched which should be brought against him? and I say that up to the ruling, which did not please the Liberal party, no fault could be found, and none has ever been found with John R. Dunn. You have had that gentleman here before you in the high court of Parliament, and in the court of his own conscience; you have had him here where you could make the most searching investigation of his movements, and I would ask if there is one man within the sound of my voice who is prepared to say that he believes that John R. Dunn ruled as he did wilfully and maliciously? Is there one man here so harsh, unjust and ungenerous as to say, after that man has been before you, that he is the kind of man who could be lured by love of gain, or could be induced to barter away his honor and manhood for the paltry return which was attributed to him on this occasion? I think there is not one gentleman here who will undertake to say that he believes that he is that kind of a man.

Mr. MITCHELL. Oh, yes, there is.

Mr. BAIRD. I am aware that it has been advanced, as a matter of argument, that his ruling is wrong, that his ruling is a legal quibble, that it is not warranted by precedent or justified by law. Now, I cannot agree with the hon. gentlemen who advanced those arguments. I had learned to look upon it in a different light. I had learned to look upon it as a debatable question, as a question which was balanced in my favor in law, as a point which I had a right to take and avail myself of if I saw fit, well knowing the responsibilities and the burdens I was assuming in accepting that declaration, knowing very well that if I was wrong the strong arm of the law could set me right. That was my consideration and view of it while listening to the arguments of the learned counsel on the day of declaration. It is true I had not looked into the question thoroughly up to that period, for I left the county soon after election day; I had gone to my own place in St. John, and, as far as I was concerned, I was content with the result of the election. And, as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) has seen fit to mention my meeting with Mr. King in St. John, it is true I met Mr. King and congratulated him on his success. It is true we were friendly and remained friendly, and talked with each other in a friendly manner. It is true that for more than a week nothing of this kind was ever spoken of, and I say it was not until the general disturbance, until the war of protests began to loom up, that I heard anything, or was called on by the people of Queen's county to come up and avail myself of this doubt. The hon. member undertook to say that I had stated in my speech at Gagetown that it was the party generally who urged. I did not say it was the party generally, but the party from Queen's County, that came to my office in large numbers. They showed me the havoc wrought upon them in the voters' list, and the different plans and stratagems used to defeat them, and they urged me to go back and take up the fight for them. They urged me, not in small, but in great numbers, and they are willing to-day to admit the responsibility of having done so. I say it was in answer to their call that I went. I felt that they had honored me in coming out of their own county and selecting me from St. John to run the election. It is true my political sympathies had clustered around the people there. They were the people of my earlier acquaintance; it was the land of my birth, and it is true my sense of justice was keenly alive to their demands, and all my energies were fully bent on seeing that they had their rights. These were the motives which actuated me; but not until late in the second week did I determine to go up, and it was more particularly in consequence of the announcement I saw in the different newspapers of the Liberal party, that in the county of Sunbury Mr. Wilmot was out, in consequence of some of his ballots having been numbered instead of being initialed—that it was a splendid thing that Mr. Barpee was in and that Mr. Wilmot was out. They came then anew to urge me and they said: "Are you going to stand by while they are taking every advantage over us; this is said to be a good legal advantage, and we call on you to come into the county and take up the battle for us again." I answered that I would come, and in pursuance of that promise I went amongst them. I heard the arguments adduced by the learned counsel before the returning officer; I listened carefully, and I believed that he had ruled honestly and conscientiously. Now, to go back to the point that I have digressed from. With reference to the ruling of the returning officer, I say I had looked upon it as a correct ruling, and I had reason to believe that it was correct, but I hoped that when the matter came here before Parliament, learned and able gentlemen would deal with it, and I thought that some additional light would be thrown on the subject and that my mind would be fixed one way or the other. I had thought before that it might come before the courts, so that we might have it determined, but when it was here before Parliament I was glad and willing to have it discussed; and when the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) broke in upon us with the case of the Queen against the Mayor of Bangor, and on the occasion of the first motion cited that judgment, one would almost suppose, from his manner that that was a fit case to determine all election questions. The Liberal press throughout the Dominion proclaimed that that was a case directly in point, and that appeared to remain before the House as good law until it was torn to pieces by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), who showed that the decision in that case was given under an Act of an entirely different character from ours, an Act which provides that no objection shall be taken after the nomination, and also that the returning officer has no return to make, but is only to add up the columns and send the result to the mayor. What bearing has that on our case? What analogy is there between the two cases? Since that argument has been completely riddled by the hon. member for Pictou, we have never heard of that case since. I think all the cases brought forward establish that the returning officer is a judicial, as well as a ministerial, officer; that his judicial functions continue after the election down to declaration, as well as before the election. But hon. gentlemen opposite do not deal with the question from that standpoint. They deal with it as though there was no authority, no argument the other way. I thought that when this matter came to be dealt with by the leader of the Opposition, a still greater flood of light would be let in upon it. He stands so eminent in his profession that we had a right to expect that from him; and although I was aware that in listening to his speech I must stand under the rod of his criticism, still I was willing to take that risk. He usually does his work so well, that a person would be willing to listen to him if he had to bear the rod of his criticism by doing so. But he left that point as much untouched as anybody else, and we have still no light upon it. We find that Rogers, Bourinot, Firmatnger and May, and all other writers on the election law, admit that the powers of the returning officer have been very much extended from what they were, but it has not been clearly defined where they end, and as yet no particular ruling is to be found to show that they do not extend up to the last act of making the declaration. However, I think I am now in a position to say to these hon. gentlemen who have declaimed against me with such energy of expression, that they were not sincere in their arguments, but are working at this question merely for political capital. If they were sincere, why did they not bring this matter before the proper tribunal? They have evinced a strange disposition to try the case before any tribunal except the right one. They know that an election court is established where impartial justice can be expected to be dealt out. They know very well that if I am wrong there I shall be set right. If the case is without argument, if it is plain on one side and there is nothing on the other side, why on earth was the case not brought before the election court, and I hurled from this seat? We were told by the Liberal press, up to the last day and hour, that a petition was ready to be filed. I was glad to hear it, because I courted publicity in this matter. I would have been glad to meet them in the court, and challenged them to the courts, and even now I would waive the lapse of time, and would again challenge them to the courts to determine the question. The returning officer has been here, assisted by counsel, prepared to argue his justification and the correctness of his law. However, that question was not reached, and I do not know that it is necessary for me to continue the argument on that subject. I do not know that the House cares for the argument, or really wants it, at this time. As to what is intended with reference to the returning officer, I am not prepared to say. If he did wrong wilfully, he deserves punishment; no one can deny that. No one can deny that an officer who has been guilty of an abuse of the power vested in him deserves punishment, or if his conduct has been wilful and malicious; but it must be otherwise when it appears that such an official has fairly followed the light of his understanding and the dictates of his conscience and the best advice he could get. If such were not the case, if every judge or other person holding judicial functions were to be called on to answer for his errors in judgment and to receive punishment for them from those whom they happened to displease, there would be many whose misfortunes we would be called upon to deplore. Punishment for errors in judgment is contrary to the whole spirit of the English law. This is no theory of mine, but the very language of English law. It is one of the first principles of British justice, and the protection afforded to those holding judicial offices extends from the highest to the lowest in the trusts of a Government. But we have not admitted, and we will never admit, that the returning officer was even wrong in law. That officer is the more justified in claiming that he was right when these honorable men, both here in Parliament and in New Brunswick, who declaim against his acts so loudly, who so broadly declare that it was an outrage on law, yet refuse to carry the matter before the courts. But another thing I wish to say to the hon. members of this House. I feel somewhat independent, and I feel a reasonable sense of pride in this matter. As yet I do not know what will be the determination of this House, but if I am retained in the seat I occupy, I am prepared to say that I am not yet satisfied. I am not content to leave these hon. gentlemen with one leg to stand upon; I am not content to leave one excuse behind. Mr. King has failed to file his protest; but it shall not be said that the matter is closed there. I am prepared to take one step further. I am prepared to say that as soon as the day arrives when the franchise list in the county of Queen's can be revised and made legal, I am prepared to hand in my resignation, and I am prepared to again fearlessly challenge the verdict of the constituency; and if the Liberal party of the county of Queen's is prepared to accept my resignation, I am ready to give it within an hour—

Mr. MITCHELL, Better send it in, that is the best plan.

Mr. BAIRD. And I will say to those hon. gentlemen who have been so active in this matter, that I would invite any of them to come down and take part in that election. I would be most happy to see there the trusted young leader of Prince Edward Island, who paid us a visit last summer, and read the death warrant of the corrupt Macdonald Government. Let him come again and explain why the execution did not take place in February last. I would be most happy to meet any of those hon. gentlemen; and when they speak of me as a robber, or usurper, or in any other terms they choose, I will speak of them as hon. gentlemen. Let the hon. member for Northumberland come with his pot of tar and feathers, which he talks so liberally about, and I will be prepared to receive him well. But one word more, for perhaps I am keeping too much of the time of the House. I know it has been the boast of the Liberal party and the Liberal press throughout the Dominion, that this seat will be made too hot for me to keep, that I should be met by the most withering scorn, and I have met plenty of their scorn, but as yet I have failed to wither, and if I know myself aright, I shall still stubbornly refuse to wither. Scorn, to be withering, must come from those whose political record is untarnished. If I were allowed to pass judgment on hon. gentlemen opposite as they do on me, I would be inclined to say there is not an hon. gentleman among them who has not violated some, and perhaps every section of the election law; and, as a party, I would say that the schemes and designs of hon. gentlemen opposite to get control of the reins of Government are such as would make a highwayman blush. What is wrong for me to do appears to be praiseworthy with them. There is not a man in their party in Queen's county who would not do what I have done, or who would not admit that they would take any advantage of me they could; and if hon. gentlemen opposite were sincere, they would say that they would avail themselves, if they had the opportunity, of a like advantage, and their protests to the contrary is political hypocrisy. Again, it has been the effort of the Liberal press, ever since the difficulty began, to destroy my character in every part of the Dominion, more particularly in St. John. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis), in his paper, I am sorry to say, has brought recklessly from day to day charges and imputations that the meanest ingenuity alone could invent, and when his own invention failed all that could be borrowed from an equally partisan and hostile press he added to his stock. He has kept constantly before the public everything that could possibly belittle me, but I am bound to say neither he nor his friends have succeeded to any great extent as yet. Among the truthful things said against me is that I occupy a back seat, but I am not aware that that is any reflection on one's dignity as a member, for most new members take back seats. Again, they have said that I am of no use as a member of this House. Quite true; but if that be the case, I have the glorious satisfaction of knowing that I am in plenty of company of the same kind, and first among them I would hail the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis). His usefulness has yet to be discovered, and I think if any of his deluded constituents would come up here, they would find what a splendid failure they have on their hands. The St. John Globe, the Cape Ann Advertiser and the Portland Argus have claimed that he is the most important man in the Maritime Provinces, and that he would soon set this Parliament straight on fishery and international questions; but, notwithstanding all their prophecies, if his constituents would come up here, they would find he is about as useless as I am. I am happy to say his strictures fall very lightly upon me. If I have sinned against a political opponent or against a single constituency—which I do not admit—I can say he has sinned against the whole nation, and that nation his own country. Disloyalty, separation and annexation has been the theme of his life. It has been his life-work to foment disloyalty in the hearts of the people; he has been constantly engaged in spreading the seeds of sedition and disaffection in the minds of a contended people, by enlarging existing evils and inventing ones that never did exist, through the medium of a mischievous press, and in this way he has kept himself before the public merely to satisfy his own selfish and vain-glorious ends. Side by side, working with him, has been the Daily Telegraph, of St. John, controlled by a broken-down and dissatisfied politician, who has had a standing call at political elections ever since I can recollect, who has run very vigorously up to nomination day, but who never dared to make his deposit of $200, knowing well he could not carry a one-third vote in his native county. This gentleman can write very ably on the subject, but I am prepared to bid defiance to all these gentlemen. I can afford to trample on their opinions and to defy their ablest efforts. I do not ask them to desist. I urge them to go ahead, and I am positive they cannot deprive me of five votes in the county of Queen's. If the public were to believe what has been published against me, they would believe that my capacities for mischief are almost endless. They would believe that I have induced a returning officer to violate the sanctity of his oath and make false returns; that I have taken hold of this young man, who stood so well before the world, and led him from the path of rectitude into the broad highway of shame. This is the language of these gentlemen, but, according to them, another step had to be taken. Judge Steadman came down to attend to the work of counting me out and Mr. King in, and my attorney, by my order, obtained a writ of prohibition from the Supreme Court to stay the judge in making that recount. Then a new outburst came from the Liberal press. I had seized the Supreme Court by the throat; I had induced one of the judges to violate the solemnity of his oath; I had induced him to soil his judicial ermine and prostitute his high office for the sake of party. This was the very language used by the Liberal press; and when I called upon them to answer to the Supreme Court for their language, I was charged with interfering with the liberty of the press, the glorious liberty of the press. It was a glorious liberty, they claimed, to call our judges perjured villains. That is rather too much liberty, and I do not think they will keep that liberty long. Still, they may, and I may be wrong. Yet the matter cannot stop. Another step has to be taken. As Richard III said, "Crowns gained by blood must be by blood maintained." Another step has to be taken—the ballots have to be burnt. The papers announce that Baird has perpetrated the last act of political brigandage, and the ballots have been burnt. As to the member for the city and county of St. John (Mr. Weldon), I cast no reflection upon him; he is not a vindictive man; I have always found him a fair man and an eminent lawyer; but, when he mentioned the fact that the ballots were burned, though I could not contradict him, I knew as well as possible that every ballot and every paper would come to you as faithfully as the hand of man could return them. But it is all in keeping with their stories, and if they are false in part they are false in the whole. And now what is it? I have come here. The press announces that I have captured the Government, and that I hold this seat by the force of a party vote. In this matter I wish to speak plainly. When they intimate that I am the ward of the Government, that I am the protégé of the right hon. gentleman, the leader of this House, I say it is false; I say that up to this moment I have never spoken one word to the right hon. the leader of this House on this question, or exchanged a single line with him in reference to it. I am proud that I can say this, and that I can say it at this particular time. As to being the ward of the Government, or being under their protection, I do not admit that. When I claim this seat, I claim it as my right—I demand it as my legal right. I do not ask to hold it by force of a party vote. I do not wish to hold it as a matter of political favor. I ask it as my right, as my legal right, as my right under the laws of the land as they now stand. I say I am entitled to it in that sense; that the ruling of the returning officer is in that direction, and is unrevised; and those returns which have been sent to you show the same thing, that the matter has been fairly investigated, that it has been successfully contended that Parliament has long since surrendered to the courts the right to try controverted elections and all questions in relation to controverted elections. I say that is established not only by the positive language of our statutes, but by precedents under other statutes. When I claim the seat, I claim it as my right; I do not claim it as a matter of political protection. I do not wish it to be understood that I am getting this protection; and, if there is a ruling in my favor, it will be as the law directs. That it is the very conclusion that the committee of this House were, I may say, forced to take, after spending two or three days in hunting for precedents, and examining carefully into the law bearing upon the matter, they were driven irresistibly to the conclusion that Parliament has not the right to deal with this matter, has not the right to unseat me and to place Mr. King here, to deprive the constituency of Queen's of any privileges they would enjoy had he brought the matter before an election court. It is in that respect that I ask it. I freely admit that you have the power, but I deny that you have the right to unseat me. Still, it is not for me to dictate, it is not for me to say. The prerogative, the high prerogative, rests with this House. Theirs is the right to determine, and theirs is the responsibility of that determination. It is for them to command and for me to obey; and if in the exercise of their discretion, if in the exercise of their wisdom, they should determine adversely to me, if they should determine that I should leave this seat, I am prepared to bow to that decision. I can then return to the people of Queen's county and say, I have fought your battle as far as I am able, I have done my best, and I return to you; and I believe they would receive me firmly believing that there was not a stain of dishonor in a single step in the course which I have taken. But I trust a wiser and better judgment will prevail. However, it is not for me to say. In either event I am content. I thank the House, through you, Mr. Speaker, for the kind attention they have given me and for the freedom from interruption which I have enjoyed; and, as you now take this matter under your consideration, I will retire from the seat.

Mr. THOMPSON. As the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) said in making his motion yesterday, this subject has been so often discussed, both in the House and in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, where a great many members of the House were present, that I am sure the House will hardly bear with any tedious discussion of it this afternoon. I shall, therefore, in making the suggestion I desire to make at the close of a few remarks which I offer to-day, refrain as much as possible from going over the ground which was either gone over in the debate when the matter first came up on the motion of one of the other hon. members for St. John, or the ground which was so fully discussed at the various meetings of the committee. I take it that the resolution which is offered this afternoon, although it does not expressly say that the House is to proceed to the seating of Mr. King, is a step in that direction, and a step in disregard of the decision which the Committee on Privileges and Elections has recommended this House to adopt. If, notwithstanding all that has been said with regard to this question on previous debates, I refer at all to the line of argument that was then presented from this side of the House, it is not by way of repeating or even insisting upon what was then urged, but merely by way of reminding members of the line of argument which was used. It was well stated, both in that debate and in the discussion which took place before the committee that, during the early period of parliamentary history, the power of trying election petitions was repeatedly exercised by the House of Commons in England. It was shown that on every question of that kind which came before the Commons of England a decision was arrived at by a strictly party vote; and so fully was it recognised, in the disposition of election cases by the House, as being a purely party vote that, on one occasion, a Ministry went out of office because it had failed to carry the vote of the House in the disposition of a controverted election. At a subsequent time, recognising the injustice of that system, the Grenville form of procedure was adopted. Under that it was necessary that a petition should be presented, that it should be accompanied by security, and that a committee, whose decision should be final, should be struck by ballot, that their report should be final, without a vote of the House being taken, and that they should be sworn. Subsequently, some sixteen or seventeen years ago, the legislation was adopted in England by which that procedure was abolished, and the election petition was to be presented to the courts. I showed on a former occasion that we have adopted that statute, we adopted it in 1874. From that time forward, as I then stated to the House—and it has not been controverted since—from the hour when the Parliament of Great Britain adopted the mode of trying controverted elections in the courts of the country, and from the hour that that procedure was adopted in Canada, there has not been a single instance in the records of either Parliament, of an election return having been disturbed, or a contested election having been tried in the House in Great Britain or in Canada. The simple absence of a precedent in favor of the course which the House has been asked to adopt by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), is most significant and striking as to the impropriety of our dealing with the question here. On one occasion, when this matter was before the House, we were asked: "Where has it been found, in the record of Parliament, that a minority candidate had been returned?" and I replied that we were not to seek in the record of the Imperial Parliament for any such question being raised or discussed. If we look in the records of the courts of the country, we will find how such questions have been raised, and how they have been disposed of. But, to the credit of Parliament, it must be said that, from the adoption of that procedure down to the present time, the records of Parliament are a blank, not only as to any action having been taken on any such petition, on any such complaint, on any such return, but as to any attempt being made to invite Parliament, either in Great Britain or here, to deal with any such question; but, as said on a former occasion, both Houses have preserved the undoubted right to deal with questions relating to the disqualification of its members. The disqualification to which I refer is that which attaches to a man who is not entitled to be elected to Parliament, or if he has been elected to Parliament, has forfeited his seat by the acceptance of an office. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) replied, on a former occasion, to that argument by saying that the greatest qualification that a man can have is the majority of his constituents, and he seemed to think that he was adding something to the argument, instead of making a play upon words and confusing the argument. The question of title to the seat, of course, depends on obtaining a majority of the electors. The question of personal disqualification, as distinct from the question of title to the seat derived from the majority of the electors, is the only one which Parliament has reserved for its decision, and the only one with which Parliament has ever dealt. When this question was before us on the previous occasion, I referred to the fact that a person had been returned to the Imperial Parliament after he had been convicted of a crime, the sentence for which he was then undergoing, and being then practically dead, civilly, he was declared incapable of occupying a seat in the British Parliament. Notwithstanding the declaration that he was civilly dead and incapable of being elected to Parliament, his constituents went on and elected him again. There was the element of notoriety; every man in that constituency who cast a vote for him knew, not only that he was disqualified—because he was then in prison under a life sentence, or under a very long sentence for felony—knew that Parliament had declared the candidate to be disqualified. The question came up before the House of Commons again. Was that a plain case? Was it a flagrant case of disqualification? Was it not a plain case in which the House, if ever it intended to act in disturbing an election return by withdrawing these matters from the court and seating a man who had not been seated by the returning officer—was it not a case in which the House would have put out its hand and corrected the return, and seated the person who had been the only qualified candidate in that election? But the House did nothing of the kind. The House simply reaffirmed the decision it had come to on a previous occasion, and again declared that the person returned was disqualified, and then waited the action of the court, and it was only by the action of a court of law that the candidate, the only candidate qualified to be elected and to be returned, was seated in the English House of Commons. We had a case, as was pointed out at the close of that debate by the hon. member for Victoria, N.S. (Mr. Macdonald), in which a similar question was raised in this House, a question very closely analogous to this, a question which arose in my own Province, and it was undoubtedly a case of a minority candidate having been returned to this House. It was not a case in which the returning officer presumed to exercise judicial functions, as this returning officer has done, and has declared that he felt himself bound to do, whether he was right or wrong, in respect to the qualification of Mr. King. It was a case in which the returning officer chose to throw out, uncounted, the returns of some of the polling places, because if he did count them, in pursuance of his oath of office, he would have had to make a return directly opposite to that which he made. That returning officer, appointed under very peculiar circumstances, chose to return a minority candidate to this House, and when there was an attempt to make the returning officer answerable at the Bar of the House, as was proposed to be done the other night, the answer which the leader of the Opposition, then the leader of the House, made, was this, as read by my hon. friend from the county of Victoria, N.S. (Mr. Macdonald):

"He would be very sorry to believe that the House had been deprived by the position of the Controverted Elections Act of its power over returning officers, of its power to investigate complaints made against them, and to punish them for improper conduct, but when Parliament transferred the trial of election petitions to the judges, and expressly provided that the conduct of returning officers might be complained of, and that they might be made respondents to petitions, Parliament thereby expressed a preference for that mode of investigation, or, at any rate, a petitioner could adopt that course. Under those circumstances he did not think it would be proper to ask the House to enter into an investigation of the conduct of that returning officer, pending the election trial. The appointment of the returning officer was a different matter."

In the only two cases which can be cited since the adoption of that procedure, by which these matters have been sent to the courts of the country, the one in England and the other here, we find in the English case, that the English House has distinctly declared that the person returned could not take his seat, and when the elements all existed for seating the only candidate entitled to be returned, the House stayed its hand and waited until the decree of the election court was pronounced; and in this country when this question was raised in 1874, when the leader of the present Opposition was a member of the then Government, the House declined even to call the returning officer to the Bar to answer for his violation of the Election Act in returning the minority candidate, and refusing to count the ballots of the electors which were in his hands. Now, the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) has very properly stated that this case has excited a great deal of public interest, and is one on which the press of the country has made very strong statements. The aspect of the case down to the present moment has been simply this: that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have contented themselves with the assertion of what they conceive to be correct principles on the point of constitutional law as regards the rights and privileges of this House. On the other side hon. gentlemen have gone into the merits of the case as they understand them. I think it was well there was no attempt to mix the argument which has been made on this side against the interference of Parliament in the trial of controverted elections with the merits of this particular case; and whether it be popular or unpopular now, and whether the course taken by the majority of this House in declining to interfere in election trials after the adoption of that salutary Act by which such trials are left to the courts of the country, is deemed popular or not, I am still of the opinion that it is better for the country, better for the electors and better for the credit of this House that this matter should be left to the tribunals, that every case should be left to the tribunals which have jurisdiction and which alone have the procedure to despatch business of this kind in a way that will command public confidence. The argument made by hon. gentlemen opposite, and it was specially urged in the committee, was that every case was to be decided on its own merits; that there might be a case of very doubtful character presented to Parliament, and in a doubtful case we should not interfere; but in a flagrant case we ought to interfere, and that this was a flagrant case. Shall we adopt that rule and act on that principle, that it is for the majority in every case to take up a case of controverted election and to reverse the return and to seat the member whom the returning officer has not seated, and to vote that it is a flagrant case, and that there was no doubt about it? We do not advance the argument a step by saying that in a plain case we will act and in a doubtful case we will not act, because we are placing the seats of the minority still in the hands of the majority, and we have only to vote, first, that it is a plain case, and, then, that we ought to violently seize the authority to do what the majority thinks is right in the matter, notwithstanding that for nearly half a century these matters have been relegated to other tribunals that are supposed to be impartial, first to the committees of the House and afterwards to the judges of the land. I need not remind the House at this stage of what was said at its Bar; that at this moment the questions connected with the recount and prohibition of recount are being considered by the Supreme Court of New Brunswick; and yet we are undertaking to deal with this question, to say there shall be no recount, for which Mr. King has applied—Mr. King understanding his privileges and rights, and advised quite as well as he can be advised by the majority of votes of this House. He has gone to the courts of the country, he has chosen his procedure there, and while we propose to take Mr. King by the hand and place him in the seat, the judges are deliberating whether they will give him the relief he asks under the authority of the law as we understand it, and as he seems to understand it. But yesterday an addition was made to the rule which hon. gentlemen opposite laid down before the committee. It was said yesterday, not only that we shall interfere in a plain case, but that we shall interfere if the individual supposed to be aggrieved has not money enough to go into the courts of the country, or does not desire to spend the money necessary. For I understand the only reason put forward by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) when he brought forward his motion, why the time had been allowed to elapse for entering a petition was that the gentleman who claimed the seat either did not choose to spend the money, or did not set sufficient value on the seat to undergo the inconvenient litigation which is necessary to obtain it, if he is well advised that the seat is rightly his. So that, according to the doctrine of hon. gentlemen opposite, the majority is, in the first instance, to vote that it is a plain case, and having done so, we are next to deliberate whether the individual aggrieved has money enough to contest the seat; and if he has money, whether he chooses to spend it in litigation or not. If having the money, he does not choose to spend it in litigation, thinking the litigation in the courts too expensive or too inconvenient, it is a reason why this House should seat him without incurring the inconvenience and expense of litigation and without the risk of a contest in a court of law. Hereafter if this doctrine be adopted, if any man claims to be seated and that the return be amended, will he be such a fool as to enter into litigation in the courts when he can get a member of this House to rise and move that he be seated, because the procedure of going to the tribunal we have appointed to try these questions is both inconvenient and expensive? The matter was referred, as the House is well aware, to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. After I made the motion that it should be so referred, a good deal of criticism took place, which I had not the opportunity of answering at that time. The very singular argument was advanced that inasmuch as I had contended that the House ought not to deal with this question, I was entirely inconsistent in moving that the question be referred to a committee of the House. The hon. gentlemen inside this House who presented that criticism are well aware of the relation which the Committee on Privileges and Elections bears to this House. It is a committee that advises the House as to the procedure which ought to be adopted in relation to questions of this kind, and in moving that it be referred to that committee I felt I had only to show that it was a case wherein the law and precedents were not perfectly plain in favor of the motion made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Skinner) in order to convince the House that, at least, it ought to stay its hand until it had consulted the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That committee stands in relation to the House just as a man's counsel stands in relation to him, and the House consults its committee on all questions in relation to which law and precedent are not perfectly plain, and, therefore, in urging the House the other day that this was a case that ought to go to the committee and not be decided by a majority vote, I was simply urging that the case was not so plain that we ought to deal with it without the advice of that committee, which was so competent to deal with it. That committee has dealt with that subject. It has appointed a sub-committee to search for precedents. I need not say what those precedents are. From the time when the present system of disposing of controverted elections was adopted, the committee have not reported a single precedent for the interference of Parliament in any case of this kind in either House. But the committee, on the contrary, have come to the conclusion :

"That the question raised as to the holding of the said returning officer as respects the candidature of the said George G. King is one cognisable by the Supreme Court in the Province of New Brunswick under the provisions of the Contested Election Act, and that no objection has been made as to the qualification or eligibility of the said George F. Baird to sit in the House of Commons if he be duly elected for the said electoral district.

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the committee the House ought not to declare that the said George F. Baird is not entitled to sit in the said House, but should leave the case to be disposed of under the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, it being the intention, spirit and policy of Parliament that all questions as to the validity of the election of members to the House of Commons should be decided by the ordinary legal tribunals of the country instead of by the House of Commons."

It will be perceived by the language of that report that the committee have adopted almost the words of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) in his speech on a motion to have the returning officer of the county of Victoria brought to the Bar, which were :

"But when Parliament transferred the trial of election petitions to the judge, and expressly provided that the conduct of returning officers might be complained of, and they might be made respondents to petitions, Parliament thereby expressed a preference for that mode of investigation, or, at any rate, a petitioner could adopt that course. Under those circumstances he did not think it would be proper to ask the House to enter into an investigation of the conduct of that returning officer pending the election trial."

I suppose it was expected by all the members of this House when the question was before us at an earlier day that the right of Mr. King to this seat, so strongly asserted by his friends on the Opposition side of the House, would have been made the subject of a petition to the court. The House will remember that, when it came up, the date at which the time for petitioning would expire was somewhat remote. The time for filing an election petition expired, I think, on the 9th of May. The question was discussed in the House on the 28th of April, and I am sure that the line of argument which was adopted, and the large vote which was recorded, gave ample information to everybody concerned that the course of leaving this matter to the courts would be insisted on as this case proceeded. But, Sir, on the 6th of May, more than three days before the expiration of the time for presenting an election petition, the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections was presented to this House, so that there was a most distinct and emphatic notice to everybody concerned that the person claiming the seat would be left to his remedy by election petition. Notwithstanding that, for the reason which was given by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), that Mr. King considers that the procedure which has been deliberately adopted by the statute is too inconvenient and expensive, the time for petition has been allowed to go by. I submit that this is not a sufficient reason why Parliament—

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I said more; I said that he felt that it was not incumbent on him to do what it was the duty of this House to do.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is simply saying that Mr. King takes the same view as the hon. member for St. John, and thinks that he ought to have the seat conferred upon him without establishing his right to it in the tribunals of the country, by which the statute law of the country says that right shall be determined. For my part I regret that the time has been allowed to go by within which this question could be submitted to the courts. It is not the fault of the majority of this House that such has been the case, and I am sure that the House has heard with satisfaction the statement of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) this afternoon, that he will be prepared to place his resignation in the hands of the Speaker, in order that Mr. King shall not be deprived of the right to an appeal to that constituency again, if the House should, in its pleasure, think proper to pass the Bill which is now before it, to remove the technical question as to the validity of the lists on which the election was run. Entertaining these views, and still holding the opinions which I expressed on a former occasion, I venture to move that all the words after "that" in the motion be omitted, and the following words substituted :—

"The House adopts the report of the Select Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections on the case of the election for Queen's county, N.B."

Mr. DAVIES. The House has had the advantage this afternoon of hearing the case of the sitting member for Queen's (Mr. Baird) presented from two different standpoints, one by the sitting member himself, wherein he entered into an argument to prove, on the merits of the case, that the conclusion of the House should be on his side, and in which, after arguing the case on the merits, he implicitly submitted to and acknowledged the full jurisdiction of this House, and stated that he was ready to abide by such vote as the House might give. We had, then, the argument of the Minister of Justice who, more astute than the sitting member for Queen's county (Mr. Baird), knowing that the case could not be defended on its merits, feeling that he could not stoop to defend it on its merits, ignored that branch of the case altogether, and asked the House to reject the voice and vote of the people of Queen's county on the ground that it had no jurisdiction in the matter at all. The hon. gentleman confined his argument entirely to that branch of the case, and before I sit down I hope to say a few words in reply. I would like, however, first to say one or two things in reply to the statements made by the sitting member for Queen's (Mr. Baird). That gentleman stated that he was induced to become a party to proceedings which, if I were not in the House, I would describe as disreputable, because he heard that some proceedings were about to be taken by somebody else in the adjoining county. He acknowledged that he felt, before he became a party to these proceedings, that the people had in open election declared by a majority, which has been unquestioned and is still unquestionable, their preference that the late member, Mr. King, should again represent them in Parliament. He felt before the election took place that he had no hope of defeating what he expected to be the verdict of the people; but looking all about him and feeling that he had no confidence in the sheriff and but little confidence in the people, he determined, if possible, to get a returning officer to do his work for him. He said: I looked around the county, and I found a gentleman who possesses a family name which will surround him with a certain degree of reputation. His parents before him—and I am willing to accept his statement—were very respectable people; in fact I gathered from him that blue blood flows through the veins of this gentleman. He holds a high position in the county, and, therefore, he says he selected him to do his work, and now he has done that work; Parliament has summoned him before them and not having punished him the hon. gentleman takes it that he goes home with a clear character. Well, if that is the hon. gentleman's deduction from the evidence given before the House the other day, I am sorry for it. He argues that Dunn did rightly, that he had judicial powers down to the moment of sending the return to Parliament—and with that view of the case I will deal later on—and then the hon. gentleman very heroically challenges Mr. King to meet him in court and discuss the matter before the judges. He says: I will sit here at a salary of some $1,200 for the Session; you, Mr. King, must put up $1,000 in court, you must abide by the chances of technical objections, you must forfeit your seat in Parliament for this Session, you must stand the chances of appeals from court to court while I will fight you at the public expense, because I shall be receiving money as a member of Parliament which will enable me to defend the action. This is the heroic challenge he throws out. He may well do that. He has got that which the electors did not elect him to have; he is sitting in this House not having received the majority of the votes of the electors; the gentleman who has received that is outside. Now, the hon. gentleman says, I am in possession; I am receiving $1,200 a year with which I can go on and fight the matter in the courts if my opponent dares to go there; and he claims that his action is a heroic one. I had hoped, when I saw the hon. gentleman rise in the House to-day, that he was going not only to place his resignation in your hands, but ask the House and his leader to do that small measure of justice that ought to have been done before, and put the gentleman who is entitled to the seat in his right place in this House. He has indulged in prophecies and boastings as to what he is going to do if the time comes for him to resign. I did not understand him, as the hon. Minister of Justice says, to pledge himself to any time when he would resign. I remember, in the Prince Edward Island case, that the gentleman who got himself returned by the sheriff to a seat in this House, although he polled a minority of the votes, appealed to his friends to confirm the return of the sheriff. He was successful in his appeal to some of the members of that House, because he had promised them privately that when he was confirmed he would resign. But it is known to everybody in this House that, after the confirmation of the sheriff's act was passed, he remained here during the whole four Sessions of Parliament and never resigned at all; and I very much fear that the precedent which has been set in that case will be followed by the gentleman who at present sits for Queen's, if the House are foolish enough to confirm him in his seat. Now, as I stated, there are two questions before the House. One is, whether Parliament has a right to deal with the case at all; and the other is, whether, if it has the right to deal with it, the merits of the case are on the side of the sitting member or on the side of Mr. George King. The Minister of Justice takes the ground that no precedent for our action can be found in either the Imperial Parliament or the Parliament of Canada. I take distinct issue with him on that point. I say there are numerous precedents. I say there is a long, unbroken series of precedents from the year 1832 down to the present time, in which Parliament has asserted successfully its jurisdiction in matters exactly similar to the present case; and these precedents govern this case. The hon. gentleman says no precedent can be found in England for Parliament interfering where a minority candidate has been returned by the returning officer, and seating the other candidate. He knows very well that no precedents exist for the last 100 years, where any returning officer has been found so false to his duty and so false to his oath as to have returned the minority candidate to Parliament. That fact has been reported to this House in the report of the Election Committee which he desires this House to confirm. In that report the committee say that they have been unable to find any case during the long interval of the last 100 years where the minority candidate was returned to Parliament. That being the case, the hon. Minister of Justice could very easily declare that he could find no precedent where the minority candidate was ousted. How could the precedent occur? The minority candidate was not there to oust. But if he had been there, no one who follows the precedents and practices of the English House of Parliament can doubt for a moment that that Parliament would rise to a sense of its own dignity and assert its privileges by ousting the intruder without any delay. Sir, I contend, as a matter of law, that the rights which this House can exercise respecting the election of its members have not been in any degree minimised by the passage of the Controverted Elections Act. I state that as a clear principle of constitutional law, and I think I have the authority, not only of the leader of the Opposition, but of the leader of the Government, for that position—that the same rights which this House retained to itself when in former days it relegated the trial of election petitions to the Election Committees of the House, these same rights the House continues to retain after it has relegated the trial of election petitions to the judges of the land. There has been no change. Almost the same words which were used in the old Controverted Elections Act, for referring the trial of controverted elections to the Election Committees of the House, are used now in the Controverted Elections Act; and the hon. gentleman knows well that the principle is this: that while the House will not entertain any petition questioning the return of a member, having relegated to the courts of the land the right to receive and determine upon such petitions, at the same time the House has never failed, of its own motion and in its own right, when the facts are brought before it, to consider all the facts set forth in the return of a returning officer; and if it believes he has returned the wrong man, to make him amend his return accordingly. Why, Sir, if we take up the precedents cited in the report of the subcommittee to which this case was referred, we find that away back, in 1848, the House commenced to exercise its rights in this regard. We find in the Beauharnois case and the Kent case, before the Act of 1851 was passed, the House exercised those rights. In the Beauharnois case, which is almost precisely like the present one, it declared that the majority candidate should be returned, and it directed that the return should be amended, and it was amended accordingly. The Kent case was a similar case, and the House made a similar declaration. Then, we have the Canadian Statute of 1851, which declared that all election petitions received by either House should be referred to the General Committee on Elections, for the purpose of choosing select committees to try said petitions; that the House should refer the petitions in each case to the said committee so appointed and sworn; and that they should there try their merits, and determine whether the sitting members, or any or what other person were duly returned or elected, or whether the election was void. In other words, that statute conferred on the Select Committee on Elections the same powers which we afterwards conferred on the judges of the land, under the Controverted Elections Act. That is a position of law that the Minister of Justice cannot controvert. If we had power before the Controverted Elections Act was passed, to consider and determine on cases of this kind, we have that power now, because we did not by that Act divest ourselves of any powers we had previously. We only conferred on the courts of the land those powers that we previously conferred on the Election Committee. What are the precedents since 1851? We have a long line of precedents where the House has uniformly declared its right, and exercised its right, of passing upon the returns of members of this House, and has declared whether the majority candidate or the minority candidate should be placed in the seat. I think in nearly all the cases—certainly in all of them but one—the House did exercise that right. We have the Gaspé case, the Bagot case, the Lennox and Addington case, and the Essex case, with which hon. members are acquainted, and the Muskoka case. It is true there is the West Peterborough case, in which the decision of the House was in direct opposition to that in the Muskoka case. That is the only one in the long line of cases from 1851. Then we have the King's county election case: and in that case what did the House do? The House determined that it had a right to pass upon the special returns made by the returning officer. The returning officer returned two men as elected. We can see whether this House retained to itself the power to determine which of the two returned should remain as a member, or passed that power over to the courts of the land. The hon. the leader of the Government, and I think nearly every supporter of the Government, declared this House still retained the power, and they acted on that declaration by voting that the minority candidate should come here. They may have been right or wrong in the conclusion at which they arrived, but all that I say is that they asserted the jurisdiction of this House in the matter. In England what do we find? The hon. gentleman would lead this House to believe that it was only in cases of disqualification, arising from personal disqualification on the part of a candidate, that the House of Commons in England had ever attempted to act, but he knows that the House of Commons in England have not stopped there. He knows they have not stopped in the case of those who have been charged with treason and have been convicted of crime. In the Sydney Waterlow case they went one step further, and declared that a person who was disqualified by reason of having an interest in a public contract was disqualified from sitting in the House, and they stated that the Parliament of England had a right so to declare and to oust him from the House. That is a case in point. The hon. gentleman cited the Victoria case, which he evidently thought as a case of authority, and I think I am not going too far when I say he unjustly declared that the leader of the Opposition had used language in favor of the proposition he was submitting to this House. I say not only did the present leader of the Opposition, who was then Minister of Justice, not use such language, but he used language the very opposite. If the hon. gentleman had read a little further in that speech, he would have found that the leader of the Opposition carefully and in chosen language declared his opinion that the House had reserved to itself the powers we say it has reserved, and ask it to exercise. In the Victoria case, an election petition was then pending in the courts of law. The court had cognisance and had taken charge of the case. A petition was then presented, a concurrent petition, by some of the electors to this House, to ask it to interfere at the very time the courts of the land were determining upon the case.

Mr. THOMPSON. No, that was another enquiry altogether.

Mr. DAVIES. Not at all; I am stating the facts.

Mr. THOMPSON. The speech that I quoted from was the speech of the hon. member for West Durham made when it was proposed to arraign the returning officer, and not a speech made in any debate which occurred on the petition.

Mr. DAVIES. The speech which the hon. member quoted from I had in my hand when he quoted from it. It was the speech delivered 20th March, 1875, on a question of privilege. The hon. member for West Durham proposed to call the attention of the House to a question of privilege arising out of the petition which it became his duty to present to the House, and which was then printed. That was a petition from certain electors of the county of Victoria asking this House to interfere in the matter of that election, and to interfere with respect to the action of the returning officer.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman had better read what my hon. friend for West Durham said, and he will see I am giving the correct version. The hon. member for West Durham said:

"That petition being forwarded to him, he believed it to be a duty incumbent upon him as a member of Parliament, to give the petitioners the opportunity of stating their grievances, or alleged grievances, by presenting the petition to the House. Of the accuracy of the facts therein stated, he had no further knowledge than he drew from the facts that those signatures to the petition were appended by parties, and the petition came to him from a source which was a sufficient guarantee for the genuineness of the signatures and the respectability of the names. He desired to call the attention of the House to the subjects of which the petition complained, and the course which it appeared to be proper to invite the House to take in regard to it. The petition complained of certain matters in connection with the last election for the county of Victoria. It might be divided into two parts—one with respect to the appointment of the returning officer, and the other with respect to the conduct of the returning officer in the execution of his duty."

That is just exactly what I stated.

Mr. McCARTHY. No.

Mr. DAVIES. The returning officer.

Mr. McCARTHY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES. The returning officer and the return he made to the House; the complaint that he made an improper return:

"He was informed that the petition was now pending in the proper court for the trial of controverted elections for the county of Victoria, and in that petition of course it was competent to the petitioners to prefer any complaint they might have as to improper conduct on the part of the returning officer relative to the merits of the petition."

So we see the hon. member for West Durham at that time contended, and his contention was not controverted, that the matter of the petition which came before this House was cognisable by the court of New Brunswick where the election petition had been filed. And what did he hold? He held that, under those circumstances, it would not be prudent for this House to take and decide upon a matter which was cognisable, on a proper election petition, by the courts of the land. He went on to say that while he could not invite the House to deal with the petition under these circumstances:

"He would be very sorry to believe that the House had been deprived, by the position of the Controverted Elections Act, of its power over returning officers and deputy returning officers—of its power to investigate complaints made against them and to punish them for improper conduct. But when Parliament transferred the trial of election petitions to the judges, and expressly provided that the conduct of returning officers might be complained of, and they might be made respondents to petitions, Parliament thereby expressed the preference for that mode of investigation, or, at any rate, a petitioner could adopt that course. Under those circumstances, he did not think it would be proper to ask the House to enter into an investigation of the conduct of that returning officer, pending the election trial."

He said, therefore, the courts of the land have cognisance, have jurisdiction over the matter and they are exercising it now. The same parties apply to us to exercise a jurisdiction which, he says, I do not doubt we possess, but as Parliament has already expressed preference for that mode of investigation before the judges, or, at any rate, has given the petitioner power to take that course, and as that course has been adopted, I will not ask the House to interfere. What did the right hon. the leader of the Government say then? Did the Minister of Justice quote that passage from the speech? Did he intend to give any fair statement of the constitutional principle as laid down by the hon. member for West Durham? He not only did not do so, but he used language calculated to convey to the House an impression directly opposite. What did the leader of the Government who was then leading the Opposition say as to the rights and powers of this House to interfere in matters of this kind? He said:

"He was glad the hon. member did not propose to ask the House to consider the points raised in the petition when the election case was before another tribunal; at the same time it was not to be supposed that the House had abandoned its rights to control, censure, and, if need be, punish, returning and deputy returning officers."

The only reason he asked this House to stay its hands was the reason I have just read, that, at that moment, the matter was before the courts of the land on a petition filed by one of the electors. So I think we will see that, so far as precedent is concerned, so far as the English precedents are concerned, they are in favor of the position we take. Now, what do the text-writers say on this point? I will quote to the House an authority which is generally received with some respect, May, on Parliamentary Practice, in which he gives his views of the position in which Parliament stood before the passage of the Controverted Elections Act and the position in which it stood subsequently to the passage of the Act:

"A few words will suffice to explain the proceedings of the House, so far as its judicature is still exercised in matters of election. It being enacted by section 50 of the Election Petitions, &c., Act, that 'no election or return to Parliament shall be questioned except in accordance with the provisions of this Act,' doubts were expressed whether this provision would not supersede the proper jurisdiction of the House, in determining questions affecting the seats of its own members, not arising out of controverted elections. It was plain, however, that this section applied to the questioning of returns by election petitions only. When controverted elections were tried by committees of the House, a sessional order required 'all persons who will question any returns' to 'question the same within fourteen days;' and under that order election petitions were received. In parliamentary language, therefore, to question a return was to controvert it by parties interested—not to adjudge it by the House itself. During the continuance of that judicature, the House never attempted to interfere with controverted elections, but after the time had expired for receiving election petitions"—

And this is a point to which I want specially to call the attention of hon. members:

"after the time had expired for receiving election petitions it always held itself, not only free, but legally bound to determine all questions affecting the seats of its members, as numerous precedents attest."

Not as the Minister of Justice attempts to lead this House to believe, not the limitation which he placed upon their powers, questions merely affecting the disqualification of members returned, but, in the language of May, all questions affecting the seats of members of the House:

"Where returns were questioned by petition, the matter was determined by the statutory tribunal; otherwise the House uniformly exercised its constitutional jurisdiction. And such continued to be the position of the House after the judicature of its election committees had been transferred to the judges."

Now, nothing could be plainer than that. It shows that the House at all times and under all circumstances had maintained that which I maintain is really necessary to its independent existence—its control over its own officers and over the returns they make to the House; and if we part with that, and by resolution to-day declare that, no matter how grossly wrong or partisan the return of a returning officer may be, unless some one chooses to question it, the returned member may sit in this House, we will be striking a blow at the independence of Parliament from which we will be a long time rallying. Supposing a returning officer chooses to think that it is more desirable in the interests of the public that he, himself, should be returned and not the man who receives the highest number of votes; suppose he chooses to return a man who is not a candidate at all; suppose any of these extreme cases, or suppose a case which is almost as flagrant, that he returns a man who obtains a small minority of the votes, this House, if they adopt the resolution of the Minister of Justice, will declare that they are powerless, and that, unless some one files a petition in the court, they are not going to question the election at all. The personal right which an elector or a candidate has to take advantage of the Controverted Elections Act and file a petition in the court is one thing. The right which this House has to purge itself of members who are improperly sent here is a higher and a very different thing; and I maintain that that right has never been questioned and cannot be questioned. The House always possessed it and possesses it now. The hon. gentleman went on further to argue, as another reason why the House should not take up the case, that in one sense the case was already before the court, and I felt rather sorry that a gentleman occupying the position he does, as Minister of Justice, should attempt to use such an argument. He says, the question of a recount is before one of the courts, and I ask Parliament to pause while that question is there. The hon. gentleman knows well, no one knows it better, that under the peremptory statute of the land no question of a recount can be taken up, that the time has long expired.

Mr. THOMPSON. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that it is not possible to have that recount now.

Mr. THOMPSON. Nothing of the kind.

Mr. DAVIES. The hon. gentleman knows well that the matter must be brought before the court within a certain time.

Mr. THOMPSON. So it was.

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Mr. SPEAKER informed the House that he had received a Message from the Senate transmitting to the House of Commons an address to her Majesty the Queen congratulating Her upon the completion of the 50th year of Her Majesty's auspicious reign, and requesting the concurrence of this House.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

QUEEN'S, N. B., ELECTION.

Mr. DAVIES. Before recess I was calling the attention of the House to the argument which had been advanced by the hon. the Minister of Justice, to the effect that the matter which is now being considered by this House is substantially before one of the courts of the land, and, therefore, that we should hold our hands, and I was endeavoring to show the hon. gentleman was not correct in that statement. The matter before the House now is a very simple one, namely, whether, in the case of a returning officer who is charged with the performance of certain specific duties by statute, and who, acting in direct defiance of the directions of the statute, returns a candidate who received the minority of votes, this House has jurisdiction to correct his palpable error. That is not a matter over which any county court judge has any jurisdiction whatever; it is not a matter over which the officer charged with the summing up of votes could give an opinion which would be effective one way or the other; but I go further, and I say that the proceedings which were originally instituted in the recount are practically at an end. The initiatory proceedings probably, as far as I know, were we all taken, and I will assume, for the purposes of the argument, that there was jurisdiction on the part of the county court judge to recount the votes. But what are the facts? In order to carry out the jurisdiction which the law gives to him, it is essential that the returning officer should, in the words of the statute, in obedience to the command of the county court judge, appear before him with the ballot boxes and the papers. The law says that :

"He shall give a command to the returning officer to produce before him the ballot boxes and the papers, which command the returning officer and his election clerk shall obey."

Now, the facts are that John R. Dunn, the returning officer, did not obey the command of Judge Steadman to appear before him with the ballot boxes. He disobeyed that order, and the county court judge was incapacitated from proceeding any further. The law says :

"The judge shall proceed, as far as practicable, de die in diem, with the recount."

But he could not proceed, he could not begin, because the returning officer, in this respect as well as in every other respect, violated the direct commands of the statute. The statute says further that :

"The returning officer shall delay making his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until he receives a certificate from the judge of the result of such final decision and recount."

But the returning officer, John R. Dunn, did not delay making his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until he received that certificate. The returning officer prevented the possibility of such a certificate being given by the county court judge, and he did, in defiance of the statute, and while a recount was pending, make his return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. And over and beyond that, this House, one of the highest judicial courts of the Dominion, has issued its mandate and taken from the returning officer the ballot papers and all other papers connected with the election, and has thus practically put it beyond the power of the county court judge to make a recount even if this rule for the writ of prohibition was discharged. Therefore, I repeat what I said before recess, that there is not a recount now pending practically. There cannot practically be a recount held. It is dead, and it is a refinement of irony on the part of the Minister of Justice to say that there is a proceeding pending before one of the courts of the land now, the result of which may be to dispose of the matter which is now before the House. He says further that the House has no jurisdiction in this matter at all. This House has already claimed to have, and has exercised, jurisdiction in this matter. When the question first came before the House, if the Minister of Justice, leading the House, thought the House had no jurisdiction to act upon the matter, why did he not lay down that proposition in a resolution, and ask the House to pass upon it? So far from doing that, he asked the House to seize jurisdiction of this matter, and the House, in response to his request, did seize, and I think did so properly, jurisdiction in the matter. After seizing jurisdiction, it referred it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, so that the House claimed to have and exercised jurisdiction in the matter. The Committee on Privileges and Elections took evidence upon the matter, kept the whole case pending before them until almost the last day when it was competent for any elector to petition the election court to have right done there, and then, at the last moment, they make a report which the hon. Minister of Justice now asks us to adopt, in which they declare that it is contrary to the spirit and policy of Parliament for this House to decide a question of this kind at all. But I maintain that the House is not bound to ratify, and would not be justified, under the facts before it, in ratifying the conclusion of the majority of that committee. That conclusion contains statements which I say are not the fact. That conclusion embodies the statement to which I would be sorry to give my adhesion, namely :

"That the returning officer has returned that George F. Baird, a candidate at the said election, has been duly elected to represent the said electoral district, the said returning officer having held that George G. King had not been duly nominated as a candidate at that election."

This House is asked to commit itself to the proposition that John R. Dunn, the returning officer, had authority to hold that Mr. King was not properly nominated, after he had received the nomination; after he had received the election fee; after he had given a receipt for the payment of the money; after he had acceded to the demand for a poll; after the poll had been held; after a majority of votes was summed up by him in favor of the candidate whom he did not wish to return. I maintain, if there was any judicial power in the returning officer at all, that power had to be exercised by him upon the nomination paper upon the nomination day, when the paper was handed in to him; and I go further, and I say it is perfectly plain that he did exercise judicial functions at that time; that he did declare, as he ought to have done, as he did perfectly properly, that the nomination paper was a good nomination paper; that the money so received was properly paid, and he gives the statutory receipt certifying to that fact, and announces to the whole people of Queen's county that George G. King is a perfectly proper and qualified candidate for whom they can vote. Having done that, and the election having been held, and because, forsooth, the majority of the electors chose to return Mr. King instead of the candidate he desired to have returned, he turns round and says: I will now reverse my judicial decision given ten days ago, before the election, and declare that those proceedings were a perfect farce, that the people were voting when they had not a right to vote, and that the votes given for Mr. King were a perfect nullity. I am quite sure that the Minister of Justice will not commit himself to the proposition that, assuming Mr. Dunn to have had judicial functions and to have exercised them in that way, he could, ten days afterwards, after the election was over, reverse his own judgment and declare all the proceedings which had been had a nullity. The whole thing is opposed to law and is opposed to common sense. This is not a matter which should be kept entirely in the region of nisi prius. There are higher considerations involved in this matter than those which would govern a court of visi prius. There are matters of right, matters of justice, matters of privilege, matters which affect not Mr. King alone or any individual elector in Queen's county, but which affects the whole mass of the electors in that county; and, further, which affects the whole mass of the electorate of Canada; and more than that, which seriously affects the rights and privileges of this House of Parliament. Then we are told that, while we had power to seize this matter, to refer it to our Committee on Elections and Privileges, now we are to declare that we have no power at all. I say that would be stultifying ourselves. I say it is perfectly open to this House—and it would be a monstrous proposition if it were not so—to refuse to ratify the report of a majority of that committee. Every member of this House is at perfect liberty to vote as he pleases on that question. Now, what did that committee report? There was possibly a scintilla of justification for the ground they took, which was that at that time there was a concurrent jurisdiction, at any rate, in the courts of the land to which it was competent for any elector to appeal and get justice done, and therefore they said: We will leave the people to their rights in the election court. I did not agree with that argument, but assuming it to be good then, what is to be said now? The time has expired when any elector can appeal to the court. There is no court in the land which has any jurisdiction in the matter except this high court of Parliament. There is no court to which the electors can appeal for justice. We have the right and we have the power, and I say it would be a monstrous proposition for us to refuse justice to these men when we are asked in this way to do it. It is not a personal question for Mr. King, it is a question of our own rights and privileges, and as, I said before, the rights and privileges of the electors. Now, Mr. Speaker, having said so much upon the power of this House to dispose of this matter, let me say one or two words upon the merits of the case itself. Sir, we are face to face with a very strange state of matters. The law declares in language which cannot be misunderstood, which could not be misunderstood even by that very respectable person, Mr. John R. Dunn—the law declares in language so plain and clear that it needs no lawyer or counsel to advise him on it. "The candidate," it says, "who, on the summing up of the votes, is found to have the majority of the votes, shall be then declared elected"; nothing can be plainer than that. What does the returning officer say? He says: I will not act in pursuance of that declaration in the law, however clear the language may be. The law is mandatory, imperative, not merely directory. He must do so, and it is in the interest of the public at large, in the interest of constitutional Government, in the interest of the rights of the people, that the law prescribes that its minion shall not have jurisdiction, but it says that he is to add together the number of votes received by each candidate, and declare the result accordingly. The law goes on to make assurance doubly sure in the 65th section, where it declares that the returning officer shall declare that the candidate having the largest number of votes has been duly elected, and shall forward his certificate to that effect to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The nomination paper was submitted to him by Mr. King, which he received as a nomination paper; the money was paid to him, for which he gave a receipt, a receipt, Sir, which the law says shall be sufficient evidence of the payment therein mentioned. But, after having given that receipt, and after having received that nomination paper and proclaimed Mr. King a candidate, on the summing up of the votes he now says: I will reverse my judgment, and I will declare that all the proceedings are irregular and void. Now, I will not repeat my argument that his judicial functions were at an end, but I will come to the one point made by those who say there was a shadow of excuse for the conduct of the returning officer. Sir, under our law, we know that $200 is to be paid as an election deposit, and it is contended that the deposit must be paid by the election agent of the candidate. I will undertake to say, Mr. Speaker, that if hon. members vote that to be the law, and they were honest, many a man in this House, after voting that way, should get up and resign his seat. I will venture to say that there are dozens of members sitting to-day in this House, who did not pay the deposit through the hands of their election agent. I have no hesitation in saying that I am one. I did not pay my $200 through the hands of my election agent, and why? Because I doubted very much, as I doubt now, whether a person putting himself in nomination can legally constitute a person an agent until his nomination paper is accepted by the returning officer. In the section that prescribes that $200 shall be paid to the sheriff or returning officer, the law does not say that it shall be paid by the election agent; it says it shall be paid to the returning officer, and that the receipt of the returning officer shall be sufficient evidence of the legal and proper payment. But it is said there is a clause in the statute, section 118, which prescribes that all payments are to be made through the election agent. That is so, but to what does that apply? That clause, Mr. Speaker, is a literal transcript of the English law, copied word for word. In the English law, of which this is a copy, no deposit of the character that we make is required to be made, therefore the word "deposit" in this section, and which some hon. members seek to twist into the deposit of $200, cannot bear that construction in England, for no such deposit is to be made. That being the case, I submit that the payment can be made legally by the candidate himself, or by any person on his behalf, as well as by the election agent. My own impression is that the election agent is not properly appointed until after the money is paid, and the nomination paper received. Now, I think I stated that no case can be found in England, in the British Empire, for the last 100 years, where a returning officer has acted in the illegal, arbitrary, and unfair manner in which John R. Dunn has acted, and which the Minister of Justice asks this House to ratify. But, Sir, there is a case somewhat analogous, somewhat parallel to this, and I would like to call the attention of gentlemen who may have any doubts on this case before the House, to the reasons given by the learned judges who decided upon it. That was a case in Ireland, called the Mayo case, and was decided in 1874. There were three candidates for election. The two hours which the law prescribes for receiving nominations had elapsed. Two of the candidates had appointed their election expense agent, and had put in their nomination papers. The third candidate had put in his nomination paper, but had not appointed his election expense agent. As soon as the time for holding the court was up, the two candidates who thought their papers were perfect, demanded that they should be returned by the returning officer, and that the nomination of the third candidate should be ignored on the ground that he had not appointed an election expense agent—very similar to the ground that Mr. Dunn takes here, in fact, I think that it is the very ground. Now, the returning officer yielded to the objection, and without calling for a vote, he exercised judicial functions at the moment, and declared these two men to be regularly elected, and would not grant a poll. Of course, a petition was immediately filed in the court, and I wish the House to bear with me while I read the short decisions given by the judges in this case. We have had strong language used in this House with reference to the outrage, as it is termed, which John R. Dunn has committed upon the rights of the people, but the language which we have used in this House is not as strong as the language which the learned judges used from the bench. They characterised the conduct of that returning officer as an outrage upon the election law, and they said the only thing that relieved the case was the inconceivably ludicrous aspect of it, and they wondered that any man should be found so wanting in brains as to make such a ridiculous return. Mr. Justice Morris said :

"In this case none of the court, I believe (I can certainly say so for myself) have a shadow of a doubt about this case, or have had such from the time we heard it raised ; and for my part it appears to me almost inconceivable how such a decision could have been arrived at by any person.

"It appears, however, that this gentleman, the sheriff, who I presume is a country gentleman, was not assisted by an assessor, and I may add, parenthetically, that when sheriffs allow themselves to be influenced, forced I should say, into making such ludicrous decisions as this it ought to be cautioned to fortify themselves by the advice and assistance of counsel."

The learned judge does not scruple to say that the returning officer was forced to make this ludicrous and illegal decision ; and I am not going beyond the bounds allowed to a member of Parliament when I say that it is perfectly apparent, from the explanation made by the sitting member, that he was the man who got John R. Dunn appointed because he saw no other chance of winning the election, and that Dunn was forced to make the return he did. The learned judge goes on to say :

"This case comes very little short of what it was opened to us by Mr. McDermott as an outrage upon the law of election. A party is put on nomination ; the sheriff has the fullest power under the Act of Parliament of investigating his nomination paper, and seeing that he was properly nominated and seconded, and there his control ends ; he has only to go on with the election. The suggestion made here is that he would be open to any remarks made in the town as to whether the candidate had committed bribery, and I think that would be a most irrelevant enquiry. Cases were cited which had no more bearing on the question before us than the case of the six carpenters would have had ; as to whether this gentleman (the petitioner) had paid to the sheriff a sum of money for the expenses of the election, or whether it was a mere statement that he did so ; in my opinion a most irrelevant and idle enquiry ; for if he paid it ten times over it would have had just as much to say to the case as if (to use Mr. McDermott's illustration) he wore a white hat or had fur on his coat. In this case I have no doubt. The rest of the court will express their opinion individually—that the election must be declared null and void ; and I can only add that I really think such a thing could not occur in any other part of Ireland than in Mayo."

I would certainly hope, were it not for my late political experience, that this case could not occur in any other riding than in the riding of Queen's, N.B. ; but I am sorry to say I do not entertain such a belief, and I have no hesitation in expressing my belief that if this House ratifies the conduct of John R. Dunn and declares that the minority man be returned, that he has a right to come here and has a right to retain his seat, John R. Dunn's conduct will have many a parallel at the next election that takes place in Canada. This case is so à propos of the one now under discussion, I will ask the permission of the House to quote the judgments of the other two learned judges. Mr. Justice Keogh said :

"I am entirely of the same opinion. The case would be serious if it were not so intensely ludicrous, that it is impossible to look upon it except in a ludicrous aspect. The case before us states that all the three persons were duly nominated. Every one of the three was entitled to a poll. An objection was then made that the petitioner had not appointed an expense agent. That, however, had nothing to do with the duty of the sheriff in appointing a day for a poll. Even supposing it had, at twenty-five minutes past two an expense agent was duly nominated by the petitioner. The ground was then shifted, and the agents for the respondents said to the sheriff: 'we object to your receiving a nomination of an expense agent, for the day is over ;' and in five minutes afterwards, at half past two, the sheriff acting under the advice of counsel for the respondents, proceeded to declare them duly elected. That is really the ludicrous part of this case ; but suppose it was tolerated, there is no reason why every sheriff in Ireland should not do the same, and if so it might happen that every member for Ireland would be returned by the sheriff. These two gentlemen have at present as much right to be members for the county of Mayo as any man who hears me."

If it were parliamentary I would say that the sitting member for Queen's has as much right to sit here as any one of the spectators in the galleries, and no more.

"Yet if there were a close division in the House of Commons on an important political question, they might decide who should be the Prime Minister for the next five years. I do really concur with my brother Morris that in no other part of Ireland—I may go further and say, in no other part of the British Dominions—could such a thing have occurred as has happened in this case."

The learned judge did not know of the case of the county of Queen's, and the existence of John R. Dunn. The judgment of the Lord Chief Justice Monaghan was as follows :—

"I am as anxious as the other members of the court to express my opinion on this case ; not that I have the slightest doubt upon it. It appears that, according to the Act of Parliament, it is the duty of a person coming forward as a candidate to appoint an expense agent on the day of election ; but the Act does not go on to say that the election is rendered void, if this expense agent be not appointed. It merely says that the party who may pay money for the expenses of the election, without having an expense agent, will be guilty of a misdemeanor ; but that has nothing to do whatever with the duty of the sheriff in appointing a day for a poll. Without any shadow of doubt all these gentlemen were duly nominated. It was the duty of the sheriff to appoint a day for a poll, and his not having done so renders his return null and void."

There is a case, decided unanimously by three judges of eminence and repute. There is a case entirely on all fours with ours, in which the Lord Chief Justice gives a decision on the very section of the Act of which ours is a copy, in which he shows the serious consequences which may follow if we vest in a returning officer, a minion of the law appointed by the Government for the time being, the power to defeat and quash the will of the people and to return a member to this House. We sit here with authority and power because we boast that we are the representatives of the people at large, but in this case we see a candidate sent here according to the political caprice of the returning officer and in defiance of the will of the people. If one returning officer can do that twenty or thirty returning officers can do the same thing, and the result will be that we shall have representatives here not representing the opinions of the people, but the whims of those officers appointed by the Government for the time being. In this country the people are supposed to rule, and if the Liberal party are true to their instincts, and if hon. gentlemen opposite will rise to-night above mere paltry party considerations, and discharge their conscientious duty, the people in this case will rule and the man they have elected will be placed in his seat. The day has gone by when men can be elected otherwise than by the will of the people. It is all very well to talk about loyalty to the Crown, but loyalty to the people is something better. We are talking in this Jubilee year about the great commercial prosperity of this country, and about the advance we have made in our political institutions, and it will be a crowning disgrace to this Jubilee year if the Parliament of Canada endorses the conduct of a returning officer in sending a man here in defiance of the will of the people. If that is done, we had better go back to the old times and adopt the old method :

"The good old rule, the simple plan,
That he will keep who has the power,
And he will take who can."

We shall then know that it is power and not law that rules in this country. I have heard an expression of opinion come from some hon. gentlemen, and come from their hearts, too, that they would not have been surprised, and, perhaps, they would not have been sorry either, if when the people found their voice and their wish thwarted, they had acted summarily in the matter and punished the man who attempted to do so. I, for one, rejoice that they are a peace-loving people, and I trust that Parliament will prove itself equal to the exigencies of the case, and rise above the contemptible party spirit and register its determination that in Canada the will of the people shall prevail. In order that a square vote may be taken upon this matter, I move the following amendment to the amendment :—

That all the words after the word "That" in the amendment to be struck out, and the following substituted instead thereof:—"at the late election held in the county of Queen's, New Brunswick, for the House of Commons, two candidates, namely : George G. King and George F. Baird were nominated, a poll demanded, and granted, and duly held, and on the summing up of the votes polled, the candidate, George G. King, had a majority of sixty-one votes. That the returning officer nevertheless returned the defeated candidate, the said George F. Baird, as elected, and that it was his duty instead to have returned the said George G. King, who received the said majority of votes, as the member elected, and that said returning officer (by name, John R. Dunn), be forthwith summoned to attend at the Bar of this House and amend his return accordingly.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I hope the House will be willing to listen for ten minutes to some sober argument, as a measure of relief from the splendid rhetoric, the somewhat intoxicating declamation, with which we have just been favored by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). Representing a New Brunswick constituency, when this case first came before the House, I had a feeling of regret that the parties who felt themselves aggrieved, by reason of the conduct of the returning officer, had brought their grievances away from the court which sat with open doors in New Brunswick, up to this House, where so much of our valuable time has been wasted with results which I think we will all find in the long run are not very profitable. There are so many points of agreement between the legal position assumed by the hon. gentleman in the earlier part of his speech, and my own, that I can in a very few minutes say all that I have to say by way of reply. He glanced at the distinction between two privileges of Parliament which I desire to set out at a little greater length—though not at great length—namely, the distinction between the privilege of trying controverted elections and the privilege of expelling unworthy members. For the former, the English Commons fought for hundreds of years, but, after party Government was organised, it was found to be a dangerous one; and I may say that the history of the growth and abandonment of that privilege is a very curious illustration of the curved lines along which political progress is made. Let me distinguish the privilege of the House of Commons to try controverted elections, from another privilege equally ancient and equally important, namely, the power of expelling from the House its unworthy members. I undertake to say that every case cited by the hon. gentleman in English practice since 1868, as an illustration of the doctrine that the English House of Commons has retained jurisdiction to deal with disputed elections, is but an illustration of the exercise of the second privilege—a privilege which they never abandoned, and which they have always maintained as necessary to the dignity of the House of Commons. In cases belonging to the first of the two classes which I have mentioned, experience has shown that committees of the House were incompetent to give a proper trial, because the facts were involved and legal points difficult. But the assertion of the older privilege, although in some small measure it involves a judicial enquiry, still, as stated five weeks ago by the Minister of Justice, is commonly a simple enough matter. I say that all the English cases since 1868, in which the English House of Commons has interfered with the seats of members, are cases in which they have expelled unworthy members; I care not what the nature of the unworthiness, whether they were debarred by sex, or age, or intellectual infirmity, whether by the fact that they were peers of the realm, or that they were felons, or had violated the Independence of Parliament Act, but not a single one of the them will you find of the nature of the case which is alleged to exist here, namely, one in which some alleged defect took place in the conduct of the elections, whether up to the nomination day, or between nomination and polling day, or between polling and the day of declaration, or incident to the return. In all the English cases relevant to our enquiry where, since 1868, a member's seat has been attacked in the House, the ground of attack has been the disability of the member by reason of his own status or act, and not by reason of the illegal conduct of the officer concerned with the election. If we take the Waterlow case in 1868, which was cited by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), we find that the facts were simply that the House of Commons said that a contractor was under the ban of the

Mr. DAVIES.

Independence of Parliament Act, and that he should not sit in the House. It was a perfectly easy matter to determine whether the claimant in that case was entitled to the seat. They had simply to prove that A. B. was a contractor and that the claimant was A. B., and the matter was at an end, but the present case involves a much more elaborate, troublesome and complex enquiry. Then if we take up the case of O'Donovan Rossa in 1870, the House of Commons simply declared that they would expel a felon; if we take the case of Mitchell in 1875—a case which was dealt with twice, the House said the same; or the case of Michael Davitt in 1872, or the case of Bradlaugh in 1883, in which the House of Commons said that a man who had not taken the oath should be expelled—if you take all those cases you will find that they belong to the category of cases in which the House asserted its right to expel unworthy members. So that I say if members are laboring under any disabilities by reason of their status acts or omissions, the House has reserved the power to say that such persons shall not sit. The hon. gentleman quibbled a little about the phrase "personal disabilities," used by the Minister of Justice, yet he gave us no better phrase, and, though he challenged, he did not impair the Minister's statement that in no single case since election trials had been relegated to the courts did the English House of Commons look into a matter of controversy that had any bearing or connection with the conduct of elections as a matter in dispute, and the matter in dispute here is one which is intimately related to the conduct of an election. In the Canadian cases we have the case of Louis Riel in 1874, in which the House expelled an unworthy member; we have the case of Victoria, N.S., in 1875, in which the House was not asked to attack the seat of a member; it was not asked to seat anybody, but it was asked to deal with the returning officers. Now we were dealing with a case of that kind a few days ago, but we have done with it, and we are asked now to deal with a question touching the seat of a member. In the course of that debate in 1875, a very able lawyer, the member for West-Durham (Mr. Blake) expressed very strong and clear opinions which the Minister of Justice quoted to night; and I may say that I think that when the member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) charged the Minister of Justice with not having read enough of that speech, he made a ludicrously irrelevant charge, if such an adverb is not unparliamentary. It is true that the Minister of Justice did not read the whole speech of the leader of the Opposition, but he did read all that part of it that bore in the slightest degree upon the question before the House, and if he had read further he would have introduced matter which would only complicate the question before us. I say the Minister of Justice would have done wrong if he had read any more of the speech; he would have confused the House; and when the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., went on to read what the hon. member for West Durham had said about the power of the House over returning officers, and what the right hon. leader of the House said about the same thing, he introduced issues that are not pertinent to this discussion, and was simply confusing the House. In discussing the Victoria case (1875), a distinction between that case and the present was drawn by the hon. member, who says that, as a matter of fact, there are not now proceedings pending in the New Brunswick courts. I understood him to say that the matter was practically dead. I am sorry the senior member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) is not in his place, for I think he knows the facts better than either the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I., or myself. I am speaking subject to correction, but I think the facts were not correctly stated. I believe that within the time fixed by statute, a day was properly named for the recount by the county judge, and if this rule nisi for the writ of prohibition given by the judge of the Superior Court be not made absolute, I believe that the judge will go on with his recourt; and I believe that Mr. King understands it so, and is pursuing his remedy in reliance on those sections of the Act quoted by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. The only other case in Canada that bears on the discussion is the difficult case of King's, P.E.I., in 1883. With reference to that case I think there will be but one opinion, that whatever be the jurisdiction of the House, it was ex necessitate compelled to deal with that case. There came a return which some hon. gentlemen called a double return, which on the other side of the House was called a special return. The man with the highest number of votes, Mr. McIntyre, was declared a member, the man with second highest number of votes, Mr. Robertson, was declared by the returning officer to be disqualified, and the man with the third highest number, Mr. McDonald, was said to be elected. My view is that it was an informal return, the substance of which was that Mr. McDonald was returned, and that the House corrected the informality and formally in terms declared Mr. McDonald elected. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., shakes his head; but if he says that it was material to the conclusion that the House should find Mr. Robertson disqualified, we come back to the distinction drawn by the Minister of Justice some days ago, and restated to-day, that it was a case of disqualification under the statute. Just as the statute says that contractors may not sit here, and just as in the old country peers cannot sit in the House of Commons, so members of the Local Legislatures are disqualified from sitting here.

The only strong point the hon. gentleman made in his contention was made when he quoted from May. I think the cases are against him. I do not think he finds, either in the modern English cases or in any of the Canadian cases, any authority for the position that the House must exercise jurisdiction. I do not think he finds any authority even for the position that the House can exercise jurisdiction in a case of this kind. But I frankly admit that he did score a point when he quoted May; yet he glided lightly over three or four sentences, though he read the whole paragraph. Those sentences I will read again. From 1770 down to 1839 a large committee conducted trials of petitions; and after 1839 a smaller committee of 13 members, under Sir Robert Peel's Act, conducted them until the trial of petitions was relegated to the courts:

"When controverted elections were tried by committees of the House, a sessional order required 'all persons who will question any returns,' to 'question the same within 14 days'; and under that order election petitions were received."

During those 14 days the House was not competent to try them at all.

"During the continuance of that judicature the House never attempted to interfere with controverted elections."

Now, I call the attention of the House to the fact that when the aggrieved parties in Queen's, N.B., brought their case to the House, that old judicature, or the equivalent of it, was open to them, that the 30 days had not run out, and that the parties, by the very terms of May, were wrong in coming here when they could have taken their grievance to the courts of justice.

Mr. DAVIES. The parties did not come here. The House took the question up as a question of privilege. There never was a petition before this House at all.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I recall that statement, then. Let me say that if you follow this paragraph you will see that it is what may be called an obiter dictum; it is an unsupported and a loose dictum. I think both the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) will agree with me that while Sir Erskine May is the highest authority on parliamentary practice, he is not recognised as the highest authority on questions of constitutional law. The hon. gentleman opposite smiles, but I will take the responsibility of giving that estimate of this distinguished writer. I think, furthermore, that it is the duty of the author, in formulating that proposition, to support it with citations, which he has not done. But I frankly grant that from the text of the book the hon. gentleman has made his point. The hon. member for Queen's, N.B. (Mr. Baird), standing in his place this afternoon, asked what I thought a very pertinent question—why the parties carried their grievances away from Queen's up to Ottawa? We have heard a great many reasons given. One was that the interval was so short that Mr. King was not able to file a petition in the courts, and to get his trial before the first Session of the House would have passed. That is a reasonable statement; but I think that in twenty years there have been but two instances when the elections were held so close upon the sitting of Parliament. Therefore, that is a grievance which is a rarely occurring one. It is also said that the reference to the courts is dilatory and expensive. The answer to that given by the hon. Minister of Justice is that that is an attack on the Act of 1874, and that this House cannot by resolution repeal any section of an Act of Parliament. If our opinion be that judicial trials are dilatory or expensive, the true way is to take steps to repeal the statute, and not in this piecemeal way to try to cut down the provisions of an Act of Parliament. There is a notion that somehow parties can get a fairer trial in Parliament than they can in the courts, that different rules and canons for interpreting the statutes prevail here from those observed by the judges. This, I need not say, is a perfect delusion; we have no power to make any new canons for the interpretation of the laws that we participate in making. They say, lastly, that if this House is not bound to entertain the case, the Minister of Justice, or a returning officer, the minion of the Government, as the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I., said the other day, may, after every general election return the candidate of the Government, though he should be in the minority, and thus cheat the candidate who should have been returned, out of his first Session. I answer that any returning officer who should do this is liable to a double punishment. He is liable, in the first instance, to a heavy penalty under the Act; and, secondly, he may be compelled to come before the House and undergo an examination as did the returning officer for Queen's county yesterday, and be punished if guilty. Of all the questions which have been raised in this matter, the only one properly before the House, to my mind, is that of jurisdiction. Have we the jurisdiction in this case? Are we empowered, under the constitution, to take up an enquiry such as this? Hon. gentlemen opposite say we are, and urge the doctrine of concurrent jurisdiction. That doctrine, I hold, is a very dangerous one to urge. I will not say, under the English cases, that we are without jurisdiction, but the cases do not show we are bound to exercise jurisdiction. My own personal view of the matter is that we may, by resolution, decide to exercise jurisdiction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear,

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I think there is no legal reason why we may not, by a resolution, lay down the proposition that the House has jurisdiction, but, taking that position, I say that in my judgment it would be a dangerous rule to lay down. This is a grave constitutional crisis, so far as the election law is concerned; it is a serious matter that the hon. member for Queen's, N.B., is not the man whom the majority of the electors chose to represent them. It is much to be regretted, as between Mr. King and the sitting member, that the right to the seat has not been elsewhere determined, and, furthermore, it is to be regretted that the majority of the electors of any constituency should not have the man of their choice sitting here. There is, however, I contend a greater danger to be feared, and that is that we should give to the majority in Parliament the power, by simple resolution, to take the seat from any hon. gentleman sitting in this House and give it to another. Our constitution would be put more in danger by the exercise of such a power by a bald majority of this House than by the conduct of the returning officer. There was no point made on either side which had such weight, in my judgment, as that emphasised by the hon. Minister of Justice, that it would be a grave and dangerous power to give to a majority of the 215 members here, the right to say that, in their view, any hon. member returned to this House was not properly elected, and proceed to unseat him and appoint another in his place. Hon. gentlemen opposite who are fighting for that position may have reason to regret the course they take. It is we who, in reality, are fighting the battles of hon. gentlemen opposite; it is we who are urging the rights of the minority, and hon. gentlemen opposite may yet thank us for standing by the doctrine that, whatever our constitutional rights may be, it is a dangerous rule to lay down that this House, in a case of this kind, may exercise the jurisdiction claimed for it. Hon. gentlemen opposite, I know, have in their hands a whip, which they openly boasted they would use to scourge us with when we went back to our constituents. They have threatened that they will appeal from this Chamber to the people in the various constituencies. I do not fear their threats. The hon. member for St. John asked, five weeks ago, to vote out the sitting member for Queen's and to put in his place Mr. King; he asked us to deal out Lynch law, to do what the people of a frontier settlement do when a man is committed at noon, hanged at night, and the judicial faculty is exercised the week after in ascertaining whether the right man or the wrong man was hanged. We do not propose to deal out this law here. We do not propose to yield to a blundering, rude desire to have speedy justice meted out, but we intend to comply with the spirit and form of the law. The hon. member for the city of St. John the other day expressed his contempt for lawyers and for legal ways, but if he will look back to history, he will have reason to think better of lawyers, for he will find that at critical times they have been the saviours and guardians of the State. It has been said by an illustrious French jurist, 50 years ago, who had the un-English gift of understanding people whose laws and habits were different from his own, that one of the strongest guarantees for the security and peace and order of the English Empire was the respect the people had for its laws, and their disinclination to interfere with the course of the law. Sir Henry Maine, and others who have studied our constitution, have made the same point. That is the sum of our argument to-night. We have examined the matter, and we hold that the aggrieved party should have gone to the courts of New Brunswick and there sought remedy. I will take this opportunity of saying, as I sit down, that in my personal judgment a wrong has been done. I believe that Mr. Dunn blundered. I believe, from all the facts, that Mr. Baird is not entitled to his seat, and I was very much delighted to hear him say that he would resign his seat.

An hon. MEMBER. When will he resign?

Mr. WELDON (Albert). The hon. gentleman heard what he said as well as I did. I was delighted to hear the sitting member say that, for it seems to me that while we are here to-night fighting the battle of the minority in this House; while we are fighting the battle of hon. gentlemen opposite, the early resignation of the member for Queen's, N.B., will give that protection to the majority of the electors of Queen's county which hon. gentlemen opposite are not prepared to give, whether through cowardice or through fear that their legal position is not as strong as it should be, or through fear that the disclosures in the courts would open that constituency and cause them in fair contest to lose it, or that, at all hazards, they want, at the sacrifice of the rights of the electors of the county, to score a point against the Government, to win a new battle cry. But when Mr. Baird resigns his seat, he will be fighting the battle of the majority in Queen's county, as we are fighting the battle of the minority in this House. I shall support the amendment of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. AMYOT. I must congratulate the speaker who has just sat down upon his moderation and the sense of honesty with which his words show he is imbued. In some of the principles he has expressed, we all agree. The principal difficulty is the question of the jurisdiction of this Parliament or rather of this House, because this is not the Parliament. If it were the Parliament of Canada, of course there would be no question whatever, but the difficulty, the hon. gentleman says, is to know whether the House of Commons has the right to expel a member and to put another in his place. It is a well known principle that every constituted body is the guardian of its own dignity, and the guardian also of the personnel or of the members who compose it. If the House of Commons has no jurisdiction, who will give us jurisdiction? Shall we petition the Senate or the Executive? Who is above us here in our House? Who is above the representatives of the people? We say we have given to the courts the right of deciding about the elections. Yes, but does that take away the right that we have to look out for our dignity and to see that those who sit with us are really members? It is true that the tribunals have been charged by us with the function of deciding the elections; but in the past year they had no right to deprive us now of the right, or to exempt us from the duty, of looking out to see who are those who sit with us. We have no power to day to deprive those who will sit to-morrow of the rights inherent to a House of Assembly. As to the jurisdiction of the House it is a very simple question. We may do concerning ourselves anything we please. It is not a question of right; it is a question of discretion. As the people are not disposed to choose men unfit to represent them, and as we are 215 here, we are supposed to act with discretion. Well, we have the right to do what we please, but we are supposed to do it with discretion, and the question to-night is to know whether or not we would act with discretion if we were doing such and such a thing. Did the ministerial party doubt its jurisdiction when it decided to put Mr. Robertson aside and to put Mr. McDonald in? Was there any doubt then? We then thought the thing most simple. Some contended that there was no jurisdiction, but everybody on the other side got up and said we had jurisdiction. So there can be no question at all about the jurisdiction. They say there is concurrent jurisdiction. I will say that if there was concurrent jurisdiction, I would for my part hesitate before using our own power, because it is always dangerous to give to the parties the use of their powers in these circumstances; and, if the courts had still the power, I would hesitate before voting as I will vote; but I think I will demonstrate in a moment that the courts have no more any power whatever. It has been admitted, and I think there is no use in discussing that point any more, that a fault has been committed. There is a grievance; somebody suffers, and there must be a remedy. That is the English maxim, based upon common sense and justice—there is no wrong without a remedy. Here we are in presence of a wrong, a serious wrong. Not only one man suffers; not only Mr. King suffers; but the whole county suffers, and the whole country suffers, and the whole country may suffer more still, and there may come circumstances wherein the existence of the Cabinet may depend upon one vote. Then what would be the position? What would be the responsibilities? What would be the consequences? It is admitted, then, that a fault has been committed.

Should we interfere? There are many reasons why we should interfere. First, the error is a public one; it is a public wrong, and it is a clear one; and the injustice is gross, is manifest. In the second place, if we do not act—and here I draw specially the attention of the hon. the Minister of Justice—if the Parliament does not act now, there will be no remedy. In the first place the time for contestation is over. That is admitted, I think. Everybody admits that the thirty days are over. But we are told there is the ballot to be recounted. Did I understand well that the ballot is still to be recounted? Did I understand the Minister of Justice aright; is that what he said, that the counting of the ballot is not over?

Mr. THOMPSON. I said it had been given in evidence at our bar that Mr. King was still pursuing in the courts of New Brunswick his remedies in relation to the recount and in relation to the prohibition.

Mr. AMYOT. So the ballot is not over. If the ballot is not over the election is not over, and what right has Mr. Baird to come here, and to have been here a moment ago addressing us? If the ballot is not over—

Mr. THOMPSON. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question to him? If the election is not over, what right has Mr. King to be seated?—and he is pursuing his remedy.

Mr. AMYOT. If the ballot is not over it is no more over for Mr. Baird than it is for Mr. King. The effect must be the same for both.

Mr. MITCHELL. If my hon. friend will allow me, I may say in reply to the Minister of Justice that the motion does not ask to seat Mr. King.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, it does.

Mr. MITCHELL. The amendment to the amendment asks that the returning officer be called to the Bar of the House to amend his return.

Mr. THOMPSON. What right is there to ask him to do that if the election is not over?

Mr. MITCHELL. There is a perfect right.

Mr. AMYOT. There is no use in trying to put a shade before our eyes on such a question. When we, the representatives of the nation, have to discuss and decide, we must take the facts sincerely as they are. I am sure that the honesty of the Minister of Justice will be struck by that reasoning—if the ballot is not over, the election is not over, and the Government should never have allowed Mr. Baird to come into this House and address the Assembly; if the ballot is over, that is, if the recount is no more possible, there is no other remedy than by this Parliament; and if such be the case, the Government, if they go on with their motion, will take the responsibility of having here for five years a member who is elected by the minority; they will, in the eyes of history, pass for men using their majority to increase the same, and to diminish the minority in the House, and to take away the rights of the majority in the county of Queen's. This is the position, and I am sure that the hon. members of this House will understand it as I do myself, and will find that what we are doing now is this: We are trying, by subtleties of the law, to take away the right of a man, to take away the right of the majority of a county, to take away the right of a minority of this Parliament—by subtleties of the law, by all sorts of precedents which you cannot apply to the present law, which is new, we are trying to take away the rights which I described a moment ago. A member, the other day, pretended that the witness, or the accused—call him as you like—wanted a lawyer. Well, I think there are lawyers enough in this House already. All the strength that the use of the law, that the study of the law may give to cover an injustice seems to be employed in the present case. For my part—I do not speak now as a lawyer—I do not undertake to follow these precedents, but I say this: Justice is justice everywhere, and is the best safeguard of the liberty of any people. I say to those who are laymen: Take care, gentlemen, what we are doing now is this: We are going to try and cover injustice under the pretext and veil of law. That is the short and the long of it. There is a man who has received a majority of votes. He should be here; he has a right to be here; his county has a right to see him here. But the majority in this House take upon itself to say: No; we, the majority, acting by party spirit, will cover up this injustice which is so manifest, and we will give the seat to the minority candidate. That is what they are trying to do. But I am sure the Parliament of Canada respects itself too much for that; I am sure the Parliament of Canada will say that the county which has elected Mr. King has a right to be represented here. Sir, on the 22nd of February last there was a man who was an officer of this House of Commons; he did what he should not have done. Well, let us do what he should have done, and let us put things in the position where they should have been put on the 22nd of February, and after that let the parties seek their respective rights in the courts. You propose to say to Mr. King: Go to the courts. By what right can we say to Mr. King: Find a thousand dollars, look after a lawyer, go to the court 50 or 100 times, endure all the anxiety of a lawsuit, carry your case to appeal, fight for three or four years, perhaps, and after that you will perhaps have your rights. Sir, he has the majority, and he has the right to sit in this House, and to wait until he is attacked. Let Mr. Baird look out for his $1,000, and bear the trouble and expense of a trial. In the name of law, in the name of common sense, in the name of justice, in the name of the dignity of this Parliament, we ought to do here what the returning officer should have done on the 22nd of February; and we should say to Mr. Baird: Carry your case to the courts; and to Mr. King: You have the majority, come and sit with us.

Mr. ELLIS. I desire to say a word or two about some remarks made by the hon. gentleman who sits for Queen's. I do not propose to take up the personal questions with regard to myself to which he referred. I desire, however, to point out to the House that Mr. Baird declares that he went into the county of Queen's and found arrayed against him, as it were, Mr. Justice Steadman, the revising barrister, Sheriff Butler and Mr. Babbitt, the registrar of the county. He found that all these were men in whom he could put no confidence whatever. Now, if these remarks made any impression upon the mind of the House, I would like to call attention to the fact that Mr. Justice Steadman, the county judge and the revising barrister, was appointed to first office by the Government of the present First Minister, quite a number of years ago. Mr. Butler, the sheriff of the county, was appointed by a Local Conservative Government in sympathy with the Government of the right hon. gentleman; and Mr. Babbitt, the registrar of the county, and who was, I presume, the clerk of the revising barrister, was also appointed to the position he holds by a Conservative Government. I am sure that these men are considered by all who know them, to be men of character and men of probity. There is no question, whatever, that Mr. Butler, the sheriff of the county, a man who has filled that office for ten or twelve years, can be trusted anywhere. He is not a partisan. I really did not know, until I saw it stated during the discussion that has arisen on this matter in New Brunswick, that Mr. Butler was a Liberal. With regard to myself, the sitting member for Queen's made what he supposed a very strong point against me: that I had published in a newspaper in the city of St. John, some remarks about him in reference to this election. Well, Sir, I must confess to the fact that I did publish several remarks. The question was one which largely affected the Province, it was one in which there was a strong public opinion, and I endeavored to treat the question as best I could. He charges me further with quoting from a number of other papers. Well, I was glad that once in my life, at any rate, I was able to find so many leading Conservative journals in Canada agreeing with the views I expressed in the journal I edited. It afforded me the greatest pleasure to be able to quote from the Ottawa Citizen, the Montreal Gazette, the Toronto Mail, and a large number of other journals which are undoubtedly organs of public opinion of the Conservative party, and which, on that occasion, expressed the very best thought of that party, as I believe. I think I did nothing wrong in that respect. I do not propose to go into the legal question at all. The matter does not strike me as a legal question. The Minister of Justice is very anxious as to precedents. Let the Minister of Justice on this occasion establish a precedent which will redound to his credit and to his honor. Let him establish a precedent which can be referred to in the future as one in which this House did simple justice. The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), who is a constitutional doctor, I believe, admits there is a wrong, and that this House can repair it; but with singular inconsistency he says: Do not do what is right because at some future time it may become a precedent for somebody else to do wrong. Now, I do not think that is a kind of argument that would appeal to any ordinary mind. He also makes a point from the fact that the sitting member for Queen's offers to resign. As I understood that offer, he said he would resign when the electoral lists were revised, and as the Minister of Justice has a Bill before the House to postpone the revision for some indefinite period, it looks to me as if the resignation would be postponed to some indefinite period. I can only say that I hope, as was said by the hon. gentleman who last preceded me (Mr. Amyot), that the House will do justice in this case.

Mr. GIROUARD. The question before the House is not, as it was put by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), whether an injustice has been done to the electors of Queen's county, but the question is whether we have jurisdiction in the matter at all? The question is not whether the time has lapsed in which the parties interested could file an election petition, or complaint, before the ordinary court. It is not the fault of this House if Mr. King or any of the electors of the county of Queen's (N.B.) have not taken the necessary steps to have their rights maintained. It may be an inconvenience, but I presume similar inconvenience may be felt in many other counties where some fraud or some violation of the statutory law has been committed. This is altogether a question of law; it is an important point of parliamentary procedure, or rather as to jurisdiction in election matters, and in the few remarks I propose to offer to the House I intend to consider it as much as possible from a judicial point of view, as I have done on past occasions, for instance in the King's county election case when I had the misfortune to differ from both sides of the House. To-day, I find myself in agreement with the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. There can be no doubt that for centuries the law and custom of Parliament had been that the House of Commons had the right to declare who was entitled to sit in that House, and I presume that right continued to exist until it was repealed by more recent legislation, superior to the law of the House of Commons. I presume that the privileges and powers of the House of Commons continued to exist until they have been repealed and surrendered by the House of Commons, under the authority of a statute of Parliament. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), asked: Where was the authority superior to this House? There is one authority superior to this House: it is the law of the land. When the Crown or the House of Commons have surrendered or renounced any of its privileges and prerogatives, those privileges and prerogatives can no longer exist until they are reestablished by the same authority that abolished them—that is by Parliament. Has the House of Commons ever renounced the privileges and right of taking cognisance of election matters? The hon. member for Queen's, Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies), said there was an unbroken line of precedents establishing the jurisdiction of this House in matters of this kind. He referred to precedents in England before 1868. I contend that they have no bearing whatever upon the issue. If he referred to precedents in this country before 1873, I say that for the same reason they have no application.

Mr. DAVIES. Why?

Mr. GIROUARD. I will tell the hon. gentleman. Until 1868, in England, there was no such provision as the one to be found in section 50 of the Imperial Election Act of 1868, and reproduced in the Canadian Statute of 1873, which says that all elections held hereafter shall not be questioned otherwise than under the provisions of this Act. Until 1868, in England, the trial of controverted elections was held under the Grenville Act of 1770, and also under the Act of Sir Robert Peel of 1848, which created certain committees to decide election cases. We had the same procedure in Canada under the Statute of 1851, which is mentioned in the report of the subcommittee which is incorporated in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to be found in the Votes and Proceedings of this House for 12th May last. In 1868, for the first time, the British Parliament enacted that no election shall be questioned. That provision is not to be found in the Grenville Act of 1770, or in the Act of Sir Robert Peel of 1848, or in the Canadian Statute of 1851. It is not to be found in any statute in England or in this country, before 1868, in England, or 1873 in Canada. I am going, therefore, to pass over all precedents before the Statute of 1868 in England, and the Canadian Statute of 1873, as having no bearing whatever on the question under consideration. If we look at the language of the Imperial Statute of 1868, or the Canadian Statute of 1873 which reproduces it, it is very plain, and it does not require the learning of a lawyer to know its meaning. It says no election shall be questioned except under the provisions of that Act. What does that mean in plain language? Does it not mean that, hereafter, the House of Commons will not interfere in election matters? Is not that the plain meaning of it? I ask laymen who understand the English language whether such is not the case. If the same language occurred in the Grenville Act, or in the Act of Sir Robert Peel, I would say that precedents before 1868 have an application. But it is not to be found there, and it is only to be found in recent legislation. Let us see what are the precedents in England as well as in Canada, under the terms of the recent statute. In England there were five cases bearing on the subject, and in every one of those cases the House of Commons interfered only when it was a question of the personal disqualification of the candidate. I refer to the case of Sir Sydney Waterlow decided in 1868, a very few months after the Imperial Act was passed, which case has been referred to during this debate. Then there is the O'Donovan Rossa case which was decided in 1870; the case of John Mitchell in 1875; a second case of John Mitchell decided the same year, when the House of Commons of England laid down a different doctrine from the one laid down in the first case. In the first case, the House held that Mitchell was disqualified from sitting in the House of Commons. When the question came up a second time the House would not interfere, and I look upon this last decision as contradicting the first one. We have finally the case of Michael Davitt decided in 1882. All those were cases of disqualification; not a single case of illegality of an election or even of fraud at an election. The hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) insisted very strongly on the Mayo case in Ireland, where a great fraud was consummated on the electors, just as it is said a gross fraud was perpetrated on the electors of Queen's, N.B. That may be, but where did the parties go in the case of Mayo? Did they go to the House of Commons? They went to the courts.

Mr. DAVIES. There was no election.

Mr. GIROUARD. We know that the courts of justice have a right to interfere only when an election is held. There was a nomination of three candidates and the returning officer omitted one nomination, and proceeded to the election upon the nomination paper of the other two candidates.

Mr. DAVIES. He declared the two elected.

Mr. GIROUARD. But did the person whose nomination was passed over by the returning officer go to the Imperial House of Commons to complain? No, he went to the ordinary courts of the land, and that is exactly what Mr. King or any of his friends should have done. I challenge any hon. gentleman to point to a single case where the House of Commons in England has interfered in a matter as to the legality or illegality of an election, in fact, in any matter where the disqualification of the sitting member was not at stake.

Mr. DAVIES. It is not a question here of legality or illegality. The election was legal, but the returning officer did not return the one he ought to have returned.

Mr. GIROUARD. If the election was all right, why do you complain against Mr. Baird?

Mr. DAVIES. Because the returning officer gave a false return.

Mr. GIROUARD. Cases of false returns are relegated to the courts, as well as cases of illegal elections. This is a question of an undue return, of illegality in the conduct of the election by the returning officer. It is certainly not a case of disqualification on the part of either of the candidates, and, therefore, the precedents in England have no application; on the contrary, they prove beyond doubt that we have no right to interfere in the matter. As I have said, I shall not call attention to Canadian precedents before 1873, because they have no bearing whatever. I would refer to cases decided by this House since the Statute of 1873, which, as I have already quoted, says that no election held hereafter shall be questioned, except under the provisions of this Act. The first case reported in the proceedings of this House is the Perry case, which is not quoted in the report of the sub-committee that is incorporated in the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections upon the present case. The question in that case was whether Mr. Perry was qualified or not—whether his resignation as Speaker of the House of Assembly of Prince Edward Island had been sent in at the proper time. It was, therefore, a question of qualification. The Committee on Privileges and Elections in that case, was of opinion that the resignation was sufficient, and the House gave the seat to Mr. Perry. However, seeing that there was some doubt in the matter, the committee recommended that a Bill of Indemnity be introduced in favor of Mr. Perry, and it was introduced accordingly. The next case was that of Louis Riel, which has already been referred to by one of the speakers who preceded me. That was also a case of disqualification; and it was moved that as Riel was a fugitive from justice, having already being charged with murder, that he was disqualified from taking a seat in the House, and it was in consequence declared that he was not entitled to his seat. The third case is the Gaspé case which was decided in 1874—not the Gaspé case which is mentioned in the report of the sub-committee, but one which is still more striking in its bearings upon the present matter. On the 20th April, 1874, it was moved that the petition of Mr. Horatio LeBouthillier praying that the return for Gaspé be amended, and that, as a matter of privilege, the name of Mr. LeBouthillier be inserted instead of the name of Louis George Harper, he being at the same time the returning officer. The Journals of the House, page 84, state:

And objection being taken to the receipt of this petition on the ground that the subject was one which should only come "under the cognizance of the courts of law, as provided by statute," the petition was refused by the Speaker.

The member for Queen's mentioned that if returning officer Dunn was allowed to proceed as he had proceeded, he might have declared himself elected. Here is a case in point in which the returning officer was a candidate, and was declared elected. He was returning officer, he allowed the clerk to proceed with the election and he became a candidate.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). The returning officer did not return himself in that case. He resigned immediately at the commencement of the election and left the papers in the hands of the election clerk, and the return was made by the election clerk.

Mr. GIROUARD. Is it not true that the writ of election was addressed to himself?

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Yes.

Mr. GIROUARD. And was he not then the returning officer? After the writ was addressed to himself he resigned and became a candidate, and he was declared elected. I will take the liberty of quoting somewhat at length from the opinions held by leading members of the House at that time, and as the Hansard was not published then I can only quote the report of the newspapers of the day, and in fact the only paper that published a complete report was the Mail. Mr. Palmer, at present one of the most distinguished judges of New Brunswick, says:

"He thought the election court very clearly covered the case, and it (the petition) should not be received."

Then Sir John A. Macdonald said:

"It had been ordered by Parliament that all petitions praying for election returns should go before a different tribunal, in order to take away from the House all interference in such questions. He thought that they should avoid making such a precedent, and that they should come to the understanding that any petition that should go before the judges should be refused in the first instance by the House. Such a course would relieve Parliament of a great many petitions and a great many tasks.

"Mr. Kirkpatrick said that the petition complained of the undue return, and prayed that the return might be amended. The election court was the proper tribunal to try in such cases. The House ought not to be dragged into the arena of party politics.

"Mr. Cauchon said they had their own laws with regard to contested elections, and only in extraordinary cases the House claimed jurisdiction."

Mr. LANDERKIN. Yes, extraordinary cases.

Mr. GIROUARD. It does not mean that extraordinary cases are cases such as the one now before us. The Gaspé and Victoria cases were just as extraordinary. Mr. Cauchon went on to say that he thought the petition ought to be referred to the judges.

"The Speaker said he had no precedent to guide him in deciding as to whether the petition ought to be received by the House, and, therefore, he left it entirely to the House to determine. Consideration should be given to the question in order that in the future similar petitions might not again be presented. His opinion was that the petition should not be received."

Then you have the case of Victoria, Nova Scotia, in which there was a complaint about certain irregularities in the election, and the House would not entertain the complaint. Finally we have the King's county election case, which was one of personal disqualification, the point being whether one of the candidates had resigned as required by law. Here, then, we have in Canada five cases decided since the Statute of 1873, and every one of them was a case of disqualification, except that of Victoria, N.S., and in every one of them the House of Commons refused to interfere, except when the sitting member was personally disqualified. It is not necessary for me to call the attention of the House to the fact that such able counsel as Mr. Matthews, Q.C., who was Home Secretary of England, and Mr. Edward Clarke, Q.C., who was Solicitor General, the former in 1870 and the latter in 1882, expressed the opinion that even in cases of personal disqualification the House of Commons had no right to interfere, except when the disqualification had taken place after the election. These eminent lawyers were of opinion that in such cases the statute was inapplicable. It is not necessary, however, to examine that point. It is sufficient to notice, that in England, as well as in Canada, under the statutes I have mentioned, not a single interference in matters of irregularity or illegality, or even fraud at an election, can be quoted; all the precedents are in cases where the personal disqualification of the candidate is at stake. I am perfectly willing to accept the jurisprudence of England and of Canada, but I do not feel inclined to go beyond that, to extend it to cases not contemplated by the practice of Parliament. For those reasons I support the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I will vote against the last amendment.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). It appears to me that the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has missed the real point of the matter. He seems to think that we are now dealing with the question of an election. We are not dealing with the question of an election; we are dealing with the conduct of one of our own officers. We are dealing with an election return, the facts of which are all before us above the signature and under the authority of our own officer. Now, my position being rather peculiar in this instance, and somewhat painful to myself, in that I am separating myself on this question from those with whom I usually act in this House, I will be pardoned if I go over the facts of the case. Mr. Dunn was appointed returning officer for Queen's, N.B. On nomination day he accepted a deposit, which deposit was required of the candidate in consequence of an Act passed in 1882. That Act provides that a candidate must have a nomination paper with a certain number of names on it, and says:

"Unless a sum of $200 be deposited in the hands of the returning officer at the time the nomination paper shall be filed with him; and the receipt of the returning officer shall, in every case, be sufficient evidence of the production of the nomination paper, of the consent of the candidate, and of the payment herein mentioned.

Prior to that we had an Act respecting the election of Members of Parliament, in which it was required that payment should be made through an agent. The object of the payments to be made through an agent under that Act was something entirely different from this temporary deposit. That money was required to be paid through an agent in order to prevent corrupt practices at elections, and in order that irregularities or corrupt practices might be more easily detected at the trials of controverted elections. But that had nothing to do with deposits paid in to prevent vexatious elections, to prevent candidates running where the sentiment of the vast majority of the community was against them, and where there was no doubt that they would not be returned. In that case a deposit was required, and was forfeited if the candidate did not get one-third of the votes polled. Well, Mr. Dunn, the returning officer, received the money, gave a receipt for the money and the nomination papers, in accordance with the Act, and the election was held. On declaration day, when, in the presence of the candidates or their agents, the returning officer came to count the ballots sent to him by the different deputy returning officers, he found that Mr. King was duly elected by 61 majority. It was his duty then, and his sole duty, under the statute, to have returned Mr. King, the candidate having the majority of votes. Instead of doing so, reopening the question of the proceedings on the day of nomination, he constituted himself a court of appeal against himself. He heard counsel; various arguments were brought forward and technical points raised, all of which he disposed of except this one point, that the deposit of $200 should be paid in by the hands of an agent. Now, I am perfectly satisfied that the law never contemplated such an objection. The clause of the Act having reference to the deposit of $200 on the day of nomination, was passed nine years subsequent to the passage of the Act respecting the payments of money through an agent. A judge, dealing with a question of that kind, would look at the intent of the Act; and I consider that we are here to-night sitting on this matter in a judicial capacity, and are to decide it on our personal honor, and not on party grounds. Mr. Dunn took it upon himself to decide that Mr. King, owing to this deposit not having been paid by an agent, was disqualified, and that the minority candidate was duly elected. He sent in his return to that effect, accompanying it with a statement of facts showing that Mr. King had a majority of the votes. Then the question arises before this House, whether we have power to deal with an act of our own officer, and power to amend that return. It is not a case of a controverted election. It is a question of a palpable wrong in the papers connected with the return, which are now in the hands of our own official, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. As to the question whether we have power to deal with this return and, with this returning officer's action, as a servant of this House, section 18 of the British North America Act provides:

"The privileges, immunities and powers to be held, enjoyed and exercised by the Senate and the House of Commons, and by the members thereof respectively, shall be such as from time to time are defined by Act of the Parliament of Canada."

Then, by chapter 23 of 31 Victoria, the Parliament of Canada enacted as follows:—

"The Senate and the House of Commons respectively, and the members thereof respectively, shall hold, enjoy and exercise such and the like privileges, immunities and powers as, at the time of the passing of the British North America Act, 1867, were held, enjoyed and exercised by the Commons, House of Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and by the members thereof, and so far as the same are consistent with and not repugnant to the said Act."

So it is not questioned that this House, at the time of the passing of this Act, had power to deal with a question of this kind. In fact, in 1873, before divesting ourselves of the trial of election petitions by committees of this House, and delegating those trials to the judges, a case in point occurred, the Muskoka case, in which various doubts were raised. But, on a motion of Mr. Blake, who was then a member of the Opposition, setting forth the facts, and showing that even under the most unfavorable circumstances Mr. Cockburn was elected by a majority of 26, it was carried that the return should be amended, and Mr. Cockburn was unanimously declared elected.

Mr. GIROUARD. Was that before the statute or after?

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). It was before the statute. We had the power down to that time. Then, later on, so as not to embarrass the business of Parliament, and also in order that the trial of election petitions might be conducted with greater impartiality, we delegated the power to try them to the judges of the land; and in order that there might be no mistake or evasion, the fullest power was given to the judges, in order that no case might arise which could be evaded. But it was never intended that this House should divest itself of that power which, as the Supreme Court of Parliament, we possess, for dealing with the conduct of our own officers when a palpable wrong or fraud has been perpetrated, as has been done in this case, on the returning officer's own statement of the facts. Taking this view, which appears to me to be as clear as the sun at noonday, I cannot be a party to any vote other than that which will give Mr. King, the gentleman elected on the 22nd of February last, the seat in this House. It is not a question of party. It is a question of the rights and privileges, of the honor and dignity, of this House. It is a case in which we are establishing a precedent. If it be said that there are no precedents for such a course, I think there was a precedent, although it was one I did not agree with; it was in 1883, when a gentleman having the minority of votes in King's, P.E.I., was declared a member of this House. That was a precedent in which Parliament took authority into its own hands, and acted without leaving the matter to the courts. I think an injustice was done in that case, and the course I then pursued is a course I have always pursued. I have always had a strong feeling against countenancing returning officers in taking powers such as have been used by the returning officers of King's, P.E.I., and Queen's, N.B. The county which I have the honor to represent has suffered on several occasions from wrongs of this kind. In the Old Parliament of Canada, the returning officer from the county of Essex, on two occasions, was brought before the Bar of the House in connection with election cases; and I have for years entertained a very strong opinion against allowing a servant of this House to take upon himself the authority to deal with matters of this kind. I think the precedent we ought to make should be a precedent that would deter returning officers from, in any case, attempting to exercise authority from a partisan point of view. Any question may be turned into a party question; but in England these questions are not considered party questions, and a member there is left free to act according to his conscience and his honor. I intend to keep myself free to do that on every occasion in which I am fully informed of the facts of the case, and in which I feel my own intelligence to be a sufficient guide. In any matter of the policy of the Government, in which, of course, the Government are better informed than I, I am willing to yield to their opinion, though I may have doubts. In the matter of the National Policy, although I think the Government have gone farther than the country anticipated they would when inaugurating this policy, and although I have serious doubts as to the results of this policy as now propounded, I intend to support the Government of the day. I intend also to give them loyal support in their railway policy and in their administrative policy as a whole; but in a matter such as this, which is clear as noon-day, when I am satisfied Mr. King is entitled to the seat, I cannot place my conscience in the hands of any hon. gentlemen. There is not an hon. gentleman opposite who supposes, for one moment, that I am one inch nearer to them because I take this stand and make this declaration. I do not think it is necessary that I should swear eternal friendship to a man because I decline to be a party to the appropriation of his pocket-book, and I do not think, because I am simply doing what I consider to be an act of justice and right, because I decline to rob Mr. King of his seat, that I am any nearer to those hon. gentlemen or their party. If for no other reason, the manner in which they conducted their recent election campaign throughout the country, and more especially in my own district, was certainly not calculated to draw me any nearer to them than I had been previously. In this case our main consideration ought to be for the personal honor and dignity of the House, and we should be animated by a feeling of esprit de corps. In the present day, we are not troubled with the encroachments of the Crown or of great nobles, as were the Commons of England at one time, but we may be troubled with what is almost equally bad, a spirit of subserviency, and a too great servility to the Government of the day. While I have a strong desire to see these gentlemen remain in power and approve of their general policy, I think it is a mistake for us to give up our individual judgment; and, having formed my individual judgment on this question, I am bound in honor to carry out my views, even though I should be so unfortunate as to have to separate myself from my friends on this occasion. In England, party lines are not drawn in this way. Take for instance the case of Mr. Bradlaugh. Mr. Bradlaugh, we know, refused to take the oath, but subsequently, not having any regard for the oath, he said he would take it. Then the majority of the House of Commons refused to allow him to take it, because he had no regard for its sanctity. Mr. Bradlaugh was a supporter of Mr. Gladstone, and, consequently, Mr. Gladstone would not make a motion to prevent his taking his seat. Sir Stafford Northcote thereupon moved a resolution to this effect, which was supported by many of Mr. Gladstone's supporters, and carried by a large majority in the House. Mr. Gladstone did not resign, because on that occasion the leadership was taken out of his hands; and supposing, in this instance, Mr. King was given his seat, do you suppose, Sir, that would indicate a want of confidence in the Government? Do you suppose that the right hon. the First Minister would not be sustained on a direct vote of want of confidence? This House, I believe, would have the more confidence in him, because, possibly, he might have thought proper to make this an open question. It is a mistake to make a party question of every subject that comes up, and to draw party lines in that way in the House and country. I do not intend to say anything about the conduct of the gentleman who at present occupies Mr. King's seat. He is the guardian of his own honor. I am not here to vituperate him or anybody else. As regards Mr. Dunn, he may have been acting on legal advice, but he had no right to take legal advice. The matter was plain to him; his course was plain. His duty, when the polls were closed, was to sum up the returns of his different deputies, and send the return to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in favor of the man who had the majority of votes. When I think of the great powers Mr. Dunn conceived himself to be possessed of, I am astonished at his moderation; I wonder he did not dispose of both the candidates and seat himself instead of the gentleman he did. For the reasons I have given, being satisfied we have the power in our own hands to deal with this question, I intend to support the amendment of my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island. I think that it fully meets the case, and that it will be a valuable precedent for our future action. I may say, in reference to myself personally, that my action on a former vote in this connection was very much criticised in certain newspapers. I do not believe in that egotism which is always inducing a man to get up and rebut, as a matter of privilege, every trivial thing that a newspaper may say about him. But in justice to myself, and with your permission, Sir, I may crave the indulgence of the House. In this matter, although it was the first vote of any importance that came up in the House, having pledged myself, in a general letter to my constituents, during the recent election campaign, that in this House I would act in a straightforward and conscientious manner, I could not, on the first vote, act in a manner, which, from my point of view, would be anything but straightforward and conscientious. If words mean anything, I had no option but to vote as I did; and as reports were circulated that great feeling was caused in the party by my vote, I have this to say: that in relation to this matter the correspondents of the different newspapers who criticised my actions have entirely, as far as I know, drawn their facts from their imagination. During the years I have been in public life, whether in this Parliament or in the Legislature of Ontario, I have this to say, that no man, whether leader of the Government or a follower, ever asked me how I was going to vote before I voted, or ever spoke to me after I voted with regard to my vote or criticised my action. I saw in one of the leading papers that words had passed between me and some of my friends, and that I had left for my constituency with the intention of resigning my seat. There is not a shadow of truth in that or any of the other statements made respecting me in this matter. If any high words passed, it must have been between gentlemen defending and attacking me behind my back. In my presence my actions were never criticised. I do not know how it is among other gentlemen opposite, but I never knew a case on this side, either in this Parliament or in the Ontario House, where a man was brought to task for his vote. I do not think that any man on this side of the House would tolerate—I, for one, would certainly not tolerate—the interference of any man with what I consider my rights in this House. However humble I may be in ability, however inferior I may be to others in the qualities which constitute a useful member of Parliament, on the question of my vote, and as a representative of an important constituency, I consider myself the peer of any man in this House, and I acted in what I believed to be in the best interests of my constituents when I cast my vote. I have made this statement because I think it is just, not only to myself, but to hon. gentlemen around me, to contradict the statement that I have been made to feel any resentment from a ministerial source or from my colleagues. I was not aware of any such feeling until I saw it stated in the public print. I have fully explained the ground on which I intend to vote, and I regret that I have to take that ground as against those with whom I usually act. I have not the shadow of a doubt about my clear duty in this matter. If I had the shadow of a doubt, in reference to the legal or constitutional ground on which I shall vote to-night, I would give that doubt in favor of the Government of the day of which I am a supporter; but I have no doubt on the question, and firmly believe that we have the right to act in this matter; that it is only a question of expediency, and that, as a question of expediency, we ought to do our duty with a view to the honor and to the prestige of this House. If we expect the country to respect us, we must respect ourselves. What does the honor and credit of this House amount to if we sink in the estimation of the country? If the House is strong in the estimation of the country, it is because in the past great men have been members of it, and the House is sacred to us and looked up to throughout the country owing to the memory of those men. We desire, as far as our humble abilities will permit, to live up to the traditions of this Parliament in the past, and to leave to our successors, untarnished and untainted, the stainless record we have received from the great men who have gone before us.

Mr. COCKBURN. I regret very much that I am one of those unfortunate people who are not blessed with that amount of intelligence which enables them at once to see clear as the noon-day sun through the intricacies of this question, which has been debated here for the last two or three days. Consequently, I am compelled to ask for a little information, and I am the more pleased to do it when I see so many gentlemen of the Opposition benches who are eminent and distinguished in law. I am but a layman myself, but, if I am able to judge by the remarkable examination of the gentleman who was brought from New Brunswick and placed at our Bar, there is in the Opposition sufficient legal lore to answer the little conundrum which I wish to place before them. The hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), whose eloquent address I listened to with the greatest pleasure, confessed, in the midst of his oration, that there was a certain informality in the way in which his deposit was made. It might not be an informality; he might declare that it was not, but he will agree with me that he said his deposit was made in such a way that many members in this House would consider it was an informality, and such an informality as would vitiate his election.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. COCKBURN. Yes, Sir; that is what he said.

Mr. DAVIES. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will state what I said. I said I had not paid my deposit through the hands of my election agent, not deeming that that was the proper way to do it. I paid it through my own hands; and I said I was satisfied that many other members had done the same thing, and that, if they voted to-night that Mr. King had violated the statute in this respect, they would condemn themselves and would have logically to resign their seats.

Mr. COCKBURN. I accept the hon. gentleman's statement, but there are many members who consider that this is an informality, and that, if it were strictly regarded, it would vitiate the election of the hon. gentleman. I therefore put this question to him. If he is prepared to decide questions of this kind by the brute majority of this House, he is put in this position: that I can rise and propose that he be expelled from the House in consequence of the informalities by which he obtained his seat. Is he prepared to leave a question of this kind to a majority of the House, or does he not consider that the House acted wisely in leaving the decision of these questions to the judiciary? I am not a lawyer; I am a simple-minded layman; I have no legal lore; but I put that question to the hon. gentleman, and I have that confidence in his honesty, in his integrity, and in his uprightness, and I know his goodness of nature, that I think he will try and answer the little conundrum to the best of his ability.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down has confessed that he has been unable to see this question as clear as noon-day. Perhaps he has illustrated the reason why he is unable to see into this question clear of all mists by showing that he has totally misunderstood the great question which is before the House by the conundrum which, in his humorous way, he has proposed to my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies). He says that my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island admitted having paid his deposit in a way which some hon. members consider an informality. I do not know whether he can see that there is any difference or not, but he asks: would my hon. friend be willing to submit the question of such informality to the brute majority, as he playfully calls those on that side of the House. This shows an amount of humor and of wit which is quite refreshing in the House at this time of night, but it shows also, on the part of the hon. gentleman, an utter lack of comprehension of the question at issue, because no one has ever proposed for a moment from this side of the House that it would be advisable to submit a purely technical question of law such as that to which he has referred to the brute majority, or to the brute minority, or to a committee of this House. Our contention has been that legal questions of this kind ought not to be decided by the majority of this House, and I quite agree with those gentlemen who have spent a great deal of time in order to convince us of what we admit already, that it would be very unwise and very unsafe to leave to the decision of the House such legal questions as are involved in the making of deposits, the marking of ballots and other matters of that kind. That is not what we are asking. My hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Aymot) put in a very clear way the problem which is now before the House. He says it is the right and the duty of the House to see that none but members of Parliament sit here. Who is a member of Parliament? A member of Parliament is a man who has been elected by the majority of the voters in the constituency for which he ran. He is a member of Parliament and no one else is, no matter whether a returning officer chooses to falsely say he is a member of Parliament or not. What we are asking the House to do is to direct the returning officer to recant the false statement he made when he represented that the gentleman who now sits for Queen's was elected member for that constituency, and to state the obvious, the patent fact which he has stated himself at the Bar, that Mr. King obtained the majority of votes, and was, therefore, elected to represent the county of Queen's, N.B. As my hon. friend from North Essex (Mr. Paterson) said, we are not discussing questions of law, we are not discussing an election, but the action of our own officer. That officer has chosen to state a lie in the return sent in to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and we wish to erase that lie from the record, and to put in the truth which he has been forced to admit before the Bar of this House. Some hon. gentlemen, and my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) in particular, have devoted a great deal of time to proving that we have not the right to try controverted election cases in this House. Sir, no one can be more strong in that belief than myself, and I believe that opinion is unanimous on this side of the House. But the case now before the House is not one of a controverted election, and that is the point that all these gentlemen have missed when they have been spending so much time in proving that we have not the right to try controverted elections. What is a controverted election case? It is a case in which the right of a gentleman who has received a majority of the votes, and has thereby the right prima facie to sit as a member of this House, is questioned on some ground of technicality, or of corruption. For instance, if the returning officer had performed his duty in this case, as directed by law, and returned Mr. King, and Mr. Baird—I must use his name in this case—and his friends had petitioned against that return on the ground that Mr. King had not made his deposit properly, then you would have had a genuine case of a controverted election, then you would have had a case to take before the courts, a case in which the qualification of the man who was elected was questioned by somebody who had a right to question it, and a case which, under our law, only the courts could settle. You have had a case of a controverted election in King's county, P. E. I., when the returning officer made a double return, stating that Mr. Robertson had a majority of votes, but he believed him to be disqualified, and therefore, made an open return. That was a case of a controverted election, or a doubtful election; that was a case where, undoubtedly, the man having a majority of votes should have been returned, because the qualification should have been questioned before the courts in the statutory way. But just where the House should not have interfered, under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman, it did interfere, and assumed to decide the legal question as to Mr. Robertson's qualifications, and to say that at the time he received a majority of votes he was not qualified to be a candidate, and it pushed him aside and declared elected the candidate who had the minority of votes. This was a case where, according to the contentions of hon. gentlemen opposite, the courts alone should have decided the matter, but the House was induced by the leader of the Government to interfere and decide the question of law. Now the case before us is not a controverted election case. There is no doubt here as to who is prima facie entitled to the seat. Mr. King is prima facie entitled to the seat, and if he were returned on his prima facie rights, he would have a right to sit here until the courts should have declared that he had not a right to be here. But until then, the gentleman who has been sent here in his place by the lying return of the returning officer, has no more right to be here as a member of this House than—I am going to quote the language used on a former occasion by the right hon. leader of the House himself about a gentleman who occupied the seat you now occupy—I say, “he had no more right to be here masquerading as a member of this House, than one of the pages who runs about the floor.” If the returning officer has a right to say that the minority candidate is elected, he has an equal right to say that anybody else he chooses is elected. He has as good a right to say that I was elected for Queen's county as to say that Mr. Baird was elected. He had as good a right to say that any person of the legal age was elected as to return the defeated candidate. There is a defect in our law in this particular that ought to be remedied. In England, I fancy, it is practically remedied now by the decision, quoted to this House, of a judge in a case referred to in a city in the north of England. I think hon. gentlemen will remember the decision which was quoted. The judge gave as a ruling in that case that the majority elected the member whether the returning officer stated so or not; that the returning officer's duties were purely mechanical, namely, to state who had the majority; that if the returning officer failed in his duty and did not state who had the majority, or if he made no return at all, the man who actually had the majority of votes was elected all the same, and he could take his seat as soon as it was proven on satisfactory evidence that he had the majority of votes. In fact, he said the law assumed that what the returning officer was directed to do as a mechanical duty, was done, and that whether he made a return or not, or whether he made a false return or not, as to the number of votes, the man who actually could be shown to have received the majority of votes was, ipso facto, the member for the constituency until his right to be considered such was disproven before a proper legal tribunal. That is now the law in England, if that decision is followed by other judges, as I have no doubt it will be. In a case like this, the lying return of the man who was appointed to count the votes would be disregarded, and the man who actually received the majority of votes would at once be considered the member. Now, in rectifying the insufficiency of the law fully to carry out its intention in directing that to be done which is intended to be done, in forcing the returning officer to do that which the statute directs him to do, in forcing our servant, for he is such, to do that which we have ordered him by statute to do, we are not trying a controverted election case, we are not entering into a question of law, we are simply seeing that the statute is obeyed by our own officer, a statute passed by this House for its own protection. Why, Sir, it is no more trying a controverted election case than if we undertook to punish a constable who had, in that election, done something contrary to the privileges of this House. We are compelling that man to do what the statute compels him to do, and vindicating our own privileges against his usurpation. But we are told there is a remedy in the courts. Sir, I do not know that there is a remedy in the courts. I am not sure, even if Mr. King were to put in a petition and to seek a remedy in the courts, that he would be recognised as having a right to do so. Who is to petition? Why should the man who had a majority, who was elected, petition against the supposed election of somebody else? I do not believe that any return which a returning officer chooses to send in here makes an election. The majority of votes makes an election, and I do not believe Mr. King was in a position to petition against Mr. Baird, because it was he who was elected and not Mr. Baird. Mr. Baird is the only party who is in a position to protest against the election, and I believe if that point were raised as a matter of constitutional law, it would be very hard for any court to decide that the mere sending here of an untruthful and lying statement by a returning officer would make a member out of a man who had no claim to the position. Such an act calls for the intervention of this House, it calls for the condign punishment of our forsworn servant, it calls for the rectification of the inconceivable injury which he has tried to do to the interests of this country and to the privileges of this House. And here is where it becomes necessary for us to remember that this is not purely a question of precedent, or a question of legal technicality; it is a vital question concerning the very existence of this House. If one returning officer can send a man to masquerade here, two, three, four, five or ten can do the same, and returning officers can send defeated candidates here, or men who were not candidates at all, in such numbers as to change the majority in this House. What remedy have you in such an event? The majority will control the action and will not allow the seats of its own members to be taken away, and thus for one Session at least one party or the other will obtain a majority by means of men not elected by the people, not even primâ facie elected, men who have not even that primâ facie claim which a corruptly elected member has until he has been shown to have been corruptly elected. If we do not put a stop to returning officers presuming to elect members to this House, where is representative and constitutional government? The hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) says that in protesting against the interference of the House he is seeking to protect the minority, and that the majority might interfere at any time in such a way as to turn out one member and bring in another. The statement is absurd. There is no danger that the majority can ever injure the minority by giving effect to the will of the people as expressed at the polls, and that is all we ask. All we demand is that the returning officer should perform the mechanical duty provided by the statute, for he is as much a machine as is the ballot box, and that he should allow the will of the people to be expressed. If the majority of the House did interfere to see the recognised will of the people carried out by the returning officer, there was no danger to either the majority or the minority, and the plea that the position of hon. gentlemen opposite is taken on behalf of the minority is absurd. It becomes more than absurd, it becomes untrue. The plea is really, one on behalf of the majority that control this House, and its effect may be to prevent a member of the minority from claiming the rights conferred on him by statute law and by the votes of his constituents. Hon. gentlemen opposite seek to do away with the rights of the minority. There are many, however, I believe, who sympathise fully with the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) in his opinion that the rights of the minority are in danger, that this case is a clear one, and that it should be decided as a point of honor. Let those hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House show their opinions by considering the question as if they were jurymen, and as if this was a point of honor, and not a party question. In this connection I would call attention to a remark made by the hon. gentleman returned for Queen's, N. B., in his speech, which, in other respects I will not criticise, though there is every temptation for criticism, coming as it does from a gentleman occupying the very extraordinary and peculiar position in which he stood. He challenged the vote of this House, free from party feeling, and he said he would be content to abide by that vote without reference to party lines. Will the Government accept the challenge of the man seated by their own supporter? Will they allow this vote to be one free from party bias, and will they declare it to be a matter in the public interest, and as freely open to members to vote as they please, as a Private Bill? I do not believe they will dare to allow free voting on this question. They have attempted to cover up the clear point at issue with a quantity of mysterious precedents that do not bear on this case, because this is not a controverted election. The Minister of Justice thought he had found a parallel in the case of Victoria, N.S., election, and I was astonished to hear him quote that case as a parallel, because the hon. gentleman knew very well that it was not a case where the returning officer had failed to carry out the wishes of the people. It was a case strictly proper for courts of law; it was a case where there was no statement in one of the ballot boxes, and the returning officer refused to take any notice of the votes at that poll because there was no statement for him to count up. It was purely a legal question as to whether the returning officer had a right to accept a statement subsequently offered him by the deputy returning officer instead of the one that should have been in the box. The returning officer decided to leave that poll out of the count, and he strictly carried out the letter of the law. He might have acted rightly if he had done otherwise; at all events, it was a question for the courts to determine, and not for this House to determine. That the Minister should have risked his reputation as a lawyer, by comparing that case with the present one, where there is no doubt as to the facts and as to the law, where it is admitted even by the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon) the professor of constitutional law at Dalhousie college, that on the face of the documents it is clear that Mr. King should have been returned. It is astonishing that a gentleman of the reputation of the Minister of Justice should risk that reputation by asking this House to abstain from interference to save its own dignity and reputation. The hon. gentleman has been for only two years a member of this House, but a gentleman who was taken from the bench to occupy a place in the Government should be specially jealous of the rights of this House, and should not have taken the position he has assumed on this question. The hon. gentleman has shown himself, on other occasions, fully capable of offering a clear and unbiased view of constitutional questions, and of questions of parliamentary procedure. He has given us instances of most admirable clearness of mind, of fairness of judgment, and of a judicial manner, in stating his conclusions. To-night we feel with sorrow, and with something more than sorrow, that this hon. gentleman to whom above all others is committed the task of looking after the privileges and rights of this House, has given with the same judicial manner, with the same apparent fairness, and with the same clearness of diction, statements that were nothing but a tissue of special pleadings, nothing but an attempt to cast a haze over the question which was clear until he succeeded in obscuring it for his followers. It was a speech to show hon. gentlemen opposite how they could excuse themselves if they failed to perform their duties in this matter. I regret that the Minister of Justice has given the House this exhibition, and I believe that he will regret it himself before he has been long in public life. The hon. gentleman amongst other statements said that Mr. King asked to have this seat conferred on him by the vote of this House. That was an extraordinary statement. The seat has been conferred on Mr. King already by the votes of the electors. That is admitted by the Minister of Justice, and by every one; but, because the returning officer chooses to tell a lie about the matter, the Minister of Justice appears willing to take advantage of the lie and retain the seat for that gentleman for this Session and probably forever.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. CASEY. As an Irishman I have a right to speak twice. I mean probably for the duration of this Parliament, and for the benefit of his party. It is not a question of conferring the seat on Mr. King. It is a question whether the theft of his seat which has been attempted to be perpetrated, whether the attempt to steal his seat that has been made by the returning officer and backed up by the Government of the day, shall be successful. If the House are willing that the seat should be stolen from Mr. King, then they will vote for the amendment of the Minister of Justice, that the opinion of the committee should be followed. If they are not willing that Mr. King's seat should be stolen from him and conferred on Mr. Baird, by the vote of this House, if they are not willing to elect a man who is not now a member of this House, then they will vote for the simple statements of facts contained in the resolution of the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies)—facts no doubt in which they all believe—and in so doing they will save themselves and this House from a great degradation. The Minister of Justice made one other point which I shall notice, and that was with reference to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. He said that that committee stood in the same relation to this House that a man's counsel stood to himself, and that that committee was always consulted in matters of this kind. Well, it is not always consulted in matters of privilege, because as we know very well, such questions are frequently decided without reference to the committee at all. Nine years ago the hon. Minister of Customs moved that Mr. Anglin's seat should be disposed of, that his seat should be declared vacant, without any reference to the committee, without any reference to this alleged counsel of the House, and it was on my own motion that the matter was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, instead of being decided summarily by this House at the demand of the Minister of Customs, backed up in very violent language by the present leader of the Government, in the Session of 1878. If the Minister of Justice had been here, or if somebody had told him of that case, he could not have assured the House that it was the universal custom to refer these matters to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, because his own leader and one of the deputy leaders of his party on that occasion did their best to induce us to decide a question affecting a member's seat without sending it to the committee at all. It does not follow that the decision of the committee shall rule with this House. They are only a committee of this House, composed of part of the members of this House; they are not a counsel, and if they have taken cognisance of this matter so also has the House taken cognisance of it. The argument of the Minister of Justice that he was consistent in referring this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, after arguing that we had no jurisdiction, is done away with by the fact that the committee is part of the House. That committee has taken cognisance of the case, they have given an opinion upon it, and, therefore, on the motion of the Minister of Justice, it has been decided that we have power to decide the matter, and on that ground, I think, the question of jurisdiction is settled. I can only hope, in conclusion, that the simple statement of facts to this House will prevail, and that, however heated or excited we may be in discussing the matter, when it comes to a vote hon. members will remember that they are voting on their honor as members of this House, not upon a legal or technical question, but upon a vital matter which involves the whole question of our constitution as a representative body, and the whole question of our rights and dignity as the Parliament of Canada:

Mr. O'BRIEN. If the question before the House were simply a question of whether or not the returning officer for Queen's county, N.B., was to be censured for the part he took in that election, then I for one would vote heartily in favor of a resolution declaring that his conduct was contrary to law, contrary to common sense, and contrary to all that should have guided him in the duties of his office. Now, I do not admit that the returning officer has no judicial functions, as stated by the last speaker, because I think it is impossible for a gentleman to occupy the position of returning officer, and to perform the multifarious and various duties of that position as a mere machine. I think he must ex necessitate have more or less of judicial functions; but I think that, in this particular case, there can be no doubt—I have no doubt myself, at any rate—that the returning officer was entirely wrong in the course he took. I think, in the first place, that having accepted the nomination papers of both candidates, having accepted the deposit from Mr. King, it did not lie in his mouth at any rate to become a party to any such proposition as that he had done wrong in so doing, and that the deposit ought to have been made by an election agent. More than that, I cannot see, from a careful consideration of the statute, that that deposit, made on behalf of the candidate or by the candidate at the time of his election, is to be considered at all in the same light as election expenses; there is nothing whatever in that statute that I can find to justify the contention that the deposit ought to be made by the agent for the candidate. If you look at the marginal note it clearly indicates what was the intention of the Legislature in passing that clause, for it is stated there that it distinctly refers to the payment as to be made by the candidate himself, and it seems contrary to common sense to suppose that the deposit made for the purpose of covering election expenses, in case the candidate should fail to comply with certain conditions, should be regarded in the same light as election expenses, incurred during the progress of an election, by the candidate himself. I think they stand upon entirely different grounds; I think it is contrary to common sense, as well as to the meaning of the statute, to suppose that the two stand on the same footing, or that the returning officer has any right to consider the deposit made at the time of the election in the same light as the election expenses incurred by the candidate during the period of the contest, which he is required by law to make solely and entirely through the election agent. So far as that is concerned, I have no doubt in my mind that the returning officer was entirely wrong; and after having, in the first place, accepted the nomination paper, after having accepted the deposit, after having given a receipt for it, after declaring that a poll was to be held, I think, whatever his motive may have been, whatever advice he may have acted upon, he was estopped from listening to a proposition such as that which apparently actuated him in the last instance, in declaring that the nomination was illegally made, and that, therefore, he was justified in returning the member who now sits for the county. I think the view that the candidate, or any one in his behalf, has a right to make the deposit has been acted upon by many of the members now sitting in this House. So far as that is concerned, I think there is no justification for the course taken by the returning officer. Judging by his evidence given the other day, I am not prepared to say that he acted from any other than conscientious motives, or a conscientious desire to do his duty, but at the same time I think he was mistaken. I must confess, however, that I was surprised—although, perhaps, such a course would not be in accordance with parliamentary precedent—that hon. gentlemen opposite who had brought him here, who had loaded him with epithets of opprobrium, who had charged him with criminality, who had exhausted upon him the language of vituperation, should not have censured him in any way after they had brought him to the Bar of the House. The motion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon) is of a two-fold character. In the first place it proposes to set aside the recommendation of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and, in the second place, it pronounces a censure upon the returning officer for the county. As regards the second part of the proposition I have already expressed my opinion, and I think there is no doubt that the view I take of that is correct. But with regard to the first part of the proposition, I am just as much at variance with the hon. member for St. John as I am in accord with him on the second part. I think the Committee on Privileges and Elections was justified in adhering steadfastly to the proposition that all matters connected with controverted elections, all disputes as to elections, and all questions as to who shall and who shall not have seats in this House, have been relegated to the courts of law, and I do not think we should in any way interfere with the jurisdiction that we ourselves have conferred upon them. Even taking this as an extreme case, in which the House ought to interfere, if it should in any, I think it is better in the interest of the whole country, and in the interest of this House, that we should do an act of seeming injustice than that we should depart from a principle which the experience of this House and the experience of the country, and also the experience of the Parliament of England, has shown to be necessary for the maintenance of the integrity and independence of this body. Now, if the proposition of the hon. member was simply one of condemnation of the returning officer, I would have voted cheerfully and heartily for it; but when he couples with that a proposition which is entirely antagonistic to the principle this House has adopted and ought to adhere to, I have no choice but to vote for the amendment of the hon. the Minister of Justice. Now, one word with regard to the remarks made by the hon. member for North Essex. I think, Sir, nothing could be worse for the independence and character of the members of this House than for either the Government or the Opposition to draw party lines with that severity that would necessarily compel members to abandon their independence altogether, or else, as a matter of choice as well as a matter of necessity, to quit parliamentary life altogether. I, for one, while admitting the necessity of party government, and feeling that, under present circumstances, we are obliged to have party government, would never consent to occupy a seat in this House if, on every question that arose, I was to be told by gentlemen on the Treasury benches or on their behalf, I would have to vote with them or else be placed in that uncomfortable position in which I have found men are liable to be placed who exercise any independence in this House. On this occasion, if I felt that the proposition laid down was not one which was justified by all those considerations to which I have alluded, and one which I think this House is bound to adhere to, from the course previously taken, I should have no hesitation in taking the same course as the hon. member for North Essex. But I do not agree with him. I think this House is justified in adhering steadfastly to the principles established that all these matters should go to the courts for settlement. We do not know what evil might arise from a departure from that principle as a matter of general policy. I make those remarks because I think it is right and just that, in a matter of this kind, every member should act with independence. In a question of this kind, which is not a party question, which is, to a certain extent, a question of legal construction and also of public policy, I think every member should exercise his independent judgment; and the vote I give, I give, not because I think the gentleman who by courtesy occupies the position of the member for Queen's ought to have a seat in this House, but because I think the House would not be justified even under present circumstances in departing from the principle laid down. I further say that that gentleman would be unworthy of the confidence of any constituency in this country, unworthy of occupying a seat in the House or of associating with the members in the business of the House, or of occupying the position of a gentleman, if, after this vote is decided, he should continue to sit in this House, not possessing the confidence of the majority of those whom he professes to represent.

Mr. FREEMAN. I think it would be a very extraordinary thing if it should turn out that all the hon. gentlemen on that side of the House are acting conscientiously in the course they are taking, and not from party motives, and that all the hon. members on this side of the House are being led by the nose by the leader of the Government, as hon. gentlemen opposite say we are. It is very extraordinary how it should happen that they who have all one way of thinking in regard to this matter should be actuated by principle, and that they should think it necessary in this debate to urge us to be conscientious and to lay aside our party feeling, as if we were all partisans and they were all independent gentlemen. I wondered, when I listened to them, how this all turns out, and I think they will find it very difficult to answer. There have been few questions before this House since I have sat here, about which there seems to have been so many different opinions among these gentlemen as there is on this one. The hon. gentleman who last addressed the House on that side said that this was not a legal question at all. When he said that I asked myself this question: then why has the time of the House been frittered away in arguing the legal bearing of this question by so many of the highest legal authorities in the House? No one can have listened to the legal arguments which have been offered on this question without coming to the conclusion that the whole matter turns on legal questions. I have to look at the conduct of the returning officer. It has been my duty on several occasions to act in that capacity, and I have looked at the matter in the light of my experience, and I think there is a good deal of excuse to be offered for the presiding officer, if excuse is required, for the manner in which he acted. In the first place, it has been said that when he received the money and gave a receipt, he guaranteed the legality of the proceedings of the candidate. It cannot be expected that the returning officer could be well advised as to the legality of the conduct of a candidate when the candidate is depositing his papers and money. Returning officers are seldom legal men, and, not being versed in the law, they are not prepared to give a decision in a moment on questions of that kind. I can quite understand that when the money was tendered, the officer was not prepared to say to the candidate: this is not a legal proceeding, and I shall not consider you a candidate unless the money is deposited by your agent. But he took shortly afterwards the step of advising the candidate, Mr. King, to appoint an agent. He reminded the candidate of his duty, and if the latter did not think proper to take his advice and comply with the law —

Mr. WELDON. He did.

Mr. FREEMAN—he should be prepared to stand by the consequence. When the presiding officer declared a ballot would be taken, he had to proceed with the election, although he may have been advised of the illegality of the tender; and when he came to return the candidate elected the objection was presented to him in its legal form, and I can quite understand that he, not being versed in the intricacies of the law, would be compelled to exercise his judgment. This he did, and if he erred there is some excuse for him. The courts are the proper place to decide this matter. I am the more confirmed in this view by the fact that on the one side here we have the Minister of Justice and other legal gentlemen perhaps of not so high a standing in the profession, taking one position, and we have legal gentlemen of eminence on the other side of the House taking just the opposite opinion, although they both quote the same books. How, therefore, is a layman to come to a conclusion on this matter if it be a legal question, as I hold it is. A large majority of this House are of opinion, therefore, this matter should go before the courts where the whole legal aspect of the subject will be presented, and there will be a proper legal decision. Hon. gentlemen opposite should allow this matter to be decided in the courts and let the gentleman entitled to the seat come here. Would hon. gentlemen opposite desire that Mr. King should come here if he were not a legally qualified candidate. The law of legal qualification is as necessary to be complied with as any legal requirement. Will these hon. gentlemen tell me that if Mr. King came here not legally qualified, he would have the right to sit in this House. Hon. gentlemen opposite say it is very clear Mr. King was legally qualified. How am I to know that? I have no certificate as to his qualification. I believe that the revising officer, before acting as he did, decided, after the legal argument, that Mr. King was not legally qualified, and, therefore, was not a legal candidate. If, therefore, hon. gentlemen wish that every man who has a seat here should have complied with the law in every point, they should not desire to have Mr. King as member, if he were not legally qualified. I have said this matter should go before the courts, and that is the view that would be taken by hon. gentlemen opposite if they were half as conscientious as they pretend to be. This is the conscientious side of the House, and we are acting conscientiously in the matter. Let the courts decide who is the gentleman entitled to the seat, and we will see that he gets it.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I wish just to make a few remarks, and I intend to do so, perhaps, mainly in reply to some remarks made by the sitting member for Queen's in his explanation to the House to-day. Judging from the remarks he made, it would be inferred that the parties connected with the revision of the lists were in entire sympathy with this party, and had an object in preparing the lists in Queen's county for the purpose of giving the Liberal party ascendancy. Knowing these gentlemen, I think, as a member of the Province of New Brunswick, these statements should not be allowed to go without contradiction. With regard to the revising barrister who had charge of the county of Queen's, he was a gentleman who has had a large share in the conduct of public affairs in New Brunswick, prior to Confederation; but I can say that, so far as he and I are concerned, we have never been in political sympathy, and he has been connected and associated with the Confederate party, and in entire sympathy with the party led by the right hon. the Premier. While he was in political life he received the respect of everyone, whether opposed to him politically or not. He was the associate of the late Minister of Finance, and of other hon. gentlemen who have sat in this House; and I believe, if the present Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick was a member of this House, when he heard the remarks of the sitting member for Queen's (Mr. Baird), he would have denounced the assertion. Judge Steadman's sympathies have been with the present Government, but since he has been on the bench, and before, I have not heard his honesty impugned in the slightest degree. Then, in regard to the gentleman who was employed by him as his clerk, Mr. Babbitt, who has been registrar of the county for a number of years. I believe his sympathies are with the Liberal party, but whatever he did was under the direction of Judge Steadman, and when it is stated that he sent back the applications made to him, he could only have done that with the knowledge of Judge Steadman, who must have been a party to it. Then the gentleman accuses the sheriff of taking a part. The sheriff has already been spoken of by my colleague from St. John, so I will not enter into that question; but, as far as the conduct of elections in which he has taken part is concerned, I have never heard a shadow of a shade of doubt cast against him. After he was ousted out of his position as returning officer, at the instance of the hon. gentleman, no doubt he felt justified in taking any course he chose, in the same way as anybody else. The hon. gentleman spoke of the gentleman who was employed by Judge Steadman to make these lists, and he would infer that he was a Liberal. He was a lawyer, a young lawyer it is true, but I know he was one of the most active men in sympathy with the Liberal-Conservative party. It is a curious fact that, from the judge down to the least important officer who was employed, except the sheriff, who had nothing to do with it, everyone who was connected with the revision of those lists was in entire sympathy with the Liberal-Conservative party. Every revising officer in New Brunswick did his duty fairly and impartially without respect to either party. So far with regard to the statements of the member for Queen's. As to the remarks of the Minister of Justice, it seems to me that he stood in the position of a lawyer having a brief. In the way in which he argued his case, he reminded me of a friend of mine in a court in New Brunswick, who put forward a certain proposition. The judge said: "Mr. Thompson, do you believe the point you are arguing?" The lawyer said: "Well, I do not believe it at all, but I want to make you believe it." If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice were sitting as a judge to-night, and he was unequalled as an administrator of justice in the Province of Nova Scotia, I would not be afraid to argue this case before him and abide by his decision. These hon. gentlemen admit that this Parliament has the right to go into the question of personal disqualification, but they endeavor to draw a line between that and the other case. I challenge any member of this House to show a precedent for this. As was pointed out by my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), there has been no precedent for a minority candidate being returned. My hon. friends, who were associated with me on the sub-committee, and myself, could not find a single case in the annals of the House of Commons where a minority candidate was returned by a returning officer. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) says that, prior to 1873, and prior to 1868, cases have no bearing on this question, because, he says, an election petition can only be questioned in a court of law, as provided for in the Acts passed in those years.

Mr. GIROUARD. Not only an election petition, but any election.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). If my hon. friend will take Sir Robert Peel's Act, he will find that the House divested itself of the power by the appointment of the General Elections Committee. The judges of the land stand in the same position now as the select committee did. That General Elections Committee occupied the same position as a single judge who is put on the rota to try an election case stands in now. If he examines the matter, he will find that the judgment of the Elections Committee was as final and complete as that of a judge at the present day. Still we find the power exercised. Subsequent to the Act of 1863 in England, we find that the House of Commons exercised the right in the cases of Sir Sidney Waterlow, O'Donovan Rossa, Michael Davitt and John Mitchel. The second case of John Mitchel was brought before the courts, but not before Parliament. A petition was filed, and he died in the interval, and a motion was made to substitute the returning officer to go on with the petition. In the first case they declared the seat vacant, as they did in the case of O'Donovan Rossa. The Minister of Justice said these were cases of notorious disqualification, that they were civilly dead. If this were the only case, that contention would be very strong. But Sir Sydney Waterlow was not civilly dead. He was returned for the county of Dumfries. The petition was presented in the Court of Sessions in Scotland. That was abandoned, and he took his seat as the hon. member for Queen's has taken his seat. His disqualification was not notorious. It was a very doubtful question. He had simply incurred the penalties of all those having contracts with the Government. They might have said that if he chose to sit in the House, he might be left to suffer the penalties. The matter was brought up and referred to a special committee, and that committee reported that Sir Sydney Waterlow was disqualified, by reason of being connected with a contract, and the seat was declared vacant and a new writ issued. Now, this shows that the House of Commons was prepared at the proper time to carry out the law, and to purge the House of those who were not properly entitled to sit in it. Hon.

gentlemen opposite differ about our constitutional rights. We find the member for Albert (Mr. Weldon), a professor of constitutional law in Dalhousie College, entirely differing with hon. gentlemen opposite, with the hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman), who prides himself upon his knowledge. The hon. member for Albert admits that we had the right to apply the remedy, but he says it is a dangerous application of the remedy. Mr. Speaker, is it a dangerous application of the remedy when a returning officer has chosen to exercise a function which he has no right to exercise, that we should set the wrong right? The hon. member for Queen's, N.S. (Mr. Freeman), says that Mr. Dunn consulted lawyers. Sir, he had the law before him, and that law said that the man who had the majority of votes should be returned. Let him return that man, and let the courts decide whether he was right. But he takes it upon himself to act the judge and to place a man in the seat against the well understood wishes of the people of the county. The hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) admits that the returning officer did wrong and deserved censure, but, says, my hon. friend, I think the case ought to go to the election courts. Surely my hon. friend when he sat in this House, and when the case of King's, P.E.I., came up, had no conscientious scruples about the duty of the House upon that occasion; he did not refer that case to the courts. When the gentleman who then sat for Centre Huron in this House moved that the case should be referred to the Supreme Court for the opinion of the judges, I think we will find in the divisions against that motion the name of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). In that case he felt that this House had full right to control the action of its returning officer, and to exercise jurisdiction in matters like this. But now, although he admits that a great wrong had been done, and that the minority candidate sits in this House, he finds that the matter must go to the courts. The hon. member for Albert said: Why do not the parties agree to go to the courts? The hon. member for Queen's, N.S., says: Why do not these gentlemen go to the courts? That we are not here to set to work and try cases. I say we are here to protect our own privileges, and it is the duty of this House, to use the language of the right hon. Premier, in the North Victoria case, not only to punish and censure, but to control the acts of a returning officer, a servant of this House. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is admitted that a great wrong is done, it is admitted that a gross violation of law was committed. The case is not here in the shape of an election petition, as was the case of North Victoria. But standing here we have the facts before us connected with this case, showing that Mr. King had the majority of votes and was entitled to be returned. Whatever may have been done on nomination day, as was done in the Mayo case, is another question altogether. We find that the returning officer undertook to perform his duty at the time of declaration, which is entirely distinct from the day of nomination. His duty was to sum up the votes and return the candidate who had the majority. He set to work and ignored that duty, and undertook to perform the functions of a judge. As I said on a previous occasion, he then did what no judge has a right to do, namely, to reverse his own judgment and to prevent the party who was fairly entitled to the seat from being returned, and depriving him of his rights. The Minister of Justice in replying to the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot), said the election was not over, there was a recount. But the recount was stopped by an order of the Supreme Court. As I said before, I am not going into an argument on the question of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, or on the authority of the judge. That matter is now before the court. It is practically of no utility, because we all know that even under the Act, Judge Steadman has now no power to go further. Moreover, we have got the ballots and the papers here, and we see by these papers that the man who was returned is not entitled to the seat. Sir, I say this is a case that ought to be considered free from party spirit. This is a matter affecting the rights of every elector in this Dominion, and it will create a precedent that after a poll has been granted and an election held, the returning officer can ignore the poll, can ignore the whole proceedings and return whichever candidate he chooses. We ought to be very careful what course we take at present, because our action to-day in this matter will be a precedent in future times. If this House ignores this fact, and says, practically, by its vote, that the returning officer had a right to do this, I think public opinion will pronounce a different verdict. The sitting member for Queen's, N.B., said to day that he was hounded by the press, alluding to the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Ellis) in no measured terms. Sir, I believe that if you look over the whole Conservative press of this Dominion that supports the Government, you will find, with very few exceptions, that it declares this act to be an outrage. Look at the Evening Journal last evening, a paper published in Ottawa which gives a support to the Government; that paper characterises this outrage in a very severe manner. Take the Fredericton Farmer, published in the city of Fredericton, one of the leading organs of the Conservative party in New Brunswick, and see what that paper says about it. I happen to have in my hand an extract from the Sherbrooke Gazette, a Conservative paper, commenting on this outrage, and I could not use stronger language:

"To hold that the House of Commons cannot amend the wrong publication of a return is to declare they have renounced all their powers over their officers. This is a new doctrine we can't recognise as a Conservative one. The musty old precedents, as one member called them, all point the other way. They were conservative precedents. They recognise a conservative principle which we can clearly understand and appreciate. When the House of Commons surrenders its powers, its privileges and its independence, and agrees to abide by the opinions of a credulous and ignorant returning officer rather than take his certificates of facts, it does not, to our mind, represent Conservative principles or Conservative practice, and we reprobate such a course with all the force we are capable of.

If that is a proper exposition of Conservative principles, and I believe it is, in this case it is not a party question in which the interests of Conservatives are involved, but it is an appeal to the sense of justice, of right, and of fair play on behalf of the electors of the constituency of Queen's, and a demand for the assertion of the rights and privileges of this House and that they are being trampled upon by the course which hon. gentlemen opposite sought to pursue; and, moreover, that the wrong done by the returning officer shall be righted, and that we shall do justice between the parties and place the majority candidate in his seat, and in that way show that a member of this House does not represent the minority of the electors of an electoral district, but the majority of the electors of the district of which he claims to be the representative.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated twice already that hon. gentlemen on this side of the House will not vote according to their convictions, and I think it is due to myself, having some views upon this question, that I should express them to the House as briefly as possible. I agree with those hon. gentlemen who have already spoken who said that this should not be considered as a party question. We have heard charges made from the other side of the House to members on this side that we were making it a party question, and we have heard the insinuation that any one who votes in favor of the amendment of the Minister of Justice is being dragged along by the Government and not voting according to his conscience. I wish to say, as was said by the hon. member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), that I believe every member on this side will cast his vote as fairly and as independently as any hon. gentleman on the other side.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope so.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. No one has a right to a seat in this House, and to exercise the powers with which the constituency has entrusted him, if he take any other course than an independent one on every question coming before the House. I agree with hon. gentlemen who have preceded me who say that it is repugnant to their idea of what is right, that any person being a minority candidate should occupy a seat in this House. But while I make that statement, I say it is also as repugnant to my sense of justice and right that any person holding the majority of votes in any constituency obtained by corrupt practices and bribery, should occupy a seat here; and when we find persons occupying seats in either of those two positions, we have to consider what the law has provided for those who are dissatisfied with the position of affairs. I may refer for a few moments to the condition of matters in England in years past. At that time election contests were decided by the whole House and not by a committee. It was acknowledged that whenever a dispute on a parliamentary return occurred, such was actually decided not upon right or wrong but according to the strength of the political party. I do not know that I could do better than read the remarks made by Lord Grenville, when he moved the Act referred to in the early portion of the evening, taking away the power from the body of the House and conferring it on a sworn committee. He said:

"Instead of trusting to the merits of their respective causes, the principal dependence of both parties is their private interest among us; and it is scandalously notorious that we are earnestly canvassed to attend in favor of the opposite sides, as if we were wholly self-elective, and not bound to act by the principle of justice, but by the discretionary impulse of our own inclination—nay, it is well known that in every contested election many members of this House, who are ultimately to judge in a kind of judicial capacity between the competitors, enlist themselves as parties in the contention, and take upon themselves the partial management of the very business upon which they should determine with the strictest impartiality."

Such was the condition of affairs when it was determined to take the power out of the hands of the House. I observe that this question has not been approached by hon. gentlemen opposite, with that spirit of impartiality which I think ought to have actuated them, and I judge from the strong expressions used, and from the prejudged expressions of those hon. gentlemen that I might not be astray in saying that if the shadow of Lord Grenville should come into this House of Commons and hear the remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite, it might well say that hon. gentlemen opposite were the reflection of a number of people who were in Parliament at Walpole's time, and on account of whose partisan conduct the Act to take away the trial of election petitions from the House of Commons was passed. Passing from that point, I may say that I was rather surprised to listen to hon. gentlemen opposite on the discussion of the amendment referring this matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. The committee were not spoken of in very complimentary terms by hon. gentlemen opposite, and I came to the conclusion from the expressions used that it was no great credit to belong to that particular committee. Let me state what one of the hon. gentlemen said in speaking of that committee. In opposing the submission of that question he said:

"We have had enough of election committees, we know what they are, and if it goes before the Committee of Privileges and Elections when will it get out, what report will it make?"

Another hon. gentleman said:

"What was the reason for sending this case to the Committee on Privileges and Elections? There can be only one result that is an effort to kill the proposal in some way or other."

Other hon. members followed in the same strain, well knowing who composed the committee. The expression of such views was an insult to the members of that committee. Such is the conduct of those hon. gentlemen when they do not desire a certain question to go before the Committee on Privileges and Elections; but when it suits them for party purposes to make a reference, that committee is a very convenient place indeed. The very next motion that took place was one in regard to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. MILLS. A proper reference.

Mr. MONCRIEFF. Excuse me for a moment; I will reply in a minute. Hon. gentlemen opposite have been condemning the Privileges and Elections Committee, and yet the very moment the case of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery was presented, they moved that it be referred to that committee, which they had been for hours traducing. That may be consistency; it was not the consistency to which I had been accustomed before coming to Parliament. I presume, if I had been an old member like the hon. gentleman who interrupted me, I might have understood that that was the consistency of his own particular party. These interruptions, I may say, are generally a kind of relief, a post or chair upon which one can rest for a few minutes, and I thank him for the observation he has made. He says that such was a proper case to submit, and why? When this question of the returning officer came up, those hon. gentlemen stated that there was not a single question to leave to the committee, that everything was proved, and they ridiculed the idea of leaving it to a committee. Let me recall what the hon. gentleman said, when discussing the question with reference to the conduct of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, in which case he also claimed there was no doubt about the facts:

"I am inclined to think that if the Secretary of State and hon. gentlemen opposite had had the frankness to answer the question which I put to them a few days ago, perhaps the Secretary of State would have been able to tell us how it was that over a hundred members on that side were gazetted as the law directs, and that, out of ninety and over on this side, only fifteen were gazetted as required by law. We would be able to know why the law was in this respect so flagrantly disregarded, that the deliberation and design manifested, about which there can be no doubt, admit of no explanation but one—that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery deliberately withheld the names of hon. members on this side from being gazetted immediately after they were returned."

So, Sir, this committee which hon. gentlemen were traducing in the early part of the Session was, in a few days afterwards, the very committee to whom they proposed to leave the question of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The real question before us is whether, after the change of the law which was made in 1873, we should deal with election matters or leave them to the courts. I am expressly in favor of the report of the committee, for I believe this is just one of those questions which should be left to the courts to decide. If once we undertake to decide such a case here, we will establish a precedent for this Parliament assuming functions which it has delegated to the courts. That statute was approved by every gentleman in the House, and I think, after passing such an Act, it would be a most improper thing to infringe upon the functions which are handed over to the judiciary. The hon. member for Queen's county, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), urged very strongly this evening, that the Prince Edward Island case was one which would justify this House in now interfering and making a change in this return. Upon that point I take issue with him at once, and I say that the decision in that case, is one which supports the contention of hon. members on this side in the present case. In that case three candidates contested the riding; McIntyre had the highest number of votes, Robertson had the next highest number, and McDonald the next, and a double or special return was made in which the circumstances were set forth. The difference between that case and this is that Mr. Robertson was disqualified, and, therefore, the case comes within the class with which this House has reserved to itself power to deal. He was disqualified because he was a member of a Provincial House. Let me call your attention to the language of the Act which says that no member shall hold a double seat :

"If any member of a Provincial Legislature shall, notwithstanding his disqualification, as in the preceding section mentioned, receive a majority of votes at any such election, such majority of votes shall be thrown away, and it shall be the duty of the returning officer to return the person having the next highest number of votes, provided he be otherwise eligible."

That is just what we contend.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Who decided that ?

Mr. MONCRIEFF. I will hand the book to the hon. gentleman in a few minutes. That case was one of disqualification, pure and simple. Then the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) says that the Victoria, N.S., case applies. Why, Sir, that was a case not of changing a return, but of finding fault with the returning officer, because the case was then before the courts in another way. All the cases in England cited, that have any bearing upon this question, which were decided since the English Act was passed, were cases of disqualification, pure and simple. In the cases of John Mitchel, when he was declared elected first by acclamation, and afterwards, when he was returned against an opponent, the House simply declared the seat vacant, and you cannot find a case in which they unseated a member for disqualification and put another member in his place. They did not do it in the Mitchel case ; and if you read the case carefully you will find that the person contesting the constituency pasted hand bills all over the county notifying the electors that if they voted for Mitchel their votes would be thrown away, because he was a disqualified candidate. Under these circumstances, when the case came before the courts as a matter of law, for the purpose of having him unseated, the courts seated the other candidate, because it held that the voters had thrown away their votes. I feel then, as I said, that we should move cautiously in encroaching upon the powers that we have delegated to the courts. I think there is no doubt that this case comes within the letter of that Statute and that we have delegated to the courts of law the power of deciding it, for the simple reason, which is a good reason, that we ourselves are liable as human beings to act under partisan feelings, and that, in delegating the matter to the courts, who are not partisan at all, we are confident of a fair, just and proper decision from a proper tribunal. Under these circumstances I intend to support the amendment of the hon. Minister of Justice confirming the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. LISTER. I will ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to answer the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. I must, in the first place, express my amazement at the speech he has made and at the result of his investigation which he announced to the House, and I would ask that hon. gentleman whether the public expression he has given of his views in this case is the private opinion he has heretofore held and expressed to numerous members of this House. It appears to me that the hon. gentleman, although he seems to have taken much pains to have mastered the law and facts of this case, is exceedingly mixed. He does not appear to me to apprehend the case at all. It is not a question as to a controverted election ; it is not a question as to whether Mr. King or Mr. Baird was elected ; but it is a question whether this House has a right to correct a return of one of its own officers, which is manifestly incorrect. The logical conclusion of the argument of the hon. gentleman is, that the man who has received the minority of the votes in the county of King's is to sit in this House for the rest of the term ; because we have heard him confess to-day that, as soon as there is another list prepared, he will be in a position to resign the seat he holds here ; and the Minister of Justice the other day introduced a Bill whereby that gentleman will have the right to hold the seat, to which he has been wrongfully, illegally and fraudulently returned, for at least another Session of this Parliament. To decide in accordance with the argument of the hon. gentleman on that side means that we are adding insult to injury, that we are wronging the constituency of Queen's, and the man elected to represent that constituency, by allowing a person who has no right by law or justice to a seat in this House. No man could have witnessed that examination the other day, without entertaining a feeling of disappointment at the conduct of hon. gentlemen in this House. A man who has confessedly done the most grievous wrong that one man can do to another, a man who occupies a position of self-degradation, comes to this House and confesses it boldly and unblushingly at the Bar of this House, and he is cheered on by hon. gentlemen on the Government benches. I say that a more disgraceful scene was never witnessed in this or any other House claiming to have representative institutions ; and the hon. gentleman who has just sat down was one of the loudest in applauding the man in his disgraceful attitude. And we have today seen a man get up in this House and deliberately admit that he has wronged another man out of his seat, and he is cheered on by hon. gentlemen opposite. To his everlasting credit the hon. member for North Essex (Mr. Patterson) has taken a position which, as he said, will be approved of by people hereafter, if not in this House. I, for one, know that the Government have no stronger supporter in this House than that hon. member, and I say it is to his everlasting credit that he had the manliness to get up to-day and take the position he has done, not the ground of a pettyfogging lawyer who tries to minify the case with technical quibbles, but on the ground that will bear investigation that a wrong has been done and that it is the duty of this House to try to rectify it. What are the facts ? Is there anything for a court to decide here ? Is not the return of the returning officer on the Table, and does it not show that Mr. King has a majority of 61, and that he ought to be returned ? Does not the law command him to return the man who has the majority of votes ? He has been examined here, and he has admitted that Mr. King had the majority of the votes. Then it was his duty, in obedience to the statute law of this country, to return Mr. King as the member for the county of Queen's. He has not done that, although the evidence is that he ought to have done it. There are no witnesses to be examined ; there is nothing to be investigated, and all this House has to do is to say we will make right what he has omitted or neglected to do. The hon. gentleman says we should go to the courts. Go to the courts for what ? He knows that the time for going to the courts is past. He knows that Mr. King depended on the honor, the honesty, the spirit of fair play that ought to pervade this House to do what was right in the case before it ; but I am sorry to say he misapprehended the spirit of this House, as I believe the vote is going to show. My hon. friend talks about Mr. Robertson's case. This House undertook to investigate Mr. Robertson's case. It undertook to decide a question of law as to his disqualification, and it seated the man who had the minority of votes. If this House had no right to investigate that case, why did it do so ? But although it might be claimed that the House had no right to deal with it, in this case no such question can arise, because it is not a question of a controverted election, or a question of disqualification, but it is a question whether the return made by the returning officer is a true return and in accordance with the facts. According to his own evidence Mr. King ought to be the member of this House, and it is the duty of this House to correct that return and to say, the majority of the votes having been for Mr. King that gentleman's name should be inserted in place of that of Mr. Baird. I regret exceedingly that there should be any doubt at all on this question. I regret exceedingly that the Minister of Justice has taken the position he has. He would have occupied a high place in the estimation of the people of this country if he could have swept to one side the legal technicalities that he has raised, and taken that manly stand which would be approved of by the country if not by the House, and say that in all justice and fair play the man who was elected to represent Queen's county honestly and properly ought to have his name inserted in place of that of the man who is usurping the position.

Mr. GILLMOR. I am sure the House will bear with me for a few minutes. I do not rise for the purpose of arguing the question at all, but, being a friend of Mr. King, having been associated with him for some time here, coming from the same Province, I feel I ought to show myself on the side of justice and fair play. I think Mr. King will expect me, as an old acquaintance and political friend, to at least express my desire that justice should be done him. I am disappointed at the result that is likely to follow this discussion. I never, since the return of Mr. Baird was made for this House, believed this Parliament would allow Mr. Baird, who had the minority of votes, to keep his seat. I differed on that point with my friends around me, for I never, until now, fully believed that a majority of this House would commit such an act of injustice towards Mr. King as they appear about to commit. Judging from the general opinion expressed throughout the Dominion, in the press and in conversations everywhere, both of Liberals and Conservatives, that the case was a plain one and that Mr. Baird could be unseated, I felt satisfied that there was sufficient conscientiousness in the House to do Mr. King justice. I felt satisfied when, on the first introduction of this subject, the right hon. the First Minister got up and cautioned hon. gentlemen on this side not to introduce party feeling into the discussion, that the leader of the Government was about to do the fair thing and that Mr. King would be given his seat. To-day, however, appearances have somewhat changed. Hon. gentlemen opposite who, at the opening of the Session, appeared to be in favor of justice and fair play, and who indulged in most severe expressions with regard to the returning officer and all those concerned in this transaction, appear now to have somewhat changed in their views. My experience is that in matters of right first impressions are always correct, and the first impressions of hon. gentlemen opposite appeared to think that injustice had been done, since then they have thought the matter over, their party feeling has become aroused, and they appear inclined to take a different view. What appeared first to be glaringly unjust they now look upon with complaisance.

"Vice is a monster of such frightful mien,
That to be hated needs but to be seen,
But seen too oft, familiar with her face,
They first endure, then pity, then embrace."

Hon. gentlemen opposite have concluded to embrace the monster which they first despised. I am sorry such is the case. I do not want to say a word about the man who accepted the position. I would not like to make him feel worse than he does, if he is capable of feeling at all the position he occupies. I do not want to pour water on a drowned rat. I was reading an American paper yesterday, and, although the case may not be exactly parallel, it speaks of a certain official there who was found guilty of wrong-doing with regard to registration, and who is now in gaol at St. Louis. There was a petition to have him released, and the newspaper thus gives the result :

"WASHINGTON, May 24.—The President to-day denied the application for a pardon in the case of James J. Stanley, who was sentenced 13th April for fraudulent registration and sentenced to 90 days imprisonment in the gaol at St. Louis. The President endorsed the application as follows:—

"Denied. I cannot pardon a crime against the election laws, except it be in a case presenting unusually strong considerations for clemency. I consider such offences the worst of all crimes, and I know of none the punishment of which is more important to the public."

I am satisfied that the crime committed by the returning officer in Queen's county deserves just such treatment as that, and that is the opinion expressed by many of those who are going to vote here to send this case to the courts. I wonder how these gentlemen would like if, after having received a majority of votes, they were not declared elected, and were told to seek redress in the courts of law. Very few gentlemen elected to Parliament feel like going to court to establish their rights to their seats. Mr. King certainly should have a seat here; and I believed until now that the majority of this House would reverse the decision of the returning officer, and do justice to Mr. King. I do not wish to trespass on your time, Sir, by arguing the case. It is plain to every one that the returning officer should have returned the man who has received the majority of votes, and not the other man; and from what I have learned, I am satisfied Parliament has the right to consider this question. With regard to the legal lore displayed by the hon. the Minister of Justice, I must say, that instead of trying to enlighten the House on a question of law, he appeared to endeavor to mystify it, and obscure what, on its face, was plain. I had a suspicion, when I found the long delay to occur in the return, and saw that at last Mr. Baird was returned for the electoral district of Queen's, that the Minister of Justice had given his opinion in reference to that matter, and I am inclined to think so now. However, I must say that I am disappointed, for I thought I saw signs of a willingness to give fair play on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite. I thought that on this question they would exercise their honest convictions and listen to the still small voice of conscience. I do not want to charge gentlemen on the other side with a lack of conscience or a lack of conviction. It is enough for me to look out for myself; but I cannot understand it. In fact they admit that the whole thing is wrong, but they say Mr. King should go to the courts. Now, Mr. King has decided not to go to the courts. You all agree that the sitting member ought not to be the sitting member. Mr. King is not going to the courts and you are going to allow a man to sit here who ought not to sit here. That is the result, because Mr. King is not going to the courts for reasons which I suppose he knows. Perhaps he is not able; perhaps he has not the means. I do not wish to detain the House longer, but I thought I ought to say a few words in sympathy with my much respected friend King, who fought his battle nobly, who fought it manfully, and then after he had gained the seat it has been taken away from him by the returning officer.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The hon. member for Elgin stated that, if this was a case that should go to the court under the Controverted Elections Act, he and all hon. gentlemen on that side of the House had nothing to say against it. I understood that to be the proposition, but he said in this case there was nothing to go before a court, that the case was so plain that there could be no two opinions about it. I confess that I was very much of that opinion myself until I looked into the matter. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down said that with him first impressions are always the right ones. I think now that my first impressions were not the right ones. I was of opinion that this was a wrongful act. I am still of the opinion that this is a wrongful act, but I differ from hon. gentlemen opposite in regard to the remedy that should be applied. I think this is a case that should properly go to a court, and there is authority for; it and I think, even from what I have heard fall from the lips of hon. gentlemen in this House, it has been shown that a learned judge in the Province where this matter has arisen has granted a rule nisi, showing that he was of opinion that a writ of prohibition should issue against a recount; and surely we must show some deference to the opinion of a judge, and must not come to the conclusion that there is nothing in this matter. I will trouble the House by giving them one case which fell under my notice this afternoon. It is the case of Monks and Jackson, reported in Law Reports, C. P. Div., Vol. 1, page 683, which was decided by Lord Chief Justice Coleridge and Mr. Justice Archibald. The municipal Elections Act provided that the nomination paper must be delivered to the town clerk by the candidate himself, or by his proposer or seconder, personally, and not by an agent, and the objection is one which is cognisable by the mayor, whose decision allowing it may be questioned on a petition against the return of the successful candidate. That is a very similar case to this one. The nomination paper, instead of being presented by the party himself, was presented by his agent, and Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, in giving judgment, says:

"I am of opinion that our judgment should be for the respondents. Mr. McIntyre admits that, if the decision is against him upon the fifth question, it will be useless to discuss the other points raised, because the election of the respondents cannot be questioned."

Then he goes on to state that the nomination paper shall be delivered by the candidate himself, or his proposer or seconder, and he winds up:

"The case, therefore, shows on the face of it that the petitioners were not duly nominated as candidates, and had no right to go to the poll, and that, if they had been elected, their election must have been set aside. I am clearly of opinion that the early part of 38 and 39 Vic., c. 40, sec. 1, sub-sec. 3, is imperative and not merely directory."

Mr. Justice Archibald agrees with this judgment, and goes on to say:

"The statute enacts that the nomination paper 'shall be delivered by the candidate himself, or his proposer or seconder, to the town clerk.' How the Legislature could more clearly indicate that the paper shall be delivered by the candidate himself, or by his proposer or seconder, personally, it is difficult to conceive. That part of the section is clearly obligatory, and is not complete with—by a delivery of the nomination paper to the town clerk by an agent."

When I read that case, I had grave doubts whether there might not be something in this matter, and whether the returning officer who, as we know, has acted under the advice of counsel, had not some grounds for acting as he has done. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge, the highest authority in England, has come to a similar conclusion. It seems a matter of small importance whether the nomination paper was handed in by the agent or by the candidate himself, but, because it was handed in by the agent, the Lord Chief Justice held that the nomination paper was bad, and the election was set aside; and further even than that, he held that, if the candidate had gone to the polls and had been elected, the election would have been set aside. So I think it is not clear of doubt, but that there is something to go to a court, and, that being conceded by hon. gentlemen opposite, I do not see why this case should be withdrawn from the courts any more than any other case of the kind. This House has relegated to the courts the right to try all cases arising out of elections, and I think we should not, without great hesitation, interfere with the law laid down by those hon. gentlemen themselves. That law I heartily approve of, because I think a court is the proper place where matters of this kind can be calmly and dispassionately disposed of, instead of being tried in a House where persons feel strongly on these matters. I shall, therefore, vote to sustain the report of the committee.

House divided on the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Davies (p. 683):

Amendment to the amendment negatived.

On the amendment of Mr. Thompson (p. 677) :

Mr. MITCHELL. I have forborne to make any further utterances on this question than I made the other night, and although I am not going to inflict, at this hour of the night, a speech upon the House, I feel that I must rise and enter my protest against the humiliation which this Parliament has just been subjected to by the course pursued by the leader of the Government. It is too late to take up the time of the House with discussing the merits of the question upon this amendment. But, Sir, I hold the right hon. gentleman there, sitting opposite me, who leads this House, responsible for the act of humiliation to which he has submitted a free Parliament. I am bound to accept the statement of hon. gentlemen sitting behind him who say that they vote according to their consciences, according to their judgment. It is right to concede that to them, and to accept their statements as they have given them, and I do accept them. But, Sir, we all know the position in which this House stands; we know that the right hon. gentleman assumes and exercises the power of dictating to this House, and of leading and influencing the men who sit behind him and have confidence in him. I say that in the long course of thirty-two years of parliamentary life that I have experienced, I have never witnessed an act so humiliating—an act which so degrades Parliament—which so subordinates the free interests and the free voice of the electors, as the decision which has just been arrived at of sustaining a man in his seat returned under such circumstances and having a minority of votes.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will get the question when I am ready. Subordinates them to the will of a single man such as this vote that he has led, that he has dictated, that he has forced upon this House. Sir, when the history of this country is written, the right hon. gentleman's name will be associated with this vote as an act—I will not designate it, because parliamentary rules prevent me from designating it by the name by which I think it is entitled to be named; but were I outside this House, and speaking of it, I would say: that act of the right hon. gentleman, the First Minister, which induced this House to pronounce as it has pronounced to-night, is an act of infamy.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I protest against the insult which the hon. member for Northumberland has offered to those members who have voted with the Government on this question. If we have been induced to vote to-day as we have done, it is due to the law that was enacted by the Liberal party, and not by the Government. It has been decided by Parliament that all contested elections should be decided by the tribunals. I do not know that we should undertake to create a precedent to please either the member for Northumberland or any hon. member on the left.

Mr. FISET. He has sold himself.

Mr. GUILBAULT. That is not true. That is blackguardly.

Mr. DESJARDINS. What is that you say?

Mr. GUILBAULT. It is not true. He has lied.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I want the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Fiset) to repeat what he has just said when I was speaking. If the hon. member does not dare to repeat what he said, it is an act—well, I do not know how to characterise it, but I would do so outside of the House. I say, Sir, that instead of being an act of infamy, as the hon. member for Northumberland characterised our vote, it is an act of independence. I do not care, I have been accustomed to the insults—

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down, sit down.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a question of order. The question is this: The hon. member from Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) has imputed to me a statement alleging that he and hon. members who had voted with him, had committed an act of infamy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. So you did.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did nothing of the kind. What I said was this: that I was bound to accept the statement of hon. gentlemen that they had voted according to their consciences, and I did accept it, and I said that I placed the responsibility at the door of the right hon. gentleman who led this House, and that history would record in the future that he was responsible for this act.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman was guilty of a bad example, which I am sorry should have been set by an old member of Parliament.

Mr. MULOCK. As I understand the hon. member for Northumberland is not allowed to speak at this stage, I move the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. To the Chair I will always bow with that respect and submission which are due to the head of an honorable body like this. But, Sir, I would like to ask wherein have I been out of order? I did not say that the hon. gentleman, the member for Hochelaga, who is so ready to take offence, on this occasion was guilty of an act of infamy. I will not say that he has taken this opportunity to take advantage of a remark which I made—not applied to him nor to any other hon. gentleman who supports the Government, but my remarks were applied to the right hon. gentleman who controls this House. The hon. gentleman may say what he likes about his independence. He may, as he says, be as independent as the member for Northumberland. He may be, Sir, but his conduct has not shown it.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must ask the hon. gentleman not to repeat the words which he has been using. I think that I was too indulgent at first in allowing them to pass.

Mr. MITCHELL. What words does the Speaker refer to?

Mr. SPEAKER. No hon. member in this House has a right to qualify a vote as an infamy.

An hon. MEMBER. He did not.

Mr. MITCHELL. I appeal now to this House who heard me—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am in order. I will speak my sentiments. I would like to put the hon. Speaker right in relation to this matter. I did not apply the word "infamy" to any individual. I appeal to the memory of hon. gentlemen in this matter. I said I would not designate from my place in the House the act of the right hon. gentleman as it deserved: but, I said, if I were outside of the House I would do so. I would like to know wherein I am out of order in that particular. I am strictly in order, and I would call upon the Speaker to withdraw the statement he has made, that I am out of order.

Mr. DESJARDINS. It is not permitted to insult a man who has voted and is not afraid of the consequences. But an hon. member says that he will repeat outside what he cannot state here. That is an insinuation that cannot be borne.

Some hon. MEMBERS. You said that yourself.

Mr. MITCHELL. You said it; I did not. I said were I outside the House I would speak of it in that way.

Mr. DESJARDINS. The law as laid down in the Controverted Elections Act provides that we must have recourse to the courts, and I think they are the proper tribunals to which we must refer these questions, especially when we see such a burst of passion as we have just witnessed in the judging of this case.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken was good enough to state that he was only following the precedent set by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. It is, I believe, quite true that the Liberal party did move to refer these cases of controverted elections from the very dubious tribunal which used to try them to the courts of law. But it is not true, the hon. gentleman was gravely misinformed, if he supposes that the Liberal party had ever set the example or precedent of causing members of this House to be elected by partisans chosen by the Government of the day for such purpose; and I say, and I think that this is in order, that there never was a more indecent act committed than the act of the Government which chose the greatest partisan in the county as returning officer to return this candidate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have already decided, I think it was no later than yesterday, that the word "indecent" applied to anything passing in this House, was out of order. I will repeat what I said yesterday, that I expect the leaders of this House to set an example in what I think is the right direction, viz., using strictly parliamentary language in the discussions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that I did not apply the words to language used in this House, but to an act of the Government of this country done outside of this House, and I say I am strictly in order in so designating it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must maintain my authority. I gave my decision yesterday on the very same ground. When the right hon. member for Kingston (Sir John A. Macdonald) used the word "indecent," and said he did not apply it to any member of this House, but to the measure or motion before this House, I declared it was unparliamentary; and now the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) has just applied the word "indecent" to the conduct of the Government. I maintain that this is the same thing, and I call upon the hon. member to withdraw it, and I hope he will set a good example to the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw, withdraw.

Mr. CHARLTON. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair; order, order; withdraw, withdraw!

Mr. CHARLTON. I should like to speak to the point of order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. I speak with all due deference to your decision, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Chair, Chair.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have rendered my decision. I have called upon the hon. member for South Oxford to withdraw his expression, and I maintain, unless there is a motion to reverse my ruling, no one can discuss it now.

Mr. CHARLTON. I rise for the purpose of moving to reverse your decision. I wish to say in speaking to this motion that—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CHARLTON. I wish to say, in regard to this matter, that it strikes me that liberty of speech in this House will be sorely and dangerously abridged if members are not permitted to characterise the conduct of the Government with respect to its actions outside of this House by some such word as indecent, wrong or improper. If such word cannot be used it strikes me it will be wrong.

Mr. McNEILL. This is insulting to the House. The hon. gentleman is insulting the Chair.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Withdraw, withdraw; Chair, Chair.

Mr. CHARLTON. While I believe in the utmost courtesy of expression with respect to members of this House and as regards their conduct in this House, I believe the utmost latitude should be given as to expressions with respect to the conduct of the Government outside of the House, and our liberty will be seriously abridged if members are deprived of properly characterising the acts of members of the Government outside of this House. I believe such a restriction is one that would be fatal to debate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. CHARLTON. The discussion of public questions is too important—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The rule of Parliament is clear, that when the Speaker of the House announces his decision, and there is an appeal from it, it must be made at once.

Mr. DESJARDINS. And without discussion.

Mr. LAURIER. I understand that you have ruled Mr. Speaker, that the expression used by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) is unparliamentary. As a humble member of this House I bow to your ruling, though I believe if I were allowed to discuss it, perhaps the words might appear in a different aspect.

Mr. DESJARDINS. No discussion.

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps it might be a subject of debate as to whether, if the Government is censurable, it may not be censured; but as you, Mr. Speaker, have ruled the word out of order, I think it would be an act of grace on the part of the hon. member to withdraw it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Grace!

Mr. LAURIER. Perhaps the word grace is not the word I intend to convey; what I mean to say is that it would be a gracious act on the part of my hon. friend.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am informed, Mr. Speaker, that you ruled somewhat in the same direction, though I was not present, as regards the First Minister; and no doubt your position is so difficult a one, and it is so desirable you should be maintained here, that I will waive my own judgment and opinion in deference to yours on this occasion; and I am willing, in obedience to your ruling, which I suppose you will record, to withdraw, and I do withdraw the word "indecent" under these circumstances.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, as we are now dealing with questions of order, I believe I have a right to call the hon. member for Joliette (Mr. Guilbault) to order. He has used expressions just as unparliamentary, to say the least, as those used by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). The hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins), has shown himself as touchy, with regard to the language used by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), concerning the Premier, that I did not recognise that same hon. gentleman whom I had occasion to hear, not very long ago at a public meeting held in the county of Levis, speaking of the same man, of the hon. Premier—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency). (Translation.) What is the point of order?

Mr. SPEAKER. That has nothing to do with the question now before the House nor with the question of order which has been raised.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency). (Translation.) If speaking of matters which took place outside of the House is to be allowed, I do not see why I should not have the same right as other members. I am now explaining the question of order which I have raised. I was saying that the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) has used a much more extraordinary language than that which he charges the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) with having used. On the occasion to which I refer he charged the hon. Premier with having commenced his career by the light of an incendiary fire of the Parliament Buildings, Montreal, and with having finished it on the scaffold at Regina.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. GIROUARD. (Translation.) I rise to a question of order. The question is not whether the language used by the hon. member for Hochelaga (Mr. Desjardins) outside of this House was parliamentary or not. That has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. WELSH. Mr. Speaker, as everybody else is jumping up I would like to rise. I bow to your ruling. You have condemned the word "indecent" several times to-night. Now, if I was to apply the word "indecent" to any matter brought to this House, I hope you would not condemn me. I think Mr. Dunn's action in this matter was very indecent; I believe Mr. Baird's action in taking the seat is very indecent. I do not know whether I am out of order or not, but I am going to say the Government's action is indecent.

Mr. DAVIS (B.C.) I would like to have this question brought before the House. I would like if somebody would get up and say what we are talking about. Let us take a vote on this thing, and let us have done with it.

Sir DONALD SMITH. I cannot help saying that I think it is a matter for very great regret that the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), should so far forget himself—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir DONALD SMITH—should so far forget himself and what is due to hon. members of this House, as to attribute to others less honorable motives than those which are presumed to actuate himself; and I think if anything were wanting to justify the vote given by gentlemen on this side of the House, and by some on the other side of the House, and by myself among them, it will be found in the exhibition of unseemly—I will not say indecent—passion which has been displayed by that hon. member on this occasion, and by some others in this House. I think that that exhibition proves beyond anything else that those who voted, as we voted on this side of the House, were right in desiring that the matter should be so placed that it could be judged of judicially, and without such an exhibition of feeling as we have witnessed.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoke, spoke.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have the right to make an explanation—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoke, spoke.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will let no hon. member of this House get up and place words in my mouth that I have not uttered. I said distinctly, in my references to this matter, that the House had received explanations from hon. gentlemen—from almost every one who spoke—disavowing any influence beyond their honest convictions, and I said that I accepted these statements. These are the words I used—I accepted these statements.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no; hear, hear. He did.

Mr. MITCHELL. But I said I placed at the door of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House,—

Mr. CAMERON. You had no right to do so.

Mr. MITCHELL—the hon. gentleman who leads this House and rules this country, the vote that was given to-night.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. MITCHELL. Therefore, I can tell the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) that he is imputing to me expressions and statements which I never made or applied to any hon. gentleman who voted behind the right hon. gentleman. But I imputed to the right hon. gentleman the consequences which I named—I will not name the words again—but I said if I was out of the House I would designate it by that name, and, therefore, I am not liable to the censure of the hon. member for Montreal West.

Sir DONALD SMITH. May I ask the hon. member for Northumberland did he not say, or say in effect, that hon. members who voted as I did myself, had done so at the dictation of the Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not say that, Sir.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MITCHELL. Whatever I may have thought I did not say it. What I did say was what I repeated a few minutes before, that while I accepted the explanations of hon. gentlemen and was bound to believe what they stated, I placed at the door of the right hon. gentleman the consequences of this act, and I said that it would go down, with the name I gave it, to posterity.

Mr. LISTER. The hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) is the last man in this House to turn round—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. LISTER. We all remember, a few years ago, when that hon. gentleman sat on that side of the House, supporting Mr. Mackenzie, and we remember also that the First Minister told him on one occasion that he could "lick him quicker than hell could scorch a feather."

Sir DONALD SMITH. The member for Montreal West—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order; spoke.

Sir DONALD SMITH. If I may be allowed I would say that the member for Montreal West, my humble self, is not ashamed of any vote he gives in this House, and he believes he votes conscientiously according to what he thinks is right. He would repeat that on this occasion he believes that in voting to take this matter out of such an arena as we have seen this to be this evening, as he has done with others, he has done what is right. Further, if I may be allowed one word—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoke, spoke.

Sir DONALD SMITH. By the grace of the House I would—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman is called to order, and as he has spoken several times already I am obliged to call him to order.

House divided on amendment of Mr. Thompson.

PRAYERS.

ST. MARTIN'S AND UPHAM RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. SKINNER. The Committee on Standing Orders reports that there has been no notice given with reference to the Bill to authorise the St. Martin's and Upham Railway Company to sell their railway. I wish to state a few facts in connection with the matter, and then move for a suspension of the 51st rule in relation to the publication of notices. This railway runs from Upham to St. Martin's, on the seashore in the county of St. John, a distance of about thirty miles. The railway is not in successful operation to the extent to which the people of the locality hoped it would be, and the company, acting in the interest of the concern, had made arrangements for the sale of the road to another company. The other company to which it was contemplated to sell the road obtained legislation at the last Session of the Legislature of New Brunswick, to enable them to buy railroads in the Province, and it was thought that that legislation would be sufficient to enable that company to buy the St. Martin's and Upham Railway. But, after the arrangements were thought to have reached a consummation, it was found that the St. Martin's and Upham Railway Company had not the power to make the sale. They had the power to lease their line for 999 years; they had also the power to mortgage the road absolutely, and, of course, the creditors could seize it under an execution; but the present opportunity of making the sale will be lost if the company cannot secure that object in a more direct way; and, inasmuch as it is impossible for them, since they discovered the defect, to give the notice, they have no other means than to come before this Legislature and ask for liberty to get the charter amended to the extent of enabling them to sell the road. It is a common power with reference to other railways in New Brunswick, but it does not seem to have been included in the charter to this company when the Local Legislature granted that charter. The Bill will be so framed that no person and no company can run any risk of loss in any way; creditors will be protected, and every person will be protected. It is only a simple amendment to the charter to enable them to sell at this present time. I, therefore, hope that—seeing that there are other members of this House from that locality who are able to give the same guarantee which I am able to give, that no injury can possibly arise to any person, but that care will be taken to protect the interests of all concerned—the House will consent to the suspension of that rule and allow the Bill to come in. I, therefore, move, as I understand this is the correct mode:

That the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Orders relating to the Bill to authorise the St. Martin's and Upham Railway Company to sell their railway and property, be referred back to that committee for reconsideration.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville). The Committee on Standing Orders are guided by certain rules, as to which there is no discretionary power in the committee whether they should be rigidly enforced or not. Hon. members are aware that the only notice the public have of the promoters of a measure coming to this House for any legislation, is the notice which appears in the official Gazette and the local papers. The practice, as I read it, not only here, but governing the committee in England, is that, if the requirements of the rule are substantially complied with, that is sufficient. But, in this case, the committee found there had not been an attempt to comply with the requirements of the rules, and

ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move that the Address from the Senate, congratulating Her Majesty upon the completion of the 50th year of her reign, be taken into consideration on Friday next.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has any special day been selected to be proclaimed as a holiday, throughout the Dominion, for the celebration of Her Majesty's jubilee?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The 21st of June has been fixed as the day. I am under the impression that the proclamation has been issued.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2:25 a.m., (Thursday).

there was nothing left to them but to report to this House as they did. I believe the committee have no objection to reconsider the matter and suspend the 51st rule of this House, because that is the only way in which the case can be met. I desire, however, to take this opportunity to beg hon. members of this House in the future, or so long as this Parliament exists, to see that there will be at least an attempt to comply, in a substantial way, with the requirements of the rules of Parliament, because otherwise it becomes a very difficult matter for the committee to do anything else than they have done in this case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with my hon. friend, the chairman of the Committee on Standing Orders, that there should be some attempt, some substantial attempt, made to carry out the regulations and the rules of Parliament, and to give the requisite notice in reference to private Bills. There are so many interests, individual or collective, which may be involved in every private Bill, that it is not fair that a Bill should be promoted or pressed through Parliament without an opportunity being given to every person who may be interested, immediately or remotely, in the Bill to defend his own interests. I do not know anything about this measure, except the name, which says it is a Bill to authorise a certain railway company to sell their railway. I do not know what evidence will be laid before the Committee on Standing Orders or the Committee on Private Bills, but certainly I should say that every shareholder ought to be consulted, and I think the creditors also should be consulted, and their approval obtained before such a measure could properly pass through Parliament. Here is a measure which, according to the name, gives the power to the directors to sell the railway. That is a very extensive order indeed.

Mr. SKINNER. One of the objects of making this sale is to meet one of the points referred to by the right hon. the Premier, that is, to pay off the creditors. We intend to have this amply protected in every particular, to see that every creditor is protected, and that the consent of the stockholders is obtained as well.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This was a local Act. They presumed there was no difficulty, in regard to the Act passed last year, for the new company to make the arrangements; but it appears that this company comes under the general clause introduced some years ago into this House, and is a railway for the general advantage of Canada, and, therefore, it is considered that it would come under the control of the Dominion. Considering the great interest that parties have in this measure, I think it forms an exceptional case.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I think the motion now in your hands hardly answers the purpose. What is the use of referring this Bill back to committee for further consideration? We have given all the consideration we can, and we find no reason whatever for suspending the rule. If the House chooses to direct us to suspend the rule, of course we will obey the mandate. I, as a member of that committee, am not going to reverse the conclusion I arrived at this morning, and refer this Bill back for reconsideration. If the House is willing to assume the responsibility of saying the rule ought to be suspended, let it do so; but merely to refer it back for reconsideration, seems to me a useless proceeding.

Mr. SKINNER. One word in explanation. When I drew the resolution, I put in the words "and that the committee be requested to report in favor of a suspension of the rule." But it was thought at the Table that probably I had better not leave that in, though now, if the House is willing, it might be wise to allow these words in the resolution as I originally drew it, and that will satisfy the committee,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We do not know anything about the Bill; we have not got the facts before us. The Bill has not been discussed; and how can we instruct the committee to do a thing which may be a great wrong?

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is a case before us now—the South-Eastern Railway Company—where a very substantial notice had been given, and yet the rule of the committee had not been complied with. It was a very much clearer case than this; in fact, it was one in which exception might fairly be taken. Yet what did we find? Although we were sure, when that Bill was before the committee, that all private rights would be protected, this House has been flooded with petitions with reference to that measure. Yet, here we are asked to pass, without a single notice, a Bill which may be, apparently, a very important one. I say if the House is willing to direct us to suspend the rule, I, for one, will obey it, but I will not vote to send the Bill back to committee merely with a request to reconsider it, because that would be a mere waste of time.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT.

Annual report of the Department of Fisheries, for the year 1886.—(Mr. Foster.)

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 126) to amend the Dominion Controverted Elections Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to meet any inconvenience which has been found to exist in the Province of Ontario, by reason of a large proportion of the petitions being filed in one division of the High Court of Justice and in the Court of Appeal. This is to enable the judges of the High Court of Justice to make a distribution of the petitions among the various judges.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if he proposes, in amending the Controverted Elections Act, to take greater precaution by which, what I suppose I may call, without any impropriety, the scandal caused by the irregularity of the Gazette returns may be corrected in future, because, if not, I would commend that matter to his attention; and, also, I think that he may profitably direct his time to seeing whether such matters as those that we were discussing last night might not be prevented from occurring in future.

Mr. EDGAR. I would like to ask the Minister of Justice if the judges of the courts of Ontario have suggested this division?

Mr. THOMPSON. Various suggestions in this direction have been made by three judges, and the arrangement made by the Bill seems to be the most convenient of those which were suggested.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to know whether it is intended, by any provision of this Bill, to prevent political partisans being employed by the officer who makes up the list? In my county a notorious partisan was employed as clerk of the revising officer. I think there ought to be some provision in the Bill by which any person who is secretary of a Liberal-Conservative association, or a Liberal association, or even an association connected with the third party, should be considered disqualified for holding that office.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the Minister of Justice whether he proposes that election trials should be held by a single judge, as at present?

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no change in that respect.

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest, whether it would not be well that a change should be made in that respect under the Controverted Act. The court is held by two judges instead of one, and, I believe, on the whole, it is much more satisfactory. Certainly there is greater uniformity in the rule by which the conduct of a court is governed where there are two judges than where it is held by a single judge. There is a great difference in the views taken by judges with regard to the procedure under the Controverted Elections Act, and certainly there would be more uniformity were two judges to sit. I may say, further, that the public have greater confidence in the proceedings of a court where there are two judges.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 127) to amend the North-West Territories Act. He said: The North-West Territories Act, which was passed last Session, and under which the Supreme Court for the Territories was established, made no provision for appeals then pending before the Court of Queen's Bench of the Province of Manitoba, as it was understood, on the information we then had, that there were none pending. It has been found that there were appeals undisposed of, and I introduce this Bill to meet the case.

Motion agreed to, and Bill was read the first time.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE TARIFF.

Mr. RINFRET asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government, in view of the changes which have taken place each year since the Session of 1879, in the levying of the duties of Customs and Excise, to publish and distribute the tariff of the duties of Customs and Excise as it now stands?

Mr. BOWELL. It is the intention of the Government, as soon as the Bill is passed, to publish it for distribution in the usual way.

DURANTAYE SENATORSHIP.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether application was made by any person besides the Honorable J. J. Ross for the position of the late Honorable J. C. Chapais as Senator for the Division of La Durantaye? If such application was made, then by what person or persons?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Whether application were made or not is a matter of no public interest, and the Government does not think this question should properly be answered.

KENNEBEC SENATORSHIP.

Mr. CHOQUETTE asked, Whether application was made by any person besides the Honorable P. Fortin for the position of the late Honorable Mr. Cormier as Senator for the Kennebec Division? If such application was made, then by what person or persons?

Mr. THOMPSON.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Same answer as to the last question.

RIVER TRENT BOOMS AND PIERS.

Mr. MALLORY asked, Is there an officer or appointee of the Government whose duty it is to keep booms and piers in order in the River Trent between Rice Lake and Trenton? If so, what is his name and salary, and is it part of his duty to repair those piers and booms if carried away by freshets or other causes?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is such an officer. His name is R. B. Rogers. His salary, paid by the Department of Public Works, is $600 per annum. It is part of his duties to have piers and booms repaired, after he has been authorised by the Department to do so.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SUBSIDY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg leave to move that, tomorrow, the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider the following resolution, and to say that I have the assent of the Crown to this resolution:—

Resolved, That from and after the first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven, there shall be paid to the Province of Prince Edward Island, in addition to all other subsidies and allowances now paid to the said Province, an annual allowance or subsidy of twenty thousand dollars, which additional allowance or subsidy shall become payable and be paid to the said Province half-yearly in advance, on the first days of July and January in each and every year, beginning with the said first day of July, one thousand eight hundred and eighty-seven.

Motion agreed to.

HIGH COMMISSIONERSHIP.

Mr. MILLS. I would ask the hon. Minister of Finance if he has brought down the papers relating to the commission of the High Commissioner?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was not in the House when the hon. gentleman spoke of it. I will bring them down to-morrow.

SUPPLY—9TH BATTALION, QUEBEC.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. AMYOT. Yesterday I had the honor to ask the Minister of Militia for the letter ordering the 9th Battalion to suspend its drills, and for the reasons why they were suspended. The hon. gentleman answered that he did not know whether the reasons had been communicated to the battalion, but that they were contained in the letter addressed to me. I beg to deny that statement. I do not think the Minister made it in bad faith, but, as a matter of fact, I deny it and I challenge him to bring down the papers to show the contrary. On that point, I may say the 9th Battalion had obtained the right of making their annual drill during the season of 1886-87, and they had begun to do so. Three drills were made, when order was received purely and simply to suspend the drill. That order was an insult to the battalion. No reason was given, no communication was addressed to me or any of my officers, that I heard of, giving the reasons for this most extraordinary order. A few days later we received permission to go on again, still without explanation whatever. We were treated more harshly than we treat our servants, because, generally, when a servant is at work in the interests of his master, he is not ordered to suspend without being given the reasons why. I also asked a question yesterday whether General Strange had made a report of the North-West Expedition, as to the part taken therein by the 9th and 65th Battalions. The Minister replied that all that had been received from General Strange had been published in the report in the annex A and B, though everybody knew that General Strange had published in the press of the country, under his own signature, and stated most emphatically that he had sent to the Department reports concerning the 9th and the 65th, and the share they had taken in the suppression of the rebellion, and that those reports were not contained in the official reports. More than that, I was asked myself by General Strange to make a general report as to the usefulness of the 9th Battalion in the North-West. I sent in that report, and I have never seen it since. I would say, in the third place, that the 9th and 65th are almost absolutely ignored in the official reports; in fact, twenty years from now the generation then living will hardly know there were two French Canadian battalions in the North-West. What the 9th was doing there, we do not know from the official reports. It was scattered over the country, being divided into five detachments, and was placed among the most warlike Indians and exposed to great danger; and the 65th took part in some of the battles in a most gallant manner, but that does not appear in the reports. The truth is, there seems to have been a decided plan agreed upon, I do not know where, to completely ignore those two battalions. Moreover, for my part, since I had the misfortune of differing in opinion with the Minister of Militia on the Riel question, his treatment of my battalion has been most severe. Not only does he make my position a difficult one, not only does he abstain from publishing any report concerning the battalion; but he wants us now to pay an almost fabulous amount under very extraordinary circumstances. I do not intend to discuss the account, but if the House will permit me I will give an idea of the way we are treated. It is a well-known fact that when the battalion came back from the North-West we were covered with laurels, there were no words sufficient to recognise our services. Not a syllable of complaint was uttered against the 9th. Everywhere we had been doing our duty and carrying high the flag of the Canadian nation; everywhere soldiers and officers had proved equal to their task. We received congratulations everywhere. But the day came when the commander of the 9th, who happened to be a member of this House, differed in opinion with the Minister of Militia, and then everything changed. When we arrived home there were some accounts still to settle. We contended that the Department owed us money, and we sent in our accounts. We received no answer. But more than a year afterwards—we arrived home in July—this was in November, 1886—while I was still expecting a letter in reply to the accounts we had sent, I received a letter of which the following is a translation:—

“QUEBEC, 11th November, 1886.

“SIR,—I have the honor to request you, in conformity with orders received from the Major General Commanding—

This is a very useful man to act as cover for the Minister—

“—to have deposited with the shortest delay, to the credit of the Receiver General, the amount of $1472.83, and to give an account of the rations which have been furnished to you at Calgary by Mr. McGibbon for the use of your battalion when going to Quebec, and, moreover, to liquidate with your officers the balance of the respective amounts which are due them by you, and which amount to the sum of $93.54.”

As to the last part of the letter, I must declare at once that I do not owe, and have never owed, a single cent to the officers of my battalion, and this is a gross insult made under cover of the Major General Commanding. As to this most extraordinary claim of $1,472.83, I had never received any account whatever or any details whatever. This came to me as a thunderclap without notice, without any intimation whatever. I was requested to pay right off $1,472.83. I then asked for some details, stating, at the same time, that I never had any suspicion whatever that I owed a cent to the Department. In answer to such letter I received this famous account. The account is a voluminous one, and I will not go into the details. It is all based on suspicion; there is not a single item based on a voucher or on a single fact. The Department had employed officers during months and months at high salaries to find out accounts against the officer commanding, and the other officers, of the 9th Battalion. In that account there is a most extraordinary item. You know, Mr. Speaker, that we were at the foot of the Rocky Mountains. When my battalion was scattered all over the plain, without any instructions being given to me or any power given to me in the event of any occurrence happening, we received from the Minister of Militia, who was then on very friendly terms with me, permission to go through the Rocky Mountains, and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company had been kind enough to furnish us with gratuitous transportation. We were most thankful for that trip, and we went through the mountains as far as we could reach. We came back to Winnipeg, and there we remained and made a parade for the benefit of somebody. I wired the Minister over and over again, telling him it was most absurd to detain us there. His answer was that we would not be detained long, and, in fact, so well disposed was he towards us, that we could start five or six days after our arrival there. Well, this account charges me with the cost of feeding my men in the Rocky Mountains. If we had not been fed in the Rocky Mountains we would have been fed in Winnipeg, and I was not bound to pay the cost of feeding my battalion. That, however, is one of the items of that account. When I received it, I suggested to the Department that a commission or arbitrators might be appointed to consider the account in a friendly spirit. In answer to that letter I received notice that a commission had been appointed. And who were the commissioners? Was I consulted? Oh, no. The Minister took three of his own servants, three men, most honorable men I admit, but men over whom he had full control. He took one man, who has a family, and whom he has threatened at every year to displace; and he took two others of his employés; and the very same day those men were appointed it was announced that new corps would be formed and there would be vacancies for some officers. The commission proceeded to work. At five minutes to two o'clock on a certain day, I received notice that at two o'clock I was to appear before the commission to give explanation. Fortunately I was not detained in the court, for I would never have received notice, and the commission would have to proceed ex parte. The commission was bound to find a balance against me, of course. They proceeded to consider that celebrated account of $1,472.83, besides the amount which they said I owed the officers of my battalion, and after an enquiry, most incomplete, where the interested parties were not heard, with the exception of four or five, the amount was reduced considerably. We will see how much. It was reduced, I find, to $469.57. So that they have added $226.27 for War Claims Commission's account. What that means I do not know. We were away for four or five months time at the North-West; we left our business; and now I must spend days and weeks to defend and protect myself against the Minister of Militia, who risked his life to go to the North-West. I do not know what these accounts are, but I know that when I was in the North-West, at Calgary, I received an order from Major General Strange to act for him, to represent him, and to sign accounts and vouchers. I spent the whole of my time in signing these papers, and for that time I received nothing; I have only been insulted for it, that is all.

During the time that I was acting in that capacity, commanding the district, I had to attend to an immense number of these papers, as well as other matters. There were those relating to the provisions, which will be alluded to later on, the teamsters, and, in fact, the whole work of organising there. I signed for many hundred thousands of dollars of accounts, and how that has been extracted from them I do not know. I know nothing of that item that is charged against me; we were not put en demeure. Then I find that there would be certain balances due by some of my own officers, and I find that I am indebted to the Department in the sum of $40.95. Well, the Department paid much more than that to find out that amount, and the amount paid here. If I had a commission of enquête, before which I would have the ordinary power of introducing witnesses, I would be able to prove that the Department owes me over $50, instead of my owing the Department. Then there are some small items; here is one of $14.40, and another to the same amount against some of my officers. Here is another sum of $126.35, but it is not due by an officer of the 9th, but by an officer who belongs to the regular army, whom the Minister of Militia has himself sent to England, and for whom I am not responsible. There is another item of $115.25, not due by an officer of the 9th, but by an officer imposed on the 9th by the Minister of Militia. He is not related to me; the hon. gentleman knows to whom he is related.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Name.

Mr. AMYOT. Surgeon DeBlois—cousin germain. Now, I told you that there was an amount put against us; but there are certain amounts due to my officers to the extent of $103.70. Do you think the hon. gentleman has time to look into that, and pay my officers the amounts which are due to them? No, he cannot attend to that at all—it would be taking too much time and trouble. I referred to the rations, and I will give you an explanation of that. I think it is due to my battalion that I should protect them here, for it is because I am here that my battalion is attacked. If I had not been a member of this House, or if I had sacrificed my opinions and convictions, and voted to support the hon. Minister of Militia, I would not have this trouble, nor would my battalion be treated as it has been. It is because I am here that the battalion is insulted, and I am bound to defend it. When we arrived at Winnipeg my officers went to the Department and asked if we were entitled to have rations in money rather than in kind; and it was answered by one officer, as I can prove by three witnesses, that we were entitled to receive rations in money. The orders and regulations of the Militia are very clear on that point, or they were up to that time, but since our return the Government has thought fit to amend them. My officers were paid the first time in money, and not in kind, and then we established a mess, as we were bound to do, by the orders and regulations of the Militia. We have been going on in that way, adapting our expenses to the scale established in the orders and regulations, showing the amounts we were entitled to. All the time of the expedition we could not be paid except once in the beginning, when we were paid on that basis of money instead of in kind. But since the Department has refused to pay us in any way for the feeding; they said, You have received in kind. Well, we established the contrary, by means of the vouchers and requisitions. Then the Department gave in, but instead of giving us one dollar, according to the orders and regulations, they gave us only 40 cents, and that is how they became our creditors. More than that, when we arrived in Quebec, we received the following letter:—

"Sir,—I beg to inform you that, according to instructions received from the Department of the Minister of Militia, the 9th Battalion are entitled to draw field allowance and rations to the 21st July. From that to the end of July net pay only * * *

"FRED. K. LAMPSON,
"Major and Paymaster."

We were paid according to that official letter. Well, the commission of enquête takes back that amount which has been paid to us and says it is irregular. The Minister wants a revenge, and proceeds ex parte against us; that is the way in which we are treated. I complain, Sir,—that the Minister of Militia, instead of being the friend and supporter of the 9th, has become its persecutor, and I am afraid that the sentiment which animates him is a feeling of revenge against its commander. The Minister of Militia should remember the circumstances connected with that expedition to the North-West, so far as I was concerned. When I was in the North-West I did my best for him; I sent in any number of letters of praise and telegrams to be read before this House, and he replied in the most friendly way. Long after the expedition was over, we exchanged letters of congratulation and friendship. I have letters from him, which I may have occasion to read before this House later on, in which he told me: "Don't be afraid when you write me privately, it will never be made public." But when the execution of Riel came, when I was faithful to my word, and acted in the way my conscience dictated, then he became my enemy and began his persecutions; and I state, as a matter of fact, that nearly every time I have had a letter from the Department, the ministerial press have been informed of its contents before me. Every possible information from the Department against me has been given to the press, and the most odious persecution has been organised against me. I complain of it, but I know it will go on, and I know that with his organisation he will some time or other find some way of chasing me from my battalion. But I do not care, because the people are with me, and I defy the hon. gentleman to find one single officer or soldier who will say one word in reference to me except of praise and gratitude. He will find, perhaps, three or four in the ranks of my officers, who are under his control for public situations or for increases of salary; but all the rest are with me—why? Because all the time the expedition lasted we did our duty. We were not old soldiers, but we did our best; we committed no wrong; we obeyed every order possible, and when we came back everybody was satisfied, and everybody is still satisfied. I am not afraid to leave that part of the case with my fellow-citizens and this honorable House. There is another part that will be disposed of further on, that is, the part of the telegrams. I will make that matter clear in such a way as to enable this honorable House to judge whether the hon. Minister of Militia is my persecutor instead of my defender.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. and gallant commander of the 9th Battalion, for the second time, comes before this House, and complains of the manner in which the great services which he has rendered to his country have been acknowledged by Parliament and by the Minister of Militia. On a former occasion the hon. gentleman appealed to this House, and called upon me, as the responsible head of the Department of Militia, to lay before Parliament and before the country the letters and telegrams which had been exchanged between the Minister of Militia and the commandant of the 9th Battalion. On that occasion it was my duty to obey the command of Parliament, and, upon the motion of the hon. gentleman, I laid on the Table of Parliament, letters and telegrams which he felt ashamed of after they were published. But the hon. gentleman stands up here, knowing his responsibility as a member of Parliament, and accuses me of being the persecutor of his battalion, and of insulting a battalion, the members of which belong to the same race to which I belong; and I can say that the members of that battalion, as I have had occasion to say before, when called upon by their country, did their duty in such a manner as to reflect credit on the Province, credit upon Canada, and credit upon the race from which they spring. But, Sir, the hon. gentleman says that I insulted that battalion. Does he remember that, upon the motion which he made, he forced me to disclose what I should have liked to keep confidential and secret? The hon. gentleman placed in the hands of the Speaker of the House a motion calling upon me, as Minister of Militia and Defence, to produce all letters and telegrams exchanged between the Minister of Militia and the Colonel of the 9th Battalion. And what did he state in those letters and telegrams? Was it right and proper for him to say that the volunteer force was merely required to look after provisions and to take charge of garrison towns? That was an insult. But the insult did not come from me, nor from my Department; it came from a gentleman who, while commanding that battalion, must have found among his own people and the members of his own battalion, brave Canadian hearts who would have felt ashamed to be set down before the Parliament of the country as merely good for the purpose of looking after provisions. And, Sir, I was asked to replace those valiant sons of Canada with cow-boys and half-breeds, who were better than they were to fight the battles of our flag and our country. I say, Sir, I never have been the insulter of his battalion or any portion of the militia force of Canada. As a Canadian, irrespective of the position I occupy to-day, I feel proud of that militia who, on every page of the history of Canada, have left a record that any people might be proud of—a record that shows that Canada can rely upon her own sons to protect her at home and to defend her when she is attacked from outside. The hon. gentleman has made a statement about accounts. Does he believe, that I, as Minister of Militia, carried that spirit of persecution, which he accuses me of, so far, that I have looked into every account of every company and every battalion in the force that was sent to the North-West? These accounts were placed in the hands of the accountants of the Department. The books are there, and if the hon. gentleman will place a motion in your hands, Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to lay on the Table of Parliament those accounts, which will show that I never interfered in any way except to do my duty as responsible to the country for the money that passed through my hands as Minister of Militia. I placed the accounts of the hon. gentleman's battalion, as I placed the accounts of every other battalion, in the hands of the officers who had charge of that particular branch of the Department; and those gentlemen cannot possibly have felt that great hatred, which he says I felt, for the hon. gentleman from the moment the Riel troubles began. It is of no use to-day to go back to that page of our history. If we did, I would be prepared to show that the hon. gentleman, even upon that question, changed his views more than once, and that he was prepared at first not to view this great crime which he accuses us of, in the same severe and critical light in which he viewed it afterwards. But we need not go back to the question of Riel. My duty here, before Parliament and the country, is merely to show that I have had no feeling whatever except a feeling which I was bound to possess, as an honest man, to see that the Department was protected; and I can tell the hon. gentleman, and he knows it, that every account which came before me was submitted to him months and months before the period when the drill took place, and I am prepared to bring down the papers which will show that it was in no hostile spirit that those accounts were forwarded to the hon. gentleman, to that protector of the honor of the battalion, to that friend of his nationality, to that great patriot who sacrificed his future, who has been the object of persecution and prosecution ever since; through patriotic motives he changed his views, the views which he entertained before, on the Riel question. Now, the hon. gentleman, again the friend of his battalion, says that the only officers in the battalion about whom possibly he may have some doubts, are those whom I had got under my control for the purposes of patronage, and giving them positions in the Civil Service, or elsewhere. Well, I should like to know whether he, the commandant of that battalion, shows himself very friendly to those who fought side by side with him, who went to the North-West with him, did their share there well, remarkably well, as I have said on more than one occasion. Is it very proper for him to brand these men here, men belonging to the militia force of Canada, as men who can be controlled by the hope of getting some patronage or some position in the Civil Service? In any case, Sir, you, as a military man, know that these officers must have been selected by the hon. gentleman. He had the selection of his officers, and he should have been more prudent in forming that battalion than to select men who could be turned away from their duty by the hope of getting patronage, or who could be controlled by the political head of the Department. The hon. gentleman referred to Surgeon DeBlois who went to the North-West, and, sotto voce, the hon. gentleman said he was a connection of mine. Mr. Speaker, when the battalion was ordered to the North-West, the surgeon who should have accompanied it was in such a poor state of health that he requested to be replaced by another, and, upon the recommendation of almost every officer in the battalion, and, I believe, of its colonel, the hon. gentleman himself, Surgeon DeBlois was selected and sent to the North-West to attend the wounded and sick of the battalion during the campaign. I must say that in that critical period, when more important matters were coming, every hour almost, under the notice of the Militia Department, I, upon these recommendations, did not hesitate to grant the request, which was made by one, who, although my connection, wanted to go, like the gallant colonel himself, to fight the battles of his country, and I consented to allow Dr. Roy to be replaced by Surgeon DeBlois. The hon. gentleman says he is here to defend his battalion which is attacked. His battalion has never been attacked. Let him take up the Hansard during the last Session, and the Session before, and show me where, at any moment, the 9th Battalion was unfavorably spoken of; let him say whether it was not always spoken of by myself and by those who took an interest in what was going on, in the highest terms possible—terms laudatory to the men and laudatory to the officers. There is a question, and more than one question, which it is very inconvenient indeed to discuss, without having the papers here; but the hon. gentleman speaks of rations that were refused to him, or which, instead of being given to him in kind, were refused to be given to him in money. We have the military regulations, and every soldier is bound to be guided by them, and I can tell the hon. gentleman, what he knows, that in my own office, when he told me Colonel Lamontagne, who was acting Adjutant General in Winnipeg, had allowed him to draw his rations in money instead of in kind, Colonel Lamontagne, whom I called into my office when the hon. gentleman himself was present, said he had never given such permission, and had never violated the regulations by allowing the hon. gentleman to do what, under the regulations, he had no right to do. I am perfectly prepared to bring down every paper connected with the manner in which the whole of this disagreeable matter was dealt with. The accounts were placed in the hands of the accountants of the Department, and they were sent to the military head of the Department by the Major General Commanding, and the hon. gentleman should know, if he does not, that all such orders connected with the active force must be sent through the general officer commanding the militia. I did not expect the hon. gentleman would call upon me to discuss, without the production of the papers, the matters which he has brought before us, but I can tell the hon. gentleman that I am as friendly to-day to the 9th Battalion, and every other French Canadian battalion, as I have ever been, and I am prepared to meet his accusations here, or elsewhere, whenever he chooses to bring them forward, and in discussing these accusations I shall have the official records which must speak for themselves. I shall not attempt to go into a discussion of any of these matters without having the papers brought before Parliament.

Mr. LANGELIER moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. AMYOT. I am told that I have changed my views on the Riel question. I would like to know where. Is it in the county of Bellechasse?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. AMYOT. My majority there, which was 142, is now 640; and the hon. gentleman must remember that some years ago, when he begged of me to help him, he was defeated by 632 in the same county. He speaks of public opinion and changing one's mind. What has he done in the district of Quebec, of which he has taken charge? First, in the Local House he lost power to the Conservative party. Through his selfishness he took away from Quebec many leading citizens who would have given the majority to Carbray in Quebec west. He brought them to the county of Quebec, where he spent, I do not know how many thousands of dollars, but where potatoes were bought at $25 a bushel. Had he spent a little money for legal organisation in L'Islet and other counties, he would have won five or six more counties, and the Conservative party would still be in power in Quebec, but no, he wanted the county of Quebec to be made sure for his own election. He lost power to the Conservatives in the Local House, and in the Federal House we know that, out of twenty-one counties, he lost seventeen. That is the great influential man, the man who is so devoted to his country, the man who has a right to say to those who devoted themselves truly to the country: You are cowards—because that is what he means. Did the great man leave his family and go to war? No, he stayed peacefully in his office, with more servants than before, and with the expectation of titles and honors. That is his share. Where is his self-sacrifice? All his sacrifice is this: When he has got blind men to follow him, he does his best for them; when he has men who act according to the dictates of their conscience, and who oppose him, he wants to destroy them. That is where his usefulness appears, but for the rest he says he has no time to look into it. He has no time to look into the accounts. I tell the hon. gentleman that, as leader in the district of Quebec, he lost that district for the Federal Government, and that in regard to the Local Legislature, he lost power for the Conservatives. I speak as an old Conservative. I speak as one who has fought the battles of that party since 1864, as one who has never obtained anything for his work, but has sacrificed much. If the hon. gentleman had carried the district of Quebec for his party, as the district of Montreal and the district of Three Rivers have been carried, the position of his party would be different to-day, but there are not many in that district who believe in him, because he lives on false promises and insults to his opponents. He insulted the commander of the 9th Battalion and the officers of that battalion, and the suspension of the 9th Battalion has made him most unpopular. He is a man who does not look into the future of his country. What has he done for the future of his country? He has promised a railway from Cap Rouge to Lorette. He has carried his county that way. Where is that famous railway now? He knows quite well that the population of the district of Quebec price him at his just value. He may try to insult me, but I am never afraid to meet him. He must remember when he refused to meet me during the last campaign. I am ready to meet him at any time; I am not afraid of my past, and I think my present is full of patriotism. I left the favors of the Administration to follow my convictions. Can he boast of doing that? Now he insults me, because I went to the North-West. I gave up everything. Did I know, when I left my family, that I would not be killed in the battle? Who told me? I made the sacrifice. Did he make the sacrifice? He never made any such thing. The hon. gentleman has said once that I offered my services. I draw his attention to this, and I defy him to contradict me: When the agitation in the North-West began, I received the following telegram—I was then here in my seat:—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

“QUEBEC, March 30th, 1885.

“Officers of the 9th, assembled, request me to enquire from you if there is any probability of being called out.

“Lt.-Col. Commanding.”

I went to the Minister of Militia and asked him what to answer. It was rather painful to me to go against the half-breeds, but I thought that, under the peculiar circumstances which we French Canadians occupied in the Confederation, it was important that there should be some French Canadian battalions in the North-West. I communicated with the Minister reluctantly, but I was bound to do so. He answered me that he would give me a definite answer the next day, and the next day he called us out. Well, we had to go. It was a hard task. The temperature at that time was not very nice, and to fight against our own blood is repulsive—human nature is there. My answer was, at the request of the hon. Minister, this:

“Lt.-Col. THOMAS ROY, Quebec.

“Probably called out. Do you prefer called now, to be in readiness, or only on the eve of starting?”

Immediately on being called out, I went down. The number of telegrams I received, urging me to hurry up, was immense. I will read two of them, Mr. Speaker, because, perhaps, you are personally interested in them:

“OTTAWA, 1st April, 1885.

“Let me know when you will be ready to start. I am anxious that you should be ahead of Montreal regiment. Answer.

“A. P. CARON.”

Why was he anxious that the Quebec regiment should be ahead of the Montreal regiment? There must be some reason. Perhaps, if we were to go to the bottom, you would not find anything against me in that. Here is another:

“Do not delay for supplies. Whatever is deficient will be forwarded to you.”

Forwarded to us? Perhaps some old goods were forwarded to us, but we were missing a great number, and we are not yet paid the $8 to which every man is entitled for the underclothing. Some regiments have been paid. I am told that those who were friendly have been paid, but where the commander is unfriendly—to be paid? oh, no; it would not do. Here is another, which I suppose will interest you, Mr. Speaker:

“OTTAWA, April 2, 1885.

“DeBlois going with you as surgeon. He is authorised to purchase what is required—

You see that is not any request of mine. I am informed that he goes with me—

“He is authorised to purchase what is required to fill medicine chest. Instruments will be forwarded from here. I am anxious that you should show how rapidly a Quebec regiment can move. Hurry up.”

Why so anxious to show that a Quebec regiment may move rapidly, and why had he been so anxious that the Quebec regiment should be ahead of Montreal? No doubt the Minister of Militia will be able to explain that.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman wants an answer, I may say that it is because his battalion is, I believe, the oldest battalion of the force amongst the French Canadians.

Mr. AMYOT. No, there are many older. On the 30th April, I received this telegram:

"I offer you congratulations on the promptness with which you and your battalion have answered the call and prepared your departure for the North-West.

"A. P. CARON."

And then I received any amount of congratulatory telegrams until we reached Winnipeg. There we were put in a swamp. There were many buildings belonging to the Government in which there was nothing at all, but no, we were bound to be put in swamps. Immense and heavy rains came on. I lost two men through sickness, most probably arising from the dampness, and from the cold they had taken in the swamps. Four days, five and six days elapsed, while we were in Winnipeg. No one minded us at all, and I heard in the streets of Winnipeg: "What are these French Canadians doing here?" And I wired the Minister to get us away by all possible means; and then I found that General Middleton had forgotten us at Winnipeg, and I obtained at last the order to go to Swift Current. It was only by sending telegram after telegram that I could be remembered and be sent forward. When I arrived at Swift Current, I met with very efficient and intelligent officers. We went round the prairie together, and we found that the war was being conducted in a most extraordinary fashion. I do not pretend, myself, to be a man of experience, but I took the ideas of others, and amongst them the ideas of an old general who was there, a soldier who had often been under fire. Those who have not been in the North-West cannot form an exact idea of the circumstances. When we speak of provisions it is not like going to your own cupboard and taking out provisions. When you have to provide food for thousands of men, and to send it for hundreds of miles through the prairie, it is a matter that requires a great deal of careful attention. One day a party of General Middleton's teamsters were attacked on the prairie by a few men and made prisoners, and all their provisions were captured; and if Riel and Dumont had been cruel men they might have killed any number of those teamsters, they might have starved the army of the North, they might have done any amount of harm in that way. After that trip the officers with whom I spoke—and this has been proven under oath in a certain case—urged me to wire to the Minister of Militia and inform him how matters were going on. They said that the expense would be enormous, that the danger would be enormous, and that the war was badly conducted. The Indians and the half-breeds were, for the most part, mounted men, and to send a corps of infantry after them in the open prairie was, in their view, as well as in mine, a very absurd thing. We could not tell how many miles the infantry would have to go to reach the mounted rebels; we could not foresee how many months the war would last. I was urged to wire the Minister of Militia that the war was being badly carried on, and that to meet mounted men mounted men were required. The Canadian army, being already there, was to be employed there, but how? Could you employ that body more usefully than by watching the forts and provisions, when one fort had already been plundered? Provisions were scattered over the prairie for hundreds of miles, and were constantly exposed to the enemy. The hon. gentleman laughs. Did he go there? Did he go further than Winnipeg? Did he go to war? Has he a very long sword with his title? That was not my opinion only. There were many officers who shared my opinion. The hon. gentleman wrote me a letter in which he stated:

"I could not find a moment to answer you before to-day. Rest assured that you need not feel anxious. When you write to me privately, I keep your letters to myself alone; it is only when I have to obtain information from the Departments that I communicate the subjects treated in your letters."

This is dated November, 1882. The hon. gentleman says: But you yourself have asked by motion that I should produce those papers. The hon. gentleman is mistaken again. He does not say what is correct. There has never been a single paper produced. Does the hon. gentleman understand what I say?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do.

Mr. AMYOT. When he stated here a moment ago that he had produced the papers, he said what was not correct. I never made a motion. I put the motion on the paper once, and when the notice was called I was just entering the Chamber, but the word "dropped" had been spoken. I put the motion again on the paper, but it was then too late to be moved that Session. So when the hon. gentleman says that he produced these papers at my request, he says what is not correct, as his answer yesterday was not correct, as his interpretation of my telegrams was not correct, as all he says about them was not correct. When the hon. gentleman appeals to the records of this House, there I have him, and there I say: You are wrong. Can he give me the number of that report? Where is it? When was my motion made? One day when there was a question about Riel, this incident was brought in suddenly when I was not prepared to answer with the papers. But to-day I am going to put matters right. Well, following the advice of those old officers, I wired to the Minister what we thought of the way in which the war was being conducted, that mounted men should follow mounted men, and that the best use to which we could put the volunteers was to watch the provisions and the forts. A fort containing 100 people and situated hundreds of miles from any other fort, was in a dangerous position, and to watch and protect convoys of provisions passing through hundreds of miles of prairie, is more dangerous than to sit in one's office, and to study one's lesson, preparing insults to those who work, and to consult one's officers of a Department. Well the hon. gentleman answered me on the 23rd of April:

"Delighted to hear how well you are getting on."

Then he wired to me very often. In answer to that telegram about provisions, concerning which he has made so much noise and so many accusations against me, he telegraphed me:

"Telegram received. You will have heard the news which answers part of your telegram. You are doing splendidly."

"You are doing splendidly." Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman was sincere then, he is not sincere to-day, and vice versa. Certainly there has been a moment in his life when he was not sincere. If I was doing wrong why did he not warn me immediately to do better? But no; "You are doing splendidly." That is his answer. On the 20th April, 1885, he wrote me as follows:—

"Your letter received. I thank you for it, and the good news you give me of your battalion affords me great pleasure. I have implicit confidence in you and in your command. Write me as often as you can and give me the news. I take note of what you say of other matters in your letters."

We went to Calgary. I found it in a great state of excitement. I secured a meeting of the priests, of the mayor, and of the officer whom General Strange had placed in command of the local guard. They decided that I should wire the Minister of Militia the same thing that I had wired him from Swift Current, conveying to him the same ideas and asking him, moreover, to order some scouts to be sent over the country around Calgary. To that I received an answer, and in that answer I am thanked for the information, and he adds:

"I am happy to learn you arrived safe at Swift Current. We are all satisfied with the way in which you have done your work."

And then another telegram came, in which the Minister said:

"Keep me posted. * *"

One day we hear: Keep me posted; and when you write to me privately, the communication is private. Another day it is: Write me often; another day it is: You did beautifully; another day it is: We are charmed with the way you are acting and with your work. These telegrams, be it remembered, were not ordinary telegrams, but were in cipher. The telegram in which the Minister said, "Keep me posted," is this: I will not read all of it, because other parties are concerned:

"OTTAWA, 2nd May, 1885.

"You are doing well; keep me posted."

When I had arrived at Calgary, there was the end of it. I received orders to scatter my battalion over the plains, to divide it into five detachments and place them from 25 to 100 miles from each other. But I received no other instructions whatever in regard to my action in any emergency, except this: that Major General Strange ordered me to do his work. I worked hard; I worked day and night; I did my duty; I did the best I could. There has never been any complaint that what I did was not correctly done, and I do not think anyone could have done much better. There is one feature in connection with the service in the North-West that deserves mention. The Post Office Department did its best for us. We have nothing but praise and gratitude for that Department, and the Minister who was then presiding over it. We came back from the North-West, after visiting the Rocky Mountains, through the kindness of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and with the permission of the Minister and the Major General Commanding. We returned to Winnipeg; and in this connection I may say that I saved a few thousand dollars to the country by forcing the return of my troops from Winnipeg earlier than would otherwise have occurred. They would have remained four or five days longer if I had not pressed, by any number of telegrams, their return, and by showing the consequence of that policy, thus securing their return four or five days earlier, whereby a considerable expense was saved. When we returned we were cordially received, and everybody was satisfied. The Minister, with his great eloquence, came and made a speech to my men. His Excellency the Governor General was kind enough to deliver a speech. We were received most cordially by the people here. We had stopped at Toronto, where we had a brilliant reception, and all my men were charmed to find that in that great commercial centre there were so many warm hearts for the French Canadian volunteers, and they will never forget it. We were received all along the route most cordially, and we felt keenly the pleasure of again returning to our homes. At Quebec we had the grandest reception possible. The Minister of Militia continued his communications with me. He was most friendly. Everything I had done, everything I had written and spoken was correct. That continued until the Riel affair; and since that affair you know, Mr. Speaker, yourself how matters have turned. I contended in my telegrams to the Minister, and I contend still, that if the campaign had been made by mounted men, instead of it costing four, five or six millions, it would not have cost more than half a million, and would have lasted only about two weeks. It is true that it brought two titles to this country, but that is not sufficient recompense for the expense incurred and the lives lost. Those who have been to the North-West know very well the meaning of provisions and supplies there. There are hundreds of miles of prairie dotted over with only a few so-called forts, but these have no walls and consist simply of some small houses. Provisions are stored there and these are liable to be seized by the Indians and half-breeds, and the duty of protecting them and of guarding teamsters hauling provisions was a work much more difficult than the hon. Minister had to perform during the campaign. I do not desire to take away from the hon. gentleman's credit; I think he worked hard, and by means of commissions which decided questions against us without our receiving proper notice, by appointing officers specially to find out accounts against us, by arranging his work in such a way that a year and a-half afterwards accounts can be brought against us—by doing his work in that way he increased his work and persecuted his enemies and unduly protected his friends. I am sorry to be obliged to go into these details, but it is due to me that I should be allowed to explain these telegrams. According to my view it was through malice that the hon. Minister, last year, when we were discussing the Riel question, brought in those telegrams, incidentally, when I was unable to again address the House. The hon. gentleman, moreover, took advantage of my momentary absence last year, to have my motion dropped, and it is proper that I should take this, the first opportunity, to explain those telegrams. The hon. gentleman pretends they are before the House. He is mistaken. The hon. gentleman is mistaken in every point of fact that he has brought before the House. Is it fair, when we have done our best to serve our country, when we have made sacrifices, and done no act whatever to dishonor the flag, when, on the contrary, everything we have done elicited praise, is it fair that the Minister having charge of the militia force, instead of being our defender should become our accuser? Is that true public gratitude on the part of Canada? Is it worthy of this Dominion that the commanding officer and the officers of the 9th Battalion should be treated in that way by the Minister of Militia? The Minister did not leave his home. We, on the contrary, left our homes and went to the North-West to win a title for him. We exposed our lives, he did not. We did the real work of soldiers, he did not. I do not reproach him, however, for that. I am glad that a French Canadian got a title, and the more titles they have the more satisfied I shall be.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Mr. AMYOT. That is my idea. I am loyal; and the Queen is the fountain of honor. I do not reproach him for that; but I say it is not fair that the Minister of Militia should use his Department and all his private information to try and destroy those who made the fight and exposed their lives. That is not fair; political hatred should not go so far as that. If he tries to fight me on political grounds, that is all right; but to use my expedition to the North-West, to use my private telegrams against me, or to use his special officers to try to find out accounts against my battalion, is not right. I think he has quite forgotten his duty, and has gone a step too far in doing that. If his political wants were less, he would content himself with fighting me on political grounds. I know that for what I have said I will be exposed to any amount of persecution after Parliament is over, but I will do my best to resist; I will not give up the rights of either the commander or the soldiers of the battalion, but so long as I can I will do my best to protect them in the Province of Quebec as I did in the Province of Manitoba. When we were friendly he found everything all right, but now he finds everything all wrong. I leave it to the country to judge as to our respective rights.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have only one word to say in reply to the hon. gentleman. He has confined his remarks to defending his telegrams, and the manner in which he viewed his duty in the North-West. Now, the hon. gentleman states that I was incorrect in stating that last Session he moved to produce all the papers, letters and telegrams exchanged between the Minister of Militia and the commanding officer of the 9th Battalion. I beg again to state, as I have stated already, and as can be easily seen by referring to Hansard, that the hon. gentleman did make that motion, and it is also quite true that the motion was abandoned. In defending myself against the accusations he made against me, and against my Department, I stated that that motion being on the Table, I would give the hon. gentleman an idea of the telegrams and letters which I was prepared to produce. I read a few, and the hon. gentleman gave up his motion and did not consider it was right to continue the discussion. That is all I have to say on the matter.

Mr. AMYOT. I deny it.

Mr. MULOCK. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Militia to a matter concerning the York and Simcoe Battalion. It has no relation to the discussion which has preceded—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would it not be as well to bring it up on the Militia Estimates?

Mr. MULOCK. It will only take a few moments. The York and Simcoe Battalion is composed of men drawn partly from my own county and partly from the adjoining county. During the time of the suppression of the rebellion they went upon active service at the beginning, and they were about the last to leave the North-West for their homes. They were on duty, probably, some three months or more—I cannot speak with accuracy on that point—but it has been called to my attention, by some of the men who are my own constituents, that they have not received the same treatment that has been accorded to other volunteers under similar conditions. It appears, on reference to the Auditor General's report for the year ending 30th June, 1886, that certain allowances were made to certain battalions on duty in the North-West, and I will confine my remarks, by way of illustration of the treatment accorded to the several battalions, to the Queen's Own and the 10th Royals. On reference to the Auditor General's report, page 556, it appears that the Queen's Own was allowed $8.15 per man in lieu of clothing, as it is called. On page 557 it appears that the 10th Royals were allowed $2,070.10 for compensation for boots and underclothing; and, assuming that their strength was about the same as the strength of the Queen's Own, that would show an allowance, per capita, to the 10th Royals, of $8.15. It appears, on page 559, that an allowance was made to the 30th Battalion of $13.95 a head, made apparently under the heading "kit allowance." If you look through the Auditor General's report you will find various allowances made to the men, in some cases kit allowances, in others allowance for underclothing, in others allowances for boots and shoes and other necessaries. But in the case of the York and Simcoe Battalion no such allowance appears, and the men complain that they have not received the same treatment that the others have, and that they are entitled to have that allowance made to them. I find that a question was put by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) on the 25th of May, and the Minister of Militia replied that no allowance was made to the York and Simcoe Battalion, on the ground that they do not appear to have any claim for such an allowance. The answer of the Minister does not disclose why, in his judgment, they have no claim, but I understand he has stated that the reason why he has come to that decision is, that he alleges that the municipalities supplied them with their kit, underclothing, &c., and that, as they did not disburse anything, they are not entitled to this allowance. If that is the case I would like to know it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. In answer to that I would say that I am advised, and I believe correctly advised, that that reason is not well founded. I would say further that the Department has never caused any enquiry to be made to ascertain whether the men did or did not disburse a sum equal to $8.15, in supplying themselves with necessaries in connection with the campaign. Looking through the Auditor General's report it does not appear that the allowance is made for any specific article, but to compensate the men for supposed expenditure in supplying themselves with whatever necessaries they might be short of; and, apparently, a great deal of latitude has been allowed in making those allowances. I think, therefore, that it is unreasonable to say, without enquiry, that the York and Simcoe Battalion is not entitled to this compensation. I believe the Minister of Militia made allowances to the Queen's Own and the 10th Royals, without investigation as to whether they were or were not entitled to this compensation; and why he should have been so anxious that the York and Simcoe Battalion should not have it, while he was so willing to give it to the Queen's Own and the 10th Royals, I am at a loss to understand. It appears that the Queen's Own obtained their kit allowance on the 2nd of May, 1886, and that the 10th Royals obtained theirs on the 26th of December, 1885, within six months after their return. But although an application was made to the proper military authorities on behalf of the York-Simcoe Battalion, on the 2nd of March, 1886, it was not until the 4th of January, 1887, ten months afterwards, that the Government saw fit to answer their application at all, and the reply denied them any kit allowance, without the Department having properly investigated the facts. That is my charge, and I would ask the hon. Minister to reconsider the matter, and have the proper enquiries made, and I think he will satisfy himself that the York-Simcoe Battalion are entitled to that kit allowance. Moreover, if the volunteers receive gratuities from the municipalities or from their friends, I do not think the Government is going to be so picayune, so small in its dealings with them, as to refuse them the allowance on that account. The pay is very small, the hardships are great, and the loss to the individual is great; and it is an unpatriotic thing, in my judgment, for any Government to be too nice in its allowances to those who stand by the country in the hour of need. I, therefore, take the ground, that no matter who supplied the necessaries to the volunteers for whom I speak, they are certainly entitled to be treated in the same way as the 10th Royals or the Queen's Own were.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. member for North York brings this matter up by asking me why I am so anxious to refuse an allowance to the battalion whose case he is advocating, while allowances were granted to other battalions. On a former occasion it was my duty to answer another question that was put to me by another hon. gentleman on that very point. I stated then, what I repeat now, that in some cases, from the fact that it became necessary at a moment's notice to send a force to the front and to improvise everything that was necessary for the force, in some instances it was found that our stores were insufficient. Although the Department was taxed to its fullest capacity, it was found in some instances quite impossible to satisfactorily equip the men; and so it was thought advisable, on application made, to allow some of the battalions to obtain supplies in the stores and elsewhere, such as underclothing and other articles which were absolutely necessary for them in undertaking the campaign. In the case of the two Toronto battalions, so far as my recollection goes, they were merely paid the amounts which appear to have been paid to the different stores for the purpose of providing the equipment required.

An hon. MEMBER. No.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman dissents, but I think he will find that my statement is absolutely correct. In the case of the York-Simcoe Battalion, the municipality provided certain articles of equipment which became the property of the battalion, and I must draw the hon. gentleman's attention to this fact, that I ascertained, on enquiry, that if any money was to be reimbursed at all by the battalion, the municipality insisted on its being paid to the municipality, and not to the battalion.

Mr. MULOCK. Did the Department ascertain whether the men of the York-Simcoe Battalion had or had not expended certain moneys of their own in supplying themselves with necessaries in connection with the campaign?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The application was not brought before the Department in that way at all. It was brought before the Department claiming that we should pay public money for the purpose of reimbursing the battalion for those very articles which the municipality claimed to have furnished; and, in the report submitted to me after the investigation took place, which the hon. gentleman says did not take place, the officer who acted as Major stated that the men had no claim whatever.

Mr. MULOCK. Who was that?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am giving the statement placed in my hands by the officers of the Department.

Mr. MULOCK. Was it the Major of the regiment?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. One of the officers acting as Major in the battalion. An application was made by Lieut.-Col. O'Brien, through the proper channel, on the 2nd March, 1866, for "an allowance in lieu" of underclothing, &c., on the ground that in "all the other battalions which were engaged in the North-West the men were either provided with underclothing, &c., or received an allowance in lieu thereof," which statement is at variance with the facts. This application was replied to through the general officer commanding, on the 4th January, 1867. The officer who acted as Major stated that the men had no claim, as they had been provided for by the county, and if payment were made it should be to the municipality. Some battalions were given an allowance, but they proved that they had expended the amount for the purchase of kits for the men. The York and Simcoe Battalion does not appear to have any claim for such an allowance.

Mr. MULOCK. May I ask, is there any report from the Major to that effect?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There must have been, because it was submitted to me in answer to the enquiry made by my hon. friend.

Mr. MULOCK. Can the report be laid before the House?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman wishes the report, I will look into the matter and see whether it can be produced. I merely take this statement as forming part of the answer.

Mr. MULOCK. There are two Majors in the regiment. One is now in the North-West, and the other is a member of this House. I presume their reports are official, and that there is no objection to laying the report on the Table.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. If the hon. gentleman wishes, I will see if I can bring it down.

Mr. MULOCK. The reasons for my suggestion is this: there are two officers of that battalion in this House, and they, of course, would be able to verify that statement or to give the Minister correct information. I should like to know whether they concur in the report said to have been made by one of the Majors.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I am sorry to have to refer to this matter in the House, because I think it is a matter purely departmental, which ought to be dealt with by the Department. In the first place, if it was right for this allowance to have been made to any part of the force it should have been made to all alike, and no one should have been called on to make application for it. There are one or two matters I will briefly refer to, in regard to which misstatements have been made that put the Minister of Militia in a position he ought not to occupy. It is said that the pay-sheets were issued by the Department. That is not correct. None were issued by the Department. Those that were made out were obtained by the officers commanding companies, who were under the impression this allowance would be made. The reply of the Minister is not satisfactory, in my opinion. It makes no difference by whom, through whom, or at whose expense these supplies were furnished. If any of the men are entitled to compensation, all are. The case of the Minister would be much stronger if he had paid the claims of the municipalities, which he does not pretend to have done. Therefore, the position is this: that the Department have taken advantage of the liberality of the counties of York and Simcoe to escape payments which in other cases they seem to have no difficulty in making. That is not a proper position for the Government to occupy. With regard to the Major spoken of, I can only assume, from the circumstances, that he acted upon representations made by Col. Windham, who commanded the York portion of the battalion, and who probably did, upon being asked, make the answer referred to. If the Minister wished to obtain proper and direct information in the matter he should have taken a direct course, and instead of asking the Major—

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I did not ask the Major; I got the report from the Major General.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The proper course would have been to ask me, and not to have taken a hearsay statement from the Major, who may or may not have been acquainted with the facts. The facts are these, and I earnestly ask the Minister of Militia to reconsider the case, as it is due to himself and the Government he should. In the first place, when we left home, we never expected, and I do not think any of the men expected, to get payment for the clothing they had furnished themselves—that is to say, the articles furnished outside the ordinary issue of the Government. The county council of Simcoe very liberally furnished us with some articles, in value about one-third of what appears to have been paid out to the men by the Government. The county of York also gave their men something, in value, perhaps, about the same amount. When we came back, we found that the men of the Queen's Own and the 10th were signing pay-sheets issued by the Department, and were about to get certain money in compensation for clothing. It occurred to us, that if the 10th and the Queen's Own, who stood in the same position as we, because they had been assisted in their outfit by the city of Toronto, were entitled to an allowance, we were also entitled to it. It did not occur to us that any difficulty would be made in granting this allowance, because our friends in the county had assisted the men in obtaining an outfit. I spoke to several gentlemen connected with the Department, and their answer was, in the first instance, of course all will be treated alike. I naturally communicated that information to those interested. I told them I had no doubt payment would be made, and they, on their own responsibility, without instructions from me or the Department, issued those pay-sheets, and I wish it to be understood that the Minister is not responsible in any way for the issue of the pay-sheets. Subsequently the matter was referred to the Claims Commission. I said to the Department, this was not a matter for reference to that commission. Either the Department ought to have issued the allowance or it ought not; it was purely a departmental matter. The answer of the Minister is not satisfactory, because he has not shown any substantial difference in the position of the men of one part of the force compared with that of the men of the other part. It does not matter from what source the men obtained their outfit. If the men who had purchased theirs from the stores were entitled to compensation, those who obtained it, partly from the stores and partly through the assistance of their friends, were equally entitled to compensation. I hope the Minister will reconsider the matter.

Mr. EDGAR. I brought up this matter in this House some weeks ago, by a question to the Minister, in reference to what had been done in the case of the Toronto battalions, on the receipt by the Department of pay sheets which I had heard were signed by the men. Until just now, I thought that these sheets had been sent out by the Department; and I supposed it was extraordinary conduct on the part of the Department to issue the sheets and have them signed and then refuse to pay the men. It is not too late to rectify the wrong done. I believe the municipality of Toronto also made a formal claim on the Department to be paid this kit money, and the claim was not recognised. There is another argument in addition to that advanced by the hon. member for Muskoka in favor of these men getting their kit allowance. The Major of the battalion must have gone beyond his duty when he suggested to the Department that the battalion had no right to get the allowance.

Mr. TYRWHITT. As the Major of the battalion has been alluded to, I may say that I was one of the two majors of the battalion, but not the one by whom the communication was sent to the Department. I have argued from the first that the men were entitled to the allowance. I have not taken the active part in dealing with the Department that I possibly might have done had Col. O'Brien not been here to approach the Department. At the same time, I am possibly more interested than he, from the fact that the men claiming the allowance come principally from my neighborhood. Only last night I received a communication from one of the captains reminding me that I had guaranteed his allowance, and that owing to my having given this guarantee he had advanced it to his men, and he still holds me responsible for the amount. Only to-day I went to the Department with the view of seeing whether it was possible this grant might be made to us at an early day, as my memory has been jogged by being held responsible for what the captain had advanced to the men. I always considered we were entitled to the allowance, from the simple fact that it has been granted to other battalions, and because it is the ordinary rule to make these grants to men on active service in the field, and also from the fact that the men receiving fifty cents a day were making great pecuniary sacrifices, for which this paltry allowance did not remunerate them, except in a very small degree.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I wish to rectify one statement which has been made by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien). The hon. gentleman complained of this matter having been brought under the war commission instead of having been dealt with by the Department. The reason why it was brought before the war commission is that we have applications from a large number of municipalities who had in some instances given a good deal, and in other instances had given something less, and who claimed from the Department to be reimbursed. As I viewed it the only practicable way of dealing with it was to have these claims investigated, and a report made to me, so that I could look into the matter and ascertain what had been done. In the case of the Toronto battalion, as the hon. gentleman can easily find out, the amount of money paid out was paid directly for kit articles which were purchased for the men, and the municipality was not in any way considered. The hon. gentleman is quite correct in stating that a claim was made by the municipality, but, in the case of that municipality, as in the case of every other municipality, the application was refused. I must say, for my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, that he has been time and again before the Department urging his claim, and certainly, if it has not been granted, it is not in any way due to a lack of insistence on the part of my hon. friend from Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) or my other hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Tyrwhitt).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may not quite correctly have apprehended the statements which have been made, but, if I did correctly understand them, the information which the Minister of Militia received appears to have been received, not from the Colonel in command, but from a subordinate officer. If that was the case, it appears to me that a breach of military etiquette, to say the least, was committed, and that the officer in command had some right to complain. The officer in command is the party with whom the Department ought to communicate in respect to claims of this kind, and, as I understand, he was not consulted; and an inferior officer—not the hon. gentleman who spoke before the Minister of Militia, but the other major—appears to have been consulted, and in consequence rather incorrect information seems to have been given to the Department as to the claims of the battalion, which have not been granted. If that be correct, I think the Department of Militia, or the person who is charged with communicating with the commandant of the battalion, certainly went out of his way, and rather threw a slur on that officer.

Mr. MULOCK. It is understood, I believe, that the Minister will bring down the reports?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, and I think it is much more satisfactory to deal with the matter when the reports come down, because it is inconvenient to make statements from memory. I may say, however, that the hon. gentleman will find that the Department of Militia did not go out of the ordinary way in getting the information which was required.

Care of Archives..... $6,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe, in connection with that, that last year there was an item which, in looking over the Auditor General's report, I do not quite understand. I see under the head of expenditure of London office the following entries: Copying archives, $1,080; comparing, $2,384. It appeared to me that these two items ought to have been reversed, that the copying of the archives ought to have engrossed a much larger portion of our vote than the comparing of any archives, but nearly two and a-half times as much is spent for comparing as is spent for the service of copying and adding useful papers, or interesting papers, at any rate to our library. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman or the officer in charge knows how such a thing came about.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the hon. gentleman the information when we meet again at 8 o'clock.

Expenses in connection with Patent Record..... $9,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire whether this printing of the Patent Record is part of the contract with Burland's Lithographic Company, or whether it is granted to them by the Department without tender. The chief work is done by Burland's Lithographic Company. I want to know whether that is under contract, or how that company comes to receive the work?

Mr. CARLING. I understand that it is part of the contract with the Burland Lithographic Company,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is to say, the contract which was renewed lately for a period of four or five years.

Mr. CARLING. No, I think it is a separate contract.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If it be not the same contract, I desire to know from the Minister when this contract was granted, and how long it runs.

Mr. CARLING. I am informed by my officer that it expires next October.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long did it run—five years?

Mr. CARLING. Three years.

Expenses in connection with preparation of criminal statistics.....$4,000

Mr. JONES. I see two items here, one for criminal statistics and one for health statistics. How is that money spent? I thought that expenditure for statistics had been abolished.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not with regard to these two items.

Mr. JONES. The Minister of Finance will remember that at one time we had a statistical officer in Halifax, but that was abolished.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That had no reference either to health statistics or to criminal statistics. It was the registration of births, marriages and deaths.

Mr. JONES. Where is this money spent?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The amount for criminal statistics is expended under the direction of the Department of Justice.

Mr. JONES. In each Province?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It covers the whole Dominion. It has reference to the criminal statistics of the whole Dominion.

Mr. DAVIES. I can understand how the expense of collecting statistics in the Health Department may be incurred, but I cannot quite see how we incur $4,000 for the preparation of criminal statistics, because they must be furnished to the Department by the different officers throughout the Dominion. The hon. gentleman sees that these statistics are furnished by the stipendiary magistrates and clerks of the courts, as a matter of course, and as part of their official returns which they make to the Department of Agriculture. The increase of $1,000 does not apply to that Department alone. A great part of it the hon. gentleman charges to that special branch, extra clerks, $1,800, and he charges sundry persons for statistical returns $1,100. I suppose that is paid to persons throughout the Dominion for making returns. But these returns, I understand, are made by these officials without pay. While the hon. gentleman is explaining this matter to me, he might also explain how it is that he asks for an increase of $1,000 over the expenditure of that branch of his Department for the past financial year of which we have an account?

Mr. CARLING. I do not understand that we ask for any increase in this vote as stated by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES. Oh, yes. The hon. gentleman expended in the year 1885-6, $3,000, and he is now asking $4,000 for the same purpose. Now, I want to know what has caused the increase.

Mr. CARLING. The expenses vary. Some years they are greater than others.

Mr. CARLING.

Mr. DAVIES. Will the hon. gentleman answer my question? Where is this money paid, and who is it paid to?

Mr. CARLING. It is provided for by statute. This amount of $1,800 is paid to the clerks of the Department.

Mr. DAVIES. That is all right, I have not sufficient information to form a judgment as to whether that $1,800 is the correct appropriation or not—I assume it is. I am not talking about the charge of $1,800 paid to extra clerks in his Department. That is only a small portion of the expenditure. There is $1,173 paid to sundry persons for statistical returns. I want to know who these sundry persons are. Are they stipendiary magistrates and clerks of the courts?—because they make returns without pay.

Mr. CARLING. I understand the amount is paid to the clerks of the courts and the officers supplying the information. That is provided for by statute.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Their fees and the amounts vary according to the number of cases.

Mr. DAVIES. I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. Of course I accept his statement.

Mr. CARLING. I am advised by the officers of the Department that such is the case.

For expenses in connection with Dominion Exhibition $10,000

Mr. DAVIES. Where is it to be held this year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At Toronto.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who are the parties to whom it was paid last year? I see it was not all paid to one gentleman, but to two last year.

Mr. CARLING. It was paid to the Sherbrooke Exhibition last year, and to the London Exhibition the year before, where the Provincial exhibition was held. This year it has been promised to the Toronto Industrial Exhibition.

For expenses in connection with Health Statistics....$10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to know on what principle the hon. gentleman regulates such a payment as this. Sundry persons, 19,056 death certificates, at 15 cents each. Are these the statistical officers who receive, in addition to the sums afterwards put down against the names, the amount of $3,367? Who has to make out these death certificates? In what manner is the hon. gentleman distributing this $2,858 which went for 19,000 death certificates?

Mr. CARLING. I understand that the health officers of the different cities pay so much to the keepers of the cemeteries for information as to the number of deaths, and so much is allowed to the officer in each city for the information furnished. The fees are regulated by an Order in Council passed some years ago.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What places do these 19,000 deaths apply to? Are they places where officers are appointed?

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman will find, in the Auditor General's report, the different places and the amounts paid to each officer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The names of the officers are there, but not the sums paid them. If the hon. gentleman looks he will see it reads: "Sundry persons, 19,056 death certificates, $2,858," then there is a series of some 20 gentlemen distributed throughout Canada.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before recess I was calling the attention to the Minister of Agriculture to the item health statistics, and I desire to know how that particular charge of 15 cents for each of the 19,000 odd deaths was arranged?

Mr. CARLING. The caretakers of the cemeteries in the different towns and cities are paid 15 cents per death.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do these return represent the mortality at Montreal, Quebec, Ottawa and other points?

Mr. CARLING. Yes; all the cities named in the Auditor's report.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This sum is altogether too small to obtain anything like correct health statistics for the whole Dominion. It would be better, in my opinion, if the expenditure were confined to a number of places selected in each Province, so that we could obtain the statistics with some degree of accuracy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Statistics with respect to the principal cities?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. CARLING. It is so now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you think accurate statistics are obtained for these cities?

Mr. CARLING. They are confined to all cities and towns over 5,000 inhabitants, where a health officer is appointed by the corporation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do 19,056 deaths accurately represent the annual death rate in those cities?

Mr. CARLING. Yes, I think so. The statistics are taken by medical men.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The statistics are simply the burials in the cemeteries attached to the cities. The return is roughly accurate, I dare say; but a very considerable number of persons are buried in the cemeteries of large towns who do not reside within the bills of mortality of each town, and, therefore, we cannot rely on these statistics as giving a strictly accurate death rate for the various towns and cities.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I understand that the means of collecting the statistics is to obtain returns from the various cemeteries by visiting them, and obtaining from the caretaker the number of burials that have taken place.

Mr. CARLING. Not by visiting the cemeteries, but by arranging with the caretaker of the cemetery to keep a record of the burials, and pay 15 cents for each.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The collectors exercise no discretion as to the classification of burials, and, therefore, the record obtained by the Government is a very imperfect one. Is not this payment a liberal one for collecting the names from the clerks, and reporting the deaths to the Minister of Agriculture? The system under which this amount is expended is virtually useless so far as regards obtaining reliable information, and if some other method of obtaining information is not adopted, this appropriation will be virtually wasted. I would have no objection to the vote if proper means were adopted whereby the Government would obtain that which would be of use to the country; but, under the present system, the money is simply squandered. It is not pretended that the work of the physician who collects the statistics by merely going into a clerk's office and obtaining the number of burials is worth $100 a year and upwards. The Government ought to devise some systematic method whereby they can utilise this money in the public interest and not squander it after the present manner. If they would join with the various township boards established throughout Ontario and thus obtain reliable information, the grant would be a benefit; but the course now pursued is perfectly useless; no benefit accrues from it and no information is obtained for the benefit of the country. I observe, moreover, that the grant is increased, that last year the amount expended was some $7,000, this year they ask for $10,000. The committee should have some information as to what is intended to be done with this increased amount.

Mr. CARLING. The estimate this year is the same as last year, $10,000. Other towns are coming into the arrangement and appointing health officers; and there might be an increased number of burials this year, as compared with last. Because $10,000 is voted, it does not follow that the whole amount will be expended.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I understand that point, and that the Government may require a larger amount this year than last; but the Minister must have some definite idea as to how he intends to extend his operations, and why he considers an increased amount necessary. Am I to understand that the Government expect a much larger number of deaths this year on account of the increase of population? It may be so, for the Minister is arranging for collecting reports of a larger number of burials. Is that the data on which the committee is asked to grant $2,000 more than was required last year? It is a very indefinite reply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no doubt there is a great deal in what the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), and the hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), have said. But I am quite sure I need not say to either of these gentlemen, that it is impossible to have any adequate health statistics in this wide Dominion with an appropriation of $10,000. The Government considered this in the past, and a somewhat elaborate scheme was prepared by the predecessor of my hon. friend, who is now Minister of Agriculture and Immigration, but it was found that to carry out anything approaching a thorough system of vital statistics would involve a very large expenditure. All that we can possibly aim at, over an extensive country like this, by an appropriation of $10,000, is to found the nucleus of a system to provide for having such vital statistics as may be obtained without any large expense. My own impression is, speaking with some knowledge of the subject—and it is a matter of vital importance—that the question of having a thorough and extended system of health statistics will force itself upon the attention of the Government, and will have to be provided for by a carefully prepared scheme which will really accomplish the object we have in view. It is very necessary that every country should have such a system. There is no doubt that in the Province of Ontario they have given a great deal of attention to this subject, and that they have a very advanced system of collecting vital as well as other statistics. I think they are probably a good deal in advance of most of the other Provinces, although Quebec has also arrangements for carrying out that work. In the other Provinces, however, I fear there is not very much done by the local authorities, and I believe the time is not far distant when it will be absolutely necessary to have a carefully prepared scheme by which such a system will be carried out much more efficiently than is possible with so small an appropriation.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I think what the hon. gentleman says should lead the Government to consider whether they should not make an appropriation to each of the Provincial Governments, and allow them to do the work. They will be able to do it much more efficiently than it can be done by the Dominion at large. If a reasonable amount was appropriated to the boards which are established in the Province of Ontario, and I think in the Province of Quebec, the sum required would not be so large as the Minister appears to think necessary for the collection of these statistics, which would be of great benefit and use to the Dominion.

Establishment and maintenance of Experimental Farms$90,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a very considerable sum, and a very important question. I desire to obtain from the Minister in charge, or from the Finance Minister, a statement of what has been done with the $30,000 voted last year, and what is proposed to be done with the $90,000 which is now asked for?

Mr. CARLING. I may say that an experimental farm of some 465 acres has been purchased in the vicinity of the city of Ottawa, which the Government are now fencing, and upon which they are preparing to erect buildings. The greater part of the expenditure this year is for the erection of buildings on the farm. I may say that it is intended to establish experimental farm stations, one in the Maritime Provinces, one in Manitoba, one in the North-West Territories, and one in British Columbia. This money will be used for the securing of sites for the experimental stations, and making improvements on them and the central station.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the cost of the 465 acres bought, and from whom was it purchased?

Mr. CARLING. It was purchased from different parties. Some of the land was purchased from Mr. Booth at $100 per acre, and the price of other portions had to be referred to arbitration. Altogether it will, I think, cost about $130 per acre. The total cost will be something like $60,000 or $65,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What buildings are upon it?

Mr. CARLING. There are none of any consequence; some old barns and other small buildings which must be taken off and new buildings erected.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. An average price of $130 an acre strikes me as a very high figure to pay for farm land in the vicinity of Ottawa. Whether it is necessary to have it in what you may call the suburbs of Ottawa is doubtful, but I would remind the hon. gentleman that land can be purchased in the most fertile districts of Ontario with very good farm buildings upon it, at $60, $70 or $80 an acre.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not so near a city as this.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I am not so sure about that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is about three miles from where we are.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I don't know that that is any great advantage.

Mr. CARLING. Oh, yes, it is.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, I am not so certain about that; but even in the vicinity of very considerable towns, farm land of good quality and with good buildings is obtainable at the rates I have mentioned. From whom was this land purchased? I suppose it was mostly bought from two or three persons, and not in a number of small parcels.

Mr. CARLING. The first purchase was made from Mr. Booth at $100 an acre, which was considered a very reasonable price, considering the situation. The situation is a most beautiful one; the farm has the different kinds of soil required for experimental purposes; it is convenient to the railway and Rideau Canal—in fact the railway runs across one corner of it—it is within three miles of the Parliament buildings, so that it is very convenient in the way of hauling manure from the city, as well as in other respects. We have been obliged to refer the price of some of the land to arbitration, and in every case the figures fixed by the arbitrators have been higher than the rates which we offered. Although we have purchased from five or six different parties; the cheapest lot was all purchased without arbitration, and many persons who were called as witnesses valued it at more than double what we paid for it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What amount do you expect to pay for the buildings which will have to be erected, for the stock, agricultural implements, and everything of that kind which will be wanted for the business? It is clear that if the other farms are to be established on an equally handsome scale with this, the experiment will involve a very heavy charge. But I would like to know in the first instance the cost of additional buildings, as well as of the agricultural implements and stock the hon. gentleman proposes to put on.

Mr. CARLING. It is expected that the total cost of land, buildings, agricultural implements, horses and stock of different kinds, will be about $160,000 for the central farm.

Mr. FISHER. How much land was there in the first purchase?

Mr. CARLING. About 146 acres.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman says that the price of land was $130 an acre. I am aware that in the immediate vicinity of Montreal, which is considered to be probably the best farming district in the Dominion of Canada, the average price of the best farms is not over $100 per acre, and it surprises me that in a place where land is not in the same demand, and where the local market is not so great, it should bring so high a price.

Mr. CARLING. It depends on the situation.

Mr. FISHER. I am speaking of the district near Petite Côte, which is considered the best farming district about Montreal, and is within easy access of the city, and it is used for the purpose for which the most fertile land in the neighborhood of a large city is used, that is to say, for market gardening. I know that large farms there have been sold for $100 an acre. The expense of this experimental farm is certainly mounting up very seriously, and although I was quite prepared last Session to endorse the establishment of this farm, I think the fears which I then expressed, that the hon. gentleman might go a little too fast, have been realised.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. member for Brome could not have prosecuted his investigations around here as to the value of land very actively, or he would have known that $100 an acre is a very small price. I may say that the hon. member for North Simcoe and myself have been making a good many enquiries about the value of land in this neighborhood, and we have found that land within five or six miles of the city, near Aylmer, rather inferior land too, could not be bought for less than $100 an acre; and farms were pointed out to us that would bring $150 an acre. I know that in my part of the country, there are farms 100 miles from Toronto that could not be bought for less than $100 an acre—cleared farms with fair buildings upon them. I may say that in different directions in this country farmers value their farms at from $100 to $150 an acre; and when you consider the importance of this enterprise of an experimental farm, the price paid has been very small. There is no interest in the country that so much needs the close attention of this House to-day as the agricultural interest. There is a feeling in different parts of the country that the subject of seed grain and various other matters in connection with agriculture need investigation, and the hon. Minister I think ought to be commended for the step he has taken. The farm is only the nucleus of what will in time be a very valuable institution. I know that the farmers of my district, who have been applying year after year to the Local Government to bring in seed grains and test them, and have been refused, hail this step as one of vital importance to the country. The distribution of seed grain appears to have taken very well with the farmers. If the institution develops, as we hope and expect, it will be one of the most important institutions in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. DAWSON. I think it is very desirable that this system of experimental farm should be extended. It has been attended with a good deal of success in the Province of Ontario, where it has been tried by the Local Government, and I think it should be gradually extended, not at once, but in the course of time, to the different parts of the Dominion. I think, above all, that it should be tried in the new districts, so that the settlers could get an example of what they should do in the way of treating soils and in other respects. In the great central district of Algoma there is a great deal of good land. Along the north coasts of Lake Superior and Lake Huron there are occasional areas of excellent land, which are now beginning to return good crops, and I think we should have an experimental farm in that part of the country. In the Thunder Bay district the climate differs very materially from that which prevails in other parts of Canada, owing to the vicinity of the great lake. The spring is cold, but it is more than offset by an exceedingly open fall. The immense area covered by the inland lakes is a guarantee against frost. The water gets highly heated in these inland lakes in summer, and cools but slowly in the fall, and thus largely saves us from early frost. There is an immense region, extending from the Georgian Bay to the head of the great lakes and through to Keewatin, a distance of more than 1,000 miles, and I think it is very desirable that agricultural experiments should be made in that country to see what it will produce. Those experiments should be carried on scientifically as well as practically, as I have no doubt they would be. I would very much like to see the system extended to the interior.

Mr. JONES. I do not object to the purpose for which this expenditure is asked, although I was under the impression that experiments of this kind were rather within the province of the Local Administrations. However, since the Government have inaugurated a policy of this kind, I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Agriculture whether it is proposed to extend the system to the Maritime Provinces. The hon. gentleman is aware, I suppose, that we have farms of equal fertility in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. And if the Government are inviting expenditure to the amount asked for by this vote, I venture to hope they are not going to leave the Maritime Provinces without an experimental farm in some central locality.

Mr. CARLING. The interests of the Maritime Provinces have not been overlooked. It is the intention to establish an experimental farm station for the three Maritime Provinces, and a sum has been put in the Estimates with a view to making a commencement.

Mr. FISHER. With regard to what the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Sproule) has said as to the value of property in this neighborhood, I did not make enquiries into the price of land in the neighborhood of Ottawa.

Mr. SPROULE. I understood the hon. gentleman to say Ottawa.

Mr. FISHER. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I venture to say, however, that any land of the high price quoted by the hon. gentleman would have buildings upon it.

Mr. SPROULE. No; no buildings and inferior land at that.

Mr. FISHER. I am inclined to believe then that the owners must be holding it for purely speculative purposes. I am sorry to see this expenditure reach its present proportions. I am well aware that when the Minister of Agriculture proposed this new departure in the way of experimental farms, I was very glad to endorse his proposition, because I believed it was necessary, in the interests of the agricultural community, that something of this kind should be done; but at that time I protested, as I do now, against a very large expenditure being made on experimental stations in the various parts of the country. The view which I hold, and which I believe was embodied in the report of the committee of which I had the honor to be a member, made in the Session of 1884, was chiefly that such scientific experiments as were beyond the reach of ordinary farmers, or men without scientific education and without the facilities or appliances necessary to make scientific and accurate experiments, should be undertaken by competent men at a central experimental station; but I thought then, as I think still, and I believe that was the idea that governed the committee, that these experiments should be such as could be taken in one place for the whole Dominion; that is to say, such experiments as would not require to be repeated in all the different sections and localities of our extensive country. But if the experiments are to be repeated in every locality, where the character and soil and climate may be different from those of other localities, it will be better to let the local authorities carry out such experiments. I believe there are a very large number of scientific experiments which require for their carrying out men of high scientific attainments, whose services we cannot get without a considerable expenditure of money, and whom it would be impossible to find in sufficient numbers to carry out these various experiments in the various Provinces—such experiments as these might well be made in the central station here. The results could be spread broadcast among our farmers throughout the Dominion, so that they might benefit by them, by means of a system of distribution of bulletins, or by means of weekly or monthly reports. The hon. the Minister of Agriculture has said, in reply to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that it is still the intention of the Government to establish branch stations in the Maritime Provinces. I believe it was suggested last year that one should be established in the Maritime Provinces, one in Manitoba, one in the North-West Territories, and one in British Columbia; and I then outlined what I believed to be a very much more practical and inexpensive mode of obtaining all the results that would accrue from the establishment of these branch stations. After all, these branches will only serve the country in their immediate neighborhood, in so far as the experiments of growing crops, which depend on the climatic conditions and soil, are concerned. But a series of experiments might be carried on under a system by which this central experimental station would send out to every constituency in the Dominion seeds or artificial manure to be tested upon the soils in the various localities. I believe a system of this kind could be inaugurated, by which we could get absolutely complete returns of experiments throughout the Dominion. The system could be cheaply and easily carried out by means of the assistance of members of this House, each of whom would recommend to the Government some one individual or two in his own constituency qualified to carry out such experiments. Such experiments ought not to be trusted to the average class of farmers, but to men who would be willing and able to carry out to the letter the instructions sent to them by the central experimental station, so that the reports sent in could be compiled, and issued in compiled form to the agriculturists of the whole country. The results under this system would be more satisfactory and complete than by the method proposed of having four or five experimental stations scattered over the various Provinces. Judging by the estimate of to-day, I am still more confident than I was last year that the system I propose can be much more cheaply carried out than the one adopted. Before closing I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture, as he proposes here an outlay of some $90,000, if any proportion of this is to be laid out upon branch stations, or whether all is to go to the central station.

Mr. CARLING. I have said that a portion of the money was to be laid out in improving the central station, and a portion in establishing experimental stations in the various Provinces. The hon. member need not be alarmed about the expenditure on these stations. I think I stated to the House last year about what it would cost to establish them in the different Provinces and we are only carrying out the scheme then adopted. In Ontario, the capital account of the agricultural college is now something in the neighborhood of $400,000, and I would say that the capital sum of the central farm station and the four experimental stations will not exceed $300,000. I think the hon. gentleman has perhaps not read the report of Professor Saunders, for in that he will see that the plan to which he refers is recommended, and that Professor Saunders proposes that these experiments shall be made here at the central farm, and that bulletins shall be issued frequently and distributed to the farmers in every Province throughout the Dominion. But we think it necessary to establish an experimental farm station in the Maritime Provinces on a plan somewhat different from that here, and also stations in Manitoba, the North-West Territories, and British Columbia. The expenditure in each of the Provinces will not be so great as that on the central farm, where all chemical tests and experiments of that kind will be made; but in the outlying stations we will have an agriculturist and a horticulturist at the head of those employed on the farms. The chief experiments and scientific tests, however, will be made at the central farm.

Mr. FISHER. If this is the case, if this system which I advocated last year is to be carried out practically—

Mr. CARLING. It was in the report of last year.

Mr. FISHER. I know it was in the report of Professor Saunders, but I did not know it was to be immediately carried out. I am very glad that it is to be carried out, but, if the scientific chemical experiments are to be carried on here, I cannot see the use, at all events for some time to come, of the establishment of these branch stations.

Mr. CARLING. I think it is most important, especially in Manitoba and the North-West, to have agricultural experiments carried on, because a new settler going there does not know to whom to go for advice, as to what kind of grain he should use, at what time he shall plough, or in what kind of way the farm should be cultivated. They want some one to go to for advice, and we believe that having first class men at the head of the agricultural and horticultural departments in the experimental farm, they can be of great service to new settlers.

Mr. WATSON. I agree with the statement of the Minister of Agriculture that it is of the utmost importance that this branch experimental farm should be established in Manitoba. To my mind, it is even of greater importance to have one of these experimental farms in Manitoba and the North-West, than it is to establish the central farm in Ottawa, because that is the country where they want to instruct settlers how to operate their new farms, and that is the country the Government are looking to with a view to locate settlers and increase settlement. But while I approved of this step being taken last year—I believed it was in the right direction at that time, and I think so still, that these experimental farms in the different Provinces might be conducted with greater advantage by the local organisations than from headquarters here in Ottawa—I think, if a certain amount of money was voted to the Provinces and these farms were operated under the control of the Board of Agriculture of each Province, they would give better results than if they are operated from headquarters in Ottawa. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if it is his intention to commence operations on the farm in Manitoba this year?

Mr. CARLING. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. Has the location of the farm been decided on?

Mr. CARLING. No, it has not.

Mr. WATSON. If the hon. gentleman has not decided on the location of the farm, it will be very hard to start operations this year.

Mr. CARLING. We do not expect to commence to farm this year, but we will secure the land, and put up the buildings, and be ready for next spring.

Mr. WATSON. I will inform the Minister of Agriculture that unless he gets the land almost immediately, and breaks it, he will have very poor success next year. It is necessary to break the land, and backset it, and get it ready for crop, and that should be done in June.

Mr. CARLING. We cannot secure the land without the money.

Mr. WATSON. I should have hoped that it could be paid out of the money voted last year. That would have been sufficient to purchase the land. The hon. Minister visited that section last year, and I had hoped that he made some notes in order to enable him to select the farm. I fear it will be of very little use next year. If it is not purchased immediately, and the prairie broken up and cultivated, it will be of little or no use next year. I say it would be much better in the interests of the country as a whole that a certain portion of the money that has been voted and expended on the central farm in Ottawa should be expended in establishing this farm in Manitoba, because it is of the utmost importance that all the information possible should be given to immigrants and new settlers. And more than that, all the farmers in that country to-day are experimentalists. I approve of the plan of securing a quantity of Russian wheat and sending it out there for experiment. Wheat farming is more important than anything else there, but I think that trees which can be grown with advantage should be experimented upon. I urge upon the Minister of Agriculture that he shall have the farm in Manitoba established at the earliest moment, and then I hope a selection of good lands will be made, where the best results will be secured.

Mr. DALY. When the last gentleman rose, I was about to state almost what he has stated, that I think it is highly necessary in the interests of the Province of Manitoba and the North-West that this experimental farm should be established as early as possible, not only in regard to the question of agriculture, but also in regard to horticulture. It is necessary on our prairies, which as hon. gentlemen know, are denuded of trees, that experiments should be made not only as far as the forest trees are concerned, but in relation to fruit. We have certain wild fruits there, and it is believed that, if grafts are made on certain wild fruits, we will be able to grow fruits in that country which are not thought of at the present moment. As to the location of the farm, I think the Minister of Agriculture will give credit to the members on this side of the House from Manitoba, that they have urged the early location of that farm periodically and systematically on the Government. If there is not sufficient money to purchase that farm now, we hope that the farm will be purchased at as early a date as possible, so that a beginning may be made this year. As to the wheat which has been distributed, I am satisfied, from the replies I have received from those to whom I sent the wheat, that they are delighted with the sample; and I think the last speaker will agree with me that a great question in that country is to get a sample of wheat that will ripen earlier. The frosts we suffered from for a couple of years may not occur again, because it is said that a different system of farming which has been adopted in the last two years will result in our not being affected by the frosts in the future; and, if we can get a grain that will ripen earlier than the hard Fife wheat which is used now, a great deal will be gained. Mr. Saunders says that the wheat which has been sent up comes from a latitude higher in Russia than the latitude in Manitoba, and no doubt, if it ripens there, it will ripen early in our Province. Coming back to the question of the value of the farm purchased here, I think I saw in one of the Ottawa papers a day or two ago that the arbitrators had valued Mr. Stackpole's farm at $125 per acre.

Mr. CARLING. $126.

Mr. DALY. $126, and, taking the statement of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) the other day, that the lands in Ontario had lessened in value, I will quote from the report of Mr. Blue, of the Agriculture Department of Ontario, who says that the value of farm lands in that Province have increased by twenty-two millions in 1886 as compared with 1885, and this increase was not due to increased acreage only, but that the value per acre increased. In the March report of the Washington Department of Agriculture, it is stated of New York State as follows:—

"On the whole, farmers are more in debt than they were ten years ago. There are a large number of farms which were purchased a few years ago and mortgaged, which now would not sell for more than the face of the mortgages, owing to depreciation of the farming lands which, on an average, is fully 33 per cent. in ten years. Probably one-third of the farms in the State would not sell for more than the cost of the buildings and other improvements owing to this shrinkage."

I merely give this extract from Mr. Blue's report to show that instead of farms in Ontario being depreciated in value, they have increased; and I think if the hon. gentlemen opposite, who possibly know more about farming than I do—because I was told in the House the other night that I was a lawyer and knew nothing about farming—if they visited that farm and compared it with other farms in Ontario, they will find that the Department of Agriculture has not paid any more than the land is worth.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the Minister of Agriculture if the establishment of an experimental farm in the Maritime Provinces is included in this vote, whether the Government propose making a commencement this year, or whether any enquiries have been made on the subject already; also, whether he can tell me at what place in the Maritime Provinces they propose establishing this farm?

Mr. FERGUSON (Leeds and Grenville). With reference to the value of land and to the remarks of the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), there seems to be some doubt as to the correct value of this land. I know, as a matter of fact, that farms two, three and four miles further from the city of Ottawa, and on the bank of the same canal, have changed hands for purely farming purposes within the present season, some for $125, and one for $150 an acre, for a 150-acre farm. The buildings were very inferior, because they were occupied by old people, but they were bought by younger men with a prospect of a longer life before them. I was agreeably surprised to hear from the Minister of Agriculture that the cost of this farm only averaged $130 an acre. I feel confident that if the Government offered that farm for sale to-morrow, at a price of $130 per acre, on the average, with the large bonus included, they would have scores of applicants for purchase.

Mr. CARLING. In answer to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), I may state it is intended to make a commencement in the Maritime Provinces this year, and a portion of this money is for that purpose. The site has not yet been selected, but soon after the House rises an examination and selection will be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is any portion of this vote intended to establish an experimental farm in New Brunswick?

Mr. CARLING. It is intended to establish an experimental farm in one of the Provinces, I do not know which, that will answer for the three.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think Miramichi would be a very suitable place, very convenient and central.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am glad the Government are making an effort to do something in the interest of the farming community. I am sure that if there is any class in this Dominion who deserve that something should be done in their interest by this Government, it is the farmers. There is no section of the electors of this Dominion that have suffered so seriously under the operation of the hon. gentleman's policy, as the farmers.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. Hon. gentlemen may pooh-pooh, but the farmers of this country are beginning to realise that the operations of that policy have been impoverishing them, and will continue to do so. The increase of duties this year on iron will undoubtedly extract from the farmers' pockets more, proportionately to each individual, than it will from the pockets of any other class. I should be very glad indeed to give my assistance in doing something in the interest of the agriculturists. My hon. friend who spoke a moment ago referred to some remark I had made with regard to the value of lands in Ontario, and quoted some statistics from the Ontario reports to show they had increased in value. Now, we know perfectly well that, year after year, the municipalities of the different counties raised the assessment on agricultural lands for the purpose of keeping down the rates to as low a point as possible. These statistics are all gathered from the assessment of the different municipalities; that is the basis upon which these calculations are made. Although by that report the value of land appears to have increased, I know that in the section where I live, and in the counties around me, the value of land has positively decreased. There is not a single money loaning institution in Toronto to-day that is prepared to loan the same amount of money upon the same hundred acres to-day that they would have loaned two or three years ago. That is pretty strong evidence that the value of land is decreasing instead of increasing. I know that lands in my section of the country that sold for $40 or $50 an acre three years ago, can be bought to-day for $30 to $35 an acre, and cannot find buyers. I should be very glad indeed to be able to report that lands are improving in price, but that is not the case. I sympathise very much with the agriculturists who have suffered very considerably, as I have stated, and they will continue to suffer. Now, Sir, if this experimental farm can accomplish anything for the agriculturists I shall be exceedingly rejoiced, but I am afraid it will only be a hole in which we will bury a lot of money and nothing really will be accomplished. I am glad to hear to-night some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who support the Government expressing the opinion that the Agricultural College of Ontario has accomplished a great deal of good in the interests of the farmers of that Province. Why, Sir, for five or six, or seven years, hon. gentlemen opposite poured their hostility upon the Government of Ontario for establishing that farm; they used all sorts of language with regard to the expenditure connected with it, but now they are beginning to admit that it has accomplished something. Now, I would like very much that this farm, in which we are going to bury a lot of money, would turn out to be a success. But I hold that if the Minister of Agriculture would distribute amongst the farmers in some other way some portion of the money that is being extracted out of their pockets, wrongfully so, by the increase of duties; if he were to distribute some of the profits among the agricultural associations, or import into this country a class of cattle that would improve our stock, and a better class of sheep, and give those animals in the way of prizes, or in some other way to scatter them throughout the country so as to improve the various kinds of stock, I say it would be very much better than to spend a whole lot of money in the way you propose to spend it on this experimental farm. You may accomplish something by an experimental farm; I hope you will, and if the farmer gets 10 cents for every dollar he pays he well deserves it. He is paying largely, and he best deserves from hon. gentlemen opposite something in the way of a return, as he suffers so severely. The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Sproule) said something with respect to the value of farms in his section, and he talks of farms being worth $100 an acre. I have been through the county of Grey, and, although I admit there are some very desirable farms, still I never saw a farm that would bring that figure, and I do not think there are half a dozen farms in the whole county that would realise it. The hon. gentleman includes buildings.

Mr. SPROULE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. The farm here without buildings has cost $130 an acre. The Agricultural College farm at Guelph had a good many improvements on it when it was bought, and the Government have added largely, so that now it is in a very desirable shape. It has cost a good deal of money and is an excellent farm, and the land is more valuable than that purchased here. It is within one mile of Guelph, it is in one of the best counties of Ontario, and is one of the most valuable pieces of land within the limits of the Dominion. Under these circumstances, and with the very high state of cultivation into which it has been brought by the efforts of the Ontario Government, it is undoubtedly doing some good; but the most good it has accomplished is by receiving as students the sons of farmers of the Province, and educating them in the different means of utilising the land to the best advantage. The member for Grey said that farmers were beginning to appreciate even the small quantity of seed sent out each year: I obtained five small bags, each weighing about five pounds, and I suppose the other members received a similar quantity, the whole cost of which would be about $100. That is about all we have got from the farm so far. I observe by a return presented to the House that the Government have engaged a very expensive director to whom they will pay $4,000 a year. When this amount is paid and we have provided all the attendants and servants necessary, the payments will reach a large sum. However, if it is going to accomplish anything I am glad of it, but I must express my doubts as to whether the farmers are going to be benefited by the operation. If the Government would take a reasonable amount of the money which they extract from their pockets by increased duty on iron, and distribute it in the shape of a bounty on the shipments of grain and cattle, it would be better, for there is no portion of the population who are suffering more from the operation of the present protective policy, whose means have been more reduced and who are personally and collectively so much pauperised, as are the farmers under the operations of the National Policy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. All rot.

Mr. McMULLEN. The increase in the iron duties is a still further burthen to the farmers. Hon. gentlemen opposite do not like reference to this matter, but the farmers are beginning to awaken to the fact; they are beginning to look into the matter themselves.

Some hon. MEMBERS. They showed it at the last election.

Mr. McMULLEN. Yes, they did. In my own constituency they realised that there was a considerable amount of humbug in the National Policy. They know that the Government take $1 out of their pockets and return five cents.

Some hon. MEMBERS. In what way?

Mr. McMULLEN. By the imposition of increased duties on everything the farmers purchase.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would suggest that it is hardly fair when we are on an estimate to provide for an experimental farm, for the hon. gentleman to propose to enter into the questions of the tariff and National Policy, I think we should keep to the question, otherwise we shall have to spend all summer here.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are discussing a very important subject. The hon. Minister when he was anxious to get through his tariff resolutions asked us to defer the discussion on some important questions, such as these I am now considering, and we agreed to do so, and he now wishes us to postpone the discussion of this question. It is a privilege which we have a right to exercise.

Mr. HESSON. If every member exercises that privilege we shall never get through.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think this is an important question, and that it is the right time and place to discuss it. I am quite willing to give my vote towards the establishment of an experimental farm and to assist hon. gentlemen opposite in doing anything for the best interests of the farm. I have expressed the opinion that no one in the community deserve more consideration than the farmer, and it is highly desirable that something should be done to help him out of his impoverished condition, for farmers were never in a more impoverished condition than they are to-day, and this is largely due to the operation of the National Policy. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will proceed carefully with the erection of buildings and will show more economy than he did with respect to the purchase of land, the price of which was altogether in excess of the actual value. I observe the hon. gentleman first purchased 110 acres, and afterwards surrounding land sufficient to make up 460 acres. I have no doubt that by the time the buildings are up and the whole thing in running order, the cost will be as much as the institution in Ontario, $400,000.

Mr. CARLING. I guarantee that it will not cost half that amount.

Mr. McMULLEN. Although if it is going to benefit the farmer's interest, I should be glad if it cost half a million.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. If, however, you were to take the money and distribute it among the farmers, it would be more advantageous than to sink it in an experimental farm here. If we were to subsidise the different associations by offering prizes and by importing animals and improving stock, much more would be accomplished. We have not spent much in the interest of the farming community, and I am glad to see that such an expenditure has been commenced. I notice the amounts which other countries have been spending on agriculture, and instead of a paltry $30,000, which this Government spent last year—and it was the first sum given to the farmers of this country since the introduction of the National Policy—France spent in 1885, upon agriculture, $20,000,000; Brazil, in 1885, $12,000,000; Russia, $11,000,000; Austria, $5,500,000, and Japan, $1,000,000. Now, I hope that this step on the part of this Government will be an introduction in the direction of aiding the farming community, for they want aid more than any other class. I have no doubt that hon. gentlemen will hear from some of the farmers in this House, who have had some experience in the matter of the value of lands, and I have no doubt they will be able to put my hon. friend from the North-West (Mr. Daly) right with regard to the increased value of farm property. I am glad to notice that hon. gentlemen are disposed to do a little for the farming community, but I am sorry to say that, spent in the way in which it is to be spent, it will be very largely lost.

Mr. McCULLA. I would not have addressed the House on this occasion were it not from the fact that I represent a constituency adjoining that of the hon. gentleman who last spoke. I must contradict here distinctly the statement he made, and say that, so far as lands in his county and in the county of Peel are concerned, they were never worth more than they are to-day. I can only account for the statements he has made on several occasions, trying to depreciate the value of farms in his neighborhood—as he and his friends have always done in the country—by supposing that he must be speculating in some land property, and that he hopes to be able to attain something by making these statements. For some years past some of the hon. gentlemen on the other side seem to take charge of the farmers; they pose as the caretakers and representatives of the farming community. I tell them that the farmers are an intelligent people and quite capable of judging for themselves, in such matters as these affecting their own interests. I have confidence in the Government and I have confidence in this experimental farm, particularly as it is being established and will be managed by a gentleman who was in charge of the Department of Agriculture in Ontario when the Ontario Agriculture College and farm were established. I hope hon. gentlemen opposite are coming to the conclusion that the farmers of Canada are intelligent men, that they cannot be imposed on by clap-trap, and that they are thoroughly in accord with the Government, as far as the National Policy is concerned. That question was the issue in my own county during the last election, no side issues were taken up, the election was fought on the National Policy and the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway; and instead of my opponent, who had had the honor of representing the county in this House, being returned, the farmers came forward and voted in support of the present Administration, on account of the policy which they had been promoting since their accession to office.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). I desire to say a few words on this question, and I would say, in the first place, that I think it would be much better that the different Provincial Governments should take the matter in hand, than that it should be left to be dealt with by the Government here. I claim to be pretty well acquainted with the working of the college at Guelph. They have recently appointed an advisory board, of which I have the honor to be a member, and I say that, so far as experiments are concerned, they may be tried and prove successful upon some soils while they would be utterly worthless upon a farm with a different soil. I think the Minister stated that the Department had written to some person in the North-West, with respect to the best way to cultivate the land and get it in proper order for crops, but every practical farmer knows that if you have a heavy clay soil you must plough the land at one season, while, if you have a light sandy soil, you have to plough it at another season, so that it would be impossible, from these experiments, to acquire information which the farmers could follow all the time. The information which the farmers want is that which can only be obtained at a thoroughly practical school, such as that which we have in the Province of Ontario. The work in this direction is going to be of more benefit to the farmers of the Dominion of Canada than any other experiments that can be made. For instance, there are a large number of students who go out annually and they establish what they call experimental unions.

Mr. CARLING. How many go out annually?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The average, I believe, for the last three or four years, has been seventy in attendance, and, as they generally attend for two seasons, that would represent about thirty or forty going out annually.

Mr. CARLING. Are they farmers' sons?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). There are more farmers' sons there to-day than there have ever been since the institution commenced. It shows that it is growing in favor with the farmers and that it is one of the best schools we can possibly have for educating the young farmers of our country. Now, there is a certain class of experiments which many say could be carried on, and that is experiments in analysing the soil. I have been in communication with some of the best chemists in the Province of Ontario, and, while they say that it is perfectly possible to analyse soils thoroughly, and tell the various elements that enter into them, yet they cannot tell whether they are suitable to be taken up as plant food, and therefore you cannot tell what artificial manures should be applied. With respect to the valuation of farms, I have been engaged for some time valuing farms in the Province of Ontario, and to say that $130 an acre for a farm without fences or buildings is only an ordinary price is something that I cannot understand. I have been over one of the best counties in Ontario, the county of Perth, of which the city of Stratford is the centre, and there is only one farm in that county, so far as I could ascertain, that ever sold at a value of $10,000, and to-day it could not be sold for more than $8,000 or $8,500. Now, with respect to the value of land in Ontario, I say that that value is going down.

Mr. CARLING. Is the hon. gentleman not aware that the experimental farm at Guelph cost about $125 an acre fifteen years ago?

Mr. McMULLEN. That was buildings and all.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). There were upon it the buildings necessary to keep the cattle in, up to last year, when they were accidentally destroyed by fire. They were purchased from Mr. Stone, one of the best breeders in Ontario, and he kept some of the best stock in those buildings that has been raised in the Province.

Mr. CARLING. How does the hon. gentleman account for the large expenditure every year for farm buildings?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). It is impossible for the hon. gentleman, or any other individual, to put me off the track. We find that the English education given to the young men at the Guelph college is of the very best kind, and for this reason, that in Ontario one of the great evils we have to contend with, when we send young men off the farms and give them a good education, is that they leave the farm and never return. In that respect the college at Guelph is a great improvement on other educational institutions for farmers' sons. I saw a letter within the last few months, written by a young man to his father, in which he stated that he had been in one of our high schools, but that the education he was receiving at Guelph model farm was far superior to anything he experienced there; that it was not only completing his education but was giving him a thorough training with respect to both the feeding and breeding of animals, and that is something which the farmers need to-day more than experimental stations. Then, when they go out from the farm to the different parts of the country, they meet annually at their experimental unions, they experiment on soils and grains—these grains being sent out to different localities in the Province—they experiment on the various kinds of artificial manures, and at those gatherings they give the results of their experience. That I look upon as something which, in the future, will be of far greater benefit to the farmers than any institution situated in any locality can be, because you get from a number of young men who have been specially trained for that purpose, the kind of information which will lift the farmer out of the mire where he has been for so long a time—information with respect to the true system of cultivating the soil, as well as the feeding and breeding of animals, and that is what we require more than anything else. Now, with respect to the value of land in Ontario, I have heard a great deal from hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the Bureau of Statistics of that Province, and we have been told that those reports do not show that land in that Province is deteriorating in value. Now, I want every hon. gentleman to understand that in Ontario there is a large quantity of wild land annually being brought under cultivation. There is a very large amount of land that was left as waste land when the farms were cleared that is now being taken up rapidly, so that with the improvement going on in the country, there must be a very bad state of things if land is not increasing in value. I hold in my hand the report of Mr. Blue, who conducts the Bureau of Statistics of Ontario. It gives a statement of the values of farm property from 1882 to 1885, and it shows that the total value of land in 1882 was $632,342,500, and that in 1885 it had fallen to $26,422,024, a reduction of $5,920,000, very close upon $6,000,000. I was very much surprised to find that the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) got up in the House the other day and stated that the land was valued at $654,000,000 in 1883, and at $625,000,000 in 1884, and, according to the Hansard, he argued that the land had increased in value $30,000,000 in that one year. He must believe in the Irishman's system—take one from two and it leaves three—to show that there was an increase. Now, I ask what makes the value of the land fall in any country? It is the value of the produce of the land that gives value to the land, and just so soon as the value of the produce falls, just so soon the value of the land falls. What does the report of the same Bureau of Statistics show with respect to the value of the crops? In 1882 the total value of the grain crops, that is, fall wheat, spring wheat, barley, oats, rye and peas, in the Province of Ontario, amounted to $89,682,065; in 1884 the value had fallen to $67,700,000, a fall of over $20,000,000, and in 1885 the value of these crops had still further fallen to $60,212,000, or something like $29,000,000 since 1882. We have not yet got the report of the Bureau of Statistics for 1886, but I am perfectly positive that when we do get it, the value of the crops will be found to be as low as $60,000,000 or even $59,000,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite cannot set aside these facts, because the valuation of the land has come from their own friends. A circular is sent to every farmer in the Province, and he is allowed to put his own value upon the land, the buildings, the stock and implements, and as hon. gentlemen have a majority in this House, we may suppose that they have a majority in the country, and it is from the returns sent in by their supporters that this report to the Bureau of Statistics is made up. I found, in going over the county of Perth, where I went to make a valuation of land, the farmers there, both Reformers and Conservatives, stated that the land had been reduced in value from 15 to 20 per cent., and in many instances more than that. Is it to be wondered at, when we find the crops reduced in value to such an extent? This reminds me of a statement made by the hon. First Minister before the National Policy was imposed. It was that if we continued without a National Policy we would soon have Canada become a vast pasture for the cows to be sent to the English market. I can tell the hon. gentleman that to-day his prediction is rapidly being fulfilled under the National Policy. I can take him to districts where, in 1878, the farmers were raising grain, but where they are now turning to cattle raising; and if the same National Policy goes on much longer the farmer will soon stop the growing of grain altogether. There is, perhaps, just one way to benefit the farmers, and it is this: The Government have been in the habit of subsidising lines of steamships on the Pacific Ocean and elsewhere; but if they would subsidise a line of steamships to go to Liverpool and Glasgow and London, and compel them to carry cattle to the English market at a low rate, that would assist us more than anything they have done. There is no class that has suffered so much from the National Policy as the farmers of Ontario. We have not been benefited by it in anything we have had to sell, and we have been obliged to pay an increased price for everything we purchase. We have been told that we get goods under it cheaper than we did before. I say that they are not proportionately as cheap as they would have been if we had not had the National Policy. I went into a store in Glasgow last summer, and left my order for this suit of clothes on my back. A merchant in Canada told me that I could not get it here for less than $23, and I got it there for $16.50. A merchant told me that he pays on a lot of dry goods 28 per cent., and that before it reaches the consumer it amounts to 33 per cent. That is the benefit the farmers derive from the National Policy on the goods they have to purchase.

Mr. SPROULE. I think the hon. gentleman who has just sat down needs to reconcile his argument with that of the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) who accounts for the fact that agricultural land is higher in value to-day than it was a few years ago by saying that the assessors have been putting up the price of lands year after year to make the rate on the dollar lower; but the hon. gentleman who has just sat down says it is not higher, but a great deal lower. One cannot but be struck with the ingenuity of the hon. gentleman in his comparison of the value of agricultural products between 1885 and 1882. He forgets to tell the House that in 1882 we had one of the best crops in Ontario we had for many years, and, therefore, it was natural to expect that the value of cereals would be very high in that year. But during the last four years we have had very poor crops. He forgets to tell the House that the farmers of the country have turned their attention from the raising of grain to raising dairy products and animals, and in that way have been making up for the large falling off in the raising of grains. With regard to the Agricultural College at Guelph, most people will admit that at present it is doing a great and good work; but we cannot overlook the fact that for several years after that institution was established, a large amount of money was expended without very much return; and during those years it was natural to expect that the farmers would grumble. They did complain. After taking advice from their friends in the country, they established an advisory board, they changed their tactics, and they are doing good work to-day for which the agriculturists of Ontario feel very thankful; but, after all, they are doing the work on one line, and the experimental farm here is doing it on another line. They are turning their attention to analysis of the soil, inspection of qualities and quantities of food best suited to feeding cattle to put them in the best condition for foreign markets. The hon.

gentleman who has just sat down, refers to the number of scholars who are there and to the importance of such an institution. I believe each county in Ontario has the privilege of sending annually two pupils to that college. That is not much for each county when we consider the amount of money we pay, but, I can only say that, so far as our experience shows, up to the present, most of the scholars who have been turned out of that college, instead of staying at home and turning their attention to agricultural pursuits, have gone abroad and turned their attention to various other lines. I could not help being struck by the pessimistic view taken by the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) of the benefit which accrues to the farmers from the establishment of this experimental farm. It has, he says, distributed two and a half pounds of grain each to so many farmers, and the aggregate distribution to the few hundred people would be equal to a sum of one hundred dollars, and that is all the return we have for our expenditure on the experimental farm. Would any gentleman, who knows anything about farming, say this is the only return the farmer receives. It is less than childish to make such a statement. It is not the intrinsic value of the number of pounds of grain which is distributed which we must look at, but the value of the information the farmer receives by virtue of the experiments which, if he had to make them himself, would have to be made in a series of processes for years. Let me give an illustration. The president of the Agricultural Society of East Grey only last year applied to some dealers in Toronto for some seed grain; he sowed the grain, barley, alongside other grain he had been using for years, and what was the result? In the one field in which he had sowed the best samples of his own grain he got about 15 bushels per acre, while in the other field, in which he had sowed the grain he received from Toronto, he realised about 32 bushels to the acre, and he obtained for that grain about five cents a bushel more than he did for the other.

Mr. MULOCK. Where did that come from?

Mr. SPROULE. I do not know in what climate it was grown, but I knew it came from Toronto, and was grown in the township of Artemesia. The result was that man had double the money for his grain that he received formerly. What is proposed to be done by the experimental farm? It is proposed to examine the different seeds of other countries, to test their productiveness, and give the results at as early a date as possible, so that our farmers may be able to turn the information to account. We have men going round the country to-day selling seeds not fit to be put in the soil, because they have no potency, and after they have been tested, the farmer finds he has lost a year, and that his land besides has yielded him no return, one half of the grain not having sprouted. In the experimental farm, however, the seeds may be tested before being put in the soil, and the farmer will know their value without spending time and money in investigating for himself. When we consider these things, we cannot help recognising the great importance of the agricultural institutions now being established. The people in my part of the country are remarkably well pleased. It is a want they have felt for years, and which the Government of Ontario has done nothing to supply; but the Dominion Government have taken up the matter and are prepared to carry out this important work. I need say but little as to the evidence adduced of the relative value of land in the Province of Ontario at this or any other period. The depreciation in the value of land in some parts of the country is due to the facts that we have acquired so much land in Manitoba and the North-West, where agricultural pursuits can be carried on with less trouble than here, and the exodus to that country has reduced the demand for land in some parts of Ontario. But, notwithstanding all that, the experience in our part of the country is that land is maintaining its value; and if the hon. member for North Wellington cannot dispose of those farms of his for as much money as he could some years ago, it is in all probability due to the inferior cultivation of the land, and to the fact that they have fallen into disuse. It is certainly not due to a reduction in the intrinsic value of the land, because I believe land is going up all the time and is destined to go up all over the Province of Ontario. Referring to the statistics of Mr. Blue, I cannot say anything with reference to what the hon. gentleman said about the reduced value of cereals from year to year, except that we have had a succession of bad crops, so that the crops of the past few years give no indication of the amount of grain that can be raised in Ontario. In addition to that, we must not forget that a large number of people who raised grain a few years ago, are turning their attention to the manufacture of cheese and butter. This will enable us to understand the great disproportion between the amount of grain raised to-day and that raised a few years ago. I believe the experimental farm is destined to do a good work. Every dollar spent in that interest is not returning, as the member for Wellington says, dollar for dollar to the farmer of Ontario, but is going to give us value more than a hundred fold, and the good effects of the expenditure will be felt for a long time to come.

Mr. FISHER. I am rather glad to find the hon. member for Huron endorse my remarks, the more so as he is well known as a gentleman of valuable experience and as one of the most practical and best farmers in Ontario. He believes with me that experiments by farmers, through a central station, would be much more valuable than those made in an experimental station in each locality. I would like some little explanation as to how the money is to be laid out. I understood the Minister to say he expected this central station will cost about $160,000. I understood that of this estimate of $90,000, a portion is to be laid out on a central station and a portion on a branch station. Would the hon. the Minister say what portion he intends to spend in each of these various items, and would he give us some information in regard to the annual expenditure on these several stations?

Mr. SEMPLE. I wish this experimental farm every success. It cost a great deal of money, $130 an acre; and I should suppose, from viewing the farm, if suitable buildings should be put up and drainage, it would cost $40 an acre more. That would be $170 an acre. However, the sale has been accomplished, and the land is bought, and I hope it will have success. The main thing which I understand we may expect from it is the seed brought from different parts of the country and tested. There is no doubt that seeds of different kinds fail, and have not the same results as when first sown. Therefore, there is every reason to make the changes of seed as frequent as possible, and to encourage the use of different kinds. When wheat is sown for a length of time, it is desirable that a change should be made. I think, therefore, that from the change of seed we may expect more gain to the country than from anything else in connection with the farm. Though a large amount is to be expended on it, it will be good if it is for the benefit of the farmers, because there is more attention paid to every other class in the community than to the farmers. We have heard a good deal as to the value of farm property. In the locality in which I live the land has depreciated in value from 15 to 25 per cent. The fact is, you can scarcely get anyone to buy a farm. A number want to sell their farms, but they cannot, because so little has been made at farming for the last number of years. It must be remembered that the assessors, when they go round the country, do not as a rule change the figures very much, but put down the same price from year to year. As it is a well known fact over the country that in a county or in a township, if the property is equally assessed, it matters little whether the valuation is high or low, the result is that the decrease in the value is not as perceptible as it otherwise would be. However, we find there is a decrease, as shown from the statistics which have been quoted by the hon. member for Huron. The farmers are the least protected class of any. They have to protect themselves. They have to compete with every nation in the world in regard to the produce which they have to sell, and that is not the case with any other industry. If the manufacturers do not prosper, they come to the Government and get some law passed to shut out anything which comes into competition with their products, and the farmers have to pay the enhanced price of what is manufactured.

Mr. MARA. I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether it is intended to establish the farm in British Columbia upon the island or upon the mainland; and, if upon the mainland, whether it is to be established east or west of the Cascade Range of mountains. If he has not the information now, I hope he will obtain it in time to commence operations this year.

Mr. CARLING. No place has yet been selected in British Columbia as the site for the experimental farm, but I hope that it will be selected soon after the Session.

Mr. MARA. In time to commence operations this year?

Mr. CARLING. I hope so.

Mr. FISHER. I would like to know from the Minister what proportion of this $90,000 it is intended to lay out upon the central station, and what proportion on the other stations; and I should also like to have some idea of what annual expenditure the establishment of these stations is expected to entail.

Mr. CARLING. It is expected that $60,000 of this item will be required for improvements, and that $30,000 will go towards the expenses.

Mr. FISHER. On the central station?

Mr. CARLING. No, on all the stations. We expect the annual expenditure will be between $30,000 and $40,000. When the stations are all established and in full force, the annual expenditure estimated is about $35,000.

Mr. FISHER. I am very glad to hear those figures given, but I confess that I do not expect that the Minister will keep within these bounds. I am glad to hear that he is so confident, and that he expects to establish this central station for $200,000.

Mr. CARLING. $160,000.

Mr. FISHER. I thought he said it would take about half what the Ontario farm cost, which, I think, was about $400,000.

Mr. CARLING. I said less than half. It will be about $160,000.

Mr. FISHER. While I should be glad to see the expenditure kept within the bounds mentioned, I greatly fear, judging from the commencement which has been made, that they will not be so kept; and if the five stations—the central station and the four branch stations—are going to be carried on at an expenditure of $35,000 a year, I think the commencement of the establishment here is very much out of proportion. I understood that the salaries here already would amount to the proportion of that $35,000 which could be given to the central establishment; and we understood that the salaries of the higher officials will be only a portion of those to be paid on all the experimental farms. They will require a great deal of labor, and we generally find that in Government works the labor is laid out to great disadvantage, and is very expensively done. This year, I have seen already that the labor has been so laid out,

Mr. SEMPLE.

I suppose because it was commenced so late in the season, and because it was attempted to do so much in a short time. A great deal of the work ought to have been done last fall.

Mr. CARLING. We had not the land then.

Mr. FISHER. Then we could wait till next fall, instead of doing it to-day, when work is very expensive and it is almost impossible to do it satisfactorily. It would be far better to leave it over till next fall, when it could be done more cheaply and more satisfactorily in regard to the future. If this kind of work is to be carried on in the four branch stations, which the Minister has, much to my regret, determined to carry through, I fear very much that the estimate he has given of the annual expenditure and the future expenditures in regard to these farms will be very much exceeded.

Mr. WATSON. I desire to ask the Minister what quantity of land he expects to secure for the farm in Manitoba; what proportion he expects to break up and bring into cultivation this year, and what amount of money he intends to expend in Manitoba during the coming season?

Mr. CARLING. We expect to secure a section or less—at all events, not more than a section. We will take steps in regard to it immediately after the House rises.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Government has no land left there.

Mr. CARLING. They may have land enough on which to establish the farm.

Mr. GIGAULT. Until now the bulletins published for making known the operations of that institution have been translated into French a long time after they were published in English. As they contain very useful information I hope the Minister of Agriculture will see that they are published at the same time in both languages.

Mr. FISHER. What means are being taken to distribute these bulletins through the country?

Mr. CARLING. It is intended that the members of the House shall be asked to give the names of as many of the leading agriculturists in their constituency as possible, and bulletins will be posted to them regularly.

Contribution of Canada towards the Imperial Jubilee of the Queen's reign, namely, the Imperial Institute.....$97,333 33

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a considerable sum of money, and I could wish that our finances were in a state which would allow of our granting it with less inconvenience than I fear can be the case. I want to know precisely what this Imperial Institute is intended to effect; what are the contributions which are going to be made to it by the United Kingdom, the colonies and India respectively; also, what proportionate sums are being contributed by the Imperial authorities, and by the several colonies and India?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not aware of any sum having been appropriated by Her Majesty's Government as yet. That question was an open question. Very considerable sums are being given by various noblemen and private gentlemen, and the large guilds in London, as a contribution to this institute. I explained at some length, on introducing the Budget, the general scope of this organisation. It was the original intention of His Royal Highness, the Prince of Wales, who moved primarily in it, that it should be confined to the colonies and India. It was subsequently claimed by the London Chamber of Commerce and the commercial classes, that in the Jubilee memorial of Her Majesty's reign in London, the United Kingdom should be represented as well as the colonies and India, and a committee was appointed by His Royal Highness, composed of the leading public men representing all the great parties in England, to devise a scheme for the purpose of carrying out the object intended, and the result of that was embodied in a memorandum, a copy of which I think I can lay on the Table of the House, so as to furnish information as to the general design. It is intended to utilise the grounds at South Kensington, the site of the exhibition, as they practically belong to the Crown, for the purpose of having an Imperial Institute. A large and imposing building will be provided, one-half of which is intended to be appropriated to the colonies and India, and the other half, or about that portion, to the United Kingdom. It is intended that the representation of the various natural products, of manufactures, and the various industries in operation in the United Kingdom, India and all the colonies, shall find place in this building, so that parties wishing for information with reference to any industry in the United Kingdom, will be able to find in this Imperial Institute all the information he desires. It is expected to furnish, in fact, illustrations of all the minerals and various products, and information is also to be distributed in reference to all portions of Her Majesty's dominions.

Mr. JONES. How is the expense of keeping it up to be met?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is expected that there will be a sufficient endowment to provide, not only for the erection of the building but for its maintenance. I may say that I have stated in the clearest and most distinct manner to His Royal Highness, and to the gentlemen who have been engaged in perfecting this scheme, that while the Government of Canada would ask Parliament for the appropriation of £20,000 sterling, that sum was intended to cover the entire contribution of Canada, both toward the original foundation of the institute, and toward the expense of its maintenance.

Mr. JONES. What is the total cost likely to be?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That matter is not yet determined, because, of course, it would depend upon the amount of money that could be raised. The site will practically cost nothing, so that all the money that is contributed will be appropriated to the building and the organisation of the institute. The amount appropriated by the various Australasian colonies was not determined when I left England, and I am not able to say what it is, but I am inclined to think it will be very considerable. I think all the Australasian colonies have agreed to co-operate and to contribute largely to this undertaking.

Mr. JONES. Will the expenditure be under the direction or control, or made with the concurrence, of the present or future High Commissioner?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, so far as Canada is concerned; and one of the conclusions adopted by the committee was that each section should be under the general supervision and direction of the official representative of that country in London.

Mr. McNEILL. I think that an authoritative statement has been made within the last day or two that the Australian colonies are contributing £100,000.

Mr. DALY. I see in a despatch to the Toronto World of yesterday the following:—

"It is now admitted by the strongest opponents of the project that the Imperial Institute has at last satisfactorily turned the corner, and that all fear of a collapse of the scheme has been removed. The United Kingdom alone has subscribed £190,000, Canada promises £20,000, and Australia £100,000. £310,000 are thus already guaranteed, and by 4th July, the amount will reach fully £400,000."

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to enter my protest against this item. It is an expenditure that we ought not to have entered upon. When we look at the depressed condition of our agricultural, lumbering and fishing population, particularly in the Maritime Provinces, it is evident that we should not have entered upon this enterprise. I suppose it has gone so far that it is useless to protest against it, and, if we had not become involved in the engagement, I think it would have been the duty of the House to have rejected this vote.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What amount is proposed to be raised?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. All the money that can be obtained.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The managers are levying contributions all over England, and, according to Mr. Labouchere in Truth, they are taxing everybody very heavily.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They want to get all the money they can.

Mr. MALLORY. In giving this particular sum at this particular time—although I do not believe the Minister of Finance thinks so—I believe we are entering on this scheme unwisely, and that nearly every year subsequently, Canada will be asked to contribute a certain sum towards the maintenance of the institution. If there were definite plans laid down as to the cost of maintenance and the proportion to be borne by the colonies, then my objection to this vote would not be so strong as it is. But I agree with the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that, on entering on a scheme of this kind, we are entering on an expenditure the end of which we cannot see. In our present condition of depressed finances we should be careful in regard to the expenditure of public money outside of our own country. We can expend our finances to greater advantage in our Dominion, and it will be for the interest of the people here that they should be so expended, rather than we should contribute a large sum, which I believe will be followed by further sums in years to come, to an institution in England.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Can the Minister of Finance state what will be the probable annual charge? Has there been any estimate made?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have already stated that I have taken every means of advising the parties engaged in this undertaking that the contribution of Canada was a contribution once for all, and that we did not hold ourselves liable, nor did we intend to incur any responsibility whatever. In fact, I communicated to His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and the committee, a cable I received from the First Minister, to the effect that Canada limited its responsibility in regard to the whole undertaking entirely to this contribution. At the same time I do not hesitate to say that I have no doubt some annual charge will be incurred not only by the Federal Government, but by all the Local Governments, in this way: The Ontario Government placed their entire educational exhibit at my disposal for the Imperial Institute of the Colonies and India, when I appealed to all the Provincial Governments, as well as to the Government of the Dominion, to give their exhibits for the purpose of forming a nucleus for this institute. The response was uniform, and was given in a most generous spirit. I say that the Government of Ontario placed their entire educational exhibit, which was of great value and had proved of the utmost interest in England, at my disposal. It was subsequently returned, because when it was decided to vary the plan, as originally proposed by His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, and to erect the building before any organisation was undertaken, I thought it better that all the exhibits should be returned, so that when, at the end of three years, the building has been completed, a much better exhibit may be made. No doubt all the Provincial Governments will be glad to take advantage of the opportunity to make a contribution, so that the exhibits of the Provinces shall find a place in this Imperial Institute. Accordingly, the Government of Canada, from year to year, will, I have no doubt, have to expend a small amount in sending forward the best representations of the natural products of the country, and for the purpose of keeping in London an advertisement, the best advertisement we can possibly have, of this country and its resources. And so with private manufacturers, who will, I am sure, take advantage of the opportunity to send there illustrations of the various industries in which they are engaged. In that way, while it has been distinctly announced that the Government of Canada does not hold itself responsible, does not intend to contribute any amount whatever to the cost of annual maintenance of this Imperial Institute, I have no doubt certain expenses will be incurred, such as the Government may think wise and such as Parliament may appropriate, to keep before the eyes of the world (because there is no place in which this can be done so thoroughly as in London) the resources of our country, and I believe this expenditure instead of being one not warranted under the circumstances, and not only this expenditure, but any small annual expenditure that will follow, will be justified by the benefit it will confer on the country.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Do I understand that Canada will have a permanent place in that institute?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Will it be under the charge and under the expense of Canada?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is our contribution to that, and it is understood that of the buildings one-half at least will be set apart for the representation of the products of the United Kingdom, and one-half, equally favorably situated, will be set apart for the Colonies and India, and that will be divided so as to present the resources and illustrations of such colony by itself. It will be under the general organisation. It will be at the cost of the general organisation, and there will be no charge falling upon the country in relation to it except such as we may voluntarily assume. But the general direction and management of each court representing each colony is to be under the control of the official representative of the colony, where they have one.

Mr. JONES. Could it not be utilised for the dissemination of information with regard to emigration?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is one of the leading objects.

Immigration $229,525

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not so much disposed to criticise individual items here as to raise the question for the consideration of the committee whether the whole of the expenditure that we are incurring for the purpose of immigration is not a huge mistake. We have, unfortunately under our hand, in the report of the Department of Agriculture for the last five years, the most conclusive evidence which, I suppose, it is possible to imagine, that the statements made to us by that Department have been wholly fallacious and misleading. I need not go through in detail the statements made as to the number of immigrants and colonists settled in Manitoba in 1881-2-3-4-5, but the result is, that, whereas on the authority of the report made by that Department the Ministers of the Crown have been stating that the population of Manitoba and the North-West Territories have been increased by 155,000, it is perfectly clear from the official census made by the same gentlemen that either those people never went there at all, that they were not settlers in the proper sense of the term, or, which is even worse, that they did go there, and that having gone there, having attempted to settle in Manitoba, out of those 155,000 scarcely more than 40,000 had remained; and the balance of 110,000 or 115,000 either returned to Canada or went to the United States or elsewhere, and they became, as I stated a few nights ago, to all intents and purposes, anti-immigration agents—men who, having gone to the country under a mistake, or having been brought there under false representations, as the case may be, have gone away soured, discontented, and disappointed, and are positively doing us a great injury instead of doing us good. Now, as to this there can be no possible doubt. We have on the one side the reports of the Department, with very specific statements as to the number of settlers, and we have on the other the official census showing that these reports are utterly misleading. It will be remembered that, on many occasions, gentlemen on this side have stated their convictions that these reports were not to be relied upon, and it is clear that in the statements we made we never fully measured the extent of the injury that had been done, or the loss of settlers which had occurred there. I always supposed that there were at least 110,000 or 120,000 white settlers in Manitoba, and a corresponding number in the North-West Territories. Now, we find there are barely 95,000 white settlers in Manitoba and 23,000 in the North-West Territories. But I find besides that, the statement which is made in the same reports that nearly one half million of settlers have settled in the various Provinces of the Dominion (477,000 is, I think, the exact number as given by the returns of the Department during those four or five years). Now, it is utterly impossible that that can represent the true settlement in this country. That number of settlers may possibly have come here. I am not disposed at this moment to say whether they came or not; I believe they did come here; but it is perfectly clear that if that number of people came to Canada the vast bulk of them were, in the strictest sense, birds of passage; that they came here only to go away to other countries. In practice what we are doing is this: We are unable, as we know to our cost, to retain the natural increase of our population in Canada, yet we are year by year—I am glad to see the decrease in the vote, but still it remains nearly a quarter of a million—spending a large amount of the people's money in bringing persons to this country, who either do not stay here or become competitors with our own people and drive them out of the country. Now, I say it is doubly and trebly wrong; I say it is a fraud on the native Canadians and a fraud on the taxpayers in the country, to bring people here who, if they remain in Canada, must remain here largely, if not altogether, by driving out our own people. Therefore, I say it would be better that we should put an end to this expenditure altogether, or reduce it, at any rate, to the proportion of information offices in London, and a few other points where it may possibly be of importance for us to have some representatives of the Dominion to whom persons can apply for information. But, as a matter of policy, I say that, under the existing condition of things, this appears to me to be money which is worse than wasted. I say that our whole immigration policy for at least the last six years is, in the face of our own census returns, a gross and manifest failure, and that perseverance in it is doing a great injury to a valuable class of people in this country; and I would recommend the committee—though this, perhaps, is not the time at which it is desirable to take a vote—to greatly reduce this item.

Mr. DALY. As one of the representatives of Manitoba, I must take exception to the remarks of the hon. gentleman opposite with reference to the condition of that country, and as to immigration. He does not take into consideration that a great number of the people who came in there, and who were no doubt counted as immigrants, were employed upon the Canadian Pacific Railway, that they went through to the Rocky Mountains, and either passed out by way of Emerson on their return from the Rocky Mountains, or went to British Columbia. Now, instead of the Government reducing this item, so far as Manitoba and the North-West Territories are concerned, I think the item should be increased. If that country is to increase in population, and if the dreams of which we have heard so much are to be realised, it must be by the increase of immigrants, and, as I stated the other day, we must consider that no matter what sums of money have been expended upon immigration, yet as far as Dakota and Minnesota and the western States of America are concerned, they have been advertised to the world for twenty-five, thirty-five or forty-five years, and that practically it is only since 1881 that immigrants have come into the Province of Manitoba. As I stated before, when you consider all the circumstances which have prevailed in that country, I think the fact that our population has increased 74.5 per cent in five years is a very good showing. But I say that instead of this item being decreased it should be increased, and that the utmost vigor should be used by the Department of Agriculture, by way of distributing literature and appointing agents in the Old Country, and not only on British soil but in foreign countries, to lay before those people the benefits which can be derived by emigrating to the Province of Manitoba. I have no expectation that the desire of hon. gentlemen opposite will be carried out, that the item will be wiped out entirely, but I trust that after their experience this year the Department will see its way clear to increase the item during next year, because if we do not encourage immigration to that country all the money we have sent upon it must go for nothing. As a representative of Manitoba, I would not be doing my duty if I did not enter my protest against the decrease of this item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The House will observe that here are the reports of the Department of Immigration. They state distinctly that in 1881, 22,000 souls were reported to have settled in Manitoba and the North-West; 58,751 in 1882, 42,000 in 1883, 24,000 in 1884, and 7,000 in 1885; 155,000 in all. Now, Sir, we have the census returns to show us that not 40,000 of those immigrants stayed there. It is, therefore, perfectly clear that the 110,000 who were stated over and over again by the Minister to have gone there, either never went there or have gone away. We pointed out repeatedly that a great number of those people were merely transient visitors, or people who were brought in, as the hon. gentleman, perhaps, correctly enough suggests, for a temporary purpose by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and who left the country again. Constantly we were told by hon. gentlemen that we need have no fear for the future of that country, because a quarter of a million of people, or thereabouts, were settled there two or three years ago; and I quite admit that if any reliance at all could have been placed on the reports of their own Department of Immigration, they were justified in making that statement. The hon. gentleman who spoke last is not aware, I presume, that the Department professes not only to give the numbers of those who went in, but the numbers of those who left, and that the figures I quoted are the residuum—those who were said to have remained in the country; so that so far as his argument goes, it would not apply to the statements made by that Department. The Department stands convicted by the census returns of a gross error—so gross as to destroy all confidence for many years to come in any reports that Department may make. I was not referring most of all to Manitoba, although the settlement there is a very important question, no doubt. I was referring most of all to the alleged fact, that nearly 500,000 immigrants, according to the report of the Department, have settled in this Dominion. Now, I contend that not merely the evidence we have from Manitoba, but all that we have been able to gather from the other Provinces, goes to show either that these people never came here at all, and that the Department was wholly deceived, or that they were mere birds of passage who came to Canada, and after spending a few weeks or a few months in the country went elsewhere, presumably to the United States. Now, Sir, there can be no greater injury done to this country—and that is the point I want specially to call the attention of the committee to—than under any pretence or pretext whatever to bring immigrants to this country under the idea that they are going to settle here and become prosperous inhabitants of the country, and then have them leave the country disappointed, to give unfavorable and very likely unfair accounts of the country to their friends and relatives scattered all over the world. I happen to know that very great evil has been done to legitimate immigration in this country from reports sent out by persons who were brought here under false pretenses—because it amounted to that—by inducements indiscreetly held out to them by persons who were employed either in the regular or irregular service of the Department of Immigration. I say it is a crying evil; and I say more, that in the older Provinces the complaints made by the labor unions and other bodies of that kind against the policy of the Government in bringing immigrants here to compete with those men and to take the bread out of their mouths, are very well justified. Here we are protecting the rich employer, and are at the same time bringing out at the public cost men to compete with the employed—to cut down their wages, and to diminish the scanty returns they receive for their labor. I say that is entirely wrong. As regards Manitoba it is very doubtful, indeed, to me whether any of those assisted immigrants are likely to make good settlers there. As I understand the case, you cannot possibly afford to bring men to Manitoba unless they possess some amount of capital to enable them to become prosperous settlers there. It is a great mistake, I should say, to encourage anything approaching pauper immigration to that country in its present condition. They are not the people who will be of any great benefit to Manitoba; and as a matter of fact we have the evidence of hon. gentlemen's own returns that if any such are brought there they most assuredly do not stay.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think we should seriously consider the expenditure of this large amount of money for immigration purposes. In past years, when the question of immigration was before the House, hon. gentlemen opposite, from time to time, presented statements to show that the cost per capita of immigrants brought into this country was something like $3.86 or $4 a head, which they represented was much less than the cost under the previous Government. Now, when we take the actual number of settlers in Manitoba, according to the census returns, and divide that number into the actual amount of money we have expended during the last five years, we find that instead of their costing us about $4 a head, they have cost us exactly $50 a head. Now, I say it is time some stop were put to this expenditure. We should cancel every immigration office that is not absolutely necessary. Will any man tell me that an immigration agent in Ottawa is a necessity. I can understand the necessity of something of the kind in Montreal or Quebec, but not in Ottawa, Hamilton, London and similar places. In the city of London alone, we pay altogether something like $20,000; we pay in Canada, $31,861, and I notice that last year the amount expended for contingencies was $13,621. One gentleman expressed the opinion that we should continue this system, in order to increase the population of Manitoba. I am prepared to say that anything that can be done at any reasonable cost to increase the population of the North-West, should be done. That country, which has cost us so large an amount of money already, will be virtually lost to us, unless we can induce actual settlers to go in, and I would willingly consent to any reasonable expenditure to accomplish that end. But we have been spending large amounts of money in the past. Last year, we paid for salaries in Manitoba, $10,015. I find there was paid for contingencies a little over $7,000 altogether. By looking at the different places where we have agencies, we find we pay quite a large amount for rent. In the city of Ottawa, for instance, we pay office rent $240, taxes $62, cleaning and repairing $46, travelling $258. In Toronto we pay for fuel $169, cab hire and rent $1,109, newspapers $36; in all $2,126. The St. John's agency costs us $89 for travelling expenses. In all the different offices I find there is a very large amount of money expended for purposes of that kind. At Emerson we have paid for travelling expenses and contingencies, $694; at Montreal, for rent, $133. The whole system should be cut down and remodelled, and the salaries of agents in Europe cut down. I find we have sent a gentleman as agent to France at an expense of $2,400, with an assistant at $300. I find we have appointed two additional agents at $1,200 each. We know that this question of immigration has been taken up by the trade unions who have given their opinion in strong terms as to the impropriety and injustice of bringing in foreign labor to compete with them. I believe that we should import men who will settle in the country and become agriculturists; but under the system that has been carried out for the last five years, the statistical returns, the returns of population in the North-West, show that we have been positively cheated by the manner in which the money has been used, and that people have been represented as settlers who have not settled in the country at all. When facts such as these confront us, it is time the whole system was remodelled. I do not think there is any item upon which we should take a stronger stand than the enormous expenditure under the head of immigration. It is an injustice to the people to keep immigration agents in such places as Kingston, Hamilton and Ottawa, where immigrants do not arrive at all. Any one who will call on the immigration agent here will see that the work he has to do is a mere nothing. I cannot understand, in fact, what he does.

Mr. WRIGHT. I can assure the hon. gentleman that he is entirely mistaken with regard to the immigration agent at Ottawa. That gentleman is a most active and useful officer; he performs a most important function. I can speak from my own knowledge, for I know he has brought out many immigrants to our city and has induced them to settle, notably in my section of the country. In that section, forty or fifty of them, excellent farmers, were induced to take up land. In the whole Ottawa district generally, that gentleman has performed a most important function; and I think, if the hon. gentleman's arguments do not apply with more force to Kingston than to Ottawa, he is entirely mistaken. I repeat, throughout the whole length and breadth of the Dominion, no more efficient officer will be found than Mr. Wills.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is to be regretted very much that hon. gentlemen opposite take the line in this House that they do. I do not say it is not possible to reduce the expenditure, and we have shown our desire to reduce the vote for immigration by placing it at $50,000 less than last year. But I say a greater injury could not be inflicted upon Canada than to adopt the suggestion made by hon. gentlemen opposite, that this appropriation should be abandoned. I do not mean to say that immigrants will not come to this country, persons not at all adapted to succeed in it, and who will fail, as many do, to realise their extravagant expectations; and who, when they go away, will decry the country. Instead of their coming here being a benefit it is an injury. The moment that special attention is attracted to any portion, as it was to the North-West, every person knows that crowds of people, men who have never succeeded in their lives in any part of the world; men who, owing to their habits of indolence and dissipation and unwillingness to work, cannot succeed in any place, will come here, and because they cannot make fortunes will go away, after loafing around and spending what little means they have in dissipation, and give the country a bad name. We cannot help that, but I would ask what impression any stranger coming into this House and taking a seat in the gallery, would form as to the gentlemen who were sitting on that side. He would suppose they were the inhabitants of a foreign country, and their object was to injure, as far as they possibly could, the best interests of Canada. We have one of the most magnificent countries the sun shines on. From the Island of Prince Edward in the Gulf of St. Lawrence away across the continent to Vancouver Island on the Pacific. The whole world does not possess a country with greater attraction for every man who is willing to work for his living than Canada possesses. Yet to listen to these hon. gentlemen, you would suppose Canada was one of the most miserable, God-forsaken countries on the face of the globe. Talk about property depreciating in Ontario! How could it do otherwise than depreciate? How is it possible to attract capitalists, the farmers of Great Britain, the men who pay £400 to £800 a year rent for a farm, and at the end of the year are poorer men, than they were at the beginning—these men, who are looking abroad to see where they may better their fortune, and there is no place in the known world where they can do better with their capital and their knowledge of agriculture, and benefit their position, than in the Province of Ontario—how is it possible to attract them to this country, when they take up the records of the discussions of this House and find that the men who profess to speak for the farmers of Ontario, are declaring, in the face of the world, that agriculture is a down-trodden interest, that the farmer is ground down by taxation, in Ontario, until he is so impoverished that his land diminishes in value? Does anyone believe that is the mode by which capital and industry are to be attracted to a country, and that is all that is necessary to be attracted to this country in order to make it all that the most ardent patriot can desire? I say we have a country that is capable of furnishing happy and prosperous homes for a hundred millions of people. We have a country capable of furnishing as happy and comfortable homes for a hundred millions of people as any section of the globe can present, but we will never get them so long as gentlemen, whatever object they may have in view, use their talents and their time, instead of doing what the people of other countries do, upholding their country and presenting it, not in its worst, but in its most attractive form. Look at the great republic to the south of us, where fifty or sixty millions of people have been attracted to build up that great country and make it what it is. How is it done? If you see a gentleman, no matter whether he is a democrat or a republican, no matter what his politics may be, no matter whether he is for or against the Government of the United States, though he may attack the party to which he is opposed and denounce them, touch his country, say a word as to the United States of America and you will find that, whatever his politics may be or whatever his political opinions may be, he is a patriot and resents as a personal injury any slight or any attack upon the character or position of his country, or its attractions for settlers. That is what has made the United States of America what it is. If we are to follow in their wake, if we are to build up a great British nationality on this northern half of the North American continent, we will have to adopt the same policy, we will have to do justice to the magnificent heritage which God has given us, and to point out, not its disadvantages or its drawbacks, but its advantages, and to show, that which I am able to show, that Canada can present to the world to-day, that Canada can present to capital and industry, attractions second to no part of the civilised world. The Secretary of State for the Colonies said to me one day: "You have turned the heads of my constituents; they came up here the other day, the farmers and the agriculturists,"—and he represented a great agricultural constituency—"and after walking through the Canadian court at the Colonial Exhibition, they have turned their faces home in despair; they say, whatever we may do, how can we compete with that country; and I have no hesitation in saying that that visit to the Canadian section of the exhibition will attract capital from the county which I represent to Canada." All we require is to give this country fair play, to put it fairly before the world, to attract that capital and that industry. Talk to me of the farmers—I say I know something of them. I am not a farmer, but I have represented one of the finest, one of the largest, one of the most independent and of the best agricultural counties to be found in the wide Dominion of Canada for thirty-two years successively, with the exception of the brief period when I was absent in England. I know everything in relation to the farming industry of this country. I have travelled far and wide over Canada. No one man knows this Dominion better than I do. I have lived in Prince Edward Island, I have lived in New Brunswick, I spent years of my life in my native Province of Nova Scotia, I have lived in Ontario, I know Quebec intimately, I have visited again and again the North-West Territories and British Columbia, and I speak from personal knowledge when I say that there is no agricultural people in the world that has greater reason to be proud and satisfied with their position than the agriculturists of Canada and of every Province in it. I have been from one end of the Dominion to the other, and I say that there never was a farming population that had greater reason to be satisfied than the agricultural population of this Dominion, and every Province in it. There is not a Province in which a most marked change has not taken place for the better in the position of the farmer, and that year by year steadily to the present day. Yesterday, the farmer was borne down by mortgages and pressed by debt, and what is the position now? I am speaking in presence of gentlemen who know, when I say that the greatest complaint in reference to the agricultural population is not only that they do not want money, that they have paid off the mortgages that burdened their property, but if you ask the loan societies, the institutions that lend money, that live by lending money, they tell you, we cannot lend money, for the moment anyone wants to borrow, a farmer is able to furnish the money and prevent him from coming to us. So, from being burdened with mortgages and borne down by debt, they have come to be in the most independent position of any class in the community; and, if fair play were given, if the simple facts in relation to the country were stated, if, instead of these gentlemen spending their time and their talents in decrying and depreciating the Province of Ontario—one of the finest Provinces in the Dominion or in any part of the world—they would point out to capitalists abroad, to the impoverished farmers of Great Britain, to the men who are unable to make a living with their capital and their skill, what a field Ontario presents for the employment of their capital and skill, you would find the price of land, whatever it may be, more or less, greatly advanced, and instead of the tendency to go west which exists so strongly in all countries, when people in Ontario move off to Manitoba or the North-West Territories, leaving their lands and their properties, in that spirit of enterprise which carries people westward all over the world, other people would come in and take up the land at a fair and good price and enter upon the cultivation and development of that great Province. I do not want to see paupers brought into this country. I quite agree with the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that we have no room for a pauper population, but, as far as agricultural laborers are concerned, as far as domestic servants are concerned, as far as agriculturists with capital are concerned, we cannot have too many of any one of these classes. The demand has never been supplied and is not supplied now, and, notwithstanding what I have said, that people who are not adapted to be successful anywhere, whose habits and want of industry are fatal to their success in any part of the world. I have been watching this matter closely, the great difficulty has been pointed out by my hon. friend behind me, who says the advantage of the United States has been that they have had a great population of immigrants who have written the most successful letters home, have become the most successful agents, by writing home to their friends and sending money to bring them out here. The great difficulty is to get the nucleus, that is the nucleus of successful immigrants who, by communication with their friends abroad will attract people to the country. That is being done. We have, in the last few years, drawn to this country a valuable nucleus of Scandinavian and German immigrants, well adapted for the settlement of the country, well adapted to the climate, and sure to succeed in any country. I have seen scores of letters written by these parties. Notwithstanding that there have been drawbacks, that there have been frosts, that there have been dry seasons, still the crops have been of a very fair character in Canada. Notwithstanding all that, these parties have so succeeded that they have sent home to their friends and are bringing them out, and we had last year a larger amount of Scandinavian and German population brought into Canada and the North-West, than in any previous year. They are the most valuable class of immigrants, men who are adapted to achieve success, and who, I am confident, will be successful. I say, Sir, that hon. gentlemen are constantly decrying the country—I will not say for party purposes, because it is not parliamentary to impute motives—but I say from the most mistaken motives, regarded from a party standpoint. I may say that, standing here a few years ago, I ventured on a little prophecy, and that was that although the time would come when gentlemen on that side of the House would take a position on this side, that that time would never come until they changed their attitude in reference to the two great questions of the day, namely, the National Policy and the Canadian Pacific Railway. I tell them more, I say that having changed their attitude on these questions, compelled to admit the success of the National Policy, compelled to recognise the transcendent importance of the Canadian Pacific Railway, still, so long as they continue to decry their country, so long as they continue to spend their time and talents in showing that this country is one of the most miserable in the world, and that it is inhabited by people the most unfortunate in the world—I say that while they retain that attitude, they will remain where they are. They will come, in the course of time, to this side of the House. Governments must change; no Government can remain in power forever; but I say they will never take the place of hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches until they convince the people that they are inspired by a patriotism that will enable a public man to do justice to his country, and place before the world the fair and legitimate attractions that it presents to all comers. Canada can never become a great country, it is impossible in the nature of things that at any early day we can become a great country, except by one means, and that is by attracting industry, capital and population to our country. We have got the finest country in the world for the exercise of industry, for the advantageous employment of labor and capital. Give the country fair play, put before the world the attraction that we possess for population, capital and industry, and we will rapidly become a country of which every patriotic Canadian will be proud.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think it would have been possible for any human being, in a shorter space of time, to have delivered a more severe rebuke or criticism on the policy of a government, which, having such a country as the hon. gentleman rightly says, a magnificent country, a country which only needs fair play to make it great—I say, Sir, it would not be possible for any human being to have delivered a more severe criticism on the policy of the Government than to find the hon. gentleman who, knowing that, has still not one word to say in reply to the statements to which I just called the attention of the House—that with all these enormous advantages, with the expenditure of a hundred millions of public money—the hon. gentleman has not been able to put 49,000 souls into the whole North-West Territories and Manitoba within the last five years. Not one word could the hon. gentleman say in reply to the proof which I gave from public reports, the mischievous and misleading statements made by his colleagues, made by the Department of Immigration, with respect to the settlement of the North-West—not one word had he to say in contradiction. He could not contradict it; and what did he do? Why, Sir, he turned round and told the House and the country that the seventy-eight or eighty gentlemen on this side are so much more powerful than that great Government; that a few words from us are sufficient utterly to undo all the efforts of these gentlemen. Sir, I am not so conceited. I do not suppose for one moment that the just criticism, the exposure of the evils, and follies and mistakes of the Government, which has been made from this side of the House, could have deterred immigrants from coming into this country. But I tell the hon. gentleman what did deter them: the mischievous and mistaken policy of the Government for a number of years back. I agree with him that if you had given the country fair play, and, in particular, given the North-West fair play, you would have to-day three-quarters of a million of prosperous settlers in the North-West. But I say that if there ever was a policy calculated to destroy the immense natural advantages of the country, if there ever was a policy calculated to drive away settlement, if there ever was a policy which was—I will not say any more than the hon. gentleman—of set purposes and malice conceived for the purpose of injuring these unfortunate settlers—it was the triple blunders which hon. gentlemen have committed, and have persisted in, of loading down those unfortunate settlers, with a monstrous taxation, and refusing them the commonest rights of British subjects to build railroads with their own money, and delivering them bound hand and foot to a gigantic monopoly, and so administering the whole of that vast and fertile territory as to turn it practically into a fund of corruption for the purposes of carrying the elections in the older Provinces. Those were the reasons, those were the causes, which prevented even this magnificent country from being settled—from becoming the home of hundreds of thousands of prosperous settlers. And now, when the hon. gentleman is confronted with the natural and inevitable result of this most disastrous blundering, when he finds that his $71,000,000 of land sales have shrunk into $1,200,000, when we find that his 500,000 or 600,000 settlers are represented by 40,000, and his 640 million bushels of wheat by four millions or five million bushels, then the hon. gentleman turns round. When we point to the results of his policy, as evidenced by his own returns, he tells us: You, on the opposite side, are to blame, because the public at large, the English public and the whole world, know you so well that they put greater dependence on your least word than they do on all the magnificent promises we make. That is the logical result of the hon. gentleman's statement. Now, the hon. gentleman is right, I believe, in saying that had Canada been wisely administered; had her taxes been kept down as they might easily have been kept down, and that without reference to his protection policy; had we done as I have always recommended to him and his confrères; had he taken a leaf as he might well have done, from the wise and prudent policy of the people of the United States who, during nearly the whole of the first century of their existence, showed themselves the most prudent people on the face of the earth, in the matter of laying taxes and burdens on the people, then, Sir, our progress would have equalled that of any part of the United States. I am quite as good a Canadian as the hon. gentleman. I know Ontario quite as well as the hon. gentleman does; I have as high an opinion of Ontario as he can possibly have, and I say that nothing but the grossest misgovernment could have brought about in a country with such resources as we possess the result we now see, viz., year after year the very choicest, the flower of our population leaving our shores. The hon. gentleman knows right well, and every hon. gentleman here knows right well, that there are whole regions of Ontario where to-day you can hardly enter a single dwelling in any township in which you will not find some near kinsman of the family a settler in the United States. Gone there because the misgovernment of this country has prevented him from finding a home under the British flag! When that is the state of things, when we see hundreds of thousands of the very best of our countrymen forsaking their own countrymen and going abroad, I say it is due to the utterly miserable and ghastly failure in which the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite has resulted, and yet we are told it is due to the policy of men who, if they were in power to-day, would keep down taxation, abolish monopoly and retain the land for the settler. If the hon. gentleman is wise he will study those pages of the earlier history of the United States to which I have called attention, and if he had studied them carefully he would not have had to deplore to-day that while we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars of the public money in bringing immigrants here, we are driving our own people out of the country, and to-day there are two millions of Canadians or the children of Canadian parents who have been driven to the United States by this evil policy.

Mr. CHARLTON. When the Minister of Finance rose to address the committee upon the subject of immigration he made a sudden departure from the consideration of the subject before the House, and entered upon the widest field of political discussion. It is an old trick on the part of the hon. gentlemen opposite, when they want to cover any of their failures, to attack hon. gentlemen on this side and accuse them of unpatriotic motives, and lay at their doors all the failures that are to be attributed to the failure in the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. I deny that members on this side act from unpatriotic motives and I contend that their conduct is the contrary. Their motive is to arrest that tide of evil which threatens disaster to the country, and already fills the minds of our best citizens with alarm. I believe it would be much more conducive to our interests if we were to amend our policy so as to keep our native Canadians at home rather than to attempt to replace native Canadians by immigrants, for, if we succeed in that policy, we would not be in as good a position or in one so well calculated to promote the prosperity of the country as by retaining our population. It is true we have lost one million inhabitants of Canada who are living in the United States, and if we add the number of their children we have two millions Canadians in the United States who ought to be living here; and it is to arrest this exodus of our own people, one of the results of the policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, that we discuss public affairs and object to the policy of hon. gentlemen. It is very true that if Canada had fair play it would be a great country, but it has not got fair play. It is in the hands of men who administer public affairs recklessly, and it is our duty to point out the evils which attend that administration. They are piling up the debt, our expenditure is increasing by millions by the methods which characterise the policy and actions of hon. gentlemen opposite, and under such circumstances we can expect nothing but destruction and ruin in this country. It is perfectly proper to point out these things and warn the Government and the country that they must cease, or we are endangered thereby. With our debt almost three times the debt per capita of the United States; with our extravagant expenditures, with our methods of subsidising railway schemes, and of making expenditures in thousands of different ways, those who are patriotic and intelligent, and take a broad and far-seeing view of the field, are filled with apprehension as to the future. This is a mighty country, with great resources; and the country to-day ought to have, without immigration and simply by natural increase, 7,000,000 of people, and it is doubtful if we have more than four millions and a-half. There is something wrong in the management of affairs here; and when hon. gentlemen opposite attempt to cover the failure of their party by accusing hon. gentlemen on this side of being unpatriotic, it is a piece of political buncombe.

The hon. gentleman made one admission, inadvertently, with respect to settlement in the North-West. He accounted for the failure to succeed on the part of many immigrants by the fact that they were dissipated and indolent in their habits. The hon. gentleman's immigration policy is calculated to promote the immigration to Canada of that very class of settlers. Men who are intelligent, energetic and possess means, will go to the country that offers them the best inducements. Men who possess none of those qualifications will go to the country to which their passages will be paid, and the expenditure of this money leads, to a very large extent, to emigration to the United States. I was told, when in Winnipeg last fall, of many cases where immigrants arrived in Winnipeg, brought there under the auspices of the immigration policy of hon. gentlemen opposite, who had not even tarried in Winnipeg, but had proceeded to Minnesota and Dakota. They had taken that route on account of the aid they received from the immigration policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. If that hon. gentleman wishes to retain immigrants in the North-West, and to promote immigration to that country, I think I can than the one at present in operation. I would advise him to consider the propriety of giving to immigrants as favorable conditions, and as great advantages, as the United States offers to the same immigrants. I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that it might be well to place the prices of the public lands in the North-West down to the limit of prices in the United States. While the United States gives outside of its railway grants, its public lands at $1.25 per acre, and while it grants homesteads wherever a quarter-section can be found, we, in the North-West, set apart a few isolated locations in the townships for homestead settlement. We charge for land south of the Canadian Pacific Railway $2.50 per acre, for lands north of the Canadian Pacific Railway $2 per acre; we are charging for lands south of the railway double the price charged in the United States, and for the balance 75 cents an acre more than the United States charge for land of the same character. How can we expect to attract settlement? In addition, we have the National Policy, which imposes heavy duties on agricultural implements and further burthens. The disadvantages that our land policy and our fiscal policy lay upon the settler in the North-West, will inevitably produce the result of driving settlement to the south of the line. If the hon. gentleman wishes to attract settlement in the North-West he must recognise those practical evils, and not attempt to place men in the North-West by giving them a few dollars to go there, and by placing them under the disadvantage of charging double price for their land as compared with the United States, and adding the disadvantage of charging them very much more for all the implements they require. The fact has been that the United States have met with great success in promoting immigration, and that immigrants pour into that country. Well, Sir, the United States makes no immigration appropriation. It has no immigration agents in Europe; it has no sum in the estimates similar to this item; it gives no bonus to the immigrant; and not only does it not assist him in his passage, but when he lands in New York it taxes him to pay quarantine expenses, and he has also to pay for the guidance of agents who direct him to his destination, wherever it may be. And yet, notwithstanding all this, that country has been eminently successful in promoting immigration, because its land and general policy have been conducive to the interests of the settler, because it has adopted a common-sense policy; and as long as we are a competitor with the United States, as long as we have a great public domain in the North-West to which we are inviting settlers, and so long as we have a rival south of the boundary line which is also inviting settlers and has a great public domain to offer, if we do not adopt a policy as liberal as that of the United States, we will be unable to get the settlers. We may increase our appropriation for immigration indefinitely, we may make it one million or five million in place of a quarter of a million, and yet we will disastrously and ignominiously fail to settle that country until we remove the primary evil, until we are able to send them to a country which has cheaper land, which has a more liberal homestead law, and which gives the settler greater inducements. We are attempting by this grant to promote the interests of immigration, while we are at the same time losing sight entirely of the only thing which will enable us to succeed in our purpose; we are leaving unrectified and undisturbed the follies of a policy which is the root of all the evil. I do not believe that this immigration grant is necessary; I do not believe that it gives to us that class of immigrants who are desirable ones. I repeat what I said before, that men of intelligence, and energy, and means, go where the best inducements are offered to them, and are not led to go to a country by a slight grant to aid their passage. If we are to secure immigration to this country, we must change our public policy, we must do something to disabuse the public mind of the impression that this country is going to ruin. If we are to secure immigrants, we do not require a public debt of $250,000,000. If we are to secure immigrants we do not want to pile up the public expenditure, to increase the taxation and leave intelligent men under the impression, which they are sure to gather from these facts, that the country is going to be a dear country, that the future of this country is clouded, that its future is a doubtful future. We do not want to place ourselves in a position in which when a comparison is drawn between us and the United States, we are shown in an unfavorable light and are growing more and more so each year. While the United States are reducing their debt, with a scale of taxation which produces very much less per head than ours, they have a surplus that they do not know what to do with, and the necessity of reducing that taxation is becoming imperative. While their public debt is $20 per head and ours is $48 per head, I say that a patriotic impulse leads us irresistibly to warn the Government of these things—to show them why it is that we do not prosper, why it is that immigration does not come here, why it is that our own population are deserting us. These are the evils which beset us in Canada, and the hon. gentleman, when he finds fault with hon. members on this side for what he calls their unpatriotic conduct, in pointing out the inevitable results of the policy he is pursuing, is simply drawing a red herring across the trail, and attempting to divert attention from the real evil with which we have to contend. I say that the example of the United States proves conclusively that expenditures of this kind are unnecessary, because they have never made them, and yet they are more successful than any other nation in the world in securing immigrants. If we adopt some of the features of their policy with reference to cheap lands, a liberal homestead system, and care of the settler, we will secure immigration; but if we pile up debt and taxation, and continue to indulge in our present course of extravagance, no immigration appropriation will rectify the evil, or will have the slightest tendency in that direction.

Mr. BROWN. It is quite refreshing to hear the observations of hon. gentlemen opposite with reference to the immigration policy of the Government. On every occasion they seek to elevate the United States as against their own country, and the pure, unadulterated Grit is never happier than when he is decrying his own country.

Mr. CHARLTON. Order.

Mr. BROWN. The hon. gentleman may call order, but before I have got through with what I have to say, I will prove my assertion. With regard to the necessity for immigration agents in the Old Country, perhaps there would be no necessity for them at all if the hon. gentlemen opposite were as true in their allegiance to their own country as they ought to be, and spoke of it in the manner in which it deserves to be spoken of. We hear them, on all occasions, parading before the world the statement that the United States is in every respect a better country for immigrants to come to than Canada. I will be able to state, before I am through, some of the reasons why it is not only necessary to have immigration agents in the Old Country, but why it is necessary that they should be increased, on account of the tactics of hon. gentlemen opposite in order and to counteract the baneful influence which they exercise in relation to immigration to this country. Some two or three years ago, a gentleman of eminence in the Old Country, connected with the Royal College, which grants diplomas to graduates in agriculture from all parts in the Empire, heard so many conflicting accounts of the condition of Canada, that he came to this country to find out the facts for himself, with regard to Canada as a field for the immigration of those who receive the diploma of the society. He came here on account of the confusing and conflicting accounts which were published in the English papers with respect to Canada. I have it from the lips of this gentleman, Professor Tanner, that he has been most anxious to induce immigrants to come from England, Scotland and Ireland to settle in this country, and particularly in the North-West. Before leaving England he wrote to the editor of one of the leading agricultural journals of England, which was accustomed to publish all the reports which came from this country antagonistic to Canada, saying that he would be glad if he would give him the address of some of the cases of tremendous hardship which were said to exist in the North-West, declaring that he would personally investigate those cases. The editor said he was not able to give any of these addresses, but that the chances were that if, when in Canada, he applied to the Toronto Globe he would get the information he desired. That paper is the paper of all papers in Canada that hon. gentlemen opposite pin their faith to. When he came to this country he went to the office of that paper, and he found that he could get little or no information there. He went to the North-West and enquired into the condition of matters for himself. He called on a great many settlers there, and ascertained from their own lips that they were prosperous, and contented, and happy. On his return he called again at that newspaper office and stated that he was requested to ascertain the truth of those statements copied from this leading Canadian journal, all indicating that this country, of all other countries in the world, was unfit for human beings to settle in. If there was a story of hardship in the winter, or of someone having suffered from frost, it was magnified and sent home to be copied into those English papers. Professor Tanner satisfied himself that there was not a vestige of truth in any one of those statements, and that no more hardships occurred to the settlers in that country than usually occur to settlers in any new country. But hon. gentlemen opposite are continually representing that an immigrant from any part of the earth will be better served and cared for in the United States than in Canada, and therefore it is singularly amusing to find them standing now and attacking the Government for not, forsooth, doing their duty in regard to immigration. The whole fault lies at the door of hon. gentlemen opposite in decrying their country. Take the American, no matter what party he belongs to, the township he lives in is the best township in the county, his county is the best county in the state, his state is the best state in the Union, and the Union is the best country in the world; but hon. gentlemen opposite are continually decrying Canada, and then abusing the Government because they are not settling the country fast enough. They know that to them belongs the responsibility of diminishing the immigration to this country. Let them take a lesson from the experience of the past, and let them do their duty as Canadians, and seek to elevate their country instead of decrying it, as they do continually. The United States is all well enough; we have nothing to do with that; but our duty is to show the advantages of our own country to immigrants. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down knows right well that the statement he makes as to the cost of agricultural implements in the North-West, is baseless. The hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) the other day proved that statement to be without foundation. To-day the settlers in the North-West can get the best agricultural implements, made after the United States pattern, cheaper than they can be got in that country; and yet the hon. gentleman stands up and tells this House and the people of the world through the press that if they come to this country they are taxed beyond measure, and that the agricultural implements they buy are higher here than they are in the United States. Everything that hon. gentleman and those beside him say goes to prove to the world that immigrants from all parts of the earth will get better homes in the United States than they will in Canada. Every Canadian has to do his part in writing the history of his country, and it is no part of the duty of hon. gentlemen opposite to seek month after month and year after year, as they have done in the past, to degrade their country, and make out that the United States is a better country for immigrants to go to. It is all nonsense for hon. gentlemen opposite to try to draw a herring across the track. They are responsible more than anybody else in this country for the diminished immigration, and I trust that the House will realise the situation, as I am sure the country does to-day. Let them take pattern by the example of the people of the United States, whom they are so fond of quoting on all occasions; let them learn something of their loyalty to their country, in crying it up, no matter what side of politics they belong to; and if they unite with gentlemen on this side of the House in placing Canada before the world as she ought to be placed, we shall not hear much more about the loss of immigration. Fortunately for the United States there is no party in that country that seeks for party purposes to decry their country; but every man there, no matter what party he belongs to, stands up for his country. Hon. gentllemen never seem to be in a happier or more joyous mood than when they are decrying their country, which they ought to thank God for the opportunity of living in, and to which they ought to invite people to establish happy and prosperous homes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You cannot have failed to perceive that hon. gentlemen opposite have learned their lesson very well. They caught the key the hon. Minister of Finance gave them to-night, and it has been piped upon and harped upon ever since. We have been told by hon. gentlemen opposite, following the example of the Minister of Finance, that we are never happy except when we are decrying our country. We have been told that the real Grit is never happy except when he is doing that. Well, the hon. gentleman himself was a Grit at one time.

Mr. BROWN. If the hon. gentleman refers to me, I tell him that I never was a Grit, and I hope I never will be a Grit.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I stand subject to correction; but I was told by a gentleman that he was one of a deputation who waited on the hon. gentleman some years ago to request him to run in the Grit interest in a neighboring constituency. I was going to say that the hon. gentleman, having been a Grit himself some time ago, would know whether what he stated was so or not.

Mr. BROWN. I never was a Grit.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I want to tell him if, when he thought he was in that position, he was happy in decrying his country, he must not judge others in the same way, because he is not built as other members are built.

Mr. BROWN. I never decried my country.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). But this is only the amusing part of the matter. One can afford, of course, to laugh at the statements of the hon. gentleman; scolding and throwing one's arms about hurts no one. But there is a side to the remarks of the hon. Minister of Finance and the gentleman who has just taken his seat, which is on a line with the course that has been pursued by the Government which these hon. members support. What do they tell us in effect? Have they denied the figures that have been produced? No. They are not the production of the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), but they are the official figures that have been given to us by the Ministers themselves. There has been no attempt to deny the accuracy of those figures. I am speaking within the judgment of the House. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in all his harangue, did not attempt to controvert one figure; and when hon. gentlemen on this side, basing their opinion on these figures, which the hon. gentleman has not attempted to controvert, say this is not a good exhibit and that there is something wrong, we are treated to a scolding by hon. gentlemen opposite for decrying the country. What does it mean? Looking at it in the light of what we know occurred prior to the last election contest, when we saw the Ministers of the Crown going through the country and giving the people to understand that our national debt, which in reality is $223,000,000, was $27,000,000 less, we get an idea of these gentlemen's notions of patriotism. Their patriotism consists in the lie.

Mr. HESSON. I call the hon. gentleman to order. That language is not parliamentary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would ask the hon. gentleman how you can lie, if you are standing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that problem has been solved pretty frequently by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). So you see, Sir, what their ideas of patriotism are. These men, in order to be patriotic, must not tell the truth. We must not give, according to them, what is really and absolutely truth to the public, but we must distort facts, and make, in fine, statements that are absolutely false. The Opposition are not prepared to be patriotic in that sense. We leave the monopoly of that patriotism to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I must say they work that monopoly for all it is worth. Will these hon. gentlemen rise in their place and explain the ghastly result of their efforts to people our North-West; let them explain how it is that that country, which is equal to any part of the north-western States—in which we ought to have as large a population, which has as bright a sun shining and as fruitful showers falling upon it as the country to the south of us, and is free in a great measure from the frightful cyclones that sweep over that section—is comparatively untenanted and a wilderness to-day, while those other states lying just to the south, with less natural advantages are teeming with hundreds of thousands of prosperous contented settlers.

Mr. HESSON. They have 60,000,000 of a population to draw from.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). We are discussing the item in the estimates of $200,000 to induce people from other countries to settle there.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Only $150,000.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). $229,000, if I may correct the hon. gentleman. We are discussing the item of $229,000, as I understand it, and the Minister of Finance stands corrected. He is just proceeding on the same basis as he did when he stated the amount of public debt. When he speaks of the possibilities of the country he deals in large appreciations, and it is pleasant to hear his rounded periods and glowing prophecies, which I wish were true; but here we are discussing a business matter from the facts and figures we have before us. Now, the hon. gentleman opposite denied the fact that there are very few settlers in the North-West, but he contented himself with merely denying it, and did not produce any proof.

Mr. DALY. I will show later on.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman does not know everything. He does not know as much with reference to that matter as the gentlemen appointed to take the census, and who are paid thousands of dollars for doing it. What do those gentlemen, appointed by the Government to do that work, say with reference to the population of that country? Let us place the statement made by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) against that of the paid officers of the Department who made the actual count. What are the facts? We had a census of the Territory taken in 1885, and according to it, there are 48,363 souls there. In 1886, last year, we had a census taken in Manitoba, and I find that, according to it, the population there consisted of 108,640 souls. I am taking in the whole population, for I do not wish that the hon. gentleman should have any side issues to argue upon. The total population of Manitoba and the North-West Territories, according to the official figures upon the Table of the House, therefore, amounts to 157,003. If it be unpatriotic to say there are not more people in that country, the want of patriotism is the act of the Government. They are publishing to the world these figures. If they did not want these facts to be known, why did the Government not use their despotic power as they have used it in other matters? Why not do in reference to these as they have done in reference to others, distort and misrepresent them. If there be any lack of patriotism, then the lack of patriotism must be charged on hon. gentlemen opposite, who have placed upon the Table of the House, in the sight of all the people, the fact that, owing to their mismanagement this great country in the west has a population of but 157,003 souls. How discouraging is this when we know that in Dakota, which is not as good a country, no less than 125,000 souls went to settle there in the last year. What does this state of things reveal? Does it reveal the fact that the Government since they came into power, since 1878, have placed 157,003 souls in that country? Why, no. In 1881, there were 122,400 souls there, so that the increase in these years, under this patriotic, this great, this model Government, has been—what? Why, that in the whole of Manitoba and the North-West Territories in the six years, after an expenditure of three million dollars since 1880, including the estimates of this year for immigration, they have expended about $100,000,000 of the public money besides, and, as the result of this expenditure, they have placed in that country in the six years 34,603 people. That is the total increase, natural increase and immigrants brought into the country. These are the figures given us by hon. gentlemen opposite, and if there is want of patriotism in stating the facts of the case, it is these gentlemen who are guilty. Yet they rise and pretend to lecture hon. gentlemen on this side because we wish simply to draw useful lessons for the Government of this country, and seek to devise remedies for the mismanagement that must exist. Let them turn their guns upon themselves, let them turn abuse upon themselves, and say how rashly they have acted, as shown by the fact that in six years we have only been able to increase our population by 34,603 in the Territories and Manitoba. Though we have spent about three millions of money in immigration alone, though we have built the Canadian Pacific Railway, though we have spent millions in surveys, the result is that we have got 34,603 souls. They may claim, and the Minister of Agriculture does claim, that they had better results for their immigration policy, that they sent the immigrants into that country. Supposing we give the Minister of Agriculture the benefit of saying that he did send more than that in the country, where will he put the blame? Upon what member of the Government will he put the blame? Upon what member of the Government will he put the blame for driving these people out of the country into which they had come? That is a question to be answered. If the figures of the Minister of Agriculture given to us in the official document are reliable, they state that from 1881 to 1886, 166,002 souls went in as immigrants to that country. We know from the census of 1881 that there were 122,400 people there, so that those sent in by the Minister of Agriculture, which he reports to us year by year, added to what was in before, should give us there at the present time 288,402 souls, without any natural increase. But we find there are actually there by the census of 1885-86 only 157,003 souls. In other words, we have lost in six years, besides the natural increase, 131,399 souls out of that country. And yet, with that exhibit, with that ghastly exhibit, as it was called by the hon. member for South Huron (Sir Richard Cartwright), we are asked to go on with the system of immigration, to endeavor to induce people to come into that country, a country which they might be proud to come to, and which it would be to their interest to come to. But, by some strange fatality, brought on, as I believe, by the misgovernment and mismanagement of the country, it has resulted, as we see, in figures that ought to stagger everyone, figures which ought to make a Canadian Parliament, even a Canadian Parliament like this supporting hon. gentlemen opposite, pause and consider and seek the cause why it is, if the Minister of Agriculture's figures be true, that 131,999 souls left that country in six years. Either that is true or we never sent them in at all, and in that case the Department would have been giving to us lying statements not borne out in fact. I would not like to charge that to the Minister of Agriculture, but to find that these men went in there and lived under our flag, and had to leave and go elsewhere to the extent of 131,000 souls is most discouraging. There is another matter in connection with this. How about this immigration business altogether? We are scolded by these hon. gentlemen for alluding to it at all, but it occupied their attention a good deal during the election time. I think we were promised some economy in regard to this. I think we were promised that a different system was to be entered upon with better results. I think that the mechanics and wage-earners of Ontario were given to understand that the assisted immigration business was to be stopped. They recognised the fact that it had not been successful. They recognise that on the eve of an election. The Mail newspaper is my authority for saying that the First Minister, at Owen Sound, declared that the policy of the Government was to abolish the assisted passages altogether or to confine them to farmers who were going to settle in the North-West. I think if a farmer is going to settle in the North-West and has sufficient means for that purpose, he would not need to be given his passage money. But how about the wage-earners and mechanics and the class that were told all this? How are they treated? Is the new policy to be carried out? I saw this in a Toronto newspaper, and I think it is worth while to read it to the House in order to show how very closely the ante-election policy is attended to when the Government gets back to power; to show how that feeling of sympathy which swells the great heart of the First Minister, his regard and his feeling for the laborer, subside from his manly bosom when the election is over. I read that the Trade and Labor Council sent the following letter to the Hon. John Carling, Minister of Immigration, Canada:—

“TORONTO, 3rd March, 1887.

“HON. JOHN CARLING,

“Minister of Immigration, Canada.

“SIR,—I am directed by the Legislative Committee of the Toronto Trades and Labor Council, and for the information of the last mentioned body, to draw your attention to the following quotation from an editorial article, under the heading ‘Assisted Immigration,’ which appeared in the Standard newspaper, published in Toronto, under date of 17th February ult, and in which quoted paragraph the Standard conveys the impression that it speaks with authority and for the Government of the Dominion, when it says:

“‘3. When the present Conservative members returned to office they found this binding agreement holding them to its provisions for a term of years. So soon as they were at liberty to do so, they stopped assistance to mechanics, and now they have stopped all money assistance to immigrants, and the whole system of assisted passages is ended so far as the Dominion Government is concerned.’

“And I am further directed to respectfully ask if it is true, as stated above, that the Dominion Government ‘have stopped all money assistance to immigrants,’ and that ‘the whole system of assisted passages is ended,’ so far as the Dominion Government is concerned?

“Trusting that the statement in this paper is correct,

“I have the honor to remain,

“Yours respectfully,

“D. J. O'DONOGHUE,

“Secretary, L. C.”

That letter was written on 3rd March, you will observe. The election was over.

“In acknowledgment to the foregoing communication, your committee received the following on 22nd March:

“DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,

“OTTAWA, 19th March, 1887.

“SIR,—I have by instruction from the Minister of Agriculture, to acknowledge your letter addressed to him on the 23rd inst. on the subject of immigration arrangements, and in reply to say that this letter, which arrived during the temporary absence of the Minister from the seat of Government, will receive his attention as soon as he returns.

“I have the honor to be, Sir,

“Your obedient servant,

“JOHN LOWE,

“Sec., Department of Agriculture.

“D. J. O'DONOGHUE, Esq.,
“Toronto.”

This letter was written only 19 days afterwards. There was no hurry attending the wage-earners now. They had been used for all they were worth as far as those gentlemen could do it. It took 19 days to get that answer.

"Your Committee, realising the onerous and many duties devolving upon a Cabinet Minister, and consequent liability to unintentionally forget something, again addressed the honorable the Minister of Agriculture as follows:—

"33 BELLEVUE PLACE,

"TORONTO, 16th April, 1887.

"HON. JOHN CARLING,

"Minister of Immigration, Canada :

"DEAR SIR,—By direction of the Legislative Committee of Toronto Trades and Labor Council, I respectfully draw your renewed attention to my letter addressed to you under date of 3rd March, ultimo, and which has not been honored with a reply to date.

"Under date of 19th March, Mr. Lowe wrote me in acknowledgment, and relating at the same time that on your return to Ottawa (you were absent from that city at the time apparently) you would be good enough to reply to my communication.

"As the subject referred to in my letter of the 3rd March is of the utmost and most pressing importance to the wage-earners of Canada, an answer thereto as soon as convenient would be duly appreciated, so that the same may be laid before the Trades and Labor Council at its next meeting.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Respectfully yours,

"D. J. O'DONOGHUE,

"Secretary Legislative Committee,

"Toronto Trades and Labor Council."

Then they add :

"Your Committee regret being obliged to add that up to date the honorable the Minister of Immigration for the Dominion has not paid any further attention to these communications from the representatives of your body in this instance."

This paper was published on 7th May, so from 16th April to May 7th, they had not received an answer at all. That is the way in which the Government that has such a warm regard for the workingmen acted. That is the way in which they treat their representatives. The Minister, of course, will know whether he has sent that letter or not. I trust, having called his attention to it in this way, he will be able to write to these people now at length. I would like to know whether it is so; I would like to know whether there has been assisted passages or not. The Minister of Finance says: "We don't want paupers here, we don't encourage them"; but if I am not mistaken, I think I read a report of him speaking in London where he said there was room for tens of thousands, I do not know but he said hundreds of thousands, of pauper children in Canada—but I speak subject to correction. This is what I find in the report of the Minister of Agriculture: "The following statement shows the number of immigrants, chiefly children, brought to Canada under the auspices of charitable societies, and individuals during the last three years." I presume they are paupers or they would not be under the auspices of charitable societies. The number brought was 1,988, and $2 apiece was paid for bringing them, yet the Minister tells us that we do not desire any immigration of that kind. Then we are told that laborers and mechanics are not coming, that it is only farm laborers and domestic servants. Well, the report of the Minister of Agriculture gives, as the trades and occupations of the steerage adults landed at the port of Quebec for the year 1886, farmers, 2,196; laborers, 6,966; mechanics, 1,110; clerks and traders, 139. The trades and occupations of the steerage passengers landed at Halifax were as follows:—Farmers, 513; laborers, 2,476; mechanics, 202; clerks and traders, 104; female servants, 496. So, take the female servants and the 513 farmers, and you have less than a thousand against the 2,476 laborers, the 202 mechanics and 104 clerks and traders that were brought into the country. Now, these gentlemen have been memorialised time and again that we had in Canada all the mechanics and the laborers that were requisite to do the work. I see in the report that their agent in British Columbia, of whom some gentleman spoke as having gone from Manitoba to British Columbia, speaks of the labor market being overstocked, and I venture to say that the Minister has received similar reports from other Departments, yet they go on with this system. They say: We are not doing it in the old Provinces, it is simply done in the North-West Territories. But we find it is not true with reference to the North-West Territories, by the figures I have given. And because we complain of this we are told that we are unpatriotic, we are decrying the country, and the hon. gentleman asks: What would be thought by a stranger in the gallery if he were to listen to a debate that was going on in this House and heard the statements of hon. gentlemen on this side, and, I suppose, heard the speeches of hon. gentlemen on that side. Well, Sir, I do not know what a stranger in the gallery would think, but I will venture to say this: If he were a sensible stranger and comprehended the situation, he would say: How on earth is it that the people of Canada support for one day the existence of a Government that has so mismanaged this country that they cannot retain the people in it after they come here? I think he would say that. I think he would be apt to say also: I wonder most of all how they can tolerate a Government who, having such meagre results to show, boldly claim for themselves all the patriotism that is to be found in this land. Sir, the hon. gentleman must not lecture us too much on our loyalty. I do not challenge his loyalty, I do not challenge his patriotism, and I do not allow him to challenge mine. I was born in the country, I live in the country. I want to remain in the country, and I want to help to build up the country, to arrest this mismanagement that is pulling down this country, that is retarding its progress.

An hon. MEMBER. You must be changing your course.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, I am not changing my course at all. I will say this, that I am a little different from the Minister of Finance, because my country is so pleasant to me, so delightful, that I want to remain here; while he told us here the other day that he wants to hurry and get through this whole business, so he can fly away to England. Now, I am not like that, I am willing to stay here. But mark the influences that surround him when he gets to England. He is in the society of unpatriotic men. He told us that the inhabitants of England clustered around him, and said: Why, what a country you have got. We find our country going all to pieces, and we cannot live here. So there he is, cheek by jowl with men who are running down their country, and I greatly fear that he may become tainted, if he is not already so. I recommend him to stay in this country and assist, by his influence and ability, in making it greater and happier, to build it up and to remove the obstacles to its progress. That, Sir, is the object sought by the Opposition. But this end is not to be attained by simply putting $250,000, or $500,000, as was done at one time, of public money in a vote for immigration expenses. It is not to be secured in that way. Now, Sir, I have said that much which I desired to say. I want hon. gentlemen opposite to understand distinctly that we will not be prevented from stating the facts in reference to this or any of their cries of disloyalty. If they want us to prove our patriotism by making statements that are not correct, by stating that the public debt is $27,000,000 less than it is, by saying there are more people in Manitoba than the official figures prove, then we will be unpatriotic. But we will say this, that, looking at these meagre results, there must be hindrances, there must be obstructions, and we believe these ought to be discovered, and being discovered, they ought to be taken away. I may be pardoned if I say that I think I have discovered the cause of these hindrances, and if I were desirous of taking up more of the time of the House—which I am not at present—I would be able to prove, at any rate to the satisfaction of this side of the House, that one of the greatest obstacles to the progress of Canada that exists at the present moment is the Government as at present constituted, and that a radical change is needed.

Mr. DALY. The last speaker has made some statements which require a flat contradiction. The hon. gentleman has spoken of his loyalty and his patriotism. I did not make any allusion to that when I spoke previously, but I would ask the hon. gentleman if it is patriotic or loyal, when he quotes figures, apparently from the public returns, to quote them improperly. If I understood the hon. gentleman, he said that the increase of population in Manitoba and the North-West Territories during the last six years, was only 34,603. The census was taken in 1885, and not in 1886. He made a mistake of one year, and if he will look at the census returns for Manitoba alone, he will find that the increase was 46,000, and yet, forsooth, he tells us that the total increase for these five years in Manitoba and the North-West was only 34,000, whereas the fact is that between 1881 and 1886, the census shows an increase of 79,247. I would ask that hon. gentleman, if he does not want his loyalty or his patriotism to be impugned, to take a little more pains and quote the returns correctly.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think not. I am subject to correction; but give me your figures and I can check them. I gave you my figures and said where I got them.

Mr. DALY. The census of Manitoba and the North-West gives—

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Take them separately.

Mr. DALY. I take them together. You took them together.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I took them separately.

Mr. DALY. I beg your pardon. Manitoba and North-West Territories combined, 1881, 87,755; 1886, 167,002; increase 79,247 in five years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Those are not whites.

Mr. DALY. They are the correct figures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Those are not the figures of the census as that of the white population.

Mr. DALY. That is a point on which I disagree with the hon. gentleman. He would like to take the census of Manitoba at 95,000 instead of 108,000. The half-breeds are as much whites as we are. They enjoy the same rights in Manitoba, they vote and hold property, and when you say there are only 95,000 in that country you insult the half-breeds by that remark. I asserted the other night, and I assert again, that when that hon. gentleman tried to give the correct figures of Manitoba and the North-West he failed to do so. He is a distributor of gloom. He talked about the condition of the country under the Government of which he was a member in 1874-75-76 and the prosperity of the country. What did they do to promote the interests of Manitoba and the North-West? Did they send any immigrants there? What did they do towards constructing the Canadian Pacific Railway? I will illustrate this point by mentioning a story I heard during my election. At one of my meetings an Irish gentleman was appointed chairman. In opening the meeting he said: "I am exceedingly proud of the honor done me by appointing me as your chairman to-day. The question for you to decide is, whether you will vote for Mr. Christie or Mr. Daly. If you vote for Mr. Christie you vote to bring back into power the party led by Mr. Blake, and if that party had been in power to-day, instead of going from Winnipeg to Port Arthur in a palace car you would have been going down there on skates or in an ice boat." That was the celebrated water stretch policy of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was not until 1880, when the Canadian Pacific Railway was advanced by the policy of the present Government, we had any population in Manitoba and the North-West. I will admit there is a discrepancy between the immigration returns and the census return.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You will.

Mr. DALY. I have never denied it.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is also a discrepancy between them and your figures.

Mr. DALY. I have stated them correctly, and I am not to be interrupted. The census of Manitoba, 1881 (deducting the population found in the Territory, since awarded to Ontario) 62,260; census of North-West Territories, 1881, 25,515, giving a total of 87,775. Immigration gone in from the date of census 1881 to date of census 1886, 155,477, giving a total of 243,252 people. Census of Manitoba, 1886, 108,640; census of North-West Territories, estimating one year's increase since 1885, 58,362. Total, 167,002. Deduct 167,002 from 243,252 and there is a discrepancy between the census and immigration returns.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). You take ten thousand people as the increase in the Territories for one year.

Mr. DALY. My figures are correct, and you cannot dispute them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I can dispute them.

The CHAIRMAN. The hon. member should not interrupt the speaker so frequently.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I beg your pardon.

Mr. DALY. The increase is 79,247; or equal to 90.3 per cent. The census of Minnesota in 1870 was 439,706, in 1880, 780,703; increase, 77 per cent. Combined population: Colorado, Dakota, Kansas, Minnesota and Illinois, 1870, 3,398,041; in 1880, 5,184,244; increase, 53 per cent. Those figures show very clearly, notwithstanding all we had to contend against in the North-West, as I pointed out on a previous occasion, that the country made good progress. I have admitted there is a discrepancy, about which there is no question. To return to the statement made by the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) who is not in his seat, that the United States spends nothing on immigration, I cannot understand any hon. member making such a statement. Does the hon. gentleman contend that the consuls of the United States are not immigrant agents for the United States? Every person would be willing to admit that the consular service is used almost exclusively for immigration purposes; and we find from the returns that the salaries paid to the consular service of the United States amounted to $444,600 last year, while all we ask for the total appropriation is $229,525. The total expenditure for the United States consular service and Castle Gardens is $1,278,225. Is not that, in the interest of the United States' immigration? The State of New York maintains Castle Gardens at a cost of $1,129,252. Yet hon. gentlemen will rise and say that the United States spend nothing for immigration. Does the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) overlook the fact that every line of railway in the United States spends money for immigration purposes? Does he overlook the fact that every American railway is an immigration agent? With respect to the Province of Manitoba and its condition and the field it offers for settlement, I will not take up the time of the House further than to read an extract from a letter written by an English immigrant settled in Manitoba, which letter is published in the Chester Chronicle and North Wales Advertiser. He writes:

"SIR,—I have read with considerable interest for several years the remarks in the Chronicle under the heading of 'Farm Notes,' and I thoroughly agree in the main with what your correspondent advocates. I would, however, like, if you can find room, to try and point out to the tenant farmers of Cheshire a better remedy than combinations such as farmers' unions, &c., to redress their many grievances. In one word, I would strongly recommend emigration.

"I know it is a difficult matter to break up old ties and associations, and to take what some would suppose 'a leap in the dark,' but for young couples especially there are homes beyond the seas equally as good so far as neighbors, churches, schools and other things that help to make up a happy community, as in old England, and for the sake of sentiment it is poor policy to cling to the old homestead and go from bad to worse.

"Let me draw your attention to Manitoba briefly as a field for emigrants. I read the correspondence in your paper sometime ago, signed I think a 'Cheshire Clergyman,' and he gives a woeful account of that country. Everything went amiss, Arctic cold, crops all frozen, and taking it altogether a country hardly fit for man or beast. I can understand pretty well how all this came about. His correspondent was very likely one of the many young men sent out from old England scattered over Manitoba and North-West Territories, with a capital of say about £200, a gun, and a fancy shooting suit, and a general notion of farming. They take up Government land, buy an outfit as far as the money will go, and with their inexperience it will readily be understood it does not go far. They then commence farming. Now pause for one moment and suppose such characters commenced farming in England with every convenience in the shape of houses, buildings, &c., and imagine what success they would meet with. Can anyone, therefore, be surprised if they utterly fail in Manitoba with all the disadvantages of a new country, practically nothing but the open prairie to work upon. And yet these youths write home, call the country every hard name they can find—nothing is too bad for it, and the people will listen and be guided in some degree by their reports.

"I have lived in Manitoba four years farming and among farmers, and I can truthfully recommend that country as a very desirable field for the energies and capital of the tenant farmers of Cheshire. Land can be secured from the Government, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and other companies on very easy terms, from the former as a free gift after residence and improvements, and from the latter on easy cash terms. But better still there are plenty of improved farms of from 160 to 320 acres, with from 50 to 100 acres broken up, tolerable buildings, some fencing and in well settled neighborhoods, near to churches, schools, railway and post office, and these can be purchased at very reasonable figures, say from £150 to £300. I would recommend new comers, tenant farmers, to buy such farms, as they are the cheapest in the long run; good milk cows can be bought from £7 to £10; horses, good team, £60 to £80; other live stock in like proportion, and implements at a reasonable figure. Prices for grain, beef and pork, butter and eggs, are not high just now, but the low figures without rents or tithes, are a long way ahead of English prices of to-day, and a farmer if he does not, as the saying is, 'put all his eggs in one basket,' can make money, besides build up a good inheritance for his children. Mixed farming pays best, and the bulk of the Manitoba farmers see this now, and it is a common thing to see on farms fine herds of cattle, sheep, &c., along with fields of wheat.

"Much has been said about the climate of Manitoba, the terribly cold winters. I grant the winters are cold; part of December, all of January and part of February is pretty severe, but the cold is of such a nature, the sun shining brightly all the time, that it is not felt like the murky, damp cold of England. With the exception of these months the weather is all that can be desired, and without any prejudice I prefer the climate of Manitoba to that of the Old Country. It is without doubt the healthiest in the world.

"I have no desire to paint up the country as a paradise. A new comer has a lot to learn, many things will strike him as different to the old, and he will have to put up with many inconveniences and drawbacks. But the thought that beyond all this there is a prospect of independence will nerve him to persevere and eventually succeed, and I trust the coming spring will find many of the over-burdened tenant farmers of Cheshire wending their way to Manitoba, where there is room for thousands."

Now, Sir, after reading that letter, taking the statement of the hon. gentleman from North Wellington that he didn't think there was any necessity for the hon. gentleman to go back to England, I want to know how we are to get those men whom the gentleman who writes the above letter asks to come to this country, if we do not have immigration agents in London and elsewhere from whom they can get their information. I think that is the best possible evidence to show that the grant should be increased rather than decreased. I am sorry the hour is so late that I cannot go further into the question, but I think I have shown conclusively, so far as the figures I have given relating to immigration are concerned, that the facts stated by the hon. member for South Brant (Mr. Paterson) are not correct.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. member for South Brant does not think so, and he happens to have the census before him, and if the hon. gentleman will compare his figures, I will not be disposed to charge him, as he has charged me, with uttering figures that he knows were incorrect, but I will be more charitable than he was to me;

I will say that it is possible to be mistaken, and that I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken. According to the census of 1881 the population of Manitoba was 65,954. Is that correct?

Mr. DALY. 65,934.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Well, the census says 65,954. Then the population of the Territories amounts to 56,446, and the two amounts together give you 122,400, which is just what I stated.

Mr. DALY. The census in Manitoba, deducting the population found in the Territories since the award was made to Ontario, is 62,260. At that time Keewatin and those parts of the country were in Manitoba, and they have gone back to Ontario.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). How many?

Mr. DALY. Three thousand and some odd, making 62,260 in the census for 1881. I gave 25,575 for the Territories. Is that correct?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The census gives 56,446, that is all.

Mr. DALY. For the Territories for 1881?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes.

Mr. DALY. I have everything here.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The census gives for the Territories 56,416, district 192 not represented.

Mr. DALY. They must take Keewatin, Athabasca, and the unexplored territories.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman will see the necessity of not being quite so positive.

Mr. DALY. I gave the census of the North-West Territories at 25,575. Now Keewatin, Athabasca, and the unexplored territories give 30,360, which will make exactly the 55,000, which the hon. gentleman gives, so that the figures are the same.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think, Sir, we might now pass the item.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, not yet; the hon. member for South Brant has something to say, and so have I.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I do not like my figures to be challenged, or to have it imputed to me that I gave them knowing them to be wrong. When I gave for the census the population of the North-West Territories, the hon. gentleman admits the figures, but in his calculation he adds 10,000 for the increase of one year. As I have shown the whole of Manitoba and the North-West increased in six years only 34,603, so you can see how modest the hon. gentleman is in his estimate when he adds 10,000 for one year. He sets his estimated figures against the official census.

Mr. DALY. You said for 1886; I said for 1885—five years, and I added 10,000 estimating for one year's increase.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I stated that the increase of six years was 34,603.

Mr. DALY. How do you get six years?

Mr. ROSS. It is five years.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is the census of 1880-81, and the census of 1886 would cover it. But supposing that we do that, how many does he want, when, according to his own figures, the average in the whole of the Territories is not six thousand a year. And besides I am not including the natural increase; I did not take that in; I want my statements always to be within the mark. Then I took the Minister of Agriculture's reports and the census figures, and the result is exactly what I gave to the House. Notwithstanding the statement of the hon. gentleman opposite he knows nothing more about the figures with reference to the North-West and Manitoba than anyone else of equal business abilities, when he has the public document in his hands.

Mr. DALY. I do not desire to impute to the hon. gentleman that he knew the figures were wrong, but I gave the figures and he has not disputed them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Yes, I have.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And if the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Paterson) does not, I do.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I took in the Indians and half-breeds, and the hon. gentleman says I left them out.

Mr. DALY. No, I said the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) left them out.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). No, the hon. gentleman was attacking me at the time.

Mr. DALY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I said the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright).

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman must have known when I gave 48,363 as the census of the Territories in 1885, that I was including more than the whites; he must have known that there were not that many whites and I wanted to throw in the half-breeds, but he would not have my figures. But he makes an estimate for himself by adding certain figures and deducting certain others, and then he rises and says that a gentleman speaking from the official census has been giving incorrect figures.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The question in hand was this—not what is the number of half-breeds, but how many white immigrants the Department of Immigration reported to have come into the North-West. I excepted the half-breeds for the best possible reason, that I do not think the Minister of Agriculture will venture to tell us that his report includes any considerable half-breed immigration coming into the North-West from distant countries; if they are, I should like to know where they came from. Now, we have the statement made by that Department, that 155,000 white people have been brought into Manitoba and the North-West. In order to ascertain what the facts were we were obliged to take the white population. I put the question to the Minister across the floor some time ago, and he very properly said that the white population of Manitoba was 95,495. This return which I hold in my hand shows that the white population in the Territories a short time before this was 23,000, making altogether 118,000. The census returns show, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that there were, in the two combined, early in April, 1881, before the immigration for that year came in, about 66,000 whites. Now, making a very moderate allowance for natural increase, which was less than I was justified in taking, that leaves you a bare 44,000 whites having come into that territory and remained there, as against 155,000 that the reports of the Department of Immigration represented to have come in. That showed either that we were wholly misinformed as to the number that had come in, or that if that number had come in, 112,000 or 113,000 had left the country. Sir, I say with all due deference to the hon. gentleman, that shows that our efforts to settle the North-West have resulted in disastrous and lamentable failure, which I regret, and which I suppose he regrets, and which can only be attributable to gross mismanagement, or to the grossest possible mis-statement put forth by one of the Departments of this country. I pointed these things out and asked for an explanation. I asked what excuse or reason could be given by the Department of Agriculture for that state of things, and I contend that these figures have not been and cannot be contradicted by any human being who supports the Ministry to-day. They are taken from their own official records, and they have nothing to do with any of the points raised by the hon. gentleman who replied to the hon. member for South Brant. I have no reason in the world to undervalue the half-breed population of the North-West, but I excepted them because they had nothing to do with the question at issue, which was, how far the returns of the Department of Agriculture were justified by the facts of the census.

Mr. WATSON. I will not occupy the time of the House at great length, but I feel it my duty to offer some remarks in reply to some statements made on the other side of the House. In 1883 and 1884 I attempted at different times to lay before this House some facts as to the actual condition of things in Manitoba and the North-West. For the statements I made, which have since proved to be true, I was branded as one who was decrying the country I lived in. I have always believed that if a patient is sick the best course is to suggest a remedy and have it applied at the earliest possible moment. At that time and ever since hon. gentlemen opposite have taken a different view. I must say that, to-night, I have heard from hon. gentlemen opposite more talk about frozen grain, and other disadvantages suffered by the North-West settlers, than I have ever heard from this side of the House. If they are not acquainted with the fact, I would inform them that last year we had no frozen grain at all, although the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) stated that we had frozen wheat for the last two years.

Mr. DALY. I did not say for the last two years. I said we had frosts for two years, and the hon. gentleman cannot deny it.

Mr. WATSON. I do deny it. I live in a section of Manitoba where I have seen ten crops reaped, and I have never seen a crop there injured by frost. I stated that in the far west the country was not fitted for growing grain, but I never said a word against Manitoba. I believe we have there the finest field for immigration in the world, and all we require is a fair chance. Give us such tariff and such land regulations and laws as will encourage the people to live in the country, and we shall soon have the country filled up with a fine class of people. But I do say that while we have all these natural advantages, the policy the Government has pursued towards the country has deterred settlement. Now, there were some matters referred to to-night which I cannot pass over. So far as the number of settlers is concerned, there is no disputing the figures of the hon. Minister of Agriculture, showing that there are 95,000 whites in Manitoba, or 108,000 whites and half-breeds. It is a matter of regret that we have not more. In 1853, when it was stated in a report of the hon. Minister of Agriculture that 13,000 Americans had settled in the North-West in that year, I disputed the statement, and the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) got up and said: "For God's sake, if we get a good report, let us have it." We have been getting these good reports; but would it not have been better to know that these people were not going into the country, and get a remedy. The remedy we want there is a reduction in the tariff and free competition for railways. With these two changes, I venture to say that we would soon have that country quickly settled. As the hon. member opposite has stated, in the United States every railroad company is an immigration agent, the best immigration agent that can be got. But unfortunately in Manitoba and the North-West we have not free trade in railways. We have to-day four lines of railway tapping at our doors and seeking admission—one to the west of Turtle Mountain which is built to the boundary, another east of Turtle Mountain, which is close to the boundary, another at St. Jo, built to within 20 miles of the boundary, and another from Duluth working westward. I say give these railways admission to the country, and they will be the best immigration agents we can have, because they will be interested in settling up the country so as to secure the carrying of the produce. I have not time to-night to deal with some statements made the other night by the hon. member for Selkirk, when he stated that the people of Manitoba suffered nothing from the tariff. Why should the Canadian manufacturer want 35 per cent. protection if implements are not cheaper in the United States than in Manitoba? Any reasonable mind will admit that if the duty were reduced on implements, we would get them cheaper. As an instance of how the tariff works, I may state an incident that happened in the town where the hon. member for Selkirk lives. About last Christmas an Englishwoman who had come there a couple of years before received a present of some clothing from her friends in England, and on going to the Custom house, she found that she had to pay $32 duty on them before she could get them. That is one of the reasons against people from the Old Country settling in the North-West.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If she had been in Dakota or Minnesota would she have been allowed to receive goods from Great Britain without paying any duty?

Mr. WATSON. No, she would not. While we, as Canadians, pride ourselves as being Canadians and British, because we belong to the mother country, we are preventing articles manufactured by artisans of the old country coming here by imposing a duty of 35 per cent. on the very article used by the old country settler. Reduce that duty and you will encourage those people to come here. I might refer to several articles, the duty on which bears heavily on the settler, and on which a reduction of duty would encourage settlement. Among these are agricultural implements, canned goods, binding twine and lumber. I have no wish to ask the Government to reduce the item under discussion, but I must express my regret that the expenditure has not produced better results. The best immigration agent is the contented settler. I pointed out the other day the number of passages to the United States that were paid in advance, and that number is far in excess of the paid passages to our country. Not only must we get immigrants into the country, but we must take care of them when they come; and the Government should see that good agents are appointed at points where the immigrants are likely to locate. Hundreds of immigrants who come to Manitoba receive no attention, and leave for the States, who would have otherwise remained with us. I have no doubt that the hon. the Minister of Finance is having a check taken of the immigrants who come over the Canadian Pacific Railway, but hundreds of them come through Winnipeg to Dakota, simply because they get better rates over the Canadian Pacific Railway on account of the inter-state law. I regret that a large number of people who settled in Manitoba have gone south. I was reading the other day in the paper that Mr. Alexander Sinclair, who, at one time was resident in Manitoba, went south of Turtle Mountain, and grew wheat which took the first prize at the exhibition in New Orleans. Yet people such as he have left us, although hon. gentlemen admit the climate and soil in Manitoba are superior to those of Dakota, because of our monopoly in railways and high tariff.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And they go where there is a greater monopoly and higher tariff.

Mr. WATSON. They can buy their agricultural implements cheaper, and their lumber cheaper and they get cheaper freight rates.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. BOWELL. That is the result of the policy of high protection. It will have the same result here shortly.

Mr. WATSON. It is a matter of public record that they go there in preference to staying with us. I would do anything to induce them to return and remain here. The acts which are performed by this Government every day are driving the people out of the country and keeping others from coming in. A few weeks ago, the Legislature of Manitoba passed a resolution that the Canadian Pacific Railway was squeezing the life blood out of the people. The president of the Canadian Pacific Railway said it was only a few demagogues and cranks who were raising the agitation in Manitoba, but we find that the Local Legislature there and also the reeves of some 23 municipalities have stated that the country was not progressing as fast as its natural advantages would permit, and I regret to say that the people of Winnipeg are in such an excited state of mind that some 4,000 or 5,000 of them actually burned in effigy the men who are at the head of the monopoly. That conduct is certainly to be regretted. But who is to blame? Why to-day, in another place, some five railway charters in Manitoba and the North-West were refused. Hon gentlemen opposite advertise that to the world, and people say they will not go to a country where there is not free trade in railways, because in a prairie country they expect to grow grain and require cheap transport. I hope that the Minister of Agriculture will do all in his power to encourage immigrants to come to Manitoba and the North-West.

Quarantine $77,966

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is that $14,000 for immigrant patients in Winnipeg and St. Boniface hospitals?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Immigrant patients are treated in St. Boniface hospital, and this is to meet the expense. The item is not increased.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It is not long ago this item found its place.

Mr. CARLING. That amount of money has been paid for a number of years according to an arrangement between the Government and the Winnipeg Council.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It seems to me that it is an excessive amount. The Government do not pretend to keep the patients at Winnipeg. It would only be such a chance traveller who would happen to get sick.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are paid according to the time they are there; according to a regular arrangement between the Government and the hospital.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does the hon. gentleman know the price of each?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Sixty cents a day.

Mr. POPE. This has been for a long time an arrangement with the people of Manitoba and the North-West. It is not for immigrants passing through there only, but it is a hospital for the North-West. We provided no hospital for the North-West, but we pay sixty cents a day for each. Sick persons in the Territories come down there to be treated.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Sick persons from the Territories come down?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. WATSON. This is a vote that ought to be continued. It is a very good vote, and there are people travelling through that territory, and young men working on the railway, and it is a matter there should be no discussion about. Accidents happen and sickness takes hold of young men in the North-West, and it is very desirable on the part of the Government to provide them with this hospital accommodation.

Mr. FISHER. I wish to point the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to a question which I brought up last year, in regard to the establishment of a cattle quarantine station in the Eastern Townships near the boundary line.

Mr. CARLING. This is not in this vote at all.

Mr. FISHER. Pardon me, I think it is. I would much prefer not going on with it to-night, but I will have to do it. I call attention to the fact that, when I asked for that establishment last year, I was told that, in consequence of an agreement with the English Government, it would be impossible, because that Government would only allow that cattle from the United States should come in through the port at Sarnia. I called the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that cattle did come in at other points, especially in the North-West Territories and Manitoba. I was told that no cattle were allowed to come in except at the extreme west for breeding purposes and ranching, and that the results of that importation could not interfere with the arrangements made between this Government and the English Government. I take up the report of the Minister himself, and I find that at Emerson, which is not in the extreme west of the North-West Territories, but in the Province of Manitoba, 308 head of cattle came in from the United States last year, directly contrary to the policy the Government announced as the reason why my request could not be granted. I also find in the report of the cattle quarantine station at St. John, N.B., the statement that:

"In consequence of the importation of cattle from the United States that required to be kept in quarantine during the autumn and winter months, it became necessary to put repairs on the barn in which the cattle were kept."

In other words, I find in the report of the same Minister who last year stated that, in consequence of an engagement he had made with the English Government, it was impossible to establish a quarantine station on the borders of the New England States, and that no cattle were allowed to come in—I find, I say, at all events two ports where there are herds of cattle coming in from the United States.

Mr. CARLING. I think that the hon. gentleman must have misunderstood me at first. I did not understand that he referred to the North-West and Manitoba, but to old Canada.

Mr. FISHER. Last year I spoke of cattle coming into Emerson, and was practically told—I do not quote the exact words, but from memory—that only those which were imported for the ranching country were allowed to come in, except through the port of Sarnia.

Mr. CARLING. The hon. gentleman must certainly have misunderstood me.

Mr. FISHER. I did so understand him. But the hon. Minister has convicted himself this minute. He says that referred to old Canada, and I have quoted from St. John, N.B., which is certainly in old Canada, a passage to show that cattle are being received from the United States and money is spent for them. Perhaps the Minister will say no cattle came, but it is evident from the report of the officer that some cattle did come, else why should he want to repair the barn.

Mr. CARLING. Not from the United States.

Mr. FISHER. Excuse me, it says from the United States. This is the report of your own inspector, who receives the instructions of the Government at that station. Does the Minister tell me that his instruction is that no cattle shall be imported from the United States, and then allow this gentleman to spend money on this barn to shelter these cattle?

Mr. WATSON.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There being a quarantine station there, there is nothing to prevent cattle coming from the United States. There is one at Halifax, N.S., and there will be nothing to prevent cattle coming there from the United States.

Mr. FISHER. That is my quarrel with the Minister. He informed me that no cattle were to be allowed to come into Canada, except through Sarnia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is, into old Canada.

Mr. FISHER. Is not St. John, N.B., in old Canada?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, certainly not.

Mr. FISHER. This is a very peculiar piece of reasoning. The reason given last year was that we had a special agreement with the Imperial Government that cattle were to be allowed to come into Canada, subject to proper quarantine regulations at Sarnia, and, when I asked for the quarantine station between Canada and the United States, he informed me that there was an agreement between the Government of Canada and the Imperial authorities. Does the Minister of Finance mean that the Imperial authorities will allow St. John and Halifax to receive cattle from the United States, when it is not to be allowed in Ontario or Quebec? The only reason the Imperial authorities can have for insisting upon the exclusion of these cattle, is to ensure that disease is not imported from the United States, and we are as much interested as they are in that. Our object is to see our cattle are not scheduled in England, and are able to be exported to England without the difficulties which arise in connection with the United States. But whether a quarantine station should be established at St. John, or in the Eastern Townships, at any other place, so long as no disease is imported it is all right. I say that because there is not a quarantine station on the border of the Eastern Townships, there is danger in that neighborhood, because, unfortunately, in consequence of the fact that there is no quarantine, there is a great temptation to import cattle without proper quarantining, and I dare say, the Minister of Customs could tell us something of what has occurred in that connection in that neighborhood. But, I am glad to know that up to the present time no disease has come in. I am glad to know that no disease has been imported, and I trust that no disease will be imported in the future.

Mr. BOWELL. Have you heard of any disease in the Eastern States, Maine and Vermont?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, I am aware of the fact that among Jersey cattle of the Eastern States, there is a hot bed of pleuro-pneumonia, and there is greater danger in the importation of such cattle for breeding purposes than in the importation of short-horns or any other breeds. In consequence of the fact that the population of the Eastern Townships are largely interested in dairying, there is a great desire to import throughbred cattle, to improve the dairying stock. The export trade in cattle is also a very important one in that section, and I think the people should be provided with facilities for importing cattle to improve their stock without being subjected to the danger of importing infected cattle. I drew the attention of the Minister to this matter last year and asked for the establishment of such a station. I only made allusion to these reports here to-night because of the inconsistency between the answer which was then given to me, and the plea that was put forward, and the reports which the Minister now lays before Parliament as to the effect of last year's administration. I believe if the Minister examines this question he will find that there is no agreement with the Imperial authorities which will prevent such an establishment.

Mr. POPE. There is an agreement. It was represented to the Imperial Government that there was no pleuro-pneumonia in the western States, but that it prevailed in the New England States, and in New York there was a great deal of it, and consequently an agreement was made that we might have quarantine at Sarnia, and cattle might be brought in from that section in which it was represented there was no disease, and up to a very short time ago there was no disease in that part of the country. But of late, some diseases have been discovered, and upon these conditions they are allowed quarantine at Sarnia and none from the eastern States where it does not prevail. I know nothing about the report of this gentleman from St. John, but I imagine that a quarantine in St. John was for cattle brought from the United States.

Mr. FISHER. Well, it is evident that this gentleman is ready to import cattle from the United States, and he expects to import them from the United States.

Mr. POPE. He may have done so, but it was without permission.

Mr. FISHER. The Minister of Railways is casting a grave reflection upon the Minister of Agriculture. He virtually intimates that the Minister of Agriculture has been negligent in his duty, but that does not at all bear upon the argument I have made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has stated his argument a half dozen times. As I understand it, he is asking that there should be facilities for introducing pleuro-pneumonia into Canada; in other words, he wants an arrangement made by which cattle can be brought from the United States into the Eastern Townships of Canada. Yet he tells us the eastern States are a hot-bed for pleuro-pneumonia. I think this is hardly worth while taking up the time of the committee at one o'clock in the morning.

Mr. FISHER. I am not going to allow the Minister of Finance to put an argument into my mouth that I never used. He must not think that he is going to carry through his estimates in this fashion, without allowing full discussion. If he does not wish this item discussed at this hour of the night he can leave it over.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Go on.

Mr. FISHER. The Minister of Finance said I wished to import pleuro-pneumonia into this country. The whole aim and object of my remarks are to prevent the importation of pleuro-pneumonia, and I can tell the Minister that if he does not take such precautions as I have pointed out, the time will come when pleuro-pneumonia will be introduced into this country from the eastern States, because the people who wish to import cattle from that region are not allowed facilities for quarantine, and consequently are not able to import cattle from that part of the country without danger to our own cattle, and consequently to our export trade. The Minister may try, as was done last year, to discredit me among the farmers of this country who are interested in the export trade of cattle. Sir, there is nobody in this country who is more interested than I am in the export trade of cattle, or who understands more thoroughly its value to Canada, and it is because I wish to see this preserved, that I express the fear that the negligence of our Government may expose this trade to be destroyed, from the want of facilities to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle from the New England States. When the Minister of Finance goes back to England, if he does not take proper precautions now, when a cargo is landed in England, there will be pleuro-pneumonia in it, and he will be no longer able to boast that that disease does not exist in Canada.

Mr. HESSON. Why do they not establish another port there, if there is danger of importing that kind of disease?

Mr. FISHER. The people in eastern Canada desire to import certain kind of cattle from the United States.

Unfortunately, as is the case in other importations from the United States, there is a tendency to smuggling. I see the Minister of Railways shakes his head, but he knows it only too well.

Mr. POPE. They cannot put an animal into a bandbox and bring it over.

Mr. FISHER. But they can drive them across the frontier without any obstacle, and the Minister of Customs knows that that is done. In consequence of there being no quarantine, these diseased cattle might be brought across the frontier without quarantine, but if there was a quarantine station, that temptation would be done away with, and the people would put them into quarantine, and after the animals had passed a three months' probation there, they could then be passed without danger. That is the reason why I wish a quarantine to be established. It is because I believe that the cattle interests of the Eastern Townships, in the Province of Quebec, are in danger in consequence of this negligence on the part of the Government.

Mr. CARLING. If any cattle have been brought in at St. John, N.B., it must have been done illegally.

Mr. FISHER. I have no objection to their being brought in there. I only alluded to that in consequence of what was advanced as the reason why, last year, a quarantine could not be established in the Eastern Townships.

Mr. BAKER. I want to take this opportunity of impressing upon the Minister of Agriculture the necessity of increasing the salary of the steward of the Quarantine Hospital on Vancouver Island, that poor fellow cannot live on $400 a year. I have requested several times that it should be increased, and I want to place on record the fact that I have asked for it, and then the responsibility must rest on the shoulders of the Minister of Agriculture.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1:15 a.m. (Friday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 3rd June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READING.

Bill (No. 130) to incorporate the Teeswater and Inverhuron Railway Company (from the Senate).—(Mr. Cargill.)

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may mention, for the information of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that the explanation of the point to which he called my attention last night, as to the larger amount paid for comparison than for examination for copying papers arose from the accumulation of transcripts. It was for a larger quantity than those to which the item of copying referred. It covered a large accumulation of previous papers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you mean that it was really an amount for several years' work?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It did not refer to the amount of papers which had been copied. It had no reference to those particular papers, but to a large amount which had accumulated in previous years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood that, but our vote is not very large, $6,000 in all, and it was chiefly intended to pay for copying and acquiring new papers. I can hardly see now how $2,300 can be allowed for comparing documents together.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a very important part of the work. It requires two persons to compare these documents.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you mean merely to secure accuracy in the copy?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In order to secure accuracy. Of course the papers would be valueless unless the accuracy were secured.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is quite true, but one would imagine, judging from our own experience, that you could compare in a vastly shorter time, one person reading and another making the comparison, than the time which would be required to make the copies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This was a previous accumulation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Extending over several years?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Over a considerable period. I cannot state how long.

Mr. JONES. I find that, at a late hour last night, an item was passed respecting the quarantine of cattle in the Maritime Provinces, and, with the permission of the committee, I will refer to some papers which were sent to me on the subject, and will call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would be better to take that up on concurrence.

Mr. JONES. It will not take two minutes. It seems that cattle disease broke out at Tatamagouche, in Colchester county, on the farm of Mr. James Clark. He notified the Government inspector, who visited the farm and pronounced that those cattle were suffering from disease. Instead of their being slaughtered at the time, they remained on the farm, and Mr. Clark contends that his farm was practically quarantined during that time, that he was put to the expense of keeping these cattle all the summer, that he had to feed them until late in the fall, and that the Government should have taken possession of them at first and should have had them slaughtered. After some time, he communicated with the Government through the inspector, Mr. Jakeman, and the Government sent down a valuation of $284.98. Mr. Clark contends that this is not sufficient. He says:

"The cattle could have been slaughtered within ten days after your visit on July 6th, or say about the middle of July, and I claim, in addition to the value put upon my cattle by the Department, compensation for all the trouble and expense I have been put to in consequence of the delay. I will not at present state what I think I ought to receive under this claim. I will do so if the Department desires, or the amount can be estimated by disinterested and competent persons, as the Department may decide. I presume you understand by the foregoing that I am willing to take the value put upon the cattle by the Department, but I want to be paid in addition to that for the additional losses and expenses I have incurred as set out in this letter. As the expenses are increased from day to day, I trust that no time will be lost in bringing the matter to a conclusion."

The owner of the cattle seems to be under the impression that the Government should compensate him for the care and maintenance of those cattle, in consequence of not taking possession and slaughtering them when notice was brought to the question. This has been before the Government for some time, and I should be obliged if the Minister would state what decision has been arrived at in reference to the communication of Mr. Clark on that subject.

Mr. CARLING. My attention has not been brought to the subject, but, if the hon. gentleman will let me have the papers, I shall be glad to bring down the information tomorrow.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the fact that some correspondence has been laid before me in regard to the management of quarantine, during the outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia, last season.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it would be better to let that stand until this item goes up for concurrence. It is very irregular and inconvenient to go back.

Pensions, payable on account of Rebellion of 1885 to militiamen, mounted police, volunteers and scouts..... $30,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a matter which requires a little consideration from the House. None of us here are going to object in the least to the Government making liberal provision for either the parties who were injured, or for the families of persons who were killed in the rebellion, even if it be in an ascending instead of a descending scale. I wish to know on what principle these pensions have been awarded? First of all, I find here an apparent discrepancy which requires special explanations—in the pension which has been assigned to the father of an officer who was killed, and to the mother of another. The cases are these, and I called the Minister's attention to them last Session, but owing to the late period at which I did so, he was not able to give me any explanations. Lieut. Charles Swinford, of the 90th Battalion, died, and I perceive that a pension of $730 a year has been awarded to his father. Turning over the page I perceive that Capt. Brown, of Boulton's mounted infantry, likewise perished in the rebellion, and that his mother, Mrs. Brown, was awarded a pension of $250. Now, here is a discrepancy of a very serious character; it is the more marked because Brown was an officer of a higher rank, and I wish to know on what ground that difference was made, or whether there is any sufficient ground for it at all?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that the rule which has been followed in awarding these pensions, was based upon an Order in Council which was passed, and which was subsequently put in the shape of a General Order and published in the Canada Gazette. The mode of proceeding adopted by the Department was, that all the cases should be submitted to the board, and naturally, in awarding the pensions, the position of the members of the family, if in the case of a man who was killed, was taken into consideration. Now, as it appears, and as the hon. gentleman very properly remarked, between these two cases of Swinford and Brown there is a great discrepancy; but my attention not having been called to these cases, I am not prepared to say upon what ground a higher pension was given to one than to the other.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would my hon. friend pardon me. This is a case to which I called his attention specially one year ago, and if he will turn to Hansard, he will see that I did so, and he was then to have looked up the case and obtain the information, but we proceeded so fast afterwards that he was not able to give it to me. I am aware, of course, that it was from a mere lapse of memory.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The committee will see that unless there is some substantial reason for the difference, a considerable injustice, apparently, has been done to Mrs. Brown, and I would suggest to him that, as he is not prepared to give the information now, he should prepare a memorandum, and lay it on the Table when we go into Committee of Supply next. Although it is informal, I suppose the Minister of Finance will have no objection.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may also state, for the Minister's information, that the two families are not in different circumstances, and that, apparently, there was as much reason for recognising the claims of Mrs. Brown as there was for recognising those of Swinford's relatives. If an unfairness has been committed it may not be too late to remedy it, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will wish to remedy it. Now, I see here a large pension of $1,000 a year, assigned to Capt. Peters, of the 7th. I believe that is very much the largest pension on the list. It is, with the exception of the pension to Mr. Swinford, more than double any other pension on the list. Under what circumstances was the sum of $1,000 assigned to Capt. Peters?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I should feel extremely sorry, in dealing with this matter in which the whole country is interested to such an extent, that any unfairness should be done to any of those who receive pensions awarded for services rendered by those who were killed. I remember now that my attention was called last year, by the hon. gentleman, to the case of Swinford and Brown, and I regret extremely that I forgot to bring down the papers and the reports, which I am under the impression I had prepared at that time, and they will be found ready in the Department; I shall place them upon the Table at the next meeting of the committee. The case of Capt. Peters is one of the most serious which has come under the notice of the commission and the board who were called upon to investigate these cases. Capt. Peters had to submit to an operation, the consequence of which was the amputation of his right arm. He had to go to New York, and for weeks and months he was put to great expense, and had to endure a good deal of suffering from the wound which finally resulted so disastrously to himself. The pension is one of the highest which has been granted. I may say to the hon. gentleman that possibly the board, in examining that case and considering the severe nature of the wound, and the suffering he had undergone, awarded him the highest possible pension that could be granted. But I think that when one comes to consider that for several months he was perfectly helpless in a hospital in the United States where he was undergoing treatment, and where he had to pay a large amount of money out of his own means, and that for months subsequently to the operation he was incapable of discharging any of the ordinary duties which he had followed up to that time, I think we will agree that, under all these circumstances, the pension is not higher than it should have been. But I will bring down the papers at the same time as I bring down those of Captains Swinford and Brown.

Mr. JONES. I desire to ask as to what conclusion has been arrived at with respect to the application made by Lieut. or Capt. Fortune, of the Halifax Battalion. It seems that he has been suffering very severely of late in consequence of an illness contracted during the service of the battalion in the North-West, and, if I am rightly informed, his case has not yet received the consideration of the Department. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will be able to let me know at an early day what course the Government have decided to follow in that case.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The case of Capt. Fortune has been investigated; but, subsequently, and quite lately, he applied to the Department for a further consideration of his case. The mode adopted in regard to all these cases is to refer them to the medical commission, which reports to me. As soon as the report is received the Department will be called upon to act on it. But I will be prepared to bring down whatever papers we have in order to show the hon. member the exact position in which the case stands.

Mr. MULOCK. How comes it that in the case of Mrs. Delaney, whose husband was murdered by the Indians at Frog Lake, she receives a pension of $400 a year, while Mrs. Gowanlock, whose husband was killed at the same time, does not receive any pension? I understand that the reason was that Mr. Delaney was in the service of the Government. Is that the only reason?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The cases of Mrs. Delaney and Mrs. Gowanlock did not come under the Department of Militia and Defence. Those murdered did not belong to the force, and in consequence they are not covered by the cases which can be examined by the Department of Militia and Defence. No doubt the Minister of Indian Affairs can give the information required.

Mr. BARRON. A good deal of feeling has been created in the neighborhood where those people are known, by the circumstance that the widow of Mr. Delaney obtained a pension, and not the widow of Mr. Gowanlock. Those men were both killed at the same time, and both were doing what they could in putting down the insurrection. If the only reason is that Mr. Delaney happened to be in the service of the Government as Indian agent, I do not think it is a sufficient reason to give Mrs. Delaney a pension and refuse a pension to Mrs. Gowanlock. Inasmuch as both were murdered at the same time and while they were both doing the same service, that is, endeavoring to put down the insurrection. I think that Mrs. Gowanlock should be treated in the same way as Mrs. Delaney was treated.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can obtain the information from the Indian Department for the hon. gentleman, but, as I have already explained, it is a case which did not come under the Department of Militia.

Mr. MULOCK. We are now dealing with pensions, and this seems to be the proper time that explanations should be forthcoming.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will obtain the information for the hon. gentleman directly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This amount of $10,000 is distributed under Order in Council, I suppose.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. INNES. With respect to the sum of $10,000, I desire to enquire if the Government have adopted any rule with respect to pensions to families of members of the mounted police, or volunteers to the mounted police, who may have lost their lives. Perhaps the Minister will recollect that, last year, there were several applications made, with one of which I was acquainted. A young man of the name of Middleton, who lived in Prince Albert, and who, at the outbreak of the troubles, volunteered in the mounted police, was killed in the first engagement. An application for a pension was laid before the Government, and though this amount of $10,000 was voted last year for such purpose, nothing, I believe, was done with it, because it was voted for the Militia and the Department retained it, and, in consequence, the money was not appropriated to the purpose for which it was intended. Perhaps the Minister will be able to give some information on the subject.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman will understand that the action of the Department of Militia, in so far as pensions are concerned, is limited altogether by statute, the Department of Militia being allowed to distribute pensions among members of the force. The case mentioned, which I remember perfectly well now that my attention has been called to it, was not the case of a member of the force. If my memory serves me, he was a member of the mounted police force, and the Department of Militia could not deal with his case; but the amount which appears as $10,000 for the mounted police, no doubt, would cover that case and similar cases.

Salaries, Military Branch and District Staff..... $17,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should be glad if the Minister would inform the committee as to what is to be the policy of the Government with reference to the several adjutants general whose terms of office expired, I think, on 1st April.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The policy of the Department, so far, has been to limit as far as possible the expenses of the staff. Hon. gentlemen will understand that for the working of a force such as the militia force of Canada, it is important from every standpoint that the money should go to the rank and file as much as possible, that it should be applied to improving the knowledge of our men in drill, and it is the duty of the Department to reduce the expenses of the staff to the minimum. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that, previous to the time that I took charge of the Department, several training schools for the different branches of the service had been established. We had batteries "A" and "B," and we had infantry schools, which, according to my view, have done very great service in training our men and in training a certain number of men who, at a time of emergency, can be utilised as instructors and as pivot men around whom forts can be organised. It has been found by the Department that, in consequence of having those schools and a permanent staff composed of a commandant and officers who serve under him, it was found possible to do without the deputy adjutants-general and brigade-majors. The duties which have been performed—and I must say, well performed—by these officers, devolved on the commandants of the different schools. So it is that in the military district of New Brunswick, Colonel Maunsell, who is in command of "A" School of Infantry, has also been entrusted with the care of the military district. Under this arrangement it has been found possible for the Department to save the salary, or the greater portion of the salary, of the deputy adjutants-general or the brigade-majors, and administer the military affairs of the district just as efficiently. So it was found with the military district of Toronto, the headquarters of which are the city of Toronto; it was also placed under command of Colonel Otter. And other districts where the same facilities exist, from the fact of our permanent establishments being placed there, have also been placed under the commandants of the different schools. My policy, as far as I can speak on behalf of the Department, is to minimise the expense of the staff, and, in every case where it is possible, to place the military district under the command of the permanent officer at the head of these permanent establishments, and I believe it to be an advantage to the force, an advantage to the district, as well as a saving to the country. My hon. friend knows that a regulation was passed, previous to the time I took charge of the Department, whereby it was decided that after a certain age—63, I think it was—the services of the brigade-majors and the deputy adjutants-general would be dispensed with. I believe it is a policy which should be carried out generally, though not absolutely, because some men at that age may still be in a position to perform their services as efficiently as they had done previously. That, however, is the regulation laid down in the Department, and, as far as possible, it is the intention to carry out that policy.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand quite well that the policy of the Government, as a general thing, has been to fix an age limit of 63, but I notice the hon. gentleman proposes no diminution of this vote, and, therefore, I suppose he does not intend to dispense with the services of any of these gentlemen, until, at any rate, they have reached the age of 63.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, that is it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They will not be dispensed with?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not during the financial year 1888, at any rate.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I need not say that it is only reasonable and right that these gentlemen, to whom, no doubt, it would be a great inconvenience to be turned adrift, should know, as far as possible, what are the intentions of the Government. I understand, therefore, that the hon. gentleman does not propose to dismiss any during 1888?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. DENISON. In connection with the remarks made by the Minister of Militia, I would like to say a word or two, with reference to the report of the Major-General Commanding the Militia Force of Canada. In looking over his report, I find that he makes use of the following words:—

"I also again strongly recommend that all officers of the permanent corps should be senior of their respective ranks to all other militia officers. With regard to this it is only just towards officers who give up their time wholly to the military service of the Dominion. Moreover, in the case of active service in the field, the present system might be found to work very awkwardly."

Now, I strongly object to this idea. It is one borrowed slavishly from the English system. But the two systems are entirely dissimilar. In England there is the volunteer force, next the militia, and then the regular army. The English volunteers or militia are not intended to take part, and have not taken part, in England's wars for 200 or 300 years; and though it was not a standing army that laid the foundation of English greatness in the battles of Cressy, Poitiers and Agincourt, still the regular army are now serving in every quarter of the globe. Great Britain has many small wars where the regular officer gains an experience that is not open to the English volunteer or militiaman, as in Zululand, Afghanistan, India, Egypt, Ashantee. This may justify such regulations as these in England; but in Canada it is entirely different. Here the militia of Canada is the first line. The moment any trouble arises in Canada, the militia are at once called out, and serve alongside the permanent corps. Our militia was out in 1775, in 1812, 1837, 1866, 1870, and in the North-West affair of 1885. On entering that campaign the permanent officers had no more experience than the militia officers—many not as much. Then, why should one be given a preference over another? Surely not because the permanent officer had paraded every day round the barrack square, had each day inspected the kitchens and the cells. That does not make a better soldier, and that is the only class of experience in which the permanent corps would have the advantage over the regular militia. As Sir Henry M. Lawrence, K.C.B., Commander-in-chief in Oude in 1856, says:

"It is not elementary knowledge, such as barrack life or regimental parades can give, that is most essential to a commander. It is good sense, energy, thoughtfulness and familiarity with independent action. It is not by three times a day seeing soldiers eat their rations, or by marching round barrack squares, that officers learn to be soldiers."

The militia officers are generally among the foremost men in their county. They make great sacrifices; they raise the men, expend their own means, give their time, and they cost the country practically nothing, while permanent officers make their living out of the country, are well paid and provided for. The country is under great obligations to the militia officers, but under none to the permanent ones. If any favor is to be granted to either class the militiaman should get it, and certainly nothing should be done in the direction pointed out by the Major-General. Then, again, the report says:

"Before leaving the subject of the schools, I would beg to point out that the time is drawing near, if it has not already arrived, when the Dominion Government must reconsider their organisation and status. All the colonies are beginning to find out that without some standing or regular force it is impossible to organise a system of defence, and all are establishing some such force. The schools of instruction in this country now represent its regular force, and I venture to think that it is beginning to be time for the country to consider if it would not be advantageous to increase that force with a corresponding decrease in the militia force (which latter I shall refer to later on), and recognise it as their regular force. As regards the rank and file, their position is clear enough, as they are enlisted for three years, and can be taken on if necessary; but the officers hold their appointments at pleasure only, have the same commissions as the other militia officers, no hope of pension however long and meritorious their service may be, and have very little chance of promotion. Hitherto there has been no difficulty, as the result has proved, in obtaining excellent men for these appointments, but as time goes on, and officers find that after severing themselves completely from their professions or appointments in civil life, they are retired and relegated to private life without any pension, I venture to think that the supply of really good men will cease. Of course, I am aware that any such change as sketched above would necessarily require consideration, and be the work of time, and in the meanwhile I would again recommend an immediate increase."

I differ entirely from this view, and hold that the exactly opposite course should be taken. The schools should be kept down to the lowest limit, only sufficient being maintained to instruct the officers and non-commissioned officers desiring a course; and as large a force of militia should be kept up as possible. What earthly use would a permanent force of 1,000 men, or even 3,000, in a war, for instance, with our neighbors? None whatever; but if we had a militia force of 100,000 men, organised with good officers, clothing, arms, &c., there would be the skeleton, that could be at once increased to 300,000, most of whom would be men who had served in the ranks, by merely increasing the service roll per company from 42 to 125. In Europe the idea is to have the people all trained to serve their country; all are taught that they owe a duty to the State. France and Germany are armed nations, and, in my humble judgment, that is the proper system. The nearer we can approach that, without being burdensome on the people, the better. I contend that our militia force should be at once increased to 50,000 men. They should be drilled for 16 days at the least. The idea ought to be scouted of going backwards by reducing our strength. On the other hand we should encourage and foster, in every way possible, a military spirit among our people. It is not in the interest of a young country to have a large standing army, a class of idlers not producing anything—drones in the hive. After a man has enlisted he may acquire some fresh knowledge for three months or, say, a year; but after that he goes through his work daily in a mechanical way, and after 20 years' service may know no more drill than a recruit of some weeks, or be any more useful. As Major-General Middleton properly says, the force should be drilled for 16 days every year; but he recommends that the force should be reduced to carry that out. On page 25, he says:

"As I have said before, for the force to be at all efficient every soldier should be called out at least for 16 days every year of his service. By this means a stream of fairly trained men would be poured out over the country, who could, in cases of emergency, be re-enrolled and take, with very little difficulty, their places in the ranks. Now, the only means of doing this would be by a reduction of the number, a reduction which could, I am sure, be made without difficulty, if it can be done legally. Moreover, it will certainly be necessary to form regiments in the North-West, an additional reason why a reduction should take place, unless more money is granted for the Department. It may be that the Dominion is bound by treaty with the Imperial Government to keep up a certain militia force, but I venture to think there would be little difficulty in arranging for a reduction of the actual number if it could be shown that it would be more advantageous to have a larger force regularly enlisted and less militia."

Now, I contend that we do not have enough money spent upon the militia. It was understood that $1,000,000 at least should be expended upon the militia every year; but that amount was reduced under the Mackenzie Government in 1875-76 to $978,530; in 1876-77, it was still further reduced to $550,451; in 1877-78, $618,136 was devoted to the militia; in 1878-79, $777,698; in 1879-80, $690,018; in 1880-81, $667,000; in 1881-82 $772,811; in 1882-83, $734,354; in 1883-84, $939,498; and in 1884-85, it jumped up to $2,707,757, on account of the North-West rebellion. These figures show that each Government, when they want to reduce expenditure, commence with the militia estimates. That is not right. The present system of drilling the rural corps every other year, was a make-shift originated by the Mackenzie Government, and continued by the present Government; and though a much better plan than reducing the militia, still it would not take a large sum to drill them every year, and they ought to be treated in the same manner as the city corps. They require the drill every year more, being scattered, and not as easily brought together as a city corps. An increase of 25 per cent. spent in drill pay would enable the Government to drill double the force. In conclusion, I would strongly urge upon the Government not to commit an injustice upon the officers of the militia by reducing their rank in favor of the permanent officers, or to follow the Major-General's suggestion of reducing the militia for the sake of raising a standing army. There is no item in the Estimates less objected to by the public, than that for the militia. There is no outlay so evenly distributed throughout the country.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to call the attention of the Government to the very unfortunate position in which the militia staff are placed under existing regulations. I quite agree with my hon. friend from Toronto (Mr. Denison) in his criticism on the evident intention of certain authorities to place the permanent corps in a different position from that of the militia, and I quite agree with him in the sentiments he has expressed on the subject. I, for one, will always protest strongly against anything being done which would make the permanent corps anything more than Parliament intended them to be when they were formed, that is, simple schools of instruction. With regard to the militia staff, I think the five years limit is not judicious in the circumstances of this country. If you appoint a man to the position of deputy adjutant-general or brigade-major in one of the large districts, it will take him most of the five years to get acquainted with the officers, so that it will be only towards the close of his term that he will be in a position to efficiently perform his duties. In England the case is different, because when a man is through with his staff appointment, he goes back to his regiment; he can give up the appointment at any time, and he loses nothing by it. The positions on the militia staff not being permanent, those who hold them have nothing to fall back upon once they leave the service, and I think some regulation ought to be made by which the staff, whether that which now exists in the various districts, or that which is being formed in the permanent corps, should be placed at least in no worse position than that of the ordinary Civil Service of the country. They are now in a comparatively worse position, their salaries are lower for the duties they perform than other branches of the Civil Service, and they have nothing to fall back upon. I drew the attention of the Minister to two or three cases of hardship in the 2nd military district. One was the case of a brigade major, who was retired, a gentleman who had served faithfully and honorably his country in various positions, who gave his life for the service of his country, and who is now in a state, I do not like to say of actual pauperism, but something like it. The gratuity he receives is a trifle in comparison with the position he occupied and with the service he rendered. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) may know to whom I refer. This gentleman is now thrown adrift, though in the full possession of all his faculties and as well able to do his duty as ever. His case is a monument of the sort of treatment the staff may expect at the hands of the Government. This ought not to be. If the country can afford to have a military service, it can afford to treat those employed in it in the same way as those employed in any other branch.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am sure the members of the House must feel very much interested in the remarks which fell from my hon. friend, the member for Toronto West (Mr. Denison), who, we all know, is one of the distinguished members of the militia force of Canada, and who distinguished himself, not only in Canada, but in the Soudan. I wish it to be thoroughly understood that, in so far as my views are concerned, I fully agree with the hon. gentleman that a standing army would be altogether out of place in a country like Canada. The permanent corps which are established, the hon. gentleman very well stated, are merely for instructional purposes, and we found the benefit of having such corps from the fact that every year we turn out a number of trained men, who, at a given moment, may render valuable services to the country. I beg to differ with the hon. gentleman in the interpretation placed by him upon the report of the general officer commanding the forces. I do not read the report as the hon. gentleman does. I take it that, in comparing our system with the system of other colonies and other countries, the general desired to draw the attention of Canada to the fact that other countries have found it necessary to establish, as we have in Canada, some permanent corps as a nucleus which would be looked upon, call them by whatever name you may, as permanent corps or the beginning of an army; but the major-general, as I understand, does not desire to replace our militia system by a different one. He does not wish to replace the militia force by a permanent or standing army, and I am sure such views would not be entertained by the Parliament of Canada. In so far as I am concerned, I would be the last man to advocate a change of system. My hon. friend for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien) has drawn attention to the staff. Well, the money voted for militia purposes, although apparently a large amount, is certainly just as small an amount as can be possibly voted for the purpose of keeping up the number of men we have in the force, and I have endeavored to reduce the expenses of the staff so as to give the money voted by Parliament to the rank and file, and to utilise it for the purpose of giving as much instruction as possible to the soldiers. Members of the staff have to be retired after a certain time, under regulations which were passed before I took control of the Department; and in many cases, and in the one just stated, the highest possible gratuity is given to the gentleman who retired. The amount may be considered insufficient, but with the amount placed by Parliament at the disposal of the Militia Department, it was impossible to deal more liberally with the gentleman referred to.

Mr. JONES. I quite realise the difficulty the hon. the Minister of Militia has in dealing with the subject referred to by the hon. member for Muskoka (Mr. O'Brien); but at the same time, it does appear to me to be a very hard case, indeed, that a gentleman occupying the position which this gentleman occupied in the Imperial service, a gentleman who served during the Crimean War and took a position in the militia at Halifax before Confederation, under the impression that it was a permanent position, and who otherwise would not have left his regiment at the time he did, should have been treated in this way. I do not mean to say there was a promise, but the understanding which prevailed in Nova Scotia at that time—and the hon. the Minister of Finance will bear me out in this—was that such positions would be considered permanent. I venture to think, therefore, that the position of this gentleman is different from that of those who have joined the service since Confederation and I would ask the Minister of Militia whether, in view of this understanding, he should not consider this retired officer in the light of other public servants who, at a certain age, received pensions for their services in the Province of Nova Scotia, previous to the Union. I agree in what fell from the hon. member for Toronto (Mr. Denison) with regard to the militia, and I am glad to hear the Minister of Militia give such an emphatic expression of opinion in regard to the determination of the Government not to increase the permanent force of the country. I have always thought that we should spend as much money as we can afford in educating such a number of sergeants of the ordinary militia as would be available if the militia were ever called out. However, that matter perhaps should not be discussed here to day; but there is one item in the major-general's report to which the Minister of Militia did not refer, and to which the hon. member for Toronto referred. That hon. gentleman said that possibly the Dominion is bound by treaty with the Imperial Government to keep up a certain military force. I am not aware of any treaty existing with regard to our obligations to keep up a military force, though it is quite true that when the ordnance and forts were handed over to us, there was the implied understanding that we would keep them in good order, which we have always done. Perhaps the hon. the Minister of Militia will give us his opinion, and, in the meantime, I would ask him to again consider the case referred to by the hon. member for Muskoka.

Mr. DENISON. I do not think I used the word "treaty." I think I used the word "understanding."

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the right hon. the First Minister will state to the House what the understanding is on that subject.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes; I am going to do so. My hon. friend behind me is quite correct in stating that there was an understanding, though there was no treaty, but, at the time of the negotiations before Confederation, in regard to the contribution that Canada would make to the general defence, it was understood by Her Majesty's Government, Lord Palmerston being then the Premier, and the delegation to England being Sir George Cartier, Sir Alexander Galt, Mr. George Brown, and myself. An arrangement was made, and the result appears in the blue-book, that we would keep up the fortifications required in good order. At that time Confederation was looming in the near distance.

Mr. JONES. Unfortunately.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. But it was understood at the same time that an amount of at least $1,000,000 a year should be expended by Canada in maintaining our defensive force, and that was considered to be merely a temporary arrangement until Confederation took place. But that has been always adhered to, and we have taken at least a million a year to keep up the militia force in Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the conclusion is right, but, to make his point good, the First Minister must take the view which I took, and which I think is a just one, that we are entitled to add the charge for mounted police in the North-West to the charge for the militia, and if that is done we have fulfilled our agreement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have really done that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have always maintained that, in computing the amount spent for militia, we should add the cost of the mounted police in the North-West; and, if that be done, our obligation, as the hon. gentleman puts it, would be very fully met, but not otherwise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It has been fully met without that, not perhaps within a pound or two, but substantially we have really expended a considerable amount of money, year after year, in keeping up the military force. Whether that has been wisely or unwisely expended, it is for military men to say—I am not a judge of that. The hon. gentleman behind the member for South Oxford, when he was Minister of Militia, discharged the duties most satisfactorily. I think we had occasion to say across the floor that we could not find much cause of criticism in the way in which he managed that Department. As far as the mounted police are concerned, they are really a military force.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That force is composed of a thousand men and is one of the finest corps in the world, and will challenge comparison with any force of cavalry in the world. They can be sent anywhere in case of war or disturbance or apprehension. They can be sent anywhere, but the primary object of establishing that force was not to make it a portion of the militia, but to make it a mounted constabulary, to keep peace and introduce law and order among the Indians in that portion of the Dominion. They performed the duty of a constabulary in time of peace, and in time of war they are an efficient military corps. I, therefore, agree that they may be considered in spirit a substantial addition to our military force, and in reckoning with the Mother Country as to our contribution to the military defence of Canada, we can fairly and honestly credit ourselves with the expenditure for the mounted police as a portion of our contribution to the military defence of the Empire.

Mr. JONES. Nevertheless, from what the hon. gentleman has said, I think the understanding which he says was arrived at was with the Old Province of Canada and not with the Dominion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, it was in 1865.

Mr. JONES. But it says in the report that the Dominion is bound by that arrangement. Of course, I understood what the hon. gentleman has explained, but there was no understanding with the Dominion, as far as I know.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I was very much interested in reading the report of the major-general. It is full of information, but, of course, I would not undertake to assume the responsibility of every expression which is used in that report. The understanding has been explained by the leader of the Government, and no hon. member can better give the explanation than he has done. He knows all the circumstances connected with it, and was in England with other members of the Government at that time when the understanding was arrived at. The hon. gentleman has called my attention to the case of one of the members of the staff. I believe he refers to the case of Lieut.-Col. Milson. That gentleman was a distinguished officer who left the British service to accept service in the Canadian militia, and, in dealing with his case, attention was paid to the fact of his long service and also to the fact that when he entered the Canadian service he might not have been under the impression that it was not to be a permanency. He was, therefore, kept on four or five years beyond the limit of time which he could expect to be kept on, and the largest possible gratuity was granted to him on retirement. As I have already explained to the House, it is impossible, with the money which is placed at the disposal of the Department, and the policy which has been adopted, to make any distinction between the different members of the staff who are retired. The case of this gentleman was considered from that standpoint, and every possible allowance was made for him.

Mr. MADILL. I hope the policy of the Government will be more liberal and generous than it has been in the past. I hope that more attention will be paid to rural battalions. I think the rural battalions have not received the consideration to which they are entitled, and I think that, if the amount could be increased so as to allow the rural battalions to have an annual drill, it would render them more efficient than they can possibly become when they are only called out once every two years.

Ammunition, clothing and military stores..... $205,000

Mr. LISTER. In reference to the item of $90,000 for clothing and great coats, I would ask the Minister whether the tunics and trousers are contracted for by the same contractor?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The clothing is all given out by contract. Tenders are called for, and invariably the lowest tenderer has received the contract. In some instances the tunics and trousers have been made by one contractor, but, as a rule, the contractors have contracted for tunics independently of trousers and great coats.

Mr. LISTER. Independently? Well, I do not rise for the purpose of making any charges, but simply to call the Minister's attention to a matter which has been represented to me, and which I promised to bring up. During the last year great complaints were made by the men as to the quality of the clothing of the trousers, and as to the manner in which they were made. The clothing is said to have been very bad, and it was worn out in a few days. Having called the Minister's attention to this, I hope there will be no reason for complaint in the future.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am very glad my attention has been called to it, but I must tell the hon. gentleman that we have received no complaint whatever in the Department from any portion of the Dominion in reference to the quality of the cloth, or to the making up.

Mr. LISTER. The complaint was made by members of the Sarnia company, who say that the cloth was simply execrable.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I would remind the hon. gentleman that in consequence of the troubles in the North-West, we had to order at a moment's notice an extraordinary number, compared with what we generally order, of tunics and trousers, and suits, in fact, for the force. They had to be made up in a great hurry, and when the troubles were over, naturally they were served out to the force, and in a good many instances it is possible that they may not have been just as perfect as the Department would have liked.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I happened to look at the report of Lieut.-Col. Aylmer—is that the one my hon. friend refers to?—and I find this under the item of clothing: "The trousers issued to certain privates' in this district this year did not last out the twelve days training, they were made from such an inferior material." This is Appendix No. 2, Militia Office, London, signed by Lieut.-Col. Aylmer.

Mr. LISTER. Lieut.-Col. Aylmer had nothing to do with it, I received no information whatever from him; but it was the men under his command last year who complained of it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would call the Minister's attention to the fact that the deputy adjutant-general of Militia District No. 1, makes this a special subject of complaint. Whatever may be said there is no economy in serving out such an article. How many suits does the hon. gentleman propose to issue out of this vote?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We have 5,500 uniforms at an average cost of $5 each, and 600 great coats at an average cost of $5.83.

Mr. JONES. I may mention that during the time I had the honor of administering the Department—which I am pleased to hear gave satisfaction to my hon. friends opposite—the custom of the Department was, if I remember rightly, to order the militia clothing from England. So far as my memory serves me, we found difficulty in getting sufficient clothing of a uniform color, both the scarlet and the blue. In the first place, there was always a different shade perceptible in the different suits, and when they came to be placed together it was found that the English clothing would last much longer than a suit of Canadian clothing made from Canadian manufacture. At that time there was a marked difference, and the English clothing was superior in style and in lasting qualities as well. All these advantages prevailed at that time, and if they still prevail, it appears to me that it would be in the interest of the Department to order their clothing from England, where you have such a large field to choose from, and where so much clothing is made for the army, and which must necessarily, under all these circumstances, have a great advantage over what our small manufacturers could produce in this country, even if they are doing their very best to carry out the contract. They suffer under the disadvantage of not being able to get material, and they only manufacture a certain number, whereas, in England, they are manufacturing very large quantities and can produce it very much cheaper. I venture still to hold to the opinion that it would be very much in the public interest if the clothing was ordered from England, instead of being manufactured in this country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. From my experience in the Department, I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman. The clothing which is manufactured in Canada is considered superior by all those who have had some experience in the Department. The adjutant-general, the inspector of clothing, and all the other officers who have charge of that branch of the Department, consider it far superior, in so far as lasting qualities are concerned, to any of the clothing which we imported from England. At first, it is true, there was some difficulty in getting the colors just as perfect as we have succeeded in getting them since; but at present I believe there is a consensus of opinion that even the scarlet color cannot be surpassed, and my hon. friend knows how difficult it was to get, outside of England, the scarlet cloth which was required for the scarlet uniforms. But since that time we have succeeded in getting in Canada cloth fully equal, and even superior in quality, to anything imported from England, and the color is considered very good indeed. Under these circumstances it became important that the large amount of money which was expended every year by Canada, should be expended in Canada if it was possible to do so; and I have endeavored, as far as possible, to have all the clothing made in Canada. In so far as quality is concerned, it lasts longer than anything we have been able to import from England.

Mr. JONES. These same remarks would apply, I suppose, to the ammunition manufactured at Quebec. I was spoken to upon the subject by several gentlemen connected with the militia service in my own Province, who informed me that the ammunition manufactured at Quebec is very inferior to the ammunition formerly obtained from the Imperial Government, that for target practice it was practically useless, and they could not depend upon it as being regular or effective. They said, naturally, that under these circumstances it was unfortunate that the Government should attempt to manufacture here, possibly at a greater expense, an article which they could procure from the Imperial Government of a much more uniform and superior quality. I am only giving the opinions I have heard expressed. Of course, the Minister knows best about this matter. It appears to me that the same objection would apply to making a small quantity of ammunition as would apply to the clothing.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am free to admit that at first we had some difficulty to contend against, as usually occurs in establishing a factory like the ammunition factory at Quebec. Reports have been made at different times, and in reading the reports from the Department of Militia, the hon. gentleman will find that we went to a great deal of trouble in getting commissions composed of the men best known among those who take an interest in rifle practice, to study the whole question and to report to the Department. For some time past, about eighteen months, the reports are quite satisfactory.

Mr. JONES. What about the cost?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will come to that point in a moment. I will point out another difficulty. Most of our volunteers are armed with the Enfield rifle, and, owing to the adoption of the Martini-Henry in England, the Imperial factories have discontinued manufacturing cartridges for the Enfield; consequently it became a necessity for Canada either to give up the present arm or have a factory of our own. We provide by this vote for the manufacture of two millions of rounds of ball cartridge, at the rate of $20 per M. for ball cartridge and $10 per M. for blank cartridge. That is to be served out on the repayment system, the money being returned to the Department in the shape of a refund by the different rifle associations which receive our ammunition.

Mr. JONES. I observe that the major-general recommends that more ammunition should be served out for target practice.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes, he does so.

Mr. JONES. Do you intend to increase the allowance?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Not this year.

Mr. CASEY. There was a pretty good discussion last year on the question of ammunition. Defects arose from three causes: first, lack of accuracy in the machine which measures the powder; second, lack of accuracy in the shape of the bullet; third, lack of uniformity in the quality of the powder. The powder at that time was obtained from the Hamilton Powder Company without sample or specification. It was afterwards found to be unsatisfactory, and a certain quantity of Waltham Abbey powder was imported. That was found to work much more satisfactorily. I think the Minister undertook last year to have the powder ordered by sample or specification. I desire to enquire whether the Department are using Waltham Abbey powder or Hamilton powder; and if the latter, whether it is purchased by specification or sample, or what are the means taken to secure uniformity. At the same time I may say that I have not heard so many complaints lately as regards the ammunition as we did last year and the year of the unfortunate troubles in the North-West, when the quality of the ammunition was of more consequence.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The trouble, as has been pointed out by the hon. gentleman, arose more from the powder, than from anything else. We followed up the suggestions made last Session and endeavored to have the powder manufactured in Canada upon specification. But it was again found unsatisfactory, and we had to go back to English powder. We are now manufacturing ammunition with English powder, and our ammunition is being found to be fully equal if not superior to anything we imported from England, thus showing distinctly that the difficulty was with the powder in making up the cartridges.

Mr. CASEY. I suppose these defects to which I have referred have been corrected?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They have all been rectified.

Mr. CASEY. I am glad to hear that, and I would urge on the Minister the desirability of carrying out the suggestion of the major-general with respect to increasing the quantity of ammunition for practice purposes. It was proved very conclusively during the North-West disturbances that the best training we could give our volunteers was to train them to shoot accurately. Nearly all modern warfare depends upon the troops being able to shoot accurately. A great many of our country volunteers cannot afford to buy ammunition for practice, and unless there is a very considerable amount issued for practice they will not get practical training in rifle shooting. I witnessed great waste of ammunition by small squads and also at brigade camp. In my opinion members on this side of the House would have no objection to a larger vote being given for ammunition for target practice.

Drill Instruction $290,000.

Mr. CASEY. With respect to the item of $40,000 I suppose that is the old item for drill instruction which goes to the companies. It is really not a payment for drill instruction, because it is given to commanders of companies whether there has been any drill instruction or not during the year, and it is practically an amount to enable captains to maintain their contributions to the band and other funds, except in cases where the captain chooses to put it in his own pocket. The Minister, in past years, admitted that this was an indefensible item as it stood, and, if it was to be continued, it should be placed under its proper heading as an allowance to commanders of companies for the purposes I have indicated. I would now ask what the Minister intends to do about it.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have been generally improving in this particular. I have reduced the allowance, and in any case where the corps has not gone out for annual drill only one-half the allowance has been paid, $20 instead of $40. The hon. gentleman is aware of the difficulties with which officers commanding rural battalions have to contend, and I must admit that the item might properly be placed under a different heading, but I am not prepared to admit that it would be good policy to strike it out of the Estimates and refuse to give that contribution to officers who at much trouble and expense to themselves, and more especially in the case of rural corps, have succeeded in maintaining their battalion. That is the reason I am in favor of its retention, but I fully admit that the heading might be different. The Department have considered it very seriously on more than one occasion, and I have concluded it would have a very bad effect if we were to deprive the commandants of the rural battalions of that help which the Government affords them.

Mr. CASEY. If the Minister will put it under any head which would increase the pay of the officers to this extent, so as to relieve the officers of the expense of putting it under the proper head, I would not object to it, because I know at least as well as the Minister what difficulties and expense the rural officers are called upon to undergo. I do not want to deprive them of the money, but I think nothing is gained by putting it under a misleading heading in the Estimates.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I entirely disagree with the Minister in the view he takes of this payment, and I have pointed out to him on several occasions the way in which it should be made. I think it is properly given for drill instruction, and should be given for drill instruction; but there should be certain conditions, as I have explained once or twice before, on which the payment should be made, so that the country would get value for the money. What I complain of is that the captain of a rural company, who does nothing at all from one year's end to another, who never sees his company, or takes the slightest trouble with it, is exactly in the same position with regard to this grant as the man who drills his company whenever he gets the opportunity. Now, I say there is a practical way of overcoming the difficulty. It is hardly worth while taking up the time of the House by going into it now, but anyone can see that when a regiment goes to camp there can be no difficulty in having an inspection of each company; and only the captains of those companies that show a certain percentage of men up to a certain point of efficiency should receive the money.

Mr. CASEY. That is payment by results.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Yes, on the same principle as the capitulation grant is given to the English volunteers. There is no practical difficulty about it, and I think, taking that view of the case, a reduction should not be made during the years the men do not go to camp, for that is the very time the captain should devote himself to his company and be able to show that he does something for his money. Of course, as long as we are in the ridiculous position we are in now, of only calling the rural battalions out every second year, the matter is of little consequence, but I hope the country will insist on the Government making a change in that respect. I think it is grossly unfair that the city battalions should get pay for each year, when the rural battalions, which are every bit as efficient and turn out just as promptly, should not be treated in the same way. They cannot keep up their band funds, or their ordinary expenditure under the present system, and are laboring under the greatest possible disadvantage, so long as the Government of the country chooses to keep them in that position. Apart from that, if a system of inspection was adopted, and the captain or instructor of a company got the money according to the condition in which the company was found, then the money would be fairly and properly applied; but I do not believe in giving a man $40 simply as a fee, when I know that he does nothing whatever to earn it. More than that, I say that the colonel of a rural battalion has no power over the payments; he may know that one-half of his men do not earn the money and the other half do earn it, and he has the mortification of seeing his most inefficient captains placed exactly in the same position as the efficient ones.

Contingencies, &c., including grants to artillery and rifle associations and bands of efficient corps $38,000

Mr. DAVIES. On this vote I wish to ask for some information from the Minister, upon a matter affecting the rifle teams which come to Ottawa yearly to the shooting matches. By some inexplicable oversight on the part of some official, those teams have not been treated as I think they ought to be treated. In the year 1885 the team from Prince Edward Island came to the shooting match here, and received second-class fares on the Intercolonial Railway, while their comrades from the adjoining Provinces travelled first class on the same train, and, of course, had the advantage of the Pullman sleeper. The hon. gentleman knows how impossible it is for a man who has been sitting in a second-class railway car for two nights, to compete at a shooting match on the following morning, and these men had to march to the ground as soon as they arrived and take part in the match. In the year 1886, the non-commissioned officers and men of that team received a second-class single fare, while their comrades from the two adjoining Provinces travelled upon the same train on first-class return fares. Of course, I am aware that this is an oversight on the part of somebody, and I am sure that, if brought to the notice of the Minister, he will see that it does not occur again. The Minister knows that these small matters create a great deal of dissatisfaction, and the teams from the various Provinces should, I think, be all put on the same footing. I wish to ask, also, if it is not possible to have a clear, distinct understanding that the men travelling to these matches should have passes over the Intercolonial Railway. I can't see why there should be any question about it.

Mr. POPE. I suppose you can't.

Mr. DAVIES. Perhaps the Minister can, and if he does I hope he will be able to tell why he sees any difficulty in the way. He is exceedingly wise, but he is also exceedingly curt in his answers and not very courteous. Let me tell him that, while I am making a complaint which I think is well founded, and which I am sure the Minister of Militia acknowledges is well founded, I think I might be treated with a little more courtesy by the hon. Minister of Railways. I may say that the men were treated very handsomely after their arrival, but they desired me to bring these facts before the notice of the Minister so that nothing of the kind may occur again.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My attention has already been drawn to this matter, but only quite lately. I must tell the hon. gentleman that the rifle association is really not under the control of my Department. It is an independent organisation, but the Government to help in what they consider to be of very great value to our militia organisation gives a certain amount of money per annum to help the rifle association to carry on their rifle practice, and also, as my hon. friend knows, contributes a handsome amount towards sending a team to England to Shoeburyness for the artillery matches, and to Wimbledon for the rifle matches. I did not consider, in the case of the men who came from Prince Edward Island, and I believe some of the other Maritime Provinces, that the Department of Militia should be called upon to contribute any transport money to those who came up to compete at our annual matches at Ottawa. This case, however, was represented to me very strongly, and last year and the year before I consented to contribute towards the transportation of the men who came up here to compete. I was sorry to hear that some of the men got second-class tickets, or were not treated in the same way as the other men who came here. That I am not responsible for, and when the matter was represented to me, I promised that so far as I could I would try to make up the deficiency these men complained of, so that all who come here should be placed on a footing of equality. Whether the system is to be continued in the future or abandoned is another thing. But I would inform the hon. gentleman that the rifle association is quite an outside organisation, the only responsibility incurred in by the Department of Militia in connection with it being to contribute a certain amount, with the sanction of Parliament, towards the expense of sending a team to England.

Mr. TUPPER. I wish to join with my hon. friend from Queen's, P.E.I., in pressing this matter upon the attention of the Government, not merely with the view of having the riflemen from Prince Edward Island placed on the same footing as those from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, but with the view of having all the riflemen from the Maritime Provinces placed on a better footing in regard to the competition held at Ottawa every year. It is extremely annoying to the riflemen every year to be obliged to go through the form of pressing both the Department of Railways and Canals and the Department of Militia, to afford them facilities in the way of transport. I understand that the difficulty is between those two Departments. The hon. Minister of Militia states that he does not feel warranted in spending money in payment for the transport of these riflemen. Well, there is no necessity, it seems to me, for his spending any money. If the Government will take the matter up and deal with it independently of those two Departments, they could arrange that the riflemen coming every year to Ottawa shall have passes on the Government railway. I think the riflemen are fully entitled to make this request. The riflemen of Canada make considerable sacrifices. The pursuit is a luxury with some, but many of them go into it with a very proper spirit, which I think should be encouraged, and this encouragement would cost very little to the country.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Last Session, during the discussion on the Estimates, I called the attention of the Minister of Militia to this question of providing passes over the Intercolonial Railway to the riflemen coming to Ottawa, and I understood the hon. gentleman to promise that some arrangement would be made. I do not blame him, for I think he has done all he could, but I think the men are fairly entitled to passes. They come here at great sacrifice and inconvenience to themselves.

Mr. JONES. This difficulty is just owing to a little piece of red-tapeism in the Railway Department, which I think should be put an end to. The hon. Minister of Railways is laughing; but I understand that, of late years, when these militiamen have come to Ottawa, the obtaining of passes for them has been a subject of negotiation, sometimes for a week or more, between the members for the counties and the authorities at Ottawa; and the passes are apparently granted as a matter of favor. They are no favor at all; they are a matter of right, and when they are asked for they should be given without any delay or hesitation whatever. I trust that after this discussion the Minister of Railways will have an order issued that those people who are selected to come up to the annual competition at Ottawa shall be entitled to their passes, without having to go through all the trouble and inconvenience and delay which have hitherto attended their application.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman is undoubtedly mistaken if he thinks that any change will be made by the Department of Railways in this respect. The men from Manitoba and Ontario, who come here, all pay their own way. I have always been glad to make arrangements for the transport of these people to Ottawa by reducing the rates; but it is not within the province of my Department to bring them free, or to bring those from Manitoba or Ontario free, who pay their own way.

Mr. JONES. But there are no Government roads there.

Mr. POPE. I am willing to meet them as far as I can in the way of reducing the rates.

Mr. DAVIES. There was no suggestion made that the hon. gentleman should pay the passage of any of the men from distant Provinces over the Grand Trunk or other roads; but I think that the circumstances that they live so far away, and have to travel so much farther than the volunteers of Ontario, ought to be taken into consideration. But as it costs nothing at all to the Government to give passes over the Government railway, I think it would be a gracious act on the part of the Department to give passes to these young men, who are anxious to attend the central match at Ottawa, and have to travel a thousand miles to get here.

Mr. TUPPER. I might suggest to the hon. Minister as an argument to strengthen the request—which I am glad to see none of the members from the other Provinces have raised any objection to—that is the rule in Australia, where there are Government railways, to give passes to all the officers of Her Majesty's ships from time to time stationed there, which I think is some authority to justify our Government in treating our own defenders as well as the Australian Government treat their defenders from the Mother Country.

Contingencies and general services not otherwise provided for, including grants to Artillery and Rifle Associations and Bands of efficient corps $38,000

Mr. CASEY. In regard to this I would like to have an explanation from the hon. gentleman. I hold that proof that a certain amount of work has been done should be exacted from the local rifle associations to which grants are made, and that the grants should be in some correct proportion to the amount of work done. The information asked for should contain the number of competitors at each meeting, the amounts of subscription obtained, &c. In some places, it has been the practice to form the same persons into two or three rifle associations, and obtain a grant for each. In this city there are the Wimbledon association and the Guards rifle association, and two of other battalions, all said to be largely composed of the same individuals. Of course, it is impossible to provide that no member of one association shall belong to another, but I think a list of the members of each of the associations should be demanded by the Department, so that there would be no glaring abuse of the system. In this way the Department might save grants and apply them to other places.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The system followed is that those rifle associations are reported by the officer of the Department, and if they are considered to be organised according to the rules, the amount of money is granted according to the number of members. I do not believe the abuse which the hon. gentleman refers to exists to any great extent. However, his suggestion is a good one, which I will be glad to look into and see if we can improve on the present system.

Mr. CASEY. I had positive information that in this city there were three organisations a few years ago—I do not know if they are all alive now—substantially composed of the same persons, and I have reliable information that the same abuse exists in other cities in Canada.

Royal Military College at Kingston $59,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has the hon. the Minister got the return I asked from the Minister of Justice as to certain fines or payments of $100 each exacted from a number of the cadets who left the college to accept commissions in the Royal army, and as to what the Government did in the matter?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I submitted the case to which my attention was called by the hon. gentleman and by another hon. gentleman to the Department of Justice. The report which I will be glad to lay on the Table, is to the effect that the college had a perfect right to charge that amount of $100 fine, in the case of those cadets who left for the purpose of accepting commissions in the Imperial service. As to the question of collecting the amount now from those who were trusted when the cadets left, and who were not made to pay before the enlistment of the cadets, the opinion of the Department of Justice is not so strong. It would be more satisfactory if I laid before the House the opinion given by the Department of Justice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I shall also have to ask the hon. gentleman to inform us who did pay and who did not pay, because this is a matter in which, I think, for the credit of the college and the Department, all should be treated alike.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will bring that down on Monday.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will not delay the item, on this understanding, that, in a case like this, before we proceed to another item, a discussion may take place. I suppose the Minister of Finance has no objection to that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia whether the Government have ever considered the advisability of giving the three or four cadets who passed at the head of the list, employment in the Civil Service? That would certainly encourage the cadets and be advantageous to the country. The first four have the right to commissions in the army. If the first two or three had the choice of taking commissions or else entering the Civil Service, it would be a move in the right direction.

Mr. JONES. I received a letter from a gentleman in Halifax, whose son was in the college, complaining that he had been called on to pay one hundred dollars fine, when his son accepted a commission in the Imperial service, and he gives the names of other prominent gentlemen who have not paid.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I promised to bring down the list.

Mr. JONES. While the Minister of Justice may be justified from a technical point of view in the position he took, I think the Government should treat everyone alike. If it has been found that these gentlemen who have paid in good faith could not have been compelled to pay, the money should be refunded them. With reference to this vote for the college, it is one in which I naturally take a great interest, because the military college was started, as hon. gentlemen are aware, by the Government of which I was a supporter and of which I subsequently became a member. That institution was started for the purpose of training a certain number of young gentlemen to qualify them for positions in our own country, but it was considered, during the time that I had the honor of administering the Department that there would be some advantage obtained by placing our institution on a par with the Imperial institutions, if we could obtain from the British Government a concession granting one commission in each branch of the service to young gentlemen who passed with first-class honors each year. That application was made during the time I was in the Department, and it was cheerfully and promptly responded to by the Imperial authorities. That arrangement went on for some time, and I believe no fault was found with regard to those who accepted the positions. I am pleased to say that I have heard from all sources that the cadets who passed through our college up to a certain time, ranked among the best officers in the several branches to which they were appointed; so much so, that a certain class of training which the Imperial cadets had to submit to when they joined headquarters in England was dispensed with in the case of the cadets from the Royal Military College. Up to a certain time, I think all these conditions were amply fulfilled, and the expectations of the Government which started that institution were fully realised, but I am afraid from what has reached me that the same standard has not been maintained. I have been informed that during the last two years, or at all events during the last year, a large number of commissions were granted to Kingston cadets in the Imperial service—some twenty or thirty, as far as I remember. I would like to know from the hon. gentleman whether the Government applied for these additional commissions?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. JONES. They were offered then?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Yes.

Mr. JONES. But I suppose under the expectation that those people who would be recommended by the College or by the Government would have passed through their full term and taken honors?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. JONES. So much the worse for the college, and so much the stronger for my argument, because I contend that it is not in the interest of Canada, it is not to the credit of our country to send out young men from the college nominally as Kingston cadets who have not completed their regular course, except under very, very exceptional circumstances. There might be circumstances under which young men had been so exceptionally attentive to their duties, and had taken such high degrees, that the authorities might be justified in making a change in their favor, but I have been informed in one case a cadet was appointed to the Imperial service who had been only one year in the college, and who at the time of his appointment was residing in England, that he had left the college and was not in Canada when the appointment was made. I was also informed that several cadets were appointed who had been in the college only two years, and had never passed through those examinations which would entitle them to take the rank which a cadet of the college should be expected to take if associated with the Imperial cadets in the same branch of the service. This is really, in my judgment, a great departure from the original design and intention of the college, which was in the first place to give a thorough military and technical education to those cadets who were attending there; and, if it comes to be known that young men are sent out from the college after one or two years' training, I say most emphatically that, in my judgment, it will lower the standard of the college with the Imperial authorities, and very likely may lead to the withdrawal of the concession of granting one commission each year, which was intended only to apply to those candidates who took the highest honors. It is a point which I urge most strongly upon the hon. the Minister of Militia, because I hold that the future of that college and the confidence it must enjoy in the public estimation in this country and in the old country, where our cadets are brought into comparison with the Imperial cadets, is all involved in this one question: whether we are going to send out cadets who are thoroughly unfit, or, after one or two years, with a mere smattering of knowledge, which could be of no practical advantage or value to them? Now, with regard to the point raised by the hon. member for Toronto, I quite concur with that view. It was my intention, if I had remained in the Department, and it was the view of the Government, that those young gentlemen who had passed through their term in the college should in some way be associated with the Civil Service of the country, to keep those men in the country if we could. My hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Mackenzie) says we promised that, and it was considered at that time that there would be no advantage to Canada in proportion to the expenditure we are called upon to make annually, if we sent out fifteen or twenty cadets from that college who immediately went into the United States or even took commissions in the Imperial service. It was the intention that those cadets should, if possible, be employed in the Dominion, and it was the intention, as announced by the Government, to give those cadets when they passed the college each year, the preference of all appointments in the Civil Service of the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen know that there are certain branches of the Dominion service that might probably absorb some ten or fifteen of these cadets annually. The Public Works Department, one would imagine, and I have no doubt, could find employment for many of these cadets who have a training which would peculiarly adapt them for service on our railways and canals; and I venture to hope that the present Administration will adopt the suggestion of the hon. member from Toronto, if not that from myself, and will endeavor to place before the cadets who enter that college some inducement to enter it, and to remain in the country when they leave it, when their education is completed. If such is not done, I look upon it that the largest proportion of the annual amount we grant will be wasted or thrown away. We can have under these circumstances a trained Civil Service, of course at the expense of the country, who will be on hand at all times when they are required to fill any position in the military branch of our public service, and those different branches combined should, in my mind, afford ample scope for the employment of all the cadets who come out of the college every year. In that way I believe we shall best realise the expectation of the Government which established the college, and best give value for the expenditure we are annually called upon to make for the maintenance of this college.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It affords me very great pleasure indeed to be able to congratulate the hon. gentleman upon the very important part he has taken in establishing the Royal Military College. It is an institution which, I believe, has greatly contributed to make Canada advantageously known abroad. When we consider that those who have left our college and who have taken service in the Imperial army, have almost without exception proved themselves to be fully equal to the cadets of any of the great military colleges of England, it seems to me that such an institution can only redound to the credit and advantage of our country. Now, Sir, I fully agree with what the hon. gentleman has stated in reference to the standard which we ought to maintain in the Royal Military College, and I believe it is the duty of every Minister of Militia to see that that standard is not reduced, so that the men whom we send forth from that institution may always occupy the same prominent position which they have occupied up to the present time. In reference to the twenty or thirty commissions which were granted last year, I look upon them as altogether outside the ordinary commissions which are granted for merit, if I may so express myself, by the Imperial Government. In the case of the four commissions placed by the Imperial Government at the disposal of the Canadian Government, the privilege is given to those who carry the highest number of points, to choose the branch of the service in which they wish to be employed. In the case of the commissions given last year, the parties entered the Imperial service from the fact that a good many of the English officers were employed abroad, some in the Soudan, others in India and other parts of the world, and the Imperial Government thought fit to call upon the Canadian Government to give some of their cadets to go into the service abroad. There was no misrepresentation in any case, the conditions and the position of the cadets were represented, and those men were taken outside of the four commissions which, as I have already stated, we consider were granted for merit, and were given because it was considered that the Imperial service required officers of that class. I cannot be positive as to the period of time which had been passed by these cadets in the Royal Military College, but no complaint as to their efficiency has ever been made to my Department since these cadets accepted service in the Imperial army. Now, another reference was made by my hon. friend from West Toronto (Mr. Denison) as to the employment which the Canadian Government should give to the cadets in the Civil Service. Well, Sir, I must say that if that was the policy of the hon. gentleman opposite when he was at the head of the Department over which I now preside, it has been pretty well followed by ourselves. I took the first opportunity I had to create a new branch in the Department of Militia, and I selected one of the cadets of the Royal Military College to take charge of it. In several of our prominent corps I have given commissions to the cadets belonging to that institution. In the mounted police force there are several cadets belonging to that institution; and we have also some of the men of our college in the large railway companies and in the great industrial establishments of Canada. I think that no complaint can be made against this policy. Of course, if it were carried to an extreme point, if we were to give exceptional advantages to the cadets of the Royal Military College beyond those which we have now conceded to them, it might create dissatisfaction. Other young men might complain that we were giving everything to the Royal Military College; that we were really creating a privileged class over other young men who have to compete with our cadets, and who do not possess the same training and instruction which are possessed by our cadets. I fully recognise the qualifications of a cadet, and I think that the cadets are not neglected; but in the interests of the institution, and in the interest of the cadets themselves, it would be a wrong policy to make further concessions beyond those which have already been made to them.

Mr. AMYOT. I am not ready yet to condemn the Royal Military College, but I must say that I have never been able to see of what use it is to the country. It seems to me it would have been better to pay the expenses of these young men to England, and send them to college there, where they could get the same education, and we should have saved money by the transaction. At all events, I do not see why, if we are to go on with a royal military college, we should not also have a school of navigation in some of our cities. When there is a demand for a military college, in the interests of the rich families, there is plenty of money; but when the Government is asked, in the interests of the poor people, in the interests of the navigators, who are a class of people much more useful to the country than the military men, we find that a few thousand dollars is much too large a sum. Oh, no, we will spend $50,000 for, or $60,000 for a royal military college. The Royal Military College! it sounds well, but a poor school of navigation to train men who are to take charge of our ships in the St. Lawrence—oh, no, we have no money for that purpose. It seems to me that the Government should do something for the school of navigation in Quebec, which has been kept alive up to the present day by the sacrifices of the Local Government, although marine matters belong rather to the Federal Government than to the Local Government. I repeat that so far as the Royal Military College is concerned, I have not yet found one place in the country where one of these students or cadets has proved useful to this country. They are useful for the English army, they are useful for the States, they are useful for the large railway companies abroad, but they are not useful for this country. It is money spent altogether uselessly, except, of course, for those young men who go there to get educated. Although I shall not object to this item of the Estimates, I hope that the Government will, this year, think of establishing a school of navigation. It has been asked for by the district of the Minister of Militia, and, perhaps, that is the reason why we do not receive it.

Mr. LABELLE. I may say that I have myself asked the Minister of Marine about that marine school, and although I do not agree with my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) on the military question, I quite concur with him in reference to a school of navigation. I think that the Government ought to do something for the marine school, and I hope that before this Session closes they will propose an appropriation for that purpose. I also think it would be an excellent idea for the Government to establish another institution of that kind in the town of Sorel.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think the Minister of Militia quite apprehended the force of the remarks of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). What the hon. Minister is asked to do is not to give every one who graduates at the Royal Military College a position in the Government, but simply to do this: to offer some four or five positions under the Government as a reward to those who show themselves the best qualified to fill them. The commissions which are given by the British Government are in the nature of prizes. The man who is first on the list has his choice, and so on in due rotation and it has had a very good effect in maintaining a wholesome spirit of emulation among the cadets. If the Government can see their way to offer an equal number, or perhaps a few more prizes in the shape of positions in the service, it would enable the service to obtain the very best men. The hon. Minister, I believe, is correct when he says that he has distributed some positions and given some places in his Department to graduates of the college; but they were not, I think, distributed with regard to the standing in the college of those young men. He selected them himself; there was no attempt made to hold out the positions as prizes. The manner in which the Government could promote the benefit of the college is by offering a small number of positions in the service as prizes to those who most distinguish themselves at the college. We ought to turn out twenty or twenty-four graduates per annum. The suggestion I would make is this: that in addition to the four commissions in the British army, five or six positions which would be no very great number considering that, according to a return laid on the Table, we added about four hundred appointees to the Civil Service within fifteen months, should be distributed among the best pupils. I am quite certain if the hon. Minister will confer with the officers of the college he will find they will agree with the hon. gentlemen who have spoken, the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Denison) and others, in saying that that step would add very largely indeed to the efficiency of the college, and in process of time would provide the Government with some valuable civil servants. Nor can there be any weighty objection to it, because the appointees in the college are selected by competition. A regular competitive examination is held, open to all Canada, and there is selected a picked class of young men who would, without the slightest reflection on the Civil Service, make very excellent officers in at least one or two Departments, and notably in the Departments of Militia, of Railways and Canals and of Public Works.

Mr. CASEY. The suggestions made with respect to giving places in the Civil Service as prizes, are very valuable, but I would urge that those appointments should be in the outside service, in the engineering service, rather than in the Departments themselves. If cadets are taken into the Departments and become valuable officers, they will not be available for active service if required, without crippling the Department. If we desire young men for use in active operations they should be where they can enter on active service, and not cripple the Department. With respect to the young under-graduates entering them, I concur with the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) as to the inadvisability of sending there men whose education is not finished. Very likely no complaints have been received in regard to them; but, notwithstanding that fact, they cannot be as well qualified as if they had passed through the whole course. Although, as the Minister has stated, their standing in college was reported, yet they will be recognised as Canadian cadets, and the public will not know how they stand in the college to which they belong. Only finished product, if any, should be sent to England. I am still more inclined to agree with the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) in regard to the expenditure on the Military College. I have always doubted, and I doubted when our own friends established the college, as to the advisability of the expenditure, especially in view of the results. It is true that we have very few examples of the usefulness of the graduates in Canada. Two years ago a return was brought down showing the destinations of the graduates up to that time, and it appeared that the vast majority were engaged neither in the Civil Service nor in the militia, but that a very large number had gone to the United States and engaged in engineering and other pursuits. So the British army and the United States have received the benefit of the expenditure and Canada has not done so. The hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) made another very good point, and it is one which I have urged before, that this is a rich man's college pure and simple. Supposing that we turn out twenty-five graduates a year they will have cost over $2,000 a piece to the country, besides $300 or so which each cadet has to pay. The result is that the young men are highly educated, as regards general education, as well as in military matters, but it is of no special use to the military service of Canada, because those young men are not kept in the country and employed in the military service. I would suggest in order to utilise the cadets and greatly increase the efficiency of our forces, to appoint no one but graduates of the college as adjutants of battalions, give them an annual salary and compel them to look after all the companies of the battalion. We could fully employ most of the graduates in this way.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

(In the Committee.)

Royal Military College at Kingston $59,000

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not altogether concur in the observations addressed to the committee on this subject by some hon. gentlemen. I do not think this institution is without its use in this country, and I do not think it is a proof of the failure of this institution that a number of those who graduated in it have found active employment in the English and other services under the Queen and in the neighboring republic. I think that a country does, after all, that which is best in providing scientific military education for a certain number of its citizens. If the services of these men were required by this country, I have no doubt that all of those who have gone to the neighboring republic would be found offering their services to the country in its hour of need. It is to be regretted these graduates have not found in this country a larger measure of employment in public life—in civil pursuits. I am inclined to think the Government might utilise their services much in the same way as the American Government have utilised the services of those who have graduated at West Point. The most effective provisions the Government can make for the defence of a country, when a defence is actually required, is by the scientific training of a certain number of those who would be called upon to officer its military forces. The experience of the United States shows it is much easier to improvise an army than to improvise men with the necessary qualifications to command men during war. It is a remarkable fact in the history of the civil war which occurred in the neighboring republic, that nearly every one who was without that scientific military training which the military school at West Point affords, was a failure when put in command of any considerable number of men. It is only necessary to look at the history of the war there, from 1861 to 1865, to see that, however brave, however competent men were who were ready to take command of a considerable number of troops, whether on the one side or the other, and who were without this military training, such men, in almost every instance, failed. It seems to me that we might expend a smaller amount in the training of the volunteer force, without seriously affecting the defence of the country. I have no doubt that our people possess the elements of a soldiery quite as well as the people of any other country in Christendom. The experience of the continent of Europe, is that men of intelligence make better soldiers than men who are without any culture or education. I think that is shown by the high discipline which the German army has attained, and that being the case we have within the limits of this country, the necessary elements for a military force whenever such force is needed. In fact, it requires but a very few weeks of training under men who are qualified, to make very fair troops of the ordinary population of this country; but it is a wholly different thing to give the necessary qualifications to those who are to take command, and I believe that the Government which preceded this, did the country an essential service in establishing a military college at Kingston. I do not think our experience, notwithstanding the fact that many of the graduates have left the country for the time being, ought to induce us to abandon the course we have adopted. Let me mention one fact worthy of consideration. Over 100,000 of the population of Italy leave every year to settle in the various portions of South America, yet the Government of Italy vote something like $750,000 a year towards the education of the children of those who have gone from their country and settled in a foreign country. It is of course going a very long way to expend money upon the population of a country after they have taken up their abode in a foreign country, and yet, after all, these people are not indifferent to the country of their birth, and they are all the more attached to it and inclined to establish friendly relations with their parent land in consequence of the interest the parent takes in them; so in this country the education and training of our population, whether it be the civil education given for civil purposes in our schools and universities or the military education afforded in the military schools, will always turn to our advantage. These men although they leave their country, are not after all indifferent to the country which has taken an interest in them. Therefore, while we might utilise our young men who are trained in our military schools to a larger extent, I feel, nevertheless, that in giving them a scientific military education, we are doing essential service, and even though they are gone beyond the boundaries of the country that expenditure is not wholly thrown away. On the contrary, I believe their services would be available if required; and at all events that the maintenance of this institution is the best means of affording efficient defence to this country when defence is required.

Mr. CASEY. When you left the Chair, Sir, I was pointing out the approximate average cost per head of the cadets turned out from Kingston college, and urging that it was practically a class college, an institution at which the country paid very large sums for the education of the children of a favored few in the community. I believe that admission to the college is not gained without recommendation from some member of this House. I may be mistaken in this, but it used to be the practice, and I would ask the hon. the Minister if such is not the case?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No such recommendation is required.

Mr. CASEY. It used to be at one time, and I thought perhaps it was continued now.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There is no such recommendation required.

Mr. CASEY. At all events, the candidate must pass a pretty severe examination. He must have had a pretty good education before he goes there, which must have cost some money, and money must be spent after he gets there, for tuition and board and so on; so that it becomes the privilege of a rather exclusive class of the community to send their children to that school. People of small means cannot afford it, and people of ordinary means can hardly afford it. As a matter of fact, it is generally the children of wealthy people, and to a large extent of people who are concerned in politics, who are educated in this school. Therefore, I say it is the college of a privileged class, and not a people's college. It is even more restricted in its operations than any of the universities of the country. No one ever proposed to this House that we should pay a subvention to any of the universities of the country for turning out young men who are educated in general subjects to the same extent that these cadets are educated. The only raison d'être, then, for the existence of this college, the only reason why the country as a whole should pay towards this education is for the sake of the military training which is given there. It has been shown, again and again, and is admitted by the Minister, that, practically, we have obtained very little advantage from the military training which the cadets have received.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I do not think I said that.

Mr. CASEY. I know the hon. gentleman told us that he had appointed one or two of the cadets in his Department and that a few had got commissions in the North-West police, and a few were employed in the military service, but can he tell us that one of them is acting now as adjutant of any battalion as far as he is aware? There is where you could get some advantage from this military training. If the hon. gentleman wants to get any advantage from this military training he should appoint these cadets as permanent and paid adjutants, and compel them to superintend the drill of all the companies in the battalion, whether at their different headquarters or in camp, and it could be easily arranged that they would drill at different times. He should be made responsible for their drill. Of course the drill would be carried on by the officers of the different companies, but the adjutant should be generally responsible for the drill of the regiment. The adjutant is the teaching officer of a regiment, and in that way you could find occupation as adjutants for a great number of these cadets, and, as has been already stated, you could find occupation for more in the engineering service. But, unless the Minister can devise some means for retaining these gentlemen, not only in the general service of the country, but in the military service, as teachers of our volunteers, I say the raison d'être of the college is gone. It is for military training that we are paying this money, and, unless we get the advantage of that military training after they have gone through the college, the reason why the Dominion should pay for the education of these wealthy young men, or a share of that education—about $2,500 apiece, I think it is, on the average—disappears, and it becomes for all practical purposes a simple waste of public money. I speak freely and plainly on this matter, although I happen to disagree with my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills), and many other of my friends on this side of the House who approve of the existence of this college, though they think greater results should be obtained from it. I have not been able to see yet the practical service of the college to the country. I agree with my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) that, if this amount of money were spent in educating trained navigators, as masters and mates and pilots of our sailing fleet, infinitely greater practical advantage would be reaped. I do not think we have the same need for a military college as a country with a large and complicated regular army, which is able to find regular employment for its trained cadets. I do not even admit that all the officers who most distinguished themselves in military tactics in the American war were those who were trained at West Point. I do not remember all the names of the distinguished officers in that war, but I have a vague recollection that some who were not trained at West Point developed considerable tactical ability, and, as far as the needs of Canada are concerned, I think our military schools give or might give, if the time were extended, a thoroughly practical training to the officers already in the service. Those schools, of which we have had several and are to have more, would meet the needs of Canada at the present time. I suppose there is no use in further arguing against the existence of the college just now, when so many leading men on both sides of the House are agreed as to its necessity, but I think it is not only my privilege but my duty to point out why I think it is unnecessary and not of any practical advantage at all, and to point out still more markedly that, even admitting the necessity of a military college and the usefulness of it, this present college, as now managed, does not give results in proportion to the amount which is spent upon it. The number of cadets is comparatively small—twenty-two, or twenty-three, I think the hon. Minister said, was the number of those who graduated last year. That gives a cost of about $2,500 apiece. If the sleeping accommodation of that college, if the buildings required to house the cadets, were extended so that the number of cadets in the college at a time could be doubled, the cost per head would be very seriously decreased. We could turn out twice the number at very little more cost than we now turn out the present number. I think I understood the Minister last year to hint that something of that kind was intended. I suppose there are not more than seventy-five or eighty studying at the college, of whom some twenty-two or three graduate each year. Twice the number could probably be handled by the same staff for the same expense that we now handle these seventy-five or eighty for, and, if it is necessary to have an annual output of cadets, we could have them for half the price. Even if the necessity and the usefulness of the college are granted, I urge this point on the Minister, and in addition to that, that some means should be adopted to retain these cadets, not only in the country, but in the military service, after we have educated them at such great expense.

Permanent corps—Batteries and Schools of Artillery,
Cavalry and Infantry Schools.....$482,700

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What does the hon. gentleman require this increase for? I see that a large sum is required.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. $47,000. That is the increase which was necessitated by the vote of Parliament which established the London school. Last year, it will be recollected, I did not estimate for the pay of the men and officers and staff, because we were building the barracks, and we were not yet ready to enlist the men and organise the school; but now that the building is very near completion, it will be necessary to provide for that school as we have provided for the other schools, and the amount of $47,000 is required to organise the school at London.

Mr. ELLIS. Might I ask the hon. Minister if he can give us any information as to this: If he looks at the Auditor General's report, page 191, part 2, he will see that the cost of medicine at the school at Fredericton, for the year, was $789. For "B," which, I think, is in Quebec, the cost was $251, and for "C" $22. It would strike one, that one school must be managed on the allopathic principle and the other on the homeopathic principle, if there is such a large difference in the cost of the medicine. I may say to the Minister, that his management of the Department is not at all unsatisfactory in the Province of New Brunswick, and this excites a great deal of surprise.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. It does not look like a large amount, and hardly speaks in favor of the climate of New Brunswick, but I could not give the details of the medicines that were purchased. I noticed the amount, and have asked for a report, so that it might be placed on the Table of the House.

Mr. CASEY. It may have been medical comforts, to a large extent. There are variations in the circumstances of the schools and batteries that make it very proper that we should know how this vote is to be divided amongst them.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can give the amounts in detail if the hon. gentleman requires.

Mr. CASEY. I wish to call particular attention to one of these batteries, the famous "C" Battery, of Victoria, B.C. This is the celebrated battery that we discussed last year. We found it was commanded by Lieut.-Col. Holmes, and that his duties consisted in drilling and looking after the discipline of the numerous and valiant Staff-Sergeant Kinsella, who formed the whole rank and file of that battery. On that occasion the Minister of Militia explained to us why it was that the battery was not filled up, namely, because wages were so high in Victoria that they could not afford to hire men to form the battery; but I understood him to assure us quite confidently that it would be made right this year. I find still, in the last accounts, the valiant Sergeant Kinsella, the numerous Sergeant Kinsella figuring as "C" Battery, of Victoria, but it does not give any account of his medicine. I find that Lieut.-Col. Holmes was paid $3 a day for 365 days, namely, $2,920 for commanding Sergeant Kinsella. But it appears that last year Col. Holmes was not equal to the exertion himself of performing the full duties of commanding Sergeant Kinsella, for he had attached officers, and I find in the Estimates $1,973.20 to pay them. So it takes Col. Holmes, at a salary of $2,920, and a number of attached officers—we are not told how many—who are paid $1,978 to assist him in commanding Sergeant Kinsella, while poor Kinsella himself only got $273.75 for submitting to all this drill and discipline during the year. I do think it is time that the Ministry should put an end to the flagrant scandal of having such an item as this appear in our Estimates. We were told, to be sure, last year that Col. Holmes was also acting as brigade-major, I think, or deputy adjutant-general.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Deputy adjutant-general.

Mr. CASEY. But I find that by referring to the pay of other deputy adjutants-general elsewhere, that they are not paid much more than half as much as Col. Holmes is paid for commanding Sergeant Kinsella, and Col. Holmes is practically acting merely as deputy adjutant-general of British Columbia. That is all he is doing, and that is all he ought to be paid for, and his name ought to be put down in the Estimates under that head, and he ought to be paid no more than deputy adjutants-general elsewhere, unless it can be shown that his duties are much more severe. I believe that all the volunteers in British Columbia do not number nearly a thousand, and why he should be paid more for acting as deputy adjutant-general in British Columbia than those officers are paid elsewhere, I am unable to understand. I say he should be paid as deputy adjutant-general alone, and not as the farcical commandant of a battery which does not exist.

Mr. ELLIS.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I had occasion last year, when the hon. gentleman spoke upon this subject, to state how it was that Battery "C" in British Columbia had not yet been organised. The fact is that an understanding was arrived at between the Imperial and Canadian Governments, the Imperial agreeing to allow marine pensioners to take service in Canada in our marine force. The hon. gentleman will recollect that, last Session, I explained that from the fact that we had not been able to complete the arrangements which had taken place between the two Governments, the men were not expected to come out last season. But this year, after further communications between the Department and the Imperial authorities, I expect that these men will be forthcoming, and will form "C" Battery in British Columbia. Now, Sir, Col. Holmes was taken from "B" Battery in Quebec, and was sent out there as deputy adjutant-general, and he is now acting in that capacity for the district. When his appointment was made we expected that the men would come out that year, and that the battery would be organised immediately. However, this did not take place. But he has been acting, notwithstanding, as commandant of that district. We expect within a short time that the men will be sent out from England, and we will be able to organise "C" Battery. Hon. gentlemen will understand that Vancouver, as the terminus of the Canadian Pacific Railway, is a very important point, and it was considered necessary by the Government to organise a military force there. I explained to the hon. gentleman, but he did not seem to appreciate the explanation, that from the fact that the labor market was so very high in British Columbia, it was impossible for us to organise the force out of the men who were there, and it became necessary to make the arrangements I have mentioned. Now, Mr. Chairman, we pay marine pensioners exactly the same amount we pay to every other militiaman in Canada; and the hon. gentleman must know that under the Militia Act it is impossible for the Department to grant any other pay, unless we change the law, to any other portion of the force, than the pay which is provided for in the Militia Act. The hon. gentleman will see that the fact that the Imperial Government allows these pensioners to retain the pensions which they receive from the Imperial Government as long as they remain in the Canadian service, puts an end to any possibility of desertion, and consequently we can count on a force that will not be carried away by the temptation of higher wages offered in the labor market. I think it is important, from every point of view, to organise the militia force in British Columbia, and I am only sorry that it could not have been done sooner. However, we hope that within a short time that battery will be organised, and will be as efficient as the other batteries the we have in Canada.

Mr. CASEY. How long has Col. Holmes been receiving this pay as commandant?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman seems to have examined the matter so closely that he ought to know that Col. Holmes was appointed some three years ago, and that ever since he has been receiving the pay which appears in the Public Accounts and the Estimates.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman has said that the Government thought it important to organise a defensive force for British Columbia. I quite agree as to its importance, and it is a shame that the Government, being aware of the importance of having armed forces there, should have allowed that country to remain undefended more than three years, except by Col. Holmes and Sergeant Kinsella. The Minister tells us this year the same story as last year. He told us last year that he expected to get the marine pensioners before he came to Parliament and asked for another vote, and, therefore, we voted Col. Holmes' salary. We have not yet got the pensioners, but we still have Col. Holmes and his salary. The Minister now tells us the same story. He seems to be very full of hope; he is a young man of great expectations, but the expectations do not seem to be realised. As a matter of fact, Col. Holmes will have received at the end of this year four years' salary, at a ridiculous figure, for commanding one man and performing the duty of adjutant-general, done elsewhere for half the money by officers who have many times that number of volunteers to inspect. The Minister has told us why he has not got the battery filled up, but he has not shown the ghost of a reason for continuing the payment to Col. Holmes. The payment is, on the face of it, a payment for duties not performed, and which the officer was not asked to perform; and it is a disgrace to the Department to allow this item to stand so long in the Estimates; and unless the Minister expects, at a very early period, within a month or two, to have a battery for that officer to command, it should be struck out. It seems that after all the Minister is to import a battery ready made. The pensioners are men who have served some time in the navy or the marines, or, perhaps, in the horse marines.

Mr. BAKER. That is the corps to which you belong, I suppose?

Mr. CASEY. And these men are in receipt of pensions, they having generally been retired on the ground of ill-health or unfitness. Is the Minister going to import old, worn-out pensioners to guard this important point?

Mr. BAKER. I am very much obliged to the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) for the interest which, primâ facie, he takes in this matter relating to the affairs of British Columbia, and at the same time, I must in part agree with him to the extent that the proposed vote for "C" Battery is rather a misnomer. Certainly at the present moment Col. Holmes has been discharging the duties of acting deputy adjutant-general of the district, and I see no reason why British Columbia, equally with all the other Provinces in the Dominion, should not have a deputy adjutant-general separate and distinct from "C" Battery and School of Gunnery. Ever since Confederation we have had one, and I believe the salary has been $1,700. Therefore, the $1,700 which should be paid to the deputy adjutant-general (the duties of which office Col. Holmes is performing) should be charged to the proper specific vote for that purpose. At the same time, the difference between $1,700 and $2,920, I presume, should be charged to "C" Battery. It is misleading to charge $2,920 to "C" Battery, which at the present moment does not exist. I know very well that the Minister, from conferences I have had with him on many occasions, has endeavored, to his utmost, to push this matter to completion, and I am equally well aware of the difficulties he has met with. In British Columbia it is utterly impossible to expect to obtain men to form a permanent corps for the sum of 60 cents per day. In that Province we pay $1 and $1.25 to Chinamen for the ordinary work of digging a garden, and, therefore, it is not to be expected that white men can be procured to perform the duty usually performed by a battery for 60 cents a day, and I am, therefore, perfectly willing, and it is only discharging my duty, to give credit to the Minister of Militia for his honest endeavor to secure from the Imperial Government marines and naval pensioners to perform the duties performed by "A" and "B" Batteries, at the same time I must regret that up to the present moment he has not received that assistance from the Imperial Government which has been asked. So far as the payment of Col. Holmes is concerned, I must say that that officer is willing at any moment to earn every dollar paid him—in fact, is simply thirsting for more work.

Mr. DAVIES. What does he do if there is no battery there?

Mr. BAKER. I will tell the hon. member for Prince Edward Island what he does. In the first place, he performs the duties of acting deputy adjutant general, for which in other Provinces such officers receive $1,000. That, therefore, deals with the major portion of the $2,920 of this vote; the remainder is an allowance for subsistence and barrack accommodation. No doubt the hon. gentleman is cognisant of those duties, and how they are performed; and, I dare say, as he takes so much interest in British Columbia, he is equally cognisant as to how the duties are performed there. I am perfectly satisfied that Col. Holmes performs all the duties required by the Department, and in every way creditably to himself and satisfactorily to the Department of Militia. So far as "C" Battery is concerned, we have had, as the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has remarked, services performed by the acting deputy adjutant general in supervising the School of Gunnery in embryo. We have had officers, non-commissioned officers and men of the various corps under instruction by Col. Holmes and he has faithfully performed his duties in that connection. I am sorry to say that "C" Battery has not been formed in the manner contemplated two years ago. I do not think that the fault should be cast on the Government, because I believe the Minister has done his level best, as we say, in our far western Province, to consummate that which we most desire in that connection. The sum which the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) has so severely criticised as having been charged and paid to "C" Battery for attached officers, I know, from having supervised the Public Accounts, is mainly owing to the amounts paid the non-commissioned officers and men who have been attached to "C" Battery from the militia of British Columbia while undergoing a course of instruction in gunnery. I must take this opportunity of expressing the hope that the Minister of Militia will, at an early day, be able to give us information as to when "C" Battery will be formed, the number of men who will constitute it, the number of officers who will be attached, and the pay they will receive for their services.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I desire to reply to some of the statements which the hon. gentleman has made. Col. Homes does not command the celebrated sergeant, which the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey) trots out every Session, alone. He is the acting deputy adjutant-general of that district, and I do not presume the hon. gentleman would wish to advocate the policy of leaving a Province like British Columbia without a deputy adjutant general, and the deputy adjutant-general commands all the ordinary militia forces of that district. The pay which Col. Homes receives is $4 per day as Lieut.-Col. commanding the artillery school; not having any barrack accommodation in British Columbia he gets an allowance in all for quarters and subsistence of $4 per day, and over and above that he gets paid $1 per day as acting deputy adjutant general. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is impossible, as I contend, that it should be advocated by any hon. gentleman here that we should leave a district so important, from a military standpoint, as British Columbia without a commanding officer. It is to be regretted, and I have stated so before, that from the circumstances of the country it was impossible, in British Columbia, to do what is done in other portions of the Dominion, that is to draw upon the citizens of the Province for the purpose of organising our battery. The arrangement which has been made with the Imperial Government is one which is highly satisfactory. Every military man whom I have had an opportunity of consulting upon it, agrees upon this one point, that without that arrangement it would be impossible for years to come to have organised batteries such as we have in Quebec and Kingston. The hon. gentleman has expressed a desire that I should give him, as soon as possible, the most reliable information as to the period of time when these men will come out. I can only tell the hon. gentleman that, in so far as my action as Minister of Militia is concerned, I have been urging upon the Imperial Government to carry out the understanding which was arrived at; and no ill-will, no indisposition on the part of the Imperial Government was shown, but, on the contrary, they were ready to meet us, and do all that possibly could be done, and do it as rapidly as possible. But the hon. gentleman must know, as well as I do, that, from the changes which have taken place in the Administrations in England, from the fact that the negotiations were commenced under one Government and taken up by a different Government, and owing also to the important questions which came up before the Imperial Parliament, it was unavoidable that some delay should take place, however regrettable it may be from our point of view that such delay occurred. However, from the despatches which have been received, I hope that within a very short period of time these arrangements will be completed. I do not wish to state the exact time, because I might be mistaken again, but from all the information which has come to me officially I believe that within a short time the men will be forthcoming and our battery will be organised. Now the hon. member for West Elgin (Mr. Casey), who has taken some interest in this matter, has stated that we were going to bring out to Canada some worn-out veterans of many wars to organise our battery in British Columbia. If the hon. gentleman had taken as much care to study the question as he has in looking into the history of Sergeant Kinsella, he must have known that these pensioners are men who are far from being old men; they are placed on the reserve list, they receive pensions, and are still kept on the lists in England. I had an opportunity when I was in England of ascertaining from those who knew the subject well, that those men were looked upon as the very best class of men that the English service possessed, men who were trained to the handling of heavy guns on ships, men who were given these pensions, and as long as they remain in Canadian Service they will retain those pensions. I think it is not only desirable, from a military standpoint, that we should get the services of these men, but I hope we shall be introducing into that promising Province of British Columbia, which requires only an increase of its population to develop its enormous resources, men who will become permanent residents of the country, and will contribute their share to the general prosperity of the Province. Now, I hope the hon. gentleman will be convinced that Lieut.-Col. Holmes, one of the best officers we possess in the Canadian service, a man who has given all his time to the study of his profession, and has made reports which have attracted the attention of every military man who has had anything to do with the Department, is not overpaid, when it is considered that he is fulfilling the duties of deputy adjutant-general, that he has the responsibility of the military district upon him, and I hope that within a short period he will be in command of that battery, which, I trust, will be as efficient as the other permanent corps which we have established in Canada.

Mr. CASEY. The hon. gentleman promised some statement as to the cost of each battery.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. "A" Battery cost $62,850. The estimate for "B" Battery is exactly the same. "C" Battery costs $47,000. The difference is owing to the fact that the strength of "A" and "B" Batteries is 150 men, and that of "C" Battery only 100 men.

Mr. CASEY. What is the estimate?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. $47,000.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON.

Mr. BAKER. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia if, in his negotiations with the Imperial Government, any limit of age has been prescribed as regards these pensioners who are to be sent out?

Mr. CASEY. Is there any limit? Can the hon. gentleman himself tell us?

Mr. BAKER. I am not addressing the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) but I am addressing the Chair with a view of eliciting this information from the hon. Minister. When I want information from the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Casey) I will consult him in the smoking room.

Mr. CASEY. Are they? I am asking for information.

Mr. BAKER. I am a little anxious about this question, because I am a pensioner from the naval service myself.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. When I was in England, I had occasion to refer to the High Commissioner's Department for the purpose of charging the office there to look after the enlistment of these men in England. Of course, I fully understand the importance of the question put to me by my hon. friend, and I pointed out to the gentleman who was acting for the High Commissioner at the time—because the Commissioner himself was kept very busy with the exhibition, which took up a great deal of his valuable time—I pointed out the importance of not sending any of the men who would be over the age when their services might be of use to our organisation here.

Mr. CASEY. I am sorry that, not knowing that the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Baker) was a naval pensioner himself, I alluded to the possibility of any such pensioner being decrepit or unfit for service. But I hope the hon. Minister will make better arrangements than merely asking the High Commissioner in London to look after these men. I do not suppose the High Commissioner would have any time to institute a careful medical examination of these men, and I do not think we should be satisfied with anything less. But even admitting that we could get these pensioners perfectly sound in wind and limb, I do not agree with the hon. Minister that this is the best arrangement that could be made. Of course, under the Militia Act, he cannot pay more than ordinary rates of wages; but, as a member of the Opposition, I should much prefer to see the hon. Minister of Militia ask for an amendment to the Militia Act to allow him to pay a higher rate of wages to this particular battery, so that Canadians could be employed rather than men from the other side. As to Col. Holmes' salary, the hon. gentleman tells us that he acts as deputy adjutant general, but he omitted to tell us how tremendous his duties were. I find, from the Auditor General's report, that pay was issued in British Columbia for 261 men. I find, however, on referring to Col. Holmes' own report in the Militia report, that instead of having 261 men, the total strength of his force in British Columbia is 128, while the number who appeared on a muster was only ninety; and for commanding, or rather inspecting these men as deputy adjutant-general once a year, Col. Holmes gets $2,900 a year, while other deputy adjutants-general who may have 2,000 or 3,000 to inspect in a year, get $1,700 a year. As to the defence of British Columbia, so far from hinting that that Province should not be defended, I am blaming the hon. Minister for leaving it undefended as it is and has been for years. What does Col. Holmes say about the defences of the harbor of Victoria and the organisation of this battery? It appears that last year there was a short course of instruction for the officers and non-commissioned officers of artillery. He says:

"One officer and twenty non-commissioned officers and men joined for the course, and one officer attended for the purpose of obtaining a special course certificate. The instruction during the course was limited to squad and company drill, field and garrison gun drill, and repository exercises, owing to there being no sling waggon, gyn or siege gun at the station. It was also necessary, owing to all the guns being mounted on naval carriages and slides, to modify the drill as laid down in the artillery exercises to suit the armament."

Here is a land battery which has nothing but guns mounted on ship carriages to work with.

"This proved only fairly satisfactory. I beg again to recommend that early steps be taken to replace these slides by travelling platforms of modern pattern."

Here is something worse—the great city of Victoria, the importance of whose defence the hon. gentleman has been insisting upon, defended in this way:

"Most of the wooden carriages and slides in charge here are now unserviceable from decay, four at least being completely useless, thus rendering two-thirds of our 64-pr. armament at present useless."

And the hon. Minister who permits this state of things, says to me: "I hope my hon. friend does not wish to hint that British Columbia should be left in a defenceless condition," when his own officer reports that it is in a defenceless condition and has been for years.

"Requisitions were made some months ago for wrought iron column standing carriages, to replace those now unserviceable, as well as for many articles of equipment much needed to place the batteries in a condition fit for service."

And they did not get them.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). Whose fault is that?

Mr. CASEY. The fault of the hon. Minister of Militia, who has been leaving the Province in a defenceless condition for years, in spite of the urgent reports of his own officers, only Col. Holmes being there and Sergeant Kinsella.

Mr. BAKER (Victoria). No, he is not. He is in Kingston; I saw him there the other day.

Mr. CASEY. Well he is an Irishman, and I suppose the hon. gentleman thinks there is as much fight in him as in a whole ordinary battery. But as careful as the hon. Minister is, he has done nothing whatever to remove that scandal.

Improved rifled ordnance.....$3,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What quantity of rifled ordnance does the hon. gentleman expect to get for this sum, and what calibre may it be?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I see that my moderation surprises the hon. gentleman. This vote is for the purchase in England of 2 64-pounder rifled guns with standing carriages. The cost of the guns is £300 sterling each, exclusive of freight and transport from England. Every year we have been putting a small amount in the Estimates for the purpose of getting a couple of these guns out to be mounted on the fortifications wherever they are required. I can easily understand that a very large amount of money might be utilised in a manner that might be of great benefit to Canada, in importing all the guns that might be required for the purpose of the force; but I think the hon. gentleman must feel that it is in every way in the interest of Canada to vote a sufficient amount to bring out a couple of these every year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are the guns which have been brought out heretofore intended for coast defence?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. They are intended for the armament of the fortifications.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We have two of these guns in Quebec, and I believe one has been sent to Kingston, and we require one in the Maritime Provinces for training purposes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If they be for the purpose of training artillerists, I can understand that they may be of some use; but if they be for the purpose of coast defence against vessels of the sizes now employed, it appears to me that the money will be practically thrown away. I am inclined to think that a 64-pounder gun of the best possible construction would be about as effective against an armor-clad vessel carrying guns of the sort now manufactured, as a pop-gun would be against an elephant.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The inspectors of artillery and the officers of the Department, must know what they recommend, and they recommend these guns.

Drill sheds and rifle ranges..... $10,000

Mr. BURDETT. What portion, if any, of this sum is to be appropriated for the erection of a drill shed in the city of Belleville? If no portion of this sum is to be so applied, what sum will be placed in the Supplementary Estimates for the purpose of accommodating the 15th Battalion?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Out of the amount estimated, the Department will be able, under the Order in Council that has been passed, and is applicable to all these cases, to contribute the proportion which the Government is bound to contribute, provided the municipality does its share also.

Mr. BURDETT. How much does the Minister propose to contribute? Does he propose the municipality shall contribute?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The question is regulated by Order in Council which applies to every drill shed, except in very exceptional cases in the large centres, such as Toronto, Montreal and Quebec, where the force is very large, but the amount which the Government is called upon to contribute is regulated by the grant which the municipality is bound also to contribute. I will give the hon. gentleman a copy of the Order in Council, which we distribute from the Department, and he will see the exact position in which the matter stands.

Mr. BURDETT. I have no desire to find fault with the hon. gentleman, for I believe he is inclined to do all he can for the force, but, at the same time, I think this ought to be made an exceptional case. We have contributed a larger proportion to the forces, comparatively, than any other district, and our battalions, the 15th and 49th, are deserving of special consideration. The 15th sent one company to the North-West, which formed part of the Midland division, and was among the foremost at the charge at Batoche, two of its officers and several men having been wounded. The 15th took the most prominent place in the fiercest of the fight, and a battalion composed of such noble men ought to be entitled to exceptional consideration, more especially as the officers held a meeting, at which it was proposed that they should resign in a body unless some consideration was shown them. The municipality can ill afford to assist the drill shed, as it has granted large bonuses to railway companies, which this Government have assumed, and thereby deprive the municipality of the benefit to be derived from the money expended on them. I believe the officers and men would forego a portion of their small and inadequate pay in order to enable the Government to construct a drill shed. While on this subject, I desire to raise my voice against the importation, into this country, of any pensioners or placemen, be they marine or of any other class. The country is in that condition in which we might be safely called upon to export pensioners instead of importing them. We are able to govern ourselves, we are able to furnish our own officers, and do not require to import officers to do our work.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We do not import officers.

Mr. BURDETT. We do not require to import pensioners, but can take men from our own schools to fill our own positions. Let people come here to settle and make this country their permanent home. They are welcome and ought to be fairly treated, but I think Canada ought to be, as has been stated on the stump by a certain party, for the Canadians, and that we ought to find the men to govern us from within ourselves, from the Governor General down to the humblest rank and file. I am opposed to the importation of officials of any kind. I believe in the employment of our own people to do our own work. Had that principle been followed in the case of the North-West rebellion, the rebellion would have been shortened materially, and we would have been saved millions of money. I wish to cast no reflection. I do not wish to deprecate the ability or courage of English officers, but I say they do not understand the genius of the country and the mode of warfare adapted to a country like the North-West. Had the men in that rebellion been officered by officers of our own country, the rebellion would have been materially shortened, and when the true history of the charge at Batoche comes to be written, it will be found that the men not only made the charge, but made it acting on orders of their own.

Mr. DENISON. I would draw the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia to the fact that Toronto is sadly in need of a drill shed. The difficulty heretofore was the want of proper ground, but that will be overcome in a week or two, and I will take the liberty of asking the Minister whether he will put an amount in the Supplementary Estimates for this purpose.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. When the Supplementary Estimates come down, my hon. friend will find that Toronto has not been neglected.

Mr. KENNY. I would like to remind the hon. the Minister too, that a drill shed is required in Halifax.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend must feel that it is impossible, with the amount of money provided for the Department of Militia, to build drill sheds every where in one year. No doubt Halifax has a drill shed which may not be as perfect as it should be, but the time will come when it will be improved sufficiently to meet the requirements of the force.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand this drill shed did receive great damage in a contest of a semi-military character that took place there.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. That has not been reported to the Department.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I draw the attention of the hon. Minister to the unsatisfactory condition of the drill shed at Victoria. It is more like a barn than anything else; and I am satisfied if the same regard is paid to the militia force at Victoria as is paid to the force in other parts of the Dominion, the militia force at Victoria will very soon increase in number. The population of that Province, I am happy to say, has increased in the last three or four years very much, and there will be no difficulty getting an increase to the military force of that Province when due regard is paid to their comfort and the necessary equipment.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend will agree with me that it is necessary first to establish "C" Battery before speaking of building a drill shed in Victoria.

Mr. JONES. The drill shed in Halifax is well enough, so far as it goes, but it is not large enough, and a part of it is taken up for the armory. During the time I administered the Department, I had removed from the present drill shed the band room and erected a brick building for the brigade officers, and thus gave increased accommodation. I doubt if a cent has since been expended on the shed, and very great complaints are made with regard to the condition of the roof and the building generally.

Mr. BURDETT.

With regard to the repairs necessitated by a gathering on a semi-military occasion last February, I trust that sum was put down to the expenses of the Conservative party, because I can assure the House that all the Liberals that evening behaved remarkably well.

Mr. BROWN. I would ask the hon. gentleman if the flag staff on the drill shed is in good order.

Mr. JONES. I suppose the hon. gentleman means the Tory flag.

Mr. BROWN. No, the British flag.

Mr. JONES. When I hear the hon. gentleman speak about the British flag, it is like a certain courtesan who is always boasting of her purity, when I see the hon. gentleman getting up here and asking a question of that kind. I have taken my position on that question, and if the hon. gentleman wishes to know my opinion, he will get it, but there is a certain amount of flunkeyism which I do not entertain, and I will let the hon. gentleman have full command and full control of all the flunkeyism he likes.

Mr. BAKER. I wish to add to the remarks of my hon. colleague that it is highly desirable that the Minister should take into consideration in the near future the desirability of building a new drill shed in Victoria, and this being Her Majesty's Jubilee year, I hope this $10,000 is for Victoria.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). I cannot let this opportunity pass without call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the importance of building a drill shed and improving the armories in the town of Chatham. A petition has been presented, signed by a large number of the ratepayers of that town, and I hope the Minister will give this matter his very serious attention. I assure him there is a very great necessity for it. I believe he is considering it now, and I hope that, after taking these papers into consideration, he will be able to bring down a vote in the Supplementary Estimates for this purpose.

Care and maintenance of military properties transferred from the Imperial Government..... $12,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot say that it is absolutely essential to this particular vote, but possibly the question may be put at this time as well as at any other. A good deal was said at the recent conference of the colonial delegates in England as to some general scheme of defence, and assertions have been made somewhat freely that some propositions or other have been transmitted to this Government to ascertain if they would be willing to pledge the credit of Canada for any specific sum for military or naval purposes. I would ask the Minister of Finance if any correspondence on that subject has taken place, or if the Government have held out any hopes to the Imperial authorities that they would be prepared to recommend an appropriation for a purpose of that sort.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no correspondence, I think, that bears recently upon that question. I hope Her Majesty's Government will, for a long time to come, consider that we have efficiently discharged our duty and made a very great contribution to the defence of the Empire by the construction of a great transcontinental railway, which is of very great Imperial as well as colonial importance.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). With reference to this item and the next, I might say a few words, and particularise the fort in the constituency of which I have the honor to be the representative. I have noticed here to-night that all the new countries in the Dominion are putting in their claim for military protection. The old Provinces, the old towns, are being left out in the cold altogether. Reference some days ago was made to this fort at Annapolis, and it was asked by a gentleman on the other side of the House what was being done with this Fort Anne, and that gentleman was highly gratified to have an answer from the hon. the Minister of Militia that Fort Anne was to remain as a landmark. It was highly satisfactory to that hon. gentleman that Fort Anne should remain as a landmark, that the Minister should have that respect for antiquity. Well, we have a landmark—no doubt about it—it is pretty well marked. It is a well-defined fort, and the antiquity is great. We have plenty of antiquity there. They tell us to have respect for antiquity. We have any quantity of antiquity. It is all antiquity, as far as that fort is concerned, in the town of Annapolis. We can go back as far as the year 1605, and rake up our antiquity as to that fort. Port Royal was founded in 1605. It was the first settlement after St. Augustine on the continent of America. There is no other place in the Dominion of Canada that can have so much antiquity as the fort at Annapolis, and I have a great respect for old and ancient institutions. I am second to none in the Province of Nova Scotia in my respect for old and ancient institutions, but, even in that respect, you must have a choice. I have respect for an old and ancient fort, but I have none whatever for an old cow pasture, and that is what Fort Anne is at the present day in Annapolis Town. Some people residing in Halifax, honorable senators residing in Halifax, hon. leaders of the Grit party residing in Halifax, may recommend that this fort be preserved, and that everything on that fort be preserved, and there let it remain, so that it may be looked upon by visitors, so that people may talk about it, and that would be all. But the people of Annapolis desire something different from that. They are willing to have their sentiments aroused with reference to the antiquity of the Annapolis fort, but they do not desire that this respect for antiquity shall detract from their business, from the progress of the town and from the universal progress which I am proud to say is being seen now in this Dominion of Canada. If we cannot get Annapolis Fort, or some portions of it, some useless portions of it, to assist us in our business transactions in the town of Annapolis, then let us have it put in a respectable state of repair. Let it not be there as a bar and a blot upon the town, but let us endeavor, let this Dominion Government endeavor to place that fort in a proper state of repair, so that it may be a respectable piece of antiquity and not what it is at the present time. I am pleased to know that the Minister of Militia has designs to place it in a respectable state of repair, but that is not all we want. We know perfectly well, it is known to everyone who understands the history of the Province of Nova Scotia, that Fort Anne at Annapolis has been one of the first military institutions in this country. It has boasted of its 135 pieces of ordnance. Now we have not a gun there to bless ourselves with, and, if the Minister of Militia should happen to come down to that part of the country, we have nothing to receive him with except an old Queen Anne musket to fire a salute in honor of his arrival. We should like to have some guns there. We have had guns.

Mr. BAKER. Big guns?

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Big guns—large guns—I do not know how many pounders. But I know that when I was a boy—and I was born immediately across from the old fort—I watched the fire which poured out of those guns at Fort Anne, when General Williams—and Annapolis was his birth place—came there as the Governor of Nova Scotia, I remember those guns being fired from Fort Anne, but now we cannot hear the sound of a gun, and all the guns have gone, every one of them. I do not know whether they have gone because the Imperial Government have transferred this property to the Dominion, but I do know that when it was Imperial property we had guns, and now we have none. I could not but remark the difference between British Columbia, a new country, and this Fort Anne, an old country.

Mr. BAKER. British Columbia is an old country.

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). They have a battery there, but no men to man it. We have men and they have enrolled themselves, and that enrollment is now in the Department of Militia, but we are told there is no money to form a battery at Fort Anne, and we cannot get the enrollment fixed. Now, I say in reference to this old fort, that every Frenchman in this House, and every Englishman in this House should combine upon this common ground, where their ancestry have fought, and bled, and died in endeavoring to wrest from each other this spot which is now the common spot of all of us. I think it is only right that this monument of antiquity should not only be restored, as it were, and as I am informed the Minister of Militia intends to do, but that we should have guns there and men who are ready to take charge of those guns.

Mr. JONES. I am glad to find that the hon. member for Annapolis has such a great respect for the historical spot mentioned in that town. I share with him the regret that he naturally feels that a place of such historical reminiscence should be left without the means of defence. But if they have not the modern weapons of warfare, we know, from what has taken place there, that at least they have what is obsolete, to some extent, in modern warfare, but which answers a useful purpose in other warfares—they still have the smooth bore. Now, I share in the desire that this place should be restored and ornamented. If I am correctly informed there were certain parties in Annapolis—I will not mention the names—

Mr. MILLS (Annapolis). Name them.

Mr. JONES. They are doubtless known to the hon. gentleman himself, who have approached the present administration on more than one occasion, to endeavor to purchase that property, and they have placed upon it a value very far beneath its actual value in the market, at least such is my information on the subject. It was in the apprehension that the Minister of Militia might be led to accept a valuation placed on it by interested parties for their own purpose, that I ventured to bring this to his notice the other day in a motion that I made in the House. It was clearly with the intention of putting the hon. member on his guard, because I was led to believe that the sum of $2,000 had been mentioned as the value of that property, whereas, if it was placed in the market for tender and sale, it would realise $15,000 or $20,000. Be that as it may, I am glad to hear that the increasing business of the town of Annapolis demands the disposal of this property; but the last time I visited that very interesting spot, I am sorry to say that, according to my recollection, there was ample room for the extension of her commerce, and think that if the Government adhere to their resolution to retain this property at their own disposal, the trade and commerce of the town of Annapolis will not be interfered with for many years to come.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). It is gratifying to hear the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), giving evidence of his conversion in the course of ten years; it is pleasant to hear him express his anxiety that these old historical forts of which, at all events, in the Lower Provinces, we have too few, shall be guarded and restored. It is within the memory of every Maritime Province man, who, during the last seven or eight years, has taken a run over to another old historical fort, Fort Cumberland, that a change for the worse, has, within ten or twelve years, gone over that fort. When we were boys, many of us here, going to school in that neighborhood, we used to spend our holidays walking over the old broken ramparts of Fort Cumberland, and hearing the guide tell stories about the history and capture of that fort. But there were some things there that we could see for ourselves, and they were the old French guns. But let a traveller go now to the old historical fort, the most interesting spot of old Acadia, and ask once more for the old French guns, and the guide tells him they are gone. When he asks what became of them the current story is that these old guns were sold when the senior member for Halifax was commander-in-chief of the fort. They were sold to make cooking stoves of, and that is worse than beating the sword into the ploughshare—melting down an old historical gun into cooking stoves.

Mr. JONES. This is the first I ever heard of the subject; I never heard before of making cooking stoves out of brass cannon.

Barracks in British Columbia..... $10,000

Mr. BAKER. I would like to ask the Minister of Militia if it is the genuine, honest intention of the Government to spend that money this year?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. In answer to the hon. member, I must say that, knowing him as I do, I am perfectly certain he would not be such a staunch supporter of the present Government if he were not perfectly certain that all that is placed in the Estimates is genuine and true.

Mr. BAKER. The hon. member for Victoria is a believer in deeds, not words.

Expenditure in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia..... $ 180,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is for the purpose of flattening the slopes and of cutting and removing loose rocks; $153,000 is the estimated cost; and the engine house at the Pacific terminus, $37,000. This concludes the expenditure in connection with the Government work on the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I thought that was completed and the work handed over.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It has been handed over, but it has not been finally completed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the arrangement now in force with the Canadian Pacific Railway as to remedying those enormous grades which exist on three or four miles of that road, just before you enter British Columbia, near about Stephen? The grades there reach to nearly 1,000 feet in four or five miles. If my recollection serves me this is contrary to the whole tenor of the agreement by which the company undertook either to construct the line at some other point or to build a tunnel. I want to know what the agreement is that is in force with respect to that matter.

Mr. POPE. The arrangement is that when the company are called upon by the Government to remedy and improve those grades, they are bound to do so, and they have left with the Government $1,000,000 worth of land grant bonds as security to secure its completion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We have an engineer in charge of this road, Mr. Schreiber, who receives a special salary for looking after it. What estimate does Mr. Schreiber make of the cost of remedying those grades and reducing them to a proper figure?

Mr. POPE. He estimated the cost of remedying those grades at about $800,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In what way? By tunnel?

Mr. POPE. Eighteen hundred feet by tunnel, which will be a small part of the distance.

Mr. WELDON (Albert).

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because, if my recollection serves me, several serious accidents, attended with loss of life, have occurred, and there is more or less risk all the time. It seems to me that the arrangement should be put in force within a reasonable space of time, and should not be hung up indefinitely, as it appears to be, from statements of the Minister of Railways and Minister of Finance; and that within a year, or two years at the furthest, the defect ought to be remedied.

L. K. Jones, services as Private Secretary to Chief Engineer of Canadian Pacific Railway..... $100

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This amount of $100 carries with it, I suppose, $2,000 or $3,000?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. By an Order in Council dated 10th July, 1882, $100 was allowed to Mr. Jones for the year 1881-82, in his capacity as secretary to the Chief Engineer of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that amount has been voted yearly since, with the exception of the year 1882-83 when Mr. Jones was acting as secretary to the Intercolonial Railway Commission, and consequently it was not voted for that year?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I fancy I am correct in saying that this implies that Mr. Schreiber receives $2,000 a year as engineer for the Canadian Pacific Railway during the next year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What has Mr. Schreiber to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway during 1887-88? We have been given to understand that all connection by the Government with the company had ceased.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have just passed a vote for $180,000 in connection with that railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under whose superintendence is that money to be expended? Is it to be under the superintendence of the Government, or is it to be handed over to the company?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It will be under the supervision of the Chief Engineer.

Halifax Extension..... $11,000

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Minister of Railways if the Government have yet come to a decision with respect to the application made to appropriate a part of the west side of Water street, and give increased accommodation at the deep water terminus, so called, at Halifax. I observe there is an item of $11,000 placed in the Estimates for Halifax Extension. At the interview which my colleague and myself had with the Minister of Railways, we pointed out to him the requirements of that terminus, and it was admitted by Mr. Schreiber, and by the other officers of the Department, that at present the accommodation at Halifax is not sufficient for the business. With the obligation of the Government to afford increased accommodation to the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, under the terms of their charter, I hope the Government are now prepared to deal with the subject generally.

Mr. POPE. How generally? Will you explain the meaning of that phrase?

Mr. JONES. To deal with the question as regards the necessity of increased accommodation for the Intercolonial, which would also embrace accommodation for the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, which, under the terms of their agreement of 1879, re-enacted in 1882, and confirmed by the decision of the Privy Council last year, the Government are bound to afford to that railway. I, therefore, contend that the opportunity now presents itself to carry out the obligations of that company and to secure what is absolutely necessary, that which is admitted to be necessary by the officers of the Railway Department, increased accommodation at Halifax for the traffic of the Intercolonial itself. I suppose this small amount is intended for some matter of repairs. Of course, it cannot be intended for any extension, and I shall be very glad to hear from the hon. gentleman whether the Government propose to enlarge the terminal railway facilities at Halifax, both for the Intercolonial and the Windsor and Annapolis Railway. The petition which has been forwarded to the Government and the plans which are now in their possession show how easily the work can be accomplished at a very moderate cost. When hon. gentlemen are spending large sums in all parts of the Dominion, in the eastern part, in British Columbia and in the North-West, I think we have a right to expect that, at least, we shall have such terminal facilities at Halifax as are necessary for the accommodation of the business. I pointed out on another occasion that a steamer loading at one wharf had to get part of her cargo at Richmond at very great expense, and if the Minister of Railways expects to make the Intercolonial Railway a success, and have the business properly despatched, he will recognise the necessity of having sufficient accommodation at Halifax for all purposes.

Mr. KENNY. I agree with all my colleague has said as to the necessity of increased terminal facilities for the Intercolonial at Halifax. I have listened with pleasure while my colleague has urged on the Government of the day the necessity of this increased accommodation, because on previous occasions when he has addressed this House he has grown wildly eloquent over the diminishing trade of Nova Scotia and especially of Halifax. I am sure he is urging this matter on public grounds, and he could not consistently do so if the trade of Halifax was decreasing and the trade of Nova Scotia was diminishing. I am glad, therefore, to find on this occasion that the hon. gentleman is right, and he must have been laboring under some great hallucination when he deplored the decreasing trade of Halifax, when, in reality, the commerce of that city was increasing. It has been shown on previous occasions, in this House, that there is no more necessary expenditure of public money than that for the improvement of the winter port of the Dominion at the city of Halifax. On previous occasions it was the duty of the Minister of Railways to expend large sums of money at Halifax. My hon. friend seemed to be almost sad that it was necessary for the Dominion of Canada to spend so much money in the city of Halifax, and I am glad, therefore, to have his assistance on this occasion in urging on the Government the necessity for the expenditure of public money in that city for the improvement of the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. JONES. My worthy colleague has argued from a different standpoint entirely, and is endeavoring to make it appear that I was opposed, to some extent, to the expenditure upon the deep-water terminus.

Mr. KENNY. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Precisely. Where my hon. friend and I differ is in this: that I say it was not spent at the proper place, that the expenditure should have been made at Richmond, that the water-side should have been secured from Richmond down to the sugar refinery, and that there was a petition presented by every shipowner and steamship agent in the city of Halifax with reference to that very question. If they had done as we contended they should have done, and placed all the sheds and wharves at Richmond, it would then have obviated the necessity of cutting half a mile more into the heart of the city, at very heavy expense, and when they came into the city they did not take sufficient land or water accommodation for their purpose. This they could have secured at Richmond at a much smaller expense than was required at the deep water terminus. But, having spent the money there, I am not going to say it is sufficient, because it is not, and having settled upon having a deep-water terminus for the landing and the discharge of goods, any one of common sense would say: As you have made it, make it large enough. My argument is to take the land near it, as has been recommended to the Minister, and give us at the deep-water terminus that accommodation, even at a little increased expense, which we should have had at Richmond, if wiser judgment had prevailed. As regards the increased business, it is mostly through traffic; it does not bring much to Halifax under any circumstances; it is only for the accommodation of the Upper Canadians and not for us at all. When the steamers come there we want accommodation, so that our goods can go into store and be forwarded. Last year the stores were breaking down with goods, simply because we could not get them over the Intercolonial Railway, and we want more shed accommodation and more water-side accommodation for steamers, because, being connected with steamers myself, I know the great convenience of securing berth room for steamers. There is only berth room for two steamers, with all this expenditure, one on each side of the wharf, so that the present accommodation is not at all satisfactory.

Mr. BORDEN. I leave the members for Halifax to settle the question of whether the trade of Halifax is increasing or diminishing, but I am glad to agree with them in urging on the hon. Minister the importance of increasing the terminal facilities for handling freight at the Intercolonial Railway at Halifax; and I do so, not in the interests of the city of Halifax simply, nor in the interests of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company, but in the interests of the whole western part of Nova Scotia. The eastern part of Nova Scotia has had its roads built by the Government, and they are owned and operated by the Government. The western part of Nova Scotia has had its roads managed by a company, and of course, has had necessarily to pay higher rates for freight, and has thereby suffered inconvenience as compared with the eastern part of Nova Scotia. When the Windsor and Annapolis Railway was constructed, certain concessions were given to the company as a bonus to help build that road, and one of them was that they should have the use of all terminal facilities in Halifax.

Mr. JONES. And extensions.

Mr. BORDEN. And extensions. Now, during this Session the question was brought up as to the discriminating charge which has been made against the west in favor of the east, by which cars are charged $1 going in from the east, and $2.50 going in from the west. In this connection, I would like to ask the Minister if he has considered the question, and whether he has made up his mind to do justice to the western part of Nova Scotia by equalising these charges? I would also call the attention of the Minister to some resolutions which were recently passed by the Halifax Chamber of Commerce. Very likely copies of those resolutions have been sent to him, but with the permission of the House I will read them:

"Resolved, that the Halifax Chamber of Commerce again call the attention of the Dominion Government to the importance of and necessity for a frost-proof freight warehouse at Halifax, and urge upon them that a sufficient sum be again included in the Estimates for the erection of such a building, and its completion this year;

"Also, resolved, that a copy of the above resolution be sent to our representatives at Ottawa, and that they be requested to have the matter brought up for consideration as early as possible during the present Session. Also, that a copy of this resolution be sent to all Nova Scotian members at Ottawa, and their co-operation solicited to secure for Halifax a building which would be mutually beneficial to the whole Province;

"Whereas, this Chamber has on several occasions expressed its desire that the terminal facilities at the Intercolonial depot at Halifax be improved that local freight be received and delivered at the deep-water terminus; and also that freight facilities at North street be afforded the Windsor and Annapolis Railroad, thus affecting a large saving in the handling and cartage of goods to and from this city;

"Therefore resolved, that this meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of Halifax once more desires to impress on the Government the necessity of these extensions of railway facilities and improvements in the handling of freight being at once made, and hereby urges on the county parliamentary representatives that effort be made to secure these much-needed facilities, for the trade of the city and Province, at an early day."

Mr. KENNY. The importance of this subject not only to the city of Halifax, but to the Dominion, as it involves the expenditure of public money, must be my excuse for addressing the committee again. My hon. friend the member for King's (Mr. Borden) has very properly brought to the notice of this House that the trade of the western portion of Nova Scotia labors under a great disadvantage, from the fact that the goods which are transported over the Windsor and Annapolis Railway are left at Richmond, where my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, says the water terminus should be. I think, Sir, that nothing could more clearly prove the error of my hon. colleague than the argument advanced by my hon. friend from King's (Mr. Borden), and I tell my hon. friend that no greater injury could possibly have been done to the trade of Halifax, and consequently to the trade of the Dominion, than to have left the water terminus of the Intercolonial Railway at Richmond. I suppose this is an excuse for my hon. friend, that when he was a member of a government and a Minister of the Crown he did not secure proper facilities for the Intercolonial Railway. Now, Sir, I contend that no wiser expenditure of public money was ever made than when the Intercolonial Railway was extended to the present deep-water terminus. And here I may take the liberty of making a suggestion to the hon. Minister of Railways. The very fact that the railway extends to the deep-water terminus will, I hope, enable the hon. Minister of Railways to secure the right of way from the wharf-holders in the city of Halifax, and lay the rails right down to every wharf in the city. Now, that could never have been done if my hon. friend's idea of having the deep-water terminus at Richmond had been carried out. My hon. friend has reminded the hon. Minister of Railways that it was absolutely necessary that some change should be made, and some improved facilities given, owing to the fact that the railway stores were breaking down with the immense quantity of goods in them, and that that was a benefit to the Upper Canadians. Is not my hon. friend a Canadian?

Mr. JONES. No, a Nova Scotian.

Mr. KENNY. Well, I am; and as the Upper Canadians are to pay their share of this expenditure, it is quite right, if they can send goods down there and we can send goods to them, that we should provide proper facilities for their transportation over the Intercolonial Railway. It was only the other day that I reminded the hon. the Minister of Railways that that railway was built to develop intercolonial trade, and that, without the Intercolonial Railway, we could not have a national existence.

Mr. JONES. My hon. friend asks me whether I am a Canadian. I will answer him in the language of a late Secretary of State, that I am a Canadian by Act of Parliament. With reference to the explanation of the hon. gentleman with regard to the terminus, he forgot to state that the terminus of the Intercolonial Railway was brought into the city of Halifax by the Administration of which I was a member.

Mr. KENNY. To North street only, and only for passengers.

Mr. JONES. He forgot also to state that there is not a pound of freight received or shipped from the deep-water terminus, so-called. It is only through freight that is landed from the Upper Provinces, and it only reaches the deep-water terminus by a siding, which was brought into the city by the Government of which I was a member. At the time that Government was in power we took care to have a survey made of the whole water-side of Halifax; and, my hon. friend is aware, if we had remained in power, it was our purpose to bring the line down Water street from the North street station, just as the deep-water terminus is reached from the North street station to-day. The hon. gentleman has been speaking aside from his argument, because every dollar we spent there was to bring the line along Water street to accommodate the business community of Halifax.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). This subject is one of considerable importance to the people of this whole Dominion. For some time the wish has been expressed by a great many people that the terminal facilities of the Intercolonial Railway at Halifax should be increased, which, I believe, would be in the interest of the whole Dominion. As one who has had considerable to do with the Intercolonial Railway for a number of years, I can say from my own experience that the lack of those facilities militates very much against the passage of freight over that road. Shippers who send flour from the west to the Maritime Provinces over the railway lines running through the State of Massachusetts to Boston receive from them free storage for 60 days, while on the Intercolonial Railway, they must unload the cars within 48 hours, or else be obliged to pay a charge of $2 per car per day. You can readily see that the privilege granted by the railways running to Boston, enables shippers to take out their flour as they require it, and consequently they do not have to bring in so much at once. In this connection, I may say that while the extension of terminal facilities at Halifax is very much needed, yet I think the whole policy in connection with the Intercolonial Railway needs to be very greatly remodelled. I notice by the Auditor General's report that the Government railways have cost the country $49,000,000. I also find that the expenses on the Intercolonial Railway last year exceeded the receipts by about $106,000. I think it is something for regret by the people of the whole Dominion that a railway that has cost us so much should not be able to pay running expenses. It is our bounden duty, therefore, to see if we cannot make such arrangements as will overcome this difficulty. I believe that if the arrangements now in existence for the carrying of freight over that railway were changed, the Intercolonial Railway, instead of having a deficit every year, would show a surplus. A week or two ago, when this matter was discussed for a few minutes in the House, the hon. Minister of Railways stated that the great difficulty was to get freight for the cars running to the sea. I always thought the opposite was the case, and I was very much pleased when I heard that statement. The hon. Minister further stated that the cars going to the sea were almost empty, and that any freights they got in that direction were almost clear profit. If that be the case, I think I can point out how, by a slight modification in the tariff now in force on the Intercolonial Railway, it can obtain such an enormous quantity of freight as will, I believe, fully make up the deficit which now exists. During the recess I interviewed a few shippers in the western part of Canada, in reference to the quantity of freight they were shipping to the Maritime Provinces by Boston, and I found that only five firms, from whom I got figures, had sent last year 1,294 car loads of flour by that route. That was a total of 161,750 barrels of flour which these five firms sent to the Lower Provinces via Boston, and every barrel of which would have gone over the Intercolonial Railway, had a reasonable policy been adopted on that line. Mind you, Sir, this is only from five firms. I have no means of ascertaining how much flour there is going via Boston, but I have no doubt this quantity, large as it is, is only a small fraction of the quantity that is going to the Maritime Provinces via Boston, and not only flour, but cornmeal, beans, and a great many other articles of produce. The question is, can we not effect an arrangement whereby this flour will go over the Intercolonial Railway. It would be the easiest thing in the world to do this, and, with the permission of the House, I will just mention how it can be done. The freight from the town of Chatham to Halifax at present is 65 cents a barrel on flour; but if the party brings in 2,000 barrels in one month, he gets a rebate of 10 cents per barrel, making a net freight of 55 cents. If he brings 1,500 barrels a month, he gets a rebate of 7½ cents; if he brings 1,000 barrels, his rebate is 5 cents. If he brings 500 barrels, he has a rebate of 2½ cents, and if he brings in less than 500 he must pay the full freight of 65 cents. As I pointed out the other day the effect is that the large importers have an advantage over the small importers to the extent of 10 cents a barrel. The consequence is they cannot compete with the large shippers, over the Intercolonial, and are forced to get their flour via Boston. The difference in rates via Boston is just enough to send the traffic by that route instead of over the Intercolonial Railway. The large shipper will get his flour at 55 cents freight delivered in Halifax over the Intercolonial Railway, but he can get it delivered in Halifax via Boston for 50 cents, making a difference of 5 cents on each barrel of flour, which in the state of the flour market, is sufficient to induce him to bring in his flour by the cheapest route. Understand, Sir, that this difference exists only when the shipper brings in a large quantity, but if he brings in less than 500 barrels per month, the difference is 15 cents per barrel, or $18.75 a car. I would suggest to the Minister of Railways that by a slight reduction in the rate charged over the Intercolonial Railway, all this flour would be forced over the Intercolonial Railway instead of going via Boston. Last year for a few months the experiment was tried, I believe, partially, at our solicitation, and that of other large millers of Ontario, and the rate on the Intercolonial Railways was reduced to 40 cents a barrel from Chatham to Halifax. The consequence was that, during the time that rate was enforced, scarcely a single barrel went via Boston. What I would point out to the Minister of Railways is, and I think it is in the interests of the country, that where the remedy can be applied it ought to be applied. If it was, instead of this large quantity of flour going over American roads, it will come over our transcontinental line. I do not think that the discrimination made in favor of the large shippers is at all in the interests of the community. It does not cost more to draw a small quantity than a large one in proportion, and it is not fair to the small dealer that he should be discriminated against as he has been. In reference to the freights on the Intercolonial Railway, I find, on looking over the tariff, that while a man can get his flour to Halifax for 55 cents, if he goes to Stellarton, Hopewell, New Glasgow or Pictou it will cost him 15 cents more. That is certainly not fair. Then if you go on the main line to Shubenacadia, Oxford, Moncton, Amherst, Newcastle, and as far west as Campbellton, you will find the rate to these points is 15 cents higher than to Halifax. Is that businesslike and just that men 250 miles this side of Halifax should be compelled to pay 15 cents more than is charged the shipper to Halifax? We expect different treatment from a government railway than what we would from a private company. The latter generally take every advantage they can. If they find they have no competition at certain points, they make such rates as they think they can exact from the people; but when a railway is directed, owned and controlled by the Government, we expect that railway will be conducted in a more equitable manner than other railways. In all these questions there is no reason why flour or any other produce should be carried 200 or 250 miles further for 15 cents less than to the points I have named. The Minister of Railways should take up this matter and see that such a system is enforced as will send that traffic over our Canadian lines. It is to be regretted while we have this railway running through Canadian territory, built by Canadian people, with Canadian money, that it should not be used to carry Canadian produce from one Canadian port to another. No man who will go to the wharves at Halifax, St. John and Charlottetown can help being sorry when he sees the immense quantities of flour reaching those places through American territory. This spring, on the 1st May, there must have been 25,000 barrels of Canadian flour lying at Boston ready for transshipment to Halifax. The Nickerson line have a steamer sailing every Saturday from Boston, which is loaded down with Canadian flour; and I say that these matters are to be regretted, and I think it is in the interests of the whole people that such a system should be inaugurated as would prevent this carrying of flour and sending the Canadian traffic away from our transcontinental lines.

Mr. BORDEN. Before this item is carried, I would like to have some explanation from the Minister in regard to the rate of $1.50 charged on eastern cars, and $2 charged on cars going in from the west. Has he taken that matter into consideration and has he made a change, or will he make a change?

Mr. POPE. I have considered the point. I find that shunting the cars from Richmond, where the western traffic is, is more than as much again as from North street station, and that is the reason for the difference. I will say to my hon. friend, who said he hoped this was the beginning of enlarging the accommodation at North street station, that this particular item is for a flour shed at Halifax. The other matter to which the hon. gentleman referred, and to which he and my hon. friend behind me have already called my attention, is now under the consideration of the Government.

M. JONES. Where is the flour shed to be built—at Richmond?

Mr. POPE. It is to be built at North street. I do not know exactly the spot.

Mr. JONES. I am glad to hear they are doing that much, but it seems a very small amount to be charged to capital account. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat, has called the attention of the Minister to the rates on flour. If the hon. gentleman had referred to the account, he would have found in corroboration of his statement that the number of barrels of flour has decreased to the extent of 168,000 from the previous year. That is a very large item in the way of freight for a single line, and entirely corroborates the statement of the hon. gentleman. I hope the Minister will give his attention to it. There is one point here in the report of the Department to which I would like to draw the hon. gentleman's attention as well. At page 18, in the reference to the Intercolonial Railway, it says:

"A large expenditure, such as is usually charged by railway companies to capital account, but which has been charged to working expenses, has again been made this year for additions and improvements to the road and its equipment, embracing additional sidings, station buildings, semaphores and fences, and such improvements as the introduction of iron bridges, heavy rails, increased number of ties, more powerful locomotives and a modernised style of cars; this expense, together with the fact of an increased volume of through coal traffic, &c., to the west, carried at such rates as to increase the expense without a corresponding increase in the earnings, has resulted in an insufficiency of earnings to cover the amount of the working expenses by $106,042.84."

I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if they are carrying coal over the Intercolonial Railway at a loss?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Then the sooner you put a stop to it the better. I would ask the hon. gentleman upon what principle they are carrying coal over the Intercolonial at a loss, and levying tribute upon the taxpayers of this country for the benefit of a particular coal mine, and are carrying other goods at a very heavy rate? I pointed this out on a previous occasion and my hon. colleague corroborated my statement, because he himself is a director in that company. What is the rate on coal to Montreal?

Mr. POPE. Three-tenths of a cent.

Mr. POPE. Well, the freight on sugar from Halifax to Montreal is $4.40 a ton. Now, it exactly bears out the contention I have always made that, if the Government can carry other freight at the rate at which they are carrying it, they can afford to carry the products of our industries, our coal and cotton industries at St. John, Moncton and Halifax to the west, at very much lower rates than they are charging at the present time. The hon. gentleman shakes his head, but they are not carrying them at a loss, are they?

Mr. POPE. They are not making anything.

Mr. JONES. Are they carrying them at a loss?

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. JONES. But he admits that they are carrying coal at a loss for the benefit of one industry, for it is largely the Spring Hills industry, though possibly some may come from Pictou as well. I say they have no right to carry it at a loss. If it cannot go at a reasonable rate, sufficient to compensate for the wear and tear of the road, they have no right to carry it at our expense; or, if it is to be admitted as a principle that the road is to be worked in that way, and every article that goes over it is to be carried at a loss, let us understand it, and it would be largely in the interests of those manufacturing industries which have been lately established in Halifax, St. John, Moncton, and other places along the line, which will be of a permanent character; but I protest most earnestly against such an indication as this that the rolling stock and the staff of the company are employed in carrying coal over the line at an absolute loss to the country. I hardly expected to hear such a statement as that submitted to Parliament. It does credit to the frankness of the hon. gentleman, but very little to his good judgment or to his management of public works.

Mr. KENNY. I regret to trouble the committee again, but great minds converge, and this subject of the Intercolonial Railway exceedingly interests us in the Maritime Provinces. My hon. friend has called attention to the fact that the rates charged on the product of the sugar refinery, the cotton mill and other industries of the Lower Provinces are high rates—I do not exactly like to say high rates, but rates which are at least fairly remunerative—and I think that, if possible, those rates should be lowered. Having, during the past few months, had an opportunity of looking into the charges on the railways of Canada, I find that the rates on the Intercolonial Railway as a rule are very moderate and reasonable. As regards the rate on coal, three-tenths of a cent per ton per mile, I do not know that that rate is very much under the rate charged by the Pennsylvania coal roads. The hon. Minister admits that it is not remunerative to the Intercolonial Railway, and consequently that to some extent the Treasury of the country may suffer, but we must remember that the Government of Canada are the owners of the Intercolonial Railway, and my hon. friend from Halifax will recognise, looking at this question commercially, that, if any line of railway could secure the direct and very large indirect trade which the development of a colliery on its line, which ships over 500,000 tons of coal annually, would give it, the owners would be prepared to carry that coal at a very low rate in order to secure the very large indirect trade that must accrue to the railway from the fact that the mines in Cumberland county have no important outlet except over that railway. Whilst the rate of the coal which is carried is very low, the Intercolonial Railway receives fair rates, at least, from the people who travel over that road, the people who are employed about that colliery, and from all the goods, provisions, &c., that these people require. I think that would be an answer to the remarks of my hon. friend with reference to the rates on coal. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) has referred to the rates at which flour is carried to Halifax and St. John, and that higher rates are charged to points west of Halifax and St. John. But he must be aware that Halifax and St. John are competitive points. I entirely agree with him in thinking that the Intercolonial Railway should carry flour at those rates, and if it does not the freight will be diverted to Boston, and that is what we want to avoid. But the same argument will not apply to points west of Halifax or west of St. John, although the haul is shorter. It is just the difference between the long and short haul; that, in fact, is what led to the interstate legislation in the United States, which, I hope, we shall never see adopted in Canada.

Mr. BORDEN. The Minister has explained that the reason of the discrimination in the charges between the east and the west is due to the fact that more shunting is required of the western cars. Well, I do not quite understand that, when the line for thirteen miles outside of Halifax is common to the two railroads. If the agreement which was made by the Government with the Windsor and Annapolis Railway Company is being fulfilled, surely the cars should be in the same position. I cannot understand why a car coming from the west should require more shunting than a car coming from the east.

Mr. JONES. They do not; they are all in the same position.

Mr. BORDEN. They should be in the same position if the agreement is being kept. I would respectfully submit to the Minister of Railways that it is rather a small matter for the Dominion of Canada, but it is a very large matter for the individuals in the western part of the Province who are suffering by it. The cars of both lines, I am informed, come to Richmond, therefore they are at the same point and the shunting would be precisely the same. Therefore, it is plain that the western freight is not treated in the same way as the eastern freight, and I contend that an unnecessary injury is done to the western commerce of Nova Scotia, and it should be remedied at once.

Mr. MULOCK. It is to be regretted that the Minister of Railways has no answer to make to the criticisms of mismanagement advanced by the hon. member for Kent, (Mr. Campbell). He has disclosed a state of affairs indicating, I think, an entire want of regard for the general interests of the country. The old Provinces, at a vast expenditure, constructed the Intercolonial Railway for the purpose of binding the various eastern Provinces together, and to assist in developing interprovincial trade. Then, when the Dominion was enlarged, we built a transcontinental line, and we now boast of having a railway from ocean to ocean. But what is the use of having a railway from ocean to ocean if one large portion of it is so operated under this Administration as not only to injure one of the greatest interests of the Dominion, the milling interest, but also to fail to utilise, to a fair extent, the capital invested in the construction of the railway, and thus diverting the traffic to another railway and to a foreign land? And this is done by a government that has always boasted of keeping everything in Canada for the Canadians, that will not allow a railway to be built from the new Provinces in the North-West to the American frontier, for fear that some Canadian money may pass into American hands, for fear that some Canadian traffic may find its way to American territory. But in a case like this, where their interests seem involved, that a policy should be adopted to develop intercolonial trade, the Minister not only fails to appreciate what is due to the country, but he sits in silence and has no answer to make; in fact, I doubt if he listened to the able argument of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). I observed his indifference at the time; of course it may, to some extent, be accounted for from the fact that he is being subjected to criticism. But he and every hon. member of this House must be aware that the greatest industry of Canada, I think by all odds, is the manufacture of flour. But though all the other industries of Canada are suffering, and have been suffering for a long period of time, the flouring industry has been the greatest sufferer, and when we are told by the hon. member for Kent that the adoption of an equitable tariff, would, to a large extent, remedy a portion of that evil, surely it cannot be tolerated on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, that they should allow that evil to continue, especially seeing that this is a paternal Government. What is the cause of disaffection in the Maritime Provinces to-day? Do we not hear complaints there that we are taxing their bread? That we are making it hard for the poor man to supply himself with the necessaries of life? Why is there discontent in the Maritime Provinces? Partly, no doubt, because we are forcing them to buy western manufactured goods. We are compelling them to buy in markets far away, when they say they can purchase to better advantage in markets nearer home. Perhaps they have arguments on their side, and if their complaints are well founded surely it is our duty as a Government to endeavor, as far as possible, to remove all possible grounds of complaint. But when it depends upon the will of a Minister, or, perhaps, of his deputy, to do justice, and try to replace this discontent, to some extent at least, with contentment, and aid, to some extent, an industry which is now suffering, and has been suffering, as the Government well know, for some time, it is inexplicable to me that this is not done, and that a fair system of rates is not established. Throughout the United States this question of discrimination has been agitated, and at last it received a temporary solution in the passage of an interstate Bill. There the great argument was, that the railway companies discriminated in various ways against localities and against individuals. What has been complained of in the United States, and what Congress has endeavored to remedy, has been going on in this country, on the part of corporations not under the control of the Government, merely, but on the part of the Government itself. The Government itself is one of the principal sinners against the people in the adoption of this unsound principle of railway rates. The hon. Minister of Railways has been charged here with demanding a higher rate to deliver goods and flour at a point two or three hundred miles easterly, than he does to deliver the same quantity of goods, under the same conditions, two or three hundred miles further away. On what principle does he charge more for hauling a short distance than a long distance, the long distance embracing the shorter distance? And on what principle does he make a rebate in favor of a man supplying 2,000 barrels of flour, when he will not make a similar rebate in favor of a man supplying a carload of flour. Whatever ground there may be for discrimination of rates, when you come to a carload, the whole people of Canada, except the railway companies, are of one mind on this point, that wherever a customer supplies a carload or more he should have the lowest rate in reward to his carload, and that discrimination should not take place except on fragments of a carload. The Minister of Railways must deal with this question if he faithfully intends to live up to his oath of office, and he must exercise the best judgment he can bring to bear upon it. This matter has gone on for years, and if he does not know—and he does know, for he is too shrewd a man not to know it—he ought to know that this matter of a few cents per barrel on flour means a difference between millers making and losing money; and it is in his power, as I have shown here, by a small reduction in the matter of freight on flour to do a much larger volume of business, and thus the gross receipts of the railway would be much larger than if by adopting almost prohibitory rates he drives these thousands of barrels of flour away to go by a rival system. It shows a lack of business enterprise, of which I did not think him capable. I thought the Minister of Railways was a shrewd business man, who, although he does not take much part in debate, understands his business well and practices what he understands. But his declaration, which was admitted to be correct, compels me unwillingly to withdraw my confidence from him as a business man. I know it will be a matter of grief to him to learn my views in regard to himself; but I express my views in this plain way in the hope that in endeavoring to restore himself to my good judgment he may amend his way and at the same time confer a benefit on the Dominion and the various interests which go to build up this country.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The last subject on which I expected to hear hon. gentlemen lecture the present Government was in regard to the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, and it only shows how quickly these gentlemen lose sight of obvious facts which have engaged their attention and the attention of the whole country. It is a very curious thing that there is, perhaps, no subject on which persons unacquainted with railway management fall into such obvious errors as that of railways, as has been done by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). What has he done? He has attacked the Government for not so cutting rates on the Intercolonial Railway as to take the traffic that has been going by Boston and other routes. That is his whole argument. His argument is not that the charge for carrying a barrel of flour is an extravagant charge, not that it has not been carried at a very reasonable rate, not that it has not enabled the flour millers of Ontario, with all this tax about which the people of Ontario are exceedingly anxious, to furnish and sell flour to the people of the Maritime Provinces at the lowest rates at which they had ever purchased it in their lives, and this notwithstanding the charge on the Intercolonial Railway and the imposition of the duty. Is there, then, anything of which to complain? If the people of the Maritime Provinces obtain, as they do to-day, flour at the lowest cost at which they ever obtained it, by Boston, by water or by any other route, is there any reason for complaints? Is there any reason to complain as regards the duty or the charges on the Intercolonial? I say there is not. The low rate at which flour is carried in the Maritime Provinces by the Intercolonial has enabled the business to be done, that valuable description of business that binds Provinces together, that links together the interests of Ontario and the Maritime Provinces, for every article sold by one Province to another, every article interchanged forms an additional link, drawing us together and giving a common interest and better information and knowledge of the various Provinces in regard to each other. I say, therefore, that this trade is most valuable. What is the argument of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell)? He says, although he does not undertake to say that the charge for carrying a barrel of flour to the Maritime Provinces is not a very low rate, that the rate might be made lower still so as to cut the rate and prevent flour going by water to and from Boston and other American ports. That is his argument. How does he sustain it? He turns around and attacks the Government for cutting rates, for doing the very thing he demands they should do.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, and I will show you how. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, in his ignorance of the subject—yes, I do not profess to be able to discuss questions of law with him, and if I did so, I would immediately exhibit my ignorance of the subject—but I am more experienced in the administration of railways than is the hon. gentleman, and he must, therefore, excuse me if, having spent several years in the study of this freight question, I should have more knowledge of the subject than an hon. gentleman who is devoting his time so successfully to the prosecution of the law. I say, therefore, that the hon. gentleman will not accept my remark as being in the least degree offensive, for it is not intended to be so. It is want of knowledge of the subject that leads the hon. gentleman to accept the argument of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), and to claim that it is a great hardship to charge a larger amount for carrying a short distance on a road. There is not a road in the world in which we do not find that same thing done. It is the only mode by which we can administer railways successfully, and that is to charge a fair and legitimate amount for the service you perform, where you are enabled to get that charge, and where you would lose the business unless you cut the rate, also meet competition by cutting that rate to the lowest figure and thus get the traffic if you can. The Grand Trunk Railway, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the railways in the United States could not carry on their business and administer their affairs successfully for a single hour if they did not adopt that policy; and as I said before the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) while he did not characterise the charge for carrying flour on the Intercolonial as excessive he made two points: First, that rates ought to be cut so as to take away the trade vid Boston to the Maritime Provinces; and, second, the hon. gentleman attacked the Government for charging a reasonable rate where there was competition, and carrying freight at a lower rate per mile than where there was no competition. That is just the difficulty into which the hon. gentleman has fallen; it is the difficulty into which everyone falls who has not taken the trouble to investigate the question of railway freight. But the last subject on which I expected to hear hon. gentlemen opposite undertake to lecture hon. members on this side was with respect to the administration of the Intercolonial Railway. The member for Halifax has attacked the Government for carrying coal at a loss. If by carrying coal at a rate that does not even pay, if the effect was to build up the traffic and business between the Maritime Provinces and the older Provinces, if the effect is to produce such competition with the coal mines of the United States as will give the consumers of coal in Ontario great reduction in the price they would otherwise have to pay, the country is no loser by the course adopted. But what is the result of the management of the Intercolonial Railway? Will hon. gentlemen be surprised when I tell them that, during the fiscal years 1877, 1878 and 1879, in which the road was operated and managed by hon. gentlemen opposite, the loss on the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, the amount taxed upon the people of this country to pay for operating the Intercolonial Railway, was $507,000 in 1876-77; $432,000 in 1877-78; and $716,000 in 1878-79, the last year when hon. gentlemen had the administration of the road. That is to say, Sir, that during those four years—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They hadn't the administration of the road in 1878-79.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They had the administration of the road; everything was organised, the estimates were taken and everything necessary for the work was provided. The hon. gentleman himself has always charged the administration of the year that they came into office as our administration.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because we kept within the estimates and you grossly exceeded them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has always charged the administration of that year to us, and taking him on his own principle I charged the year to them for which they provided the administration of the road, in which their superintendent and general manager administered the road, and I say that during those three years they took out of the taxes of the people of this country $1,645,637 to provide for the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. DAVIES. How much of that was for 1878-79?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. $716,000. But there was a million spent before the change in the administration of the road; a million sunk, a million taken out of the taxes of the people to pay for their administration of the Intercolonial Railway before the change of Government occurred, from 1876, or in two and a-half years, if you take away all the portion afterwards, although it might fairly be charged. Now, what does the other side of the account show? It shows that during the seven years of the administration of this Government, the entire amount of net deficiency for the Intercolonial Railway, instead of being $1,645,000 in three years, as it was under hon. gentlemen opposite, was only $246,000. Now, Sir, if anything could close the mouths of hon. gentlemen opposite; if anything could induce them to avoid a discussion of the question of the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, it would be the facts as they stand on this page of the history of the country, in a way in which they can be read by everybody. I say, therefore, I am very much surprised that hon. gentlemen opposite, in exercising their legitimate right to criticise these estimates, and discuss all these interesting public questions, should not have carefully avoided that as a rock upon which they must inevitably be wrecked, if they come in close proximity to it. I say that for the first year of our administration, the first year after we took it in hand, after we had reformed the administration of the railway, it showed a loss of $97,000 instead of $716,000, and the second year a gain, and the third year a gain, and the fourth and fifth years a gain, so that instead of being a loss there was a slight balance on the right side of the ledger; and if, under these circumstances which have been adverted to, the great difficulties which have been encountered, owing to the extremely unfavorable seasons, there should be a comparatively small loss, I do not think it is a question which should excite the anxiety of the House at all, but one which may be regarded as still presenting a most interesting and favorable contrast as compared with the administration of the Intercolonial Railway by hon. gentlemen opposite. I did not intend to say a word on the subject, but when I found an elaborate attack made on the railway administration of this Government, and when I know, as I do, that if there is one thing upon which this Government can claim the confidence of the people of this country more than another, it is the success which has attended the management of the Intercolonial Railway, I felt bound to take the opportunity of placing these figures fairly before the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman must presume exceedingly on the ignorance of the House when he dares to talk of the advantages which have resulted from the management of the Intercolonial Railway. Now, in the first place, there could not be a more unjust, a more disingenuous, or a more dishonest comparison than that which he makes between the Intercolonial Railway under the Administration of my hon. friend Mr. Mackenzie, when that road had been barely completed, before there was the smallest chance of developing traffic upon it, and the road as it is now, after nine or ten years. The hon. gentleman talks about a net deficiency of $246,000, as contrasted with a net deficiency, as he stated, of $1,700,000 in three years, under Mr. Mackenzie's management. Turn to the Public Accounts and you will see that Mr. Mackenzie left the capital account closed at $36,000,000, and this hon. gentleman has a capital account of $46,000,000—ten millions of dollars added in eight years to the capital account of the Intercolonial Railway! And he presumes to talk to us of his wise and economical administration of that road. I take these accounts here, and I say they are a fraud, every one of them. Here we have $404,000 charged to capital account of the Intercolonial Railway—$318,000 for rolling stock, $12,500 for Servis' tie plates, $500 for a coal shed at Amherst, and other things of that kind. I say there never was a more impudent statement made than the statement which is made by his friends and himself, in the Public Accounts, of the supposed profits, forsooth, they made in operating the Intercolonial Railway; a profit of $100,000 in one year, a profit of $20,000 in another, with a capital charge of two, three, one and a quarter, and another one and a quarter millions, or, in eight or nine years, ten millions added to the capital account of this road. Why, Sir, the interest and the sinking fund of the Intercolonial Railway is $450,000 a year for that alone, and I venture to say that during those eight or nine years, if you computed it, you would find probably one and a quarter millions for interest alone, over and above what was expended in Mr. Mackenzie's time. Now, I say that is a most delusive and a most dishonest mode of making comparisons. I say the hon. gentleman all through has been guilty of very gross offences against the public interest, by his consistent and persistent practice of charging large sums of money, as you can see for yourselves he is doing, in this way to the charges on capital account of the Intercolonial Railway. You cannot possibly pretend that you are administering this road honestly and fairly, when you find these charges are being placed to capital account for perishable articles. Now, one thing is very noticeable. Here we have evidence admitted by these hon. gentlemen that important branches of their trade are being operated at a loss, and we find on and for the benefit of that trade he has operated at the loss of hundreds of thousands of dollars on rolling stock, for the last few years. Is that economy and good management? And what is most unfair is this, that, as the hon. gentleman knows quite well, Mr. Mackenzie could not—no man could—expect, the moment a road of that character was completed, and running through a sparsely peopled country, to develop the traffic. With all railroads that I know anything of, it has always been expected that some time should be allowed, after the road is completed, before the traffic can be developed. But the main point to which I call the attention of the House is this, that all these comparisons are fallacious and dishonest, because they take no account of the enormous additional charge, amounting now to $450,000 a year for interest, on capital sunk by that hon. gentleman since Mr. Mackenzie's time. Take that into account, and the Administration of my hon. friend stands justified from the Public Accounts the hon. gentleman has referred to, and justified as few other Administrations have ever been.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken if he supposes that he can mislead either this House or this country by such a statement as he has made. He knows perfectly well that the administration of the Intercolonial Railway by myself was challenged by my predecessor, the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and that year after year, on the floor of this Parliament, I vindicated that administration, and showed that the accounts of the Intercolonial Railway were kept by the same officers and in the same manner that they had been under his management. Not only that, but I brought evidence from the Grand Trunk Railway and other great lines of railway in Canada, all of which showed that the accounts of capital were kept by them on precisely the same principle as they were kept under the administration of

Mr. Mackenzie, and under my own. Now, the hon. gentleman says the road was just being completed at the time they were managing it. Why, that gave them this great advantage, that everything they wanted for the road was charged to capital account, and they had not the disadvantage that we have had year after year of having to maintain old rolling stock which has been deteriorated by use, and which requires a much larger amount to keep it up than was required when the rolling stock was new. I say this question was fought out fully, and the criticisms of the hon. gentlemen were analysed for years. Take up the Hansard of the last few years of my administration of the road, and you will find that Session after Session passed by almost without question, after this battle had been fairly fought out, and after it was shown to the House that the accounts of the road under our management was precisely the same as it was under theirs, that nothing they had not charged to capital account had ever been charged to capital account by us. I am not speaking of the late Government or the present Government only; I am speaking of the principle of keeping accounts followed by every railway company. In the first place you charge to capital account all that the construction of the road costs—the station buildings, wharves and everything else that is necessary to put the road in complete and efficient order, and you charge all the rolling stock that is required to perform the business of the road. You then charge to revenue all that is necessary to maintain the track and the rolling stock in good condition; but the moment that a large increase of traffic demands a large additional outlay for new rolling stock, every railway company charges that to capital account; and when, from the time we took charge of the Intercolonial Railway down to the present hour, the traffic has gone on increasing steadily year after year until it has more than doubled, and new rolling stock was required to accommodate that increased traffic, where does the hon. gentleman suppose we should get the money necessary to provide for this great volume of traffic, but from capital? Does the hon. gentleman mean that we should not furnish the rolling stock that is necessary to handle all the traffic we can get? He will hardly say that. He will hardly say that, after the enormous sum of money which has been spent in constructing the Intercolonial Railway, it is not the duty of the Government to provide all the rolling stock that is necessary to meet the demands of the increasing traffic of the country. Therefore, I need not, as he has done, deal in strong language—language which I think went a little beyond the bounds of ordinary parliamentary discussion, but for which I excuse the hon. gentleman in view of the very difficult and embarrassing position in which he finds himself. There was nothing in the fair, and legitimate, and candid argument that I put before the House to warrant him in using terms which I think, if the Speaker had been in the Chair, would hardly have been permitted to pass. But I admit that the hon. gentleman had a weak case, and that it had to be bolstered up by strong language, and I excuse him on that account. But I ask him, in all candor, whether he thinks that the expenditure for the purchase of the Rivière du Loup branch and the expenditure necessary to put it in efficient condition, can fairly be charged against me as having been wasted in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, and improperly charged to capital account? Is not that part of the $10,000,000? And yet he led the House to believe that all this money was sunk in the administration of the road. Not a dollar of it was sunk in the administration of the road. From the day we took charge of the railway the only money sunk in the administration of the road was $246,000 in seven years, against $1,646,000 which our predecessors ran behind in the three years of their administration. In every other expenditure we followed the same policy that was pursued by hon. gentlemen opposite; and the hon. gentleman cannot show a single dollar expended for the purpose of providing for the administration of the road, that is not a legitimate charge against capital account, just as in their own case. As I said on a former occasion, the country ought to be only too glad to have the Government come here and ask for an increased appropriation, charged to capital account, to provide for the increased traffic which was growing up. There can be no greater satisfaction to the people of this country than to know that having expended such a vast amount of money in the construction of that road, it is doing that for which it was constructed, so developing the country as to make it right and proper for the Minister to come and ask Parliament for an increased appropriation to provide for the increased traffic.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman was so very mild, candid and moderate in his own language that no doubt he is justified in going out of his way to make an attack on the Administration of Mr. Mackenzie.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not do that. I was defending the Government, and not making an attack.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The fact is Mr. Mackenzie and myself, having fully considered the subject, and seeing clearly that there was no possibility of administering the Government road without exposing the country to the very considerable danger of being dragged into an unnecessary expenditure, put an end to the capital account, and the hon. gentleman is quite misinformed, and has misinformed the House, when he states that Mr. Mackenzie charged to capital account all the items which the hon. gentleman has placed to that account. Now, the fact is this: that my hon. friend, in carrying out the rules which he laid down for himself, made a very large amount of charges to income which he would have been perfectly justified in charging to capital account. If the hon. gentleman will look, if his memory has failed him on that point, he will find that when my hon. friend substituted steel rails for iron, a very important change, largely conducive to the benefit of the road, he charged a large portion of that to income.

Mr. JONES. $800,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. $800,000, or about $1,250,000 of this extra expenditure, taking the amount which was legitimately chargeable to Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, were caused, my hon. friend tells me, by the substitution of steel rails for iron. There is a proof exactly in point. The reasons which led us to adopt that course were very clear and sound. In an ordinary railroad, the process of which the hon. gentleman speaks may go on, they may never close their capital account, and I believe they never do, and I know, and the hon. gentleman knows, that it is a constant ground of complaint by shareholders of railways, that the keeping of this capital account as an open account is very often abused by directors and persons in authority, for the express purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of the shareholders, who, in this case, are the people of Canada, and by millions of dollars of charges to capital account concealing the fact that the railroad very often is worked at a loss. The hon. gentleman cannot pretend, and has not pretended, to deny the fact that whereas the capital charge for interest in Mr. Mackenzie's time was roughly about $1,750,000, the capital charge to day is quite $2,250,000. What he says may be true enough in some respects, but it does not destroy the fact that our charge for interest sunk in this Intercolonial Railway is nearly $500,000 to-day more than it was when Mr. Mackenzie went out of office, and that, in any ordinary railroad, it would have produced an annual deficit of $500,000. After spending all this money purchasing all these additional pieces of road, after spending huge sums for this additional rolling stock and charging it to capital account, you would still have a net deficiency to-day of more than $500,000, not taking into account charges of management at headquarters which must amount to a considerable sum of money. Those are the points to which I called attention. They have not been and cannot be met, and there ought to be for that reason a great difference between the charges on a government and the charges on an ordinary railway. Mr. Mackenzie had deliberately decided for that reason on making future charges for rolling stock which might be required, to revenue account. I do not gainsay the point that the rolling stock might be required, but I told the hon. gentleman that Mr. Mackenzie had decided to charge it to the annual outlay from year to year for the reason I gave, that unless it was charged to income, the House and the country behind it was in great danger of being thoroughly deceived as to the real cost of working the railway. Nothing is easier in a road like this, having an immense amount of rolling stock, when for certain reasons it is convenient to make a good showing before the House and the country at election time, and that rolling stock has become depreciated—nothing is easier than to take a large vote of several hundred thousand dollars and use it where the money will go far to propitiate electors, who are interested in seeing car works companies or other companies getting orders, and then, by charging the expenditure to capital account, the hon. gentleman and his predecessors could avoid the imputation of having swollen the annual expense to the people. But the whole of it does not in the slightest degree touch the main fact, that, so far as the interest account is concerned, the annual charge—because neither in the hon. gentleman's nor the hon. Mr. Mackenzie's time has this road paid any portion of the interest charged on its capital—the annual charge on the capital is nearly $500,000 a year now more than it was in Mr. Mackenzie's time. Therefore there is to-day an annual deficit of more than half a million dollars, after hon. gentlemen opposite have had ten years to operate the road and develop its traffic, and after all this money has been sunk. That is a fair, candid, mild, moderate mode of stating the case, if the truth be known. So far from its being the case that the hon. gentleman's contentions were allowed to pass undisputed in this House, Mr. Mackenzie, while he had strength and voice left, never failed to challenge them, and the late Speaker, Mr. Anglin, never failed to controvert them, and I have always taken exception to the hon. gentleman's mode of keeping the accounts and in particular to the facts that he ever took in consideration the additional charge for interest which was laid on the people and paid for out of their pockets, year after year, by reason of large additional amounts sunk in capital account.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No person can regret more deeply than I that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), is not in the possession of that strength and vigor that enabled him always to defend the administration of the Intercolonial Railway, or the manner in which he discharged his duties in any other respect. No person can regret it more deeply than I, and I would be very unwilling to be supposed to make, in the slightest degree, any attack on that hon. gentleman. I did not, and I am not attacking that hon. gentleman. I stated simply, in defence of the Government, when the administration of the road was attacked, the facts, and I contrasted the administration of the road under hon. gentlemen opposite with that under hon. gentlemen on this side. The hon. gentleman says that Mr. Mackenzie had determined to close the capital accounts. I understood him to say that. I would like to ask him then where the money was to come from to do what the hon. gentleman behind him (Mr. Jones) told us, if Mr. Mackenzie had not gone out, he was going to do, namely, to carry the railway away down to Water street, in Halifax, which we subsequently had to do at a very large expense in order to find a water site for the terminus?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. He could have charged it to income; it would not have cost us any more.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that any Government, or that any person who ever had charge of a railway, would have charged such expenditure to income?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They might.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What good would it do to charge it to income, with a deficit in revenue of $750,000?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That was yours, not Mr. Mackenzie's.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman seems to forget that it makes no difference; the interest would be the same.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then what harm would it do?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The interest would be the same. I ask the hon. gentleman whether, if he had remained in power, he would have allowed the grass to grow on the Intercolonial Railway, if he would have refused to do the business of the country? No, he would say at once. He would say that he would develop the traffic of the country, as he would be bound to do, by every means in his power, and that he would prepare to handle that traffic by every means in his power. He would be bound to do that. Then I say, as you have no surplus against which you can charge the money which is required, what possible difference does it make in the interest? Is not the interest the same? If it had gone to swell the deficit year by year, would not that swell the interest in the same way? Does it make any difference at all?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it does, as I will explain to the hon. gentleman presently.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think it does. The accounts of this road are kept—and I think the hon. gentleman has conceded that—as railway companies are accustomed to keep their accounts, and I established that in the discussion I had with my hon. predecessor and with the hon. gentleman, and I think the question rested very much upon that discussion, because, practically, nothing more was said on that subject. We had that very fully discussed. I brought the evidence from other railway companies, and showed how they kept their accounts, and I understood that that was held practically to settle the question. But what I want to put to the hon. gentleman is this: Not a single dollar has been expended that has not been demanded in order to maintain the road, and provide for the additional traffic that has grown up in the administration of the road, and that has required to be handled. Therefore, I say, as that money has been required to be furnished, providing the road was to perform the purpose for which it was constructed, it does not make the slightest difference to the country whether it is charged to revenue or capital, so long as you have no revenue account, no surplus from revenue account, from which to deduct it. I will take the Grand Trunk Railway Company, I will take the Great Western Railway Company, I will take any railway company, and the hon. gentleman knows that if they require a large additional capital for new rolling stock, or for any new work along the line of road, or to make connections or branches or anything of that kind, such as has been required in connection with the Intercolonial Railway in order to bring traffic to it, the shareholders, the stockholders, the managers must issue new stock or must raise a new capital account from which to get the money if they have not got a surplus revenue from which to draw it. So it is after all the same thing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I cannot admit that it is after all the same thing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so. It does not affect the question of interest the country pays, the money the country pays. It has to be paid in the one case or in the other, and it makes no difference. I show the hon. gentleman in the first instance that the administration has been the same, that the same charges had been made against capital account under the one Government and under the other, under both Governments alike; and I show him in the second place that it is practically a matter of indifference whether it is charged to one account or the other, so long as the money has to be provided by the country.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In one sense, no doubt, the hon. gentleman is right. What money is really requisite to carry on the necessary works of the road will have to be paid by the country, and he is right enough in stating that, whether you charge it to income or whether you charge it to capital, what is really necessary will, in the long run, come out of the same pocket. So far he is right.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the whole question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, that is not the whole of the question by any manner of means. The reason which was assigned by Mr. Mackenzie, which was assigned by him particularly at my instance, I may tell the hon. gentleman, is this: We know by experience—and every man of common sense who considers the question will see the force of the argument—that, unfortunately for itself, no House of Commons cares anything like as much for the sums which are spent on capital from year to year as for the sums which are charged to income. It is a misfortune. It is a very great error, I have often thought, that the House was so indifferent as to the large sums which are put to capital in comparison with the charges which are put to income. And I do not allege that is peculiar to gentlemen on one side of the House more than to gentlemen on the other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear; no doubt that is so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it is desirable for that reason that, in working a Government railway, as soon as you can, or if you possibly can, you should close the capital account in order to concentrate the attention of the people on the way in which the railway is worked. The railway will be worked more economically, it will be better attended to, more attention will be given by the House, more attention will be given by the officials and by the Government, if you are compelled to come down for a charge from year to year which will go against the ordinary income of the year; and that was the reason which induced my hon. friend to advise in his Department the closing of the capital account. That was the reason, and it is a very good reason. In one respect, my hon. friend did take caution and make an exception. He stated, and, as the hon. gentleman alluded to it, I will say that that is one point on which an exception does exist—that, if it was necessary to construct a considerable additional portion of railroad—not a siding or a small piece of work of that kind, but a considerable additional portion of railway—that, being in the nature of an entirely new work, would warrant the re-opening of the capital account; but, with that exception, we had decided to close it altogether. And I think that the fact that such an enormous addition has been made since his time to that capital account, and that it has attracted so very little attention in the House, and that nobody has apparently paid the least attention to the fact that our charge for interest on the capital of the Intercolonial Railway has increased by half a million since his time, is the best proof of the substantial wisdom of Mr. Mackenzie's decision.

Mr. MULLOCK. The Minister of Finance in pointing out how imperfectly I was informed in relation to this matter, appeared to imply that he was so superior, and, indeed, in his own judgment infallible, an authority that the conclusion he arrived at was absolutely right, and was supported by all the authorities. I did not profess to speak, nor do I now, on any authority of my own, but I gave the authority of persons who are better versed, perhaps, in this question than either he or I. The Minister of Finance has been so long connected with the operation of railways, that he has come to look at the railway policy from a railway standpoint alone. Therein, I think, is his weakness. I think his long dealings with railways has rather rendered it difficult for him to view the question impartially in the interests both of the railways and of the public. I am not in favor of any unjust laws against the railways, but I am in favor of what will be both just to them and fair to the public. When I advanced the view I did, I did so, as I stated before, on the authority not only of public opinion, but of the action of the United States Congress in dealing with the matter. We have had limited dealings with railways compared with our neighbors to the south of us. Their system of railways is manifold greater than ours, and the difficulties we have here they have had there, and the very question which has been under discussion, which was so ably brought out by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), has revealed a state of things here which has been recently dealt with in the United States. The hon. the Minister of Finance, in giving his version of what was right, took a ground which I extremely deplore to have understood as his attitude and, I presume, that of the Government. He affirms that the present system of operating railways, discriminating in all its viciousness, meets with his approval. That is the attitude which he, as the leading member of the Government, takes in regard to this question. He will not, I think, find the country with him on that question, and particularly that portion of the people who are so deeply interested in the carrying trade—I refer to the first producers, the farmers of the country. The manufacturers, as a rule, locate at points where competition can be obtained. The farmers have no such advantages, and as a rule their freight is carried from non-competitive points, and as a rule they suffer all the disadvantages and all the injustices which are the outcome of this system which the Minister of Finance approves of. I will just trouble the committee by reading section 4 of the interstate Bill which received the sanction of Congress on the 31st January last. Section 4 says:

"That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this Act, to charge or receive any greater compensation in the aggregate for the transportation of passengers or of like kinds of property under substantially similar circumstances and conditions for a shorter than for a longer distance over the same line in the same direction, the shorter being included within the longer distance,"—

That is the case complained of by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell)—

"but this shall not be construed as authorising any common carrier, within the terms of the Act, to charge and receive as great compensation for a shorter as for a longer distance."

And then follows the proviso that, under special circumstances, the commission may give a dispensation from that enactment. That is now the law in the United States; it is in full force there. Are all the wise men, all the experienced men, of the United States wrong, and is the Minister of Finance right? This is the principle which the hon. member for Kent is asking for. I will read the proviso:

"Provided, however, that upon application to the commission appointed under the provisions of this Act, such common carrier may, in special cases, after investigation by the commission, be authorised to charge less for longer than for shorter distances for the transportation of passengers or property; and the commission may, from time to time, prescribe the extent to which such designated common carrier may be relieved from the operation of this section of this Act."

Section 3, which meets the case of the complaint, further says:

"That it shall be unlawful for any common carrier, subject to the provisions of this Act, to make or give any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever; or to subject any particular person, company, firm, corporation or locality, or any particular description of traffic, to any undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever."

There the United States say that a locality should not be put to a disadvantage because of its position. The Minister of Finance says that it shall. He says that it is, in his mind, the right policy to handicap a town where there is but one railway, and that railway, according to his doctrine, may charge all that it can exact according to the laws of trade. Now, I do not agree with him, and I do not think that a large portion of the country will agree with him in that doctrine. If there is one portion of the people that have been suffering from legislation since I have been observing the action of this Parliament, if there is a class of people that has on all occasions suffered from the effects of legislation passed by this House, it has been the farming community. They suffer upon all occasions. If it is a matter of tariff, they suffer; if it is a matter of legislation, they suffer; and when now it is being asked to relieve them to a certain extent, by even carrying the outcome of their produce at a slight reduction, it is denied. Why, we maintain, it would not be unreasonable if the Government, for the sake of producing harmony throughout the Dominion, should carry their produce at a less rate. There are two distinct points involved in the consideration of the work of the Intercolonial Railway: one is, whether it is to be operated as a strictly commercial enterprise; the other is, whether it is to be operated as a public work in the general interest of the country. The two are not altogether, perhaps, reconcilable, but still, I believe that, by a liberal policy, by developing largely the trade of the country, the Government would not be great losers; on the contrary, they would stand a chance to enlarge the volume of trade which they now lose in consequence of the high freights. They may now get higher rates than they would otherwise, but the net profits are less than they would be under a more liberal policy. Under these circumstances I think it is to be deplored that the Government have taken this stand upon this question. They have come to a conclusion which I think public opinion will reverse when the opportunity presents itself.

Mr. DAVIES. The Minister of Finance has shown himself a skilful general in coming to the rescue of the Minister of Railways and changing the entire argument, as, instead of answering the argument that was presented to the House to-night, he covered up his retreat in a great cloud of words, and by making a counter-attack upon the management of the railway under the late Mackenzie Administration. I think that on that branch of the case he has received a complete answer from the member from South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), an answer which, I think, will hardly justify a production of these charges again in this House. But, while it may have sounded very fine to some new members, those of us who have had the pleasure of sitting here the last four or five years, remember that the statements made to-night by the hon. Finance Minister are simply repetitions of the statements he has made every year since I have been in the House; and every year he has had his answer in the same line that he has got it to-night. I am satisfied that the answer which has been made to him is a complete answer; but I think that the importance of the question brought before the committee by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) deserves a little more from the Minister of Railways than the contemptuous silence in which he has seen fit to treat it.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman has a great faculty for getting up and calling hard names. I tell the hon. gentleman I will not be treated in that way by him.

Mr. DAVIES. I say that the statements made by the hon. member for Kent were of a serious character, quietly and sensibly delivered, statements which challenge and demand a reply from the gentleman who has charge of the Department of Railways.

Mr. POPE. I think I know my business as well as you do.

Mr. DAVIES. Well, he may treat the statements with contemptuous silence, but the country will demand an answer to them. I have seen the hon. gentleman before now try to get through his estimates by sitting quietly by, hoping that no reply would be required. I admit that when old political charges are revived, he has a right, if he chooses, to treat them with silence, but when charges of a serious nature have been made, he has a duty to perform to this House and this country which he has failed so far to perform. The first statement on which the hon. gentleman based his charge was that he found there was a deficit of $106,000 last year in working the Intercolonial Railway. But that is not all. That does not embrace the Eastern Extension branch; there is $24,000 out of a deficit on that branch besides. But leaving that out of the question, and confining myself to the statement brought forward by the hon. member for Kent, I say that it justified him in occupying the time of the House for an hour or so, on the ground that we found this great Intercolonial Railway running now at a large deficiency, and he said it behooved us to look into the question and find the causes. Were they political or did they lie in the management of the road? He thought that he discovered that they did lie in the management of the road. He says that road had a competing line. There was the all-rail line to Halifax and the Maritime Provinces, and there were the roads that run to Boston, and the water line by steamboat from Boston to Halifax and Charlottetown; and the question was: Are we getting the natural carrying trade we ought to have, or were we allowing that traffic to go by rail to Boston and then come back to Charlottetown and Halifax? He showed that by the rates, which you have fixed upon the Intercolonial Railway for flour, there is a difference between western Ontario and Halifax of 5 cents per barrel, a sufficient difference, he said, speaking as a large dealer in flour, to throw the whole traffic upon the American line. That required an answer. The hon. Minister of Finance does not answer it by referring to the general results in the management of the road under his time, as compared with the management under Mr. Mackenzie's Government. That has nothing to do with this point. Why is not flour carried as cheaply over the Intercolonial as it can be carried round by way of Boston? They tell us that the cars go down empty; why not have them full? It is not a question of discrimination of rates to which the hon. member for North York (Mr. Mulock) referred, that was not the only point, or the chief point, adduced by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell). His point is that the cars are going down empty; you can get them filled and make larger returns if you only carry flour at the same rate for which it can be transported by way of Boston. Speaking from a provincial standpoint, the case of Prince Edward Island is still worse. I find that flour can be carried from western Ontario to Boston for 38 cents per barrel, from Boston to Charlottetown, 16 cents, with insurance, 2 cents; making 56 cents as the cost of landing a barrel of flour from western Ontario at Charlottetown. What is the cost by the Intercolonial? From western Ontario to Pictou Landing 65 cents, from Pictou Landing to Charlottetown 7 cents, or 72 cents. There may be some explanations to be given; I am not prepared to say there is not; all I complain of is the silence with which the hon. gentleman treats these statements. We have a right to know the reason why that road had been worked at a loss of $106,000 in a year, and why when an hon. gentleman points out what seems to be a reasonable method of making up that loss, he fails to obtain an answer from the hon. Minister. More than that, the different rates make a difference of 16 cents per barrel or $20 per carload. The hon. gentleman is aware that by the regulations of the Intercolonial Railway if an importer takes 2,000 barrels per month into Halifax he obtains a certain allowance. That allowance does not extend to flour, which comes to Pictou Landing. Why? There are from 150,000 to 152,000 barrels of flour sent to Prince Edward Island, but the importer of 2,000 barrels a month does not get the same rebate as the importer does at Halifax. I cannot understand why these discriminating rates exist, and to my mind the committee is entitled to an explanation of this point by the Minister.

Mr. JONES. It was in anticipation of some discussion similar to that which is going on this evening, that I moved for a return of the expenditure on capital account on the Intercolonial, and I had entertained the hope that it would have been brought down before this time, because we could then have had before us grounds on which an argument on either side could have been based or sustained. I trust that this return will be brought down as soon as possible, so that it may be referred to at some subsequent stage of the debate, and we may see exactly how the expenditure has been made. My hon. friend in front of me, referring to the expenditure on capital account under the Mackenzie Administration, referred to the amount Mr. Mackenzie charged for working expenses. When it was necessary to place steel rails instead of iron rails on the Intercolonial, $800,000 which were invested, was charged by Mr. Mackenzie to working expenses. There was also the expense of widening the track, which Mr. Mackenzie also charged to working expenses. If it was proper under Mr. Mackenzie's Administration, to charge such item to working expenses, the Minister of Finance could hardly justify some of the explanations made by him with respect to capital account. But the hon. gentleman justified the expenditure on the ground of the enormous traffic, as he was pleased to call it, on the Intercolonial, an increase, which he said, had been so rapid as to demand from this House a yearly appropriation for additional rolling stock. Let us look at the return for a moment. I find as long ago as 1882-83, the earnings of the Intercolonial were $2,370,000; 1883-84, $2,353,000, or $17,000 less; 1884-85, $2,368,000 or $2,000 less; 1886, $2,383,000 or an increase of $13,000. Referring again to the increase in the number of tons of freight carried, I find the following: 1883-84, 1,001,000 tons; 1884-85, 870,000 tons, or a reduction of 30,000; 1885-86, 1,008,000 tons, an increase over the previous year of 7,000 tons. I submit that these tables which are brought down here as an indication of the expansion of trade over the Intercolonial, do not warrant the extravagant language which the Minister of Finance has used with respect to the expansion of trade over that public work. If the hon. Minister requires a vote for rolling stock to meet the vast increase in traffic, I am not sufficiently familiar with railway management to deny that it might not be a correct appropriation to charge to capital account; but, so far from increasing, there seems to have been in the previous year a falling off, and in this year a very small increase. And this very small increase does not justify the position taken by the Minister of Finance that they require a large appropriation of money for rolling stock, to meet the enormous increase of traffic over the road. I think the hon.

gentleman is hardly justified in that view in the language used with respect to the appropriation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to show the hon. gentleman that the statement I made with respect to freight cannot be impugned. The number of tons of freight carried on the Intercolonial was as follows:—1876, 6,221,758 tons; 1878, 7,883,472 tons; 1885, 14,659,271 tons; or more than double the quantity of freight carried in 1876. So that continuously down, as I have stated, there is a gradual increase. In 1880 it was 9,000,000 tons, in 1881, 12,000,000; 1882, 13,000,000, in 1883, 13,000,000; 1884, 13,712,000; 1885, 14,659,271 tons.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the cause of the difference between the two tables? This is an official table from which my hon. friend quoted?

Mr. JONES. What are you quoting from?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The official abstract in the office.

Mr. JONES. How many millions does the hon. gentleman say?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You must be calculating on a totally different basis.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is from the blue-book, and I have now the official record in the office, and it shows: 421,327 tons in 1876-77; 522,710 tons in 1877-78; 510,861 tons in 1878-79; 561,924 tons in 1879-80; 724,577 tons in 1880-81; 838,956 tons in 1881-82; 970,661 tons in 1882-83; 1,001,163 tons in 1883-84; 970,069 tons in 1884-85, and in 1885-86 they carried 1,008,345 tons against 421,327 in 1876-77, and 510,861 in 1878-79, or more than double the quantity in 1876-77, and nearly double the quantity in 1878-79.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the hon. gentleman give us the figures showing the quantities carried by the Grand Trunk Railway in the same years?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not at this moment.

Mr. McMULLEN. I think you will find that the increase was fully proportionate to that.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I should expect it to be so, and I should be surprised if it were not. Such has been the increasing prosperity of Canada, such has been the development of the country that I should expect a large increase. The table from which I have just quoted gives the total of the railways, and there it is seen that the increase in the whole of the railways of Canada alike shows the enormous development of the country and the enormous increased business upon the railways of the country—one of the best evidences that could be given of the development of Canada.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. gentleman will consult some of the statistics to which I referred him, he will see that the population of the rural districts in Canada increased between 1872 and 1878 six times as fast as it has increased between 1878 and 1887, and if mere increase of rates is a proof of anything, the rural population on that showing would have been six times as prosperous as they have been during the latter of the two periods.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know how unpleasant it is to the hon. gentleman, and how much he suffers from anything which shows the increasing progress and prosperity of Canada that it was almost with hesitancy that I offered such evidence as I have been able to give to the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will notice that he has confirmed the statement of my hon. friend that within the last four years the increase has been utterly insignificant—that between 1883 and 1886 it has apparently only been from 1,001,000 to 1,008,000. How many millions has he added to the capital account in that interval?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not more than in proportion to the work done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Much more, I think, than the difference between those amounts.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). At this late hour I shall only take a few minutes to address the committee. I think, however, the hon. Minister misrepresented my argument altogether, for I never advanced such arguments as he alleges I did. I found, from the public documents which are laid before this Parliament, that a railway which has cost us nearly fifty millions of dollars, was run last year with a deficit of $106,000, and I pointed out, in my own way, how I thought these matters could be remedied. I said I thought there was not an hon. gentleman in this House but would regret that such a state of affairs existed. I am sure the Minister of Finance would like to see a good surplus on the workings of the Intercolonial Railway. I said to the House that only five millers in the western part of the country shipped to the Lower Provinces, by Boston, no less than 161,000 barrels of flour, and I stated that, if the facilities which might be granted on the Intercolonial Railway were granted, every single barrel of that flour would have gone over that road. I do not find any fault with the Intercolonial Railway for cutting their rates at Halifax, as the hon. gentleman stated they did. I said that while it was the policy of the Government, as they claim, to keep Canada for Canadians, in the Railway Committee the other day we disallowed no less than six charters of railways that were asked to be granted in the North-West Territories, and why were they refused? Because as hon. gentlemen said they might take some traffic away to the American roads. Although there were four American railways tapping at the doors of the North-West Territories for admittance, and although the people, without a dissenting voice, were demanding and petitioning this House to grant them the accommodation they required, hon. gentlemen in their wisdom saw fit to disallow those charters, because, as they said, they would take away traffic from Canadian lines, while here was an instance in which there were hundreds of thousands of barrels of flour and other freight going away from our Canadian lines over American territory which should go over Canadian lines, and that was the reason I brought the matter before the Finance Minister. I do not bring it forward in a spirit of partisanship. As a matter of fact it does not make a particle of difference to me whether I send that flour over the Intercolonial Railway or via Boston. If I can send it cheaper via Boston I am going to do it, but while we have that Canadian road, built with Canadian money, and running over Canadian territory, we ought to be able to make such arrangements, such a tariff of rates, as would send the traffic over that road and not via the United States roads. I pointed out to the Minister of Finance, how, by a slight reduction of existing rates, all this vast amount of freight could be carried over the Intercolonial Railway. I certainly thought I was right, as a member of this House, in bringing the argument forward, if it is a proper and fair argument to bring to the attention of this House. I gave you the quantity of flour from these five mills, and I know that other millers at Galt, Guelph, Toronto and others in western Ontario are sending thousands of barrels of which I have no knowledge at all, as I could not get the statistics, but for these five mills I know the figures myself. What was the statement of facts made by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island? The difference now in the rate by Boston and over the Intercolonial Railway is no less than 16 cents a barrel; but does any business man think the millers of Ontario are going to send their flour over the Intercolonial Railway at present rates? I will venture to say that there are hundreds of thousands of barrels going to that island every year, and every barrel of it ought to go over the Intercolonial Railway, and would go over it if a rational policy were adopted. A few years ago we used to send thousands of barrels of flour to Pictou Landing, and the steamers going to Charlottetown carried it all, and we also sent a large quantity by the steamers from Point Chêne to Summerside. I think it is disgraceful that while we have lines running through our own territory that ought to carry this traffic, we are by our dog-in-the-manger policy contributing our money to build up American lines. The hon. gentleman said that while I charged the Government with cutting down the rates, I also attacked them for not cutting down the rates. I did not do so. I brought this charge: that while they carried flour to Halifax for 55 cents a barrel, they charged 15 cents a barrel more for carrying it to Campbellton, a distance of 250 miles less. Has the hon. gentleman no sympathy for the men working in the coal fields and in the iron mills of Londonderry in his own county? He admits that he carries the coal and iron for the company at Londonderry at a loss.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). It was admitted that the coal was carried at a loss.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not the iron.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). And yet he charges the poor miners and the workmen of that district for the material they have to live upon, 15 cents a barrel more than the people of Halifax. The same is true of the fishermen about Bay of Chaleurs—has he no sympathy for them? That is my argument. I say that while this road is controlled by the Government of Canada, that Government should have manliness and honesty enough about it not to charge one section of the country more than they charge another—that for like services the rates should be equal. I do not say anything against the rates on the Intercolonial Railway, only that they are not consistent or just to the people of Nova Scotia particularly. The hon. gentleman also spoke of the low price of flour, and he tried to make a point by stating that the people of the Maritime Provinces were getting their flour at a lower price now than they ever did before. Why is that the case? Because the raw material is reduced in value 30 or 40 per cent. Does the hon. gentleman take any credit for that? Does he say that the National Policy brought about that reduction? It is owing to the injurious effect of the National Policy, which has reduced the price of the raw material, and is injuring every farmer throughout the Dominion to-day. The hon. gentleman will not go to a farming district in Ontario and brag that flour and wheat are cheaper than they were before the National Policy was in force. I have only to say in conclusion that I thought that when we were discussing matters in connection with the Intercolonial Railway, it was proper to point out the difficulty to which I have been referring, and endeavor to find a remedy. The hon. Minister says that the cars go down to the sea empty. Surely it would pay to carry flour in them at $30 or even $20 a car, rather than to take them down empty.

Mr. POPE. The cars are coal cars.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). I have seen thousands of Intercolonial Railway cars up west, and does the hon. gentleman mean to say that no freight goes west of Montreal?

Mr. POPE. Very little.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). Then I say it would pay to take that flour down to Halifax even at the rate I have named.

Mr. POPE. I say it won't.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). The hon. gentleman is actually carrying flour now for a lower rate. For numbers of years flour has been carried from Chicago, over the Grand Trunk and Intercolonial Railways, and delivered in Montreal and Halifax, at a lower rate than the hon. gentleman has been charging the people of Ontario. Surely at the same rates flour could be carried from Ontario at a profit, and it is surely to the interest of the people of this whole Dominion that it should be carried on our own railway.

Mr. KENNY. I agree entirely with the hon. member for Kent that every effort should be made to divert all the freight we can to Canada and to Canadian railways, and to retain all we possess to-day. He must remember that the freight to Halifax and the Lower Provinces must be carried at a low rate, because they are competitive points, and the Intercolonial Railway is competing with roads in the United States.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). There are thousands and thousands of barrels of flour going to Halifax by Boston, and I say the rates on the Intercolonial Railway ought to be lowered in order to compete for that traffic.

Mr. KENNY. The difference to-day in the rate to Halifax by Boston and that on the Intercolonial Railway is 5 cents a barrel. I quite agree with the hon. member that every effort should be made to obtain that traffic for Canada; but I do not agree with him when he says that because the rate to Halifax is necessarily so low—and you must admit that 50 cents a barrel is an exceedingly low rate—the rate to points west of Halifax should be proportionately lower. We must recognise the difference between the long and the short haul, and he knows that it is not in the interest of the millers of Ontario to press for a mileage rate. The rate to Halifax is not entirely made by the Intercolonial Railway, but is made first by the Grand Trunk Railway. We have in evidence the fact that the flour carried over the Intercolonial Railway is generally very satisfactorily handled, and the hon. member for Kent will admit he is prepared to pay the Intercolonial Railway a little more than he would pay by Boston, because he knows that the work is more satisfactorily done by the Intercolonial Railway. As a proof that the work is more satisfactorily done by the Intercolonial Railway, I will ask the attention of the House for a minute or two while I read the evidence of Mr. Lord, a commission merchant of Montreal, which was given on 18th January, before the Railway Commission. He said:

"I have shipped a great deal of flour from different parts of the country, shipped it to Boston, brought it to Montreal, and now we are sending it to Halifax on the Intercolonial Railway. It is chiefly for Newfoundland now. We are moving a pretty considerable quantity. A large quantity has gone down there, and we have some of the vessels loaded. The first one was loaded on Saturday, at Halifax. Another ought to be loaded to-day, and I must say that I have never had so much satisfaction in shipping before as in this case. The vessels are there, and the railway authorities are giving every facility. As soon as the flour is on board they simply telegraph up the number of cars, and we get our bills of lading; the inland freight is paid, and there is no trouble whatever getting the bills of lading. Everything works very smoothly. It is shipped direct from Ontario. We get a rate to Halifax and charter vessels there. Those vessels come with sugar, principally from the Brazils, and we charter them at Halifax and load them."

I would just say to the hon. member for Kent that if he were to ask the merchants of Montreal their views, he would find that they complained of the Intercolonial Railway, because they carried freight very low from Chatham, St. Thomas and other points to the Lower Provinces. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that the rates of freight ought to be as low as possible, but it is hardly fair to lay the entire blame on the Intercolonial Railway, when the rates are partly made by the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Grand Trunk Railway, and other roads with which the Intercolonial Railway has to pool its rates.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not think it possible for the Intercolonial Railway to carry flour into Halifax or any part of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island to compete with the line vid Boston except at a loss. So long as we have the line by Boston, I cannot see any reason why the people should be taxed to bring the flour over the Intercolonial Railway. If there were no other way of getting it, I should think we should have the lowest possible rates on the Intercolonial Railway, inasmuch as we are prevented by the tariff from buying our flour in the United States. But this getting flour from Boston to the Maritime Provinces is not an unmixed evil, because it gives employment to our coasting vessels. Our schooners which carry freights of potatoes and other things to the United States are able to bring back freights of flour; so that no matter what rate the Intercolonial Railway might fix, a very large amount of the flour which goes to Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island must, of necessity, come by the Boston route. However, I did not rise particularly to go into that part of the subject, but I want, before this discussion closes, to ask the Minister to give an answer to the resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce which I read, referring to the construction of a frost-proof warehouse, and to ask him whether the Government intend to bring a vote down in the Supplementary Estimates for the construction of that warehouse. I desire to point out to him the fact, which the hon. the Minister of Finance will know very well, that the great industry of fruit growing has sprung up in the western part of the Province of Nova Scotia, and that this year, during the winter months, 100,000 barrels of apples have been shipped at Halifax over the Windsor and Annapolis Railway. The people of the west cannot ask this railway company to construct a frost-proof warehouse at Halifax, because their road does not go into Halifax. They simply get into that city through arrangements made with the Intercolonial Railway. We have, therefore, to look to the Dominion Government for that warehouse. The Government has seen fit to construct an elevator in the city of Halifax at a very heavy expense to carry out what, in my judgment, is a very unnatural trade, that of bringing wheat from the western part of this Dominion to be shipped at Halifax. The Government established a precedent, in going out of their way to encourage that industry. By a very much smaller expense they could encourage this fruit-growing industry, which has come up within fifteen years in the western part of Nova Scotia, and which is destined to be one of the greatest industries in the Maritime Provinces. I might point out that when a large number of car loads of this valuable fruit is shipped during the months from November to March, thousands of dollars may be lost to the people of the district where the fruit is grown by a sudden lowering of the temperature. I would ask, therefore, the hon. gentleman to give a statement in answer to the resolutions I have read, and the statements I have made, which, I am sure, will be borne out by the Minister of Finance, who from his position as High Commissioner in England, and representative Minister here of Nova Scotia, knows that every word I have said is quite true.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have waited patiently expecting the Minister to give an answer to the hon. member for Kent who has twice asked for a reply. The returns show a decrease in freight of 168,011 barrels of flour carried by the Intercolonial Railway as compared with last year, and the hon. member for Kent has asked the hon. gentleman to give some explanation of this.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman listen to the statement made by the hon. member for King's who has just sat down. There is no object in taking up the time of the House by giving different explanations from different people. The statement of the Minister was anticipated by the very clear explanations just made by the hon. member for Kent.

Mr. BORDEN.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Finance last year belabored and bullied the House the same as he has done to-night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I was not here last year.

Mr. McMULLEN. You were here last night.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You said last year.

Mr. McMULLEN. Last night. And to-night when that statement was made, and the Minister of Railways was called upon for the purpose of eliciting from him information on that point, the Minister of Finance gets up and does the same thing again. It is unfair. The Opposition have endeavored to get information on that point. They have approached the question in a courteous way. The hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) brought this question before the House courteously and fairly, and the Minister of Railways sat still in his seat, until a member here on my left had to get up and explain how it was. He says they carry coal over the Intercolonial Railway at a loss. Why do they not carry flour at a loss? Why should they not try to compete with the railways in America, so that the farmers might get an increased price for the wheat they produce? It is a notorious fact that a barrel of flour can be carried from St. Paul, Minnesota, to Liverpool for less than a barrel of flour can be carried from Guelph to Halifax. You can ship a barrel of oatmeal from the town in which I live to Liverpool or Glasgow cheaper than you can ship it to the Maritime Provinces. Here we have a road which has cost an enormous amount of money, which was built for the purpose of introducing an interprovincial trade, and in place of accomplishing the object which was in view in the construction of that road, the Minister of Railways allowed the traffic of the country to be carried through the United States, over American lines, and back to the Maritime Provinces, when we have a road which should do that work. They carry coal at a loss. Why do they not carry flour at a loss, for a short time at any rate, and so give us a little advantage? I say an effort should be made to do it. I say that the Minister of Railways, when a question of this kind comes up, should be prepared to get up and intelligently deal with a question such as this. Since I have been in Parliament, I have never seen a more sickening exhibition of incompetency than we have seen here to-night, when the Minister of Railways has sat here when questions were asked of him and has never made a single reply. I say it is uncourteous and unfair. Why did he not state why he is not able to carry that flour? Has he stated it? No, he has not. He sits still in his seat and says nothing. The Minister of Finance complains that he is not getting along with the different items in supply. We could get along quicker if they would give courteous and proper answers to the questions put to them by the Opposition. Two hours have been lost on this item? Why? Simply because the Minister of Railways will not get up and deal with a question which belongs to his Department; but, while he sits quiet, the Minister of Finance gets up and tries as has been said before, to draw a red herring across the trail, and to take off the attention of the House to the traffic on the Intercolonial Railway under the Mackenzie Government, as compared with that under the present Government. He also endeavored to show the marvellous ability which is presiding over that road in the person of the Minister of Railways, which is so extraordinary that it has doubled the traffic of that road within the years that it has been managed by hon. gentlemen opposite. He does not realize that there is not a road in Canada that has not doubled its traffic. Take the Canadian Pacific Railway. Take the returns of the Grand Trunk Railway. Have they not increased more in proportion than the Intercolonial Railway? But the hon. gentlemen claim the whole credit for themselves.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not claim any credit for the doubling of the traffic. On the contrary, I explained the necessity for providing additional rolling stock in consequence of the greatly increased traffic.

Mr. McMULLEN. He drew attention to the limited amount of traffic on the Intercolonial Railway when it was handed over to the present Government, and pointed out that since, under the able and efficient management of himself and the gentleman who succeeded him, the trade had doubled, and he claimed credit no doubt to his party for that.

[Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is unfair that the Minister of Railways does not give us some answer in regard to the flour matter. If he had done so some time ago, we might have got over this item. It is not our fault that it has not been passed. The blame lies with the Minister of Railways, who sits in his seat and says nothing. He does not even give a reply to a question, but sits in his seat and treats the Opposition with the utmost discourtesy. I hope and trust that the country will be better served, before many years, with a Minister of Railways than it is now, with a man who will sit in his seat and give no explanation why things are in the position they are, as he has done to-night.

Mr. ROBERTSON (King's). I am sorry that the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Kenny) has left the House, but I understood that he was willing that flour should be carried from Halifax at a cheap rate by the Intercolonial Railway, but that the stations along the line were not to get those cheap rates. I do not think that is a fair argument of the hon. gentleman. I think it is a very selfish argument, that the lumbermen, the fishermen and the farmers all along the line of the Intercolonial Railway should be asked to pay more for a shorter distance than the people of Halifax and the people of Prince Edward Island. I will not say more on the subject as the hon. gentleman is not in his seat.

Mr. WATSON. I have been much interested in this debate to-night, and I have been rather surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite claim that freight should be carried at certain reduced figures over the Intercolonial when the present rates are very low. A few days ago they voted that we should still continue to pay the high freight rates in the west. We have been discussing to-night the estimate for the purpose of maintaining this Intercolonial Railway, which is run at the expense of the country and at a loss to the country, and at the same time this Government is bonusing a competing line through the State of Maine to cut off the trade of the same Intercolonial Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, not to cut it off, but to enable us to do what the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell) wants, to compete with Boston and enable them to take the flour which is now going via Boston.

Mr. WATSON. You are going to take it through the State of Maine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That will not hurt it.

Mr. WATSON. And you are bonusing a railway to take it away from the Intercolonial Railway, which belongs to the Dominion of Canada, but you will not allow the Province of Manitoba to have a competing line to carry their freight. We are told that the Intercolonial Railway carries coal at three-tenths of a cent per mile. The Government, at the same time, allow a road over which they claim to have a certain control, in regard to their freight rates, to charge $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per ton per mile for carrying coal in Manitoba. It is strange for hon. gentlemen opposite to make such statements, when we know they are acting as they are in the west. We are actually paying more for carrying wheat, which is a lower class of freight than flour, from Winnipeg to Port Arthur, about 450 miles, than is paid for carrying flour from St. Thomas to Halifax, a distance of about 1,300 or 1,400 miles. I will not occupy the time of the House further at this hour in the morning, but I will call attention to this fact, that, while you are prepared, as it were, to sacrifice your wife's relations for the eastern Provinces, and compel the whole Dominion of Canada to pay for carrying freight at a loss over the Intercolonial Railway, you compel the people of Manitoba and the North-West to pay excessive freights over a monopoly road which does not belong to the country at all.

Mr. POPE. With reference to the remarks of the hon. member for King's (Mr. Borden), I may say, as I did before, that we are considering now the whole matter of the terminus at Halifax. With respect to the particular building he referred to to-night, the frost-proof building, I can say nothing now. We have not considered that matter yet, but I hope that we will be able to give greater accommodation to Halifax than we have hitherto been able to do.

Increased Railway accommodation at Moncton $12,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is to provide for the erection of a paint shop, $7,000, and a blacksmith shop $5,000. There is no intention of building a new station.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Some years ago I called the attention of the Government to the position of the platform where people change cars from one road to another, and the danger to which they were exposed, and I asked that the station should be put in some better order. The Minister of Finance, who was then Minister of Railways, told me he would look into the matter.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would have done so had I not gone away.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I wish you would pass it over to your successor.

Committee rose and reported progress.

PRIVILEGE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Before the House adjourns, I would like to draw the attention of the House for a single moment to a statement contained in the Toronto Daily Mail, which purports to come from Washington, and to be a report of an interview held between myself and Secretary Bayard. I wish to say that not only is this statement, which purports to be a report of the interview I had the pleasure of having with that gentleman, entirely incorrect, but in almost every particular it is the very reverse of true.

ADJOURNMENT—THE FISHERIES REPORT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. DAVIES. I have to complain that the Fishery Report which was presented, I think, either yesterday or the day before, is not yet distributed. The Session is very nearly to a close, and it is a most important report and we are very anxious to get it. Not a member on this side of the House has as yet had a copy of it, although copies of it have been distributed to the press.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I suppose it is the fault of the printers. We will do what we can to get it distributed at once.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 1 a.m. (Saturday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, 6th June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill (No. 132) further to amend the Act incorporating the Canada Atlantic Railway Company.—(Mr. Perley, Ottawa.)

Bill (No. 133) respecting the Manitoba South-Western Colonisation Railway.—(Mr. Haggart.)

Bill (No. 131) respecting the Nova Scotia Permanent Benefit Building Society and Savings Fund (from the Senate).—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 134) to enable the St. Martin's and Upham Railway Company to sell its railway and property.—(Mr. Skinner.)

Bill (No. 128) to enable the Western Canada Loan and Savings Company to extend their business, and for other purposes (from the Senate).—(Mr. McCarthy.)

ADDRESS TO THE QUEEN.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. With the universal consent of the House—I can only do it with the consent of the House—I desire to move the concurrence of this House in the Address from the Senate to Her Majesty on the occasion of her arrival at the fiftieth year of her auspicious reign. Unfortunately I was not in my place last Friday when I ought to have moved it, and I throw myself on the good nature of the House in asking permission to move it now, although it is not on the Orders of the Day. The Address has not been read, I think, in the House, and before reading it I may say that it conveys faithfully, I think, the sentiments not only of the Senate, but of this House, who are the representatives of the people. The Address is as follows:—

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MAJESTY:

We, Your Majesty's loyal and dutiful subjects, the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, in Parliament assembled, beg to offer our sincere congratulations on the happy completion of the fiftieth year of Your auspicious Reign.

The Supreme Disposer of events has made Your Majesty the Ruler of the fifth part of the habitable globe. Hundreds of millions of almost every race and tongue are proud to own your sway. But among them all, there is no community that cherishes a more heartfelt attachment to Your Majesty's person and Throne, than the people of the Canadian Dominion.

Once a colony of France, won in a struggle not less honorable to the vanquished than the victors, it was not long till its fidelity to the Crown was severely tried. How it stood the test was known to Your Majesty's illustrious father, when he honored with his friendship the hero of Chautauqua—the brave De Salaberry. And when the daughter of the Duke of Kent ascended to the Throne, the event was hailed as the dawn of an era which should bring to British and French Canada not only prosperity and progress, but the spirit of unity and goodwill. Under the influence of the great gift of constitutional self-government, conferred upon Canada in the early years of Your Majesty's reign, the country has made rapid progress. It has shared in the general advancement of the last half century, in the wonderful discoveries and application of science—the railway, the steamship, the telegraph, and their conquests of time and space; the multiplication of manufactures, the expansion of commerce, the blessings of legal reform, the diffusion of education, and in the wearing away of prejudices through increased intercourse between man and man. If the Empire's progress compares favorably during the last fifty years with that of the world at large, so does the progress of Canada compare favorably with that of the Empire. From a few scattered Provinces, it has become a great Federation, stretching from ocean to ocean, and linking by its iron path the European to the Asiatic portions of Your Majesty's domain.

It has been the good fortune of the people of Canada to enjoy, from time to time, the honor of the presence and countenance of several members of the Royal Family, and this relationship not only deepened their loyal devotion to the head of the British Empire, but enhanced their regard for the wife and mother, their veneration for the memory of the husband and father.

Our earnest prayer is that He who is the Ruler of all nations and the King of all Kings, may uphold, direct and preserve Your Majesty for many long years to reign over a prosperous and contented people.

This address is so appropriate, and I think so fully meets the feelings of the people of Canada as a whole, that it is almost out of place for me to add any imperfect words to carry out the sentiments so exceedingly well expressed in the Address coming from the honorable the Senate. Indeed, the people of Canada have taken the subject into their own hands. All the municipalities, the largest counties and the humblest villages alike, have arisen in their might and of their own accord, have given most enthusiastic evidence of their gratitude that Her Majesty the Queen has been so long spared, and gratitude also for the great blessings we have enjoyed under her reign of fifty years. And our people, after their own fashion and in their own way, and not pressed by any court or official influence, are showing from one end of the country to the other, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, their desire to make this a gala day in the history of Canada as it is in the history of the Empire. We, in Canada, have undergone great changes during the fifty years during which Her Majesty has reigned over us. But a few months after she ascended the Throne—I can remember it well—the old Provinces of Canada were in armed resistance to the Crown—not, I believe, from any fault of the Crown, but from discontent, which has happily long passed away, and which should be but lightly alluded to. From that time our progress has been constant. We have had our drawbacks, we have had our troubles, we have had commercial and other catastrophes, but still, on the whole, the progress of this great Dominion, and every Province of it, has been onward. The outbreak of which I speak was settled for the time by the Union of Upper and Lower Canada. The area was extended in 1867 to four of our Provinces, and now all British America, with the exception of Newfoundland, is under one Government, under a constitutional government, under a government fashioned, so far as the Federal Government is concerned, upon the model of the British Constitution, and we are going on prospering and, I hope, to prosper. And, although we may have our contests and our differences as to the best mode of advancing the interests of the Dominion as a whole, I hope that all of us, no matter to what party we may belong, have one object at heart, and that is, to develop still further the Dominion, which has made such an extensive progress during Her Majesty's reign. I will not say one word respecting the tribute that all the world, as well as Canada and the Empire, passes on Her Majesty's domestic virtues. It is said that:

“To gild refined gold, to paint the lily,
To throw a perfume on the violet,
Is wasteful and ridiculous excess.”

So it would be to attempt by any feeble language of mine to enhance the great merits of Her Majesty as a woman, wife and mother. I move:

That this House do concur in the Address of the Senate to Her Majesty the Queen, congratulating her upon the completion of the fiftieth year of Her Majesty's reign, and that the blank be filled with the words “and House of Commons.”

Mr. LAURIER. Apart from the regret which, I am sure, is felt in every quarter of this House, that the leader of the Opposition is compelled, through ill-health, to absent himself for the rest of the Session, I am especially sorry that on this occasion he cannot be in his place and be heard upon this subject to which he could do so ample justice. Yet, in so far as it can be a matter of joy to me under such circumstances, I must say it affords me great pleasure that the agreeable duty of seconding the Address which has been placed in your hands, Mr. Speaker, by the right hon. gentleman, has been, on this side of the House, devolved upon one of Her Majesty's subjects of French Canadian origin, and that occasion is at once afforded to testify to the fact that the feelings and the sentiments expressed in this Address are not only shared by those of Her Majesty's subjects from whom they would come most naturally, but they are also shared by all the races which inhabit this vast country of ours. I am quite satisfied, I am quite convinced, that the sentiments contained in the Address are shared by all races, and upon that point no race can claim precedence. This year Her Majesty will complete the fiftieth year of her reign. We all express the hope and the wish that she may long live to enjoy the respectful allegiance of her subjects in all quarters of the globe. We all entertain that hope, yet we know that the days allotted to Her Majesty by Providence may be long or short; but whatever may be the length of time still allotted to Her Majesty, by Providence, we may safely say that the judgment of history has already commenced to be passed on Her Majesty's reign, and it will be the judgment of contemporaneous opinion, and it has already been written that the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, is one of the grandest periods, not only in the annals of British history, but in the annals of the human race. The reign of Her Majesty has been pre-eminently characterised by the conquests, advancement and progress of civilisation. When I speak of conquests, I do not speak of conquests achieved by war. The reign of Her Majesty has been more free from wars than the reigns of most of her predecessors, yet, unfortunately, it has not been completely free. Such wars as have taken place during her reign have also added brightness to the splendor of her reign. The Crimean war, the Indian mutiny, and lately, the short, brilliant, though unfortunate and fruitless campaign in the Soudan, showed that the great characteristics of British arms, courage, pluck and endurance, have been as conspicuous in the reign of Her Majesty as in any period during English history. And indeed if I myself, the descendant of a gallant race, were here to express my own opinion, I would say that I know of no day in English history of which an Englishman ought to be prouder than of that day in the Soudan, when the small English force in the sands of the desert, under a scorching sun and without water, reformed the square which had been broken for a moment by the onset of the enemy, and marched triumphantly to the banks of the Nile. But it is not of military glory, it is not of the achievements of war, but of the blessings of peace, that I am speaking. The achievements of peace have been such, during Her Majesty's long reign, that, to-day, in her jubilee year, the fiftieth year of her reign, there is far more freedom, happiness and enlightenment in all parts of her Empire, than were found on the opening of her reign. Indeed the reign of Victoria will become famous, not so much by the glamor of military glory as by the wonderful development of letters, arts and sciences, that is, all those things which are most conducive to the freedom, enlightenment and happiness of the people. Though I pretend not to be an English scholar, it seems to me that English letters never shed a purer and brighter light than they do to-day; and if we except the exceptional name of Shakespeare, there was never such a galaxy of names great in literature as during the reign of Queen Victoria. The arts are more flourishing in England and in the British community at large than at any time during English history, and they are also more appreciated by the people. And of the sciences what shall I say? Their pre-eminence has been wonderful, marvellous, and would be incredible if we had not the example before our eyes; and their application to commerce and industry has developed British trade to such enormous proportions that, compared with it, the commerce of the most famous nations of antiquity pales into perfect insignificance. Of Her Majesty it would be trite to say, what has been so often said before, that, as a queen, a woman, a wife and a mother, she has been a model and example to the lowest as to the highest of her subjects. She has made herself dear to all her subjects and, as was said by the right hon. gentleman, has conquered the admiration of the world, because she has shown that in one of so high and exalted station the simple and modest duties of domestic life were always paramount. And, Mr. Speaker, if there be a fact of all facts for which it seems to me Her Majesty should be held in grateful memory by her subjects, it is because she has undoubtedly been the most perfect constitutional sovereign which the world has ever seen. At the time Her Majesty ascended the throne we may say there never had been any constitutional sovereigns outside the kingdom of England; and, in the kingdom, we must acknowledge, and history teaches us, that the sovereigns had not always borne that allegiance to the constitution that might have been expected. We know that they often endeavored to substitute their own will for the will of the people or of Parliament. We know, for it is also a matter of history, that, when she ascended the throne, the Duke of Wellington finding, as he thought, that she was in the hands of his political opponents, expressed his opinion and regret that there would probably be no hope for his party. But the young Queen promptly showed that, whatever might be her personal preferences, she would have but one rule of government, and that was to govern according to the expressed will of her people and the advice of her responsible ministers; and to that rule, laid down at the outset of her reign, she has steadfastly adhered. Of course we must know, for it is according to human nature, that Her Majesty may have had her personal opinions, but whatever may have been her own personal opinions on questions of public policy, the chief and only rule which guided her during her long reign has been a loyal adhesion to the will of the people. Of all the subjects of Her Majesty there are none who should be more grateful to her for following that course than her Canadian subjects. It is to that principle, carried out by her in England and adopted in this country, that we owe the prosperity of which we now boast, and to which the hon. gentleman has alluded. Let us suppose, for one instant, that during her whole reign in this country the system of government had prevailed which was in force during the reign of Her Majesty's predecessors. Could we suppose, for one moment, that the progress of which we now boast would then have taken place? Is it not a fact that our energies, instead of being exerted in the way of developing our resources, would have been spent in political agitation, in fruitless political agitation, and that, instead of having such a country as we now possess, we would only have had, in the language of the Address, a few scattered Provinces in this country, each struggling in its own way for constitutional liberty. It is a great pleasure to me to say that if her Canadian subjects ought to be grateful to Her Majesty, there are none of them who ought to be so grateful to her as her subjects of French origin, because there is no class of her subjects who have so profited by the era of liberty which was ushered in by her ascension to the throne. Remembering those facts, it would be ungrateful in me, were it not, as it is, a labor of love to express my adhesion in the name of the race to which I belong, to every sentiment contained in this Address, and to express the hope and wish that the glorious reign of Her Majesty may long and long continue. I have much pleasure in seconding the resolution.

Mr. AMYOT. I entirely concur in the Address and all that has been said. There is one thing, however, to which I object, from a historical point of view, the Address says:

"Once a colony in France, won in a struggle not less honorable to the vanquished than the victors, it was not long till its fidelity to the Crown was severely tried."

In the French edition I notice that the word "conquered" is substituted for the word "won." Well, I deny that Canada has ever been conquered. It was ceded over by France to England. I suppose the matter has escaped the attention of the hon. gentleman, and it will suffice to draw attention to it to have it remedied. It would be a historical error, and while it would be in one way expressing our love to Her Majesty, it would be unjust and unfair to a great part of the population of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move, seconded by Mr. Laurier:

That a message be sent to the Senate, acquainting their honors that this House has agreed to the said Address by filling up the blank with the words, "and House of Commons."

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move, seconded by Mr. Laurier:

That a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will be pleased to transmit the joint Address of both Houses to Her Most Gracious Majesty congratulating her upon the completion of the fiftieth year of Her Majesty's auspicious reign, in such a manner as His Excellency may see fit, in order that the same may be laid at the foot of the Throne.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move, seconded by Mr. Laurier:

That the said Address be engrossed.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move, seconded by Mr. Laurier:

That a message be sent to the Senate, informing their honors that this House has passed the accompanying Address to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will be pleased to transmit the joint Address of both Houses to Her Most Gracious Majesty congratulating Her Majesty upon the completion of the fiftieth year of her auspicious reign.

Motion agreed to.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of Commissioner of North-West Mounted Police for 1886.—(Sir John A. Macdonald.)

POSTING PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. WOOD (Brockville) moved:

That the time for posting Private Bills be reduced to four days.

Motion agreed to.

CANCELLATION OF HOMESTEADS.

Mr. MILLS. I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior when we may expect the information contained in those two addresses that were carried at the instance of the leader of the Opposition with reference to the cancellation of homesteads.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). That is being prepared as rapidly as it can be. It involves investigation into a number of registers.

Mr. LAURIER.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. KENNY. I rise to a question of privilege. I think the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) is in the House, although not in his place, and I beg to call the attention of the House to what appears to be a very palpable error in the Hansard report of Friday's proceedings. I do this in no spirit of fault-finding with the manner in which the Hansard reporters discharge the very difficult duties assigned to them; but I understand the practice of this House is, that the sheets of the Hansard reports, containing remarks which hon. members may have made during the course of debates, are sent to the hon. members for correction. This is an excellent rule, to my mind, and a most charitable one for the new members of the House. I presumed that, in this respect, all the members were treated alike. This morning I received from the post office, with my other letters, certain pages of Hansard containing the proceedings of Friday, for correction, and, on looking them over, found they were incomplete, as some remarks I had made were omitted. I called at the office between one and two o'clock to ask for the missing matter. The manager was not there, and I could not obtain it. It was only when I took my place in the House that I found on my desk page 803 of the proceedings of Friday. I do not attach, in the slightest degree, blame to the reporters. I know it would be impossible for them to make a mistake in a monosyllabic answer given across the floor by one gentleman to another. In my opinion, the error is not an error of the reporters. It is not for me to say whether any gentleman or certain gentlemen are to have the special privilege of going to the Hansard reporters and correcting these reports earlier than others. That is a matter which the House, I presume, will have to decide. I presume that if any gentleman gives a monosyllabic answer, it is not in his power to change it without the permission of the House. It will be within the recollection of the hon. gentlemen who were in the House Friday last—I call their attention to page 803—that, in the debate there reported, the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) referred to certain privileges, which, he said, only Upper Canadians enjoyed, and, later on in the debate, I asked, in reference to that: "Is not my hon. friend a Canadian?" To this question, he emphatically gave the monosyllabic answer: "No." To prove I am correct in making that statement, I refer the House to the Toronto Mail of Saturday, in which the answer for the senior member for Halifax is given as he gave it in this House, and not as it is reported in the Hansard:

"Mr. Kenny asked if his colleague was a Canadian, and the senior member for Halifax is reported to have answered, 'No.'"

I also find in the Daily Citizen, published in Ottawa, on Saturday last, the following report:

"Mr. KENNY. I am a Canadian, and we would have no national existence without the Intercolonial. Is not the hon. member for Halifax a Canadian?"

"Mr. JONES. No."

Now, this answer has gone before the country, and has appeared in the public press, and I bring this matter to the notice of the House, first of all to have the Hansard corrected, if there is an error, and also to know what the practice and custom of the House with respect to corrections.

Mr. JONES. I am very much at a loss to know what my hon. friend has taken exception to.

Mr. KENNY. I am reminded I have not given the answer as reported in Hansard. The answer, as reported in Hansard, is: "No, a Nova Scotian." I did not hear my hon. friend say that.

Mr. JONES. If that is all the hon. gentleman has to find fault with, he has taken up the time of the House to very little purpose. I can only say that when the hon. gentleman comes to hold a seat in this House as long as others, he will not be so thin-skinned, and will not give preference to newspaper reports over the official debates of this House, as reported by the official reporters. If the hon. gentleman means to insinuate that I had access to or approached the reporters at any time, the hon. gentleman is laboring under an erroneous impression. I neither directly nor indirectly approached, conversed with, influenced, solicited, or corrected any report made by the reporters on that occasion, and I am disposed to place more confidence in the reporters in this House, than in party newspapers, which may circulate, as they have circulated, erroneous and false impressions of my opinions throughout this country. If the hon. gentleman has nothing more important to bring before the notice of the House, he had better not take up its attention with such small matters.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I understand the hon. gentleman, the report in Hansard is correct, and the language he used is the language as reported; so that he did say: "No, I am a Nova Scotian." The hon. gentleman, I understand, affirms that he said that he did not instruct the reporters to say it, but somebody must have instructed them, or the hon. gentleman must have said so. Will the hon. gentleman now say that he said anything further than the word "No"?

Mr. MACKENZIE. What business has the hon. gentleman to catechise him?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is a question of falsifying the Hansard by someone. If the hon. gentleman said, "No," and someone added the words, "I am a Nova Scotian," that would be a falsification of the Hansard for which the reporter must be punished, having ventured to attribute to the hon. gentleman language not used by him. This is a very important matter, and not to be slighted.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman reminds me that I did not finish. I am sorry I did not give him that satisfaction, which it seems he is very anxious to get, and which he is craving to hear. I did reply: "No, I am a Nova Scotian;" and I said further down, that, in the language of a Tory Secretary of State, I was a Canadian by Act of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is another affair. We must accept the statement of the hon. gentleman. The hon. gentleman did say: "No, I am a Nova Scotian," and he did not confine himself to the monosyllable "No."

Mr. BÉCHARD. I heard the hon. gentleman say: "I am a Nova Scotian."

Mr. DAVIES. I heard the very same words fall from the lips of the hon. gentleman at the time. I heard them clearly and distinctly.

Mr. KENNY. I am glad to hear that hon. gentlemen opposite say that. If the hon. gentleman wishes to qualify the matter,—

Mr. WELDON (St. John). No, there is no qualifying at all.

Mr. SPEAKER. Orders of the day.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I wish to quote from the remarks of the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The hon. the junior member for Halifax asked: "Is not my hon. friend a Canadian?" To which the senior member replied: "No, a Nova Scotian."

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The Hansard shows that, when the junior member for Halifax said:

"Without the Intercolonial Railway we could not have any national existence."

My hon. friend said:

"My hon. friend asks me whether I am a Canadian. I will answer him in the language of a late Secretary of State, that I am a Canadian by Act of Parliament."

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. JONES. Beaucoup de bruit pour une omelette.

Mr. McMULLEN. I desire to say—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that the reports have not been sent as regularly in advance this Session as they were during the previous Parliament. I think the advance copies should be sent in good time in order that they might be corrected. I know that I have not received the advance copies in time for the purpose of correction, and I suppose other hon. members are in the same position. If the same principle were followed that was followed in the previous Parliament the same difficulties would not arise. I have had some difficulties myself as to utterances which were sent out as made by myself which I had not uttered, and had not the ordinary opportunity of correcting. I think it is desirable that members should be furnished as early as possible with the advance sheets of what they have said for correction before they are passed into the Hansard.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 55) to incorporate the Eastern Canada Savings and Loan Company (Limited).—(Mr. Kenny.)

Bill (No. 44) respecting the Atlantic and North-West Railway Company.—(Mr. Rykert.)

Bill (No. 67) to incorporate the Massawippi Junction Railway Company.—(Mr. Colby.)

Bill (No. 63) to incorporate the Kingston, Smith's Falls and Ottawa Railway Company.—(Mr. Kirkpatrick.)

SECOND READING.

Bill (No. 130) to incorporate "The Teeswater and Inverhuron Railway Company" (from the Senate).—(Mr. Cargill.)

BREAKWATER AT DIPPER HARBOR, ST. JOHN.

Mr. WELDON (St. John) asked, Is it the intention of the Government to provide for the construction of a breakwater at Dipper Harbor, in the city and county of St. John, or for the erection of a lighthouse at that place?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. To the first part of the question, I may say that my chief engineer states that an examination was made during the past year, and the report that was furnished to him is still under consideration, and he would like to receive further information before submitting an estimate.

Mr. FOSTER. With respect to the second part of the question, I may say that on looking over the papers, I find that last year I practically promised the late member for the county (Mr. Everett) that this work would be built. It is necessary, and it will be built this year.

HARBOR LIGHTING AT PORT LA TOUR.

Mr. GILLMOR, in the absence of Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), asked, Is it the intention of the Department of Marine to provide in the Estimates this Session for the erection of a harbor light at Port la Tour, in the county of Shelburne, Nova Scotia?

Mr. FOSTER. It is not.

HARBOUR LIGHT AT WEST HEAD, N. S.

Mr. GILLMOR, in the absence of Mr. ROBERTSON (Shelburne), asked, Is it the intention of the Department of Marine to provide in the Estimates this Session for the erection of a harbor light at West Head, Cape Sable Island, Shelburne County, Nova Scotia?

Mr. FOSTER. A light has been asked for this place, and earnestly pressed by Major Laurie, and upon the favorable report of my officers I have decided to proceed with its construction this year.

POST OFFICE AT BEAUHARNOIS.

Mr. HOLTON asked, By whom, at whose request, and under whose authority was an investigation instituted, or is now being prosecuted into the loss of certain registered and other letters mailed at the post office of Beauharnois on or about 2nd March, 1886? Was such investigation demanded by any citizen or citizens of Beauharnois; if so, by whom?

Mr. McLELAN. The enquiry into the loss of certain registered letters posted at Beauharnois on the 1st March, 1886, was undertaken by the Post Office Inspector of the Montreal Division, on his own motion, and under the authority delegated to him for such purposes. A Mr. Brossoit, of Beauharnois, some months subsequently, made enquiry respecting a letter posted by him, which was contained in the missing package of registered letters; but this had nothing to do with the investigation of the case by the inspector.

BRACKET BOARDS ON CHISHOLM'S DAM.

Mr. MALLORY asked, Has permission been given by the Government or any of its employés to any person or persons, company or companies, since the year 1880, to place bracket boards on Chisholm's Dam in the River Trent, or in any other way to raise the water above the said dam? If so, to whom was such permission given, and when? To what height was the water allowed to be raised?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In 1885, permission was given to Gilmour & Co., to place brackets or "flush" boards; but a claim for damages having been made by Joseph Dunkley, on account of his having been flooded, an order was issued by the Minister in December, 1886, that all flush boards be removed. However, I must say that if any damage is incurred in such cases, of course, Gilmour & Co., will have to meet it.

COLONISATION COMPANIES.

Mr. MALLORY asked, How many colonisation companies are now in operation in Manitoba and the North-West Territories? What sums of money have been received by the Government from colonisation companies from the 1st day of January, 1886, to 1st June, 1887, both days included?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Nineteen colonisation companies have not yet surrendered their contracts to the Government, and are, therefore, in that sense in operation. No money has been received from colonisation companies within the period mentioned, but in settlement of these lands we are taking back land instead.

BRITON MEDICAL AND GENERAL LIFE ASSOCIATION.

Mr. LAURIER asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to pay the claim of the policy-holders of the Briton Medical and General Life Association (Limited), now insolvent, out of the deposit of $100,000 made by that company in the hands of the Government for the benefit of the Canadian policy-holders?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Proceedings have been instituted in the courts of the Provinces of Quebec and Ontario for winding-up the company's Canadian affairs. Proceedings are still pending, and until some decision has been arrived at no action can be taken.

CABLE BETWEEN PELEE ISLAND AND MAINLAND.

Mr. BRIEN asked, Is it the intention of the Government this year to lay a cable between Pelée Island and the mainland, in the county of Essex, so as to give the people of that Island direct communication by telegraph and telephone with other portions of Canada?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is not.

DEPUTY JUDGE FOR ESSEX.

Mr. BRIEN asked, Is it the intention of the Government to appoint a deputy judge for the county of Essex, this year?

Mr. THOMPSON. A deputy judge was appointed in that county some time ago, and, of course, deputies are appointed whenever a judge has to be absent.

RED POINT WHARF, HILLSBORO' RIVER.

Mr. WELSH asked, Has any money been expended by the Government in the repairs of Red Point Wharf, Hillsboro' River, Prince Edward Island, during the past two years? If so, how much? Has that wharf been taken over from the Island Government by the Dominion? If not, how came the repairs to be done by the Dominion?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In answer to the hon. gentleman I may say that I am informed by the chief engineer that no money has been expended by the Government in the repairs of Red Point wharf during the past two years.

BALLOT BOX PATENTS.

Mr. BROWN moved:

"That a Committee, consisting of the following gentlemen, be appointed to examine and report upon a ballot or voting box invented by John Waddell, of Harriston, and also by Dr. Jones, of Hagersville, viz.: Messrs. Ward, Edgar, Kenny, Hudspeth, Mills (Bothwell), Madill, Courso, Girouard, and the mover."

Mr. MILLS. I would suggest that there ought to be some member from the Maritime Provinces on this committee, and that he should be put on in my place.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Baird.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would suggest the name of Mr. Skinner of St. John.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a good name.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER.

Mr. CHARLTON moved for:

Copies of all papers and correspondence relating to any proposed change in the mode of ventilating the House of Commons Chamber.

He said: This subject was under discussion some years ago. At that time the ventilation of the Chamber was wretchedly bad. Some improvements were made. Still, I think that other improvements might be made that would very much improve the sanitary condition of this Chamber. This is a subject which interests every member of the House, and that is my excuse for bringing it under consideration. I do it in the hope that some further improvement may be secured in the ventilation of the Chamber. The necessity for that is not as apparent, fortunately, now as it is in the winter season, because we can open the windows and get a supply of fresh air in that way which we are otherwise unable to secure. But in the winter old members of the House are aware that the atmosphere of the Chamber is very injurious to health. I find myself, after a few days, that the effect of the atmosphere in this Chamber is very deleterious. Headache, stupidity almost—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no, that is impossible.

Mr. CHARLTON. The mental barometer goes down, and the amount of mental force, in the case of a member who sits in this Chamber habitually till midnight or after, gradually diminishes. The system by which we are supplied with air is a bad one. We have running from this building to the face of the cliff a number of sewers, through which the air is conducted to the fans, and so brought into this Chamber. I call them sewers, though they are not used for the purpose of sewers. They do not, I believe, convey any offensive matter from the building to the outside; but the air is brought through these subterranean passages, which are damp and mouldy, and which are liable to be foul. Dead dogs and cats may be in them for aught I know, and I think the mode of bringing the air into this Chamber is radically defective and deleterious to health, and cannot be otherwise. Now, when a committee sat some years ago, on this matter, their recommendation was that the air brought into this Chamber should be brought directly from the great source of pure air, and not from the face of the cliff through sewers; but we persisted in following that plan of ventilating the Chamber, and the result is that we have a great deal of sickness here, a great many members lose their health in this Chamber, and those who do not lose their health, those who are strong enough constitutionally to be able to stand it, nevertheless suffer, to some extent, in consequence of this bad system of ventilation. The situation of this Chamber could scarcely be worse. It is surrounded by lobbies, passages, offices, and even water closets, and there is no opportunity for the air of heaven, or the sunlight of heaven, to reach us directly. If we cannot have the Chamber changed, or a new one built, or some radical change of that kind effected, we at least ought to make an effort to have the air brought into this Chamber direct from the only source from which we can get pure air, and have it supplied directly from the outside, and not bring it through these ducts. It is a matter of great importance to us all. We sit here, we endure this evil Session after Session, and we all feel the effects that are produced by it. It would not cost, I imagine, a very large sum to effect the necessary change. All we have got to do is either to run a shaft up above the smoke and the dust of that court, and bring the air down through that shaft direct to the fans, or adopt some other method that would let the air in here directly. But to bring the air through these sewers, as we are doing now, is something that ought to cease. I have made this motion—I do not know whether there are any papers or correspondence in connection with the matter before the Department of Public Works—but I have made this motion for the purpose of bringing this matter to the attention of the Government. I think it is an evil that might be remedied, I think it is an evil that ought to be remedied, it is in the interest of all of us that it should be remedied, and I have no doubt that the Minister of Public Works, if he has an expression of the sentiments of this House to warrant him in doing so, will incur the necessary expense and provide a remedy for the evil.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I regret that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is not in the Chamber at the moment to speak as to the steps which he has taken. I know that my hon. colleague has taken a great interest in this subject, and has attempted in every possible way, after taking the advice of the architect, to improve the ventilation of this Chamber. No doubt it has improved immensely since we first commenced to sit here. It is not, however, by any means perfect yet, and I think it will stand a good deal of improvement. I dare say that on this subject the Minister of Public Works will find himself supported by both sides of the House if he goes to any reasonable expense to perfect the ventilation of this Chamber. It is our right to have a comfortable, and wholesome, and healthy Chamber to sit in while we are deliberating here, while we are sacrificing ourselves for the public good; but I do not go so far as my hon. friend did a moment ago, when he said he wanted a radical change. Well, I want a wholesome change, not a radical change in this Chamber. I shall call the attention of my hon. friend to this matter, and I will take an early opportunity to inform my hon. friend who moved this motion what steps are being taken to improve the ventilation of this Chamber.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I did not hear what the hon. mover of this resolution said, but I have no doubt that he wants better ventilation, plenty of fresh air and light. Well, as for the air, of course, we have only to open the windows, and in place of the gas we have the electric light, which, I think, has greatly improved the atmosphere. Besides I think the light is better, and we are all the better for it. As for the ducts under this building, we have had them examined repeatedly during the sitting of this House, and I think that nothing is wanting in that direction. But we cannot shut our eyes to this fact, that we are shut up here between four walls, and there are no openings except the doors on the floor. I do not know whether those who built this Chamber thought very much of ventilation; as a rule, I think architects think less of ventilation than of making a very fine building, without considering very often, perhaps, that this building must be used by human beings, sometimes occupied to a late hour by large numbers of people, and that consequently the air must be vitiated and needs constantly to be changed. However, I have called the attention of the chief architect to the ventilation of this room, and also to the ventilation of the Railway Committee room. It was suggested the other day that a new committee room might be built. Well, that is easy to say, but it is not so easy to be done, because this edifice has been built on a certain plan, and the space has been all occupied as we find it to be now. To construct another room large enough for our purposes, would require a good deal of space. I have been told that there was a large inner court where another room might be built. I have enquired about that and find that hon. members would not feel very comfortable if a new room was built in that court, because the boilers would be underneath, and perhaps some fine morning we might be all sent up to Heaven, I hope; and I think hon. members will prefer to postpone that very auspicious event as long as possible. However, I will call the attention of the chief architect to the matter during recess, and we will see what can be done to increase the capacity of the committee room by enlarging it at one end or the other, and by improving the ventilation in the upper floor, or the ceiling, and if it be found possible, by heightening the Chamber. If I find that we can enlarge the room to such an extent as to meet the wishes of hon. gentlemen, of course, they must not be surprised if I ask for a Governor General's warrant, which I shall expect Parliament to sanction. Hon. gentlemen may rest assured that everything possible will be done to improve the ventilation of this Chamber, as well as the Railway Committee room.

Mr. MULOCK. This matter was before the House, either in the Session of 1885 or 1886, and the Minister of Public Works, if I remember rightly, said a good deal could be done to improve the condition of the atmosphere of this room by the windows outside the lobbies being kept open during the recess, when the House was not sitting, and by the various doors entering this Chamber being kept open; and he undertook to give directions to whoever has charge of that economy of the House, to have that attended to. That has not been done of late. I have come to the House many mornings quite early and have found every window and door leading into this Chamber absolutely closed.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The other day members were complaining about the ventilation just as the House was meeting, and I thought—although I have no special authority—I would endeavor to meet their wishes, and accordingly I had all the doors opened; but within ten minutes, they were quietly unfastened and closed. This is a matter in the hands of hon. members, some of whom prefer a little more hot air and a little less draught.

Mr. MULOCK. The ventilation should not be done during hours when members are in the Chamber, but at four or five o'clock in the morning, when the windows and doors should be left entirely open until members arrive and occupy the Chamber. Is there any reason for having the green doors to the west of the post office closed, or any advantage in having the wooden porch at the western entrance? That porch should be removed, at least during the summer season.

Mr. McNEILL. I hope the Minister of Public Works will make some arrangement by which air will be admitted directly from the outside. No artificial ventilation can suffice unless it be supplemented by a direct current of fresh air from the outside, and to do this the best way is to have the windows open. If they were opened about three times a day, and that when members are not in the Chamber, in addition to the present artificial ventilation, the quality of the air would be improved. This would be a very simple way of obviating the present difficulty.

Mr. DAVIES. I trust the Minister of Public Works will have the outside porch at the western entrance removed in summer.

Motion agreed to.

LIEUT. WILLIAM HAMILTON MERRITT.

Mr. BARRON moved for:

Copies of all letters, papers, and documents from the officer commanding the Governor General's Body Guards during the late North-West rebellion to the Minister of Militia or Major-General in command of the Canadian Militia, recommending for promotion Lieut. William Hamilton Merritt, of that corps, on account of services rendered by him while on active service during said rebellion; and of all letters, statements or memoranda written in reply by the said Minister or Major-General in reference to said recommendation to said commanding officer, Deputy Adjutant-General District No. 22, or to any other person."

He said: The gentleman whose name is mentioned, Lieut. William Hamilton Merritt, is well known to hon. gentlemen opposite. He took a very active part indeed in the campaign in the North-West. I am personally aware of the services he rendered, especially in the capture of White Cap, and I have reason to believe that a recommendation was made by his commanding officer that his services should receive some recognition. When the recommendation went in, I am informed, and I believe my information is reliable, that a very unsatisfactory reply was given by the Major General in command, and especially unsatisfactory to those officers who recommended that his services should be rewarded. If the correspondence is brought down, it will enlighten hon. members as to the facts, and show how this matter was treated by the Major-General commanding.

the position of Major-General commanding should not be confined to English officers. For many reasons I think it is advisable that this motion should pass the House, and especially, if for no other reason, that simple justice may be done an officer who rendered very great and valuable services to the country during the last insurrection.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will allow the motion to stand until the Minister of Militia is in his seat.

After Recess.

On the order:

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed, shall be by the Dominion Government through especially appointed officers.—(Mr. Jamieson.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I saw the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), a minute ago, and I suggested, as we had so thin a House this evening, and as he cannot expect to get through before the end of the sitting, that it would be better to postpone this matter until Wednesday, make it the First Order of the day on that day, and continue the discussion on until the end of the sitting.

Mr. JAMIESON. I accede to that suggestion, and will allow the matter to stand as the First Order for Wednesday.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. A special Order.

Mr. FISHER. Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that it will continue through the evening, as well as on the afternoon of Wednesday?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, the First Order of the day before Notices of Motion—immediately after Routine.

Mr. JAMIESON. I move that this Order be postponed until Wednesday and made the First Order of the day after Routine.

Motion agreed to.

WHARF AT ST. JÉRÔME DE MATANE.

Mr. Fiset moved for:

Statement showing the amount of the sums expended since 1878 for repairs and improvements on the wharf at St. Jérôme de Matane.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I would suggest that this motion be made to cover also the expenditure from the 16th of May, 1867, to be given in two statements, or giving the whole expenditure from the beginning down to the present time.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Strike out 1878 and insert 1867.

Mr. Fiset. I certainly have no objection to the amendment moved by the hon. Minister of Public Works, but would be glad if the amounts expended each year were mentioned separately in the return.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

FISH TRAP AT TIGNISH, P.E.I.

Mr. PERRY moved for:

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams, &c., that may have taken place between the Department of Marine and Fisheries and the agent in Prince Edward Island, having reference to setting a fish trap by James H. Myrick at Tignish, P.E.I., since the 1st day of January, 1886. Also, copies of all petitions, letters, &c., against setting said trap, and copies of petitions in favor of setting said trap.

He said: In making this motion I desire to draw the attention of the House, and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries especially, to the fact that a fish trap has been set off the Tignish coast for a number of years, and that trap has been of great benefit in catching the bait required for the purpose of the mackerel and lobster fisheries. In order to carry on those fisheries successfully, a great deal of bait, mostly herring, is required, and this is taken around the shores of Prince Edward Island. A few years ago a large quantity of the nets of the fishermen were destroyed by storms or ice, and they did not go to the expense and trouble of making new nets, but depended on this trap for their bait. But on a sudden, and very mysteriously, some day in March last, I have not the exact date, a letter was sent from the Department to Mr. Myrick, stating that he was not to set the fish trap until a license was obtained from the Department. On the 30th of March last the following letter was also addressed to Mr. Myrick by Col. Duvar, inspector of fisheries:—

"Sir,—I beg to state that I am to-day directed by the Department of Marine and Fisheries to inform you that license will not be issued this season for your fish trap."

"JOHN H. DUVAR."

Now, I want to know why this order was issued at that time. Had the Government candidates for Prince county been returned, I believe the trap would have been allowed to be set for this season. I know that the Government candidates, three or four days before election, called on Mr. Myrick and asked for his influence; but he does not make use of his influence in the elections. He has no politics; he is a foreigner, he does not vote, and is not a politician. He has been doing business in Prince Edward Island for something over a quarter of a century, and during that time he has been supplying all the fishermen along the coast from West Point to Alberton, a distance of 40 or 50 miles, I suppose 20 different fisheries, with bait for the mackerel and lobster fisheries which are carried on there; and the result of that trap not being set is that about 2,000 fishermen have been thrown out of employment. That is a poor way to enable those people to pay their lawful debts. It makes it very hard for them to pay Mr. Myrick for the goods he has supplied them, which are so highly taxed by the National Policy. The refusal to allow the trap to be set is a great injustice and hardship, not to Mr. Myrick, but to the fishermen around the shores. It was done solely to punish Mr. Myrick's concern because he would not allow his business to be made use of to help to return the Government candidates. I am not aware that his concern has ever been used in any shape whatever for or against any candidate. I have never asked him for his vote or for his influence in my election, and I am sure my colleague has not; but I know that the wires have been pulled, and I believe the Department has been coaxed and harassed into making this sudden order in order to punish these people. Why was not this order issued last year and made public then? Why were the people not made aware then that they must not expect the benefit of this trap for carrying on their fisheries? This spring, owing to the ice around Prince Edward Island, vessels could not reach the Madeline to catch bait, and the result is that not one-tenth of the bait usually caught on our shores has been caught this season. The Government talk about protecting our fish. This looks more like preventing the people catching fish, because it is taking away from them the means of carrying on their fisheries. I hope and trust that the Minister will have no delay in laying these papers before Parliament, in order that we may know who has been at the bottom of this matter. When it was known that this trap was not going to be set, petitions signed by 200 or 300 fishermen were sent from Tignish, Kildare, Miminigash, Nail Pond and other places to the Department asking that the trap should be allowed to be set. Notwithstanding all that, I am sorry to say that it appears that one dead man has more influence than 200 or 300 live men. I charge this home to the Department of Fisheries. Three or four weeks ago I asked, not on the floor of this House, because it is hard to get an answer here; but I went to the Department and asked the gentleman in charge of that Department to give me the names of those petitioners. He promised to do so, but I have not got them yet. But the House and the country will find, when these names come down, that they are the names of fishermen; and they ought to know, and must know, and do know, as well or better than the Minister, whether this trap was injurious or not. The fish have come and they have gone, and the people have to do without them. The result of the order to stop this trap has been to prevent these poor, hardworking people following their legitimate business of catching mackerel and lobsters. I hope the Minister will make no delay in bringing down the papers.

Mr. FOSTER. I have no objection to bring down the papers, I suppose it would be more in order to discuss the question when the papers come down. If the information had been before the House, my hon. friend would not have made all the statements he has. About some of the statements he has made, I happen to know something, about others I do not know anything; but if I am to judge the veracity of those of which I know nothing by the veracity of those of which I know something, I should judge his case to be a very weak one. His whole case falls to the ground when the House knows that this fish trap is the only one about the coast of Prince Edward Island; that, owing to many representations, the Department the year before last, before the elections were thought of, came to the conclusion it should not be again put down, and orders to that effect were issued. Last spring, however, through some misunderstanding between the fishery inspector in Prince Edward Island and the Department, the trap was found to have been put down, and the Department allowed it to be retained there last year, but notice was given last year to Mr. Myrick, and to the fishermen themselves, that it would not be allowed to be put down another year. These are the facts, and before them my hon. friend's pretension that this is a mysterious political matter, a matter of departmental persecution, falls to the ground. When the papers come down, the subject can be discussed at full length if, indeed, it is worthy of discussion.

Motion agreed to.

L'ARDOISE BREAKWATER.

Mr. FLYNN moved for:

Copies of all surveys, reports and correspondence in connection with L'Ardoise Breakwater, in the county of Richmond.

He said: Petitions had been sent in to the Government of the right hon. gentleman in 1873, and subsequently to the Mackenzie Government, for the erection of a breakwater at this place, and in 1876 one was erected at a cost of about $11,000. It was destroyed by storm, however, some years ago, and since then no effort has been made by the Department of Public Works to repair it. It is now a sunken ledge, a portion of it being above water, and very dangerous. The Department of Public Works, having recognised the necessity of a breakwater there, should surely when it has been destroyed by the operation of the tide, and ice, and other causes, at least restore it. It is of great importance to the people of the section, a very large fishing district, in protecting their boats and in other respects. I trust steps will be immediately taken to restore this breakwater, and I would like to know if any have been taken as yet. I shall say nothing more in reference to this matter, but leave it in the hands of the Government.

Motion agreed to.

POST OFFICE AND CUSTOM HOUSE, ARICHAT.

Mr. FLYNN moved for :

Copies of all correspondence in connection with the purchase of a site for the erection of a post office and custom house in the town of Arichat.

He said: Some years ago the Government purchased a site, at an expense of $1,000, in the town of Arichat, for the erection of a post office and a custom house and other buildings connected with the Government departments in that town. Tenders were called for, but no contract has been entered into, and the buildings have never been erected. There are plenty of towns of less importance in Nova Scotia, and in other portions of the Dominion, with public offices, and I may ask now what is the reason why these have not been erected, especially after the site has been purchased?

Motion agreed to.

RAILWAY CONSTRUCTION IN CAPE BRETON.

Mr. FLYNN moved for :

Copies of railway surveys from the Strait of Canso to Sydney via Grand Narrows and from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg via St. Peter's during the summer of 1885, with the estimated cost of both lines. Also copies of surveys from Grand Narrows via Boisdale to North Sydney and Sydney. Also copies of surveys between East Bay and St. Peter's, copies of reports and surveys between Sydney and Loch Lomond via the Mira and Salmon River Valley, in the year 1886; copies of all telegrams to the Department of Railways during the time of the surveys; also a copy of Minute of Council adopting the Grand Narrows route via Boisdale to North and South Sydney, with the engineer's report on the crossing of the Grand Narrows.

He said: My object in moving for these papers is to show that the route selected by the Government for the construction of the railway on the Island of Cape Breton is one that will not meet the requirements of the great majority of the people of that Island. In the first place, the route may be designated as a local one, and one altogether unsuited to the requirements of the people there. It is a departure from the well grounded and general principle that the railway in the Island of Cape Breton, when built, would be a continuation of the Intercolonial system. There can be very many reasons given why the southern route, having its terminus at Louisburg, should have been adopted in preference to the one the Government has adopted. It was shorter, it was a less expensive route, it was a shorter route to Europe, and it had an open port during the winter. The Grand Narrows route offers none of the advantages I have spoken of in regard to the southern route. It increases the distance to Sydney by 15 miles and the distance to Louisburg by 45 miles. It will give very little accommodation to Inverness and Victoria, and the engineering difficulties are much greater than they would be on the southern route. That portion of the road via Boisdale requires the construction of large bridges over the George's River, the West Arm, Lynch's Creek, Ball's Creek, and a very large bridge across the Sydney River, adding very much to the cost of the road. But, in addition to the cost of the road in consequence of these large structures, there is another very important reason why this route should not have been selected—one of the greatest—is the crossing of the Grand Narrows themselves. We have had one great difficulty heretofore in extending our railway system east, the crossing of the Strait of Canso; but, in this case, by abandoning the southern route via St. Peter's and Louisburg, the Government have absolutely added another difficulty, by the fact that they have crossed another arm of the sea nearly two thousand feet in width. In the Strait of Canso we have a difficulty with the ice, but that can be overcome with a ferry at all times. In the first part of the season, when the drift ice comes down the Gulf of St. Lawrence, there are periods when the crossing is interrupted for a short time during the day, but at the change of the tide the crossing can be navigated by a steamer. In consequence of the peculiar formation of the Gut of Canso, when the winter begins, the ice jams in there and becomes a solid block, reaching no further than Hastings, offering every facility during the winter for crossing. This is not the case at the Grand Narrows. Although it is stated that a steam ferry may be possible there, I believe it is quite impossible to use it all the year round, and I believe, if the route that the Government have selected is adhered to, a bridge must be ultimately built. The ice there forms from eighteen inches to thirty-six inches in thickness every winter. I have here the report of Mr. Hyndman, the engineer, in which he states:

"Except during a very severe winter, it is said the ice is never fast, but floats with the tide. The thickness of the ice is generally about three feet. It begins to form about the middle of January, and disappears below the surface about the first week of May. The period of the greatest quantity of ice is in February, where it attains sometimes six feet in thickness. It is formed in the coves, the result of the ordinary drift ice being piled up. It afterwards cracks and moves out with the wind and is carried backwards and forwards in larger or smaller blocks several hundred feet in length and breadth. The shipping passing through the Narrows consists principally of fishing schooners which come from the east to fish in the Great Bras d'Or Lake and coasting vessels, all of which pass on through the canal at St. Peter's. On some days as many as sixty or seventy have passed backwards and forwards."

Now, according to his calculation, the ice is sometimes three feet in thickness and at other times six feet in thickness. If that is the case, and the road is built on that route, I maintain that a steam ferry cannot be used at all times, and it necessarily involves the building of a bridge. One of the surveyors states that a bridge can only be built at an enormous cost, and it has been estimated by some that it will amount to at least a million dollars. If that route is adhered to, and a bridge is built, as I maintain it must be, it will, therefore, involve an additional cost of a million dollars for the construction of the road, which will still be a local road, and will not serve the general interests of the Island of Cape Breton. For very many years—perhaps I might go back to a quarter of a century—the dream of the people has been a railway from New Glasgow by the southern route to Louisburg. For some years there was very little done in the way of the extension of railways in the Province of Nova Scotia, but fifteen years ago the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia took hold of this matter. Before this, all the discussions in the Local Legislature tended to one point, the extension of the railway system from New Glasgow via St. Peter's and the southern route. I intend to show to-night that all the discussions in the Local Legislature, all the Acts of incorporation, all the subsidies granted had invariably that end in view. The first to which I will call the attention of the House was in 1872, when the Local Legislature gave a subsidy for a road from New Glasgow to Louisburg of 150,000 acres of Crown lands and all the royalty in coal produced in the island for forty years. No company undertook to build the road for that subsidy. The next move taken by the Local Legislature was in 1875, and then I find it was for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a line of railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg by a grant of 300,000 acres of Crown lands, to be taken from the four counties, $5,000 a mile in cash, and the minerals in 150,000 acres of Crown lands. Again, Sir, not being able to get a company to build the line to Louisburg, on this offer made by the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia in 1875, not having sufficient means at their command to induce a company to undertake that work, they agreed to extend the railroad to the Strait of Canso, with the ultimate view of carrying it on to Louisburg as the Atlantic terminus. I am going to call the attention of the Government and the House to the fact that, up to within the last six or nine months, the location of the Grand Narrows was never spoken of, never thought of, and never dreamed of, by anybody in the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia, where this matter was discussed, and where the subsidies were voted, or in the Federal Parliament, until last summer. Again, in 1882, when the Holmes Government was in power, of which the present Minister of Justice was then Attorney General, they entered into an agreement for the purpose of consolidating the railway system of Nova Scotia, and a portion of that agreement was drawn up in these words:

"A line of railway from the Strait of Canso, through the Island of Cape Breton, to a point at or near Louisburg, or other convenient point on the east coast, of a distance of about eighty miles."

Now, I have shown that in successive Governments up to 1882, and in the discussions which took place, a southern route, with its terminus at Louisburg, was the only thing ever thought of. In 1874, the Mackenzie Government agreed to give the Pictou Branch, then under the Dominion Government, to the Local Government. It was considered that inasmuch as that branch had cost over $2,000,000, the money subsidy and the grant of Crown lands to the Local Government would enable a company to build the road as far east as Louisburg. It was represented here by the company who were about to undertake the road, that if Mr. Mackenzie would refuse for another year to give that Pictou Branch to the Local Government, they would be able to build it. Mr. Mackenzie, in the interest of the Island of Cape Breton, taking a deep interest, as he always did, in the island, withheld that branch from the Local Government from 1874 to 1876. Then finding it was impossible to do otherwise, Mr. Mackenzie was induced to give up the Pictou Branch unconditionally, and he did so on a motion in this House in 1876, in reference to this matter. In discussing it Mr. Mackenzie made use of some words which I shall quote to show that on that occasion both the Local Governments, and both parties in Nova Scotia had adopted the policy of the extension of this railway east, having its terminus at Louisburg. It was the policy of Mr. Mackenzie's Government who gave that Pictou Branch of 50 miles, valued at two millions, for the purpose of aiding the Local Government to extend the railway east, having its terminus at Louisburg. Mr. Mackenzie said:

"There was no doubt if a good line to that part of the country was established, a steamship line would sooner or later be organised crossing the narrowest part of the Atlantic, and carrying the mails and passengers, steamers of comparatively light draught which could make more rapid progress than was at present attained. It was evident to any one who studied the map that this would ultimately be the short route to Europe, and would be used, perhaps, within a very few years."

Now, I have given you what were Mr. Mackenzie's views on that occasion. During all this time, during the discussions in the Local Legislature and this Parliament, when the Mackenzie Government were called upon to aid the line, it was always with the view of having a terminus at Louisburg. Now, I propose to show that the same policy was adopted by the present Government. In 1883 the hon. Finance Minister thought it was necessary, in the interests of this country, to take a new departure. He then said in this House that he felt convinced that the Local Legislatures were not in a position to carry out those important works, that it was the bounden duty of this Legislature to aid in the construction of these lines, because they were of national importance, and because the results flowing from them, the development of the country, and the opening up of trade, would enrich the Dominion Treasury. That hon. gentleman, when he was acting as Minister of Railways, clearly laid down the policy that this line was to be in extension of our national system, it was to be an extension of the Intercolonial Railway, having its terminus at Louisburg or Sydney, and not through the Grand Narrows. In the Session of 1883 that hon. gentleman asked this Parliament to grant, among other subsidies, one to the Great American and European Short Line Railway Company, mark you, for 80 miles, a railway from Canso to Louisburg or Sydney in Nova Scotia, a subsidy of $3,200 per mile. Now, in proof of that let me read to you what the hon. Finance Minister, who was then acting as Minister of Railways, said on that occasion. I read it because it is more important than anything I could say, and the language the hon. gentleman used on that occasion conveys not only what I wish to express, but in a more condensed and a more elegant form. He said:

"Then, Sir, it is proposed to give to the great American and European Short Line Railway Company, for 80 miles of their railway from Canso to Louisburg, or Sydney, in the Province of Nova Scotia, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole, $256,000. I may say that this is for the purpose of extending the existing railway system of Canada from the Strait of Canso on the Island of Cape Breton, to Sydney and Louisburg, two ports which are connected with a short line of railway—the only railway of any length existing on the Island of Cape Breton. The construction of this 80 miles will extend the great inter-oceanic system of railway communication to which we have been devoting so much time and energy for the last few years, from Port Moody, on the shores of the Pacific, to the easternmost port in the Dominion of Canada. I need not refer to the great volume of shipping which is now pouring into the harbor of Sydney, as stated by the senior member for the county of Cape Breton last night, and there is only a comparatively small portion of the year when it is inaccessible to the ocean. The port of Louisburg, with which, as I stated, it is connected by rail, is open at all seasons of the year, and by that port we have the shortest route to Liverpool, as the distance via Louisburg is 200 miles shorter than by Halifax, the nearest port to England we now have in Canada. This will make almost an air line of communication—the most direct line of communication—connecting with the Canadian Pacific Railway at Montreal, running by the Grand Trunk system from Montreal to Sherbrooke, there taking the International Railway to the boundaries of the State of Maine, and then striking New Brunswick at the Mattawamkeag, or in that neighborhood, thence on to St. John, thus forming the shortest line of communication which can be obtained between the western portions of Canada and the Atlantic ports."

Again in the same speech he said:

"The distance from Montreal to Halifax will be shortened by 160 miles by the line I have referred to. Then, a subsidy is divided for an extension of the railway system of Nova Scotia towards the Island of Cape Breton. A subsidy composed of fifty miles of completed railway between Truro and Pictou, was handed over by the late Government to the Government of Nova Scotia to enable that Government to secure the construction of the line towards the Island of Cape Breton. I hoped, and all of us hoped, when that subsidy was given, that it could accomplish more than it did accomplish, but when the compact came to be made, it was found that the Government were obliged to give an additional subsidy amounting, I think, to something like $750,000, to secure the construction of the road from Pictou or New Glasgow on to the Strait of Canso. It was hoped that this would carry the line further, but it has not done so, and arrangements have been made by the late and present Government of Nova Scotia to require that 80 miles of railway, leaving 80 miles to be constructed in the Island of Cape Breton, which everybody knows will be of great importance to this country and at no distant date, in forming the most direct and rapid route between this country and the mother country, and knowing as we do, that a great saving of time and distance will be effected for the transfer of mails and passengers by extending this road to the harbor of Louisburg, we believe that Parliament in carrying out and extending the policy of having the most direct line across this continent from ocean to ocean that it is possible to obtain and having the most western portion of our country and the Pacific trade brought as near the mother country and by as rapid and as direct line of communication as possible, will be prepared to approve of the small subsidy to the International Company forming the link on this end of the road, and this subsidy of $3,200 a mile to secure the construction of that 80 miles, as I trust will be secured from Canso to the harbor of Louisburg. I do not think it will be necessary for me to detain the House at this stage of the Session, to speak longer on this question, though great and important as it is: but I will say that it would be difficult to overrate the value to Canada, of obtaining this great route, from ocean to ocean, and it would be difficult to overrate the importance from every point of view, of opening up the Island of Cape Breton. The Island of Cape Breton is cut off by the Strait of Canso, although there is no ice, and no difficulty of maintaining communication across by means of a boat—and, perhaps, at no distant day, by a bridge or a tunnel, although that is not proposed at present. It is at present cut off by the Strait of Canso from railway communication with the rest of the country and it will be impossible to overrate the importance of the development of the Island of Cape Breton, of the construction of that line of railway. Independent of enormous coal fields, independent of the valuable fisheries, it is known that Cape Breton possesses a large portion of good soil adapted to cultivation and development, and also mineral resources of various kinds that only await the facilities railroads alone can give in order to cause the island to spring forward, as I am sure it will, with unwonted rapidity.

That was the language of the present Finance Minister when acting as Minister of Railways in this House in the Session of 1883, when he asked the House to grant, and when the House did grant, towards the European and American Company a subsidy of $3,200 per mile to extend the line from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. Here, then, the House will see that at the very commencement of the new departure by the present Government, when they thought that it was in the interest of the country that they should undertake the construction of this railway, the policy adopted was the policy of the previous Government, to extend this line as forming part of the national highway by the southern route, via St. Peter's to Louisburg or Sydney. Again, in 1884, the same hon. gentleman in moving for certain railway subsidies, asked this House to grant a subsidy of $30,000 for fifteen years for a line from Oxford Station on the Intercolonial Railway to Sydney or Louisburg. Again, in 1885, I find a petition was unanimously signed by the five members then representing Cape Breton, and by a number of other representatives, asking the Government for a grant of money to complete this railway, not to Grand Narrows, but to Louisburg or Sydney. Again, last Session when the Minister of Railways asked a vote of Parliament to construct this work as a Government work, and after receiving that authority from Parliament, and when the Government came down and asked a grant of $1,700,000 to carry out the work, it was all done with a view to extending the road, and the House was asked to grant it for such extension by way of St. Peter's, having for its terminus Sydney or Louisburg. I think I have shown that during all those fourteen years when the subject was discussed in the Local Legislature, when it was entertained from time to time by the different Governments, when it was discussed in this Parliament during the Administration of the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and when the question of railway extension from the Strait of Canso to Cape Breton was discussed in this House during the present administration of affairs, it was always with a view to the extension of the line from Canso as a part of our great national highway, that extension having Louisburg or Sydney as the terminus. I do not hesitate to say that if the present Finance Minister had continued in the Government, acting as Minister of Railways, the railway would never have gone by the Grand Narrows route. I am satisfied from the intimate knowledge he possesses of that section of the country, from his desire for its material progress, for the development of the mineral, agricultural and fishing resources which Cape Breton possesses in such abundance, he would never have consented to the location at Grand Narrows, a location which must prove so injurious to the best interests of the island as a whole. I have pointed out, as briefly as this question would permit, that great injustice will be done to Cape Breton if the present route, the route selected by the Minister of Railways, is adhered to. Besides running in the wrong direction, besides not being a continuation of our national system of railway, besides not having its terminus where it was always proposed, namely on the Atlantic seaboard, the cost would be very much greater than by the southern route. It was reported, and I have seen it publicly stated during the time the surveys were in progress, that the cost of the line via Grand Narrows would be at least $10,000 per mile more than by the southern route, although in the report of the surveys the statement is made that the cost by either route would be the same, $20,000 per mile, provided a steam ferry could be used at Grand Narrows. But from reading the report I cannot see how this is possible owing to the number of bridges, the large structures necessary to be built on that route as compared with the southern route to Louisburg. Now, Sir, Mr. Schreiber in submitting the report of Mr. Hyndman and Mr. Donken, and their surveys of the two routes, makes the following statement, to which I call the attention of the Government, in proof of the position I take that notwithstanding these reports which state that if a steam ferry could be used all the year round—and of that they are doubtful—the cost would be the same. I propose to show from the report as to the nature and character of the country, the character of the structures, the number of bridges, their extent and span, in constructing the line via the Grand Narrows, that it must necessarily involve a great deal more cost per mile than by the other route. What does he say in reference to the road from Hawkesbury to Louisburg :

"The work on about one-fourth of the total distance may be classed as heavy and the remainder medium to light. The bridging on this route is not of an expensive character, the largest structure being that over the Inhabitants River, consisting of one span of 188 feet, and 450 feet of pile trestle. The indications of rock are by no means formidable, and it is estimated that the construction and equipment of this road, including sufficient wharf accommodation at each terminus, to serve the present traffic, would not exceed $20,000 per mile. Attached is Mr. Donken's report describing, in detail, the country traversed, accompanied by tables of gradients and a list of the principal structures required. Also attached is a copy of a letter addressed to Mr. Donken by the Rev. Dr. Sutherland, upon the mineral resources of the country, which cannot fail to be of interest."

Now, what does he say with reference to the Grand Narrows ?

"West of the Grand Narrows the country is very rough, necessitating heavy work and considerable curvature."

He also says :

"The structures are somewhat numerous, there being eight spans of 100 feet required, besides a large number of small bridges and culverts."

He says further :

"The crossing of the Grand Narrows forms a serious obstacle on this route, the width of the waterway being 1,800 feet, with a depth of 75 feet of water for a distance of 1,200 feet. From the information obtained from the engineers in the field, it is believed"—

You will observe that there is nothing positive about it.—

"that no difficulty would be encountered in working a steam ferry across the Narrows at all seasons of the year. A bridge at this point would be a most costly work, whilst a ferry would probably serve the purpose of the traffic of the road if it can be worked without interruption the year round. If a ferry be considered sufficient the cost per mile of this line would be about the same as that to Louisburg, namely $20,000."

Now, in the face of those statements, with regard to the character of the country by these different routes, I cannot see how it is possible that even the engineers could have said that both routes would cost a like amount, namely, $20,000. They also give in this report the number of structures on both routes, and their width; and they show very clearly, taking the reports of the surveyors themselves, notwithstanding the statement that it would cost $20,000 to build it, that it will cost much more per mile by the Grand Narrows than by the other route. By the Louisburg route fifteen structures are required, the largest being on the River Inhabitants, 180 feet span, and 450 feet trestle work; one of 125 feet span, one of 120; two spans of 100 feet, and the remainder of 60 feet. By the Grand Narrows route there are twenty-one structures exclusive of the Narrows, one on Benacadie Pond over 100 feet, eleven requiring from 100 to 650 feet of trestle and three spans of 90 feet. Now, I say that upon these statements it is impossible that the cost via the Grand Narrows can be the same as the cost via the southern route; and I wish to call the attention of the Government to the fact that, even on the face of these reports, meagre as they are, the cost cannot possibly be the same. I wish also to call their attention to the fact that while we have some difficulty in crossing the Strait of Canso, while that difficulty can be overcome to a great extent for the reasons I have stated, that even during the short season in which we have floating ice there are times when we can cross with steamers, during a greater portion of the winter, the ice jams leave clear water in which a crossing can be effected, this is not so in the case of the Grand

Narrows. Neither Mr. Schreiber, Mr. Donken nor Mr. Hyndman states distinctly that it can be used all the year round. Therefore, if the road is built by that route, I warn the Government that they will have to build a bridge at the enormous cost that Mr. Schreiber speaks of. Not only, therefore, will this work, involving this immense cost, have to be proceeded with, but the moment you build the bridge you interfere with the navigation of the Bras d'Or Lake and destroy the usefulness of St. Peter's Canal, constructed at a cost of three-quarters of a million, and used in a great measure by the fishermen and coasters and steamers. It will be utterly useless, for I have it on the authority of many seafaring men, that if there was a bridge built across the Narrows they would not risk their vessels on account of the damage they would incur from the rapidity of the current at that point, and that it would be far better for them to take them round by the Atlantic. Now, if there is any objection to the shore route, as surveyed by Mr. Hyndman, a good line could be had starting from a point at Loch Lomond down the Salmon River Valley to Mira River. This could be extended to Sydney with a short branch from the Mira River to Louisburg. This road would tap the coal fields, the mineral deposits, and a large portion of it would traverse a fine agricultural district. It would be in reality an extension of our national line, making Louisburg the terminus, as it should be, of our great transcontinental highway, thus carrying out the publicly expressed policy of both parties in the Local Legislature of Nova Scotia for fifteen years and also the publicly declared policy of both Governments in the Federal Parliament. When this money was asked, it was with a distinct and clear understanding that this line was to go by the southern route, having Sydney or Louisburg as a terminus. If the other route is adhered to, it will be a breach of faith, a violation of the compact. For years and years, whilst the extension of a railway to the Island of Cape Breton was agitated, nobody ever dared to raise a word in favor of any route but the southern route. It was at one time thought, from the peculiar formation of that island, which is opened up in the very heart of it by the waters of the Bras d'Or Lake, that by making Louisburg the terminus, a line running through Inverness would be necessary to open up the agricultural district of the counties of Victoria and Inverness; but nobody ever dreamed of a route running over a peninsula that is barren and unproductive, abounding in plaster holes, in a place that was once called Sodom, and that was designated by Governor Ainsley, in his report to the British Government, as being unfit for man and beast. That is a description of the country through which this railway was projected to run.

An hon. MEMBER. Carried.

Mr. FLYNN. I do not often trouble the House, and besides, this is not a Government day. I am discussing a matter of very great importance to the people I represent, and if the gentlemen on the other side who say "carried" would please keep quiet, I will bring this subject to a close when I think I have fully and faithfully performed my duty as the representative of the county of Richmond; and I can assure the hon. gentlemen that, by these unseemly shouts of "carried" they will not prevent me doing my duty on the floor of this House. When I do trouble the House it is because I have something to say. This is a question of great importance to the people of the county I represent, if it is not to the gentlemen who shout "carried." Now, during the last election, when it was known that the route to the Grand Narrows was selected, the people of Richmond were assured that a branch would be extended from the Strait of Canso to St. Peter's. The gentleman who opposed me in the contest assured the people of Richmond that that was the intention of the Government, and stated that a telegram to this effect was received by him from two members of the Government:

"We acknowledge H. N. Paint, Conservative candidate in Richmond. Hope friends will secure his return. Will support grant towards branch railway to St. Peter's."

When Mr. Paint received this telegram, he sent this message to his friends:

"Acquaint friends, have guarantee from Government of line of railway to St. Peter's. Tell Conservatives and Grits elect Paint. Send word to Rory Ferguson, 'L'Ardoise.'"

The people did not elect Mr. Paint, notwithstanding that; but they believed that if the Government authorised Mr. Paint to say that they would make a grant for a railway from Canso to St. Peter's, they would do so because it was in the interest of that section of the country, and, therefore, the people believed that no matter who was returned, the Government would carry out that promise. We were also promised the extension of a branch to Arichat. That is the county town of the county of Richmond, and it is the place where I reside; yet, much as I would desire to see a branch there, I would much prefer, if the two cannot be accomplished, that the Government should build a line to St. Peter's, because, for obvious reasons, it would be more in the general interest. On the one hand, it would tap the waters of the Bras d'Or Lake, and on the other, the waters of the Atlantic. St. Peter's is the centre of a fine agricultural district; it has a fine harbor, it is easy of access, and is open all the year round. For these reasons, if the two branches cannot be built, I, as the representative of the county, would prefer the line to St. Peter's. I would prefer it for another reason. I believe that if a branch is built from the Straits of Canso to St. Peter's it must ultimately extend to Louisburg, which is only fifty miles further. The other night I listened with a great deal of pleasure, as I always do, to the hon. Minister of Finance on the motion made by the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson), when he spoke in such glowing terms of the rapid progress and development of Manitoba and the North-West; but that rapid progress and development, as the hon. gentleman stated, has been obtained at a cost of over $70,000,000 to the people of the older Provinces, and there is no portion of the population of this country on whom the burden of that taxation falls more heavily than on the mining and fishing population. They are consumers of almost everything, and I believe the people of the Island of Cape Breton will feel that burden more than any other part of the Dominion. But they might have borne that taxation with some degree of resignation, if the proper route for this railway had been selected. For it would not only have given employment to the people, but it would have developed the resources of the island—its mining, fishing and agricultural resources. No route could be selected that would be better for the country than the line by St. Peter's. I, therefore, trust that the rumors circulated in the county of Richmond during the last election, were not merely to influence the electors of that county as to the way they should vote. I trust that the Government were sincere when this promise was made, as I believe I am right in saying some of them were. The hon. Minister of Finance used to take some interest in the Island of Cape Breton, and I believe he still has an honest and earnest desire to develop its resources. If that is the feeling of the Government, I trust that steps will be immediately taken to carry out the promise made during the election campaign, that in the very near future they will ask this House for the grant of a sum of money to build a branch railway from the Strait of Canso to St. Peter's.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I am very glad that the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) has brought this question before the House, and has asked for the information called for by his motion. I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen), that the following be added to the motion of the hon. member for Richmond:—

And also a copy of all statements and arguments laid before the Government against the Grand Narrows route by the Cape Breton delegation in January last; and also a statement showing the particular route advocated by the said delegation.

In making this motion, I desire to say a few words with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Richmond. In his opening remarks, the hon. member said that the route adopted by the Government for the construction of the road does not meet with the approval of the majority of the people of Cape Breton. I am prepared to take issue with the hon. gentleman on that question, and I would just point out to my hon. friend the result of the last elections. My hon. friend well knows that the question of the railway route in the Island of Cape Breton was the question upon which, to a very large extent, the elections were fought in that island, particularly in my own county. As regards the general fiscal policy, it was a one-sided question with the people of the island, what party should hold the reins of power in this Dominion. The elections of previous years showed that fact from year to year, so that the question of a railway route, I might say, was the sole and absolute question which was before the people on the occasion of the last election. There were in the county seven candidates, two of whom advocated the construction of the road over the line adopted by the Government. These were my hon. friend, the member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKeen) and myself. Opposed to us were three gentlemen who were pledged, if returned to Parliament, to secure an alteration in the decision of the Government, and to have the road constructed from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg or Sydney on the south shore. Otherwise, they declared they would oppose the Government of the day. This was the manner in which the question was before the people of the county I have the honor to represent. It was in the same way before the county of Victoria, except that the people of Victoria did not run a candidate in opposition to the line adopted by the Government. In the county of Inverness, it was also a one-sided affair. The people of Inverness, and Victoria, and the majority of the people of the county of Cape Breton, were one on the question of routes. With regard to the crossing at Grand Narrows, my hon. friend says it is quite impossible to operate a steam ferry all the year round there. What are the facts? Last winter, I venture to say, was one of the severest we have had for the last 30 years, and yet there was not a day but what a row boat could have crossed the Narrows at the place where it is expected to operate this ferry. That is the condition of navigation at Grand Narrows. The hon. gentleman is in error about the report made by Mr. Hyndman. That report was made under a misunderstanding of statements made to that gentleman when he was making the examination of that route, which I pointed out to this House by letter addressed to that engineer a year ago. With the permission of the House, I will read the letter addressed to Mr. Hyndman:

"DEAR SIR,—You will remember that when discussing the subject of the Grand Narrows crossing with you before leaving Cape Breton last fall, I learned from you that acting on information received from Mr. McNeill, you reported to the Department of Railways that the ice in the Grand Narrows attained a thickness of some 6 feet at certain periods in the winter. I subsequently called Mr. McNeill's attention to this, and he told me that you could not have possibly understood him, as no permanent ice forming at or near the Grand Narrows scarcely ever exceeds one foot in thickness, and at the crossing points in the Narrows there is seldom any ice at all; none, however, to impede regular crossing with an open boat during any period in the winter. The only reference which Mr. McNeill or any other person could have made to ice forming a thickness of 6 feet is, that in some parts of the lake when the ice is broken the force of strong winds would cause such ice to be piled up in a crumbled form on the shore to a height or thickness of 6 feet, but does not apply to the immediate points at which the crossing is made. I can only refer you for corroboration of these facts to the ferrymen of forty years' experience on both sides of the Narrows. I might further add that the mails from Port Hastings for North Sydney have been crossed over the Grand Narrows in an open row boat during the last two winters every night (excepting Sunday), and although the winter of 1885 was an exceptionally severe winter, the service had been accomplished without a single interruption by ice since first established. The same may be said with regard to the mail service performed across the ferry for a period of some fifteen or twenty years in day time, previous to the establishing the present night service in connection with the mail to and from North Sydney. And I trust you will be pleased to represent this matter to the Department in conjunction with your former report, if you have not done so already."

Mr. McDougall.

Mr. FLYNN. That is your own letter.

Mr. McDougall. This is my letter, and these statements I repeat on the floor of this House. I would like to ask the hon. member for Richmond if the statements he has made he made on his own authority, or from any knowledge he personally formed of the character of the crossing at the Grand Narrows? Has he any authority to give this House for his statement, further than that report made under a misapprehension by an engineer who, for the first time in his life, saw the Island of Cape Breton that fall? My hon. friend says that the Local Government always adhered to the route from St. Peter's to Louisburg, and that this is evidence why the question of the route by the Grand Narrows was not before the people until last year. I beg to say to my hon. friend that the question of the route by the Narrows was before the people since 1875, and I was the first to bring it before the people. Subsequently to that, in 1877, I was appointed one of a committee by a mass meeting held in the shire town of the county I have the honor to represent, to confer with both Local and Dominion Governments, with the view of extending the road from the Strait of Canso by way of Grand Narrows to Sydney. The reason why the Local Government adhered to the building of the road by the southern route to Louisburg was that, at the same time, they had granted a subsidy in aid of the construction of the road to Louisburg. They granted a subsidy in aid of a railway to Whyccomagh and Broad Cove on the northern side of the island. This is an evidence that the Local Government could not have had the unanimous opinion of the people of the island on the subject of the building of that road. They could never get the people to be of one mind on that subject. Nor could they venture to unite them, so they kept dangling before the eyes of the people, both of the north and of the south, subsidies which were insufficient to secure the construction of that road. I made a proposition myself, to the Attorney General of 1877, to put these subsidies together, and pointed out that by doing so he could get a road through the interior by way of the Grand Narrows which would be better than either the northern or the southern route; but I could not get the hon. member to agree to that. He favored the southern route himself, and, therefore, he could not adopt the Grand Narrows route, and would not agree to put the subsidy granted for the northern with that granted for the southern route in order to secure one trunk line through the island as I suggested. On that question, I may say, I was brought before the people in 1878 and was returned to Parliament, and the Attorney General was defeated by the votes of the very people at whose instance I made the suggestion which he refused to adopt or propose to the Government of which he was a member. My hon. friend quoted from the report of the engineers the statement that the cost of the Grand Narrows route would be no more than that of the southern route, but they went even further than that, Sir, and stated that there was a difference in the cost of construction per mile in favor of the Narrows route which would fully equip a ferry across the Grand Narrows. I discovered that my hon. friend has quoted the report of the engineers in favor of a route by way of East Bay and Benacadie, which is a circuitous route and a most expensive route.

Mr. FLYNN. I quoted in reference to the Grand Narrows route.

Mr. McDougall. Yes, but my hon. friend may not be aware of the fact that that is an entirely different route from that which the Government adopted. Last year the engineers reported on the route from Sydney, by way of north side of East Bay, and by Benacadie to Grand Narrows, but subsequent to that, one of the first surveys, after the policy of building the road as a Government work was adopted to construct this road, was the survey from Grand Narrows to North Sydney and Sydney, and it was found that this route was much cheaper and much easier, and for that reason the Government adopted it. My hon. friend says the report of the engineers cannot possibly be correct with regard to the estimated cost of the construction of the railway, but he believes in the report of the engineers on a question of the ice in the Grand Narrows, although that portion of the report is contradicted. I cannot see how he can reconcile these two statements. If he believes the engineers in one case, why does he not believe them in the other case? He cannot possibly have looked over the report of the engineers without seeing my letter in reference to the report of Mr. Hyndman, but my hon. friend passed over that letter, although he might have referred to it and to the answer subsequently made by the engineer. I look upon it as unfair to adopt such a course in arguing this question before the House. If the report of the engineers was correct in one case, why is it not in the other? My hon. friend laid great stress on the fact that, because the Local Government in offering subsidies towards the construction of the road in Cape Breton, offered them in favor of the construction to Louisburg and by St. Peter's, therefore the present Government should have adhered to that route. I venture to say that one of the reasons why no person or body of people was willing heretofore to undertake the construction of the road in the Island of Cape Breton, was because the Government insisted on building by the southern route to Louisburg. I will give a reason for that. In the first place, the Government did not provide for crossing the Strait of Canso in any other way than by steam service; and we have the authority of the hon. gentleman to-night for saying that it is not possible to navigate the Strait of Canso without interruption during the winter. If that be the fact, how could these people be expected to build a road through a section of country where there is little or no traffic to be expected? I mean by the southern side of the island. There is no local traffic except a small traffic in fish, and most of those who deal in fish have their own vessels, and would rather ship their fish by their own vessels to Halifax, which is their ordinary market, than by rail. These are the reasons why, to my mind, that road was not adopted by any company or government which attempted to undertake the building of a road in eastern Nova Scotia, and particularly by that company known as the Eastern Extension Company, which had the option of building either to Louisburg or to St. Peter's or to the Bras d'Or Lake, but they did not choose to carry it out for that reason. Any company or any government undertaking to build a road through the island would have to build by the route which would ensure the best local traffic, as foreign traffic could not be expected because of the difficulty of crossing the Strait of Canso. I venture to say that there is no section of the Province of Nova Scotia that holds out the inducements for local traffic that the route which has been adopted by the Government does. It runs by the side of the Bras d'Or Lake for more than half its length, and for that reason, during the summer season, and during the open navigation season, there are means of bringing traffic to that road from different directions that could not be brought by a road built through any other section of the island. More than that, the road by the present route will terminate for the time being in a harbor which is unrivalled, I might say, in the world, with access to Louisburg. The harbor of Sydney is one of the finest harbors in the world. Besides that, it taps the coal mines, it taps the railways leading to the coal mines.

If it went to St. Peter's and direct to Louisburg, it would not tap the mines of the country without incurring the cost of acquiring a road which is now built to Louisburg, but which is not in operation. Because of the expense of keeping it in operation, the company found it cheaper to do without the road than to keep it in operation after they had built it. By the present road, tapping the principal mines of the country, tapping the oldest mine in Nova Scotia, and tapping the other mines of the country, and terminating in the town of Sydney, I say the road could not have gone through any other section of the Island of Cape Breton that could hold out the same inducements as this route. In addition to that, we find the road running parallel to about one-half of the boundary of the county of Victoria, within five, and six and seven miles of that county. That is a matter of importance, because the sections of the county which are adjacent to that road are agricultural districts which are unequalled in eastern Nova Scotia. There is the Island of Boularderie, for instance, which is 27 miles in length, adjacent to this line of railway, and is a magnificent farming country. Then there is the Middle River, and other settlements within ten or twelve miles of this route. As to the section of the country west of the Grand Narrows, my hon. friend has told the House that it was so barren and full of plaster that it was quite unfit for anything. Now, Sir, I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that question also. If my hon. friend can find 100 acres of land from the Grand Narrows to the Strait of Canso, on the line which has been adopted by the Government, that is unfit for cultivation, I am willing to resign my seat in this House. I know every inch of that land; I have known it from infancy, and have gone over it a great many times. I am satisfied my hon. friend is not speaking from personal knowledge of this country, but from information given to him by parties who had other objects in getting up an excitement about this railway route, than the best interests of the country. That was my experience in dealing with this question on the hustings during the last elections. I found that there was no agitation in the Island of Cape Breton, or in my own county, with regard to the question of route, at least not such an agitation as he would have us believe. We had a delegation sent up here from Cape Breton and Richmond counties in January last, headed by the senator from my county, and by one of the local members. Those gentlemen asserted that they came here to put the views of the people of Cape Breton before the Government, and I desire that those views should be made known to the public, in addition to the reports and to the particulars for which my hon. friend has called. Now, after those gentlemen had put their views before the Government and went back, they declared that any man who would advocate the building of that road by the Narrows, could not get his election in my county. What was the result? I went before the electors, and notwithstanding the means of opposition that they used against me, notwithstanding the fact that the hon. senator had taken a stand against me and brought out two candidates against me, the people who favored the construction of the road by the Grand Narrows, elected me as their representative, and if that is not an endorsement of the action of the Government in adopting this route, I do not know what is. Not only did these gentlemen fail to get their election, but they lost their deposit; and another gentleman who undertook to come before the people on the question of routes, lost his deposit also; he took about one vote to three that my hon. friend and myself took. This is how that question was dealt with in the county I have the honor to represent. There were no two opinions on this question in the counties of Inverness and Victoria. When I was here in January to see the Government in reference to this question, and when those delegates came up from Cape Breton, they tried to lead the Government to believe they were making a mistake by adopting the Narrows route, that the people of Victoria of all shades of politics were dissatisfied, I communicated with leaders of both parties in that county as to the feeling, and they replied to me on that occasion that there were no two opinions in the county, and that the people would protest in the strongest manner if the Government adopted any other route. Now, with these facts before him, I do not think my hon. friend should have taken such strong grounds as he did on this question. I hope when the information asked for by my hon. friend, and that asked for by myself, is brought before the House, the country will have an opportunity of seeing what little reason these people have for advocating another route than that adopted by the Government. I have no fear as to the result, I have no fear as to the general opinion of the public on this question, and the satisfaction which will be given by the route adopted.

Mr. CAMERON. I have only a few words to add to what has been said by my hon. friend the senior member for the county of Cape Breton. This question has been fully discussed before the electors of the Island of Cape Breton, and the verdict which has been given should have satisfied my hon. friend the member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn). It is true, as he has alleged, that this question of building a railway through the Island of Cape Breton has been before the public for a long period, and it is equally true that until the year 1875 the route proposed by those who agitated in favor of a railway through the Island of Cape Breton was from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. But it is true also that both the Local and Dominion Governments failed, up to last year, to induce any company to undertake the construction of a railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg. That fact also ought to lead my hon. friend to conclude that there must have been serious reasons why neither a company nor a government up to that time could be induced to undertake the construction of that line. In 1882, the Local Government, and the Dominion Parliament as well, incorporated a company called the Short Line Railway Company, not for the purpose of building a railway from the Strait of Canso to Louisburg, but for the purpose of building a line from the Strait of Canso to Cape North. It is not true, therefore, to say that the construction of a line from the Strait of Canso to Sydney or Louisburg, via the Grand Narrows, was not agitated until 1885. The agitation for the purpose of building that line commenced as early as 1875, and as my hon. friend the senior member for Cape Breton intimated, he was the originator of that agitation. I may say that at that time I, myself, contributed my mite towards the agitation in favor of building a line in that direction, feeling then, as I do now, that no company or government would undertake the construction of a road where no local traffic could be obtained for it. In 1883, this Parliament subsidised the so-called Short Line Railway for the purpose of building a line from the Strait of Canso, via Grand Narrows, to Sydney, and not by St. Peter's, as intimated by the hon. member for Richmond. The object of that company was, as I have already stated, to construct a railway from the Strait of Canso to Cape North, but as part of that great line in which they had embarked they proposed to extend a section from Whyccomagh to Sydney. It was found, however, that the subsidy of $3,200 per mile was not sufficient to enable that company to undertake the construction of that line. In 1884, in addition to the subsidy of $3,200 per mile, this Parliament granted $30,000 for fifteen years to a line from Oxford to Sydney, and the Eastern Extension, with its equipment, and, as the engineer of the company repeatedly informed me, with the intention that the line should be constructed via the Grand Narrows. This is evident from the fact that the Short Line Railway Company had surveyed the line in the direction of the Grand Narrows in 1883, nearly as far as the Grand Narrows, as that was the only direction in which they would build a line with any subsidy. When this question of route was before the House on a former occasion I stated my views fully, believing that if any Government or any company would undertake its construction, the road would be built in the direction where local traffic would be furnished to the line. On 11th February, 1885, the late member for Richmond, N.S., (Mr. Paint) brought this question before the House, believing then, as the present member for that county believes now, that the line would probably be built via Grand Narrows, if undertaken by the Short Line Railway Company. But feeling that neither this House nor the people were in a position to judge as to the best route I spoke in the following words:—

“ My own idea was and is still that the determination of the route through the island of Cape Breton should be left exclusively to the discretion of any company who would undertake to build the railway through the island. I apprehend that in past days the enforcement of particular routes upon railway companies may have been the reason why disappointment followed disappointment successively. It would be unwise, it would be unfair, it would be against the interests of the Island of Cape Breton to tie the company down to any particular route, and, therefore, I think it is premature even to mention the route now. When the Government are in a position to subsidise a company sufficiently to enable them to build that road, or when the Government undertake the construction of the road themselves, it will be ample time for the member for Richmond, the member for Cape Breton county, the member for Victoria, or the member for Inverness, to present the claims of the respective localities, and to give reasons why any particular route should be selected. On that phase of the subject I have determined not to speak. My object in rising now is merely to make a statement in behalf of the Short Line Railway Company, in reference to which the honorable member has spoken. I am authorised by the engineer and the general manager of the Great American and European Short Line Railway Company to state that no correspondence has taken place, and that no plans in regard to routes in Cape Breton had been talked of or submitted to the Government; that no location of the line had been made or considered by the company, and that none would be made until the different routes had been surveyed and reported upon; that while different routes recommended by members of Parliament and other interested parties would be carefully surveyed and estimated, it was the intention of the company to ask those members of Parliament and others interested to present such statements as each might desire to make in favor of the route which he preferred; and that such statements, together with the engineer's report, would be submitted to the directors of the company for approval before any route in Cape Breton would be adopted, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. My object in rising on this occasion was simply to state this in behalf of the company and to assure my hon. friend from Richmond (Mr. Paint) that it is in the interest of a railway extension in Cape Breton to leave the selection of the route exclusively to the discretion of the company undertaking to build the railway subject to the approval of the Governor in Council.

This was my opinion at the time when it was supposed that the construction of this road would be undertaken by a company, and the surveys made up to 1885, from which the hon. member for Richmond, N. S. (Mr. Flynn), has quoted, had been made with a view to assisting that company to determine on what route they would undertake the construction of the road. But several surveys have been made by the Government since that time, and the route to which the hon. gentleman has referred has not been adopted by the Government. It is true that the people of Richmond are not satisfied with the location of the line. It may be equally true that a portion of the people of Inverness, or Victoria or Cape Breton, may not be satisfied with the selection made by the Government; but it is equally true that the responsibility for the adoption of that particular line rests upon the shoulders of the Government, and if they claim that the selection they made was one in the interest of the people of the island, on them rests the responsibility. If the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) had quoted from the report of the chief engineer of the Department, he would have found that that officer had, to a large extent, recommended the line via Grand Narrows, even before the late surveys were made. He will find in the report from which he has quoted, that the chief engineer, referring to the leading facts in connection with these routes, speaks as follows:—

“ Port Hawkesbury to Louisburg:—The initial point of this survey is Point Tupper, on the east side of the Straits of Canso and immediately opposite to the present terminus of the Eastern Extension Railway, this point having been adopted as being the easiest of access to steamers during the winter. The total distance by the surveyed line to Louisburg is eighty-three miles, the St. Peter's Canal being crossed at the twenty-ninth mile, in close proximity to the present road bridge. The general character of the country traversed is rough and broken, and it was found necessary to use grades of 78 feet per mile to avoid very heavy work. The highest elevation above sea level is 308 feet, which is attained passing over the summit between the basin of Loch Lomond and the Mira River."

The work on this route via St. Peter's is a very difficult one and a very expensive one, the cost being placed at $20,000 per mile. The object of this Parliament was to reach Sydney. It will be found by the reports of the chief engineer that the shortest route from the Strait of Canso to Sydney has been adopted, and also that the route which will secure for the railway the greatest amount of traffic has been adopted. In regard to the route via St. Peter's, the reports says:

"The bridging on this route is not of an expensive character, the largest structure being that over the Inhabitants River."

The estimated cost was $20,000 per mile. In regard to the route which was then surveyed from Port Hawkesbury to Sydney, via Grand Narrows, the chief engineer says:

"This survey starts from Point Tupper, and, for a distance of four miles, follows the surveyed line to Louisburg, then branches northwards, runs north of the Great Bras d'Or Lakes, crosses the Grand Narrows at the 51st mile and reaches Sydney Harbor at the 92nd mile. Mr. Donken, however, explains a portion of the surveyed line having been run with a view of passing over the high ground between River Inhabitants and River Deny's, afterwards found impracticable, a deflection to the Big Brook Valley was made. This deflection, he says, can be avoided by adopting a direct line, which presents no difficulty and a saving be effected of about five miles. The line, generally, passes through a good agricultural country, with indications of various minerals."

This is in direct contradiction to what the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) has quoted. The chief engineer also gives this information:

"From the information obtained by the engineers in the field, it is believed that no difficulty would be encountered in working a steam ferry across the Narrows at all seasons of the year. A bridge at this point would be a most costly work, whilst a ferry would probably serve the purpose of the traffic of the road, if it can be worked without interruption the year round. If a ferry be considered sufficient, the cost per mile of this line would be about the same as that to Louisburg, viz., $20,000."

So the chief engineer's report made on the previous surveys, which were not made with a view to the Government undertaking the building of the road, but with a view to assisting a short line company to undertake its construction, conclusively proves that the statistics which the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn) has quoted are not correct. But since that survey has been made the chief engineer has recommended, for reasons best known to himself, a line direct from the Strait of Canso to the Narrows, by Big Brook, which shortens the line by five miles to Sydney and is much more easily constructed. The hon. gentleman will find, when the papers come down, that the last report of the chief engineer is conclusively in favor of the line adopted by the Government, and every person who is reasonable, not only in Inverness, Victoria and Cape Breton, will agree with the chief engineer that the best location was made, but every sensible person in the county of Richmond will also consider it satisfactory.

Mr. McKEEN. I have no intention of addressing the House at any length, after the time which has been occupied in discussing this question. It is a most unfortunate fact that the noble Island of Cape Breton is so nearly bisected as to make it almost two islands, and being two islands, it is entirely impossible to locate a line of railway which will suit both the north and the south sides of the island. Much might be said in favor of both routes, and I feel a good deal of sympathy with the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), for unfortunately, his county is situated on the southern side of the island, and does not derive that benefit from the proposed line of road that the other side does. I think, from what I have learned from the engineers who had charge of the surveys of these routes, that the expense of building the road would be pretty nearly the same. From what I gathered from the engineers, during the agitation with regard to the location of this road, last autumn, I concluded that there was not more than a mile difference in the length of the lines. I learned also that the gradients were about the same, and that the expense of construction, with the exception of building the bridge across the Narrows, if that should ever be found necessary, was almost the same. I must conclude, therefore, the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Flynn), is misinformed, when he says that the expense of building the central line is much greater than if the southern line were built. I simply take the estimates given by the engineer in charge of the line, in expressing that opinion. Personally, I may say I have no great preference for either. Either line suits us, and, therefore, I did not take any decided ground. I may say, however, that I fail to see the necessity of taking up the time of the House upon this question, when we know that the matter has already been decided by the Government, that the line is under contract, that the work of construction has been going on for the last four or five months, that thousands of dollars have been spent in building the road from Sydney to the Grand Narrows, and that it is absurd to suppose that the route could be changed on account of any representations that could be made at this late hour. We must remember that a strong delegation was sent up here last winter, as strong a delegation as the advocates of the southern route could select; they presented the case of the southern route, ably, I have no doubt, but they failed to move the Government. It is useless, therefore, to think that any representations that can now be brought forward would make them depart from their present position. But what I more particularly wanted to say was this: the road is now under construction, or about to be put under construction, from the Strait of Canso to Sydney, and that road will fail in its object if it is not continued as far as the important harbor of Louisburg. We know that is the only open port we have on the Island of Cape Breton. Sydney is closed for some four months in the year, but Louisburg is open—free to the navigation of the world, we might say—for at least ten or eleven months in the year. We know that the route from Sydney to Louisburg intersects one of the richest mining localities in the Dominion—mines which represent a capital of some eight or ten millions of dollars, and some seven or eight collieries, which, during the winter, have no outlet to the sea except by Louisburg. I feel satisfied that when the Government take this matter into consideration they will see the importance and the necessity of continuing the present system of railway on to Louisburg, touching the different collieries of our county. Without that extension the system will be incomplete, and must partially fail in the accomplishment of the object sought to be achieved.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS AT TORONTO.

Mr. McMULLEN moved for:

Copies of all reports, letters, correspondence, &c., of the chief engineer, and any sub-engineer or engineers to the chief engineer or the Department of Public Works, relating to or connected with the harbor improvements at Toronto, during the years A.D. 1885 and 1886; also copies of all reports and correspondence of the inspector or inspectors-in-chief to the chief engineer, and also to the Department, relating to the said harbor improvements, or the material used, also samples of any bolts, spikes or other material forwarded to or seized by the Department as not being in compliance with the specification under which the work was let.

He said: My object in moving the present resolution is to have the information to which it refers brought down. I have heard that in the matter of pile-driving, in connection with this work, the piles were not driven to the depth required by the conditions of the contract, and also that some of the materials used, such as bolts, were not in accordance with the contract. A large amount of money has been expended in connection with this work, and I believe a further sum is going to be expended. I notice that this year the vote is small, but last year Cook & Jones were paid $134,199.43, and that they also drew, on another contract, $288,495.35, which is a large sum to expend in connection with this work. It appears in the spring of 1884-85, a severe storm arose and a large portion of this work was swept away. I believe that work was not constructed in accordance with the provisions of the contract. I am informed that the piles, instead of being properly driven to the depth required by the contract, were driven only a short distance, and that the tops were sawed off. I am also informed that blind bolts were used, and that one box of these was seized by the engineer in charge, and is now, either in his possession or in the possession of the Department of Public Works. I do not make this motion for the purpose of finding fault with the Minister of Public Works, but simply to bring this point before the House and the Government so as to protect the country against such useless expenditure of public money. In the construction of harbors, where a contract has been let, it is necessary that the work should be solidly and substantially constructed, and if any inefficiency is permitted by the engineers in charge, the country will certainly suffer great loss. I do not know whether, in the final settlement, any deduction was made by the Government on account of any imperfection in the work. But I believe that it was constructed so badly that when storms came the whole thing was swept away. I believe Mr. Perley was engineer at the time, and that he has in his possession some of the blind bolts I have referred to. I would like to have a return brought down giving all the facts connected with this matter. If there is no truth in the statement that I have given, and I have it on very good authority, the facts will show. We expend hundreds of thousands of dollars for the construction of harbors, and it is a serious matter if the work is so imperfectly done that the whole structure has been washed away, and the country is required to make restitution for such a destruction of property.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman bringing up this matter. He put his case in a very proper way before the House, and so far as I am concerned I do not complain at all. There is some truth in the statements that have been made to the hon. gentleman about some deficiency in the work. That was traced to the clerk of works who was there at the time the work was performed, and was responsible for its execution; but this has been cured, to a very great extent, since the report was made to the Department. There were storms, and a portion of the stones, which were small, were carried away. As soon as that was reported to the Department, it ordered large stones to be used, and I understand from the chief engineer that since then the work has proved to be good work, and will stand the storms of the lake. Deputations from the City Council, and I believe from the Harbor Board of Toronto, went this spring to examine the work, which it had been represented had been carried away; but they found to their satisfaction, and mine, that it was not so. Of course, as the hon. gentleman knows, severe storms must have greater or less effect on works of this kind, and, therefore, repairs are occasionally required. The other day, when my attention was called to the notice of the hon. gentleman's motion, I enquired of the chief engineer of the Department what condition it was in now, and he told me it was in good order. I may say that the city of Toronto has promised, through deputations at different periods, during the last five or six years to place to the credit of the Department for that work,

Mr. McMULLEN.

$100,000, which, with the sum we are now asking from Parliament, is expected to complete the work in a satisfactory manner. I would ask the hon. gentleman to strike out of the motion the words, "and of any sub-engineer or engineers to the chief engineer or the Department of Public Works." Otherwise we could never obtain from a sub-engineer or an inspector the whole truth, because he would be afraid it might injure his prospects; but the whole report is assumed by the chief engineer.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite willing to consent to the suggestion of the hon. Minister of Public Works.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

CLEMENCY OF THE CROWN.

Mr. SPROULE moved:

That in view of this being the fiftieth year of the reign of Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, and that it is to be observed as a "Jubilee" or general rejoicing throughout Her Empire, it is expedient that a humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that the clemency of the Crown be extended to those unfortunate criminals now incarcerated in the various penitentiaries of the Dominion, and that the said executive clemency be extended to those male and female convicts whose conduct has been meritorious during their imprisonment, and that it be considered under the following heads, viz.:

- 1st. Life sentences to be commuted to a reasonable term of years.
- 2nd. That all who have served ten years be set at liberty.
- 3rd. That all convicts with a record of good conduct since their incarceration, be allowed a remission of ten days for every month's imprisonment since 1st January, 1887.

That the Minister of Justice be instructed to submit, through the Warden of the Penitentiaries, a list of those deserving or entitled to Executive clemency, according to the foregoing requirements, in order to make it a year of rejoicing to those poor unfortunates confined in living tombs.

He said: My object in making this motion at present is to have performed a merciful act towards a class of Her Majesty's subjects who are to-day deprived of their liberty, many of whom have few friends to speak on their behalf, either inside or outside of the House. The unfortunate acts which have produced that chasm between them and society, over which they will scarcely ever be able to make a bridge, have been such as to alienate from them the affections, generally, of humanity. I make this motion at this particular time, because I think it is an opportune one, in view of the fact that we are holding this year a jubilee or general rejoicing, and in order to enable every element of society to take part in that rejoicing, so that we may extend the jubilee to those who, under ordinary circumstances, could not be expected to participate in it. I may be asked, is there any precedent for this motion? In answer, I would say that only a short time ago, in that great country, India, which is under the ægis of the British Crown, such a motion has been made, such a principle has been adopted, such a principle has been acted upon, advised and sanctioned by no less a person than the Viceroy of India himself, Lord Dufferin, who is favorably known in this country. If an authority such as he, has seen fit, in his wisdom, to extend this great clemency to those poor and unfortunate criminals, and that he expects no unhappy results will ensue, or, in the language of those who have acted upon it, that it is not expected additional crime will be the result, we may fairly be justified in recommending it in Canada. I make it on behalf of the clergymen and others who have sent a very numerous signed petition to the Governor General from both Kingston and Toronto, praying for the release of these convicts, and also on behalf of the hundreds of thousands who, unfortunately, have friends and relations confined in those living dungeons, and who are, from day to day, petitioning in the strongest possible language for the relief of these unfortunate criminals. It may be said that we, as a people, who profess the Christian religion, are always preaching clemency and mercy. If this is a characteristic of Christianity, we are entitled to extend that clemency and mercy to even the most insignificant of Her Majesty's subjects. But, it may be said, society is likely to suffer by the release of those prisoners. In answer to that, I would say that there are very strong grounds for believing the reverse. Many of those unfortunates who are to-day paying the penalty of their crime, receive as much punishment by their confinement for a few months as they would have received if confined for fifty years. Besides it is likely that many of them who have been sent there have been sent there for the commission of acts, the result of sudden temper, impatience and sudden fright, or for acts committed when they had little or no control of themselves at the time, through excited condition of temper, or liquor, or other causes, and who, under such circumstances, have received ample punishment in a very short time to make them, in all future, good members of society, should the mercy of the Crown be extended to them. Some hon. gentlemen in this House have, in talking the matter over, said the criminals who were released in India were only those imprisoned on account of debt. I find, on looking through the report, that such is not the case; I find that criminals of all classes were considered and liberated. It has been said by some that only a few were released. I find, on looking over the report of the London Times, that there were no less than 23,307 discharged in India on the 16th February. While that large number was discharged, and discharged by the advice and with the consent of the Viceroy of that great country, we might fairly consider the reasonableness of extending clemency to the few hundred who are confined in our penitentiaries. It is said that the Government find it a difficult task to employ those parties in the penitentiaries, on account of the feeling that exists that prison labor should not be brought into competition with outside labor; and since the lock trade was closed in Kingston, it is a difficult matter to give employment to those prisoners. If so, it is most important that we should devise some other means of reducing the number, and not only reducing the number, but exercising, at the same time, a great act of clemency. I only ask for this consideration for those prisoners who have had a good record during their confinement. Many are confined for trivial offences, who have no friends, or relatives, or money to be used in their behalf, and, consequently, they are allowed to spend the full length of their term, when others who are, perhaps, confined for much more heinous offences against society, are allowed to get out before their term has expired. The Minister of Justice said a few days ago there was a terrible difference in the length of sentences given by judges in the Maritime Provinces and those in Ontario. This shows that it is simply a matter of opinion as to the length of time which each criminal should be condemned to remain in those cells in expiation of his crime; and when one is confined for fifteen years for an offence for which another is let off for two years, it cannot be said that we are doing any injustice in asking the Crown to extend its clemency to all on the same scale. And so I ask on behalf of those unfortunate criminals and of their friends throughout the country who are asking anxiously for their release, that the clemency of the Crown may be exercised in their behalf. We find that petitions are sent in day after day, and week after week, for clemency in regard to these cases, but there are a great number in whose behalf petitions are never sent in. I have before me a letter from a reverend gentleman who speaks of two cases now in the penitentiary. One man is sent there for fifteen years for the theft of a very small article. Another is sent for a term between fifteen and twenty years for burning a building, although he was at a time of life when he could hardly be expected to understand the evil he was committing. No effort has been made on behalf of these criminals, because they have no friends to interpose, and no money to induce others to interpose in their behalf; and in all probability they would be allowed to spend their time, or to grow old while they were confined in these dungeons, without an effort being made to secure their release, and to give them another opportunity to live as peaceful and grateful citizens under the reign of Her Majesty. It is said by the Viceroy of India that if anything is more than another characteristic of the Victorian era, it is the onward march and progress of the moral influences that go to make up the well-being of a nation. If that be so we may fairly claim some consideration at the hands of liberal Canadians, as well as at the hands of people in India. In reference to this question I need not take up the time of the House long, but I may say that in consultation with some hon. gentlemen about it, it was expressed as a wish that as many members of the House as could be got would speak on it, no matter how briefly, in order to give expression of the people of this country through their representatives of their feeling upon this subject. I believe there is scarcely a member of this House who has not had, at one time or another, to present a petition on behalf of these criminals; and, if hon. gentlemen do take an interest in behalf of these criminals, as I believe they do, I hope that each one of them will give expression to his opinion on these resolutions. If the Governor General sees fit to consider this matter on the lines laid down in these resolutions, I do not think any injustice will be done, but that a great act of clemency, a great act of mercy, will be displayed in behalf of a class who have few to support their claims or interest themselves in their favor. I move the resolution, and trust it will receive every consideration at the hands of this House and at the hands of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is impossible that I can do ample justice to the sentiments which actuate the hon. member who has made the motion and many hon. members who are inclined, I am sure, to support it. I say it is impossible that I can do their sentiments justice, because, while appreciating them very highly indeed, I am utterly unable to concur in this motion being adopted. These sentiments which actuate the hon. member who has brought the motion forward are those which, I find, in the experience which I have had in office, actuate about three-fourths of the members of this House, who are under the impression, apparently, that the unfortunate persons who are confined in the penitentiaries of this Dominion are confined there either through mistake, or some unforeseen misadventure which it was impossible for them to provide against. It is oftentimes my disagreeable duty to undeceive them, and I must confess that I very seldom succeed in convincing them or shaking the idea they have that the persons whose cause they have been advocating are the victims of mistake or cruelty. I think, if I may express the sentiment without offence to the gentlemen who are supporting this motion, that the most unsuitable way we could devise of celebrating Her Majesty's Jubilee, or attempting to confer any benefit upon the public, would be let loose upon the community a class of people who have shown themselves able, by long experience, to inflict the greatest injury upon the community; for, unfortunately, this is the class of persons whom we generally have in our penitentiaries. I know, in regard to the hon. gentleman who has made this motion, I know from his asking me to show my clemency in regard to this motion, as well as in regard to particular cases which have come under my notice, that he shares the sentiments which are expressed in the resolution, that these persons are really unfortunates, that they are to a certain extent the victims of the tribunals of this country. In considering the very many cases which are brought to my notice in connection with petitions for clemency, I am bound to regard them in a very different light. I think, Mr. Speaker, that there is no country in the world in which the criminal classes are treated with such large consideration as they are in Canada. The criminal procedure in Canada, from the first moment of a man's arrest until the last moment of his detention in prison, is a procedure which devises means for his escape. In the first place he is brought for examination before a justice of the peace, one of whose first duties is to warn the prisoner not by any chance to say anything which will tend to aid his conviction. In the next place, before he can be put upon his trial, there must be a clear majority of the grand jury, a tribunal devised in his interest, the most ingenious tribunal that the wisdom of man has ever devised to enable criminals to escape—it is only after obtaining the assent of a body like the grand jury, that he can even be put upon his trial. And then, before he can be convicted, we must have the unanimous concurrence of the petit jury before which he is tried, a jury which is susceptible to all the sentiments of compassion or sympathy, which run through the classes of the community from which the criminal himself is drawn. And then, as I reminded the House the other evening, we have every kind of appeal made, not only for executive clemency, but for the clemency of the judge before whom the trial has taken place. The conviction has been forced upon me by the experience I have had in connection with such matters, that the judges before whom these trials take place—I can speak confidently, at least, as regards the administration of criminal justice, in the larger Provinces—are actuated by motives of clemency and humanity; and I must say that in the majority of cases that have been brought before me, in which executive clemency has been asked for, if I had the power to do so, I would have increased the sentence instead of diminishing it. So often are persons misled, and it may be that the hon. member who has brought this resolution forward has been misled by the same consideration—so often are persons misled by philanthropic motives, by kindly feelings, towards those whom they know are undergoing a punishment which must, for the time being, at any rate, whether it tends to the elevation of their lives or not, be sufficient to excite the prisoner to penitence—through motives of sympathy of that kind I am continually applied to by members of this House, as well as persons outside, who are altogether mistaken in their view, both of the hardship which the prisoners are enduring and of the circumstances which have led to their being immured in prison. I may refer to one case which came under my observation in connection with the urgent application of some three or four members of this House within the last two or three weeks, a case in which, I may say, those gentlemen were entirely convinced by outside information, that it was a case of extreme hardship and extreme severity on the part of the judge who had imposed the sentence; and their application was backed by a strong petition, and by as urgent an application as they could make. But an examination of the papers of but a few moments was sufficient to convince them that the prisoner, whatever the severity of the sentence may have been as regards that particular offence, was then undergoing his eighteenth penalty, and that seventeen times before then he had showed himself utterly obdurate and insensible to any sentence the magistrate could impose upon him. In that connection I may refer to the details of the resolution. It does not proceed upon any logical basis as regards the treatment of these prisoners. Life sentences are to be commuted to a reasonable term of years. The practice in Great Britain, so far as I have been able to ascertain it, is to consider a long term of years as equivalent to a life sentence, and I am disposed to follow that policy. But a great deal must depend on the nature of the offence which the prisoner has committed. For instance, if a grave offence, but far short of murder, has been committed by the prisoner, it may be reasonable that 10, or, at the utmost, 15 years, would be sufficient commutation for a life imprisonment. On the other hand, if the prisoner has committed the offence of murder, and through any circumstances his sentence has been commuted to imprisonment for life, we are asked again to commute that sentence to a shorter term. He may be a young man, and a term of 10 or 15 years would be an entirely inadequate commutation. And, for these reasons, every life sentence is to be considered in relation to the age of the prisoner and the gravity of his offence, and in relation also to the question whether, in receiving that life sentence, he has also been a subject of executive clemency before, by the commutation of a sentence of death. So that in adopting the sweeping provisions that life sentences are to be commuted to a reasonable term of years, we are asked to adopt a theory for which it is unnecessary to pass a resolution, because in practice it is applied. Then, again, the second provision of the resolution is that all those who have served ten years be set at liberty. Now, that would dispense clemency in a very unequal way to classes of criminals many of whom are totally undeserving of clemency. I dare say that a majority of the members of this House, who have been led by a sense of duty to approach me in connection with cases of this kind, have a very unfavorable impression of my disposition to accede to their request. But I am in a position to furnish them, I am sorry to say, with instances of the unfortunate result of executive clemency. A short time ago, not more than four or five months ago, I was induced by strong representations, not only from outside, but from the prison authorities themselves, to commute a very long sentence which had been imposed upon a prisoner for a very shocking offence. I was induced, principally by representations made by the prison authorities, joined in by the surgeon of the prison, that this prisoner had symptoms indicating that his reason was giving way, and that, although, perhaps, the time had not come when he should be released, yet that it would tend to stay the progress of insanity if I should even indicate a time at which clemency would be exercised. Moved by these representations I thought it proper to recommend—he having already served something like 12 years, if my memory serves me, of his term—that he be forthwith released. He had not, I think, been two weeks released before he was brought before the courts again for another very grave offence, and I must say, the report brought to my own mind the impression that I was, to some extent, an accessory to the second offence. It is not quite two weeks, perhaps not one, since, in connection with North-West matters, we had a shocking case of a murder committed by a person who, within the last few months, was a subject of executive clemency. His release was procured by representations not only that his family were in the most extreme distress, but that he himself had been brought almost to death's door by his confinement. He was released, and the result was that within a few weeks after his restoration to liberty he committed upon the plains of the North-West an atrocious murder, in respect of which he is now a fugitive from justice. These are considerations which every one has to bear in mind. They are not altogether isolated cases, they are fair illustrations of the result of the executive clemency unwisely exercised, or exercised with respect to representations that are not, perhaps, entirely accurate, and which, perhaps, were induced by an overzeal for what are called in this resolution "unfortunate persons confined in living tombs," who elicit feelings of charity and sympathy. But there are considerations which the House has to bear in mind before it adopts a sweeping remedy by discharging all those persons, so-called unfortunates, in respect of whom, if this House passes this Address, I would feel entirely absolved from any responsibility after the protest which I make against it. With respect to one feature of the resolution I have this to say: the hon. member asks that there shall be a remission of ten days for every month's imprisonment since 1st January, 1887, in case, of course, of good conduct. I would ask the attention of the House to the provisions of chapter 182 of the Revised Statutes, which is the Penitentiary Act, section 55. The provisions of that Act are most liberal with respect to the shortening of sentences; and that applies not only to the penitentiaries, but there are regulations likewise in it which applies to the central prison in Toronto, and a fair application of the same provisions is sometimes made with respect to prisoners in gaols under short sentences. These provisions are:

"The inspector may, for the purpose of encouraging convicts to good behavior, diligence and industry, and of rewarding them for the same, make rules and regulations, under which a correct record may be kept of the daily conduct of every convict in any penitentiary, noting his industry, diligence and faithfulness in the performances of his work, and the strictness in which he observes the prison rules, with a view to permit such convict, under the prison rules, to earn a remission of a portion of the time for which he is sentenced to be confined, not exceeding five days for every month during which he is exemplary in industry, diligence and faithfulness in his work, and does not violate any of the prison rules."

Then there is the usual provision for escapes and misconduct by which the prisoners forfeit whatever remission has been granted them. So that the feature of allowing a gradual remission, which is embodied in this resolution, is already part of the Statutes; and if the hon. gentleman who has made the motion can point to any country in which more liberal provision is made on account of remission for good conduct, I shall be happy to consider it and recommend its adoption by Parliament. But experience of the past has shown not only that our provisions are most liberal in regard to prisoners condemned for criminal offences, but that the treatment of them by the courts, at all events in far the greater part of the country, is most liberal and humane, and after they are placed in custody their term of imprisonment is diminished according as they bring forth fruits meet for repentance. There can be nothing so ill-judged, in regard to the criminal classes, as indiscriminate releases—the intimation to the criminal classes that in consequence of this being the Jubilee year, or for any other reason, all classes of them, no matter what distinction there may be between their offences, are to receive a liberal release, and that they are to be set free upon a community which has certainly done nothing to deserve so severe a punishment as that we would thereby inflict upon them. I repeat now what I said, in connection with this subject at another stage, that I shall always deem it my duty to give the very best consideration I possibly can to any individual case brought before me in connection with the application of executive clemency; but I think we should proceed by considering individual cases, by considering every single case upon its merits, ascertaining what the record of the prisoner has been, what the probabilities are of his inflicting injury upon the community if he shall be released; what the probabilities are as regards his past record, of his being reformed, and what, in view of his conduct in the penitentiary, is likely to be his future conduct, and every circumstance of that kind. I think it is only by considering all the circumstances after this manner, that it is possible for us to treat, with any degree of justice, as regards the criminal classes themselves, and with any sense of fairness to the community at large, from whom these criminals have been taken in order to protect society, a question of this kind. I, therefore, move that the further debate on this subject be adjourned.

Mr. MILLIS (Bothwell). I think this is rather an extraordinary course for the Minister of Justice to adopt upon a motion from which he so entirely dissents. It seems to me that the great majority of members will entirely concur in the views expressed by the hon. Minister. I could not, myself, well conceive any more unfortunate way of commemorating the Jubilee of Her Majesty, than by proposing to set free upon the peaceable and orderly portion of the community those who are at the present time deservedly confined in the penitentiaries. I think that when clemency is sought and remission of punishment is asked, the Government should enquire into the merits of the cases and should judge each case upon its merits, and I do not well conceive how we could inflict greater injury on the community than by an indiscriminate discharge from the penitentiaries of a vast number of those who are confined there for serious offences. However popular it might be with that particular class, the great majority of the community would not wish a return very often of the Jubilee year, if accompanied by an event of this sort. That being the case, it would have been better if the Minister of Justice had asked the hon. gentleman to have withdrawn his motion, instead of proposing an adjournment of the debate.

Mr. SPROULE. In view of the expressions of the Minister of Justice upon this subject, strengthened by the indisposition of the House to give their views upon it, and believing it to be against the wishes of the House, I would prefer to withdraw it, rather than to have it disposed of otherwise.

Motion withdrawn.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOMENCLATURE IN OFFICIAL REPORTS.

Mr. DAWSON moved for:

Return of all reports and correspondence in the possession of the Government in relation to the substitution of new and unknown names for places in this Dominion which have been from time immemorial otherwise designated. Also all instructions showing by what particular authority a new nomenclature has been adopted in the reports of the Geological Survey for old and historic places having French and English names, commemorative of the early voyageurs and explorers.

He said: I have on several previous occasions called the attention of the Government to a practice, which is becoming very common, among persons who are sent out to the north and west of this country to make surveys and explorations of one kind and another. I refer to the custom which they have fallen into of giving new names to all the places to which they come. They think they have the privilege of giving names to every island, every river and every place they may happen to visit. Now, all these places have historical names. The French, when they first occupied the country and travelled over the prairies to the Rocky Mountains and the Pacific Ocean, gave names to the places they visited. Many of these names, commemorative of good and great men, still remain, but these people who now obliterate these historical names and sweep away, in some measure, the history of the country, they sweep away the honored names of men who were distinguished in their day, and that I think is an outrage on the history of the past. And what are the names that are substituted for these old historic names? I have just been looking over a map, representing some of the surveys, and I will give the House some specimens of the new nomenclature. I find on this map these names: Yellow Girl Point, Yellow Girl Bay, Bottle Bay, Massacre Island, Maud Lake, Hebe Falls, Annie Island, Patsy Island, Allie Island, Sunset Channel, Devil's Hole, Devil's Bay, Witch Bay, Queer Island, Square Island, Bald Island, Mouse Island, Bath Island, Felix Island, Luella Island, Whiskey Island. Now, Sir, is not that very vile? Here are maps got up at an enormous expense by people sent out to explore the country and come back with reliable information, and they remove the old historic names and put down such names as these, which, no doubt, they think very amusing and very astounding. The maps become things of record, and these paltry, absurd and ridiculous names are perpetuated. There is one place in the Lake of the Woods famous in the legends of the old Canadian voyageurs. At one time a massacre happened at this place, and a missionary father and some of his followers were killed. Afterwards it was converted by missionaries and Indians into a garden, and they called it by the name of Garden Island, and that is the name it has retained to the present day. But these gentlemen must sweep that name away and give it a new name. I thought, therefore, that it was well to call the attention of the Government to the matter, and, on a former occasion, they promised not to allow any new names to be put on the maps, without their being submitted for consideration. I think the matter is of more importance than it appears at first sight, and hence I have brought forward this motion.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The information I have from the director of the Geological Survey is that no names have been changed, either in the reports or the maps of the Geological Survey, and there are no reports or correspondence on the subject. But the statements made by the hon. gentleman, in which he gives specific instances, will enable us to ascertain more fully whether the impressions of the director are absolutely correct, and, therefore, there is no reason why the motion should not pass. I need, therefore, only promise, after the statements made by the hon. gentleman, that the matter will be further examined, with a view of bringing down the papers if there are any.

Mr. MITCHELL. In relation to the Geological Survey, I may say that I was extremely anxious to get a copy of the Geological Survey report of last year, and it appears to be very difficult to obtain anything of the kind. I received a letter from the director saying that, as I had received three copies last year, I could not get another. Now, as one of my constituents is anxious to get a copy, I thought it was very strange that I could not obtain a copy of that report, seeing that the public pay a good deal of money for the purpose of getting them out. I would like the hon. the Minister to explain how it is that an extra report could not be had, when it is actually required by a member representing the people.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I can only tell the hon. gentleman what I think he ought reasonably to have known himself, as an old member of Parliament and as an old Minister, that the geological reports are not distributed like other parliamentary papers. One copy goes to each member. They are for sale at Dawson's at Montreal, where they can be purchased by any member of this House, who desires to get them for himself or any of his constituents.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can only say that if it is necessary to purchase the documents, the public ought to know it. I did not know we required to purchase extra copies. If one of our constituents requires a report of that kind I think we ought to be able to obtain it.

Motion agreed to.

INDIAN RESERVE AT WHITE FISH RIVER.

Mr. BARRON moved for :

Copies of all papers, letters, documents, maps, &c., in any way relating to the action of the Dominion Government in setting apart an Indian reserve, under the Robinson or other treaty, between White Fish and Wanabtasch Rivers, several miles inland from the north shore of Georgian Bay; for copies of all correspondence had between the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario on the subject; and for copies of all correspondence and other documents and papers with the Government of Canada and any person or persons, regarding the sale of timber upon said reserve, if any such sale has been had.

He said: This is a most important motion, because it involves more or less the principle of provincial rights. The Government of hon. gentlemen opposite have not only attacked the Province of Ontario in important matters, but it appears to me and to those gentlemen who have placed this motion in my hands, that they have shown a disposition in small matters to attack the rights of the Province of Ontario, and the vested rights of gentlemen interested in the property of the Province of Ontario. It will be remembered that, in 1872, the Government of the Province of Ontario had a sale of the timber limits on the north shore of the Georgian Bay. At that time a large number of timber berths were sold, involving a very large sum of money. Those timber limits have since changed hands, the original vendees having sold to others at a great advance on the sums originally paid. Notwithstanding that, it appears, from information given to me, that the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite have taken upon themselves the right to lay out an Indian reserve upon the lands on which the timber limits have been sold. I believe they acted under what is known as the Robinson Treaty, which was made some 37 years ago. The clause on which they acted is the 6th clause, which reads as follows:—

“Shawmakiskick. This band a tract of land now occupied by them, and contained between two rivers, called White Fish River and Wanabtasche, seven miles inland.”

Under that clause it appears that the Government, I think, two or three years ago, laid out this particular reserve, although never asked to do it for 37 years, and sold the timber on the reserve to one of the hon. gentlemen opposite. My information is that the hon. member for Ottawa purchased the timber on the reserve from this Government, which timber had originally been sold by the Ontario Government. Now, I am informed that the value of that timber is between $250,000 and $300,000 to the gentlemen who bought from the original vendees of the Ontario Government. Of course the sum originally paid to the Ontario Government was not very large. It was large enough at that time, but we all know that timber limits have become extremely valuable. This Government, in taking away these timber limits, have to that extent interfered with the vested rights of purchasers from the Ontario Government. If any one will undertake to look at the map covering this Indian reserve, he will plainly see that the surveyors, whether under instruction from the Government or not I do not know, went out of their way to select this reserve where they did. The treaty speaks of an area of land between two particular waters. I have had an opportunity of seeing the map for a moment, and it was quite possible for the surveyors to have selected the reserve at other places than where they did select it. It has been selected—so I have been informed, and I have every reason to rely upon the information—where the very best pine is to be found in the original berths sold by the Ontario Government. That Government, in 1872, sold berths 70, 76, 69, 75, 84 and 83, and the surveyors have angled among those berths in such a way as to take the very best pine that they contain. Hon. gentlemen opposite will see that this must cause a conflict between the purchasers from the vendees of the Ontario Government and the Dominion Government. One of the purchasers has already made a demand on the Ontario Government to be recouped for the timber, on the strength of this Government having taken this reserve and sold the pine to one of their supporters. I think this is a matter which involves very important rights. If this Government are to resurrect old treaties and lay out Indian reserves, and thereby take away pine and other property which had been sold by the Ontario Government and sell it to their friends, I think we have a right to know it. I think we are also entitled to know who are to recoup the gentlemen who have purchased from the Ontario Government or from the vendees of that Government. This matter is far more important than on its face it seems to be, and I only regret that it was not placed in some other member's hands who would do more justice to it. I hope that the motion will pass, and that the return will be brought down.

Mr. PERLEY (Ottawa). I beg to ask who the hon. gentleman means by the hon. member for Ottawa?

Mr. BARRON. It was not my intention to mention any hon. member, but now that I am asked the question, my information is this: that the hon. member, I think the member for Ottawa, purchased the timber from this Government on this particular reserve, the timber having been previously sold by the Ontario Government, as I stated.

Mr. BOWELL. Which member for Ottawa?

Mr. BARRON. Mr. Robillard.

Motion agreed to.

RETURNS ORDERED.

Papers, correspondence, reports, Orders in Council, &c., relating to claims made by revising barristers for pay or salary, and a return showing the actual amounts allowed to each revising barrister, &c., and all reports or Orders in Council showing the rate, scale or amount which the Government have determined to pay the several revising barristers.—(Mr. Davies.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, and of all correspondence between the Government of Canada and the Government of the Province of Ontario, and between the Government of Canada and any person or persons, respecting timber licenses and Crown titles to lands affected by claims of settlers, and by mining claims, within the so-called Disputed Territory.—(Mr. Dawson.)

Return showing the names of all persons who applied for fishing bounties for the year 1885, for the District of Grand Narrows and Washabuck, in the county of Victoria, Nova Scotia, showing too the names of those applicants who, for that year, were refused; showing too, if the claim for fishing bounty of Michael McDougall was refused; and if so, why; showing too, if said McDougall was afterwards appointed fishery Warden for the said district, and if he was, shewing who was his immediate predecessor, and if the latter resigned or was dismissed, and if dismissed all papers showing why.—(Mr. Barron)

Copies of all claims presented to the Department of Railways for lands expropriated for the construction of the St. Charles Branch Railway in the county of Lévis; also a statement showing the amount of each claim, the names of those whose claims have been settled up to last April, 1887, and the amount awarded to them, and the names of those whose claims are still pending.—(Mr. Guay.)

Copies of petitions presented from time to time, and supported by the several Transatlantic steamship companies and other persons, praying for the building of a breakwater at Point du Père.—(Mr. Fiset.)

Copy of the contract with D. A. Duffy for the erection of the new wing of the penitentiary at Dorchester; also any claims or applications made for extras, and also any recommendations for allowance of such claims or any of them, and also all correspondence between the contractor and the Department of Public Works.—(Mr. Weldon, St. John.)

Copies of all surveys, reports and correspondence in connection with the survey of the Straits of Northumberland, with the view of building a subway across the Straits. Also the names of engineers employed, with detailed account of expenses incurred in said survey during the year 1886.—(Mr. Perry.)

Return showing the nature of the agreement made between the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, and other parties (if any), respecting the town site of Regina and other town sites in which the Government is part owner, the cost to the Government of collecting their share of the payments made on lots sold in such town sites up to the 30th June, 1886; also the amount realised up to that date by the Government on the sale of such lots, and the number of lots in town sites, together with the quantity of farm lands in the North-West Territories to which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is entitled, but for which up to the present they have not received patents from the Government.—(Mr. Davin.)

Return giving the following details of the expenditure connected with the support of the Marine and Immigrant Hospital in the city of Quebec, during the term of years from the date of Confederation to 30th June, 1886, and showing:

1. What was the aggregate amount voted by Parliament or the maintenance of this hospital during the said term of years? and
2. What was the amount actually expended?
3. What was the number of persons, other than sick mariners, who received hospital care there during the said term? and
4. What was the aggregate number of days of hospital treatment accorded to them?
5. What was the number of sick mariners who received hospital care during the same term? and
6. What was the number of days of hospital treatment accorded to them?
7. What was the average cost per patient per diem of both classes of patients during said term?

8. What was the price per patient per diem paid to the Montreal General Hospital for the care of sick seamen during the same years—1867-1886?

9. What is the aggregate amount that has been charged during the said term of years to the fund for the relief of Sick and Distressed Mariners, as for expenditure in connection with this Quebec Hospital, by virtue of the Act 31 Victoria, chapter 64, section 12 (now 40 Victoria, chapter 76, section 16)?—(Sir Donald Smith.)

Copies of all correspondence and telegrams, since 31st December last, relating to the construction or repair of breakwaters or piers at Scott's Bay, Horton Landing and Boot Island, in King's county, Nova Scotia; and also of all instructions to an engineer of the Department of Public Works, who visited said localities during the months of January and February last, with his reports thereon.—(Mr. Borden.)

Copies of surveys of a proposed line of railway from Kingsport, on the Basin of Minas, to connect with the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, together with the instructions issued to the engineers, and the correspondence and telegrams relating to the survey, or a Dominion subsidy in aid of the construction of the railway, between any member of the Government, or any officer of the Department of Railways, and any other persons.—(Mr. Borden.)

Copy of the report of Judge Taylor, made under the provisions of the commission issued to him to enquire into the administration of justice by the Hon. Jeremiah Travis, in the North-West.—(Mr. Mulock.)

Copies of all correspondence had between the Department of the Interior and one Peter Gray, of Moose Mountain, respecting one Edward Brokovski, an employé of the Department at Moosomin, North-West Territories, and of all letters and communications to the Department from any and all other persons bearing upon the conduct and competency in office of the said Brokovski.—(Mr. Barron.)

Copies of all correspondence, telegrams, &c., between the Customs Department and the collector of Customs for the port of Gaspé, respecting the seizure and forfeiture of the schooner "Ste. Anne" and eight barrels of spirits confiscated for infraction of the revenue laws of the Dominion, together with copies of accounts paid for wages and other expenses of the said schooner, and an account of the proceeds of the sale of the said spirits, made on the 6th July, 1886.—(Mr. Langelier, Montmorency.)

Copies of all reports of engineers, or of commissions of engineers, made to the Government respecting the disastrous floods which have occurred on the south shore and on the north shore of the St. Lawrence, at and in the vicinity of the city of Montreal, for some years past.

2nd. Copies of all correspondence, resolutions of municipal councils, and other documents in relation to the said subject, now in the hands of the Government.

3rd. A statement of all expenditure incurred by the Government for surveys and experiments made in connection therewith, together with the names of persons to whom payments were made and dates of such payments.—(Mr. Rinfret.)

Copies of the Order in Council appointing Louis Boisvert, lighthouse keeper at Grondines, in the place of E. Trottier; and copies of all correspondence recommending Charles N. Trottier for this position.—(Mr. Rinfret.)

Copies of all Orders in Council, or other documents, granting a power to construct any bridge, dam, breakwater, or other obstructions in the Rideau River, from its mouth to its source.—(Mr. Robillard.)

Copies of charges preferred and complaints made against Daniel Wellbanks, now, or recently mail carrier between Pictou and Milford, in Province of Ontario, the name or names of the person or persons preferring such charges or making such complaints, the evidence produced in support of said charges, and Departmental or other order terminating his contract.—(Mr. Platt.)

Copies of all accounts, correspondence, documents, &c., of Hubert Hébert, revising officer for the electoral district of Montmagny, in respect to the preparation of the electoral lists, and in relation to himself, and also his clerk, bailiff and other employés in connection with the making of the said lists; also copies of the accounts for the printing of the same.—(Mr. Choquette.)

Copies of all contracts entered into between the Government and John Harvey for the construction of slides and other improvements on the Mattawa River; also copies of all advertisements asking for tenders for such work, copies of such tenders and all other papers, letters and correspondence between the Government and Harvey relating to such contracts and works.—(Mr. Lister.)

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What business tomorrow?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Bills 47, 39, 56 and then very likely Supply.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11:45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 7th June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

RELIEF OF SUSAN ASH.

Mr. SMALL moved that Bill (No. 135) from the Senate, for the relief of Susan Ash, be now read the first time.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. SPEAKER. Motion agreed to on a division.

Mr. SMALL moved that said Bill be read the second time to-morrow.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Before that motion is carried I wish to say to the hon. gentleman that I will not ask a division at this stage of the Bill, but when the second reading of the Bill comes on, I will ask for a division.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Before that motion is carried I wish to ask if the evidence has been yet distributed. There are some very important law questions which, I think, will give rise to some little discussion upon that Bill, and I for one, as at present advised, will hardly feel myself in a position to do so, as that Bill now stands. I should hesitate to give a vote without reading the evidence, and I do not think I ought to be forced to do so, and I hope before the hon. gentleman asks this Bill to be read the second time, the evidence will be distributed to the members, so that we may have an opportunity of understanding some of the constitutional questions involved in that Bill.

Mr. SMALL. The evidence has been distributed. I had it yesterday.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is not a usual practice to have all the evidence printed. Hon. members can find the evidence in the proceedings of the Senate which are distributed daily.

Motion agreed to on a division.

RELIEF OF MARIE LOUISE NOEL.

Mr. SMALL moved that Bill (No. 108) from the Senate, for the relief of Marie Louise Noel, be now read the first time.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On a division.

Motion agreed to on a division.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I make the same remark to the hon. gentleman in respect of this Bill that I did in the first instance.

REPORT OF THE PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BERGIN. I ought properly, I suppose, to-day, to move the adoption of the report of the Joint Committee on the Printing of both Houses, but as this is a Government day, and hon. gentlemen probably would like to look into the report a little more fully, I propose to do so to-morrow and not to-day. The report was presented yesterday.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Before the introduction of Bills I will give notice, or, if the House will allow me, I will move now:

That when this House adjourns on Friday it stand adjourned until Saturday afternoon at three o'clock, and Government Orders shall have precedence.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

I move this motion now as we shall lose Thursday, it being a fête d'obligation, and the House will not sit.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. CHARLTON. May I be permitted to ask the First Minister when he hopes to be able to prorogue the House?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I ought to ask that question of hon. gentlemen opposite, as the House is generally in the hands of Her Majesty's Opposition. However, I must say that on this head we have no cause to complain of any attempt whatever to delay unduly the business of Parliament; and with the assistance of the House, if public business will allow, I think we might possibly prorogue on Saturday, 18th June.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to enquire of the hon. gentleman, whether he is in a position to state if the Government will call the attention of the House to any other measures than those of which they have already given notice. I should like to know if the bill of fare before us includes everything to which he proposes to direct our attention, or whether there are any other measures which he proposes to submit.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps not literally the only measures, but we will endeavor to add as few additional important measures as possible between now and the 18th.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do the Government propose to go on with all the measures on the paper relating to the reconstruction of the Departments?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

LICENSING OF WEIGHERS.

Mr. COSTIGAN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 136) to confer certain powers on Boards of Trade as to the licensing of weighers.

Mr. JONES. Will the hon. gentleman explain the provisions of the Bill?

Mr. COSTIGAN. A very small change is proposed. Some of the Boards of Trade have recommended to the Department that the present state of the law with respect to weighers was not satisfactory. The weighers in England are sworn, the weighers in this country are not sworn. The law is found to operate in favor of English buyers who have the certificate of a sworn weigher. It is proposed to have the weighers here sworn, and this Bill gives power to Boards of Trade to license them.

Mr. JONES. Does that refer to Customs weighers, the Government weighers?

Mr. COSTIGAN. They will be weighers for the Board of Trade. The Bill gives power to Boards of Trade to make such appointments.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PAYMENT OF INTEREST BY THE CROWN.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 137) respecting the paying of interest by the Crown. He said: This Bill contains two provisions only: the first is that the Crown may pay interest in all cases where it would be payable as between subject and subject; and the second is, that when interest is so paid it shall not exceed six per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is the Bill retrospective in its action, or does it apply only to future engagements?

Mr. THOMPSON. The Bill makes no special provisions on that subject.

Mr. MITCHELL. But what is the effect?

Mr. THOMPSON. It is prospective; it has no retrospective provision.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

REVISION OF VOTERS' LISTS.

Mr. CHARLTON. Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to enquire of the Government, for my own information chiefly, as to their intention with respect to the Bill to amend the Electoral Franchise Act. The business of making preparations for the revision of the rolls has been suspended in many ridings, in my own riding among others, and we would like to obtain a definite assurance from the Government as to whether it is intended to have the rolls revised this year or not. If the matter were allowed to go along to the close of the Session, and at the very last moment some provision should be made for the revision of the lists, it might place those not informed as to the Government's intentions in a bad position, and it would be only fair to members of the House who have lists to attend to, that they should know what are the intentions of the Government. The Bill, I observe, is not printed, and for that reason it might be inferred that it would not be proceeded with.

Mr. THOMPSON. I presume the question of the hon. member really is, whether the Bill now on the paper is to be proceeded with. It will be proceeded with.

Mr. CHARLTON. It makes provision to allow the lists to stand over to another year?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. LAURIER. I observe the Bill is not yet printed.

Mr. THOMPSON. I see it is not, but it will be printed immediately.

THE HIGH COMMISSIONER IN LONDON.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I should like to call the attention of the First Minister to the return with respect to the resignation of the High Commissioner, and the office of the High Commissioner in London. The High Commissioner informed the House, since the Session opened, that he was to resume the duties of the office immediately after the close of the Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I think not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I was going to call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that there is no reference to that matter in the papers brought down.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. What the hon. gentleman said was, that he or some one else would take the position of High Commissioner after the Session.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Certainly, I understood him to speak in the direction I have indicated. Are we to understand that the Finance Minister has not been offered by the Government, and he has not agreed to accept, the position of High Commissioner?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We understand the matter perfectly. The question of whether the hon. gentleman's services will be more useful as High Commissioner in London, or by remaining here as a member of the Government, we will consider after the Session is over, and not before.

THE FISHERIES REPORT.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. L.). I wish again to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the non-distribution of the report of the fisheries branch of his Department. I called attention to this matter yesterday, and the hon. gentleman replied to me in rather a captious spirit, because I said that the report had not been distributed to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. The reason I mentioned hon. gentlemen on this side was because I had no opportunity of consulting hon. gentlemen on the other side. I knew I had not received my own copy; I asked hon. members about me, and found that it had not been distributed to them. I wish again to repeat, in the hon. gentleman's own presence, that I hardly think it is creditable to his Department that, when we are within measurable distance of prorogation, and when the Premier has stated that we will probably prorogue on the 18th, we are still without the report of that most important branch of the Department, at a critical time like this, when it is so important that the negotiations with regard to the fisheries should be thoroughly understood by the country, and hon. members of the House should be thoroughly informed upon them. I repeat again that I think the House is entitled to some explanation why a report, which to all appearance should have been prepared at the beginning of the Session, when this House met at so late a period, has not been distributed now, when we are nearing the close of the Session, and when it will be impossible for hon. gentlemen to give it proper attention, owing to the pressure of business on our time. I think the hon. gentleman should give his special attention to the matter and have the report distributed to hon. members at once. It is now some five or six days since he laid a copy on the Table of the House. What the secret of the delay is I cannot understand, but certainly the fact is not creditable to the Department.

Mr. FOSTER. I informed my hon. friend yesterday what the secret of delay was. I said that the report had been in the printers' hands six or eight weeks, and that I got one copy bound as soon as I could to lay on the Table of the House. The others are not yet bound, but they are being bound as rapidly as possible, and they will be in the hands of hon. members just as soon as there is a sufficient number to distribute. One reason why the report has been delayed later than it would have been, is, that the printers were ordered to get out additional papers and documents, and they had to lay aside their regular work for that purpose. While it is important that the report should be before the House, yet I think my hon. friend is scarcely warranted in considering the report of any greater importance this year than in former years, as what relates specially to the fishery question has already been brought down.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think the hon. gentleman's explanation is quite satisfactory. What would have been our position if we had met in February or in the middle of January, instead of the middle of April? The hon. gentleman should bear in mind that this report comes down to July last, nearly twelve months ago—

Mr. FOSTER. It comes down to the end of the year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, the hon. gentleman has had over five months to get out his report, so that I think his explanation is not one which can satisfy the House. Certainly, if we had met at the usual time we would have been in Session three months and would have left here without receiving the hon. gentleman's report at all.

ALLOWANCE TO GODEFROI LAVIOLETTE.

House resolved itself into committee to consider a certain proposed resolution (p. 111) providing for the granting of an allowance to Godefroi Laviolette, late warden of the penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul, in view of valuable services rendered by him.—(Mr. Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

Mr. LAURIER. Has the hon. gentleman any explanation to offer in support of this resolution?

Mr. THOMPSON. I will state, as briefly as I can, to the committee, the reasons which induced the Government to offer this resolution to the House. Mr. Laviolette, as the committee, I suppose, is aware, was for some years warden of the penitentiary at St. Vincent de Paul. It is a matter of public notoriety that, about fifteen months ago, an emeute occurred in that institution of a very serious character, and that the result of it was that, among other casualties, Mr. Laviolette, while endeavoring actively, in the discharge of his duty, to suppress the revolt, sustained very serious injuries. He conducted himself in the course of that day's proceedings with very great heroism. It was not essential to the discharge of his duty that he should have exposed himself personally, but in the haste of the moment, and impelled by a courageous sense of duty, he did expose himself to the fullest extent. He proceeded to one of the sheds where the men were congregated in a state of mutiny, and where they had already obtained some arms. He found some of the keepers bound there, and he endeavored to expostulate with the persons who were carrying on the revolt. The result was that his effort to appease them entirely failed, and that they sought to make use of him as a shield to protect them in the depredations which they then proceeded to commit. They advanced in force to the wall and instructed the warden, on pain of death, to give directions to the keepers to open the gates, in order that they might get their liberty. He not only emphatically refused to comply with their demands, but instructed his officers to fire on the mutinous prisoners. They eventually obeyed his directions; they did fire; one of the convicts was killed, and one or two others were wounded. In a fit of exasperation the warden was fired at from behind and sustained three very serious wounds, one of which broke his jaw, another pierced his wrist, and the third inflicted a serious wound in his thigh. He was not expected to recover from these wounds, but he recovered to a certain extent. He was given leave of absence, in order to ascertain whether entire freedom from his duties would aid his restoration to health; but it was found, after the lapse of nearly ten months, during which the institution was in charge of the deputy warden, that, while the immediate results following from the wounds had been mitigated, there was no prospect of his health being restored. In fact, he was not only entirely unfit for duty, but unable to leave his room even so late as ten months after the revolt occurred. Considering that his conduct was most courageous, and that these very serious injuries had come upon him while in the immediate discharge of duty, well performed, I thought, inasmuch as his retirement from his post had become inevitable in consequence of his health having been entirely shattered, that it was our duty to propose to Parliament that he should be liberally dealt with as regards superannuation. Therefore, I propose, that for the remainder of his life, instead of the superannuation allowance, which he would otherwise have been entitled to, which would have been under $1,000, he shall continue to receive the salary he would have received if he had continued to discharge his duties. Of course, hon. members are aware that his emoluments will not be the same as they would have been had he continued in office, because the perquisites, such as the use of his dwelling, fuel, light, and the keep of a horse and cow, would probably be worth $1,000 more. There was one other allowance which I thought it would be reasonable to ask Parliament to grant, and that is this: If he had to rely on the annuity only, it would have taken, in all probability, the greater part of one year's salary to provide for removal and another house; and I thought, as we had adopted the principle of continuing the same salary that he had before, it was only fair to make a reasonable allowance to him for removal expenses. I am, therefore, asking Parliament $1,000 for removal expenses, and I only regret that the indications are, from what I know and have heard of his health, that he will not be very long in the enjoyment of the liberality which I ask Parliament to extend to him.

Mr. LAURIER. I did not see fit, Mr. Chairman, to criticise the motion that has been placed in your hands. I readily admit that Mr. Laviolette is entitled to some compensation for the loss of health and the suffering he has undergone in what is, after all, the service of the country. It cannot be denied that, on the occasion to which the hon. gentleman has referred, Mr. Laviolette behaved in the most admirable manner; not only so, but he showed an amount of courage—I might say, heroism—that is not often met with. As I understand, Mr. Laviolette had the gates opened, and went himself to the yard in order to try persuasion with the convicts who had broken loose. It may be that he did not show a great deal of judgment in so doing, because it was very much like fighting demons. At the same time, I am disposed not to deal critically with him, but to consider only the courageous and heroic motives that impelled him. The convicts, instead of showing moderation, took hold of Mr. Laviolette and used him as a shield to prevent the guards from firing upon them; and even then, I understand, Mr. Laviolette showed his courage by telling the guards not to mind him, but to do their duty. Under the circumstances, I am quite disposed to agree to the principle of the motion, and not to criticise the action of the Government in proposing it. But I must say that in other respects the Government seem to me highly censurable. I think the Government are responsible, not only for the money now expended to compensate a good officer who was disabled in the performance of his duty, but I must say they are to blame for that revolt having taken place at all. It has been a matter of notoriety for some years that the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary has been in a most lamentable condition. Ever since Mr. Laviolette was appointed to office the penitentiary has been going from bad to worse, until the end was that revolt. Day after day there were escapes from the penitentiary, and year after year scandals occurred. I would not lay the fault on Mr. Laviolette; but the fact is, that during the time he was in the penitentiary, he was in constant quarrels with his chief officers. The consequence was that the inspector reported again and again that the Government should take some action, but they never did. In this they are highly censurable, and I cannot imagine what they can urge in their defence. Let us look at the book recently laid before the House. On the 2nd of January, 1884, Mr. Inspector Moylan, after noticing several derelictions of duty on the part of the warden, concluded his report on the state of the penitentiary in these words:

"I have to add that the warden does not take, in good spirit, either any mention of these abuses and defects or the suggestion of their being prevented or remedied. What is forced upon me by the actual state of affairs and in the simple discharge of plain duty, is attributed by him to personal or national prejudice—a groundless charge and wholly without proof.

"In a word, the condition of the whole administration of this penitentiary, if examined into beneath the surface, would show that there is a great want of common sense, sound judgment and ordinary discretion and intelligence on the part of the chief executive officer."

When that was the conclusion to which the inspector of penitentiaries had come, that there was, on the part of the chief officer of the penitentiary, want of judgment, want of common sense, and even want of ordinary discretion, it would seem to me that the bounden duty of the Government was at once to take some step to remedy such a state of things, and to prevent what want of common sense, and want of judgment, and want of ordinary discretion were sure to lead to at some time or other. I find that this volume is full of rancor, which was going on between the warden and the deputy warden, the warden accusing the deputy of wanting in his duty, and the deputy retorting with a charge of want of duty against the warden. These facts were brought to the notice of the Government again and again, and yet no action was taken. Time and again the matter was also brought to the attention of the House; but on such occasions, as on other occasions, we were not able to obtain from the Government the information to which we were entitled, and in that respect, also, the Government are highly censurable, for having kept from the House information which they had in their possession for several years, and which has now come before the House for the first time. Had that information been communicated to the House at the proper time, when it was first received, it is probable that the House would have forced the Government to take action, and if that had been done all these troubles would have been prevented. But, at last, public opinion compelled the Government to take some action, and they appointed, not one, but two or three investigations. Strange to say, however,—and I do not want to lay any blame on anybody; I take the information as I have it—strange to say, Mr. Laviolette, the warden, complained again and again of the inspector, that, at all times, it was he who was entrusted with the enquiry. If the Government had so much confidence in the inspector, that they entrusted to him every enquiry and investigation, it seems to me they should, at least, have abided by his judgment and conclusions. I have just stated the conclusions to which the chief inspector had come in 1884. I find another report of an investigation made by Mr. Baillaigé, and concerning which he made a report dated 31st March, 1885. That report expressed again his conclusion as to the utter unfitness of Mr. Laviolette in the strongest language it was possible to use. This is what he said:

"I beg, therefore, to state that, according to the opportunities which I have had of forming an opinion of the warden, I am reluctantly forced to the conclusion that he is utterly unsuited for the important trust confided to his charge. His errors of judgment—serious in many instances—have been too numerous to result from any other cause than natural defect or dogged determination to ignore all rule and authority. He lacks that firmness and determination so essential in one exercising the functions with which he is clothed by the law. In that self-respect and dignity of character, which should withhold one in his position from too free and easy intercourse, not only with subordinate officers, but even with convicts, he has shown himself sadly deficient. His sense of justice and veracity, as manifested in his treatment of the deputy warden and chief keeper, appears to be greatly at fault." The exceptional treatment, in one extreme or the other, which he has accorded to the officers, and his easy credulity in believing the tales of convicts, and thereby in gratifying their whims and caprices, betray a degree of unfairness and weakness quite at variance with that impartiality and strength of mind which should be prominent traits in the chief officer of a penal institution. It happens that the warden's defects are known to, and freely discussed by the officers and convicts alike. Hence, it may be truly said that 'his usefulness' in his present capacity 'is gone.' Consequently, I recommend that he be superannuated or transferred to some other position under the Government wherein his peculiar talents may render him more useful in the public service."

That advice was given on the 31st March, 1885. Then the inspector, who had just completed his third or fourth enquiry, came deliberately to the conclusion that the usefulness of Mr. Laviolette was gone. Still the Government remained perfectly inactive in that matter. There is a remark here made by the chief inspector, which is rather pregnant, in consequence of the facts which afterwards took place. He says that Mr. Laviolette was too free, not only with the officers, but even with the convicts, and we know—for this volume is full of examples of it—that the administration of the penitentiary was divided into two camps, the one headed by the warden, the other, by the deputy warden. On one side were certain of the officers, and on the other side were certain of the officers; even the convicts took part in the quarrel, some on the one side and others on the other. Could a more deplorable state of things exist in a penitentiary, when even convicts took a part in the wrangles that went on between the warden and the deputy warden? Is it, therefore, astonishing that at last that state of things culminated in a revolt, in which one of the convicts lost his life and several were wounded, and in which the warden himself, rising at last equal to the occasion, was most severely wounded.

On that occasion, at least, the warden acted nobly, and in a manner which entitles him to the consideration of the House. For his previous conduct I do not want to censure him at all. If he was unfit it was not his fault, but the fault of the Government which appointed him to that position and kept him there, and the Government cannot escape the censure which this Parliament should inflict upon it for allowing that state of things to go on, not for one, but for four or five years, without remedy, although its attention had been called to it again and again by its own officer. Why should there have been so many investigations held, when the conclusion arrived at was invariably the same, and when each report, after being handed in to the office of the Department of Justice, remained there a dead letter, without any action being taken upon it? In my judgment, Mr. Laviolette should have the money granted to him by this resolution. He has lost his health, and I believe the hon. the Minister spoke truly when he said he would not live to enjoy the little gratification about to be made to him; but, at the same time, while in this matter Parliament is doing its duty towards this officer, the Government cannot escape condemnation for the course it has taken.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am sorry that, while the hon. gentleman seems to entirely agree that this is a proper vote, he should have thought it proper to make reflections, which, not only have the effect of aspersing the action of the Government, but are more severe in relation to the character of the officer to whom we are about to extend a liberal vote. The hon. gentleman, I hold, has not quite fully stated the case when he speaks of the Government as being highly censurable for having disregarded reports made, from time to time, with regard to complaints coming from this institution. I admit that from an early period in 1884, there were occasionally complaints from the prison. Under my predecessor, those complaints were always directly attended to, and fully investigated. The inspector, it is true, was the only person who, in two or three of these investigations, was sent to make the enquiry. That is not to be wondered at. He is the officer charged with the duty, he is the person who has had long experience in connection with the administration of prison affairs, and a person in every way qualified to conduct these investigations. Later on, it is true, the warden occupied an attitude of hostility with regard to him; and if I am bound to express, as the hon. member for Quebec East (Mr. Laurier) seems determined that I should, an opinion as to the propriety of Mr. Laviolette's conduct during his term of office, I am compelled to admit that I think he was, to a large extent, censurable for his management of that institution. I must say, however, in justice to him, as well as to the Government, that the fault which he committed in the management of the institution was one of a very generous kind. The impression I have received, after very long and careful examination of the prison officers, myself, is that the laxity of discipline which occurred in that institution was due altogether to his kindness of heart, and his disposition not to take notice of complaints made against the prisoners by inferior officers, or made by inferior officers against each other. It was found necessary, for the complete restoration of discipline there, that every complaint made by inferior officers against the prisoners, or against each other, should be followed by prompt and severe punishment. That was all that was found necessary to restore discipline. It was only, in my judgment, for the want of a disposition to be severe in the punishment of trivial offences by the prisoners that disorders were allowed to creep in at all; and the want of severity, the want in some instances of great severity on the part of the warden is almost the only fault that can be found with him in the administration of the prison. At a subsequent period, the warden occupied an attitude of hostility to the inspector himself, and, in answer to the reports which the hon. gentleman has read, he stated that the inspector had conceived a prejudice against him and had taken the opportunity of his visits to the institution to misrepresent him to the Government. I believe that he was entirely mistaken, but the result was to call for fuller action on the part of the Government before displacing the warden. Considering that the only fault with which he could be charged was a want of severity, I think the Government would have been censurable if they had simply dismissed Mr. Laviolette, especially after the action which he took in the revolt, for which the Government now propose to reward him. The Government thought it better to make a fuller investigation, and, in 1885, an investigation was made, not only by the inspector, but by Mr. Baillairgé as well, an investigation which was made under oath, under which a great number of officers were examined, and that investigation extended long into 1885. The report which I have was not made until June.

Mr. LAURIER. March, 1885. The investigation was made in 1884.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes, it began in 1884. I do not think that, under the circumstances, the Government can be censured either for not dismissing Mr. Laviolette before, or for keeping back information from the House when this very full investigation was ordered and was being continued. The report was only presented in 1885, and I do not think there is good reason for believing that the differences which occurred between the warden and his principal officers, caused the revolt which occurred last year. I believe that, to a great extent, the cause of that revolt was the laxity of discipline and the want of severity which I have before mentioned, and it is worth the hon. member's consideration, especially when he speaks about public opinion having compelled us at last to make an enquiry, that, while we are charged here with undue leniency in dealing with the warden, and with undue consideration for him, we have been constantly assailed for years past in another place for having been unduly severe in dealing with the warden, and in pressing upon him the recommendations of our inspector. While the hon. member is disposed to throw all the blame upon the Government that can be heaped upon us in connection with this transaction, I must say that there are other persons not altogether unconnected with public life whom I hold responsible for the disturbance which took place there, and whom we know were not under the control or under the advice of the Government.

Mr. MITCHELL. I must take this opportunity of making a few remarks to the Minister of Justice in connection with this revolt. I do not intend to deal with the merits of the subject, but the point I intend to speak to is outside of what has been discussed in this House. I desire to pay a just tribute to the consideration which the Government of the day have shown in connection with that revolt to a poor unfortunate fellow who had not a single friend in the country, but who was committed to that penitentiary for twenty years. He is not only unfortunate in his isolation, but also in his color. He happens to be a negro boy who, for an offence which was an accident, in which he happened accidentally to shoot a man in a scuffle with another person, was committed for twenty years. I had occasion to call the attention of the Minister of Justice to this very severe sentence, and to the course which I thought ought to be taken after the revolt occurred. He was one, I believe, who had the courage to resist the conspirators, and who closed the door which prevented them from getting into the main building; and I am pleased to say that, having called the attention of the Minister to the fact, and to the further fact that the boy was alone and friendless in this country, having taken an interest in him because I had known him as a bell-boy in the hotel in which I live, the Windsor Hotel, the Government took into consideration the heroic effort which he made to sustain the authority in that prison, and by closing that door to prevent these men from getting into the interior of the prison, and the Minister informed me that he had reduced the lad's sentence from twenty years to ten years. I personally thanked the Minister and the Government for having done so.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 138) to provide for the payment of a yearly allowance to Godefroi Laviolette, late warden of the Penitentiary of St. Vincent de Paul.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

COUNTERFEIT NOTES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved second reading of Bill (No. 123) respecting the defacing of counterfeit notes and the use of imitation notes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time; House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. THOMPSON. I explained briefly to the House, when I introduced the Bill, the object in view. At present, we have no statutory provision enabling counterfeit notes to be defaced, and the result is that, after being presented, when they are detected as being spurious, they are returned to the person who presents them and go back into circulation. The object of the Bill is to enable any person charged with the receipt and disbursement of public money, or any officer of a bank doing business in Canada, to obliterate such notes when they are presented to him, by stamping the word "counterfeit" upon them in such a way that they shall not be taken into circulation again. The second clause is to prevent the annoyance of counterfeits in the nature of notes which have a resemblance to bank notes, although they are not really bank notes, and may deceive persons who are not accustomed to handle money to any large extent.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the reason of the rather severe penalty inflicted for this putting a business notice on or across a note? I had seen it sometimes done, but I hardly thought it had grown to such a nuisance as to require an imprisonment of three months, as provided in the second clause.

Mr. THOMPSON. The reason of the severity is that the offence is connected with the circulation of spurious money, and the temptation is very great.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am speaking of this portion of it. Anybody who:

"Writes, prints or otherwise impresses upon any such note, obligation or security any business or profession card, notice or advertisement, or any notice or advertisement of any matter or thing whatever, is liable, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, to a penalty of $100 or three months' imprisonment, or both."

It seems rather a severe accumulation of penalty for a thing of that kind.

Mr. THOMPSON. The penalty applies to the whole clause.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Yes, but it applies to both. I would not see so much objection to its applying to the first portion as to the second portion. It seems a severe penalty for a thing of that kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This seems to be a multiplication of offences unnecessarily. Of course there are many instances of patent medicine advertisements being printed in the form of a bank note. Now, any one who would undertake to pass such an advertisement as money, and seek to defraud any one thereby, ought to be punished, of course, and it seems to me that meets the whole cases. Why should this House go on and legislate against engraving such an advertisement if a patent medicine man chooses to have a bill of that sort prepared, if he thinks he can sell his medicine thereby, there is no harm done. It is only when there is an attempt to pass it as money that there is wrong done. Perhaps the hon. gentleman has had cases brought under his notice, but so far as I know, there are very rarely any attempts of this sort. We are legislating against what appears to me to be an imaginary offence. We are simply interfering with the liberty of people who engrave bills and advertisements as may suit their fancy. Now, will the hon. gentleman make it a criminal offence to import medicines that contain bills engraved in the way here described, because, then, if he does, then, of course, he is carrying out his law logically, but if he does not, he is merely interfering with the man in this country who undertakes to engrave a bill of that sort, and then he is undertaking to punish a man in Canada for doing what may be done by an outsider with impunity.

Mr. THOMPSON. It is not an imaginary offence, it is an offence which has repeatedly occurred in many parts of the Dominion. From my own experience I have known it to cause considerable loss and inconvenience to poor people who, perhaps, could not read, and who were not capable of discriminating readily between good and bad money. Reports coming from the Province of Ontario, lately, have indicated this offence as calling for legislation. The difficulty is in detecting and visiting with punishment the person who commits the offence, and the only way of dealing with the offence at all is to punish everybody who is connected with it, not only the person who has put it in circulation—he is very seldom caught—but the person who engraves such notes, as we punish a person who engraves a counterfeit note and the person who makes use of it, too, by stamping it with his advertisement or business card. The person who makes use of it by stamping it with his business card or advertisement, is really the person who puts it in circulation for his own purposes. The only way to deal with an offence like that, which is difficult of detection, and which is seldom detected, after the bill has passed through several hands of unsuspecting people, is to punish everybody who has anything to do with the transaction. Let everyone know that it is forbidden to have anything to do with such matters.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is force in what the Minister of Justice says, but he did not quite meet the point I took, which was this: The offence in the second portion of this Act is not visited with the same penalty as in the first part, which, as he truly says, might easily lead to considerable fraud, though I was not aware that much had occurred. The second part has reference simply to persons writing or putting their business address, apparently, across a note. That may become a nuisance in the way of defacing our bills, but it is a different class of offence altogether from the one mentioned, if I read his measure aright, in the first half. The first half refers to a person printing circulars or advertisements so as to resemble a Dominion note. No doubt a fraud may occur in that. The habit is not infrequent, I take it, of a man stamping his address and professional description on the back of a note. Now, it is a sharp thing to say that such a man shall be liable to three months' imprisonment. We might fine him defacing a note in a moderate sum of money. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, has often seen what I have alluded to—on the back of a note a man would put "so and so," dealer in "so and so," but I had hardly thought it had reached the point of being made a criminal offence.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not think that this is a matter calling for so severe a penalty, therefore, I have no objection to amend the clause by striking out the words beginning "or who" down to the word "whatever" inclusive.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 127) to amend the North-West Territories Act.

Mr. MILLS. The proposed amendment in the first section is unintelligible as it stands, unless we have the original Act before us. There was an understanding, to which the First Minister gave his concurrence, that when any verbal alteration was proposed the section should be recited, and reprinted with the alteration. This is going back to the old system, which was unsatisfactory.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time; House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. THOMPSON. I may explain what the nature of the amendment is. Section 79 of the North-West Territories Act is the one which provides that a prisoner may be detained in the custody of the North-West Mounted Police. In the fourth line the offences for which a person may be so detained are recited, and the words are added "so convicted." The word "so" is unmeaning, for there is no allusion before those words to any conviction. We, therefore, strike out the word "so" in the fourth line. In the last line of the Act the words struck out lead to an ambiguity, because the Act does not deal with criminal offences. The other change is in respect to a provision which I mentioned to the House when I introduced the Bill, and it refers to appeal cases. When the Act was passed last year bringing into force the Supreme Court of the North-West Territories, no provision was made with respect to pending cases, because there were none before the court in Manitoba, although there were some which had been argued, and in respect of which judgment had been reserved; and the Court of Appeal held that that Act had the effect of taking away their jurisdiction to pronounce judgment in those cases, although judgment had not been pronounced.

Mr. DAVIN. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice whether, after this Bill has passed, a case appealed from our own courts will have to be carried, first to Manitoba, or whether it will be brought directly here?

Mr. THOMPSON. The appeal to Manitoba is taken away.

Mr. DAVIN. That is as I understand it.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

DOMINION CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 126) to amend "The Dominion Controverted Elections Act."

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time; House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand that the second subsection of section 9, of the Controverted Elections Act, has given rise, in the Province of Ontario, to the belief that a petition can only be presented in the Court of Appeal. It is desirable, therefore, in order to remove that distinction, that the interpretation of the words "clerk of the court" should be made so wide that a petition may be filed in any of the divisions of the High Court of Justice. I propose, therefore, to add the words "or in Ontario, in any division of the High Court of Justice."

On section 2,

Mr. THOMPSON. The object of this clause is likewise to facilitate the disposal of the trial of the election petitions which have been filed. As I explained on a former occasion, a number of these have been filed in one division of the court, nearly always in the Court of Appeal, and it is desirable to give facilities for distributing them. I will read to the House—as it is not a private letter—a letter I have received on this subject from the Chief Justice of Ontario. He says:

"I feel it my duty to bring under your notice the fact that under the election law seventeen election petitions have already been filed in the Court of Appeal. We are now within a little over six weeks of vacation—"

And this was written nearly a month ago—

"and we have about fifty-eight cases entered for argument, besides a number that have been argued and stand for judgment. It is most unlikely that of these cases much more than one-half can be disposed of by the 1st of July; and under such circumstances it would be most disastrous to the interests of suitors if the appeal judges were to attempt to dispose of this very heavy election business. I find, on enquiry, that seven have been filed in the Queen's Bench, four in the Common Pleas and none in Chancery. I bring this condition of affairs under your notice, while Parliament is in Session, so that the Executive Government may consider whether it is advisable that any alteration should be made in the law.

I may state that I have letters to the like effect from two of the other judges.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am sure it would be satisfactory to the public if the hon. gentleman would make provision that, in the trial of election petitions, two judges should sit for trial, in the same manner as provincial election petitions are tried in Ontario. There would be greater uniformity of proceeding, and I am sure the public, and those who are specially interested, those against whom petitions are filed, would be better satisfied with the results of the trial if that were the case. I think this is a favorable opportunity for the hon. gentleman to amend the law in that particular. The number of the petitions is not great, the judges will not be over-worked, and, under such a provision, there would be less disposition to call in question the decision of the court. Sometimes a judge is not in the best of health, but with two judges the trial would go on, and the result would be less liable to be questioned than under the present mode of procedure.

Mr. THOMPSON. The suggestion which the hon. gentleman has made is of course entitled to our best consideration, but I am not prepared to deal with it by way of an amendment to this Bill. It would be an important change; indeed, it would involve a consideration of all the provisions of the Controverted Elections Act, and would involve, I may say, in many parts of the country at any rate, an entire change in the arrangements which have been made for the trial of these petitions. In some Provinces it would entail very great delay, considering the large number of petitions which are entered.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACTS.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 111) to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Acts, and to make better provision for the trial of claims against the Crown. He said: When I introduced this Bill I explained the principal provisions which it contains. It has been long felt that a better mode of procedure for the trial of claims against the Crown and claims by the Crown was needed in Canada. I need no better evidence of that than the fact that for three successive Sessions the matter has been brought before Parliament. The features of the Bill are principally these: It is proposed to withdraw from the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada the exchequer jurisdiction which they now possess, both as to claims against the Crown and claims by the Crown, and to vest that jurisdiction in a judge to be called the judge of the Exchequer Court, and his court will be the Exchequer Court. It is proposed that he shall receive a salary of $6,000 a year. The reason for making so liberal a provision is that he will be a superior judge, and will have the adjudication of cases involving very large sums of money, and cases involving both public and private interests to a large extent. Besides, his work will be such as to require all his time. It is proposed likewise to withdraw the powers of adjudication which the Dominion arbitrators now exercise. I intend to suggest an amendment, which will be a matter of detail, and which will enable the head of a Department still to refer to one of the Dominion arbitrators to report on, any claim which may be made against any Department without sending them in the first instance to the court. The Dominion arbitrators are to be continued in office as official referees of the Exchequer Court, in order that they may be sent to take evidence and report upon cases at distant points, and to assist the judge in the progress of his business; and it will be convenient, I think, that some claims which involve small amount, instead of being sent to the court for adjudication, should be sent, as at present, to one of those referees for report; because it frequently happens that when claims are so reported upon their settlement is arrived at without any expense to litigants or to the Crown. At the same time, the House will understand me as adhering to the principle of withdrawing entirely from the Dominion arbitrators the powers they now have to make any adjudication on any claim. All that class of claims which are now referred by the Minister to the Dominion arbitrators will be hereafter referred in the same way to the judge, and the judge will deliberate and adjudicate upon those claims in precisely the same way as upon petitions of right. It is proposed, of course, to appoint a registrar to the court at a salary of $2,000 per annum; and we take power to appoint such other officers, including stenographers, as may become necessary from time to time as the business proceeds, it being, of course, impossible at this stage to ascertain exactly what staff of officers will be required. I think the result of such a measure as this will be not only to improve very considerably, indeed, the procedure in connection with claims against the Crown, but to ensure a far more satisfactory disposition of them as regards the final result than is possible now. The House is aware that the great body of claims laid against the Crown are claims which are presented for adjudication to the Dominion arbitrators; and without wishing to say a word in disparagement of those gentlemen who have done their duty with great fidelity in the past, there is this inconvenience found in connection with a body like that, that it is composed of four persons who have to travel to different parts of the Dominion for the purpose of adjudicating upon cases, a plan which is attended with very considerable expense. But the more serious difficulty is that the board consists of laymen, and, as they have no technical knowledge of the rules of evidence, or of procedure, the effect has been found to be, that, in order to be strictly careful not to exclude evidence which a person skilled in the rules of evidence would very often exclude, the arbitrators have been exceedingly liberal in allowing the introduction of evidence, tending, in the first place, to great expense to litigants in keeping counsel and witnesses in attendance upon a tribunal which necessarily takes at least four times the amount of time which would be necessary for the adjudication were it in the hands of a judge, and, in the second place, greatly increasing the expense in the cost of reporting and printing the evidence, and submitting it for adjudication upon appeal. I would be in a position, if the House needed them, to give some facts which would show the expense, both to the Crown and suitors, of adjudicating cases in that way before the Dominion arbitrators. The suitor very often finds that the costs which the tariff of fees allows him to recover is not at all adequate to the expense he has had to incur. I think the House will come to the conclusion that this is a far more satisfactory tribunal, and one which, even taking into account the allowances for its officers, is less expensive than the present mode of procedure. For these reasons I ask the House to consent to the second reading of the Bill.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The Bill to which the hon. gentleman has called our attention is one of considerable importance in more than one respect. It proposes to alter the mode in which claims against the Government are now prosecuted to a final conclusion. It also proposes to increase the cost very largely. If I understand the Bill aright, it transfers the existing jurisdiction, which the Court of Exchequer now possesses, entirely to the new court, and the judges of the Supreme Court will hereafter have nothing to do with these cases. They will not be a court of original jurisdiction at all, but simply a Court of Appeal; in other words, their original jurisdiction will cease. So far as the point which the hon. gentleman last made is concerned, I am disposed to agree with him that, possibly, in many cases, the Dominion arbitrators do not constitute a satisfactory tribunal, but it does seem to me that the hon. gentleman, although he may have done something to improve that body, still retains it substantially as before. We have not the official arbitrators, nominally, but we have them under the name of official referees. By a provision of the Bill, the existing arbitrators are to remain in their present positions until superannuated, and after their death, superannuation or removal, there will be substituted for them other officials known as official referees. I am unable to understand that the duties of official referees in the collection of evidence will be much different from those of the official arbitrators. They will, of course, not pronounce judgment in the sense in which the official arbitrators do, but they will report to the judge what their opinion is of the claim. In the making of that report, it will be necessary for them to travel, just as the official arbitrators do at present, and to take the same amount of evidence. The official arbitrators not being lawyers, the change of name to that of official referees will not invest them with new powers of discrimination, but they will take the same evidence as before and make report to the judge, and, without the evidence, that report will be valueless, because the judge would not know on what basis to form his opinion. The Bill, as it now stands, divests the Supreme Court of its original jurisdiction, and transfers that jurisdiction to the new court, and calls on the country to pay a very large expense for the institution of that new court. We are now to have a judge costing $6,000 a year, a registrar at $2,000 a year, and all the auxiliary costs which invariably follow the constitution of an important tribunal of this kind. How many thousands it may amount to in the course of a year, I am not in a position to say, but I do think, in the first place, that the hon. gentleman has not shown the House there are sufficient public reasons to justify this large expenditure. The present system may not work as smoothly and as well as desirable, but the friction which exists and the difficulties which may exist can be got over without appointing an additional judge. The arbitration board, as it is at present constituted, consisting entirely of laymen, evidently does not meet the exigencies of the case, as the Minister of Justice thinks it may be necessary to remodel that board, and, in making new appointments, to put men who are fitted for the position. The substance of the hon. gentleman's statement is that the present arbitrators do not understand their duties, that they take a vast amount of evidence totally unnecessary, and, in some cases, irrelevant, which makes it more difficult, in appeal cases, and more expensive to get at the real facts. That may be a difficulty, but it is one which may be easily got over without appointing a new court. I do not think it is desirable the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court should be withdrawn. I think we should retain the Exchequer Court, as at present constituted, and if the Government come to the conclusion that a new judge is necessary—and that is a conclusion to which I am not prepared to commit myself at present—it will be more in the interests of justice that, instead of creating a new court, they would appoint a new judge for the Supreme Court. That court at present is composed of six judges, and in order to constitute a quorum there must be five on the bench. Three out of five form a majority, so that we sometimes have the anomalous condition of things when three judges overrule the decision of five judges in the courts below. I do not say that can, in all cases be avoided, but the fault can in some degree be mitigated by the appointment of an additional judge, if we are to have the large expense that will arise from the working of this measure. The Government a year or two ago brought down a Bill which had for its object something in the nature of what the hon. gentleman suggests in this Bill. That Bill was on entirely different lines. It was introduced by the Minister of Public Works to establish what he called a Court of Claims. This court did not, in any sense, infringe upon the existing jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The Government, however, for some reason they have not explained, changed their mind. The Bill they now bring down is fraught with serious consequences; it imposes large additional costs on the taxpayers, and does not seem to me to be absolutely required. I, therefore, think it should be very carefully considered. I am opposed to its principle entirely.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). This Bill will make a material change in the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. My hon. friend has adverted to the Bill introduced by the hon. the Minister of Public Works in 1885, to provide for a Court of Claims. The distinctive feature of difference between that Bill and the present one is that, in the first, the Exchequer Court was not interfered with; it merely did away with the official arbitrators. But, in this Bill, the official arbitrators still remain under the name of official referees. This Bill will largely increase the expenditure of the administration of justice, because it is necessary, under it, that a judge should be appointed at $6,000, a registrar at $2,000 a year, office clerks and others, which the Governor in Council is authorised to appoint, besides the travelling expenses of the official referees and other officers. It seems to me, if the Government would adopt the suggestion of my hon. friend, that an additional judge of the Supreme Court should be created and the Exchequer Court retain its present position, a large amount of expenditure might be saved and more effective machinery be had. Up to the present, as the Minister of Justice has said, the judges of the Supreme Court have conducted the business of the Exchequer Court very satisfactorily to the country, and it seems to me that the present mode has another advantage. We know that in the different Provinces there are various laws and various procedures, that the laws of one Province differ from those of another Province. If these judges are together, those who know the law relating to a particular case would be chosen, and that is far better than it would be in this case where the judge is simply a judge of the common law. Then, the judges from the Lower Provinces, who are more familiar with those laws and the questions arising under them, can divide the duties among them, and in that way the matter would be better attended to than under the proposed system, and business would be facilitated. Besides that, in this way you do away with the necessity for having another registrar and other officers. If additional assistance is required it can be supplied at a very small expense, and all the additional officers that might be required for the Supreme Court, if the Exchequer Court was continued as it is at present, would be much smaller in number than would be required by the formation of a new court. Of course, we can discuss the provisions of the Bill when it is in committee, but it strikes me that the principle of the Bill is wrong, involving as it does such great expense to the country, which would be better served by maintaining the present system and appointing an additional judge to the Supreme Court.

Mr. THOMPSON. The effect of the suggestions which have been proposed strikes me as being this: We propose that one judge shall be charged with this business and paid $6,000 a year. My hon. friends opposite propose that we shall appoint another judge of the Supreme Court and so increase the public burdens by $7,000 a year. The inconvenience does not end there, but, if we had another judge of the Supreme Court and abolished the arbitrators—which I presume is included in the suggestions of the hon. gentleman, for otherwise it would be no improvement at all—everyone who has a case before the court, no matter how small his claim may be, must come to Ottawa to have it tried, unless we keep the official referees, which my hon. friends opposite object to as increasing the expense. I think the criticism by which my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) sought to answer my contention, that we were reducing the cost of litigation before the court of arbitrators, was not well founded. He contended that we were doing nothing more than changing their names. We are doing a great deal more than that. The present board of arbitrators has the power, the right, and the duty to adjudicate on the whole of the claims, to decide on the questions of law which may be involved, to take evidence on every point, and it has to sit as an entire body. We propose to change entirely the character of their duties and powers, and to place them under the control of the judge as referees. We propose that he may send one of them to any part of the country to investigate any question of fact upon which he desires to obtain evidence, but the referee will have no power to hear any evidence in regard to any branch of the case, except that in which he is called upon to act as official referee. Is there any Superior Court that has not now the power to appoint official arbitrators or assessors, or referees, and has anyone heard that that costs a great deal more to the suitor, or that it leads to the taking of a large mass of evidence such as the official arbitrators take now? In many cases where the arbitrators are proceeding in perfect good faith, and with every desire for economy, the evidence they take is three times as much as is necessary; and it is in contemplation in some cases to discharge the whole matter and to commence to take the evidence de novo because that is easier than to sift the unsound evidence from the sound. Does anyone suppose that, if an official referee were sent by the judge to report on the value of the property, the value of the animal lost, or the value of the damage sustained in a particular case, he would, in answer to that, report an immense book of evidence, taken as this evidence is taken upon every conceivable point, as these arbitrators necessarily must, because they have to adjudicate upon every part of the case? The judge would send them to investigate a simple matter of account, a question of value, the situation of the property, or whatever it might be, and they would report upon that subject to him, and he would retain the adjudication of all claims which came before him. We are changing the duties and functions of these officers, and putting them in the same position as other referees are in under the judicature system. Those referees are not often employed, but, when they are called in, it is familiar to everyone how expeditiously and how easily the evidence they obtain is used in a court of justice, and how little it is open to the objection that it increases the expenses, as the employment of arbitrators increases it now. The hon. gentleman says that the remedy is to put competent men upon the board of arbitrators. I hope it may not be understood from what I said, as a fair inference, that the present arbitrators are not competent. I think they are, as far as men of that class and with that remuneration can be spoken of as competent to discharge what are really judicial duties; but, if we are to appoint men who are competent in the sense of being professional men, we shall have to pay a very different amount instead of the present salaries which are only $1,000 a year. I do not understand why, if an individual has a claim against the Government or against a Department, which the Minister sends now to the board of arbitrators, a claim perhaps involving many thousands of dollars, as these claims sometimes do, he should not be entitled to as much skill on the part of the judge who determines that case as if he was a private suitor appearing before one of the superior courts of the country. If an individual has a suit against another we provide him with a skilled judge at no additional expense to himself, and our statutes provide that there shall be a certain number of years' experience at the bar before a man is appointed a judge, and the judges are paid liberal salaries for the skill which they are able to bring to the discharge of their duties. But if a suit is brought against a Department the suitor is sent before gentlemen who have no professional skill or attainments, and that although their award is conclusive to the same extent as the judgment of a court of law. The only remedy he has is to appeal to the highest court in the country, and the procedure in that court on appeal involves very considerable expense. I have no doubt, Sir, whatever that the procedure established by this Bill, and the tribunal established by this Bill, will accomplish all the purposes which it is our desire to accomplish, that is, to dispose of all the exchequer business and the business which is now done before the board of arbitrators, without increasing by a single dollar the expense that is now borne by the Treasury, and that we shall have diminished by at least one-half, the expense to the suitors and to the Crown of conducting the business before these tribunals. I might call the attention of the House to what the direct expense has been during the past year, for instance, of the board of arbitrators. Now, I will not take into account the salaries of the exchequer judges, the travelling allowances of the exchequer judges, their stenographers, their registrars and their officers, when they hear petitions of right in different parts of the country; and I am not taking into account one dollar for the cost of litigation, conducted in the expensive way in which it now proceeds; but taking the costs of the arbitrators alone, I find that for the two Departments of Railways and Canals and Public Works, in the last fiscal year, their travelling allowances amounted to $6,000, and their salaries to $6,000 more. So in respect of that one tribunal, we have a cost in one year of $12,000, for a procedure without any professional skill, and in the most costly way that it is possible to have these trials conducted. and $12,000, it strikes me, is ample to provide for the improved system of procedure and the more skilled tribunal which this Bill proposes to establish.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am unable to discover, although I followed the Minister of Justice very closely in the observations he has addressed to the House, how it is that he expects to make that considerable saving by constituting an additional court. The Minister stated that he proposes to pay under this Bill to the Exchequer judge $1,000 less than they would pay to a Superior Court judge if they were to add another judge to the Supreme Court. The hon. gentleman provides in this Bill for the appointment of a registrar at a salary of $2,000. Well, if the hon. gentleman were to add a judge to the Supreme Court, allowing the original jurisdiction to remain where it is now, he would avoid that expense.

Mr. THOMPSON. Unless we centralise all that business in Ottawa, we must provide for the Exchequer judge going about the country to hear cases, and we must surely provide a new registrar for him, for the registrar of the Supreme Court cannot do it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not agree with the view expressed by the hon. gentleman, but that is a matter for further consideration. Now, the hon. gentleman has referred to the board of arbitrators. He told us that these were laymen, that they were not conversant with the law of evidence, that they took as evidence a great deal that was not legal evidence, that in fact they increase the labor of the judges four-fold, since they were obliged to review the evidence in those cases. Now, the hon. gentleman does not propose to get rid of that difficulty. He told us there would be a special reference only, that the particular branch of the subject which was involved, would be referred to them. Not only do these gentlemen travel outside the subject altogether and deal with other subjects, but in regard to the matter in hand, they are unable to distinguish between what is and what is not evidence, and the same difficulty would continue as when they were subordinated to the Exchequer Court, as it did when they were acting, as at present, as a board of arbitrators. Now, the Government are, in this matter, proceeding upon wholly different lines from what they proposed for the consideration of the House before. They left the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court, the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, in fact, just where it now is. But the hon. gentleman proposes to divest the judges of the Supreme Court of their original jurisdiction as an Exchequer Court, and to confer all this power upon a single judge. If the hon. gentleman will look at the jurisdiction that is conferred upon this judge of the Exchequer Court, he will see how utterly inadequate a single judge would be to discharge that duty, supposing the country had confidence in the party the Government might appoint. Why, Sir, the Government propose not only to give to this judge a jurisdiction such as the Exchequer Court now possesses, but they propose to give to him concurrent jurisdiction with provincial courts on a great variety of subjects. Then again, I find by the 7th section, that the hon. gentleman proposes to give to this one judge the right of trying, in the first instance, all the disputes that may arise between the Government of the Dominion and any Province, or between one Province and another. The hon. gentleman knows that under the Supreme Court Act such power is conferred upon the judges of that court in their capacity as an Exchequer Court. The public have confidence in a court consisting of half a dozen of the most eminent jurists, but the hon. gentleman proposes to create an inferior court which is to consist of one judge, and to this inferior court is to be given the right to try, in the first instance, the most important cases that can possibly come before a judicial tribunal. Those cases may involve questions of political consideration as well as questions of statutory construction and judicial interpretation. Now, the hon. gentleman has also spoken of the change in the board of arbitrators. Why, Sir, if the hon. gentleman finds the board of arbitrators an inconvenient or an inefficient body, if he proposes to subordinate them to a court and confer upon them functions somewhat like those now discharged by an ordinary master in chancery, or by an official referee, if he proposes to make them assessors in cases where technical knowledge is required, all that might be done by amending the law relating to the constitution of the board of arbitrators, without creating a new court at all. The hon. gentleman can subordinate them to the Court of Exchequer, he can make them a body of assessors and he can bring about all these reforms, and get rid of all these inconveniences which he has pointed out as existing under the law as it now stands, by subordinating them to the existing Exchequer Court. The hon. gentleman does not propose to do that. He proposes to create a new court, and confer upon that court a very large measure of jurisdiction, while at the same time he intimated, from the position which he assigns to the one judge of that court, that it is to be an inferior tribunal.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I must inform the House that I am in favor of the principle of this Bill, because I think that this will enable us to recover from the Crown damages which we could not recover heretofore. I will give an instance which happened in the county which I have the honor to represent. The Intercolonial crosses this county, and the same thing may be said of all the counties below Quebec. This railway is the cause of great damages every year. There are bridges which cause the water to flow back on the properties of the farmers, and it is clear that these damages are caused by the railway. We have complained again and again; we have asked for investigations, but we could never obtain anything, perhaps because these demands were made by me; however, I do not wish to say that it was for political reasons, but the fact is there, and under these circumstances we could never obtain justice. Well, if this Bill becomes law, we will be able to claim the amount of these damages; we will be able to make out a case against the Government, and we will be in a position to prove damages as we would in any court of justice, and obtain justice against the Government. Now, I am not prepared to approve every clause of this Bill, but I believe that the principle of the Bill ought to be adopted, in order to enable us to obtain damages which are at times very large. I know that properties have been damaged to a great extent, and farmers who are well known to me hardly two weeks ago have asked me to bring before the Government their own individual cases in order to obtain for them a compensation for damages caused by the Intercolonial Railway. I believe that with this Bill we will be able to establish these damages and to prove our case as we would before any other tribunal. Therefore, I say I approve the Government for having introduced this Bill, but it seems to me that the arbitrators should be dispensed with and that their office should not be continued by others under different names. The moment we have a judge before whom our witnesses may be heard, I do not see the necessity of the arbitrators, besides the judge himself may, if he sees fit, refer the case to arbitrators if needs be. Consequently if we wish to improve the present state of things, the arbitrators should be dispensed with, because the arbitrators are men before whom investigations only are made; now the judge will take the place of the arbitrators and the investigations will be held before him, and will be much more regular than they were before the arbitrators. The hon. Minister of Justice stated a moment ago, that there were circumstances when under the old law the arbitrators were judge in the last instance. I am not prepared to contradict the hon. Minister, but there is one case which came within my experience and which, to a certain extent, contradicts that. In the county of Montmagny a horse was killed on the Intercolonial Railway. One of the arbitrators held an investigation; it was proved before him that the horse was worth $200. But what was the result? The case dragged along for two or three years, and it was only sometime before the election that the Government made up their mind to pay, but they did not pay the full amount of the damage which had been suffered according to the statement of the arbitrator; they only paid $160. Here are the facts such as they were reported to me, and, I believe, such as they happened. Well, if that is the case, the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Justice is not, in my opinion, conformable to what took place in the past, because this proves that the decision of the arbitrators was not final and that the Government or the Minister of Justice could revise it and not grant to the complainant the amount established before the arbitrators' court, but only the amount which the Government or the Minister of Justice thought just and reasonable to give. This shows that the arbitrators were only a commission of enquiry, that they were not judges and that their judgment was not final. To return to the present Bill, I say that we should dispense with the arbitrators and give jurisdiction to the judge, if he has not jurisdiction already, by inserting a clause under which he may appoint arbitrators. Therefore, I say, Mr. Speaker, that with the exception of certain clauses, I am in favor of this Bill, the effect of which will be to do away with the deplorable state of things which exists to-day.

Mr. AMYOT. I am happy to congratulate the Government upon the introduction of this Bill, which was necessary in order that we might obtain justice. I am not ready to assent to every detail of the Bill, but I think that, as a whole, it is very good, and will prove very useful to the public. There is one clause, though, to which I will object and upon which I will make a suggestion when it will come before the committee. That clause says:

"The practice and procedure in suits, actions and matters in the Exchequer Court shall, so far as they are applicable and unless it is otherwise provided for by this Act, or by general rules made in pursuance of this Act, be regulated by the practice and procedure in similar suits, actions and matters in Her Majesty's High Court of Justice in England."

This is practically excluding all the lawyers in the Province of Quebec from practising before that court. We know nothing about the rules and practice in England, and would have to begin again our studies, and we have no time to do so. I hope the Minister will see that as regards Quebec cases the rules and practice of Quebec will be applied, which I think will be nothing but fair. As to the Bill itself, I am in favor of its principle, and I hope it will be found practicable. I am in favor also of retaining the services of the Dominion arbitrators, because they possess a great deal of experience. I consider the country at large will be satisfied with the Bill, which should receive the support of this House.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time on a division.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider certain proposed resolutions (p. 590) respecting the salaries of the judge and officers of the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Motion agreed to, and resolutions considered in Committee and reported.

CANNED GOODS.

Mr. BOWELL moved the second reading of Bill (No. 121) to amend the Act respecting Canned Goods.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time; House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. WELDON (St. John). What description of goods are referred to?

Mr. CHOQUETTE.

Mr. BOWELL. This Bill is merely to change the law as it stands at present so as to provide that the word "soaked" shall be printed on the label at the top of the can sufficiently large to be seen. The goods embrace fruit, corn, vegetables and such articles.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

LIQUORS ON BOARD HER MAJESTY'S SHIPS IN CANADIAN WATERS.

Mr. FOSTER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 122) respecting the conveyance of liquors on board Her Majesty's ships in Canadian waters.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understand that this Bill is prepared at the instance of the Imperial Government, and is a transcript of the English Act.

Mr. FOSTER. It is almost a transcript of a clause in the English Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SUBSIDY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider a certain proposed resolution (p. 708) respecting the subsidy to the Province of Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Will the Minister explain the basis upon which this sum is arrived at?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that the Order in Council which I have laid on the Table of the House, gives, I think, the necessary explanation. The attention of the Government was called to the fact that, in the arrangements for the admission of Prince Edward Island into the Union, they were not in a position to derive the same amount of advantage from the expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway and the Canadian Pacific Railway as the other portions of the Dominion, which were on the mainland, and which were in immediate railway communication with those roads. The question was raised that, as the expenditures on both these railways was so greatly in excess of what was estimated at the time the island was brought into the Union, they ought to receive some corresponding consideration on that account. Then there was the further question that Parliament had adopted the policy of subsidizing lines of railway in the other Provinces—that in Ontario and Quebec, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, there had been considerable expenditures in connection with the construction of railways, and the island had not received any corresponding advantage. No subsidies had been granted for the construction of railways in Prince Edward Island, and on those two grounds it was claimed that there should be additional consideration given to the island. That matter having been carefully considered, the Government felt warranted in undertaking to propose to Parliament a grant of $20,000 a year to meet the claims founded upon these two causes. That is set forth in the Order in Council, and the resolution is for the purpose of carrying it into effect.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I need not say that I am thoroughly in sympathy with the spirit of the hon. gentleman's resolution, but I only wish to ascertain how he arrived at the amount. Do I understand that the expenditure so far as the Canadian Pacific Railway is concerned, was not taken into consideration in making up the amount?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, yes, it was.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Then it was the expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway, and the excessive expenditure on the Intercolonial beyond what was anticipated, and the amount of subsidies paid under the new system adopted a few years ago of subsidising provincial roads?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I understand from the hon. gentleman that a careful calculation was made, and that this was the result—$20,000 a year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the result.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) A careful calculation based on those three expenditures?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We, of course, desire to be liberal.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Because my own impression is that the hon. gentleman has erred in the other direction.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I think I will be able to convince the hon. gentlemen before I am through, and I am sure that when I have convinced the Minister of Customs, he will be one of the first to go for the increased allowance. I would ask the hon. gentleman whether, in this allowance, it is perfectly plain that the claims which the island has preferred against the Dominion Government are not included in this amount. Of course the hon. gentleman is aware of the controversy, in which he took part, between the island and the Dominion, before the Home Office; that there is a large pecuniary claim which the island made against the Dominion Government. That is not included in this.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is confined to the amounts stated in the Order in Council.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) And those other claims remain as they were before? Do I understand that this is in any sense or way treated as a settlement pro tanto or in whole, of those claims, or do they remain as before? That is the information to which I think we are entitled.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Order in Council speaks for itself. We have only undertaken to deal with the grounds which are stated in the Order in Council.

It being six o'clock the committee rose, and the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee on the resolution.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is the first time that we have been brought absolutely face to face with the necessary consequence of the policy adopted by the Government a few years ago in granting aid to local enterprises. I am bound myself to admit that if you once, in a confederation situated like ours, commence granting local aid to local enterprises, I see no alternative.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You mean general aid to local enterprises?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, I mean particular aid to local enterprises. I mean such as the hon. gentleman has been giving in various ways, but especially in subsidies to various railways of importance only to particular localities; and the point to which I wish to call his attention and that of the committee is this: Here for perhaps the first time, under an Order in Council, we have virtually recognised the result of granting aid to certain local enterprises. Here the Government feel compelled to come down and give half a million as compensation to Prince Edward Island for the sums which have been granted in various directions in other Provinces. Now, I must say that it appears to me that we cannot possibly stop here, and that the consequences contained in this grant will go a great deal further. I think the Government will find themselves obliged at no distant time to consider the question of the revision of the financial position of the whole Dominion. Everything you grant to Prince Edward Island you must of necessity grant elsewhere, if a similar case or anything approaching it is made out. I have no intention of opposing the grant to Prince Edward Island on the principles I lay down. Very likely the demand made by that Province is quite justifiable, and that it may be that this vote is quite justifiable. I am not going to gainsay that; but what I do call the attention of the committee to is that most assuredly this particular grant will not stop here, but what has been time and again pointed out by myself and others as a consequence of the policy of the Government is going to come to pass, and that when we consider our present debt, we will have to take into consideration an enormous mass of undefined liabilities which are now virtually sanctioned by this Order in Council in the present measure. I doubt very much whether, under the circumstances, the Government will not be called upon to consider the propriety and expediency of making very large grants to various other Provinces. I must say I think the Province of Ontario will have a very large claim. If you grant half a million to Prince Edward Island and several millions to the Maritime Provinces, you will have to grant very large sums to all the other Provinces, and you will establish a case for an arbitration among the Provinces in order that it may be seen that they shall each receive their due share from the Dominion Treasury. I was somewhat surprised, that being so, that the Minister of Finance introduced this proposal without a word, and as a matter of course. I do not think it will be possible for him to refuse to consider the claims of sections of Provinces as well as Provinces. I believe he will have to consider the necessity of making large grants to the Province of Ontario in order to compensate that Province for the grants he has been making in other parts of the Dominion.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad that I am relieved from the necessity of defending this vote by the statement the hon. gentleman has made that he does not intend to oppose it, and for the sufficient reason that he seems himself impressed with the propriety of making the grant. At all events, the ground on which this appropriation is made is specifically stated, and if the ground of the appropriation is not sound, the appropriation is not justifiable, and the hon. gentleman would be bound to oppose it; but the moment, when that ground is stated clearly and explicitly, he says he is not in a position to question the propriety of the grant, I think I am relieved from the necessity of any labored argument in support of it. I think the very ground on which we have placed the appropriation has so commended itself to the hon. gentleman's judgment as to be our best vindication for having made the appropriation, and I think he will find that it is based upon principles that will absolutely prevent it being made applicable to any other Province, or entail the expenditure of a shilling in any other province whatever. It is true, I thought, that the five minutes before six o'clock which remained when I rose to propose this vote, would enable us to get through it before six o'clock, because, I thought, having stated in the Order in Council the grounds on which it was made, it would so commend itself to every person that very few minutes would be sufficient to dispose of it.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I am not quite satisfied with the appropriation that has been made by the hon. gentleman in favor of the Province from which I come, and I think I shall be able to satisfy every reasonable man in the House that an examination of the figures —

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I would be almost tempted to ask the House to reject the appropriation if the hon. gentleman is not satisfied with it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) It appears that this committee is a kind of gagged committee—that I am not allowed at all to show that the Province from which I come is entitled fairly and honestly to a larger appropriation than the hon. gentleman proposes. He lays down the proposition that if I attempt to discuss it at all he will withdraw the vote. Well, Sir, I will take the risk of such a threat. I propose to lay before the committee a few figures which I think will convince them, and the hon. gentleman too, that when a further claim is made on behalf of Prince Edward Island, it is one that ought to be and will be conceded. The hon. gentleman stated that this grant was made to Prince Edward Island on three grounds; first, that there had been a larger expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway than was anticipated when the island entered the Union; second, that there had been a new policy inaugurated in 1882, of subsidising local railways in the different Provinces of the Dominion; and, third, that there has been an unprecedentedly large expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway—an expenditure not anticipated at the time the contract was entered into or at the time the island came into the Union. Now, I think the principle is a reasonable one, that a Province like Prince Edward Island, which in no way has benefited by the new policy inaugurated by the Government, of subsidising local railways, and does not derive any benefit whatever from the immense expenditure on the Canadian Pacific Railway or the increased expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, is entitled to some recognition at the hands of the Government. But the only question I wish to present to the Minister is whether he has sufficiently considered the figures and has given the island as much as it is entitled to. Now, an impression prevails largely amongst members of this House that the island has been rather a favored Province.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Hon. gentlemen cheer that statement, showing that it is concurred in by a large number of members, and that impression is based upon the belief that Prince Edward Island had its railway built for it by the Dominion of Canada. That impression has been removed from the minds of a great many who have learned the facts, and I am sure will be removed from the minds of those who are cheering the statement, when they learn the Dominion never paid one dollar towards building the road. We are paying money to build railroads in every part of the Dominion. We have spent one million dollars to build railways in Cape Breton, and I did not offer strenuous opposition to it, but, as a matter of fact, the $3,250,000, which the Prince Edward Island Railway cost, was paid for entirely by the people of the island themselves. So far as railway accommodation is concerned and railway subsidy, Prince Edward Island has never received one cent from the Dominion except the small sum voted two years ago, at the instance of the Minister of Railways, to carry out the terms of Union, by building the short line between Cape Traverse and the main line. Therefore, while all parts of the Dominion have been reaping, and will continue to reap in the future, the benefits which will flow from the expenditure of our money on railways, the island, from its peculiar position, has not benefited and will not benefit by that expenditure. When the hon. gentleman proposed his resolution, I asked the grounds upon which he based his calculations, and I had the curiosity to examine how much money Canada has become liable for since the new policy of subsidising railways was inaugurated in 1882. I find we have become liable for subsidies to the extent of $23,000,000. Hon. gentlemen will recollect that, before 1882, it was not the policy of the Government to grant subsidies to local lines at all. The policy was introduced in 1882, local lines were declared to be for the benefit of Canada; and from that time to the present, every Session has witnessed large sums of money granted to different parts of the Provinces of Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. I find that the population of Prince Edward Island is one-fortieth that of the Dominion, and if it shared to the same extent as the other Provinces in these local subsidies alone, it would be entitled to the $20,000 per year the hon. gentleman proposes to vote. Putting, therefore, this vote upon its proper ground, we are not receiving any sum whatever for the expenditure upon the building of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The amount which the Dominion of Canada has expended in that work in cash, outside of land, as everybody knows, is over $70,000,000; the amount we have expended on the Intercolonial Railway since Prince Edward Island came into the Union, beyond what was then calculated, is about $10,000,000, and the amount the hon. gentleman proposes to vote to the island simply represents its fair share of the grants made towards subsidising local railways in the other Provinces. The sum proposed in no sense represents what we are entitled to for the expenditure which the Dominion has incurred upon the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway. In fairness, I must say that when the island came in, allowance was made for contemplated expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway. It was assumed there would be a large expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway, and that there would be some few millions expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway. That was taken into consideration, but there is an enormous sum, representing some $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 at the least which has been expended by the Dominion upon the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Intercolonial Railway, which was not contemplated at all at the time the island entered Confederation. Of course, everyone knows that that Province, from its insular position, does not derive any benefit from the construction of those works, at all commensurate with the benefits other portions of the Dominion derive. I think, therefore, the hon. gentleman should have taken that fact into consideration, and the amount granted the island should, in common justice, have been at least nearly double what he proposes. I do not see how these figures can be got over. The fact of our being one-fortieth of the Dominion entitles us, if our terms are to be readjusted and we are to be placed on a fair basis, to a sum that ought to represent a proportionate amount, according to population, of the expenditure in the other parts of the Dominion. My hon. friend speaks of this opening a door for claims by the other Provinces. It may be so to some extent, but I find the other Provinces have had granted to them, in subsidies, all of which of course, have not been expended, since 1882, the sum of $23,000,000, besides the $70,000,000 expended on the Canadian Pacific Railway, on no portion of which expenditure can we by any possibility derive the benefit which other portions of the Dominion will. Under these circumstances, I wish it to be understood that the Government are not conferring any special favor on that Province whatever. They are not even giving us our fair honest rights, and I trust, at no distant time, this matter will be put on a fair basis, and we will get the balance we are fairly entitled to. Hon. gentlemen know that if we had not expended $3,250,000 on the Prince Edward Island Railway, we would to-day be entitled to stand in the same position as Cape Breton, and have a railway built for us. But we did not do that; we built the railway ourselves. Therefore, while accepting the resolutions of the Government, I do so with the protest that it is not sufficient, and I hope at no distant date the unfairness will be remedied.

Mr. WELSH. I say so, too. The hon. the Finance Minister is beginning to treat us right, he is making a step in the right direction, and we are getting some of the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table; and if the rich man does not give us some more crumbs, he will find himself in the same place as did the other rich man—rather warm. If the hon. the Finance Minister had only consulted the members from Prince Edward Island, I have no doubt he could have settled the business in one job, but he does not offer to consult the members from Prince Edward Island as to what is required for the island. We are looked upon, I suppose, as having no right to offer suggestions here. I do not expect, of course, on this side of the House, that we would get the patronage of the island; we leave that to some of the political hacks; but we do expect that we would be consulted on everything concerning the welfare and public interest of the island. Although there are six of us on this side of the House representing Prince Edward Island, I do not suppose the Government will go so far as to pass a Coercion Act against us. I maintain this is only a drop, only a measure of justice. Some hon. members on that side and some on this side think Prince Edward Island is a great nuisance. I would like to hear them say so, and the Government say so. Let them cut the painter and send us adrift, and we will give them a handsome subsidy of $200,000. We are all loyal, and all we want is even-handed justice. Until we get that, we will not be satisfied. The Finance Minister knows well these outstanding claims against the Dominion Government by the Local Government amounting to $5,000,000; he has seen the delegation from Prince Edward Island; he has argued the case before the Colonial Secretary in London; he knows what our grievances and claims are. He knows also that Earl Granville, I think it was, wrote out recommending a generous treatment of Prince Edward Island. Will the Finance Minister tell me that this offer of $20,000 a year is a just consideration of that claim? I admit that he frankly tells us it is a claim outside of that; it is a claim in connection with old expenditure on the Intercolonial Railway. I believe that is his argument, and I am very glad to hear that it is only a settlement of one small claim by itself; but I would like very much to see the whole matter laid before this House, and an equitable settlement of these difficulties arrived at, so that the Federal Government and the Local Government would be in unison. We may be extreme, perhaps, in our demands—I am not going to enter into that question—but I do hope that the Government will at an early period take this matter into consideration and have it settled, because the Finance Minister knows very well that when we went into Confederation, our tariff was only 11 per cent., I think it was, and we went in on the Dominion tariff of something like 15 per cent. We went in on that basis, and they allowed 80 cents per head of subsidy to the Local Government. Since that the taxation has increased from 15 per cent. till now it is very nearly 30 per cent.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nearly 100 per cent.

Mr. WELSH. Yes, nearly 100 per cent. We stopped the fertilisers, though. While it has gone up from 15 to 30 per cent., our subsidy has not increased in proportion. I do not want to be unreasonable. I am very glad to see this matter come down, and as my colleague says, if it were double the amount, I should go for it with double the pleasure.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 139), to provide for an additional subsidy to the Province of Prince Edward Island.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

103

DOMINION LANDS ACT.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 113), to amend the Dominion Lands Act. He said: This Act relates purely to matters of detail, and if the House will consent to its being read the second time now, so as to go into committee on the next Government day, the details may be discussed more effectively than on the second reading.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

SUPPLY—COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH FRANCE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of Supply.

Mr. AMYOT. Mr. Speaker, before you leave the Chair I desire to call the attention of the Government on a very important question.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. AMYOT. If the hon. gentlemen think we have no right to speak in French in this House, they are very much mistaken, if, out of courtesy, we generally speak in English, they should not, when we do speak in French, say "hear, hear" or cry "question," as they did this afternoon when my hon. friend from Montmagny (Mr. Choquette) tried to speak in French. I know that some papers laugh at our pronunciation, but I expect more courtesy from this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. AMYOT. (Translation.) On the 30th of March I had the honor to call the attention of the Government on a question of public interest: on the necessity of a treaty of commerce with France, an exceedingly important question, not only for the present, but also on account of the very serious circumstances which it may involve in the future. This question is not altogether new, for as far back as 1859 and 1860 certain financial arrangements were made between England and France concerning Canada. And I find, in a conference signed jointly by the French Ministers, the British Ambassador and by our representative at London, bearing date the 15th of March, 1882, a statement in the following terms:—

"In 1859-60 an informal arrangement gave to Canadian products certain advantages for importation in France, on condition that, as regarded several French articles for importation in Canada, the Canadian duties should be assimilated to similar articles of English manufacture, on the further condition that the duties on wines, excepting, however, sparkling wines, be reduced to a shilling per gallon, that is to say, the rate settled upon for the import duty on French wines in England.

"Canada had not been mentioned in the treaty between France and England in 1860; nevertheless, it had the benefit, under the above mentioned arrangement, of being treated as the most favored nation, until 1873.

"But from that time, the French Government adopted another system, and placing Canada under the general tariff, caused a material damage to that country."

And further it is said, that these arrangements, commenced in 1859 and 1860, had been highly beneficial to Canada and to France:

"The trade between France and Canada, which, until 1873, had taken a great impulse, has decreased since, under the old general tariff, and there is no doubt that, under the new system, it will decline entirely. But it is for that reason that the Canadian Government would heartily wish to find a remedy to such a disastrous condition."

This, as I have just said, was declared on the 15th of March, 1882, at the conference held in Paris. It was then found that during the first period, when we had commercial relations between France and Canada, the trade had progressed, but since this arrangement had ceased, trade had suffered, and there were indications of a still greater depression for the future. In the first place, I must say that the Government of Canada have always concerned themselves with this question, or at least have seemed to concern themselves about it. Sir Alexander Galt, our delegate at London, was instructed by the Government to open official negotiations. They were commenced in 1878; I will not repeat them here, for in 1885 I had the honor to explain them to the House. They will be found in the Debates of 1885, pages 866 and following. In 1878, however, it was semi-official and not official negotiations which were opened, and in prevision of what was going to happen, France consented to take the first step. I find in the official report, bearing date the 20th of March, 1882, of a conference between Sir Alexander Galt and the French authorities, the following passage:—

"In the course of conversations which took place in 1878, with a view to the improvement of that situation, it was pointed out that in case that France would consent to re-establish the duty of 2 francs per ton register on sea-going vessels, Canada would blot out from its tariff the over-tax of 30 per cent. on wines."

That is to say, Mr. Speaker, that on the one hand, in 1878, France consented to reduce from 40 francs to 2 francs per ton, the duties on our ships, on the promise that Canada had made to reduce the duties on French wines. France kept her word, but Canada has not done so. Our pledge is still unredeemed. In 1882, as I had the honor to say, the first official conference took place. There were several of them; they have all been detailed in the first speech which I delivered on the 30th of March, 1885. Later on the present Minister of Finance was appointed High Commissioner, and I said in the first speech I delivered on the subject, among other things:

"Things were in this state, when Sir Charles Tupper was appointed High Commissioner to London. If the rumor is to be credited, and the papers asked for will show whether it is to be credited or not, Sir Charles Tupper has attempted new negotiations. On the 5th of November, 1883, if I am well informed, he submitted a memorandum in which he proposed:

"1. That France should grant to Canada the benefit of the tariff granted to the most favored nation, and should abolish the over-tax on goods in bond imported from Canada into France by way of England or any of the seaports in Europe.

"2. That Canada should grant to France the privileges of the most favored nation and abolish the duty of 30 per cent. which is now imposed on wines, while maintaining the specific duties now imposed. Such would be the proposal made on the part of Canada. Lord Lyons, Ambassador in France, has, it seems, assented to it, and the Colonial Office, on his recommendation, and at the request of Sir Charles Tupper, has also, it seems, assented to it. I am even told that France is ready to sign a treaty to that effect, but I do not know how far the negotiations have gone."

I concluded, Mr. Speaker, by moving for the returns concerning this question. We will now see what answer was given to me then by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Sir Hector Langevin). He said:

"I congratulate the hon. gentleman on the able speech he has made. He is very favorable, as we all are, to opening commercial relations with France. Of course, as the hon. member has shown, negotiations had been carried on between this country, through the Ambassador at Paris and the High Commissioner in London, and France. These negotiations lasted for several years. I hope, with the hon. gentleman, that the time will come very soon when those negotiations will be resumed, and that they will come to such a result as will be a benefit to Canada as well as France. No doubt also the result can be obtained without too great sacrifice on our part; but if we have to make a sacrifice, we must expect that this country with which we will have to deal will make a corresponding sacrifice. That is the only way in which we can obtain a reciprocity between the two countries. I have no objection to the papers being produced, and they will be brought down as soon as possible."

On this point, Mr. Speaker, I must make two remarks. In the first place, I must say that the returns promised in 1885 are not before the House, and have not yet been brought down. I have examined all the Sessional papers and no trace of them can be found anywhere. I regret it very much, and this shows that the Government have not dealt with this question as they should have done. I am certain, however, that the hon. Ministers, with the intelligence for which they are noted, and with the experience which they possess, understand the importance of the question; and to find that they have not, to this moment, found means to bring down these documents, is a thing of which the House and the country have good reason to be surprised. In the second place, I have reason to think that the informations which were given to me in 1885, with regard to the High Commissioner, the present Minister of Finance, were correct; and I must congratulate this hon. Minister on the ability which he has displayed on that occasion in obtaining the consent, or at least, the probability of the consent of France. Now, Mr. Speaker, the papers for which I have moved, not having been produced, I have had to apply to France to get information, and to obtain certain informations which are here, however, in the Departments, and which, it seems, people are trying to conceal from us. Since the negotiations have been continued by the present Minister of Finance (Sir Charles Tupper) the matter continued to be agitated in France. We have there a representative, Hon. Mr. Fabre, who does his best to ensure the success of our negotiations with the French Government. He publishes a newspaper, and has given a number of lectures which were highly remarked in France, which were copied by a large number of newspapers, and which have very greatly added to the commercial and financial fame of Canada, and made known its numerous resources. In the second place, he has been busy with continuing semi-official relations with the French Government, and, I believe, not without results, as will be seen in the reports which he has made to the Canadian Government. I believe he has made four since the last four years. There is not one of them before the House, that I know of; at least, I am not aware that there are any printed. It seems that with regard to this question, all the means which we might have to receive informations are intentionally refused to us. I notice that the Government, on receiving each of Mr. Fabre's reports' always addressed to him the most flattering letters of congratulation and of thanks. The last report which he has made, and which is very important, was welcomed as warmly as the others. It is dated April the 20th, 1886. I will quote, among others, the answer given by the Government to Hon. Mr. Fabre, with regard to his report of the 26th of February, 1885. I will read it in English, because the document which I have in my possession is in that language:

"The undersigned has the honor to report to Council that there has been referred to the Minister of Finance, translation of a report of Hon. Hector Fabre, agent of the Canadian Government in France, under date of the 26th February last, on the subject of commercial relationship with France. The subject is one of very great importance, and owing to the pressure of business at present cannot be given that attention which it deserves. The undersigned therefore recommends that the thanks of the Government should be conveyed to Mr. Fabre for his valuable report, and that as soon as possible enquiries should be made into the several subjects referred to in the report.

"Respectfully submitted,

"M. BOWELL,

"Acting Minister of Finance."

It will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that the Government could not help admitting the strength of this report and acknowledging that it was framed in the interest of Canada. The last report of Mr. Fabre confirms his previous reports. I hope that it will soon be before the House, and printed in the Sessional papers. Mr. Fabre has succeeded in securing the services of a young Frenchman, who is exceedingly intelligent, who came several times to this country, who is doing his best to establish a line of transatlantic steamers between France and Canada, and takes great interest in our trade with France. Mr. Foursin-Escandé is the name of that young Frenchman. He communicated with the then Ministers of France, and here is the final result at which he was enabled to arrive, at least as far as I could find by the papers which I have been able to procure. The following letter dated at Paris on the 1st of April, 1886, speaks for itself.

"MY DEAR FOURSIN,—I have seen Mr. Fernand Faure, deputy for La Gironde, to whom I spoke about the treaty of commerce with Canada.

Mr. Faure has been in Canada; therefore he is fully disposed to help us. I would advise you to present yourself at his house in my name. He will see you again at 10 o'clock at his domicile, 26 Rue Cardinet, on Thursday morning."

On the following day, that is, on Wednesday morning, 14th April, 1886, the following letter was addressed to Mr. Foursin-Escande:—

"Sir,—I will have the regret to not see you this morning. I am obliged to leave for the South at 8.45. I will not come back in Paris before about the 20th of May.

"I have seen Mr. de Freycinet and I have spoken to him about the project which you pointed out to me. In his opinion, after having examined the question, it is impossible for France to prepare a treaty of commerce or an agreement as regards Customs with Canada without referring the matter to England, and he hardly thinks it possible that himself or the Minister of Commerce should pledge themselves to an agreement of any value tending to secure to Canada on the part of France the treatment of the most favored nation.

"But it goes without saying that should the Canadian Government, using their own autonomy as regards Customs, reduce the duties on our wines and liquors, the French Government would, by that fact, be pledged to reciprocate by a liberal measure such as that of which we have spoken.

"I hope, Sir, that you will kindly believe that it will always be agreeable to me to follow and to study all questions in the interest of relations between France and Canada. And accept the assurance of my highest esteem.

(Signed) "FERNAND FAURE."

So that, Mr. Speaker, on the 14th of April, 1886, the French Minister declared that should Canada reduce the duties on French wines, with the exception of sparkling wines, as we had promised to do when France had consented to reduce from 40 to 2 francs per ton her duties on our ships, France would immediately be pledged towards us, and pledged to what? Pledged to give us the rights of the most favored nations, that is to say, to give us the benefit of her tariff with all the nations of Europe with the exception of three, which are, I think, Denmark, Holland and Greece, which tariff gives her wealth, while it gives profit to the nations which are trading with her. France would be disposed to grant us these rights, the rights of the most favored nations. The matter is, therefore, in our own hands, thanks to the exertions of the hon. Minister of Finance, thanks to the efforts of our friends in France, thanks to the efforts of Mr. Fabre, and I might add also, thanks to the efforts of the hon. Secretary of State, who, when he went to France, did his utmost to promote our interest in that respect. I am really astonished, Mr. Speaker, when I see in the Cabinet men whom I know to be friendly to commercial relations with France, as well as with every nation in the world—I am astonished, I say, to find that the Government remain stagnant, dumb and inactive. I am surprised to see that this question seems to be a dead question in the opinion of Ministers who pretend to be in favor of protection. What is protection, Mr. Speaker, if it is not intended to diminish as much as possible the price of the goods to the consumer in the country, and to secure an abundant market, a ready market and a paying market for our own products? Now, the more we shall extend our relations, the greater the number of countries trading with us, the more chance we will have to cheapen the price of the goods to the consumer, and the more chance we will have of securing a high price for our goods. Such is the principle of protection of which we are boasting so much and so justly. I have just shown that since 1886, thanks to all the efforts which have been made, our trade with France is entirely within our hands. It may be asked, what are the advantages which may result from a treaty of commerce with France? It seems to me, when it is a question of securing a market of 40,000,000 souls among as intelligent a people as the people of France are, with cities such as Paris, Lyons, Marseilles and others, in a country friendly to England, a country wherein a portion of the population of England spend a part of the year—it seems to me that, on a matter of this kind, it should be considered as almost useless to discuss the expediency of maintaining commercial relations with such a country. The usefulness, Mr. Speaker, would be in the first place for our import and export trade. Allow me to give you a list of a few of the goods which we might export to France with advantage. In the first place we have our lumber of all sorts, our fish and game products, our minerals, such as iron, copper, zinc, platina, mercury, bismuth, manganese, phosphates, gypsum, asbestos. The trade in asbestos might become very profitable. Our friends living in the eastern townships know what an immense quantity of asbestos is to be found there. A manufacture of asbestos is now in operation in Quebec. I may say, by the way, that it is to be regretted that our great railway companies, the Pacific and the Grand Trunk, who have received so many favors from the public, should import their asbestos from foreign countries, and a very inferior quality of asbestos at that, instead of using the Canadian asbestos, which is of a superior quality. Besides, we have here coal, petroleum, marble, slate. We have our manufactured goods of all kinds, divers kinds of leather, boots and shoes, cheese. I believe I have already stated to this House that the cheese manufactured in Canada was exported to the English markets, where the Canadian trade-mark was taken off and the English trade-mark substituted to it, and that after this change had taken place, that cheese was sold in France as an English product. We have also sugar, eggs, poultry, and a number of other goods. There is still our shipping, the vessels which we might build and sell with advantage. We have also the works of our writers which might be exported to France, and which would find there a sufficient demand to procure a source of income to their authors. We have still a number of other things which would be too numerous to mention and which we might very profitably export to France. Let us now examine the import trade. I find in the able report made to the Maritime and Inland Navigation Syndicate of France by Mr. Agostini, who came here to visit the country with a large number of distinguished Frenchmen, last year, a list of the goods which we might principally import with profit. The Government have had the good idea of having this report printed and of causing it to be distributed in this House, and I congratulate them of that fact. The more France and Canada will know their mutual resources the better it will be for all concerned. Here is that list. I am merely summarising it:

"Black and light colored merinos, cloth, crape, haberdashery, silk and velvets, gloves, fancy trimmings, furs, hats and caps, flowers and feathers, umbrellas, canes and whips, hair, perfumery, furniture, musical instruments, clocks and watches, jewellery, bronzes, morocco-leathers, trunks and valises, optical instruments, looking glasses, combs and brushes, china and crystal, smoker's articles, books and stationery, leathers, chemical products, hard and small wares, alimentary products."

This trade between France and England both in importations and exportations, I do not hesitate to say it, and I believe I will be supported in this view by every business man, would before two years amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars, if we could have a treaty with France and be treated by her as the most favored nation. There are also the light wines—these wines which would be so useful to the working class and which are a real food. But it will be said: You will diminish the revenue of the country. Mr. Fabre's reports show the contrary. At present, the revenue which we derive from the 30 per cent. ad valorem on the wines does not amount to $30,000. If we should abolish this duty, 30 per cent ad valorem, leaving the specific duty as it is—the importation of French wines would considerably increase; it would increase ten-fold, a hundred-fold perhaps, and what we would lose on the apparent amount of 30 per cent., we would gain it by the specific tax on the immense quantity of wine which would be imported into the country. More than that, Mr. Speaker, I will now address myself to the advocates of total abstinence, which is an impossibility, as has been shown by experience. Let me tell them: Introduce light wines, the pure French wines into the country, and you will have taken a great step towards temperance.

The use of wine is not bad; the abuse only is pernicious. And it is known that it is impossible to make a frequent abuse of light wines; those who have tried it once seldom repeat the experiment. Therefore, I say: Introduce light wines into the country and you will materially diminish drunkenness, this plague of modern ages, especially in northern climates. I believe, I have shown, in a previous speech, that if we had a commercial treaty with France, we might compete with advantage with the United States on the French market. There is still another side to the question: Supposing that complications would arise between England and other countries, and that on account of a war, or for one reason or another, our vessels would find it impossible to land in England, would it not then be fortunate for us to have the French market in which we could sell our produce? With regard to such a small country as the Island of Cuba, or when it is proposed to establish relations with Spain, no pains are spared, no step, no effort is considered as useless. The British authorities, the Canadian authorities, the diplomatic influences, everything is brought to bear. When France is to be dealt with, everything sinks down to a dead calm. Fine promises are made, but that is the last of it. Why? I do not know. It is probable that the immense amount of business with which the hon. Ministers have had to deal, have prevented them from dealing with this question; but I hope the country will soon be able to congratulate them on a change of their policy on this subject. I wonder also, Mr. Speaker, what objections could be brought against this treaty of commerce with France. Not one has ever been stated. We see all the advantages which may arise from a treaty with a country of 40,000,000 inhabitants. We see the French banks exporting French money and putting it within the reach of every borrower. Take, for instance, the Crédit Foncier Franco-Canadien which was introduced here. In one year only that financial institution has caused the rate of interest to fall in the country places from 8, 9 and 10 per cent., which it was then, to 6, and even to 5 per cent. We know what abundance of money can do. Competition necessarily brings a fall in stocks, and the consumer reaps the benefits. I will now, Mr. Speaker, address myself to the French Ministers, to those who most specially represent the Province of Quebec in the Confederation, and I ask them to forget for a moment the present needs, and to think a little of the future of their countrymen. I do not pretend to say that a commercial treaty with France would benefit the French Canadians exclusively. No; our English fellow-citizens are intelligent, and they would soon find out the advantages they would have in having commercial relations with France, but I say it is easier for the French population to benefit from trade with France than from trade with other countries, on account of the similarity of language. I repeat it. The future ought to be considered more than it is; it should be noticed that in our country all the wealth goes one way and all the poverty goes the other way. We are in an age of declension and of egotism for a part of the country and of the population. Let us see what takes place in the North-West. To what extent are we represented, we, French Canadians, in that country? What are the advantages which are offered to us there? What has been done to induce those of our countrymen who were too far from those regions to go and settle there? What has been done to induce them to take up land? What has been done to direct there a movement of repatriation? Nothing, Mr. Speaker. One day we will find that the whole North-West has been monopolised, and we will have to act the part of servants for half a century before we can become proprietors there. Such is the result of remaining mere spectators while others are toiling on. Mr. Speaker, if the hon. Minister who more especially represents the district of Quebec was at his seat, I would call upon him to look at the city of Quebec, which is struggling in the embrace of agony, that city where the value of pro-

erty is declining, where trade is languishing; I would ask him to look at this great seaport, where so many ships could be seen at one time, and where are now only a few unoccupied tow-boats. Quebec had been promised a ferry boat to connect the Intercolonial Railway with the Pacific. Where is that ferry boat? Elections were carried on the strength of that promise, and that was the last of it. The hope was held out to it that a bridge would be built to put an end to its isolation, and to connect the railways on the southern shore of the river with those on the north shore. When shall we have that bridge? All these schemes have had the same fate as the railway to Cap Rouge. The opinion seems to prevail that political humbug will create the prosperity of a country. I pray, for mercy's sake, the Ministers from the Province of Quebec to keep their eyes open. It is a fine thing to be in power. It is a fine thing to deal with the affairs of the moment, but let us look a little in the future if we wish that hereafter the people may be grateful to us, if we wish to do our duty like statesmen, like diplomatists. I congratulate my English-speaking fellow-citizens on the energy which they constantly display; they act like men. I like that, and I call upon my own countrymen who could do it to put their shoulder to the wheel, and help their countrymen. They know what they can do; let them not sacrifice too much to the transient needs of the moment; let them not be too much absorbed in the present, and let not the future of their country escape their attention. Well, we ask it, in the name of the prosperity of the country, in the name of the future of our nation, we ask them to do their utmost, and strive to obtain a commercial treaty with France. Why should it be refused to us? Why should we not take advantage of the chances which are offered to us? I have said it: The Government have taken so little notice of these great interests that they have not even brought down the papers promised two years ago. France—thanks to the ability of the hon. Minister of Finance, thanks to the work of Mr. Fabre, and of our numerous friends, thanks to the generosity of the Mother Country—France said: I am ready; I will consent to treat you as I treat the most favored nation. The obstacle must come from here. From whom, and why? I do not know, but I simply state the fact, and I deplore it. Well, I call upon our Ministers from the Province of Quebec, and I ask them, for the sake of their honor, for the sake of their reputation, for the welfare of their countrymen, for the prosperity of their countrymen in the present and in the future, to be so kind as to extend the circle of our relations, and to see that the wishes of the Province of Quebec, and the wishes of Canada at large, be satisfied. They can do it. The matter is in their own hands, and it is their imperative duty to act at once. I hope, this time, at least before long, we will have the pleasure to add to the list of the nations with whom we are dealing, one of the countries the most friendly to England: France, that old country, which we love so well.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The Government accept in good part most of the remarks which the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, has made to the House, but I think some portion of his observations is not correct. In a preceding Session, my hon. friend called the attention of the Government to the importance of developing trade with a large nation like France, and to the importance of obtaining a commercial convention or treaty with that important country. So far my hon. friend is right. After we have created a National Policy, after we have developed manufactures in our country to a very great extent, it is but natural, it is but just, and it is necessary for the Government to look outside of our own limits, to find markets for the products of our industry. So far my hon. friend is right. A commercial treaty between a nation of thirty-six millions is necessarily a very desirable thing for a young country like Canada, containing only four millions and a half of population. The hon. gentleman has said that there is every disposition in France to favor such commercial relations. It is true, my hon. friend says, also, that there has been of late years, and especially during the last two years, a certain immigration from France to this country—only a small immigration, I must say, because the French people are not given to immigration; but within the last two years, there has been a certain amount of immigration to this country, and of a very good quality, bringing some capital. My hon. friend has also stated correctly that if the exports from France to Canada, and the exports from Canada to France, have been small, there is no reason to believe that the amount might not easily be increased. I admit that there are a number of articles which could, with advantage to both nations, be interchanged in trade. My hon. friend has said, and I agree with him, that our agent in France, the Hon. Mr. Fabre has been working assiduously to spread throughout France and the continent the good name of Canada. My hon. friend has also spoken in the highest terms of the zeal and energy of the High Commissioner, the present Minister of Finance; and he has stated truly when that hon. gentleman went to France, after the unsuccessful efforts of his predecessors in trying to secure reciprocal trade relations between Canada and France, the High Commissioner had been not only well received, but had met with great encouragement in the pursuit of his object. But, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is not just to the Government; he is certainly misinformed or unjust, when he says that this Government has been so indifferent to this question as to have neglected to bring before the House the papers which had been promised, and not even to have had printed the very interesting report of Mr. Fabre, the Canadian agent in France. These reports have been laid before the House; if they have not been printed it is, perhaps, owing to those gentlemen who take an interest in this question, having neglected to ask the Printing Committee to print those reports. I regret that they have not been printed, because they were of very great interest, not only to the House but to the country. My hon. friend is unjust in saying that the Government has been indifferent to the question of trade between France and Canada. On three successive occasions this Government has sent to France commissioners empowered to negotiate, if possible, a commercial convention with France. On two different occasions that commissioner proceeded to Paris, but, unfortunately, French governments have succeeded each other so rapidly in France—although I do not want to blame those in that country who were favorable to a convention—but I may say that owing, perhaps, to the interruption in the policy of the French government in regard to foreign questions, or in regard to this question of trade with a small country like ours—we must use that expression in comparing the two countries—perhaps, I repeat, it is owing to the interruption in the policy of various French governments that these negotiations have not succeeded. I know that our Government has always been fully alive to the importance of that question. My hon. friend mentioned that this Government was pledged to France either to reduce the duties on wine or abolish them altogether, on condition that France reduced or abolished the duty of 40 francs per ton on Canadian ships entering her ports. It is true these duties have been abolished in France, but he forgot to say that when they abolished the duties, they reduced them on Canadian built vessels from 40 to 2 francs, which is the duty of ships built in England. At the same time the French Government gave such a bounty to their own shipbuilders that the abolition of the duty was scarcely of any advantage to Canadian shipbuilders. I must say that I regret that the papers which were promised in 1855, have not been laid before the House. It was probably due to an oversight of the then Finance Minister, but I do not think that any harm has been done. I am sure that High Commissioner will see that negotiations, if they can be once more reopened, will be prosecuted to a successful result, if that be possible. My hon. friend has presented a very gloomy picture of decadence, of disintegration, of decline of trade and industry in the Province of Quebec, and he has drawn a very gloomy picture of what the future of the North-West would be when we took the North-West in relation to the Province of Quebec, or to the majority of the people of that Province. Let me say here, for the information of my hon. friend as well as for the information of the House, and also for the Province of Quebec, since the hon. gentleman has spoken of the Province of Quebec, is it not more the fault of those who have refused to go or who have not chosen to go and place their energies there, who have refused or neglected to go and settle that great North-West of ours? Is it not more the fault of those who have not thought proper to invest their money in the North-West? They may have been deterred by the first efforts made by foreign capitalists. We know very well that not all the English, Scotch and American capital that has been sent has been successful, and perhaps the comparatively poor Province of Quebec, where capital is not so large, and that portion in whose name my hon. friend was speaking, has not dared to invest capital in the North-West and to undertake there enterprises which would have brought not only capital but French Canadian settlers into that country. After the two expeditions that took place to the North-West, one in 1870 and the other in 1885, we all thought a large proportion of the volunteers going from the Province of Quebec would have selected lands in the North-West and settled there. With the proverbial genius of French Canadians as settlers, with their great energy, their perseverance, their frugality, we all expected a large emigration would go from Quebec to the North-West. My hon. friend perhaps knows that there have been not only obstacles, but impediments and even prohibitions to procuring immigration from the Province of Quebec to the North-West. Those who have placed their veto in opposition to the colonisation of the North-West from the Province of Quebec know better, probably, than I do, or my hon. friend does, the reason why they did it. Perhaps my hon. friend knows, and if he does not I can tell him, that it was stated in a good many parts of Quebec that it would not be correct to depopulate dioceses in that Province even for the North-West. Whether that policy was good or not I am not here to judge; but the fact is, that if French Canadian immigration to the North-West has not been so large as we might have presumed and supposed it would have been, the cause will be found elsewhere than in the action of the Government with respect to the North-West. I have followed the hon. gentleman over this ground which is apart from the main question, which is one of trade relations between France and Canada. Let me tell this House and my hon. friend that the great objection has been this: you cannot have trade relations and consequently develop those trade relations, unless you have means of communication between those two countries. My hon. friend should, therefore, give credit to the Government, because since 1881 a subsidy, I do not call it a very large subsidy but a generous subsidy, has been inserted in the Estimates for the encouragement of a line of steamers between France and Canada. Why, do the importations from France appear to be small? If the direct importations are small, it is due to the fact that there are no means of communication. Why have we no means of communication? Because the line of steamers asked by the French people has not been established, and this has not been through the fault of the Government. Two or three unsuccessful attempts have been made, and I am glad to say, as my hon. friend knows, that this Government has been quite ready to encourage the enterprise; and so far have they gone in that direction that when a gentleman came this year with a view to establish a line of steamers, they assured him not only of the subsidy, but they even granted him additional facilities, all of which goes to show that the Government are disposed to act in the direction suggested by my hon. friend. It is a pleasure to me to state here, that although the negotiations with the firm of Rossière, one of the largest firms of Havre, with the Government have been completed not more than seven or eight weeks, a steamer has already left Havre to come to this country, and, if she has not already arrived, she will arrive in a few days. If trade can be developed by this line of steamers, what will be the consequences? One of the great difficulties in regard to establishing commercial relations was that we did not know what importations from France we required, and what would be acceptable exports from Canada. In order to promote the successful carrying on of the line of steamers, those interested will naturally seek to obtain advantages in the fiscal policy of France for Canadian products, and I am sure if there is the least desire on the part of the French Government to go half way, this Government will not be reluctant to go the other half. I am perfectly sure also that if the establishment of that line of steamers is successful great progress will have been made in the direction of more intimate trade relations between the two countries. I can say to my hon. friend that I have asked the Minister of Finance to give the necessary orders so that the papers asked for may be laid on the Table of the House to-morrow, and steps can then be taken to have them printed for the use of members. I think I have answered the different points put forward by my hon. friend. I am perfectly sure the Government are desirous of securing the same object as he is seeking to attain, that the Government are desirous of extending the trade relations of this country with other countries, and that it is but a natural desire for this Government to seek to have opened a market in a large country for the manufactures of this Dominion. I am sure the Government have no objection to furnish the papers asked by the hon. gentleman, and I am confident that I am not mistaken in my statement in saying that the Government will always be ready to do all in their power to secure those advantages.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In view of the fact that the Minister of Finance has occupied the position of High Commissioner, and therefore is supposed to be specially conversant with the important question raised by my hon. friend who spoke first, I think the hon. Minister ought to give the House some little information on the points raised. There can be no doubt whatever that our trade with France, a country which is connected with a large portion of Canada by so many ties, might naturally have been expected to develop, and no doubt one of the objects for which the High Commissioner was supposed to be made High Commissioner was to promote such trade as that with France. Now, unfortunately during the last few years our trade with France has declined instead of having made an advance. It has been declining both as regards the imports and exports. Some years ago it was larger by many hundreds of thousands of dollars than it is to-day. I had supposed from the statements made by the hon. gentleman's predecessor on many occasions in this House that something substantial might have resulted if not with Spain at all events with France; and notwithstanding all that has been said by the Secretary of State, there does not appear to have been any exertions made, to say the least of it, or any such exertions made as were of the slightest avail. No doubt the hon. gentleman was anxious to accomplish this object; but on looking over our trade returns, it appears that both our imports and exports with France were greater fourteen years ago than they are to-day. I see that at various periods at intervals they have attained in the case of exports $300,000 or $400,000 more than to day, and in regard to imports about the same amount; and it certainly appears to me that we have been unfortunate in our efforts to develop trade relations with France, when I find that the trade in both directions is diminishing and not increasing. I think the hon. gentleman did well to call the attention of the House to the fact, but I think, Sir, that the results which have been displayed do not afford any very great encouragement in hoping that the policy of the Government will be very successful in developing trade with France. I cannot but feel that in a country where a million of people are of French origin this is a trade which does afford considerable chance for expansion, but I am sorry the Government have not taken any great amount of interest in endeavoring to develop it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not feel it necessary to occupy the time of the House, after the very full statement made by my hon. colleague the Secretary of State. I quite agree, however, in the statement just made, that we are indebted to the hon. gentleman who introduced this subject to the House, for drawing the attention of the House to it. The Government have not been insensible to the importance of extending our trade with France. I took an opportunity recently to point out to the House how anxious we were to extend our trade in every direction. I may say, however, that circumstances arose which tend to the conclusion that it was desirable to terminate if possible the making of arrangements with Spain, before again resuming definitely the negotiations with France, and for another reason, and that was that we were of opinion that the establishment of a line of steamers between France and Canada would greatly promote and facilitate our efforts in the direction of extending our trade with France. The House knows that it has not been for any lack of effort on the part of this Government that that line of steamers has not been put in operation before. Such a subsidy as the House was led to believe would be sufficient for that purpose was cheerfully voted by the House, and efforts have been made, from time to time, to secure the establishment of a line of steam communication. Even quite recently the Government were very glad to avail themselves of the opportunity of entering into arrangements with a very strong firm of gentlemen in France, who were prepared at once, in case the Government accepted their proposals, to put this line of steamers upon the route; and, as my hon. colleague the Secretary of State has stated, the first steamer has already sailed, and I have every reason to believe that we shall have now a very efficient line of steam communication established between France and this country. I feel sure that that will greatly facilitate our efforts to extend our commercial arrangements, and improve the fiscal arrangements which exist between France and this country. I do not think that at this moment it is necessary to say more than that the subject has not been lost sight of, that it will continue to engage the careful attention of the Government, and that I am able to say from personal communication that I believe the Government of France will be found well disposed, at the proper moment, to take up the subject with a view of seeing how trade can be promoted between France and Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I cannot see how it is that the Government on the Treasury benches should express such extraordinary anxiety to increase the trade with France, or with any other country, when, according to the rule they have laid down for ten years past, the perfection of wisdom is to build up home industry and make this country self-sustaining. The hon. gentleman and his leader told us that this country was ruined by its foreign trade and its dependence upon foreign countries as a market for the products of the people. We were told that we were to have a home market for everything that our agriculturists had to sell, for everything that this country could produce. In fact every farm was to be converted into a kind of kitchen garden, by which the income of the agricultural population was to be increased four or five fold. Then there were millions of capital abroad awaiting investment in this country. We were, instead of sending everything thousands of miles away, to have a market at home; the articles which we were receiving in exchange for our own products were to be produced in this country; every village was to be converted into a town, every town into a city, and every hamlet into a village. There were to be manufacturing establishments in the sight of every farmer in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific. That being the case, what do hon. gentlemen want with foreign trade? If they are anxious for foreign trade, why do they erect such high barriers to serve as impediments to that trade? Since we have met this Session, we have had the taxes on a great many articles more than doubled, and yet the hon. gentleman in the face of his tariff, in the face of his policy, in the face of the declarations made to the people of this country, year after year for the past ten years, still professes now to be in favor of extending the foreign commerce of this country.

Mr. RINFRET. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I only learned this evening that this debate would take place on our commercial intercourse with France, therefore I am not prepared to address the House on this question. However, I feel it my duty not to allow a few of the statements of the hon. Secretary of State to pass unchallenged. I have not been surprised to hear the hon. Secretary of State acknowledge the importance of our commercial relations with France. It is not the first time the Government pronounce in favor of the adoption of a commercial treaty with the Mother Country, but, unfortunately, they never carry out their admissions, and they limit themselves to making vain promises. The hon. Secretary of State has ascribed to a hostile feeling, on the part of the French Government, the total absence of any commercial relations with France. That may be a cause, but I believe that the true cause exists in the fiscal policy of the Government. For nine years back the National Policy has been established, and it is painful to find that we have not yet succeeded in securing one foreign market, by means of commercial treaties, for the exportation of our produce. As far as I am concerned, I am not surprised of that, because I have never believed in the sincerity of the Government with regard to the establishment of commercial relations with foreign countries. Indeed, Sir, the policy of the Government has been to this day a policy of commercial restriction. The Government have never done anything to extend our commercial relations. The National Policy which was to result in giving us a national market for the sale of our produce, has had no such effect at all, and I am sorry to state that we have succeeded still less in securing a foreign market for the exportation of our manufactured goods. When the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) made his speech in answer to the Budget speech of the Minister of Finance, he perfectly proved that the exportation of our manufactured goods, not only had not increased, but had even decreased to a large extent for a few years back. I am sorry to find that all that has been done until now by the hon. Minister of Finance as High Commissioner for Canada has had no result whatever. The question of our commercial relations with France, Spain and the United States, has often been raised, but until now nothing has been done, although each year the Government has admitted the great importance of these relations. The hon. Secretary of State has been pleased to recall to our minds the name of Mr. Fabre and he has spoken of that gentleman's efforts in the direction of French immigration in Canada. He said that Mr. Fabre is a very good officer, and that the only reason why the French do not immigrate to Canada is that the French are not a population of emigrants. There may be some truth in that. But if there is one thing which has been clearly proved at different times in this House, it is that Mr. Fabre's efforts as emigration agent in France have always been absolutely ineffective. It has repeatedly been proved that this man has only been appointed to that office in order to reward him for his political services and for his treason. It will be remembered that this man had been appointed a Senator by the liberal party, and it was evidently on account of promises of that kind that Mr. Fabre changed his political colors. His appointment was made in order to reward his services in favor of the Conservative party, and not to reward his services to his country. The hon. Secretary of State has also referred to the exportation of our vessels to France. This is still another of the promises which had been made by the Conservative party in 1878. It had been promised that shipbuilding would flourish at Quebec under the new policy adopted by the Government. In 1878, it is true that shipbuilding at Quebec had decreased, but to-day this industry does not exist at all. There is not one dock-yard left in St. Roch or St. Sauveur, who were the great shipbuilding places in the country. And if we examine the statements of trade and navigation we find that, not only in Quebec, but also in the Maritime Provinces, there is a large decrease in the shipbuilding industry. And why? Evidently because the Government make no effort whatever to insure the exportation of our ships in foreign countries. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the true cause of the want of success with which we have met until now in the exportation of our produce abroad, lies in the indifference of the Government towards the adoption of commercial treaties; and if the hon. Secretary of State had chosen to speak frankly, he would have admitted that the cause of the evil lies in the policy of the Government itself, which policy is to restrict our trade, instead of extending it by all possible means.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Intercolonial Railway—Rolling Stock$318,000

Mr. JONES. Will the hon. Minister of Finance tell us for what purpose this is to be expended?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is to provide for three sleeping cars for the English mail passenger service at $15,000 each, $45,000; 10 locomotives at $3,000 each, $90,000; 200 20-ton coal cars at $550 each, $110,000; 100 box cars at $600 each, $60,000; to provide for fitting up 200 freight cars with the Westinghouse brake, $13,000; total, $318,000. These are necessary for the increased through, coal, and other traffic, and with the view of greater safety in conducting the traffic.

Mr. JONES. Will the coal cars be sufficient to accommodate the increased traffic from Pictou?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman will remember that on a previous occasion I drew his attention to a complaint made by the Pictou colliers of not having sufficient rolling stock to enable them to get their coal to market, which caused them to lose a large portion of the business done at Halifax. I understand that has been remedied.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Does the hon. gentleman propose to retain the same rate of freight for coal from Pictou to Halifax that has been charged heretofore?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so.

Mr. JONES. On what principle does the railway charge 18 cents for about 90 miles from Pictou to Halifax, while at the same time it carries coal for $2 from Springhill to Montreal at a loss?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The question of the short and long haul.

Mr. JONES. But the hon. gentleman will observe by his own report that there is an actual loss on carrying coal that distance. Does he think it fair to the colliers at Cape Breton, as well as to the taxpayers elsewhere, to carry coal at that rate and to maintain the high rate for carrying it from Pictou to Halifax, whereby the people in Halifax who consume coal have to pay a correspondingly higher price for it. I am glad to see that the Government propose to have Pullman cars put on the trains for the accommodation of passengers from Rimouski. Last year that was a matter very much complained of. Perhaps in this connection I might ask the hon. Minister of Railways whether it is not possible to travel at a higher rate of speed over the Intercolonial Railway than at present prevails. It takes 40 hours to travel from Halifax to Montreal, which in either hot or cold weather is very wearisome. It appears to me that the speed might, with very little additional expense, be increased to such an extent that the run from Halifax to Montreal, and vice versa, would be made in something like 30 hours. Many people from New Brunswick prefer to go to Montreal by way of Boston, to taking the long route from St. John and Halifax to Montreal over the Intercolonial. I think this is a very important matter just at this time. The roads in the United States now travel at a very high rate of speed, and I cannot imagine what can prevent the Government railway, with all the facilities at its disposal, with a good track and very few stoppages, from travelling at a faster rate than something over 20 miles an hour.

Mr. POPE. I can only state to the hon. gentlemen that it is our desire to make as fast time as we can; but we have been prevented from doing so for several reasons. For instance, we have to make a great many stops, and there is pressure brought upon us all the time to make more stops. It is our desire to make as fast time as possible, consistent with giving reasonable accommodation to the people living along the line.

Mr. JONES. I would ask the hon. gentleman if there is any railway on the continent of the same length on which so few stoppages are made as on the Intercolonial Railway between Halifax and Montreal. I doubt it very much.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman must know that on almost every railway there are special fast trains which make very few stoppages. The Grand Trunk, between this city and Montreal, makes no stops at all. We are unable to do the same thing on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. WELDON. One great objection to passengers going to St. John by the Intercolonial Railway, is the detention at Moncton for three or four hours, waiting for the train from Halifax. There was some talk of having the Halifax train run through, and another train to follow, meeting the train from Quebec and then going on.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman must see that on a road situated as the Intercolonial Railway is, with not a very heavy passenger business, we cannot put on trains enough to avoid making these stops. Passengers on the Grand Trunk are delayed two hours at Richmond.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to ask if the Minister of Finance is able to inform us what is the total amount that has been charged to capital account for rolling stock since 1878?

Mr. JONES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have a statement of the entire amount charged from 1873-74 down to the present time. The amount expended for additional new rolling stock in 1873-74 was $3,099,45; in 1875-6 $1,960.45. In 1877-88, it was $125,245.52; in 1878-79, nothing; in 1879-80, nothing; in 1810-81, nothing; in 1881-82, $205,005.20; in 1882-83, $628,244.39; in 1883-84, $586,286.84; in 1884-85, $287,213.97; in 1885-86, $221,025.63. Total $2,129,073.45.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman tell me where I can find in the reports any full statement of the amount of rolling stock belonging to the Intercolonial Railway in 1878?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will lay a statement of that on the Table to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman also lay on the Table a statement of the present amount of rolling stock?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I will bring that down to-morrow.

Mr. WELDON. Is it the intention of the Government to extend the station of St. John by taking more ground?

Mr. POPE. We have been making some enquiry, and had an estimate made of the cost of some property which we thought was very high.

Mr. ELLIS. What is the position of the Carleton Branch. When the Government engineer was in St. John, some months ago, he met a committee of the citizens, composed of members of the Board of Trade and others, and one of the requests the committee made was that the Government should run a train over the branch. Is the branch in such a condition that a train can be run over it?

Mr. POPE. I have not seen anything of that requisition, neither have I considered the question. I will see if we have any correspondence on that subject.

Mr. ELLIS. Is the branch still in the possession of the Government?

Mr. POPE. At present the New Brunswick Railway is running it.

Mr. JONES. I notice an increase in the working expenses of the road from $73,273 to $94,756, an increase of $16,482 over the previous year. Will the hon. gentleman say how that increase was caused?

Mr. POPE. That includes all the working expenses. In the first place we have expended in a new station over $100,000, we have also had a great deal more through freight and more freight going to Montreal.

Mr. JONES. At a loss?

Mr. POPE. I explained before that freight did not pay exactly, but it added to the working expenses.

Mr. WELDON. The value of the stores at Moncton is $719,000. That seems to be a large amount where stores can be procured in so short a time.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman must refer to new rails.

Mr. WELDON—

Ordinary stores, including fuel.....	$293,765 24
Iron and steel rails and fastenings.....	152,333 97
Second-hand material, serviceable.....	58,796 00
Old material for sale.....	214,762 67
	$719,660 88

Mr. MILLS. If there is not that amount on hand—

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman is speaking of something else. We have not sold our old rails for the reason that they are low and are likely to rise.

Mr. JONES. You can put the duty and make them as high as you like. About the stores question, I moved in the Committee of Public Accounts for a detailed statement of every account, and it was brought down all right, and to that extent was satisfactory. But there is just this about it, that there is no check outside of the Department such as applies to other Departments. That is to say, in some of these Departments there is an inspector who goes over these accounts and certifies to their correctness. I do not mean to say that they are not correct, but it appears to me it would be more satisfactory for the head of the Department to have these accounts certified every year by some properly authorised person outside the Department. In that way, when these accounts are brought down, their value would be more fairly arrived at.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can give the hon. gentleman a statement of the rolling stock which I think will meet the case. I will give him the statement of the rolling stock purchased on capital account up to the 30th June, 1886. On 30th June, 1876 there were 100 locomotives. There were since added, at the cost of capital, 64, making 164 now. There was one official car in June, 1886. None has been added since.

Mr. JONES. Is that the Brydges car or the Government car?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the Brydges car, or one that has taken the place of it. There was one paymaster's car then, and one has been added. Of first-class passenger cars, there were forty-six in 1876, and twenty-three have been added, making sixty-nine now. There were no second class cars; seventy-six have been added. There were no first-class sleeping cars in 1876; there are now ten. There were no baggage express cars then; there are forty-six baggage express cars now. There were no box cars then; there are 1,457 box cars now. There were no cattle cars then, there are 72 cattle cars now. There were 1,028 platform cars then; 414 have been added, making 1,442 now. There were four conductors' vans then, 79 have been added, making 83 conductors' vans now. There were 900 five-ton hopper coal cars then; there are 595 now. That is a decrease, because they have been converted into other descriptions of cars. There were no fifteen-ton coal cars then; there are 125 now. There were no twenty-ton coal cars then; there are 1,092 now. There were no ten-ton coal cars then; there are 18 now. That accounts for the decrease, because there has been a change from the five-ton hopper cars to the fifteen-ton and ten-ton cars, the five-ton cars not being found suitable. There were 900 five-ton hopper cars; now there are 595 five-ton hopper cars, 18 ten-ton flats, and 123 fifteen-ton gondolas, which are of equal capacity to the original 900 five-ton hoppers. I think that is the statement the hon. gentleman wanted.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman will tell us how it is that the consumption of fuel costs nearly twice as much on the main line of the Intercolonial Railway per mile to run a locomotive as it does on the Prince Edward Island Railway. One would naturally think that on the main line, where coal can be obtained with greater facility than in Prince Edward Island, it would cost less, but the reports of the hon. gentleman show that it costs very much more. There is something there that requires explanation.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). I find that the expense of fuel per mile is $6.20 on the Intercolonial Railway, while on the Prince Edward Island Railway it is $3.80.

Mr. JONES. I would ask whether the rolling stock to which the hon. gentleman referred is all in good order? I have understood that a great deal of it is not in good running order.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is always the case.

Mr. JONES. But I understand there is a very large proportion. I would also ask if, when the Intercolonial Railway cars arrive at Point Lévis, they are discharged and loaded into the Grand Trunk.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No. They were, but not now.

Mr. JONES. I asked the question because I was informed that such was the case. At times, as the hon. gentleman is aware, there has been a great scarcity of cars in Halifax, and all along the line, and I have been informed on several occasions, on very good authority, by people connected with the line, that it arose largely from the fact that the refineries in Montreal in the winter season had these cars loaded and made storehouses of them, and only discharged them as they used the sugar, and so kept a large number of the Intercolonial Railway cars in Montreal. That was the excuse which was given very frequently by people connected with the railway in Halifax, when steamers arrived there, and they had not enough cars to take the freight.

Mr. POPE. I do not exactly understand the hon. gentleman. Do I understand him to say that the cars are detained at Lévis?

Mr. JONES. No, at Montreal. Can the Minister give any explanation of that?

Mr. POPE. They have been delayed there at times, and we have been always troubled by not getting our cars back. At one time, we insisted on getting the transshipment made at the junction, because we could not get the cars back, but we found that that was very troublesome to shippers. We had some complaint last year about it, but, as a rule, they did much better last year than before.

Mr. JONES. But the Minister will see that they have it in their own power. They need not make any arrangement with the refiners in Montreal. When a car arrives at the end of the line, they have to discharge it in a certain time, or to pay—and very properly so—a certain amount of expense for it, whereas in Montreal it has been the habit—not an exceptional case—every winter when the sugars are landed at Halifax for the Intercolonial Railroad cars, as I am informed on good authority, to be used as warehouses for the refineries in Montreal. The result is that other parties having business to do with the Intercolonial Railway along the line are prevented from getting cars.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman will see that we have no charge of these cars in Montreal when they are handed over to the Grand Trunk. We cannot control them on the Grand Trunk, and that is why at one time we refused to allow them to go to Montreal and made them transship at the junction. I am aware that there has been some delay, but exactly the same complaint is made in Halifax, that the cars are occupied as storehouses.

Mr. JONES. I have no doubt that, on certain occasions, merchants may want their cars detained, but I know that, as a rule, the cars are not detained in Halifax, and that they are not allowed to be detained. It appears to me there should be some arrangements made whereby the authorities of the Intercolonial Railway can have control of their own cars.

Mr. POPE. They cannot.

Mr. MILLS. Flies on the wheel.

Mr. JONES. Has this been represented to the Grand Trunk? Are they parties to it?

Mr. POPE. Of course they are hauling our cars.

Mr. JONES. When the Grand Trunk cars come to Halifax, why do you compel the merchants to take their goods from the Grand Trunk cars?

Mr. POPE. Because they are in our keeping.

Mr. JONES. But you are doing just the reverse of what the Grand Trunk people are doing in Montreal with your cars. I only say that to point out to the hon. gentleman that they have the remedy in their own hands, and the Government, I assume, dealing with a large corporation like the Grand Trunk, naturally should exercise sufficient control over them to insist that the cars were properly discharged. I know that has been a difficulty for years with the Intercolonial Railway, and I hope the hon. gentleman now will take the matter up and make a more vigorous effort than he appears to have done up to this time, to bring about a remedy.

Mr. POPE. I have made every effort that I could, both in Montreal and at Halifax. I can say that at Halifax, as well as at Montreal, the cars have been charged, but we have had very hard work in many cases to collect anything.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The answer to the statement made by the hon. member for Bothwell, I think, is that on the Intercolonial Railway the locomotives and trains are four or five times as heavy, and of course the consumption of coal per mile for haulage would necessarily be much larger than on the Prince Edward Island Railway, where small locomotives and small trains are used.

Mr. McMULLEN. The Minister of Finance dropped a remark that I would like to understand. In giving the number of cars that are now on the Intercolonial Railway, replying to a question whether those cars were in good running condition, the hon. gentleman said a number of them were pretty well worn out, and the Minister of Finance acquiesced in that statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I did not.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would like to know whether those cars which are worn out have been charged to working expenses—for we are charging all the time new stock to capital account.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. The hon. member for Halifax said he understood that many of those cars were in a very imperfect condition and much out of repair. I said: That is always the case, that you cannot have a great line of railway like the Intercolonial Railway without having always a large number of cars out of repair. But I did not say that they were not kept in good repair, and that the rolling stock was not kept in good repair; I said that necessarily you must always have a large amount of rolling stock that requires to be repaired.

Mr. McMULLEN. Could the Minister of Railways give us an idea about what proportion of the rolling stock is now out of repair, and not in condition to be used?

Mr. POPE. I can tell the hon. gentleman that there is a larger proportion now out of repair than I ever knew before at this time of the year. The proportion is larger in engines than in cars, and the reason is that the past winter was an exceptionally severe one, and we had to put on a heavy engine force to keep the road open, which strained the engines to the utmost. They were injured a great deal, and the most of them must be repaired. In many cases we had to put on five men to shovel snow out of this road, one above the other on the snow bank, and when there was such an enormous quantity of snow, we had to force the engines all they could stand, and there are many more than usual out of repair.

Mr. POPE.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Are these repaired in the machine shop at Moncton? Have you not reduced the number of men working there considerably?

Mr. POPE. No.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). Were not a good many hands turned off last year?

Mr. POPE. It is often the case, that at certain times of the year we have a larger force than at other times. We have a larger force just now than we have had for a long time.

Mr. MILLS. Before the 22nd February?

Mr. McMULLEN. I wish to ask if, when these repairs are made, they are charged to working expenses?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. McMULLEN. We are now near the close of a working year of the Intercolonial Railway, which expires on the 30th of this month. Now, the Minister of Finance admits that there is a larger proportion of the rolling stock out of order at the present moment than there has been in previous years. What estimation does he make of the expense necessary to put that stock in good working order, to be charged to working expenses, for the current year? Has he made an estimate of what it will take?

Mr. POPE. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Surely the hon. gentleman does not suppose that anybody should attempt to keep the accounts of a railway in that way—to charge to one year what will be the estimated expense of another year. Why, Sir, Parliament would lose all means of ascertaining the financial condition of the road if the Minister was allowed, instead of making up the actual account, to make estimated accounts, and the House would have no means of getting any accurate information. It would be a most dangerous system to adopt. The system, of course, is to charge the actual outlay each year to the year in which it occurred. It cannot be done in any other way, and that is the mode in which public accounts require to be kept.

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite understand the Minister of Finance. I can easily see that from year to year a very large amount of rolling stock may be kept in quite an unworkable condition, and be left over simply because it is not desirable to swell the account for working expenses. It is left over from year to year, and may possibly accumulate to a large extent. Now, if the principle is followed out, which the Minister of Finance has stated, we may find in the course of a few years a very large number of the cars and rolling stock of the Intercolonial Railway in a very unworkable condition. You have got each year to charge to that year a certain percentage for working expenses in connection with wear and tear. I know it is done on other lines. I have had some experience in connection with railways, and I am satisfied that it is the custom to estimate the probable cost of working expenses and repairs during the year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is always estimated, but you do not put it in the accounts.

Mr. McMULLEN. In making up the accounts you have got to estimate what amount it is necessary to charge to working expenses, and to put the rolling stock into the same condition that it was when you commenced.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I saw a statement made the other day in some newspaper, as to which I certainly will not pledge myself, but as to which I should like to have some information from the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Finance. It was to the effect that on the occasion of the recent adjournment of the House, the Minister gave free passes to gentlemen who have dis-Played a discriminating support of the Government, but not to other members of this House. Is that the case?

Mr. POPE. I heard the same thing myself. The fact is that I gave a free pass to all who came for it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated on the floor of the House that every gentleman on that side who applied would receive exactly the same as members on this side.

Mr. JONES. Doubtless; but did the hon. gentleman expect the members of the House to go to the Government and ask for railway passes over the road?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. After they had their travelling fees, that would take them down and back eight or ten times? My travelling fees would take me down and back from four to ten times. I, for one, should have felt that I was putting myself in a false position if I had approached the Government to give me a railway pass under those circumstances. I think the system of railway passes is abused very much, and we heard a good deal about it in olden times. A few years ago under the Mackenzie Administration, Mr. Brydges had a car in which he travelled over the Intercolonial Railway, and the organs of the present Government never ceased attacking the Administration of that day for allowing Mr. Brydges the use of a car. I do not mean to say that they were right, but the present Administration have their cars going backwards and forwards for members of the Government, and friends of the Government, and officers connected with the road, and I do not find fault with it. Our course, however, with respect to that matter, has been in very marked contrast with that pursued by the organs of hon. gentlemen opposite when we were in power.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not agree with the hon. gentleman at all. I say the House found it convenient, at the request of a very large majority of the members, to adjourn the public business for a week, and that enabled hon. gentlemen who lived in Ontario and Quebec, the great proportion of members of this House, at very little inconvenience to themselves, to be able to visit their families; and it was under those circumstances, an effort was made on the part of the Minister of Railways to give the same advantage to hon. members, without regard to their political complexions, as was possessed by the greater portion of members of this House from Ontario and Quebec.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think the hon. gentleman will find any sympathy among the hon. gentlemen opposite in attacking the Government for giving what I feel was only just consideration to members for the Maritime Provinces, who were, so far as we could do it, placed in the same position as hon. gentlemen who live in the larger Provinces. But I may tell the hon. gentleman if he wishes to censure any person in regard to this matter, he had better deal with his hon. friend the member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), who claimed on the floor of this House the same consideration for hon. gentlemen opposite as was given hon. members on this side of the House, and very rightly and properly so; and he claimed that every hon. gentleman should be treated alike. No other disposition was manifested in regard to this matter, and the most public means were taken for placing every hon. gentleman on exactly the same position in regard to this matter.

Mr. FREEMAN. It would be very interesting to myself and I am sure to many hon. members, if we could ascertain distinctly of what hon. gentlemen opposite are complaining. I listened to the question that was asked in the House the other day, respecting passes on the Intercolonial Railway, and the reply of the Minister was that all members would be treated alike. I certainly thought that would be satisfactory. However, hon. gentlemen opposite, it appears, are not satisfied with it. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), says he would not ask for a pass on the Intercolonial Railway, and it strikes me that he might feel it derogatory to his honor and ability to do so. No one could find fault with that; if he thought proper not to ask for a pass, let him pay for his ticket; but I do not see any reason in that why hon. members should not accept a pass if they could get one. All the members may not be so wealthy as the hon. gentleman, and if they chose to accept a pass, and if the Government were willing to grant it, fault should not be found with them. We would like to have in clearly distinct terms, as to what hon. gentlemen opposite are attacking the Government for, what the Government has done of which they complain, and let us hear it and in clear, plain common sense language? Let us have this instead of this beating about the bush, for I utterly fail to see what the Mackenzie Government has to do with passes given a few weeks ago. If the Mackenzie Government did not give passes, well and good; we have no fault to find with them on that account. If there is any fault to be found with the Government, let us hear it in clear and distinct terms, so that we can understand the complaint, for the subject of the Intercolonial Railway has occupied much of the time of this House, and I have not been able to see what the trouble is about. I have not heard that there was any attack made on the Government or that they had acted improperly in regard to this railway. It has been said that charges have been placed under improper accounts, and what should have been charged to running expenses has been charged to capital. I do not know that that is a very grave offence; but let hon. gentlemen opposite make out of it what they can. The Intercolonial Railway belongs to the people, and if it is run in the interest of the people, they do not suffer by it. The people of Nova Scotia have a large interest in that road, and if hon. members for the Upper Provinces feel dissatisfied and think we have too much advantage in allowances made on rates, I think any such complaint is a very unreasonable one. It would be well if we could understand distinctly what the trouble is in respect of the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. JONES. In answer to the Minister of Finance I would just say this, that the complaint I made was, that when the Government made up their mind to give passes to members from the Maritime Provinces or elsewhere, they should have announced it or sent circulars or sent the passes to members. It was only when it was discovered subsequently, after many members had procured their tickets and after the question was raised in the House by the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), that the Government then stated that all who applied for passes should have them. But I for one, when I made up my mind to go to Nova Scotia, never for one moment thought it would be becoming to go to the Government and ask them to give me a pass, and it was not until I had purchased my ticket I heard that other hon. gentlemen supporting the Government had had passes given to them. So I say, that if all the members are to be treated alike, passes should have been sent to them, so that they might all have been placed in the same position. That is the only ground I take.

Mr. WELDON (St. John). The course adopted by the Minister of Railways in 1881, when the House adjourned from Christmas to 11th January, was that passes were sent with the compliments of the Minister, to every member from the Lower Provinces.

Mr. POPE. When was that?

Mr. WELDON (St. John). In 1881 when we met in December and adjourned for a fortnight till 11th January. In that case the passes were sent by the Minister of Railways to the different members from the Lower Provinces. There are many more special cars travelling over the Intercolonial now than then; but when Mr. Brydges was taken all through Nova Scotia in his car, it was said that he was going round like an eastern potentate, and this was made one of the great causes of complaint against the Mackenzie Government at that date.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the Minister of Railways ought not to treat this matter as a mere matter of patronage belonging to the Administration or to his Department. If it is right and proper to issue passes along the Intercolonial, the fact ought to be known; and they ought to be issued to all members in that section of the Province without reference to their party proclivities. But that is not what the hon. gentleman did. Hon. gentlemen supporting the party sitting on this side of the House, and living along the line of the Intercolonial Railway, knew nothing of the intention of the Government to issue passes in that way. Now, I think that the hon. gentleman has not justified the course of the Administration at all, in stating that my hon. friend from Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) was to blame, if anybody was to blame. That hon. gentleman complained here on account of the manner in which the hon. gentleman proceeded. The Government treated the railway as though it were the private property of the Administration, as though it were a portion of their special possessions, as if they had a right to deal with it as a matter of party patronage. If the Government choose to charge full fare or half fare, or if they choose to issue tickets to hon. gentlemen who desire to return home during the vacation, so long as it was known that these tickets were issued without application on the part of the members, then there would have been nothing to complain of, except the question of public policy. But, as it is, I think the hon. gentleman's course is highly censurable.

Mr. POPE. It was quite impossible that we should know who were going. Was I to send a messenger to everybody with a ticket? More than that, I may say to the hon. gentleman that I was of opinion that a half fare ticket was quite enough to grant to hon. gentl. men on both sides of the House, because the pressure came from both sides of the House for free passes. Upon consideration I said to Mr. Schreiber that he should give free passes to all members who would come to him, and I believe that everyone who came to him got free passes. I can understand that the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), with that extreme modesty which he displays on all occasions, would not take a pass, but they were not all like him; a great many of them would take passes and say: "Thank you, sir."

Mr. DAVIES (Queen's, P.E.I.) I understand that the hon. gentleman intimated that I was to blame.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, no; the hon. gentleman is quite misinformed, for I said nothing of the kind. I said that if the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) had to blame any person, he had better settle the matter with his friends on that side of the House, who had claimed that it was quite right that passes should be given alike to both sides.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I want to put myself right in the matter, not because I had any personal interest in it for I was not going home myself. But I understood from some of my friends on this side that they had to purchase tickets to go home and return during the recess, while some other members from the same Province, but of different politics, had passes presented to them by the Minister of Railways. I submitted that that was a gross injustice. I take the ground which has been taken by my hon. friend to the left (Mr. Mills) that the railway is no more the private property of the Minister of Railways than it is mine; that he has no more right to give passes over it than I had, except to somebody travelling for railway purposes. I am opposed to the whole system of passes, but I thought that if some members living in a far off part of the Dominion were to get passes during the recess, then the same rule should apply to all. I say that if the rule was once laid down that they were to get passes, the Minister should either have informed them by a clerk or sent the passes with his compliments. It is not a very nice thing that a man should have to go down to the Department with his hat in his hand and ask as a favor what should have been his right, and I for one would rather have done without a pass than to have done that. I repeat that I only spoke on behalf of those on this side who told me they had not been treated like members on the other side.

Mr. WELDON (St. John).

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I am one of those who applied to the Minister of Railways and who got a pass. I may state that I met the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and in conversation with him he mentioned the fact that members supporting the Government had had special favors in getting passes which enabled them to go home. I told the hon. gentleman in reply that I believed that they had no more favors than would be extended to members on that side if they asked for them. I assured him that if he had asked the Minister of Railways he would have got a pass, just the same as members supporting the Government got them, and as I got mine. I may say that I did ask for mine and that I went to the Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that this discussion shows that it is not a desirable relation for members of this House to be put in by members of the Government, whom they are opposing and criticising, possibly every night, to have to go to the Minister of Railways and ask him for a matter, which he evidently considers, to some extent, as a matter of favor. I think it is not in accordance with the dignity of the House that that relation should be established. I think my hon. friends here are quite right in saying that if it be considered proper—and I am not going to stand on a small matter of that kind; I do not suppose the granting of a pass is going to influence any of my friends behind me—but I do not think either the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Finance will deny the proposition, that for members on this side to go and ask for such favors from the hon. gentleman is not a right relation to exist between members of this House and members of the Government, on either side, but especially members of the Opposition. I think the proper way would have been for the Minister to have sent a circular indiscriminately, and then hon. members could have taken the passes or not, as they liked.

Mr. POPE. I may say that I did not ask anyone to come to me to get a pass, nor did anyone come. It happened at the time that I was unwell, and they went to the chief engineer who gives these passes.

Mr. JONES. After you told him.

Mr. POPE. Yes, I did tell him to give passes to members who came; they did not have to come to me, and so far as my friends on this side are concerned, they were granted passes, because I did not suppose for a moment that they could be bought, and I don't think that hon. gentlemen opposite need be afraid of their friends in that respect. I do not believe they are to be bought by granting them a railway pass; I never believed it. But why are my hon. friends so modest about these passes? Have they not the same right to come to me, as they have about thousands of other things—because they want something? What is there about this matter of granting a pass which makes it differ so much from other things that they ask me about?

As I said before, it was very late before I thought it was necessary to issue free passes; I thought half-fares would be sufficient, and consequently I had no time then to do more than was done by the Minister of Finance—that is, to announce to the House that anybody could have these passes by asking for them.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) There is a very broad distinction between the cases which the hon. gentleman puts. When a member of Parliament asks him, at his Department, about a public matter, or asks him in the House, he is only doing part of his duty as a member, but the hon. gentleman knows that, unless members on this side were informed, by circular, that it was the intention to grant passes, none of them would choose to go down to his Department to ask for them. He seems to think, also, that while it would be undignified to ask him, it would be dignified to ask his clerk.

Mr. McDOUGALL (Cape Breton). I may say that I was informed, on the way home, by some friends of the Government, that the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Eisenhauer), who is not a supporter of the Government, had a pass.

Servis' tie plates $12,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are these Servis' tie plates.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are patent arrangements intended to promote the life of the sleeper. This patent having been tried for a considerable time, under the observation of the engineering department at Moncton, it was decided to try it on a larger scale for the purpose of ascertaining its value more fully.

Mr. JONES. Where are they manufactured?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At New Glasgow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the difference between the cost of these plates and those in ordinary use?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There are none in ordinary use. This is a patented invention to be put between the sleeper and the rail.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was a tie plate in use before?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, that is a chair.

Mr. JONES. Is it an American or an English patent?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. An American patent.

Cape Breton Railway..... $300,000

Mr. GUAY. I am surprised to see that the Government has not thought proper to place an amount in the estimates this year for settling the land claims and damages resulting from the construction of the St. Charles Railway Branch. I am informed that there are a great many of the land claims and damages which are not yet settled, although that branch has been built for several years, and many interested parties have been making great exertions to have their claims and damages settled. During the last electoral campaign sweeter promises than usual were made that all these claims would be settled before the end of the election; but from letters that I have received since, and from what I saw during the election, I come to the conclusion that if any of those claims were settled, they were those of the political friends of my opponent. I hope the hon. Minister of Railways will take the matter into his serious consideration, and give equal justice to all interested parties.

Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency). I wish to make a few remarks in corroboration of the statement made by my hon. friend the member for Lévis. I have been charged, as a lawyer, with a number of the claims of certain farmers living near St. Joseph of Lévis, whose lands were expropriated by the Government four or five years ago, and who have not yet been paid one cent for them. I have repeatedly sought to get their cases investigated, but I never could succeed. Yet, at the same time that I was refused, I saw that some claims which were put in after those of my clients were investigated. I found that when those people had engaged Tory lawyers to defend their cases, their cases were immediately taken up. One of my clients found out that it was because I was a Liberal lawyer that I could not get the arbitrators at Quebec to take up his case, and he got so much disgusted that he retained another lawyer, Mr. Isidore Belleau, and his case was immediately settled. There are a good many farmers in St. Joseph of Lévis who have been deprived of their lands for five years, and who have not yet been paid for them. I hope that the Government will see that their claims be settled before long.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may mention that the greater number of these claims have been paid; but a number of persons refused to accept the amount offered to them, and it was necessary to refer their cases to the official arbitrators, but I am quite sure the hon. gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the official arbitrators of the Government would be in the slightest degree influenced by the political proclivities of any advocate who might be engaged. I am sure the hon. gentleman does not accuse the Government of anything of that kind. I am sure no Government would be influenced by any consideration of that kind, and I cannot believe an official arbitrator would be.

Mr. GUAY. I am informed that there were over $1,000,000 of land claims settled during the electoral campaign, and the other day I saw that the Government had to issue special warrants for about $1,000,000 to settle a large number of these claims.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is aware that that was explained on the floor of the House. The amount was awarded by the judgment of the court.

Mr. GUAY. There were a few land claims settled, but it is extraordinary that they were only those of my political opponents.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the charge these hon. gentlemen make is of such a character that it should be officially investigated. It seems to me so highly improper, that this House would be altogether wanting in its duty if it permitted the Session to close without making some enquiry in the matter. It would be an extraordinary condition of things if at this time of day we found that an hon. gentleman could not proceed with the settlement of a case because the Government arbitrator would not entertain a proposition on account of his political opinions. I say that would be a condition of things that would be utterly intolerable.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How would it be if a case were carried into a court and the professional man who had it in charge would not be heard by the judge? The hon. gentleman's statement that the arbitrator, acting on behalf of the Government, with the view of settling these claims, many of which are four or five years' standing, could not get a hearing because he had employed my hon. friend as his counsel. I say that is a matter that requires the immediate attention of the Government, and if any arbitrator or official of the Government has acted in that way, the Government owe it to themselves to immediately dismiss him from his present position.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). The settlement of these land claims has been a regular scandal. I mention one case that has come under my notice. A gentleman who was unfortunate enough to be against the Government, had a claim which was such a clear case that there could be no doubt about it. He obtained judgment, but the case was taken to the Supreme Court, where the judges were unanimous in deciding that the Government had not a leg to stand on. Why was the case taken to the Supreme Court? Because the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy), insisted that the case should be taken to the Supreme Court in order to ruin that man, and to prevent him getting the $12,000 to which he was entitled. This is only one case out of a great many, showing how the St. Charles Branch land claims have been treated. Whether rightly or wrongly, the general impression in Quebec is that it is perfectly impossible for any man to get justice unless he applies to Tory lawyers. I have seen some of my own clients—my clients for a great many years—who have been advised to go to a Tory lawyer with their claim. These lawyers have made a great deal of money with these Intercolonial Railway claims, because the general impression was, whether rightly or wrongly, I do not say there was any justification for it, that those who had land claims should go to a Tory lawyer in order to obtain justice from the Government.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that the case he has cited, that of Mr. Murphy, is an example of all the cases. Of the statements in connection with that case not one half have any foundation. Mr. Murphy's claim was appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada on my advice. I believed, and still believe, that there was good ground for making that appeal. The appeal was not entered at the instance of the hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. McGreevy); he was never consulted about it; he never spoke to us about it; he never used the slightest influence to induce us to make it. The hon. gentleman says that the judges of the Supreme Court were unanimous in saying that our case had not a leg to stand on. They said nothing of the kind. Under the same circumstances, I would advise an appeal again, for Mr. Murphy obtained more than he was entitled to.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Mr. Murphy obtained before the arbitrators a certain award. The Exchequer Court confirmed that award, then the Government appealed to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court unanimously affirmed there was not one leg for the Government case to stand on.

Mr. THOMPSON. That is not so.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). The result was the same. There was not one judge who was not of opinion that the original judgment should have been held good.

Mr. THOMPSON. That at times happens, and it is no proof at all of the impropriety of the appeal. I regret to say, in many cases, it is not sufficient proof to satisfy anybody acquainted with the facts that the plaintiff ought to succeed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is rather a reflection on the Supreme Court.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am quite prepared to take the responsibility, and stand by all that I have said on the subject.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Sault Ste. Marie Canal.....$1,000,000

Mr. DAWSON. I would like to give a little information in regard to this canal, and to draw attention to the great importance of this national work which is now to be undertaken. I think it might be of some interest to the House to go back a little to the time at which it was first proposed to build a canal at Sault Ste. Marie, and contrast the condition of affairs at that time with their condition now. As early as 1852, the Government made a survey of the canal at Sault Ste. Marie, and I have here the report of the engineer containing the statement of the traffic of those days, and his estimate of the probable cost of a then proposed canal. This engineer, in setting out the position of matters at that day, gave this statement:

"I have not been able to obtain the return of trade except for the year 1851, which is as follows:—

Upwards.
Iron, steel and castings, including three steam engines, 370,000 lbs.....	185 Tons
Number of cattle and horses, 370 lbs.....	123 do
Hay.....	322 do
Bricks, 76M.....	171 do
Lumber, 418M.....	700 do
Shingles, 183M.....	18 do
Merchandise, provisions, &c., 52,847 brls. bulk.	2,641 do
Total.....	4,160 do
Downwards.
Copper (native).....	1586 Tons
Iron "blooms".....	383 do
Fish, 3,590 barrels.....	513 do 2,482 do
Tons both ways.....	6,642

At the same time he says:

"The fleet on Lake Superior consists of one steamboat, three propellers and five schooners, with an aggregate tonnage of 1,500 tons."

That was in the year 1852. He expresses himself in this way in respect to the location of the canal:

"The canal has been laid out upon a straight line, the shortest that can be drawn between the navigable portions of the bays above and below the island, thus passing nearly through the middle of the large island on the Canada side. Its length through the island is 50 chains, but from end to end of piers it is 95 chains. It was found necessary to produce the piers at the upper entrance, right across the first bay, and the point of shoal above it in order to avoid the awkwardness of an abrupt turn had the pier ended in the first bay, as well as to obviate the exposure of vessels making that entrance to the influence of the current at the head of the rapids. The upper terminus is now in a deep bay, and in still water where the American vessels wintering above the shoal usually lie up."

This is very important information, because it shows that the proper place for the canal was on the Canadian side, and that at a place above the rapids on the Canadian side, American vessels used to come and lie up for the winter. This shows the superiority of the Canadian side—a basin above and a basin below, and the whole length of the canal about a mile. The estimate of the cost that the engineer made of a canal which should have a depth of 10 feet and width of 140, was $500,000 or thereabouts, but that was a canal which would not be at all adapted to the wants of the present day. Having shown what the traffic was at that time, perhaps I may be allowed to show what it is now; and I have a statement here which, I think, under present circumstances, will be found to be exceedingly interesting. In 1852, when the statement I have just read was made, there was no canal on the American side of Sault Ste. Marie. It was in contemplation to build one, but no step had been taken towards its construction at that time. I have stated the tonnage up and down, both ways, over a little portage railway on the American side at 6,000 tons and the shipping on Lake Superior at 1,500 tons. I ask the attention of the House, in contrast to that, to this statement of the traffic last year at Sault Ste. Marie:

Canal was open to navigation 211 days in 1885, and 224 days in 1886.

To give some idea of what this immense traffic is, I may state what the traffic of three continents, Europe, Asia and Africa, passing through the Suez Canal has been. In 1881 the tonnage in the Suez Canal was 5,794,401 tons, while that in the Sault Ste. Marie Canal last year was 4,527,000 tons, as I have just stated. In other words, the traffic between these two great inland seas is already up to somewhat more than half the traffic of the Suez Canal, which in 1885 was 8,985,411 tons. I think these facts are somewhat interesting in view of our being about to undertake the building of a canal, but there are some other things which I think are equally interesting. The Americans have already two canals on their side and are now proposing to build a third as will be seen by what a local paper says:

"Colonel O. M. Poe, of the United States engineer corps, has urged upon Congress, at various times, during the past few years, the necessity of hastening the improvements in the St. Mary's Falls Canal. In one of his last arguments before the Commerce Committee, he stated that at the present rate of increase in lake shipping it would be necessary to commence the construction of a third canal at Sault Ste. Marie long before the new one now under construction could be completed, in order to keep pace with the increase and meet the demands of lake shipping.

Now, they are not only building a new canal on the American side, but are cutting a canal three miles long behind the ship canals in order to avail themselves of the water power. There is a company formed to open a canal or aqueduct three miles long in order to avail themselves of that power. I think the views which are expressed in regard to that will be interesting in another point of view, because the water power there is likely very soon to be availed of by the Americans, who are now carrying on the manufacture of flour at Minneapolis to a very large extent; and the people who are coming there are capitalists from the vicinity of Minneapolis. They are coming to Sault Ste. Marie—and are prepared to build this water power canal on the American side, which is a work entirely apart from the other canal, with locks which is about to be built. Here is their view:—

"When the Canadian Pacific was completed a few months ago it not only opened an immense and fruitful country for occupation, but it also made a government highway for English commerce from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean. The road has been built in a thorough manner, and the projectors, sure of good returns in the not distant future, have prepared a perfect channel of commerce. This road has a branch to the Sault, and there is to receive the outpourings of the vast American wheat fields of the north, which will be landed there by the Detroit, Mackinac and Marquette and the Minneapolis and Sault Ste. Marie roads, and such other roads as may be built.

"It is not the purpose of Sault Ste. Marie to let this grain pass across her borders, either in the original form or even as flour from the Minneapolis mills. On the contrary, she herself proposes to convert it into flour. Let us see what advantages she has to set up against that great milling centre, Minneapolis. In the first place, the Minneapolis mills, although their water power is of the finest when the river is full, is liable to be without water for months at a time. All the large mills have to resort to steam power during part of the year, and consequently do business at an increased cost. More than that, the rapid destruction of timber at the headwaters of the Mississippi is constantly making the flow of the river more uncertain. So much for the disadvantages of the Minnesota rival.

"Sault Ste. Marie, on the other hand, has in Lake Superior a body of water as large as New England except Maine; and the water level does not vary more than one foot during the year. The falls of Saint Mary give all the head needed and to utilise this water power all that remains is to build a canal around the rapids."

And that canal they are now engaged in building. The same might be said with equal truth of the Canadian side of the falls. As I have pointed out, the traffic now amounts to seventy millions of dollars a year—that is, the value of the articles passing through the United States canal—and I believe that, if this canal is carried out on our side, it will be the means of building up a city in a very short time at Sault Ste. Marie, and of drawing traffic to our great Canadian Pacific Railway. I may say, moreover, that it is a necessity in other respects. It will be remembered that, on a former occasion, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal was shut against us; that, during the military expedition of 1870, when it was necessary to send troops to the North-West, when we got to Sault Ste. Marie it was found that the Americans had shut their canal in order to cut off all intercourse between this section of the country and Lake Superior. However, the Government made a portage road by which they reached the lake, and engaged steamers on Lake Superior and on Lake Huron. Then, when the Americans found that there was another means of our getting through without using the canal, they politely informed us that the canal was perfectly open to us, but that was not until they saw we could get on without it. I thought that, as this matter was up, and as this canal is altogether within the district which I have the honor to represent, I would draw the attention of the House to these facts.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). I do not rise for the purpose of offering any objection to this vote. I quite agree with the hon. gentleman who has taken his seat as to the importance of this canal. I believe it is a work that is necessary in the interest of the navigation of our inland waters. But I would like to draw the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, to what I consider a work of equal importance, one which I think it is necessary the Government should construct if they wish to derive all the advantages which are to be obtained by the construction of this work itself—I refer to the improved navigation of the Ottawa and French Rivers. I drew the attention of the House to this matter in 1885, by submitting a resolution declaring the advisability of entering on that work at an early date. The matter was fully discussed on that occasion, and I do not now propose to enter into its merits. You will remember also that during last Session I brought this matter before the House, and upon that occasion the Minister of Railways stated:

"With respect to my hon. friend from Renfrew (Mr. White) I am sure he will wait."

That is in reference to the construction of the Ottawa Canal.

"I will be very glad to listen to him, to see everything he can show us, and to do everything we can do. But I will ask him to have patience. I will ask him to wait a little, until we have made some progress in these great works which we have on hand, although we have completed that work for which we have expended so much money."

Referring, I presume, to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

"I am sure that he will not be disappointed in the interest which we shall take in his work, as well as those that have gone before."

Well, Mr. Chairman, I would like my hon. friend the Minister of Railways to give some practical illustration of his interest in the work to which I refer. I had hoped that in the Estimates which are submitted a vote would have been asked for the purpose of doing something towards the construction of that great work. I still venture to express the hope—if the Minister of Railways is in the House I hope he will state his views in regard to the matter—I still venture to express the hope that a vote will be placed in the Supplementary Estimates which will give practical effect to the promises the Minister of Railways made during last Session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the estimated cost of this?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There has not been a close estimate made recently. But I expect this amount is larger than will be required to complete the work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it to be of the same dimension as the American canal?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Lachine Canal.....$98,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Would the hon. member state in what position this work is?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This sum of $98,000 will complete the works that have been commenced, including the deepening of St. Gabriel Basin, $58,000; stone side wall, section 6, $7,000; race and weir at Lachine, $13,000; together with other items, making the total amount.

Cornwall Canal.....$73,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is required to complete. The amount available for 1886-87 is $70,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does that complete what you propose to spend on it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That completes all in relation to which expenditure is at present undertaken; but to carry out the whole scheme a large addition will be required.

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew).

Williamsburg Canal—For the construction of an entrance and locks at head of Rapide Plat Canal.....$60,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This amount, with $100,000 for the improvement of the Galops Canal, includes the two votes under the heads of the Williamsburg Canal. The amount of $100,000 is towards the construction of locks.

St. Lawrence River and Canal.....$40,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is required to improve the canal through the Galops Rapids by certain works of submarine blasting and dredging. These works were commenced in 1880, and consist of an excavation in the channel of the rapids of such depth as to afford a passage at low water to vessels of 14 feet draught. An additional sum of $30,000 is required to complete.

Towards completing the present works at the Murray Canal.....$116,000

Mr. MALLORY. I noticed the member for Prince Edward county (Mr. Platt) asked a few days ago when the contract had expired for the construction of the Murray Canal, and the Minister of Railways and Canals replied that the date was arranged for in the original contract of 1st July 1885, and that no written extension of time had been given to the contractors for the completion of that work. I would like to enquire whether any verbal arrangement has been entered into with the contractors as to the time at which this canal should be completed?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me, I will make a note of that, as the Minister of Railways is not very well and could not be here. I will give the hon. gentleman the information.

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to know, also, if there is any forfeit in case of a failure on the part of the contractors.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. You wish to know whether there is a provision for an extension of time?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, whether there is an agreement, whether written or verbal, as to the extension of time. The date of the completion of the contract had expired on 1st July, 1885, and, as it appears, the contractors have been going on with the work from that time until this, at the mercy, as I may express it, of the Government of the day. I understand, from the most reliable authority, that some members of the Government, and some of their influential supporters, have seen fit to negotiate with these parties; and we remember the statement made by the Minister of Finance a few evenings ago, that it was quite legitimate for those who were in the employ of the Government—he did not state that exactly—to become active electioneering agents for the Government during any political contest that might be taking place in their locality or anywhere else, I know as a matter of fact—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman must allow me to correct him. I made no reference to anything of the kind. We were speaking of civil servants of the Crown exclusively. I said nothing about contractors or persons who have contracts with the Government.

Mr. MALLORY. I corrected myself. I did not mention contractors but those in the employ of the Government; and if the principle is true and just in the one case, surely it cannot be unjust in the other. If it is just for Civil Service employés—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is another thing altogether.

Mr. MALLORY—to become active election agents—I say if the principle is a correct one, the legitimate conclusion to be drawn is that a contractor or any other employé, other than civil servants, should be allowed to do the same thing, and they are allowed to do the same thing. As a matter of fact pressure has been brought to bear on those contractors to make them active election agents in the interests of the party in power. Two, three, or four Ministers of the Crown went into the ridings, particularly into the riding where those men have a contract, and by some mysterious influences, I know not what, those gentlemen were induced to take the stump and do all they possibly could for the party in power. Not only that, but they expended a large sum of money—where it came from I am not prepared to state. Not only that, but some employés of the Government, not of the contractors, the assistant engineer and others in the employ of the Government, used the positions they occupied under the Government in order to assist them very materially. I may state, that not only did the contractors for this canal spend days and weeks in active work against the candidates of the Liberal party and favored the candidates of the Government, but employés of the Government did the same work. I have this to say to the House: That days and weeks before the 22nd February, employés of the Government employed dozens of men, from thirty to forty, and, I am informed, as high as fifty, for no other purpose than to cut holes in the ice, to give them remunerative employment in order to induce them to vote for the Government candidate. I am informed by the men themselves that they received from $1.30 to $1.00 per day, for simply cutting holes in the ice, ostensibly for the purpose of taking soundings; but so many were employed that soundings could not be taken until many of the holes had frozen over, and they had to be cut open again. For days and weeks men were so employed on the Murray Canal and in the harbor of Brighton, and for several days previous to the 22nd February from twenty to thirty men were ostensibly searching for the sunken pier at Presqu'île, whereas any school boy in Brighton could have told them where the pier was. But these men were drawing $1.30 a day for the work. It is in line with that conduct of the employés and contractors of the Government on these particular works that these men were employed for days and weeks before the 22nd in the way I have mentioned, and I am informed many of them did not receive a single day's employment after the 22nd February. These matters have come under my own notice; what I speak is from personal knowledge; I know these transactions to have occurred. As I have stated before, if the principle is a sound one, as laid down by the Minister of Finance, that Civil Service employés are allowed and are expected to be active agents in support of the Government during political contests, we should know it. If it is true that civil servants are allowed to do this, contractors also should be allowed to act as they have done in this particular case. The particular complaint I make is that these men, owing their financial existence to the Government of the day, have been induced to take the action they have taken, while they know and while the Government know that they are, and if they are not they ought to be, responsible to this country and the Government for the forfeit which ought to be contained in the contract. They are going on at the sufferance of the Government. The time for the completion of the contract expired about two years ago, still the contract is not completed, and these men go on and try to repay the Government of the day, and the party in power, for the kindness extended to them, by exercising every influence in their power in support of the Government during an election contest. The hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Burdett) if he were in his place, could give some of the experiences he had to pass through during his election. In the same way could the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) speak, because the action of those gentlemen was not confined to the constituency I represent; and I could give many particular instances which have come under my own observations of the conduct of those men; but it is just as well that I should keep them for the proper tribunal before which I propose to bring many of these charges. But I have brought this matter forward, so that this House and the country may understand whether conduct of this kind is justified by the Government of the day, and may judge as to the righteousness of actions of this kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think such a statement as that made by my hon. friend really requires explanation. Here we have an hon. member stating very distinctly that a gross waste of public money has taken place under circumstances which certainly warrant the suspicion that the election for Northumberland county had a good deal to do with it. The charges of the hon. gentleman indicate such a state of affairs as to involve a very great waste of the public money, not to speak of the corrupt influences employed to secure the election of a member to this House; and on both these scores some explanation is due to the committee. I presume in this case, as in most others, there is a heavy forfeit for every day the work is delayed after the original time for completion. That clause is usually inserted in public works contracts, and it is quite clear that under such circumstances the parties who are contractors for the Murray canal are absolutely in the hands of the Government; and if they have been large subscribers to election funds, we know well enough their little peccadilloes are not likely to be closely looked after. It is a very peculiar state of things and requires some explanation by the Minister.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The observations which the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Mallory) made before he sat down were pertinent to the occasion, and they were that he would reserve his remarks and statements on this subject to the tribunal before which those matters would be reviewed; and I think if that be the case, if this matter is to be dealt with and if these charges of corrupt practices are to be dealt with, the hon. gentleman is quite right in reserving them for a tribunal where the facts will all be weighed and examined, and where he will have an opportunity of hearing what both sides have to say. I can only say that I think I have never heard it laid down in this House by anybody, that any contractor in this country is not perfectly free to exercise his right to influence an election, wherever he might happen to be. I believe it is nothing new on the part of contractors, either when hon. gentlemen were in power or under any present Government, to take a part in elections, sometimes on one side and sometimes on the other. I am informed by an hon. gentleman behind me that this contractor, whose conduct is now being reviewed, and who is charged with being open to corrupt influences on the part of the Government under whom he holds the contract, took a most energetic and active part in support of one of Mr. Mowat's candidates in the Local election in the county of Welland. If that be the case, as I believe it to be—I was not in the country, but I am told it is so by my hon. friends on this side, who took some interest in that election—it would show that that gentleman is not altogether deprived of the free exercise of his judgment, in matters of politics, as we would be led to assume. With regard to what has been said as to the time of the contract having expired, there is nothing new in that. Hon. gentlemen opposite had experience themselves when they were in power of how contractors drag their slow length along in contracts with the Government; when they were in power they found that it was not always in the public interest either to enforce the penalty against the contractors, or take the work out of their hands, because it is well known that, where you have the power to terminate the contract and make a new contract, the result is almost invariably to very largely increase the cost to the country. There are many cases in which, by the exercise of a little forbearance, you may get the work done at the contract price, when if you took it out of the contractor's hands and put it up at competition, the very failure of the contractor tends to increase the cost very much under a subsequent contract. I do not know anything about the facts, as to how far this contractor exercised his right to take an active part in the election. Of course, he had no right to do any corrupt act, and if he did anything of that kind the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity of establishing that before a tribunal, where there will be an opportunity of hearing both sides. I hope, however, that we are not going to enter into the whole question, with which I think it would be very unprofitable to take up the time of the House at present.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But it is not an unprofitable one with reference to the question of granting the Government $116,000 to finish the Murray Canal—it is strictly germane to that question—to point out that a good deal of money appears to have been wasted under the circumstances to which my hon. friend alluded, and we have in that view, I think, considerable ground for investigating it. As to the other point which the hon. gentleman mentioned, I would remind him that this question of contractors subscribing to election funds has been before—not this House, perhaps, because this is a new House—but it has been before preceding Houses several times, and the House passed the second reading of a Bill for preventing such subscriptions being made. I may remind the hon. gentleman that that question was referred to a special committee, presided over by a colleague of his own, Mr. McDonald, a former Minister of Justice, and now Chief Justice of Nova Scotia, and that Mr. McDonald and this committee reported strongly in favor of a Bill which was introduced into the House, to prevent contractors intermeddling with elections in that way. The Government, for reasons of their own, in various ways prevented that Bill from becoming law, but the principle was over and over again affirmed by former Parliaments, and my impression is that it would be a most wholesome principle. But I call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that my hon. friend's remarks point to a considerable waste of public money in connection with this canal, and that is undoubtedly a question which we should investigate.

Mr. MALLORY. With regard to these contractors taking an active part in the local contest in Welland, if they did so they must have done so for a very limited time, because I know, as a matter of fact, that they were not out of our county, except in the neighboring constituencies, unless it may have been for a day or two during the local contest, and all their ammunition was brought to bear in the local contests in these particular local constituencies. That I know as a matter of fact, because I had occasion to come in contact with them from time to time during the local election, as well as in the Dominion contest. But the charge I make is not one which I can take into the courts of law. I will, so far as I can, go into the matter in the courts, but I cannot arraign the Government and show up their conduct as regards these works, in a court of law; in any action I may take in that way, I must, of necessity, proceed against private individuals. But I not only state that the contractors on this canal, the servants of the Government working under their employ, have themselves acted in a spirit which I believe is contrary to law, in connection with these works, but they have employed men and expended public money uselessly, and, as I believe, and as the people in these constituencies believe, they did so in order that they might influence the electors in those particular constituencies. The assistant engineer was one who did this kind of thing. It was he who employed the laborers I spoke of, and it was under his supervision that some of these acts were done. I have been informed, on the most reliable authority, that those men who would not pledge themselves to support the Government candidate were refused employment. Some of the men have informed me themselves that the assistant engineer absolutely refused to employ them, and stated that his own position depended on his not employing Liberals on this work. The point I make against the Government is this: that these people owed their financial existence, for the time being, to the beck of the Government; that the time for the completion of this contract had expired, and that the Minister of Railways and Canals stated the other evening, in answer to my hon. friend, that the contract had expired and that no written renewal had been made. He was not asked if a written renewal had been made but if any renewal had been given, and he stated that no written renewal had been given. So that if there is any forfeit in connection with the contract, it depends upon the will of the Government whether that forfeit should be exacted from them or not. I say that the fact of whether their contract shall go on or not, whether they shall complete the contract and receive their pay, depends altogether upon the Government of the day, and therefore, as they told me themselves, it is in their interest to make a good showing for the Government of the day. Moreover, they told me and my friends, as well as their own friends, that when the Ministers of the Crown were in the constituencies at other times, they promised—and they left the impression on us that the promise was demanded of them—that they would see to it that four supporters of the hon. gentlemen would be returned from those four constituencies, and that it would be a disgrace to them, being under a compliment to the Government of the day, if they did not do everything in their power, and even expend their money, to see that supporters of the Government were returned to the House. These are the charges I preferred, and I think we are entitled to some answer to them.

Mr. BOWELL. I had not the pleasure of listening to the hon. gentleman when he commenced his remarks, and consequently I am not in a position to know what he has said. But if what he has just said is a repetition of what he said before I entered the House, it just amounts to this: that somebody told him that somebody said something, and that somebody told him they intended to do so and so. That is about the whole sum and substance of the remarks made by the hon. gentleman. He said that the Ministers of the Crown who had been in that constituency, had induced their contractors and their servants, when the contest was going on, to make certain promises and do certain acts to affect the result. I was in that riding; I live in that neighborhood, and had as good a right to take part in that contest as my hon. friend, for I have lived there as long as he has. I know that no inducements were held out to Mr. Silcox, nor were any instructions given to any of his employes in that section of the country as how they should vote. Neither have I any knowledge of holes having been cut in the ice; and, if the hon. gentleman did not say so on his own responsibility, I will be loath to believe that the contractor, whom I know, and who is a tolerably shrewd Irishman, would make the confessions which the hon. member for Northumberland says he made. And I very much doubt that Mr. Rosmond, the engineer, ever told him or anybody else that his position would depend on the action he should take in the election. These people may have said that they would return four members for the Bay of Quinté counties. I would not be surprised at that, for many people said the same thing to me during the contest. Such things are always said when we are going into political fights. But I am not aware that that is any evidence of corruption. I wonder if my hon. friend has not been told by his friends what they would do, and be sure to accomplish; and yet they were mistaken when the votes were counted. I am not aware that Mr. Silcox took any action other than what any elector would be entitled to take. I am not aware that he received any instructions from any members of the Government, and I positively deny that he received any from me directly or indirectly. As to the charges the hon. gentleman made, I have no doubt the hon. Minister of Finance and the hon. Minister of Railways will ask for explanations as to whether the money was squandered in the manner in which the hon. gentleman says it was squandered. If the holes were cut in the ice, they may have been cut at the expense of the contractor in the furtherance of his work, or in preparing for the work in the spring. Whether that work was charged to the Government outside of the contract I am not able to say. The Minister of Railways and Canals would, no doubt, be able to answer that question if he were here; but the undue influence to which the hon. gentleman has referred as having been exercised on the part of the Government, I not only have no knowledge of, but I say most distinctly that no inducements were held out to any person, contractor, or anybody else. I regret, in the interests of the county where I lived for many years, and where my hon. friend lives, that the contract has not been completed long before. There are many reasons for that. I think the Minister of Finance gave a good reason why the contract should not be taken out of the hands of the present contractor. He has been going on slowly, not as fast as he ought, probably, from year to year. Yet the work has been well done, and the contractor, I know, as does everybody, to be a pushing and energetic man in anything into which he enters. That work will be completed shortly, and I believe it will be done well. I believe the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do that the work is of much greater magnitude than was expected when the contract was given out; and that it is costing more money. But the desire of the Government is to make it a substantial highway for the commerce of that part of the country, and not a mere ditch. If that is accomplished, and it takes a year or two more to accomplish it, it will be in the interest of the country rather than to have the work done in a slipshod manner and at a more rapid rate. I am sure that when the hon. gentleman gets into that court to which he refers, he will then have an opportunity of showing whether the Government has been guilty of corrupt practices or used undue influence to defeat him; but in fighting our political battles over again on the floor of this House to merely repeat hearsays of what one man or another man says would not be taken in court as evidence; and I am not prepared to believe that this House will accept the mere statements that are made to the candidates, whether successful or defeated, as evidence that corrupt practices have prevailed.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish it to be distinctly understood that I have not said a word against allowing the contract to be carried out. I have not said a word in favor of taking the contract out of the contractor's hands, or allowing it to be fulfilled, or making this the best possible canal under the circumstances. I have not said it was not a work in the interest of the country. I have not said a word against that particular matter at all, and I do not wish the Minister of Customs to make a statement that would even leave the inference that I had said anything against that work, because I never have, and do not say so to-night.

Mr. BOWELL. I am not aware that I laid any such charge against the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MALLORY. No, but by inference he did. But the charge that I make still remains, that I believe it is improper that a contractor, who owes his financial position and everything he has to the good-will of a government, should go out and use every influence he possibly could in favor of the Government of the day. Many of the matters that I have spoken of have not been matters of hearsay at all, but matters of fact that I know myself. I know as a matter of fact that one of the employés of the Government employed those men to cut holes in the ice.

Mr. BOWELL. If they were not paid by the Government that would not be a corrupt act on the part of the Government.

Mr. MALLORY. If this man is in the employ of the Government his time belongs to the Government, and not to some electioneering committee. That is the ground I take. I think it is my duty as the representative of that constituency, to bring this matter to the attention of the Government, so that if any wrong has been done to the country, that wrong could be righted; and I should fail in the discharge of my duty if I did not point out to the House and the country the manner in which the works have been conducted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the depth of water?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Eleven feet, the lowest low water level of Lake Ontario.

Mr. MALLORY. What arrangements have been made as to walling or otherwise providing against the sand coming into this canal? I have understood from the contractors and others that there was much more sand—I do not mean quick-sand—on the route of the canal than was anticipated. I would like to know what the character of the embankment will be, whether stone or timber, to prevent sand coming in?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not able to tell the hon. gentleman specifically. He is aware these canals are under the supervision of one of the ablest engineers in this or any other country, and he may be certain, whatever measures are found necessary to protect the work, as it progresses, will be adopted.

Welland Canal..... $120,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is required to complete the aqueduct under contract with Mr. Beemer, also to settle with R. Dunbar, Section No. 34, and the lining of the banks.

Welland Canal—towards deepening to 14 feet throughout..... $450,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that finished?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is not; $450,000 will complete the deepening of the canal to 14 feet throughout.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it possible to make it any deeper, or is 14 feet the maximum?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If my recollection serves me aright, having been formerly Minister of Railways and Canals, I believe that 14 feet is all the depth estimated to be obtained at present. The canal was so constructed as to have a depth of 12 feet., and the increased depth was obtained by heightening the banks. I am not able to say whether they would admit of being raised further, so as to give greater depth of water.

Trent River Navigation.....$90,000

Mr. BARRON. At this late hour I am not prepared to take up the time of the House in discussing this scheme at any particular length, but I think it is my duty to my constituency, which is deeply interested in the construction of the Trent Canal, to express the opinions they entertain on this subject. I think if the gentlemen living throughout the entire route of this canal, from Georgian Bay down to the Bay of Quinté, are as equally interested in it as the constituents I represent, I may fairly say that I express their feelings, when I say they are deeply disappointed at the Government not doing anything more than they now promise to do. I take it from their estimates that they do not intend to grant any more money than that which they originally voted. I understand that the $90,000 to be expended is part of a former vote, so that the fact is there is no new vote to be taken this Session on behalf of the construction and continuation of that canal. I say, therefore, the people will be most deeply disappointed at that state of things. I presume to say, although I know it is not wise sometimes for a young member to presume too much, that the Government is a little to blame in this matter. Hon. gentlemen remember the answer given me the other day by the hon. the Minister of Railways and Canals. He then said it was not the intention of the Government to enter upon any new works on this canal, but to complete the works now under progress. It may astonish some hon. gentlemen to learn that that, practically speaking, is the very same answer which was made by the hon. the Finance Minister in 1882. He then said that the Government intended to see if the works could not be completed. I want to be accurate, and shall read, therefore, from Hansard, the answer made by the Finance Minister to the former representative of North Victoria, when he asked the question almost similar to that which I asked two days ago:

"I beg leave to say that an appropriation having been made for that purpose, an engineer was engaged to make a careful location and survey of the Trent Valley Navigation, with the view of arriving at the cost and feasibility of construction of that work."

That was in 1882. There also appears in that year the sum of $8,000 placed in the Estimates for that purpose. Here are the words of the Finance Minister on that occasion:

"We shall presently come to an additional item of $8,000 to prosecute that survey to its completion during the present season."

Five years have elapsed since that time, and although the Government then promised that the works should be pushed to completion, so far as surveys were concerned, we have to-day, five years afterwards, almost the self-same answers made by hon. gentlemen opposite. They appear to give as excuse for such an answer that they are not sufficiently familiar with the work, or, at all events, with the cost of the work, to say whether they can go on with it or not. At this hour, I do not intend to ask the House to listen to a reading of the report brought down to the House in 1882, but I shall ask the permission of the House to read the first clause, and I cannot understand that that report being in their possession, the Government can now say they are not sufficiently familiar with the feasibility of the work to say whether or not they can go on and complete it or not:

"The undersigned has the honor to represent that from time to time, during many years past, as shown in successive annual and other reports, the establishment of a line of water communication between Lake Ontario, at the mouth of the River Trent, and Lake Huron, through the utilising of existing river and lake waters, has been under consideration."

That report is a very old one indeed; it has been in the possession of the Department many years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will allow me to interrupt him, I think I may say he has entirely misapprehended the statement of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals the other day, and that he is beating the air, fighting a shadow, setting up a man of straw and then knocking it down. The Minister of Railways and Canals has said nothing about the survey, or about the report, or about the engineering information that was desired. What he did state was, that he proposed to take a vote for the completion of the work now in progress, and for a commission during recess to take up the whole question of the extension of the works on the Murray Canal. That has nothing to do with the surveys or reports, but has simply reference to the utilisation of these reports, and the demand and necessity for a large expenditure of public money in order to make a new canal through there. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. gentleman, and if this were during the winter season, I would not do so, but here in the dog-days and at midnight, to deal with an argument of this kind is rather trying.

Mr. BARRON. Of course I should be sorry to be under any misapprehension, but, although we all recognise the great ability of the Finance Minister, I think I can read plain English as well as he can. It is not my fault if I have misread the answer given the other day. I am not alone in that. The organ of the hon. gentleman gives it in the way in which I understood it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Take the Hansard. We have an accurate report there of what takes place.

Mr. BARRON. If the hon. gentleman will listen to me I will read the observations of the Peterborough Review, which is recognised as being a Conservative paper, in reference to the answer made to me the other day:

"The statement made by the Minister of Railways and Canals that a commission would be appointed to examine during the recess into the nature and cost of further works to open the Trent Valley navigation will not be favorably regarded in this district. The nature and cost of these works"

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will take the Hansard I will stand corrected, if he will show that it was a question of the surveys and costs that was referred to.

Mr. BOWELL. What was the date of that paper?

Mr. BARRON. I shall continue to read what the Peterborough Review said.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. BARRON. Well, it is a very singular thing that there should be others mistaken as well as myself. The answer was given by the hon. gentleman, and has gone over the country, and the people who are interested along the route of this canal—and there are a great many of them—have considered as I have—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take the Hansard.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Suppose you hand it to the reporter, and let it be treated as read.

Mr. BARRON. The paper says:

"The nature and cost of these works have already been fully investigated and if the Ministers insist upon their officials producing them they will find ample materials on which to form a judgment. Indeed on the information before them they some time ago formed a judgment, recognised the value and feasibility of this great improvement and promised to carry it out as promptly as the finances permitted. So far they have continuously prosecuted the works, but the section now in hand is now near its completion, and for the first time since it was recommenced there will be a cessation of the work.

"There is no disposition to dread an investigation on account of want of confidence in the merits of this improvement. The more it is investigated the more clearly it will appear that for a comparatively small outlay a route can be opened that will be of great value to the country at large. Its benefits have been plainly demonstrated and have been officially admitted. Mr. Starke's careful estimates showed that it would be far from costly for a route of such great importance, and nothing has since arisen to modify this view. If a commission is to be appointed we hope it will consist of men of sound judgment, and then there can be no fear of their reporting adversely to this necessary work.

"But, as we have before remarked, we see no need of a commission. The stage of investigation is passed. Another section, say from here to Lakefield, might well be placed under contract, for the plans and estimates are ready. Many railways that have been subsidised in other parts of the Dominion are of far less public importance than this navigable route."

Now, in addition to that, it appears that the hon. gentleman wrote a letter a few days ago to the hon. member for West Peterborough, which is printed in the Peterborough papers. I will not read it at length, but simply the part which refers to this point :

"I have to say in reply that, inasmuch as I would like to meet your views respecting this matter, I will press on the work, so far as already begun, to completion this season, if possible. In so far as the balance of the work of the Trent Valley Canal is concerned, I have to say that, before proceeding further, we will, after the Session send on a commission to report fully upon the whole matter."

This is signed by the Minister of Railways and Canals. Now, I think I am justified in taking up a little time, because I tell hon. gentlemen opposite that the answer made to me the other day has created a little disturbance in the localities which are interested in this canal, so much so, I understand, that, in face of the remonstrances of the Minister of Railways and Canals, a deputation is coming from the town of Peterborough to ask the Government to make an appropriation for this purpose. I am simply expressing the disappointment which is felt as to their not having been treated fairly as far as this work is concerned. We have the promise of the Minister of Public Works made to the member for West Peterborough that the works will be completed or gone on with between Peterborough and Lakefield during the coming summer. I shall read the remarks which the member for West Peterborough (Mr. Stevenson) made on the night of the election. He is reported by the Peterborough Review, the Conservative organ, to have said :

"The Minister of Public Works had given him every assurance that the Trent Valley Canal contract between Peterborough and Lakefield would be let during the coming summer. This was no electioneering dodge, because the elections were now all over."

The statement was made on the night of the election, therefore, the promise must have been made before the election was over.

"He hoped next summer to see thousands of men employed in and about Peterborough."

That is what I hope to see, and I believe the public who are interested in this canal, and there are very many of them, will regard this otherwise than as an electioneering dodge, more or less, by the hon gentlemen opposite. We all remember that the Minister of Finance paid a visit to that part of the country before the works were begun, and he was reported to have said that the work would be gone on with, but we have it from higher authority. Hon. gentlemen will remember that elections took place in June, 1882, and what at that time did the Premier of the country say? He went there accompanied by the present Speaker of the Senate, and he said :

"Every town of sufficient size wanted a post office and a custom house, and every part of the country wanted some improvement in order to develop its resources, just as those he was addressing demanded the carrying out of the Trent navigation system, and they were going to get it. It was by mere chance the Government had the opportunity of carrying out that great project of inland navigation."

Speaking of the Trent waters, he said :

"The Government kept them till the revenue had expanded sufficiently to justify them in going to Parliament as they did last Session, and getting a substantial vote which would be sufficient to add 150 miles of internal communication to their part of the country. The vote taken last Session would, however, amply guarantee that the whole work would be carried out as fast as the revenue would allow, so it could be constructed."

Now, that is what the Premier stated in June, 1882. I do think, therefore, that the people interested in this work have a right to expect that the Government will go on and complete it. The Government go into other expenses, they expend an enormous sum on the Franchise Act, which for one election, assuming that we shall have only one election in five years, will amount to between two and a quarter and two and a half million dollars. Now, if they would dispense with that and take the money and build this Trent Valley Canal the people would be thoroughly well satisfied all over the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen opposite know that this matter has been looked upon altogether aside from party feeling; the Reformers have joined hands with the Conservatives in representing to hon. gentlemen opposite its necessity. I say it is not treating the people fairly now to do no more than simply give us a revote of $90,000. I am sure the people will be greatly dissatisfied all along the line of these works unless something more is done.

Mr. STEVENSON. As my name has been mentioned in connection with this matter, I wish to make some remarks before the vote is carried. I regret that the Minister of Railways and Canals is not in his place, not being well enough, unfortunately, to remain. In respect to this canal I have myself taken a great deal of time and trouble, and probably know as much about it as my hon. friend from North Victoria (Mr. Barron). I may say in the beginning that I have the utmost confidence in the intention of the present Government to do what is right and to press forward the work of the canal. From the beginning I have never wavered in that belief, and I have heard nothing from the Government to justify an intention that the works will not be proceeded with. It is quite true that the Minister has stated that the Government intended to appoint a commission immediately after the Parliament rises, to go over the works and report. What that means I do not know exactly. I must say that I did not expect that answer, in the first place, because I thought, and think still, that no commission was required. I have always understood that there is no doubt of the feasibility of the project, and I think still that the most expensive part of it has been constructed. I think the locks at Burley, where the rocks are very hard and difficult to blast, are the most expensive and difficult portion of the whole work, so far as I know. The section above Peterborough is one of a very different character, as the rock is of shale limestone and easy to cut. I do not think there will be any difficulty in the project. The town of Peterborough is very much interested, and the Government knows this very well. I was in Peterborough the other night, and a meeting was immediately called at which I gave the answer of the Minister, supposing that it would be satisfactory. The council urged a deputation to go to Ottawa, and it will arrive here the middle of next week to interview the Government on this matter. I know that other deputations are coming. People along the Trent Valley Canal on both sides of the river are alive to this matter. They are determined, no matter what Government is in power, that they shall have that canal eventually. It has been dragging along now year after year. The hardest part of the work has now been done, and I give the present Government credit for it. The Mackenzie Government, instead of doing anything towards that work, handed over the title of it to the Ontario Government, and all they ever did was to appoint some men to keep the people from fishing. But to the present Government, and also to the present Minister of Railways and the present Minister of Finance, we are indebted for all that has been constructed so far. I am happy to know that there is no intention on the part of the Government to abandon it, so far as I have been able to gather from them. I have pressed the work upon them as earnestly as I know how. I have urged the construction of this canal, as well as I know how upon the Minister of Canals and also upon other members of the Government, and I have no doubt that when times get a little better and money is more plenty, we will have a large grant towards this canal. In connection with these canal contracts I know, and everyone must know, that every contractor and every official belonging to the Local Government worked as hard as they possibly could to oppose this Government. They did not make any bones about it, and spent money without end in our constituencies. I know that every man from the lowest bailiff to the head of the Government of Ontario travelled through our constituencies, and fought the Government, and fought myself—I know that to a certainty—from the Premier down. I know that every man in their employ from one end to the other, travelled round and did everything possible to oppose the present Government. I would not have referred to this matter if it had not been referred to by the hon. member for East Northumberland (Mr. Mallory). In reference to cutting holes in the ice the contractors may do as they please, I suppose. I do not know anything to prevent them, I do not know as any government can prevent them, and if they see fit to help a candidate, and spend their own money, I suppose they have a perfect right to do it. I know that in our part of the country the Government spent no money, at least in my behalf. Whatever money was spent in my behalf, I spent it myself, and I asked nobody to help me. I did not want any assistance. My expenses were very little, comparatively speaking. I spoke with regard to the contractor. The contractor for the canal was not there at all during the elections. I do not know about cutting holes in the ice, but it does seem singular that it should have been done. That man must be a good contractor if he cuts holes in the ice in the winter and lets them freeze up again. I know where other things were done that were probably as ridiculous as that, although, perhaps, they were not paid for by the Government. I am very sorry the Government have not seen fit at the present time to put a larger amount in the Estimates. I hope that before the Session closes they will give us something more, but if they do not, I trust that another Session will not pass without their doing something more. I am satisfied that all the inhabitants in that Trent Valley, from Barrie and from Lake Huron down, will support the Government if they go on with that canal. The people are terribly in earnest about it; they are determined to have it. There is a large lake in the rear, and a shortening by the water way of over 150 or nearly 200 miles, so that vessels could reach Montreal much more quickly than by any other route. Yet the work is not done, and vast sums of money are spent on the Welland Canal. All the engineers to whom I have spoken are satisfied that there is no difficulty with respect to its construction. The present engineer says that the total amount necessary for the construction of the work is between three millions and four millions. We have spent already at various times during the last thirty years in the neighborhood of one million dollars, and it is not all to be thrown away. No Government will permit this expenditure to be wasted, and the necessities of the west and North-West will eventually force the Government to construct this work. It is the most direct outlet by water for the products of the North-West. Look at the water route by way of the Georgian Bay and the Sault down by this canal by which barges could come by Lakes Superior and Huron through to Montreal without transshipment. The advantages are so enormous that I cannot see what the trouble can be, and I hope that before long the Government will see its way, in fact I have no doubt about it, to carry this work to completion. I have full confidence in the present Government that they will give all the assistance we need to press forward the construction of this canal as rapidly as possible. I can quite understand that it is necessary to have a commission sent up there to examine the work. I am aware that the engineers have not agreed in their reports as to the cost of its construction, and, therefore, I see the necessity of the course the Government intend to pursue. On that account I am willing to acquiesce in what the Government have agreed to do, and I am satisfied that the people living along the line of the canal feel confident that the Government will carry forward the work and complete the canal as soon as possible.

Tay Canal..... $55,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long has this canal been under construction; how much has it cost, and how much is it likely to cost? There have been sums in the Estimates for the last 15 years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will feel very much relieved when I tell him that the expenditure commenced in 1883. From that date to 1st March, 1887, the expenditure has been $255,360; this sum of $55,000 will complete the work, including the new basin at Perth, which is not under contract. We shall thus obtain a canal 6 miles in length at a cost of a little over a quarter of a million dollars.

Culbute Canal—to remove shoal, &c.....$25,000

Mr. WHITE (Renfrew). Is it estimated that that sum will be sufficient to pay for all the works and complete the payments for land damages?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This amount is required to remove a shoal, at a cost of $1,000, and the balance of the amount is to pay the land damages in connection with the retaining dams. So this covers everything.

Lachine Canal..... $6,600

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are you going to introduce telephone lines all along the canals?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This amount is for the building of a new swing bridge at Lock No. 5, and the purchase of telephone lines. The first amount is $5,000, and the second $1,600. The Public Works Department has been paying a rental of $650 per annum to the Bell Telephone Company for the use of their line on the Lachine Canal, and this is to purchase the line from the company.

Beauharnois Canal.....$11,650

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is for the deepening of the bottom of the canal and building telephone lines. For the first item there is $10,150, and for the second $1,500.

Williamsburg Canal.....$1,613

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this to pay the owner of titles of lands taken for the construction of the Rapide Plat Canal recently or a long time ago?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In 1885.

Rideau Canal.....$33,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is $10,000 not a rather heavy item for changing the location of the swing bridge over the canal at Smith's Falls.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A very numerous signed petition was received from the ratepayers of the town of Smith's Falls, stating that great delay occurred and injury to business resulted from the bridge being placed immediately over the locks. It is a serious hindrance to passengers. This difficulty can be removed by adopting another location above the locks, and the delay would thereby be reduced simply to the time required in passing the vessel through the bridge. The estimate of the work has been furnished by the superintending engineer at $10,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It seems a large sum for a swing bridge. The Rideau is a small canal.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, but a swing bridge is sometimes an expensive thing.

Committee rose and reported progress.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12:45 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 8th June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

ADJOURNMENT.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved :

That when the House adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned till Friday next, at three o'clock, p.m.

Motion agreed to.

REPORTS OF PRINTING COMMITTEE.

Mr. BERGIN moved that the third and fourth reports of the Joint Committee of both Houses on the Printing of Parliament be adopted. He said: In moving the adoption of these reports I desire to call attention more particularly to two paragraphs. The first paragraph to which I desire to call attention is to be found on page 315, of the Votes and Proceedings of the 6th inst. :

"Resolved, That in the opinion of this Committee the furnishing of the stationery required in either House should remain under the control of each House, as at present, and that the 'Act respecting the Department of Public Printing and Stationery' be so amended as to provide for the same."

This recommendation of the committee we trust the Government will take into consideration, and that they will meet the wishes of the committee. It is felt by the committee that the handing over of the Stationery Department in either House to the Printing Department, would give rise to very great inconvenience and annoyance, and would not at all contribute to the convenience and comfort of members of the House. It would be very awkward, should it be handed over to the Printing Department, to be constantly sending to that Department for a sheet of paper or an envelope. It is in the convenience of the House now, but it would not be in the future. Again, there is a very strong feeling amongst the members of the committee that they have already delegated to the Government as great powers as they ought to have, and that this one little thing that remains to us we should keep in our hands. We trust that the Government will take this representation into consideration immediately. There is another portion of the report to which, also, I desire to call attention, and it is that which refers to the providing of further accommodation for the distribution department. We examined carefully all the space at the disposal of the distributing department, both in the vaults and upstairs, and we find that there is now no room for any further storage. We find, also, that the head of the distributing branch has been obliged to reduce the number of documents which he has been in the habit of filing away, and we think this is a very serious matter, and one which should be enquired into immediately, with a view of providing further accommodation. It has been suggested that, as the present Railway Committee room is entirely too small, and a large space in the vaults is taken up with the ventilating department of that Railway Committee room, a new Railway Committee room should be provided, that the present one should be used for other purposes, and that in the vaults which are now encumbered with the ventilating apparatus of that room—apparatus which, by the way, does not ventilate it at all—space should be provided for the use of the distributing department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not think we have had an opportunity of reading this report; at all events, I have not, although I have had the pleasure of hearing my hon. friend's speech. I think we had better let it stand over, so that we may have the opportunity of considering it a little.

Mr. BERGIN. Until Monday?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, remove it on Monday.

Mr. BERGIN. Before, however, the motion is entirely withdrawn, I would ask the right hon. the Premier whether he will have the motion as adopted by the House, placed on the Government Orders; otherwise the Bill cannot be got through this Session, and the only way in which the views of the committee can be adopted will be by the Government amending their Printing Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We must, in the first place, see if the Government can give their approval of the report. If they give their approval to the report, it will be their duty to carry it out.

Mr. BERGIN. And then it will be placed on the Government Orders.

Motion withdrawn.

REPRESENTATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 140) in addition to the Revised Statutes, Chapter 6, respecting representation in the House of Commons. He said: The Representation Act, as published in the Revised Statutes, continues the old enactment that the House shall consist of 211 members, and a subsequent chapter deals with the representation in the North-West Territories; but it is proper that the second section should be amended to make it conform with the present number of members of the House. There is also a difficulty arising from the fact that, since the representation in the House was last distributed, the boundaries of some municipalities have changed, and, therefore, if the Act reads as it now does, from the day the Revised Statutes were brought into force, the boundaries of some of the constituencies would be different from those boundaries as established by the Act of 1882. The Bill contains a short clause declaring that the meaning of the Representation Act is that every county, city, town, township, village, or other territorial division, shall be as it stood prior to the bringing into force of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think, if the hon. gentleman proposes to legislate literally in the direction he has mentioned, very serious inconvenience might arise. No inconvenience might arise where a whole municipality is taken into an adjoining constituency; but where the boundaries of a township are enlarged, and a small section is taken in, the hon. gentleman would leave that still a part of the constituency to which it had formerly belonged. That would be very inconvenient.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD That frequently happens.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then it seems to me that the municipality ought to remain unbroken. That is the way the constituency of the hon. Postmaster General was dealt with. If I rightly remember, London East was a part of the electoral district of East Middlesex before the enlargement of the city, but it was made part of the hon. gentleman's constituency before the recent election.

Mr. CARLING. It was part of the constituency in the Local election, but not in the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But there would be less difficulty where a whole municipality was taken in than where a small section was taken in. There might not be twelve voters in the section, and yet in making up the voters' lists they would have to be separated from the municipality to which they belonged. For instance, the extension of the boundaries of Chatham included not more than fifty electors, and if they were left a part of the adjoining constituency serious inconvenience might arise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think the principle was set early in our legislation that there should be no re-adjustment of the constituencies, either in regard to the boundaries or otherwise, except every ten years after the taking of the census, and I think it would really be well that we should adhere to that rule. Occasionally, by the addition of a rural portion of a county to a town, there may be a little inconvenience, but it would be much better that that little inconvenience should be borne than that we should have little Bills brought in on every alteration of the bounds of any municipality, either urban or rural, to alter the bounds of the constituencies for electoral purposes. We would have continual taunts of gerrymandering thrown across the floor. We had better leave the matter as it is, so that the electoral districts shall remain, both as to boundaries and otherwise, as they are until the next re-adjustment. Depend upon it, we would bring upon ourselves a great deal of trouble, and a great many objections from both sides of the House, by making any other alterations in the boundaries of constituencies, because if the argument of convenience is adopted in one case, that argument will apply in another, and various reasons will be given why it is convenient to alter the boundaries of constituencies. The boundary of a constituency should not be altered except once in ten years.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We had no such rule as that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think we have never deviated from that principle. You remember the Bill introduced some time ago.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Tuckersmith case in the other House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In the case of that measure this was considered the most inconvenient rule.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. JAMIESON moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors, except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed, shall be by the Dominion Government through specially appointed officers.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a desire on both sides of the House to expedite business and hasten the close of the Session; and in introducing the resolution of which I have given notice, I shall exercise the utmost brevity. The resolution is a very important one in many respects. It is important, first, in consideration of the interests involved to those engaged in the traffic of manufacturing or selling intoxicating liquors. In the second place, it is important to those who are affected by the traffic; and, in the third place, it is important to the Government, owing to the large amount of revenue which is derived from the traffic. Now, in introducing this resolution, I cannot overlook the very grave importance which is attached to it, and I trust that it shall receive very careful consideration at the hands of the members of this House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

While I do not invite an exhaustive discussion of the question, at the same time I trust that a number of the leading members on both sides of the House will favor us with their views upon it. I may say that this question has not been brought up of my own motion, although I am in full accord with it. I have been delegated to introduce it by the Dominion Alliance for the suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors. I am not prepared to contend that the opinions of the Dominion Alliance should prevail with the members of this House; at the same time I do say that its opinions are entitled to a great deal of weight. It represents the different temperance institutions and organizations of this Dominion, besides having within its membership a large number of laymen and clergymen from all parts of the Dominion. It was the desire of that body that the question of the prohibition of the traffic in intoxicating liquors should be brought before this House, and through this House before the country, the Alliance considering that the time had come when an expression of opinion should be given by this House, and by the country upon the question. It has been said in the public press that a private member has no right or authority to introduce prohibitive legislation in this House. I may say that I have looked into the question, and although I do not profess to be very high authority on questions of that kind, I have come to the conclusion that, did I think it proper, I have authority as a member of this House to introduce a prohibitory Bill here and have its provisions discussed and disposed of by the House. I am quite prepared to admit that a private member cannot initiate any legislation which will affect the revenue of the country by casting a burden upon them; but, so far as lessening the revenues of a country are concerned, that may be brought about by private legislation. However, we did not deem it necessary to introduce a prohibitory Bill this Session. We came to the conclusion that the matter could be brought before the House in the manner in which I brought it, by a resolution affirming the principle of the prohibition of the traffic, and indicating the general lines upon which prohibitory legislation should be framed. Should this resolution be carried it will become necessary to introduce a prohibitory Bill based upon the resolution. Now, I do not purpose at length going into the effects of this traffic upon the country at large. I believe it has been ascertained beyond doubt that the people of this Dominion expend annually in the neighborhood of $40,000,000 in intoxicating beverages. Certainly, they expend a very large sum, exceeding the whole revenue of the Dominion. In addition to that, I believe about three million bushels of grain are annually destroyed in the manufacture of intoxicating liquors. This grain is converted from its proper and legitimate use as human food into that which, in my judgment, is not only useless, but very injurious to the whole interests of the people. The large amount of money, which is expended in intoxicating liquors, must, to a very large extent, affect the trade and commerce of the country, and I have no doubt that if it were diverted from that purpose and turned into a more useful channel, it would bring about a much more salutary state of things in the country, and that every inhabitant of the country would be largely benefited. In addition to this there is no doubt that the traffic in intoxicating liquors is productive of a very large amount of vice. I am not going to enter into statistics, but on former occasions statistics have been given which point conclusively in that direction. I make a statement which, I think, cannot be gainsaid, that at least a large proportion of the crime of the country is directly attributable to the traffic in intoxicating liquor. I might call attention to the statement of Mr. Gladstone in reference to the traffic in England, which is equally applicable to the traffic here. He says:

"It has been said that greater calamities are inflicted on mankind by intemperance than by the three great historical scourges—war, pestilence and famine. That is true for us, and it is the measure of our discredit and disgrace."

Sir, the pathway of this traffic is strewn with the wrecked lives and fortunes and the blighted hopes of a large number of the inhabitants of this country, and if, by the strong arm of the law, we can put an end to that state of things, I have no doubt that the country would be largely the gainer. It is contended, that the landlords of Ireland have, by the operation of the law, brought about a very large number of evictions, but I have no hesitation in saying that the traffic in intoxicating liquors has evicted more people than ever did the landlords of Ireland or of any other country. It will be asked what remedy can we apply to this state of things? A great legal luminary has said that the object of all law is the well being of the governed. That can scarcely be questioned. It has been further said that that is the best law which produces the greatest good to the greatest number. Now, if by legal enactment we can bring about a better state of things in reference to this traffic, I think it is our bounden duty as representatives of the people to enact such a law. Some contend, perhaps honestly, that it is a most improper thing to pass what are called sumptuary laws; and some think that they sum up all the wisdom of the ages, when they say you cannot make a man sober by Act of Parliament. We have never contended we can, but we do contend that we should cease to make men drunk by Act of Parliament. So far as prohibitory legislation is concerned, the principle is not a new one. It is embodied in every law which we enact. Take, for instance, the license law. That is simply prohibition with licensed exceptions. We simply ask to carry the principle a little further. Where the license law prevails, 399 persons out of every 400 are prohibited from trafficking in intoxicating liquors. We simply ask to extend the principle a little further, and prohibit the 400th man from doing what the 399 men have been prohibited from doing. I believe the principle is a correct one. We are not asking this House to initiate a new principle. In several States of the Union they have prohibitory legislation. For instance, in the State of Maine for thirty-five years they have had a prohibitory law, and have been going on from year to year, making it more perfect. They have also a prohibitory law in New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Kansas and Iowa. In addition to that, in the State of Maine, three or four years ago, they passed an amendment to the State constitution, rendering it impossible ever to take a retrograde step upon the question of prohibition. I would point out, as an indication of the strong hold which the question of prohibition has taken on the people of that State, the fact that the prohibitory amendment to the constitution was carried by the overwhelming majority of 44,000 out of 84,000 votes polled. So far as the people of the State of Maine are concerned, they are perfectly satisfied with their prohibitory law. I may say further, that, as to the working of that law in the State of Maine, with the exception of a few of the larger cities, it is perfectly satisfactory. I will read a few statements made by Governor Bodwell of that State, in regard to the Maine law. He says:

"The question of the prohibition of the liquor traffic in Maine has engaged popular attention within the last year to a considerable extent. The agitation has resulted in a re-affirmation on the part of the people of their full faith in the prohibitory system, and of their desire to see the law fairly administered and fairly enforced. The situation in the State respecting the law may be briefly and candidly stated. In from three-fourths to four-fifths of the town of the State the law is well enforced and has practically abolished the sale of spirituous and malt liquors as a beverage. In the larger cities and towns, on the seaboard and at railway centres, it has been found more difficult to secure perfect compliance with the law, but it can still be said that at very few points in the State is liquor openly sold. The offences against the law are in large part clandestine, and therefore difficult to detect and expose by legal testimony. But it is a great moral gain when the liquor seller is driven from light of day to secret places, and to stealthy devices to carry on his hurtful and demoralising traffic."

That is the opinion of the Governor of the State of Maine. I believe that the working of the law has been satisfactory in other States which have adopted it. I am not advocating any new principle even so far as our own legislation is concerned. In 1864, the Parliament of the old Province of Canada, passed the Dunkin Act. Although that was by no means a perfect piece of legislation, and did not work as satisfactorily as the advocates of temperance could have desired, or did desire, still it gave the opportunity to the people of showing their disapprobation of the traffic in any municipality where they thought proper to do so. In addition to that, it embodied a principle which had never hitherto been conceded in this country—that was the principle of local option. However, the Dunkin Act was not considered just the piece of legislation which the temperance people of this country demanded, and a further agitation was gotten up for the purpose of improving the legislation in reference to the suppression of the traffic. In answer to the demand of the temperance people, in 1878 the Canada Temperance Act was conceded. That was a very great improvement on the Temperance Act of 1864, and it was laid hold of to a large extent by the people of this Dominion and put in operation, and in many cases, in my judgement, with a great deal of satisfaction. But even the Canada Temperance Act was not what the temperance people of this country sought for or demanded. They demanded the total suppression of the traffic in intoxicating liquors, but, being willing to accept part of what they asked, not being able to secure the whole, they have discharged their duty in operating the Canada Temperance Act. That Act has had two good effects; in the first place, of educating the people in reference to the effects of the traffic, and, in the second place, it has enabled them to sound public opinion on the subject of the prohibition of the traffic. At the present time in this Dominion, the Canada Temperance Act is in force in over sixty counties and cities, and has been carried by very large majorities. No political party appealing to the country has received such a response from the people as the response which the people gave in answer to the demand for the adoption of the Canada Temperance Act. But even the Canada Temperance Act is imperfect and very defective in several respects, and it is not a fair test of the public sentiment on the question of the prohibition of the traffic. It must be obvious to every hon. member of this House that, in order to make the prohibition of the traffic effective, we must not only be able to prohibit the sale, but we ought to be able to go further and prohibit the importation and manufacture. It is well known that the Canada Temperance Act only prohibits the sale, and does not go far enough, and, in our judgment, we ought now, in answer to the demand of the people, to receive a law which will enable us to prohibit not only the sale but the importation and the manufacture. I may say further, that the principle of the prohibition of the liquor traffic is not a new one in this Dominion. In 1873, the present Minister of Finance, then Minister of Customs, placed upon the Statute-book, through the Parliament of this country, a very important measure. I refer to the prohibition of the importation, sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors in the North-West of this Dominion; and, notwithstanding the reports which we hear from time to time from that section of our Dominion, that the law is not being enforced as it should be, I have the very best authority for knowing that it has been of very great benefit to the people of that section, and that it has to a very large extent prevented the traffic in intoxicating liquors. The only defect in connection with that legislation, in my judgment, was the power given to the Lieutenant Governor to permit the introduction of liquor without specifying that it was for such purposes as medicinal, chemical and sacramental. I understand, and I am afraid it is but too true, that that part of the law has not been observed as strictly as it should have been, and that there have been abuses which ought never to have been permitted in the North West Territories in connection with the administration of that law. Now, Sir, I have no doubt that it will be contended, and, perhaps, with some force, that we should not enact a prohibitory law until the people are prepared for it. But we do not always act upon that principle. I think that we have frequently, in this House, enacted laws for which the people were not fully prepared. I am strongly of the opinion that the law is a schoolmaster, and a very good schoolmaster too, that the law is an educator of public opinion, and a very good educator too; and that if the law in itself be right, that is all this House need ask itself before passing it. If the law be right, if the circumstances of the country demand it, let us pass the law, and let the law be enforced as it can be. I have no doubt it would be enforced, and properly enforced, and that the people would soon be educated up to it. In addition to that, I believe that this House, this Parliament, is pledged to pass a prohibitory liquor law. The House will, no doubt, recollect that, in 1884, the present Minister of Marine submitted a resolution to this House affirming the principle of the prohibition of the liquor traffic. That resolution was adopted with a certain amendment, and the House pledged itself to adopt prohibitory legislation when the country was prepared for it. Now, we hold that since that deliverance on the part of this Parliament, the country has spoken unmistakably in reference to the traffic in intoxicating liquors; that from one end of the country to the other, where the Canada Temperance Act has been submitted to the people, they have shown unmistakably that they are ready for the prohibition of the traffic. It was contended for some time that the jurisdiction of the Dominion Parliament and Provincial Legislatures in respect to this question, had not been sufficiently defined to enable this House to assume control of a question of this kind. But, Sir, no such contention as that is now available by the opponents of prohibition, because the highest authority in the realm has declared that with this Parliament alone rests the power to prohibit the liquor traffic. It will be said, doubtless, that it would be a most improper thing to pass a prohibitory law without giving proper notice, or without giving compensation to those engaged in the liquor traffic. Well, Sir, so far as those engaged in the traffic are concerned, I believe they ought to have due notice. In the event of a prohibitory law being passed by this Parliament, I believe it ought not to go into force immediately, and that a notice of two years to those engaged in the traffic, should be given before it went into force. So far as the question of compensation is concerned, I do not propose at the outset to touch it, because I intend to bring my remarks to a close shortly. It may be said that we who are advocating the prohibition of the liquor traffic have no proper sympathy with those whose interests are involved in it. Well, Mr. Speaker, I have sympathy for those whose interests are involved in it, but I have a deeper, a wider, a more intense sympathy for those who are injured by the traffic. Without extending my remarks any further, I beg to move the following resolution:—

That in the opinion of this House it is expedient to prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors except for sacramental, medicinal, scientific and mechanical purposes. That the enforcement of such prohibition and such manufacture, importation and sale as may be allowed, shall be by the Dominion Government through specially appointed officers.

Mr. FISHER. After the able statement which has been made by my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, I do not think there is any necessity for me to detain the attention of this House for any great length of time. I shall follow his good example by trying to make the statement

Mr. JAMIESON.

I have to make as short as possible. It has been my good fortune now, for the second time, to second in this Chamber a resolution of this character. When the Dominion Alliance in favor of the prohibition of the liquor traffic, decided on both occasions to have introduced into this Chamber a resolution in favor of prohibition, it was believed to be in the best interest of the cause that the resolution should be moved by some one belonging to the majority in this House, and seconded by some one chosen from the minority. That understanding has been carried out, and it fell to my lot on this occasion, as it did four years ago, to second this motion, in which I am so deeply interested, and with which I sympathise so thoroughly. In the present state of the temperance cause in this country, with the present general acceptance of the necessity of some legislation to restrict the evils which flow from the liquor traffic in this country, I do not think it is necessary to inflict upon this House a temperance lecture, or to prove the evils of the traffic. I find, Sir, that when we are arguing this question in the country those who are opposed to our proposition, do not dare to stand up and deny our assertions in that regard. I find that, as a rule, they acknowledge the evils of intemperance, and only differ from us in the method by which we propose to reduce those evils. Now, I believe that the only way in which the evils of the liquor traffic and the evils of intemperance can be reduced effectively, is by totally and absolutely prohibiting the traffic in, and the use of, liquor in this country. For a long time we have resorted to restrictive legislation of various kinds. We have had license laws passed by the various Provinces differing in degree, but all more or less restrictive of the traffic; and we have found in this country, as it has been found elsewhere, as it can be ascertained by anyone who examines the history of the prohibitory movement throughout the world, that just so far as the liquor traffic is restricted, just so far are the evils flowing from it diminished. Sir, in speaking upon this question four years ago, I dwelt upon this phase of the question at some length, and brought forward certain evidence which I am not going to bring forward to-day, but I believe that at that time the proposition I have just laid down was sufficiently proven. At all events, in the discussion which then took place and in the various criticisms on that discussion I have read in the newspapers, I have not seen that argument combated by those opposed to temperance. I believe in considering this question we as legislators sitting in the House of Commons are not only called upon to act in consequence of the moral obligations which are upon us, as those who are interested in measures to confer any benefit on our fellow human beings, but it is a duty which devolves upon us as legislators to bring about legislation which is in the direct interest of the prosperity and well-being of this country to which we have the honor to belong. In this view and with this idea I contend that it is one of the most important duties that can devolve on any Parliament or any public man that he should do his utmost to remove from the midst of the people he represents, the people for whom he is legislating, this great difficulty which lies in their way towards prosperity and towards a high tone of morality in this country. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat has quoted the opinions of a distinguished statesman. I will recall to the attention of hon. gentlemen that Mr. Gladstone, one of the greatest authorities on questions of high statesmanship and especially upon high moral statesmanship, has contended that it is the duty of the Government as it is the duty of the Legislature to assist the community in all that tends towards good and to remove from the community all which may make towards or which will tend towards evil. And, as I said a little while ago, even those interested in the liquor traffic, even those who profit by it, have receded from the contention that that traffic is good, or that the results of that traffic are not frightful. I am going to make a little argument on a point which I see is still taken up by those who oppose us in the demand for a prohibitory resolution. I allude to the argument that by such a law we are going to interfere with the legitimate liberty of the individuals. I confess that I look upon this argument as so manifestly absurd that I would not undertake for a moment to deal with it, were it not that I have met with a few honest people who are frightened, by the apparent importance of this argument, from acting with us. As the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has stated, we have already interfered with the liberty of the individual. In our various license laws we have prevented individuals from obtaining liquors at certain times and in certain places, we have forbidden the individual, except under certain rules and regulations, from obtaining liquor. It was stated a few minutes ago that in the North-West Territories we have forbidden the traffic in intoxicating liquors, we have absolutely prohibited the importation of intoxicating liquors into those Territories; and I had the testimony only yesterday of a gentleman who represents a portion of those Territories that that has been a good thing in those Territories, and he is in favor of it, and it has had a good effect in those Territories. More than that, the Dominion License Act passed by this Parliament gave the privilege, as far as we could, to an individual polling subdivision to prevent the traffic of intoxicating liquors within its limits. We have for a long time, as all hon. gentlemen who come from the Province of Quebec know, had on the Statute-book of that Province a provision that municipal councils have the privilege of refusing to allow the traffic in intoxicating liquors within their bounds. I am well aware that this will be said not to be a parallel case. I am well aware that while that was only to prohibit the traffic, this resolution is an absolute prohibition not only of the traffic, but of the use. I can, Sir, show a case in which this kind of restriction has already taken place in this country. I can show that we have laws here prohibiting other things besides liquor—prostitution is forbidden, also the carrying of concealed weapons and gambling, and these may be held up as parallel cases to that of intoxicating liquors. But our opponents may say: "It is true these things are forbidden, but it is because they are necessarily and inherently vicious." I have here before me a case in which I can show this House that a thing, which is not in itself in any sense or way necessarily vicious and evil, has been prohibited within certain bounds. By an Act of this House, which gives a charter to the city of Montreal, it is provided:

"The council of the said city shall have power and authority to prohibit the rearing and keeping or feeding of pigs within the limits of the said city or in such sections as the said council shall determine, and to pass a by-law to that purpose, and may impose by such a by-law a fine not exceeding twenty dollars or an imprisonment not exceeding two months, unless such fine be sooner paid, or may impose such fine, with the addition of the said imprisonment for the said offence, as may be deemed expedient."

This legislation is acted upon. The city of Montreal passed a by-law, and by the terms of that by-law they absolutely prohibited within certain sections of that city the keeping of pigs. Hon. gentlemen will know, and I can state positively, being a farmer and one who knows something about the keeping of such stock, that it is quite possible, and it is done, to keep pigs, either in a city or elsewhere, without their being in any sense offensive or causing an interference with sanitary arrangements, and, in fact, they are kept without any evil effect attending them. But here the power is given to a municipal council to prohibit the keeping of those animals within the bounds of that city, not to prohibit their keeping when they have been proved hurtful, when it has been proved that they were a nuisance; but in case they might prove to be a nuisance, the absolute prohibition of the right of any person to keep them within the city is laid down in the clause of the Act I have quoted. I say this is an absolutely analogous case. We are asking here for the total prohibition of the liquor traffic, not because we say that liquor cannot be used without abuse, not because we say that in any sense or every sense or in all cases liquor is necessarily bad or injurious, but because we have found by public experience in this country as all over the world that wherever liquor is used its use is necessarily attended by abuse, and we found upon that our contention that the necessary consequence is that its use as well as its abuse should be prohibited and forbidden. I contend that the law which I have quoted is a directly analogous case, that if we had the right to do that in Montreal we certainly have the right to do this over the whole Dominion of Canada. Hon. members say that this is a matter of degree; that this question in Montreal may affect only a few people, that it may affect perhaps half a dozen people in the country. But I say that in this country, where the liberties of the individual are so greatly cherished, if an injustice is done to half a dozen it is as great an injustice, and it is as wrongful for Parliament to do anything which would create that injustice, as it would be to do an injustice to nearly one half of the community. And, Sir, it is a mistake to suppose that there is a desire on our part to impose the will of the minority on the majority of the people of this country. We know very well—as everybody knows very well—that no law can be passed and effectively enforced in this country which is not backed by a majority of the people. We are here to-day representing the people of this country; as we represent those people we believe we express their views upon this matter, and that it is in consequence of a majority of those people desiring a thing like this that their representatives in this House insist upon that thing and pass it. But, Sir, there are other questions connected with this matter which I wish shortly to allude to this afternoon. Total prohibition has had discredit cast upon it in consequence of what has been adduced as the failure of local prohibition in this country. Sir, I join issue with those who bring forward that argument, by saying that I do not believe that local prohibition has failed in this country. Speaking from experience in my own county, where local prohibition has been in force for a great many years, I can say that local prohibition has done an immense amount of good there, and that it has been fairly effectively enforced. I am not going to say or pretend that local prohibition has been able absolutely and entirely to stop the sale of liquor in any locality in which it has been adopted. But this I do say in favor of the advocates of local prohibition, that where it has been adopted, where the people of the locality have decided that they wish to have it tried in their midst, they have fairly succeeded in stopping the sale of liquor, whether that sale be licit or illicit, whether it be open or secret. And even where this has not been the case, even where I am not able to say this as boldly as I do, I will not acknowledge that that argument when brought before this House, is a fair justification for the House refusing to pass a totally prohibitory resolution. It is true that the Scott Act has been enforced for some little time, in a large number of the constituencies of this country. It is true that before the Scott Act was in force, the Dunkin Act was in force in some of these constituencies. But both of these measures are defective. The Dunkin Act was defective, and in consequence of the defects of the Act the temperance people of the country came to Parliament and demanded a more effective law. That law was given in the Canada Temperance Act of 1878; and we have found by experience, since that law was adopted in various parts of the country, since the question of jurisdiction was finally decided by the decision of the Privy Council, since the doubts and difficulties regarding the constitutional question which came up in connection with that law have been removed, we have found that there are defects in the details of that law by which it is very difficult indeed for the temperance people of the country to enforce it. We find a burden has been laid on the advocates of that law which is not laid on the advocates of any other law on the Statute-books of the country. In the case of any ordinary law, the Government of the country has to provide the machinery for its enforcement; that obligation rests upon their shoulders; but no such obligation has been laid upon the Government in the case of the Canada Temperance Act. It is unfortunately the fact that, while the temperance people of the country have approached the Government again and again, and urged them to assume this responsibility of enforcing the Scott Act, as they enforce other laws on the Statute-book, the Government has turned a deaf ear to their demands, has been indifferent to their requests; and more than that, when the temperance people laid before the Government a scheme by which they might, by means of an Order in Council, bring about some help to the temperance people in enforcing that law, the Government disregarded those representations and passed an Order in Council, which, instead of assisting in the more effective enforcement of the law, placed an additional difficulty in the way of those who were trying to enforce it, and to-day we are no better off than we were before. I will not now enter into the question of the duty of the Government in the premises; I will not enlarge upon what I consider to be a disgrace to the people of Canada—that the law upon their Statute-books is not properly enforced by the authorities who are under moral, and I believe legal, obligations to enforce it. But I point out that, if in some localities the Scott Act has not been an absolute success, that condition of things is not due to the temperance people. It is not due to any absolute failure in the principles which are embodied in that law, but it is due to defects in the law which the Government have not seen their way clear to remove or remedy. Now, Sir, great objection has been brought against total prohibition, on the ground that the people of the country are not prepared for it; that we require a stronger moral backing for enforcement of this law than we have got; and in that respect it has been compared with various laws upon the Statute-books. But, Sir, I contend that those analogies are not fair ones. I contend that it is not fair to compare this law with such laws as those against theft or murder or other crimes. But we have on our Statute-books other laws which are directly analogous to this—laws which stand in exactly the same relation to the community as a prohibitory law would. I allude to the license laws of the country particularly, and to the Customs law. But I will not go further than to take the license laws, which are exactly and absolutely parallel in every respect to this question of total prohibition. What are the facts of the case? It has been said that if one man picks another's pockets on the streets, everyone who saw the act would immediately try to arrest the thief and enforce the law against stealing, and that as that is not done in the case of total prohibition, therefore the country is not prepared for this kind of legislation. But I would ask the House if the present license laws of the country will bear any better comparison with, say the law against theft, than the supposed case of total prohibition? I would ask whether any ordinary individual who, say on a Sunday, passes a hotel and sees an open bar-room, would immediately go and inform against the individual who is offending against the law? I would ask if when such a person sees two individuals go into a back room of a country hotel, pay for their liquor and get it and drink it; or, if he should see a minor go to the bar of such a hotel and get liquor from the hotel-keeper and pay his money for it—I would ask if any ordinary individual, seeing any of these infractions of the law, would take upon himself immediately to go and inform upon the law-breaker, and enforce the law? We know only too well he would not; and I could point to many instances within a few hundred yards of where we sit, which show that this is not the case, and that day after day, month after month, the license laws of this Province and of other Provinces of the Dominion are broken, and that ordinary individuals do not think it to be their duty to try and enforce these laws. Now, those are exactly analogous cases to what might be supposed to occur under prohibition. They deal with the same class of people, they appeal to the same feelings in the human breast as would be appealed to by a prohibitory law. And yet when we find that those laws are broken, and broken with impunity, every day, those who say we should not pass a prohibitory law because the people are not ready to enforce it, ought in consistency, if they carry out their views to their logical conclusion, to demand the repeal of every license law which is now upon our Statute-books. But no; they are quite ready to have license laws; they are quite ready to allow other people's desire for liberty to be interfered with; but when the question comes home to themselves, and they find that in consequence of a total prohibitory law, they personally will not be able to get the liquor which they think is good for them, while some poor wretch is not allowed to get what he thinks is good for him, then the argument comes home to them, then they are touched in their own persons and their selfish enjoyments, and then they spring to arms and demand that the liberty of the individual shall not be interfered with. Sir, I contend that this is simply class legislation. I contend that the Scott Act, as compared with a total prohibitory law, is a piece of class legislation. It is an Act by which individuals who are not rich enough to buy the liquor wholesale and bring it to their houses cannot get it; but the same individuals who are glad enough to pass that and to acknowledge that partial prohibition is a good thing, when they find that they are not allowed to have liquor under any circumstances, or at any time or place, will not allow prohibition, and they speak against it, and argue against it; but I think that convicts them out of their own mouths. There are another large class in the community who are opposed to a total prohibitory liquor law, those are called Liberal Temperance Unionists. As I have understood their platform, they are quite prepared to forbid strong drinks, but they wish that beer and wines should be allowed; and, certainly, if it is allowable that we should interfere with the liberty of the individual in drinking alcoholic drinks such as brandy and whiskey, we are entitled to interfere with the liberty of the individual just as much in drinking wine and beer, and I think there is an insidious danger in the advocacy of this beer and wine proposition which I warn temperance men against. If beer and wine are allowed to be sold where spirits are not, the result will be to lead to the strengthening in alcohol of those liquors, and they will, in a short time, be even worse than the liquors which those gentlemen propose to prohibit. Unfortunately, one of the greatest dangers in connection with liquor drinking and the traffic is the danger of adulteration, and those liquors are abominably poisoned by almost all the manufacturers and retailers. I believe the adoption of the beer and wine proposition would lead to a further adulteration, and I warn all temperance men against allowing themselves to be led away by such an insidious proposition. There is another point on which I wish to compare the License Act and the Scott Act with a prohibitory law. It is said that a prohibitory law would not be effective, and the license laws are held up as being much preferable. I am going to make a statement which I have thought over very carefully and closely, and which I make after a great deal of personal observation. I say that in the Province of Quebec, with regard to which I speak with personal knowledge, there is just as much illegal sale of liquor in License Act counties as in the Scott Act counties; and in addition to the illegal sale, there is the whole legal sale that is permitted under the License Act. In other words, I say that the license laws of the Province of Quebec are not one bit better enforced than the Scott Act is in those counties of the Province where it has been adopted. I have a statement from a learned gentleman who is well known to everybody in this House; I speak of Mr. J. J. McLaren, advocate, of Toronto, formerly of Montreal. True, he is a prominent temperance advocate, but is at the same time a gentleman well known for his ability, integrity and character, and a gentleman whose position at the bar of Ontario has given him almost unlimited means of observation in the various parts of that Province where he has been enabled to see the working of the Scott Act and the Crooks Act. Mr. McLaren says exactly the same thing of the Province of Ontario as I say of the Province of Quebec, and he has stated to me his firm conviction that in those counties of Ontario where the Crooke Act is in force, there is just as much liquor sold illegally, to drunkards, to minors, on Sunday, and by people who have not licenses as there is in the Scott Act counties. Those who oppose us contend that the failure of the Scott Act is a reason why no prohibitory law should be passed in this country. They must also propose to work for the abolition of the license laws to be consistent. But I do not believe they wish to do so. I believe as a matter of fact that the restrictive license laws of this country have helped us to restrict the liquor traffic. I believe that by the Scott Act we have been able still further to restrict the traffic, and I believe that when we are able to pass a prohibitory law, it will be but a short time before we shall be able to point to such a reduction in the liquor traffic, and in the use of liquor in this country, as will conduce to immense strides of prosperity in this land, and we shall be able to boast of Canada, not only as the country in which the least liquor is consumed on the face of the earth, as I believe is to-day the case, but as a land in which scarcely any liquor is consumed. Now, before taking my seat, I want to say one or two words about the terms of this resolution. Hon. gentlemen will remember that, in 1884, we passed a resolution in this House somewhat similar to the present one, stating in general terms that it was the duty of Parliament to pass a prohibitory law just as soon as the people of the country are prepared for it. I believed then that the time had come for a prohibitory law in this country; and I believe that the country is still better prepared for prohibition to-day than it was in 1884. But this resolution, while repeating the bald proposition that it is the duty of Parliament to pass this law, goes a little further, and asks that the Government of the Dominion shall be empowered, and that it shall be their duty, to take charge of the manufacture of, and the traffic in, such liquor as may be needed, even under a prohibitory law, for arts, science and manufacturing purposes. Sir, we do not propose this resolution with any desire or intention of conflicting with the local authorities. I am one of those who insisted most strongly, a few years ago, that this Parliament had not the right to deal with licenses for selling liquor in the various Provinces. And this portion of the resolution I believe in no way interferes with that power of the Local Legislatures. Far be it from me to support anything that is going to interfere with provincial rights; but I believe we are perfectly within our competence to say that the manufacture of and dealing in such liquor as shall be necessary shall be carried on by the Dominion Government under the regulations and control of the various Provinces. If the Dominion Government would appoint special officers, whose duty would be to attend to the manufacture and the sale or distribution of these liquors—of course the manufacture would be under the control of the Dominion authorities, as it is to-day, and the sale would be subject to the control of the provincial authorities—if the Dominion Government would appoint officers whose duties it would be to sell the liquor or distribute it in the various localities throughout the Dominion, these officers would have to be licensed by the local authorities, and be subject to such rules in regard to the distribution of the liquors as the local authorities would choose to impose on them. In this way there would be no conflict between the Dominion and the local authorities. Such conflict I wish to avoid, such conflict I would deeply deplore, because I know well that, in the past, the greatest difficulty in the way of the temperance movement has been the conflict between the constitutional rights of the Dominion and of the local authorities. I wish, therefore, to impress upon the House that this resolution, as it stands, in no way brings about a conflict between the respective rights and privileges of the Legislatures of the Dominion and the various Provinces. I have said that I intend to be brief, and I shall be brief; and I regret that, in consequence of that intention, I cannot deal with this question as fully as its importance would justify and its merits require. I know that, at this period of the Session, all are anxious that we should get through business without delay, and I do not wish to obstruct or interfere with the progress of business, especially as I am well aware this question has been thoroughly discussed and dealt with in all parts of the country. I know it was an important factor in the last general elections, and that it is looked upon by the people as likely to be a great factor in the coming elections, whenever they may occur. I believe we may leave this question now in the hands of the House, to be discussed from every point of view, being convinced that every hon. gentleman will act on this question according to what he believes to be the interests of his people and the opinion of the constituency he represents, and, no doubt, will represent those opinions and interests by the vote he will give on this resolution.

Mr. GIROUARD. I must congratulate the proposer and seconder of this resolution on their perseverance in bringing this important matter to the notice of the House. Its importance is so great that I believe they cannot do so too often. Hon. gentlemen and their friends outside the House believe that the evil of intemperance which we all deplore, can only be cured by prohibition. I, on previous occasions, expressed the opinion that I did not believe in entire prohibition as a remedy for intemperance. I am one of those who believe that the use of beer and of cider, claret and other light wines, is better calculated to make people temperate than entire prohibition. Prohibit, if you like, alcohol, for the history of the world tell us that alcohol is the source of the whole trouble. This question of intemperance, which seems to be a new one in this world, is not at all new in the old one. It was first raised some time after alcohol was introduced into society, about the 13th century. Before that time, drunkenness was known, because beer and wine were known, and drunken men were and have been found at all times; but, until the 16th century, no one expressed the opinion that you could cure a drunken man by prohibition. If you look back to the time of Christ, will you find that our Lord preached prohibition? On the contrary, instead of forcing water upon the company at a wedding, he turned that water into wine. Let us look now at the efforts to suppress intemperance since alcohol was introduced. In the 13th century, a plant was discovered in Africa, which produced alcohol, and was used only for medicinal purposes for nearly 150 years. Its use did not become general, and its effects were not felt; but, about the end of the 15th or the beginning of the 16th century, the discovery was made that alcohol could be produced from grain, and then the use of alcohol became general, especially in Germany and in northern countries. It was not introduced into England until about the beginning of the 18th century, at which period it was also introduced into France, Spain and Italy. Then intemperance became general and alarming, and the attention of legislators was called to this state of society. Prohibition was introduced from 1524 to 1652 in Brandenburg, Whittenberg, Frankfort and Saxony. It was introduced into Sweden in 1752. The legislatures of these countries, however, had to repeal these prohibitory laws, because it was found that under them, intemperance, instead of decreasing, was increasing. I have before me my authorities for so stating—because I took the trouble during recess to import from Europe three or four volumes on the subject—and all of them prove beyond a shadow of doubt that prohibition was a failure. In Sweden, the Government took possession of the distilleries, but even that was not sufficient to check or stop the evil, and in those countries they had to resort, as they had to in England, France, Spain and Italy, to stricter regulations of the sale of liquors. Statistics show that the use of alcohol increases as the use of light wines decreases. In Paris, from 1854 to 1864, in Marseilles, from 1865 to 1871, alcohol nearly doubled in use and wines decreased in use in about the same proportion. I find in one of these books which I procured, a very singular incident at the very beginning of this social evil. In the year 1581, about the first temperance society was established, under authority of the law, in Hesse (Lefort, page 27). What was the object of that temperance society? Every member of it was allowed to use seven glasses of wine at a meal, and besides all the beer he wanted, but he was not allowed to take a single glass of alcoholic liquor. It is evident, therefore, that the people of those days saw in alcohol the origin of intemperance, and they were in a better position than we are to pass a judgment upon the subject. What has been our experience in the new world? Let us take the statistics of our own country which were produced before the House in 1885. They show that Canada was the most sober country in the world, and also that the Province of Quebec, where, perhaps, more light wines and beer are used than anywhere else in Canada, was the most temperate Province of the Dominion. Prohibition has been introduced in many States in the Union since 1854; in Maine, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, Vermont, Connecticut, Michigan, Iowa, Kansas, Delaware and New Hampshire. The proposer of this resolution mentioned the names of a few of these States, no doubt because in the other States the prohibitory law had to be repealed, having been a failure, as it was in the old world. Look at the Scott Act. I ask any hon. member who knows where the Scott Act is in force, what the experience of the people is in regard to that Act. I think it is generally admitted that it is a failure. The hon. member who has just sat down says that if it did not have the good effect which was expected, that was due to the Government, who refused to introduce the necessary changes to the Act. We have had enough legislation every Session in this House to see that this accusation is altogether groundless. Finally, it has been said that in 1884 this Parliament pledged itself to prohibition. There is a resolution, in fact, in favor of prohibition, but it is with a certain condition which has not been fulfilled. The condition is that prohibition shall be introduced by Parliament so soon as the people of the country pronounce in favor of it. Where are the petitions before the House in favor of prohibition? I have been here at every sitting of the House this Session, and I do not recollect a single petition being presented in favor of such a measure as the one which is before the House. Before taking my seat, I may say that to my mind the question is so simple, and I think it is to every French member of this House, that I do not think it necessary to dwell any longer upon this subject, but I will quote from one of these books, "Intempérance et Misère," in which Mr. Lefort, an eminent member of the Society of Political Economy of France, says (page 229):

" Dans les pays où le législateur a voulu remplir le rôle de moraliste, les effets de la contrainte n'ont pas eu un grand succès, et de l'avis d'un adversaire déclaré de l'intempérance, le Dr. Jolly, en Suède, en Prusse et dans quelques Etats de l'Allemagne, le fléau n'a pu encore être conjuré, malgré l'empire des lois."

Mr. GIBOUARD.

And on page 270, he says:

" Comme, en effet, l'abus de l'alcool dilué au titre de l'eau-de-vie commune et aromatisé ou non crée beaucoup plus de dangers que le vin, le cidre ou la bière, et comme les ivrognes sont pour la plupart, si ce n'est tous, des buveurs d'alcool, il est urgent de restreindre la consommation des eaux-de-vie au profit de celles des boissons utiles pour la santé, en grevant les premières de droits très lourds et en dégrevant le plus possible les autres."

After making another quotation, I will submit to the House the amendment which I intend to propose to the main resolution. Frank Leslie's Illustrated Paper of the 30th May, 1885, says:

" The question of encouraging beer and light wines is not likely to be laughed down or safely ignored. It will make itself heard and demand consideration. Neal Dow's recent statement that ardent spirits were causing more distress in Maine than ever before, coupled with the admitted failure of prohibition in Kansas and Iowa makes it imperative that the problem of drunkenness be re-examined."

I, therefore, move, seconded by Mr. Ward, that all the words after "that" be omitted, and the following substituted therefor:—

This House, while admitting that brandy, gin, whiskey and other alcoholic liquors might be prohibited, is of opinion that the dealing in and sale of ale, porter, lager beer, cider, claret and other light wines, should be exempt from the operation of the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I rise to a question of order. I wish to ask if that amendment is really in order. It recommends an amendment to the Canada Temperance Act, commonly known as the Scott Act. It is not an amendment to the resolution before the House.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER. As I understand the resolution, this is really an amendment to the resolution before the House. I think it is relevant to the proposition contained in the resolution.

Mr. FREEMAN. A good deal of apology has been made in reference to the occupying of time on this question, which I think is altogether unnecessary. A great deal of time has been occupied on matters of very much less importance than this great question, and I think a few hours of the time of this House cannot be occupied in a better manner than in discussing this grave question, inasmuch as this country, this whole Dominion of Canada, is waiting to hear what the verdict of this House will be upon this question, and I think it will not be treating the people of the Dominion of Canada with that deference they deserve to be treated with if this matter is got over lightly and without examining it thoroughly. The way in which I look at this question is this: I ask myself, first, is this liquor traffic an evil? That is the great question which we have before us to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. FREEMAN. It is well that those gentlemen who declare that the liquor traffic is not an evil, should have an opportunity of expressing themselves. I had fears that the Dominion of Canada might return a great many members to Parliament who believe that the liquor traffic is not an evil, and I believe that this declaration of theirs will open the eyes of their constituents when they hear it. It will give them a better idea of the views of those members of Parliament when they hear that declaration that the liquor traffic is not an evil. The whole world has come to the conclusion that the liquor traffic is an evil. Show me to-day a man of eminence in this country, or in any other country, who says the liquor traffic is not an evil, and that will be something I never heard of before. It is true that at the commencement of this century there were people who thought the liquor traffic was not an evil, but the advancement of the Christian civilisation of this nineteenth century has opened the dark caverns of this abominable traffic, and has allowed the people to look in and to see the abominations which are carried on within. Every man who has looked at the matter with an unprejudiced mind, rises up to declare that it is one of the greatest evils that our country is afflicted with. Take that eminent man who visited the city of Ottawa a few days ago, that eminent divine from England, who stands high in the estimation of all philanthropists, of all men of education and of worth, and ask him what the liquor traffic is doing for the people in England? Ask him whether the liquor traffic is an evil, and those gentlemen would stand abashed before him as he gives his answer, as he gave it in Ottawa a few days ago. The most eminent judges have declared that it is an evil, and they speak from personal observation and after studying the statistics of the country, and they declare that it is one of the greatest evils with which the country is afflicted. Now, Sir, the next question which comes to my mind is this: Has this Parliament power to deal with it? I will go further than that, and I will ask: Is it the duty of this Parliament to deal with it? I have before me the decision of an eminent judge of the Supreme Court of the United States, on a case that came before him in an appeal from the Supreme Court in Massachusetts. He declared in the most emphatic language that it is not only the privilege of the Legislature to deal with questions like this, affecting the well-being, the prosperity and the happiness of the people, but that it is the duty of the Legislature to deal with such questions. I agree with that decision, and I say it is the duty of this Parliament to prohibit a traffic which endangers the lives of the people, which destroys the happiness of the people, which jeopardises in fact the very life of the nation; I say it is the duty of this House to step in between the people and this terrible traffic by which they are threatened. Now, the hon. gentleman who spoke last undertook to tell us that you must cure drunkenness with alcohol. Well, Sir, that is an extraordinary proposition, for that is just what his proposition amounts to—that you must cure drunkenness with alcohol, in the form of beer and wine. Well, Sir, take the poor drunkard that you pick up off the street, and give him a dose of alcohol. You may mix it with dirty water just as much as you please, and give it to him and ask him how he feels. What is beer, Sir, but alcohol diluted, and diluted with dirty ingredients? Extract me alcohol out of beer, and what have you left? There is not an hon. member in this House that would drink a drop of it if you were to pay him for it. That is what beer is, and are you going to give the people beer to cure them of drunkenness? But the hon. gentleman says that light wines will also cure drunkenness. I wonder if there is any alcohol in light wines. Give the people light wines and they will not drink alcoholic liquor, says the hon. gentleman. Sir, that is an entire fallacy, it is ridiculous to suppose that drinking light wines will cure drunkenness. If you want to know what beer and light wines are, try them on your boy. Take your little boy, if you please, who has never yet tasted the accursed thing. I would not suppose that you have got them in your house, but take him into one of those corner shops where they are exposed for sale, and treat him with some of this alcohol and see whether he would be willing to drink it. No, Sir, his normal taste will reject it. By-and-bye, if you cultivate that taste, you may get him to love it, perhaps, as well as his father loved it. In his normal condition he will not taste alcohol in any form, but you can educate him to it, and that is the way every drunkard is educated. He gets a taste for liquor and his taste is educated from beer to wine, from wine to brandy, and so on to whiskey, until finally he becomes a drunkard. Now, I say that is just what beer will do, it educates a man to become a drunkard. But you tell me that men do not get drunk in beer houses. I have seen them many a time, and many hon. gentlemen here who have gone into beer houses, must have seen besotted men sitting around the table drinking beer; and still you tell me that beer does not tend to drunkenness; you tell me that beer does not educate in the use of alcoholic drinks. The hon. gentleman tells us to go to France. Why Sir, there is not a more drunken country, perhaps, in the world, and that is the great country for light wines. If I had time I could produce testimony to prove my statements, the testimony of distinguished Frenchmen. Let me refer to the hon. gentleman to Count Montalembert, and see what he says about drunkenness in France. Then the hon. gentleman tells us that they have adopted a beer law in England. I do not know whether he said it was very successful, but he tried to leave the impression upon the House that the beer law in England was successful. How successful was it? What did Sir Sidney Smith say about it a few months after the law was passed? Why, Sir, he said:

"The new beer bill has begun its operations. Everybody is drunk. Those who are not singing are sprawling. The sovereign people are in a beastly state."

That was the effect of the beer law. No law that has ever passed in England proved a greater failure than the beer law. Recorder Hill, in one of his charges said:

"The establishment of the beer shop is universally denounced as a curse upon the land."

This is the kind of remedy which the hon. gentleman proposes in this country as a cure for drunkenness. The Committee of the House of Lords, in 1840, reported of the beer houses:

"They are notorious for the sale of an inferior article; that the absolute consumption of (ardent) spirits has, from whatever cause, far from diminished."

Here the committee states that through the use of beer the absolute consumption of spirits had "far from diminished." This committee also reported this to Parliament, and I think we ought to place some confidence in their report: "The comforts and morals of the poor have been seriously impaired"—that is through the operations of the beer law. Among the testimony before that committee was that of Chaplain Clay:

"I believe it impossible for human language to describe the misery and wickedness added to the previous sum of our moral and social ills, by beer houses."

Gentlemen, have you any confidence in such testimony as this? If you have, I am sure that you will consider it as, at least, of equal weight, and as equally binding upon your consciences, as the testimony the hon. gentleman has given us. The Lower House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, a body having ecclesiastical supervision over a population of fourteen millions, adopted the report of a commission who declared, after an elaborate investigation, that of "The direct causes of our national intemperance, one of the foremost and most prolific, as it appears to your commission, is the operation of the Legislative Act which called beer houses into existence."

Here are some answers to a number of questions:

"Beer shops the curse of the country."
 "Intemperance much increased since beer shops were introduced some years ago—specially among the young men."
 "I gave ten pounds a year out of my own pocket (a clergyman) to a man for giving up a beer house."
 "The beer houses as present conducted are a social pest." "An unmitigated nuisance."
 "Intemperance decreased previous to, increased since, enactment of the beer shop Act."

There are some hundred answers to questions similar to these, and I need not read any further from them. This is the evidence with respect to beer shops in England. In the United States a beer law was also authorised. They had some weak-kneed temperance men there, holding the same opinion as the hon. gentleman, who advocated the passing of the beer law. In the United States they did pass such a law. How long did they keep it in force? They passed it twenty years ago, but those far-seeing people knew better than to retain it, and during its third year the law was repealed and we have not heard anything of it since. Instead of a beer law they have been agitating for a prohibitory law, and that is the law to cure intemperance and drunkenness. We have been told that the local option act, the Scott Act, has not been successful here. Those opposed to prohibition say to us: "We have given you a law, but you do not work it; we have given you a law, but you have not made it a success." Have the temperance men had delegated to them the peace and prosperity of this country? Are they responsible for the good order and government of this country, that they should be taunted with not having kept down drunkenness, that they have not lessened the number of men who have entered the poor houses, asylums, work-houses and penitentiaries? Are they to be twitted with the fact that those places are still being filled with the victims of drunkenness, the victims of the liquor traffic, the victims of those places where alcoholic liquors are sold? I say, no. They should not be twitted with that fact. If this law has not been so successful as it might have been, if it has not done all the good it might and ought to have done—and we admit it has not—we can point to half a dozen other laws which have not conferred all the benefit that they were intended to confer. But is that any reason why we should open the flood-gates to intemperance and drunkenness and their attendant evils? I say, no. If this law is not wide enough to accomplish all that it should accomplish, give us a law more likely to be successful, and appliances for working the law so that we may put down this terrible evil. There is no question about the evil. I saw in a Toronto paper the other day that thirty-one poor fellows were brought before the police magistrate on one morning—thirty-one men, thirty-one victims, thirty-one men who probably but for this accursed traffic would have been honest and honorable citizens, holding good positions in society and not disgraced by standing before a police magistrate. Go into any part of our country and see the ravages of intemperance, although I am proud to say that there is less evil of this kind in Canada than in other countries; but go into the homes of the poor and see the wretchedness prevailing there because of drunkenness. See the pauper children, see children without fathers or mothers or guardians. See the misery everywhere around where drunkenness prevails, and tell me whether we should not have a prohibitory law so that this evil may be banished from our midst. Again, as to what the Scott Act has done. It has done a marvellous amount of good in Canada. I am sorry to have to believe that in Ontario and Quebec it has not done the good it has done in the Lower Provinces. I am very sorry to be forced to believe that in all temperance matters the people of the Upper Provinces are far behind us at the sea shore. I am sorry to find it so, but you want more education, and you want a less number of wine and beer temperance men. They are the curse of any cause—those wine and beer people. They say: "Oh, I am a temperance man, I am exceedingly temperate, and I am going to help you to promote temperance." How do they do it? They say the way to make people temperate is to give them beer and wine. I say, no; that is the trouble with you up here, I believe. Out of the seventeen counties in Nova Scotia thirteen have adopted the Scott Act, and in many of them it is working grandly. We are putting down the liquor sellers. In many of the counties there has been very little liquor sold; and there is not a county in Nova Scotia—I would hardly include Halifax, for I must be a little careful here, and I will put Halifax out of the way—I believe there is not one county in Nova Scotia where half the liquor is sold that was sold

Mr. FREEMAN.

when the Scott Act was first passed. We are becoming a teetotal people, an abstaining people, very rapidly. Let me tell you more. The people of Nova Scotia will rise up very shortly and declare that they will have a prohibitory law. Whether you will give it to us or not is another question, but we are going to demand it. Whoever speaks after me as to this Act, and speaks of this law being a failure, must except Nova Scotia. But I am informed by those well able to judge, and when I look at the number of Scott Act counties in Ontario I cannot but believe, that there is a great deal of good, honest temperance sentiment in Ontario, as I hope there is in Quebec. I have read the grand, noble declaration of the clergy of the dominant church in Quebec, and I have read the fulminations of these men, honest, emphatic fulminations against this terrible traffic. I have said to myself that Quebec will come up with Nova Scotia in a very short time, and I am amazed that Quebec is not more forward than she is in this grand work. I have seen the position taken by the clergy of Quebec. I have read their declarations, and I am informed that there is there a little army of prohibition teetotal men who are laboring to put down this abominable traffic, and I am sure their efforts will be successful. I am confident they will be stimulated by the grand work of Cardinal Manning. If I had time I would read the declaration of Cardinal Manning on this terrible evil afflicting England. He has declared that he would be willing to give his life if he could save the lives of the multitude who are running to ruin by following strong drink. I was exceedingly sorry, my heart was pained within me, when I heard an hon. gentleman bring up to-day the name of the blessed Redeemer. What man worthy of the name of a Christian dares to use the name of the blessed Redeemer for any other purpose than for a holy purpose, and, when the hon. gentleman brought in His name in connection with dirty beer and intoxicating wine he must have felt he was sadly in need of something to support his cause. He said that the blessed Redeemer turned water into wine. Our heart would tremble at the idea that the Saviour of mankind, who travelled up and down the world for no other purpose than for benefiting the human race—to say that He, who travelled up and down the world to do the people good, would turn water into the beastly intoxicating liquor such as they have in this country, that takes men's brains away, that destroys their happiness and comfort, that reduces their families to misery and makes them drunkards, of whom He himself declared that they could never enjoy everlasting life; it is a monstrous idea that cannot be entertained, and one that I hope will not prevail among us. Now, Sir, I do not think it would be wise for me to occupy longer the time of the House; I think I have said all I ought to say on this question. I have simply to repeat what I said at the outset, and that is, that the people of this Dominion are anxiously waiting to ascertain what the vote of this House will be on this great question, and I trust that it will be such a vote as the temperance people will approve of. We have heard a great deal since we came here about the waste of money—I use the words which have been used here; and I am sure there is no hon. gentleman in this House but feels that it is cruel and sinful to waste anything which is produced by the hard labor of the people. We have heard the Government accused of this by members on the other side of the House, but I will not deal with that charge one way or the other. We were told to-day that there is expended by the people of the Dominion of Canada no less than forty millions of dollars in strong drink. I presume that is the direct cost of the liquor traffic; I will take that for granted, for I do not know whether it is exactly correct or not. Now, let us add the indirect cost of this traffic. I believe statisticians, and those who try to calculate the indirect loss arising from the use of intoxicating liquors, put it at forty millions of dollars among the five millions of people who inhabit this Domjion. There you have eighty millions of money thrown away by the people of this country—money worse than wasted—money used for the purpose of disseminating sickness and death, of degrading the people, lowering them in their own estimation, taking away from them the grand position they occupy, as having been created in the image of God, taking away from them the very thing that lifts them above the level of the beasts, destroying their senses and degrading their intellects. I say, Sir, if this is the case, should not we all be interested in this waste of money, this throwing away of the hardly-earned wages of the people. Should not we all be desirous of saving this $80,000,000 to this country next year, making the country $80,000,000 richer, and going on from year to year, by passing and properly enforcing a prohibitory law all over this Dominion. Then, Sir, you will hear no more complaints about hard times, no more complaints about the country going down to ruin, no more complaints about farms being mortgaged, but you will find general prosperity amongst all the people by reason of this saving. Besides that you will save an immense amount of labor. Statisticians tell us in a way that we cannot doubt that the use of liquor, not to the extent of drunkenness, but moderately used by laboring men, destroys their labor to a certain extent. The great firm of Ames & Co., of Boston, Mass., who employed 400 workmen, took an account of their own wages and the product of the labor they employed the year after the prohibition law was repealed, and they found that the loss of labor among men who were regularly at work, and were never found to be drunk, amounted to some 14 or 20 per cent., I forget which. The use of liquor takes away the direct power of endurance, it destroys men's intellects, and injures them physically and morally. In consideration of these views I beg to say to the House that I intend to vote for total prohibition; and I beg the hon. gentlemen of this House, and I appeal especially to those temperance men who are a little weak, whether their weakness is in their knees, or in their backs, or in their taste; I beseech them to throw off this weakness, to gird up their loins, and strengthen themselves with the assurance that they will be well rewarded for their vote. I say to them to gird up their loins, to get up a little enthusiasm and vote for this prohibitory liquor resolution. Let it go forth to the people of Canada that this new House voted in favor of a prohibitory law, and, Sir, we will all feel prouder and better for it when we return home.

Mr. CARGILL. I rise to make a few remarks relative to this subject. I may just say that the speaker who preceded me became very enthusiastic, and I think that men who become so enthusiastic are apt to go to extremes. I am not learned in the cause of temperance; I am not well read upon it, and consequently will not be able to favor the House with extracts from eminent authors. I only rise to give my practical experience of the operation of the Scott Act in the county in which I reside, where it was adopted in the year 1885, and where it has been in operation for about two years. Now, my experience as to the operation of the Scott Act is quite the reverse of that of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat. If you will allow me to diverge somewhat, in order to explain my connection with the Scott Act, I might say that in the year 1871, I bought a tract of timber from the Ontario Government, known as the Greenock Swamp, in the county of Bruce. Shortly afterwards, I erected mills there for the purpose of manufacturing that timber into lumber. As my business increased, a great many persons in quest of lumber made their way there by rail. There being no hotel accommodation in the place, I was under the necessity of taking these people to my own house and affording them accommodation over night. While there were not too many,

I had no serious objection to doing this, as it afforded me much pleasure to entertain people, especially customers in quest of lumber. But after a time they became so numerous that my house was more like a hotel than a private residence, and consequently I concluded to curtail my business in this line. Finally I sold a site to a party who was anxious to erect a hotel in the place. He went to work, and shortly afterwards had a comfortable hotel erected for the accommodation of the travelling public. For some time the hotel was conducted properly, and every person who had occasion to stop there over night, or at any other time, was well satisfied with the accommodation furnished. I might say that I employ a great number of men in connection with the manufacture of lumber, and as you all know, men employed about a saw mill are addicted to drinking. Shortly after the erection of the hotel a number of those men who had small families frequented it too much, and the hotel keeper also, after a time, became very fond of his glass of liquor; and what was at one time a nice little comfortable hotel for the accommodation of the public was turned into a resort for all the roughest of the locality. Things went on in this way for some time until I became very much annoyed, and I disliked very much to send any person there for a night's lodging. The place gradually grew from bad to worse, and I made a proposition to the proprietor to buy him out. I bought the property, closed it up, and ran it as a temperance hotel for two or three years. There was really no necessity for this because at that time hotels were conducted under the Crooks Act, and I claim that if the Crooks Act had been properly enforced, and if the parties whose duty it was to enforce it had informed on the hotel keepers, there would have been no necessity for the introduction of the Scott Act. The Crooks Act provided that a hotel keeper who furnished liquor to any person who was the worse of it was liable to a fine. However, I found, after making the purchase, that I was not much better off, for my men went to the neighboring hotel and got the worse of liquor there, and carried it home in jugs. So, in the summer of 1884, an agitation arose for the introduction of the Scott Act. I became a very zealous advocate of that Act, and did all I could to further it. We succeeded in carrying the Scott Act in the county of Bruce by a very large majority, although the east riding which I have the honor to represent, gave a very large majority against it. The law came into force on the 1st of May, 1885, and apparently, for a few weeks, the hotel keepers and those engaged in the liquor traffic respected the law. I had frequently occasion to go to the town of Walkerton, and I found the hotels there apparently shut up. In fact, some of them closed their sheds, so as not to give any accommodation to the farmers coming into town. They felt so sore, and regarded the adoption of the Scott Act such a grievance, that they felt justified in closing up their places. For three or four weeks the law was apparently strictly observed; but two or three weeks later, when I was in town, I observed in some of the rooms back of the bar groups of two or three or four persons would be assembled, with glasses on the table, and they were apparently enjoying themselves. I have a great many friends in the town of Walkerton, and although they knew I was a strong Scott Act advocate, they used to ask me in occasionally to take a cigar. I would go into the back room with these gentlemen, and we would find three or four people seated there apparently enjoying themselves. Some would order blue ribbon beer, some would have long pop and some short pop, I, of course, would take a cigar. Those drinks had a very striking resemblance to drinks which were known by other names previous to the introduction of the Scott Act. I would sit there, not very comfortable I assure you, because I had been a party to the adoption of the Scott Act, and I felt that I was then being a party to its violation. I concluded that I would either have to adopt one course or the other, I would have to refrain from going into such places with my friends or turn my back on the Scott Act. A short time afterwards the hotel keepers began to sell over their bar openly, and I frequently noticed parties who had voted for the Scott Act go up to the bar and take their drinks. Consequently my conscience was considerably relieved, because I then knew that others who had supported the Scott Act were parties to its violation. I might say in connection with this that when municipalities had the power of passing by-laws for the guidance and regulations of hotel keepers, a by-law was passed in my native municipality to the effect that hotel keepers should close their hotels at seven o'clock on Saturday evening, and that they should remain closed until six o'clock on Monday morning. I found, when I had occasion to go where those meetings were held, usually in hotels, that the parties who enacted those laws were the very men who would probably remain there until 9, 10 and 11 o'clock, and drink hot Scotch whiskey. I may say that in June, 1885, a request was made to the county council of Bruce for the appointment of a police magistrate in order to enforce the law. I was the only one of five of the committee who favored the appointment. That was only some six weeks after the adoption of the Scott Act, and I thought it was working very well, and that it was our duty to provide the necessary machinery for enforcing that law. I acted accordingly, although I was the only one of the five who was in favor of making that appointment. The appointment was not made and the hotels have gone on selling liquor in that county. There is as much liquor sold there as was sold previous to the adoption of the Scott Act. The assessment of hotel property has been reduced about 50 per cent., and we obtain no license fee from the hotel keepers. In addition to the hotels, we have innumerable grog shops, scattered over the length and breadth of the county, in which liquor is kept for sale, and there is apparently no law regulating the sale of liquor in Bruce to-day. I claim that things in that county are very much worse than they were previous to the adoption of the Scott Act.

It being Six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

CANADIAN HORSE INSURANCE COMPANY.

House resolved itself into committee on Bill (No. 88) to incorporate the Canadian Horse Insurance Company.—(Mr. Small.)

(In Committee.)

On the preamble,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see what we have to do with this measure. It is a matter of property and civil rights. It is not a matter of banking and commerce, which is specially relegated to this Parliament.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is an insurance company.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not a matter with which we have anything to do at all.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the same as the insurance of buildings or ships.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). You cannot give this House jurisdiction simply by making the Bill extend to the whole Dominion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Insurance companies are under the control of the Dominion.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Some of them are, but it was admitted by the Privy Council that the Provinces had the right to legislate on matters of insurance.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. They may, but we have also the right here.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PROHIBITION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Mr. CARGILL. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned I was speaking of the injurious results of the adoption of the Scott Act in the county of Bruce. I may say that the injurious results thus accruing had the effect of making me change my opinion as to the advisability of retaining the Scott Act. I changed my opinion as to the Scott Act, and since then I have opposed it, and I believe its repeal would now be in the interests of the country. Consequently, I proposed a motion sometime ago, asking leave to introduce a Bill for the repeal of the Scott Act. Some of my constituents allege or insinuate that I changed my opinion on the Scott Act for political reasons. In reply to them I say that legislation is experimental, and when it is introduced and does not produce results anticipated, none who are wise will contend for the retention of such legislation, but should favor its abolition. I am quite satisfied that the results are not what were anticipated, and that they have been injurious, not only to the interests of the temperance cause, but also to the general interests of the country. Some time ago a large majority vote was given in this House, expressing sympathy for the poor people in Ireland and eliciting sympathy for the tenantry of Ireland, who were violating their obligations to their landlords and contending for rights that never existed, while here at home this Government has been a party to the introduction of legislation which interferes with the vested rights of their own citizens. I contend that this traffic has been licensed by the Government of this country, that those people who are engaged in that traffic have vested rights, that hotel keepers have been induced from year to year to go on and erect hotels for the accommodation of the public, with a promise or understanding that their licenses would be renewed from year to year. Brewers and distillers occupy the same position. Legislation introduced for the purpose of interfering with those rights is wrong, and I cannot possibly record my vote in favor of a law which interferes with what I consider are vested rights or will deprive people of the right to use their own property. Some say the manufacture of liquor is not restricted by the Scott Act. I admit that the manufacture of liquor is not restricted, but that is the greatest inconsistency in connection with the Act. The idea of any government restricting the sale of an article, the manufacture of which they encourage. I think it is wrong. There is no more effectual way of destroying an industry than by restricting the sale of the article proposed to be manufactured by that industry. As regards prohibition, the Scott Act means prohibition so far as the sale of liquor is concerned. An opinion has been expressed by members on both sides of the House that the introduction of prohibition should be coupled with compensation. Now, the most profitable crop that is produced by the agricultural community of this country, namely, that of barley, is seriously affected. We know that the Americans are giving their attention to the growth of barley, that that crop is being successfully grown, and that they are now in a position to supply themselves with the barley which they used to import from Canada. There is a duty of ten cents per bushel on Canadian barley, besides the freight charges against us in sending it into the United States. I have always understood that the policy of this Government was to protect and foster the manufacturing industries of this country. That being the case, I cannot understand how they should perpetuate legislation which has been instrumental in crippling one of the most prosperous and most profitable revenue producing industries that we have in this country. Now, in my riding, I know a number of brewers who have been engaged in the business for a number of years. They commenced with a small capital, but by industry and attention to business they succeeded in acquiring properties worth from $5,000 to $10,000. Now, by passing such a law, you deprive these people of the use of those breweries for manufacturing beer; you leave them with a pile of bricks and mortar and old machinery that is comparatively useless and of very little value. These people have their families to provide for; they are fellow citizens of our own; they are subjects of Her Majesty; they contribute to the revenue of the country equally with ourselves, and I certainly think it is wrong to deprive them of their legitimate means of making a living without compensating them for the depreciation in the value of their property. I, therefore, think that hon. members of both sides of this House, who represent constituencies which have adopted the Scott Act, will feel respecting this matter the same as I do myself, and will vote for its repeal. Thanking the House for the patient attention they have given to my rambling remarks, and without making further observations, I beg leave to move the following amendment to the amendment:

That all the words after the word "House" in the said resolution be omitted, and in lieu thereof the following words be inserted: Inasmuch as the Canada Temperance Act has not, in those counties in which it has hitherto been in force, resulted in the promotion of the cause of temperance, and obedience to and a general enforcement of the law have not been attained in consequence of public opinion amongst a large portion of the people not being in favor of the said law, the Canada Temperance Act should be repealed.

Mr. JAMIESON. I rise to a point of order. I claim that the amendment to the amendment is not in order. It is not relevant to the subject-matter of the resolution, and in addition to that it is an effort to substitute one Order for another. There is already an Order on the paper—I refer to Order 17 of the Public Bills and Orders—to repeal the Canada Temperance Act, and the amendment to the amendment is simply an effort to substitute it for the present Order under discussion.

Mr. BERGIN. I submit that the motion of my hon. friend is perfectly in order. The motion introduced by the member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) is a motion to prohibit the sale of liquor. The Canada Temperance Act is an Act to prevent the sale of liquor, and the motion of my hon. friend is an amendment perfectly relevant, because it is an amendment to repeal an Act prohibiting the sale of liquor. Let me read to the House Mr. Bourinot's dictum on that subject:

"The law on the relevancy of amendments seems now to be that if they are on the same subject-matter with the original motion they are admissible, but not when foreign thereto."

And in a note I find a decision, almost exactly in point, made in the House of Commons of England by Mr. Speaker Brand on the Oaths Act, that it was regular to move an amendment in favor of the Oaths Act on a question re-affirming a resolution restraining Mr. Bradlaugh from taking the oath. I cannot see that there is very much difference between the two cases, and I submit that the amendment is perfectly relevant and, therefore, quite in order.

Mr. FISHER. I think the hon. gentleman has entirely misconceived the grounds of objection to this amendment. It is not only that it is not really relevant to the main motion, but that it is practically bringing forward and putting out of its place on the Order Paper an Order which is there in almost the same terms. The hon. gentleman who has moved this amendment has already on the Order Paper a Bill to repeal the Canada Temperance Act, which has passed its first reading, and is in substance exactly the same as the amendment he now proposes; and I contend that it is out of order to substitute another motion for the consideration of practically the same question as that involved in the Bill on the list of Public Bills and Orders. I think it is not allowable thus to bring forward the motion which stands on the Order Paper among Public Bills and Orders.

Mr. BERGIN. I submit that the objection taken by my hon. friend to the amendment, if it had any force at all, should have been taken to the resolution proposed by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). It might possibly have applied to that; it cannot possibly apply to the amendment.

Mr. FISHER. I cannot see how my hon. friend could apply that argument to the motion made by the hon. member for Lanark.

Mr. BERGIN. Because it is a motion to amend the Order Paper, and to obtain an opinion of the House in advance on the Bill of my hon. friend which is on the Order Paper.

Mr. JAMIESON. Not at all. I have no Bill on the Order Paper.

Mr. BERGIN. I say it is a motion to anticipate the opinion of the House on the Bill which is on the Order Paper.

Mr. FISHER. The motion of my hon. friend from Lanark is not at all the same as the Bill of the hon member who has moved this sub amendment. My hon. friend from Lanark is proposing an entirely different thing. He is not proposing to repeal the Canada Temperance Act; he is proposing a resolution which would express the opinion of this House in regard to a measure of total prohibition, something quite different from the Canada Temperance Act, not a resolution which would in itself involve a law even on the question of prohibition, although, of course, it would lead to that result. I may say that when the first amendment was proposed this evening, that moved by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard), I examined it to see if it was not out of order, and I feel convinced that it was out of order in consequence of its practically—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Order. The Speaker has decided that it is in order.

Mr. FISHER. I was merely stating why it was in order, and showing that it was because it did not fulfil the reasons why I say this is not in order. The reason that amendment was in order is that although involving the question proposed by the hon. member for Jacques Cartier, that is to say that wine and beer shall be allowed to be sold in Scott Act counties, it also involves a proposition in regard to the total prohibition of certain kinds of liquor; and the two propositions involved in the first amendment are so inextricably involved in each other in the drafting of that amendment that I could not separate them sufficiently to say it was out of order, and I believe that is the reason it was declared in order. But this amendment of the hon. member for East Bruce, is not sufficiently well drafted that I can escape from the conclusion that it is, in substance, exactly the same as the Bill the hon. gentleman has proposed in this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I should be very sorry if the rules of this House should prevent this motion being brought up, and I must say the restriction the hon. gentleman attempts to establish is rather a new thing to me, although I have been for some little time in Parliament; and I am rather surprised that the hon. gentleman or anyone else, on an important question of this kind, should attempt to limit the discussion. It is the only day we shall have this Session for a discussion, and on this amendment, and the previous one we shall have the whole question brought before the House. Now, it is a very grave question which interests the country in a very marked degree, and there are two kinds of opinions upon it. Some are of the opinion of the mover of the original resolution, that the only cure for the evil complained of is absolute prohibition. Others think that by a reasonable relaxation which would allow the milder kind of beverages to be used in this country, there would be less friction and less opposition to the putting down of the use of the coarser alcoholic stimulants; and others think that the Scott Act is a failure, and that it is infinitely better to sweep it away than to have it a pretext and a supposed means of suppressing intemperance, whereas in operation it has a contrary effect. Well, these three resolutions before the House—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. leader of the House is not speaking to the question of order. He is speaking of the policy of discussing the whole question.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I was merely stating the effect of the three resolutions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But he is discussing the propriety of having this original resolution. That is not the point of order.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I will shorten my remarks and say that this resolution is certainly in order.

Mr. BERGIN.

It states certain reasons why, in the opinion of the mover, the Scott Act should be repealed—that it is noxious and should be repealed. Having given the reason for the repeal in this resolution, it is quite clear that it is not the same proposition as the Bill which the hon. gentleman has before the House, which is a simple enactment to repeal the Scott Act. Here reasons are given for the repeal, and certainly the motion is relevant to the original resolution. The whole three resolutions before the House relate to the use or regulation of intoxicating liquors. I hope, certainly, Mr. Speaker, that the result of your decision will not be to restrict this discussion.

Mr. FISHER. If I might be allowed to say a word in reply to the hon. Minister—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Spoke.

Mr. FISHER. I submit that this amendment is not germane, either to the amendment or the resolution. If it were proposed to repeal or to amend the Canada Temperance Act, that amendment would be appropriate, but that is not the proposition. The proposition is to adopt a measure of prohibition, and this is a measure germane to a totally different matter.

Mr. SPEAKER. The resolution before the House is to affirm, as a broad proposition, that it would be expedient and conducive to the public good to totally prohibit the manufacture, importation and sale of intoxicating liquors. In short, it calls for an expression of opinion from this House in favor of total prohibition. The amendment affirms that the partial prohibition, as provided by the existing temperance law, called "The Canada Temperance Act," with certain modifications to the latter, would be the best thing. To that amendment the hon. member for East Bruce moves, as a sub-amendment, that in the opinion of the House, from the experience that has been had of partial prohibition as provided by the present temperance Act, such prohibitory legislation has been a failure, and such legislation ought to be repealed. May, Parliamentary Practice, page 316, speaking of amendments to questions, says:

"Sometimes the object of an amendment is to present to the House an alternative proposition, either wholly or partially opposed to the original question, and the form of the amendment is here to define as offering the House an opportunity of deciding, in one proceeding, upon the two propositions."

May thus speaks only of two propositions, because, in the English practice, amendments to amendments are unknown. In this case, the amendment to the main motion is partially opposed to it, and the sub-amendment is wholly opposed to it, but both are relevant to the subject matter of the main motion, viz: whether it is advisable to prohibit or allow liquor traffic in toto or in part. Thus both carry out the two propositions spoken of by May. The amendment to the main motion, I repeat it, is to the effect that the present Canada Temperance Act, which only partially prohibits the sale of intoxicating liquor, would be better than total prohibition, if amended in a certain measure, and the amendment to the amendment is to the effect that it would be more conducive to the public good to get rid of prohibition entirely. I rule, therefore, that both the amendment and the amendment to the amendment is in order.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). The argument which I purpose briefly to advance on the subject of the amendment to the amendment would equally apply to the question of prohibition. I wish, at the outset, to express my respect for, and admiration of, the manner in which the hon. gentlemen in favor of prohibition addressed this House. We all listened with the greatest pleasure to the eloquent speech of the hon. member for Queen's, N. S. (Mr. Freeman); the evident sincerity which characterised his utterances commanded the respect of the whole House; but those who differ from him and have the courage to express their opinions, as opposed to the views of that hon. gentleman and the hon. member for North Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) are equally entitled to the privilege of being heard, and their sincerity should be equally undoubted. It seems to me that the arguments advanced before recess by the hon. member for East Bruce (Mr. Cargill) were a fair specimen of what may be brought forward by any hon. member who resides in a county in Ontario, or who has intercourse with the residents of a county, in which the Scott Act is in force. For my part, having taken an interest in the subject, and having made enquiries from gentlemen from other Provinces, I am credibly informed, although my friend from Queen's, N. S., has said otherwise, by gentlemen from Nova Scotia, that the Scott Act does not operate satisfactorily in the counties in Nova Scotia where it is in force. I am credibly informed by them that the law is systematically evaded in those counties, not because it is not enforced, but because it is in advance of the public sentiment. For my part I am opposed in toto to laws of this character. I think they are an interference with individual liberty; they are an interference with our civil rights; and they belong to a class of legislation of an unhealthy character which tends to destroy the moral fibre of the community. Such legislation has never been successfully attempted in older countries. We have the evidence of distinguished English statesmen and prelates against it. The expression occurs to me of the Anglican Bishop of Peterborough, who, when discussing this subject, said if he had to choose between England sober and England free, he would prefer England free; and he was right, because a nation of free men will not long remain subject to the vice of intemperance.

An hon. MEMBER. Free and drunk.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex.) If they are free, they will not be drunk. Drunkenness may prevail for a time, but the example of the better class, moral sentiment, religious training, self-respect, all that goes to make up true manhood will force a man to recognise what is for his physical and intellectual good as a Christian. The question is whether the Scott Act has been a success, and, judging from the accumulated evidence from all parts of the Dominion, it has not. I know, speaking of the counties in the vicinity of which I live, Huron, Bruce, Elgin, Kent and Lambton, that in any one of the leading towns of those counties, you can go into any hotel and get all the liquor you want. I have had personal experience of the demoralisation effected where this Act is in force, because men are induced to keep liquor and persuade their friends to drink it, who otherwise would never have kept liquor in their places of business. I know cases where respectable business men have induced their customers to go into private rooms behind their stores, and have produced decanters and glasses in order to show that hospitality which they were debarred from obtaining in a more open and reputable manner. Laws of this character, in which the general feeling of the country is opposed to their enforcement, lower the sentiment of the community in regard to all laws, and men who begin by treating the prohibitory law with disrespect end by disregarding other laws which, for the well-being of society, it is necessary to enforce. In every section of the community where this law is in force, we find men guilty of perjury and subornation of perjury in order to evade the Act and to escape giving full evidence as to the breaches of the Act on the part of themselves or their friends. I am perfectly well aware that the enforcement of the Scott Act is not within the province of the Dominion Government, and I do not pretend to say that any of the Provincial Governments have been lax in their efforts to enforce the Act; but the reason why it has not been successful, and why no prohibitory law will be successful at present, is that it is contrary to the sentiment of the community in which we live. I admit and deplore, with the gentlemen who have spoken in favor of prohibition, the unfortunate effects which flow from excessive use of intoxicating liquors; but there are other follies and vices which entail misery and disgrace upon the people and upon their posterity which we do not pretend to legislate for. It is impossible to legislate men into a state of virtue. I contend that it would be no more absurd to prevent a child from learning to walk for fear that it should afterwards fall and injure itself than it is to legislate for total prohibition. I think these matters should be left to a man's religious training and the development of his moral sentiment, for it is only by encountering and resisting evil that the moral character can be strengthened. The effect has been hitherto not to strengthen the moral character, but to degrade the character of the community in which the Scott Act is in force. I speak from knowledge of how the Act operates in the counties where it is in force in the western part of Ontario, and I am sure that it is not for the public good that the Act should be continued on our Statute-books. It is a great mistake for people to state that Canada as a rule is a country where people are addicted to excess in intoxicating liquors. I think that is rather the exception than the rule. The statistics on this subject clearly show that there is less intoxicating liquor drunk in Canada, in proportion to its population, than in any other civilised country in the world. There is a certain delicacy felt in speaking on this subject by some hon. gentlemen. They wish to avoid offending the sentiment of a certain active section of the community; but I think when the Act comes to be voted upon again in the counties where it has been adopted, the result will be different. The number of people who voted upon the Act is a very small proportion of the people in those counties. In New Brunswick, up to 1885, there were 7,678 votes polled for the Scott Act in the whole Province, and 2,188 against it, out of a population of 201,000, and the aggregate number of votes on the roll was 32,000; so that less than one-fourth of those on the roll voted in favor of the Scott Act, in the pre-eminently temperance Province of New Brunswick. In Prince Edward Island—and the Act is in force in the whole island—the number of votes cast was 4,900 in favor of the Act, out of a total possible vote of 19,287, a little over one-fourth of the total number. In Nova Scotia 13,700 voted in favor of the Act, out of a possible vote of over 42,000 in the counties in which the Act is in force. In Ontario, the votes cast were 37,500 out of a possible aggregate number of voters of nearly 100,000. This shows that there is a prevailing feeling of indifference on the subject in the several constituencies in which the Act has been voted upon, and that feeling arises from the fact that the people know they can get liquors when the Act is in force, that, if they cannot get them in the taverns, they can have them in their houses, they can get them in bulk, and it leads to a greater amount of social drinking than existed previous to the passing of the Scott Act. The result in those States of the Union where the prohibitory Act has been in force is not such as to induce us to continue this Act further in Canada, where we have our own experience as to its deleterious effects. In Vermont, we find from the Popular Science Monthly of May, 1884, the experience which Mr. Edward Johnston has had of its working. He is a gentleman who has devoted much attention to that subject. They have had a prohibitory law in that state for thirty years. He says:

“But the practical operation of this severe and sweeping law, there is the rub. It is a fact that cannot be controverted or denied that, for all practical purposes, the law is an abolute dead letter. According to the returns of the United States revenue officers the Government tax on the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in the State amounted last year to $14,000 in round numbers. On the same authority, there are in the State at the present time 446 places where intoxicating liquors are sold; and, though the population is well-nigh stationary, there is a marked increase in the number of these places; last year's returns showing 426, and those for the preceding year only 409. In the city of Burlington there are about three score of places where liquor is sold, and in Rutland, St. Albans, and all the larger towns, a proportional number, and in every village in the State, with the exception of a few inconsiderable hamlets, there is at least one such place. A large proportion of the dram shops are located upon the principal streets, and there is no concealment or attempted concealment of the illegal traffic conducted within them. As these facts and figures sufficiently indicate, the law, broadly speaking, is not at all enforced. The sale of liquor, it is hardly too much to say, is almost as free and open as though there were no such thing as a prohibitory law. The principal exception to the general rule consists of an occasional spasmodic attempt to enforce the law in the larger places, and the fining of liquor dealers on what are termed disclosures. In the latter case, a person arrested for intoxication is compelled to disclose the name of the person from whom he procured the liquor, and that person is then tried for the offence. Such cases are very common, but, as only the lowest class of liquor dealers is concerned in them, generally speaking, and as the prosecution is for a first offence, no effective purpose is served in repressing the liquor traffic. In the larger towns an effort to enforce the law is occasionally made, but such efforts have invariably proved short-lived, and in almost every instance the people have at the earliest opportunity rejected at the polls the officers who have attempted to enforce the law. These are the principal exceptions to the general rule of non-enforcement. Of enforcing the law as the laws against burglary and larceny are enforced, no one dreams for a moment. Such is the unsatisfactory result of Vermont's thirty years experience, of the prohibitory liquor law.

"One might go still further and speak of the perjury and subornation of perjury, for which the law is in a sense responsible, of the disregard and contempt for all law which the operation of this law tends to foster and encourage, and to cognate matters which will occur to the reflective reader; but, perhaps, enough has been said in showing the failure of the law to accomplish the object for which it was enacted."

Now, Maine has been regarded as pre-eminently the temperance state of the Union, but here is what Gail Hamilton says in the North American Review, on that subject:

"The actual result is that liquor is sold to all who wish to obtain it in nearly every town in the State. Enforcement of the law seems to have little effect. For the past six years the city of Bangor has practically enjoyed free ram. In more than one hundred places liquor is sold, and no attempt has been made to enforce the law. In Bath, Lewiston, Augusta, and other cities, no real difficulty is experienced in procuring liquor. In Portland, enforcement of the law has been faithfully attempted, yet the liquor traffic flourishes for all classes, from the highest to the lowest. In a journey last summer for hundreds of miles through the cities and through the scattered villages, and hamlets of no names, the almost universal testimony was that you can get liquor enough for bad purposes in bad places, but you cannot get it for good purposes in good places. What works against prohibition adds Gail Hamilton, is that, in the opinion of many of the most earnest total abstinence men, the original Maine law State, after 30 years of prohibition, is no more a temperance State than it was before prohibition was introduced."

Then take the Maine prison report for 1884, which states:

"Intoxication is on the increase; some new legislation must be made if it is to be lessened. In many of our counties prohibition does not seem to affect or prevent it. Prisoners, the report tells us, all say when released, if they can get money, they can get as much drink as they please. In Portland, in 1874, the number of arrests for drunkenness was 2,318. But drunkenness is not confined to the cities. In 1876, when a more than usually vigorous crusade was made against the saloons, the number of prosecutions for infraction of the liquor law was 2,300. Every one of the 16 counties furnished its quota. In four counties the number exceeded 200, in only two was it less than 30. In 1884, the law generally was not so stringently enforced, but every county again furnished its quota."

Mr. Goldwin Smith, in his admirable address on the subject of temperance vs. prohibition, compared the statistics of Maine, in relation to drunkenness, with some of our Canadian counties, very much, as will be seen, to the disadvantage of Maine:

"The number of committals to gaol for drunkenness last year, in the State of Maine, was 1,316 for a population of 648,000, while in Canada the counties of Bruce, Huron, Grey, Simcoe, Dufferin, Wellington, Waterloo, Perth, Oxford, Brant, Wentworth, Lincoln, Haldimand and Welland, none of which were at that time under the Scott Act, with an aggregate population of 661,000, and a town population as large as that of Maine, showed only 593 committals, less than half the number of those in the model state of prohibition. Maine is very far from realising the promise of immunity from crime and vastly enhanced prosperity which prohibitionism holds out. Though the population of the State has been stationary, the statistics of crime have increased. In 1873, the number committed to gaol was 1,548, in 1884 it was 3,072. The pauper rates in the cities is larger than in those of any other state; and between 1850 and 1880, the school attendance decreased by more than 21,000."

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex).

We all respect the evidence of General Neal Dow, who is an eminent life-long temperance man, but he admits with sorrow that the State of Maine is infested with places for the sale of liquor, and he gives as his reason for breaking with the Republican party that it was in complicity with liquor sellers, and had not enforced the law with sufficient vigor. In Kansas, where the prohibition Act was also enforced, Gail Hamilton again says, in the article from which I have been quoting:

"In Kansas, where the most stringent prohibition has been enacted, and has had the inestimable advantage of Governor St. John's fostering care, Doctor Gardner, testified that the drug stores are little more than rum shops, and their number is astonishing. In Pittsburg, a thrifty little town of 4,000 people, he counted 15 drug stores and 20 doctors' signs on the main street."

I believe that the practical effect of the Scott Act, or prohibition, will be simply free trade in liquor, and an inferior kind of liquor. I have learned from officers connected with the Inland Revenue Department that in the counties of Ontario where the Scott Act is in force, more particularly in Gray and Simcoe, they are now distilling from potatoes and other vegetables, an inferior quality of liquor which they are selling at $5 a gallon; they are selling it raw from the still, with the fusil oil floating in it, and it is known to be a most injurious and destructive quality of spirits. It seems to me that laws like the Scott Act, laws that can be evaded and set at naught, are among the greatest misfortunes that can befall a people, and I think the testimony which I have produced from the various States where similar Acts have been in force, fully justify that opinion on my part. In other States where a prohibitory law has been in force, it has been found necessary to repeal it. It was in force for some years in Michigan, but they repealed it, and a new attempt, on a recent occasion, to reintroduce prohibitory legislation in that State was defeated. While I oppose legislation of this character, I trust that no one will suppose that I do so from any hostility to the spirit which actuates those hon. gentlemen who speak in favor of temperance and sobriety. I know the great necessity of that in this country, but I see that in counties where the Scott Act is not in force, but where liquor is allowed to be sold, regulated by license, the law is treated with more respect, and the moral character of the community is advancing and improving, as regards the excessive use of alcoholic stimulants. The county in which I live, at one time was notorious for the dissipated habits of the better class of the community. At one time the tavern keepers controlled the county, and no man could be elected without their influence. That is all changed. They have lost any influence of that kind, and I do not know of any county in Ontario where there has been a more marked influence on the habits of the people, owing to greater enlightenment, owing to a better example set among the better class of people, and owing to the development of education and intelligence, and the religious and moral sentiment of the people in that county. Take our own Parliament, we are all aware that for years back every successive Parliament has been more sober than its predecessor. Some years ago that could not be said of the Parliament of Canada. But I think we can say now that the members of each successive Parliament are more and more fitted, by their lives and habits, to set an example to the community. All this is not due to the restrictive legislation, but it is the effect of a better moral tone in the country. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, from my point of view, that in interfering with individual freedom, we are not doing that good which I am quite sure is the object of those gentlemen who promote this legislation in this House, and the large, respectable and influential body of people outside of this House, who favor legislation of a prohibitory character. I believe that their object is most excellent, and that they are actuated by the highest moral motives; but I think, from my point of view, speaking for myself—I suppose I have the same privilege of expressing my views that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson) has—I think that they are taking a wrong course in interfering with individual liberty in this matter. High license, strict regulations, and seeing that the licenses are in the hands of responsible persons, and that the law as regards the hours for keeping taverns open are properly enforced, would have a better effect on the community than any attempt at coercive legislation, inducing men to evade and disregard the law, and thereby bringing the more important laws of the country into disrespect. As regards the view I have expressed, that this is an interference with individual liberty I have been very much struck with some remarks made by Mr. John Stuart Mill on this subject. He said :

“ There is a limit to the legitimate interference of collective opinion with individual independence ; and to find that limit, and maintain it against encroachment, is as indispensable to a good condition of human affairs as protection against political despotism.

“ There are in our own day gross usurpations upon the liberty of private life actually practised, and still greater ones threatened with some expectation of success, and opinions propounded which assert an unlimited right in the public, not only to prohibit by law everything which it thinks wrong, but to prohibit a number of things which it admits to be innocent. Under the name of preventing intemperance, the people of one English colony, and of nearly half the United States, have been interdicted by law from making any use whatever of fermented drinks, except for medicinal purposes ; for prohibition of their sale is, in fact, as it is intended to be, prohibition of their use.

“ There are questions relating to interference with trade which are essentially questions of liberty ; such as the Maine law. These interferences are objectionable, not as infringements on the liberty of the producer or seller, but on that of the buyer.

“ The acts of an individual may be hurtful to others, or wanting in due consideration for their welfare, without going to the length of violating any of their constituted rights. The offender may then be justly punished by opinion, though not by law.

“ The individual is not accountable to society for his actions, in so far as these concern the interests of no person but himself. Advice, instruction, persuasion, and avoidance by other people if thought necessary by them for their own good, are the only measures by which society can justifiably express its dislike or disapprobation of his conduct.

“ For such actions as are prejudicial to the interests of others the individual is accountable, and may be subjected either to social or legal punishment, if society is of opinion that the one or the other is requisite for its protection.”

I might go on and cite other opinions of great men, all converging to the same view, that it is not in the public interest that prohibitory legislation of this kind should be enforced, and that to arouse the moral sentiment of the community by persuasion, by religious training, by example in the lives of men in high position, is the true method, and the only one by means of which a better state of feeling on the subject of intemperance can be introduced into the community. I am perfectly certain there is no hon. gentleman here who will gainsay my statement that in Canada there has been a great improvement of late years in the habits of the community as regards drinking, and that has not been brought about by legislation of this kind, for, where such an Act is in force, although the better class of the community may respect it, it is not obeyed by the mass of the people, and I have been informed by responsible gentlemen that in the very counties where the Scott Act is in force it is steadily evaded and leads to worse consequences in degrading the habits and injuring the self-respect of the communities affected. I do not wish to occupy the time of the House too long, but I must state that there are numerous instances where town and county councils and where cities in Canada have petitioned for the repeal of this Act, and no later, I think, than yesterday the council of St. Thomas sent in a petition praying for the repeal of the Scott Act, because instead of benefiting it seriously injured the moral character of the people of that city. Such is the feeling throughout the Province of Ontario, and such I am told by gentlemen familiar with the facts is the feeling in the counties of other Provinces where the Act is in force. If this be true, and it is for hon. gentlemen opposite to controvert my statement, then I appeal to this House to say whether it thinks it is in the public interest that an Act which is not respected and not obeyed should be kept upon the Statute-book of the Dominion. I think not. I think it is for the best interests of the country that we should repeal the Scott Act and leave to the several Provinces of the Dominion the constitutional right to enforce the high license system, if they think that desirable, and by strictly enforcing that system and by seeing that none but men of respectability have the privilege of obtaining licenses, and that the houses are properly conducted, more will be done to benefit the people than by the enforcement of a prohibitory Act or a partially prohibitory Act. Speaking of the opinion of eminent men upon this subject we all will treat with respect what Mr. John Bright has to say in regard to the change in the public habits of gentlemen with whom he has been in the habit of mixing in England. He said, in addressing the House of Commons :

“ There are some members of this House older than I am, but I am old enough to remember, when among those classes with which we are more familiar than with working people, drunkenness was ten or twenty times more common than it is at present. I have been in this House twenty years, and during that time I have often partaken of the hospitality of various members of the House, and I may assert that during the whole of those twenty years, I have no recollection of having seen one single person at any gentleman's table who has been in the condition which would be at all fairly described by saying that he was drunk.

That is not the state of things which prevailed in this country fifty or sixty years ago. We know, therefore, as respects this class of persons, who can always obtain as much of these pernicious articles as they desire to have, because price to them is no object, that temperance has made great way ; and if it were possible now to make all classes in this country as temperate as those of whom I have just spoken, we should be amongst the very soberest nations of the earth.”

In conclusion, I believe that in taking this ground I am acting for the best interests of the people of Canada. I desire to see temperance and sobriety the rule in this country, just as much as does the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson), or the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Fisher), or any other gentleman who has taken the opposite side of this question ; but I, for my part, believe it is not by prohibitory legislation, which may prohibit but does not prevent that this desirable end is to be attained, but by leaving these matters to the common sense of the people, to the religious training of their pastors and priests, to the greater development of education and intelligence, and by these means, having kept alive the higher moral sentiments of the people, I have no fear as to our retaining, even in a more eminent degree, our present position as one of the soberest among the nations of the earth.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish before the debate closes to express my opinion on the question under discussion this afternoon. It appears that the question has widened out considerably beyond the motion made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Jamieson). It is a question of great importance to this country, no matter what position we take upon it. It is a question that will be pressed upon the legislators by the electorate, whether we consider it calmly and judicially or not. I believe as representatives of five millions of people, we must consider calmly this question, which is a large question involving the interest of the whole people. During the discussion that took place this afternoon some hon. members would lead us to believe that there are not such evils flowing from this traffic as many of us wish to put forward. We are told that frequently lecturers on temperance platforms exaggerate very largely the degradation and misery arising from this traffic throughout the length and breadth of Canada. In order that I might be correct in regard to this matter I put myself in communication with men in different parts of the country, who occupy positions from which they are able to speak with authority in reference to this question, and I purpose this evening, not so much for the benefit of hon. gentlemen here, but for the country at large, to show you by the statistics from these men, that there is a large amount of evil and great crime arising from this traffic, and that, therefore, as sensible men and representative men, we should at least consider this question in a serious manner. I do not expect that we shall all come to the same conclusion as to the best means of abating this evil or discarding it from the country. But while I admit that there is great room for difference of opinion upon this question, still it is our duty to consult together as reasonable men and hear the opinions of different parties from different standpoints, and find, if possible, some method by which we can stem the torrent of iniquity that is perpetrated in this country through the influence of strong drink. I have examined the report of the Inspector of Prisons for the Province of Ontario, and I find that he has stated in that report that, in 1884, there were 12,081 prisoners imprisoned in the gaols of Ontario, and that, out of that number, no less than 7,502 were imprisoned on account of drunken and disorderly conduct, or for crimes committed by them while under the influence of strong drink. In 1885, there were no less than 11,426 persons imprisoned in these gaols, and out of that number there were 9,001 who were incarcerated for crimes committed by them while under the influence of strong drink, or for disorderly conduct on the streets. And in the three years of 1884-85-86, out of a total imprisonment of 34,152 persons, there were 23,902 imprisoned on account of drunken habits, or 70 per cent. of the entire number. I have consulted also, by letter, the chief of police of the city of London, and in answer he tells me that in the three years 1884-85-86, out of 3,451 commitments in the city of London, no less than 1,772, or over 50 per cent., were caused by the influence of strong drink. I have a report from the chief of police of the city of Quebec, and he tells me that, during those three years, 1,584 persons were imprisoned on account of drunkenness in that city. Now, let us go to the model city of this continent, the church-going city of Toronto, the city of schools and colleges and churches, the city which is known throughout the whole continent as being the best ordered city in Canada. There is not a better ordered city on the continent of America; I might go still further and say that there is not a better ordered city in the civilised world, and yet in that city so well ordered, with its large force of police, Mr. Grassett, chief of police, informs me that during the last three years there were 23,912 commitments in that city, and out of that number 11,786 were committed on account of disorderly and drunken habits, or crimes committed while under the influence of strong drink—49 per cent. of the total number. If I go to Kingston, a city much smaller in population, but a city which is well cared for, and well ordered under the present system of dealing with this traffic, Mr. Harley, chief of police, informs me that out of 1,567 commitments in three years, 1,110 were on account of drunkenness. Let us now go to the city of Montreal. I had the pleasure of a personal interview with the chief of police of that city, but not in a professional way.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I interviewed him on this particular subject, and he informed that the commitments in that city are divided into two classes, one being the prisoners who are committed for some crime, and the other being the "protections" who are merely taken in at night for their protection, and are allowed to go in the morning. Giving the years 1884-85-86, 19,037 persons were put in the prisons of the city of Montreal, and out of that number 14,766 were committed on account of drunken and disorderly conduct. Of the "protections" there were 22,151 imprisoned in the lock-ups and police stations in that city, and of these 14,768 were imprisoned on account of drunkenness on the streets. In the three years there were in all 41,188 imprisoned, and of these 29,536 were incarcerated on account of drunken and disorderly habits, or 72 per cent. of the entire number. Need we wonder that such a condition of things takes place, when I was informed by the same gentleman that there are no less than 1,008 licensed places for the sale of liquor in that city, besides the unlicensed places where intoxicating liquors are sold. That is to say there was one such place for every 199 inhabitants, and one was incarcerated in prison for every twenty. That is a tale which tells us, I think, that it is highly important that we should consider this question in a serious way, so that we may, if possible, agree upon some line of action which would be in the interests of this country. I also consulted Mr. Massie, superintendent of the Central Prison in Toronto, in regard to the characters of those who have been imprisoned during the years since it has been established. He tells me that out of 495 persons who were committed to that institution in 1886, no less than 461 were entered as being intemperate persons, and out of 8,118 persons who have been imprisoned there since 1874, when it was established by the Local Legislature of Ontario, no less than 6,390 were committed and punished for crimes committed by them while under the influence of strong drink. I consulted also Mr. Reilly, of the Andrew Mercer Reformatory for females in Toronto, and he tells me that out of 156 admitted in 1884, no less than 112 of those poor females were drunkards; that out of 142 admitted in 1885, no less than 94 were of drunken habits; and out of 123 admitted in 1886 no less than 78 were intemperate. He remarks that since 1880, when the institution was established, no less than 1,075 entrants were admitted, and he says they were invariably confirmed drunkards. Still, we are told by some hon. gentlemen that there is no evil arising out of this traffic. I say that if there was such an evil arising from any other source or any other traffic in the world, we would put our heads and our talents together, and devise some method by which this incubus of iniquity should be removed from the shoulders of the Canadian people. I wrote also to the superintendent of the asylum for idiots in Orillia. He tells me that a considerable proportion of the idiots in that institution are children of drunken parents; and the great man who was instrumental in establishing asylums for idiots, the great Dr. Howe, after an investigation in the State of Massachusetts, conducted at the instance of the Government of that State, reported that out of 300 idiots that he had examined, no less than 145 had drunken parents. I consulted another eminent authority, Dr. Daniel Clark, the superintendent of the Toronto asylum who has paid great attention to psychological studies and made a speciality of mental diseases, and he says that there are 7,000 lunatics in the Dominion of Canada, 10 per cent. of whom owe their lunacy directly to intoxicating liquors, which means that there are 700 lunatics in the Dominion from that cause. I wrote also to Dr. Bucke, another celebrated psychologist, the superintendent of the asylum in London, who has devoted a great part of his life to this subject, and whose name is known throughout the length and breadth of the Dominion, and he says that although he does not know any person who has come there through intoxicating liquors, he is sure it constitutes a large factor in the production of lunacy. This being so, what a crime we are committing to allow such a state of iniquity to be established and perpetuated in this country—an evil that entails, not upon this generation, but upon those who succeed the present generation, those great weaknesses and defects. But it is said that we are infringing on personal rights. Before it can be said that in abolishing this evil we are infringing on personal rights, it may be well for us to ask what we regard as our private rights. No man has any right but what the social community in which he is established can give him. No man can claim as a right the exercise of which would interfere with the prosperity and well-being of those around him; and if the people consider that that which he thinks his right interferes with the well-being and order of society, they are perfectly right in saying it is not his. Again, we are told that prohibition would reduce the revenue largely. I dare say it would; but we can stand it. The hon. Minister of Finance the other night in glowing language, which I admired for its energy and pith, spoke of the great resources of this country, of its gold and silver, of its woods, and its mountains of iron which the wood would melt into pig iron, &c. Now, surely a country possessing such large natural resources as this country, can make provision for the five or six millions that would be taken from us by the abolition of the liquor traffic, in order to restore peace and contentment and social order throughout the length and breadth of this country. There is another question to which I beg leave to refer, that is the Scott Act. My hon. friend from Essex stated that the Scott Act was a total failure in every place in which it had been tried. Now, he does not know that from personal observation and experience. He does not know that it is a failure in the county from which I come. It has been to a large extent a failure, but I place the fault of that failure on the shoulders of the hon. gentlemen on the Treasury benches. When that Act came into force on the 1st of May, 1885, licenses to sell for certain purposes were given to the hotel keepers, the parties who would naturally be inclined to violate the provisions of the Act. We contended that the Government should not place the enforcement of the Scott Act in the hands of its enemies, for whoever knew the enemy of a law to carry it out? I heard another complaint in the county I come from that the inspectors under the McCarthy Act were opposed to the provisions of the Scott Act, and they winked at its violation until the hotel keepers became so bold, knowing that they would not be interfered with, that for a year they sold liquor in almost an open way. But when the matter was taken in hand by the Local Government, and a magistrate and proper inspectors were appointed, then the Scott Act began to work, and is continuing to work as well as we ever expected it would work. We are told to-night that the Dominion Parliament should repeal the Scott Act. Will you take from the municipalities the power to say whether they will have the Scott Act or not? If any of them say: We do not want it, they can repeal it, and if any of them want to put it into execution, they have the power to do so. But we, as the central body, are asked to take from them the only means they have to thwart, as far as they possibly can, the influences of intoxicating liquors in the neighborhood from which I come, and in many other neighborhoods in the Dominion. I believe the Scott Act is violated very largely in East Bruce, and the reason is clear. A large portion of the electorate there consist of Germans who are accustomed to have their beer, and they are bound to have it, whether under the Scott Act or any other Act; but the county as a whole is largely in favor of the Scott Act. The hon. member who proposes the amendment is only speaking of East Bruce, leaving the rest of the county out altogether, and there are more Germans in his riding than in the rest of the county. That is no reason why we should repeal the Scott Act in the whole Dominion, because, forsooth, his little corner of this domain is opposed to its provisions. We are also told that we cannot make men moral by legal enactment. No, we cannot; nor do we strive to do that, but we want moral suasion for the parties tempted throughout the country, and we want legal enactment for the tempters. We want to moralise with the tempted persons to get them away from their habits, but we want at the same time to say to those who are tempting those men that they must not sell or expose for sale those liquors that degrade the people of a country. I am favorable to the continuance of the Scott Act, but if we could get prohibition I would prefer it. I believe there is a strong public sentiment throughout the entire length and breadth of this country that is not felt in this House.

I believe the temperance men do not stand together as they should. I believe the Christian people do not stand together as they should; and the result is that members in this House are, no doubt, governed largely by the votes they have received during their election. If they have received the votes of a certain section opposed to the Scott Act, they endeavor to argue conscientiously, or make us believe, at least, they are conscientious, that it should be repealed and something else established. That is the reason we, as men who look upon the question, not from a party point of view, not on the basis of political exigencies, but on the basis of the conscientious conviction that we are serving our country in the true way by removing this scourge and restoring peace and harmony, by removing these commitments and all the degradations and misery and want that flow from all these centres of misery which I have pointed out—that is the reason why we are in favor of total prohibition. I shall gladly support the resolution of the hon. member for Lanark, because I believe it is neither just nor politic to extend legal protection or sanction to any system that tends to increase crime, to corrupt the social habits, and to destroy the health and lives of our people. I support this resolution on the ground that the whole traffic is a system of crimes and pollutions, which stain the honor of my country, and, therefore, are inimical to the true interest of individuals, physically, morally and religiously.

Mr. CURRAN. I have very few words, indeed, to add to what has already been said on this subject to-night, and to what I have said on a former occasion, but I feel constrained to give a reason for the vote I am about to cast. During the recent elections, we all know this question of prohibition was prominently brought before very many constituencies. In my own city there was a movement made and a pledge sought to be obtained from the candidates, so as to induce them to pronounce positively as to whether they would support prohibitory legislation or not. For my own part, I feel the deepest interest in the temperance cause. I am a member of a total abstinence organisation which has done a vast amount of good in the city of Montreal, and whose members have gone abroad and established total abstinence organisations in other places. I said to those who sought my views upon this subject, that I would be governed by the principles of the body known as the Convention of Irish Catholic Temperance Societies of Montreal and its vicinity, which had promulgated a platform of principles some time before. When I saw that the hon. member for North Lanark had placed a notice upon the paper, I immediately communicated with the secretary of convention, and he transmitted to me a document, which I am now about to read to this House, and which contains the principles by which that body is governed. This is the document which he has forwarded to me, and to which, he informs me, the number of associations which are gathered together under one general convention, still adhere:

"The regular quarterly meeting of the Irish Catholic Temperance Convention held in St. Mary's Hall, Tuesday evening, September 8th, 1885. Delegates from the St. Patrick's, St. Ann's, St. Bridget's and St. Gabriel's T. A. and B. Society were present. The chair was occupied by the Rev. Pastor of St. Mary's. The following report of the special committee on principles was read and unanimously adopted:

"MONTREAL, 8th September, 1885.

"The undersigned beg leave to report the following as the platform of principles necessary to be adopted by this convention:

"1st. This convention is most desirous to forward the cause of temperance in adopting and using all wise and legitimate means to remove the cause of drunkenness.

"2nd. This convention is not prepared to say prohibition would accomplish the desired effect, expecting better results from moral suasion than from extreme legislative measures.

"3rd. That as a means more effective, and more practical, this convention suggest as a common groundwork for united action:

"(a.) A strict licensing system both as regards persons and places.

"(b.) The total separation of the liquor traffic from all other trade.

"(c.) The careful analysis of all liquors, sold and used, to detect adulteration.

"(d.) An effective police system named by the Government, whose business it would be to enforce and stringently carry out the laws governing the sale of liquor.

"The whole respectfully submitted,

"(Signed) REV. M. CALLAGHAN, St. Patrick's Parish,
 "REV. J. STRUBBE, St. Ann's do
 "REV. J. J. SALMON, St. Gabriel's do
 "REV. S. P. LONERGAN, St. Mary's do
 "JAMES J. COSTIGAN, Sec. of Convention."

Under these circumstances, this convention having declared against prohibition, I feel that it is my duty to vote against prohibition. This convention having declared that a strict licensing system, both as to persons and places, is the proper mode for enforcing temperance; this convention having also declared that the spread of drunkenness is best arrested by moral suasion, religious exercises and the carrying out of the admirable system which has prevailed for so many years in those organisations, I cannot see that a measure which is partly prohibitory, such as the Scott Act, which has been spoken of in the course of this debate, and which has been pointed out by those who live in the midst of communities where that Act is in force, to have proved a total failure, should receive our support, and I cannot vote for its continuance as the law of the land. I have very little doubt that, if the principles which are laid down on this platform were effectively carried out, if we had a strict law for analysis of liquors, which are now so thoroughly adulterated that it is impossible to tell what is sold over the counter—if we had such a law, and if we had this programme of the convention carried out in its entirety by a strong police force, active in the discharge of their duty, the result so much desired would be readily obtained. I may be pardoned if, not being desirous of detaining the House any longer, I read one item more from this report, it is as follows:—

"Mr. Curran's M.P., speech in the House of Commons on 18th June, 1885, was referred to, and stated to be in full accord with the spirit of the convention.

"A hearty motion of thanks was passed to Mr. Curran for his many acts of courtesy to the convention and the valuable assistance he had given to its work."

Having made a speech once on this subject, and having met with the approbation of this temperance convention, it will be a wise thing on my part to let well enough alone. I shall vote as I have indicated in the few remarks I have made.

Mr. MILLS. I would like, Sir, to call your attention to the fact on which you have not ruled, that there is on the Order Papers, Bill No. 64 to repeal the Canada Temperance Act, standing in the name of Mr. Cargill, the hon. gentleman who has moved the amendment to the amendment. I submit for your consideration whether it is possible that the hon. gentleman can move as an amendment to the amendment practically a Bill which already stands on the Order Paper, which has been read a first time and which the House has ordered to be read a second time hereafter. If this resolution is voted upon, the House will be called upon, by this amendment to the amendment, to anticipate the principle of the Bill which has been already fixed for another time, and I submit that the hon. gentleman cannot, after having proposed a Bill to the House and had it read a first time, and after the House had ordered it to be read a second time on a certain day, propose as an amendment to the amendment precisely the same matter as he has proposed for the consideration of the House in his Bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that the point of order has already been decided.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. SPEAKER. The point raised by the hon. member is correctly stated. That it is a fact that the House has ordered a certain Bill for the repeal of the Canada Temperance Act, to be read and considered on a certain day; he also correctly states the rule: that questions put down on the Order Paper for consideration at a certain time and in a certain way, must be considered at the time and in the manner specified in the Order Paper; but the questions must be strictly identical and bear on the same facts as well as on the same principle. Here, there are facts stated which are not in the Bill referred to, and on which the House is called upon to give its opinion. The amendment states, first, the following facts:—

"That the Canada Temperance Act has not, in those counties in which it has hitherto been in force, resulted in the promotion of the cause of temperance, and the obedience to and the general enforcement of the law have not been attained, in consequence of public opinion among a large portion of the people not being in favor of the said law."

And then, as a consequence, it goes to affirm that even the Canada Temperance Act, as enacting partial prohibition, should be repealed. I am of opinion that the rule invoked by the hon. member for Bothwell does not apply here. Therefore, I feel bound to adhere to my first ruling. The question being that it would be for the public good to have total prohibition in this country, an hon. member, not being willing to vote on that, moves that partial prohibition with certain amendments would be for the best interests of the country; and another hon. member, considering that, in view of the experience which has been had, this partial prohibition would not be the correct thing for the public good, proposes that we ought to have no law on the matter, that is, that all prohibitory legislation on the subject ought to be wiped out. Although I would like to see that sub-amendment drawn in a better way, I do not think it would be judicious on my part to stop the debate and prevent a vote being taken on the whole question as it stands now before the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not intend to trespass at any length on the patience of the House, but, having taken a certain position in reference to the temperance question, both outside and inside of this House, and fearing lest, if I kept silence, my silence might be misconstrued, I beg the attention of the House for a very few moments, in order to state my position in reference to the question which is before us to-night. I should not have asked the House to listen to me if we had simply the original motion to be decided. Upon the general question, upon an abstract resolution such as this, I have had the pleasure of addressing the House before, and I should have been willing to stand by those sentiments which I expressed in 1884, and which I have not seen any reason for changing from that date up to the present time. But to-night we have other questions and other issues besides that before us. It is proposed by one of these amendments that we should make a new move in this country, that we should adopt a different plan from what has hitherto been carried out with reference to the sale of intoxicating liquors. By the first amendment it is proposed that we shall not have total prohibition, neither shall we have local option prohibition, but that we shall have a sort of cross between the two, total prohibition so far as the alcoholic spirituous liquors go, and a license system, I suppose, as far as the fermented liquors go. As far as that proposition is concerned, I may say at once that I am opposed to it. I do not propose to argue it at length, I am opposed to it from conviction, and I am opposed to it because I have very thoroughly studied the question. For a good many years I have given more or less attention to this question, and, as the result of my investigation and of my experience, I do not believe it would conduce to the sobriety of the people or to the enforcement of good honest laws, or to the betterment of this country, to have fermented liquors allowed to be sold in connection with the Canada Temperance Act. So strong an opinion do I hold in reference to that question that I would rather see the Scott Act entirely taken away from the county in which I live, than to see it retained with this option left and the permission given to sell fermented liquors. I take this ground largely from what has been experienced from the same kind of legislation in Great Britain and in the United States of America. In both countries, these laws have been uttered and acknowledged failures, failures acknowledged not only in the experience of the people themselves, but acknowledged also and spread upon the records by representative committees which have investigated the subject, and have given their conclusions to the world. I suppose, if that amendment were to carry, and in Scott Act counties we were to have wine and beer sold, it is not intended to have them sold without restrictions. Then, every objection which has been urged against the Scott Act, on the ground of lack of enforcement, could be urged against the Scott Act, with this added to it: for lack of enforcement and inability to enforce it. Suppose the Scott Act is in force in a county, and this fermented liquor is to be sold in the county, you are not going to allow it to be sold without restrictions; you are not going to allow it to be sold on Sundays or at all hours of the day or to all classes of the people. There must be the restrictions on the sale as there are now, whether in license counties or in Scott Act counties. Hon. gentlemen say they are opposed to the Scott Act because it cannot be enforced. Will this be enforced any more strictly or faithfully? The very same difficulty would be found that is now found in reference to the enforcement of the Scott Act. My hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. Cargill) gave away the whole question when he stated—and his first proposition proved it as plainly as possible—that on his timber land, where he was carrying on his mill the moment a hotel was put up where liquors were sold, he felt the disadvantage. He had to struggle against the disability from that very moment. Inducements were placed in his vicinity which he would rather not have there. He was then under the Crooks Act, as it is termed, which is the License Act in the Province of Ontario. Let the amendment to the amendment pass, and my hon. friend goes back to the Crooks Act. What was his trouble? The Crooks Act could not be enforced, and so a nuisance was created, and he took sides in favor of substituting the Scott Act for the Crooks Act. But the same non-enforcement and the same disability to which the hon. gentleman was exposed before would occur again when he goes back to the Crooks Act. Any hon. gentleman who argues that the Scott Act should be repealed because it is difficult to enforce it, and who cites examples of non-enforcement, can be met by an hon. gentleman who does not believe in a license law who can state, in regard to any city or town or any district you please, the constant and habitual and well known violations of the License Act itself. Take the city in which we live to-day. Does not everybody know that the Crooks Act in this city is habitually violated? If the argument is good that because a law is violated, therefore we should do away with it, we should do away likewise with the Crooks Act, we should do away with all license Acts. Therefore I say that you will have the very same difficulty that you have to the enforcement of a license law if you allow wine and beer to be sold, and you will have more difficulty, because given a locus a quo wine and beer can be sold without difficulty, how are you going to prevent all kinds of liquors from being sold there? You say that under the Scott Act men will go into back rooms and drink at improper hours, against the plain dictates of law; suppose we carry this amendment, will not the same violation of law take place? Will not wine and beer be drunk at improper hours, and with them will not all other intoxicating liquors be drunk? The same difficulty comes in. I am therefore, opposed to that, but I do not propose to argue it any further. I believe that you will have another element of difficulty added to the elements of difficulty that you have already. I want to say one word now with reference to the argument of my hon. friend about prohibition. I do not know from what he quoted. He quoted from a book which may be very good authority. I should judge, however, from the quotations that it was a book which set out with the design of proving that prohibition was a failure and could not be enforced. To that I have simply two answers to give. First, I give in answer the action of this Parliament in 1873 and 1874, when it sent out commissioners through the different prohibition states who gathered evidence which is better than any evidence which was read by my hon. friend here to-night. They collated evidence, not on one side alone, but on both sides, and brought that to this House, and both in the Senate and House of Commons this evidence was sifted and a favorable report passed and placed in our parliamentary reports. Thus, both Houses of Parliament in this manner give a direct negative to the assertion of my hon. friend, who says that in Vermont, Maine, and other prohibition States prohibition has been a failure. If you say that prohibition is a failure because intoxicating liquor is sold in a prohibition State, I grant it immediately without argument. But I do not allow that prohibition is a failure because every drop of liquor is not destroyed or prevented from being sold. If you applied that canon to the laws of this country, or any other country, you would not be able to keep a single law on the Statute-book. My own opinion is, and I think hon. gentlemen will agree with me, that if there is an evil to be reduced, or an evil to be abolished, and the Legislature sees fit to pass a law for the reduction or abolition of that evil and it is found that the evil still goes on, though in a diminished degree, it is the part of the Legislature not to abolish the law but to see that the law is put in a position to be better enforced and to be better carried out, to strengthen the restrictions, and to strengthen the operating clauses of the law. But besides the answer that this Parliament has given by its commission and report, I give to the hon. gentleman a still more practical answer. He does not live in Vermont, he does not live in Maine, he does not live in Kansas, nor in Iowa. But people do live there, sensible people, intelligent people, people who go to churches, who go to schools, and who know what they are about. Take the State of Maine. There is not a better educated people in the New England States than the people of the State of Maine. There is not a more practical, level-headed people in the United States, than the people of the State of Maine. They have had a prohibitory law for thirty years. My hon. friend reads from Gail Hamilton to show you that there is in the State of Maine a very sink of corruption on account of that prohibitory law. But sensible people, educated people, Christian people, living in the State of Maine, have had that law for thirty years uninterruptedly, have kept it against every opposition, and only three years ago a proposition to imbed it in the constitution of the State was adopted by a larger vote than was brought out in the political elections; it obtained a majority of 40,000 or 50,000. That is a practical answer. The people of the State of Maine ought to know their own business; living there for a generation under the operation of that law they have given their voice about their own business by that immense majority, and made prohibition a part of the constitution of the State. Now, about Kansas, the hon. gentleman does not live in Kansas. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Girouard) read a casual observation, I think, from Harper's Weekly, that the prohibitory law in Kansas was a failure. That was a stray statement. But the people of Kansas know better, even, than the writer in Harper's Weekly. They are upon the spot, they have all the evidence before them. That prohibitory law was passed in Kansas in 1881; it came into force in 1882; they have had three general elections in that State since then, and at every one of those elections prohibition was an issue; at the last general election it was a para mount issue. The law has been strengthened from year to year, and if the House will permit me, I will read to you a statement of the Governor of Kansas, in his last message to the Legislature. Governor Martin stated :

"I stated in my message a year ago that while the law of 1885 embodied some defects, its general results has been very favorable. I have seen no occasion to reverse this judgment. A great reform has certainly been accomplished in Kansas. Intemperance is steadily and surely decreasing. In thousands of houses where want, wretchedness and suffering were once familiar guests, plenty, happiness and contentment now abide. Thousands of women and children are better clothed and fed than they were when the saloons absorbed all the earnings of husbands and fathers. The marvellous material growth of the State during the past six years has been accompanied by an equally marvellous moral progress; and it can be fairly and truthfully asserted that in no portion of the civilised world can a million and a half of people be found who are more temperate than the people of Kansas."

So says the Governor of Kansas, after four or five years' experience with the law, a law which has been reviewed again and again by the people, so far as all its essential principles were concerned. My hon. friend finds fault with prohibition because, as he says, it destroys the moral fibre of the community. My own view with reference to that is this: that whatever is an open and continual temptation to the people of a community from childhood to manhood, tends to sap and destroy the moral fibre of a growing people; and that whatever tends to diminish or put away these open temptations, does not militate against a strong moral fibre in a community, but rather tends to perfect it, to strengthen it, until it becomes strong and sufficient to withstand the temptation by the power that accrues to it from year to year. Now, I said, Mr. Speaker, that I do not intend to argue this question of personal rights. Every hon. gentleman and every person knows that every day his natural rights, so to speak, have to give way to the good of the community. We could not exist as a society otherwise; we could not exist as a country a single year if we did not propose to give up, everyone of us, on certain points, something that is of natural right, so to speak, for the good of the community, for the greater good of the greater number. Now, with reference to this amendment, I am sorry it came up in this way. I should like to have had it fought out on its own merits, but it is here, and we have to meet it. I ask earnestly and honestly of hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House to pause before they take the retrograde step of taking away the Canada Temperance Act from the people, to whom they gave it in 1878. Ever since Confederation began, the temperance people of this country—and they are not all fanatics, they are not all hobbyists, they are not all to be despised; take them man for man in the community, the temperance men of this country are as good as any other class, as loyal and as patriotic. They have in their minds what they think would be a preventive for a great evil. They come to the doors of Parliament and knock there, and ask Parliament to give them a chance to try this great preventive. From 1867 to 1878 they came to this Parliament, and at last, as a measure of compromise, this Parliament said: We cannot give you total prohibition, but we will give you a local option law, which you can use in your own counties, and where the counties are favorable to it, you may try it. And when the counties get tired of it there is a way by which they can get rid of it. Parliament gave them that measure, and I think Parliament did a wise thing when it made that enactment. The people have taken it up and acted upon it. We come to the year 1887, and in the different counties numbering, I think, over 60 that by overwhelming majorities in most cases have adopted the Canada Temperance Act, where is the agitation among the people in those counties to get rid of that Act? Hon. gentlemen talk about the vested rights of the liquor interest. Are there not vested rights in other respects as well? Are there not vested rights when 60 or 70 counties and cities in this country, on the faith of the enactment of Parliament, have put their energies, their powers, their talents, and their money into obtaining for themselves a measure which they believe is good for their homes and good for their communities, and which they can abrogate when they see fit to get rid of it? Is it not taking hold of and interfering with vested rights in a very high and proper sense if we now say: "Although you have accepted this Act, although you have taken it in good faith and expected to enjoy the Act, and we gave you constitutional means of getting rid of it if it did not suit your purposes, we will now step in without leave or license from you and abolish this whole enactment, and leave you where you were in 1878?" I leave that to hon. members as a matter worthy of their consideration. When hon. members are asked to vote for prohibition, in reply they sometimes say: "Well, I have not been instructed by my constituents." Hon. gentlemen are now asked to vote for the repeal of the Scott Act. Have you been instructed by your constituents to vote for its repeal? Have I been instructed by my constituents to vote for its repeal? I have not, and until my constituents should instruct me to vote for the repeal of the Act, I would be very chary in doing so on the evidence at present before us. So I say the people have the legislation we have given them. I do not deny the right of this Parliament to repeal the Act, but I think, in common justice and fairness, we ought to leave it to the people whether they will carry out the Act which they themselves have accepted in good faith, which, if they think it is not for the benefit of the people, according to the best of their judgment, they can abolish at any time. These are my sentiments on this question. I am in favor of total and complete prohibition as giving the maximum of restriction and leaving the minimum of evil. I am in favor of the strictest kind of license, if I cannot get absolute prohibition, as giving what is next to the maximum of restriction in this matter. I am opposed to any retrograde legislation. I would fear the effect upon the country at large if this new Parliament composed of men as good, if not better than any who have before sat in Parliament, taken on the whole, should commence its career by saying to the people that we will sweep away even one of the slightest restrictions which the people believe are to-day around the liquor traffic, which we all agree has contained in it an element of injury to the people. There is just one other point to which I desire to call the attention of the House, and that is the expressions of opinion, the strong expressions of opinions from a section—no, not a section, but from classes of people in this Dominion whose opinion is of weight. Anyone who has watched the moral and religious forces of this country at work within the last six years has seen how those forces have been accelerated and marching on with quickened pace in the direction of complete and total prohibition. You cannot find the utterances of a Presbyterian synod, of a Methodist conference, of a Baptist conference, you cannot find any religious body whose general utterances have not been more or less strongly in favor of restrictions upon the liquor traffic, while nearly all of them have placed on record over and over again, the strongest resolutions of their attachment to the Canada Temperance Act, unless prohibition can be got, and their desire that Parliament will not repeal or interfere with the Act. In to-day's papers, and in the issues for the last two or three days, there are reports of the proceedings of the great conferences that are being held throughout the country, and the strongest resolutions—I will not take up the time of the House by reading them—have been passed by those bodies, setting forth that we pray our legislators at Ottawa not to put their hands upon any legislation which will relax the restrictions on the liquor traffic and militate against what we believe to be for the protection of our homes and the betterment of our country. There surely is no reason why, in the face of this sentiment, Parliament should repeal the Canada Temperance Act.

Mr. WALDIE. I think it is a reasonable proposition that the people in a locality which passes the Scott Act should know something about its operation; and if there is one county in Canada that knows about this Act more than another it is the county I represent. The Scott Act was carried as a prohibitive measure in 1848. In 1879 it was applied to the county of Halton by a majority of 70 in a very close contest. The case was fully argued from all its different standpoints; its effect upon the interests of the county and the public morals, and it was carried on that occasion. The first year the measure was not so fully enforced as was desirable, as it is desirable that laws of this country should be enforced, and the violations of the law were so numerous that it was supposed the sentiment of the people had entirely changed. It was held that they were prepared to reverse their verdict, and, accordingly, an appeal was made to the people in 1883 to repeal the Act. We heard in that year on public platforms in Halton, all the statements uttered in this House to-night with respect to the inefficiency of prohibitory legislation in other places. What was the result? After a full discussion and after drawing out as large a vote as has ever been polled on an occasion of that kind, the Act was again enacted by a double majority. On the first occasion the majority was 70, on the second occasion it was 140. The Act has been more rigidly enforced from year to year. It is not reasonable to suppose that a measure of this kind can be immediately enforced. There are large numbers of the people who are opposed to such Acts and who evince no interest in their enforcement, and indeed it is more difficult to enforce legislation of this kind than almost any other. What does this Parliament propose to do? Does it propose to repeal Acts because their provisions are violated? Why, it was only the other night we had the statement of the Minister of Customs that he had changed from ad valorem to specific duties owing to people committing violations of the law by making false entries of goods and giving false prices, and he proposed to remedy it by placing specific duties on those articles. Now, what this Parliament should do is to make the Scott Act more effective, by such legislation as is required for that purpose. I think that is a reasonable proposition, but it will not be a reasonable proposition at this time to repeal that Act on the supposition that it is not effective, because I can assure the House that the Scott Act is being carried out in nearly every portion of Halton in the most effective manner, excepting in the town of Milton. There is no other part of the country where the Act is not fully enforced, and there is not even an imputation that in the four townships of the county intoxicating liquor is sold. In Milton violations of the law are getting less and less, and I trust they will entirely disappear when the matter is settled by the vote of this House, which I believe will be strongly in favor of prohibition. I will not seek to detain the House at this hour upon the question of temperance. I do not think that would be a proper thing to do, but I wish to read the expression of a body who has formulated their views with regard to the question of the Scott Act in the county of Halton, into a resolution and sent it to me within the last week, and having done so, I will take my seat. This is a copy of a resolution unanimously carried at the annual district meeting of the Milton district of the Niagara Conference of the Methodist Church:

"Resolved, that we, the members of the annual meeting of the Milton District of the Methodist Church, assembled in the town of Burlington, in the county of Halton, May 26th, 1887, and representing about 9,000 members and adherents of the Methodist Church, do hereby express our continued confidence in the Scott Act as the most efficient law on the statutes of Canada for the suppression and prevention of the evils of the liquor traffic, and our appreciation of the good results of said law in the promotion of sobriety, morality, and good order in this county, where it has been in force during the past five years, and is now being as well enforced as most laws in the land; and we also most emphatically protest against the attempts being made in the Dominion Parliament to repeal or mutilate the said Act; and respectfully pray the Dominion Parliament to pass the amendments desired by the Dominion Alliance as incorporated in the Bill proposed by Mr. Jamieson.

"A. E. RUSS, Chairman,

"JOHN STEWART, District Secretary."

There you have the expressed views of the representatives of nine thousand inhabitants of that county, formulated by one of the most prominent religious bodies in this country. Now, I spent some time in Milton during the elections, and came in from political meetings to hotels there, at late hours on many occasions, and I saw no evidence of any violation of the law; and I was assured by boarders at the hotel, that no liquor was obtainable there. The law is not systematically violated in that place; it is violated, but not systematically violated, and it is not violated in the public houses. I was told that an attempt was made in the town of Oakville to procure liquor, and that the attempt failed. It is not true that the Scott Act is not doing good work, and if it is efficiently enforced it will continue to improve and advance the morality of the community. I may say also that I have some interests in the county of Simcoe, and I am aware that in places in that county where large numbers of men are employed the Act is respected and no liquor is sold. I know that large numbers of men employed in the various saw mills in that county, and the employers of these men desire prohibition. I believe that prohibition will prove a success, a comfort and a blessing to the people, if it is maintained in its integrity by the vote of this House.

Mr. McNEILL. I wish to say one word—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Adjourn, adjourn; twelve o'clock.

Mr. CASEY. Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Twelve o'clock.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. As I know that there are some hon. gentlemen who desire to speak on this question, or rather on these questions, and as they are questions of much importance, the discussion of which ought not to be hurried, I will move that the debate be adjourned to be the first Order of the Day after Routine and Private Bills on Monday next.

Mr. LISTER. If the vote is not taken to-night, I think it is doubtful if it is taken this Session.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Why not?

Mr. LISTER. There are a good many members here now who will not be here on Monday.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is their affair. If they do not choose to attend to their duties it is their own affair.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12 o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, 10th June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

POSTING PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved :

That in view of the advanced period of the Session, Rule 60 be suspended for the remainder of the Session.

He said: This rule has reference to posting up Bills after they have passed the House. As the House will most likely be prorogued on Saturday of next week, there will probably not be time to post the Bills.

Motion agreed to.

EXPROPRIATION OF LANDS.

Mr. THOMPSON moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 141) to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 39, respecting Expropriation of Lands. He said: The object of the Bill is to make the procedure under the Court of Claims applicable to the expropriation of lands, instead of the procedure by the Dominion Arbitrators.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROTECTION OF LABORERS ON BOARD VESSELS.

Mr. AMYOT moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 142) for the protection of laborers on board vessels. He said: Everybody knows the fearful state into which the harbor of Quebec has been brought by the action of the Ship Laborers' Society, in preventing anybody from working at loading or unloading vessels there, who does not belong to their society, and in compelling everybody who works to work at certain wages, which are very high. The consequence is that ships have ceased to come to the harbor, to the prejudice of the commerce of the country in general, and more especially of Quebec. The existing law, chapter 173 of the Revised Statutes, is quite insufficient to meet the case. Under that law it is very difficult to succeed in a prosecution of the offenders. For example, in the present law the word "unlawful" is used; and as the Ship Laborers' Society is incorporated, and has a right to pass certain by-laws regulating its members in their work, it is very hard to prove before a court that when the society wants to enforce its by-laws it acts unlawfully. This Bill is framed in such a way as to make the act of preventing or trying to prevent anybody from working on board or near vessels, a misdemeanor, and any gathering of more than three people near a vessel before the shore will be a misdemeanor, and the penalty is made very severe. Those who know the state of Quebec harbor, and the large organization of these ship laborers, who have caused almost the ruin of Quebec, know that a strong remedy must be applied, and the Bill is for that purpose. The session is late, but as this is no party question, I hope the Government will assist in passing it, and in that way come to rescue of the city of Quebec, and of commerce generally.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

FREDERICTON AND ST. MARY'S RAILWAY BRIDGE COMPANY.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the Governor in Council to advance to the Fredericton and St. Mary's Railway Bridge Company, from time to time, as the work of constructing the undertaking of the company progresses, as certified by the chief engineer of Government railways, sums of money, by way of loan, not exceeding 80 per cent. of the amount expended for such construction, and not exceeding, in the whole, the sum of $300,000, such loan to be subject to the following conditions: The company to pay interest annually on the amounts advanced, at the rate of four per cent. per annum, and to execute a deed of mortgage to the Crown constituting the loan hereby authorised, a first charge on the undertaking, the company to be entitled to pay off the loan, with interest, at any time within fifteen years from the making of the first advance. The Governor in Council to have power, within five years from the same date, to assume possession of the undertaking, on payment of the difference between the amounts then due to the Government for advances and interest, and the total amount expended by the company, and 10 per cent. on the total so expended, and also to assume such possession in the event of the company failing to carry out the undertaking, as provided by their charter, on payment to the company of the difference between the amount advanced and 80 per cent. of the outlay on the works, when the same are so assumed by the Governor in Council.

Motion agreed to.

THE QUEBEC JUDICIARY.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that, to-morrow, the House resolve itself into Committee to consider the following resolution:—

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the salary of an additional Judge of the Superior Court of the Province of Quebec shall be four thousand dollars per annum, and that such salary shall be payable out of any moneys forming part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

He said: This is to provide a salary for a judge at Terrebonne, under an Act of the Legislature of the Province of Quebec.

Motion agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that the House resolve itself into Committee on Bill (No. 7) respecting the Department of Trade and Commerce. He said: The principle of this Bill has been adopted on the second reading, but there are other matters connected with the organisation of the Department, and I shall briefly state what the proposed arrangement is. The Government have come to the conclusion that, with the rapidly and largely increasing trade of Canada, both foreign and domestic, it is necessary, or, at all events, expedient, that there should be a Minister whose time and attention and energy should be applied to the important object of developing and maintaining everything connected with our trade and commerce, whether it be home or foreign trade. Hitherto that branch of the public service has been attended to principally by the Minister of Finance, and it was thought that the time has now arrived when the duties of that branch might be separated. I have had opportunity of discussing this subject with Sir Leonard Tilley, who held the office of Minister of Finance for a good many years, and, I believe, with general acceptance, and his opinion coincided with that of the boards of trade and commerce of all parts of the Dominion, namely, that the duties of this service might properly be separated; that the duties of Minister of Finance should be, as the name indicates, purely financial, such as the charge of revenues, seeing to the balance of expenditure and revenue, and the character of the assets, the money assets of the Dominion. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will take charge of every question in any degree connected with the trade of the country, and all the questions connected with the tariff. Then, as regards the general subject of revenue, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce will, in fact, form a Treasury Board. One will consider the question of the tariff purely as a matter of revenue; and the other will consider it from the standpoint of trade and commerce. The two together will, it is hoped, be a most satisfactory board, attending to that great branch of the public service. This will add a Minister to the present list. On the other hand, we consider that the two Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue are administrative only. They are not suggestive, but administrative, and after the policy of the Government, with respect either to internal revenue or Customs, is settled, the Ministers at the head of these Departments will see that the law is carried out. It is proposed, therefore, that when the re-organisation has commenced, the Minister at the head of Customs and the Minister at the head of Inland Revenue will not be necessarily Cabinet Ministers. They will be political heads, but they need not actually, as a matter of practice, be members of the Cabinet. The intention of the Government in making this alteration, among other things, is to introduce the system which operates well in England, of having certain Departments presided over by political heads, who will thus commence their official career by holding these offices without being, of necessity, members of the Cabinet. This is a proposition, made many years ago, by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), who suggested that it would be well to introduce this system as soon as might be, and the system of having political secretaries and important officers of the various Departments who would be Ministers, and yet not be, of necessity, members of the Cabinet. It is of considerable importance that the number of Cabinet Ministers should not be increased, that is to say, that every member holding a political office in Parliament should not, ex necessitate, be a member of the Cabinet. That would overload a Cabinet, and in that regard would not promote promptness of action; but by this system, young members of Parliament, comparatively young members, who have taken prominent positions in Parliament, can obtain entrance into public life, and commence official training by holding these offices, and after certain probation, if they assert themselves before Parliament, they will, very naturally, be promoted and become Cabinet Ministers. A similar proposition was, I think, made quo ad the Department of Justice, years ago, when my hon. friend from East York was at the head of the Government, and it was proposed the Department of Justice would be divided. These propositions, in a modified form, are now before Parliament, under the auspices of my hon. friend, the Minister of Justice. The proposed proposal is, that, when these Acts come into force, the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue shall be members of the Government, and, on appointment, they must seek re-election, and they will have a salary, as it is proposed, of $5,000 a year. They will go out with the Government, and they will be political personages as much as if they were members of the Cabinet. It is believed that the expense will be diminished after the new Act relating to the Customs and Excise goes into force. It is proposed that the permanent officer under the political head will hold the position of chief clerk, and will have a less salary than the present officers, who are deputy heads and draw salaries of $3,200 a year each. These two Departments, the Department of Customs and the Department of Excise, which are the Departments furnishing the chief portion of the revenue of the country, will be under the control and supervision of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who will be the head of the whole of these two Departments, will deal with matters of trade and commerce, and will have the supervision of these two branches; and it is believed that, when they are under one head, there will be a great saving in the way of avoiding the duplication of offices. Now, the Departments of Inland Revenue and of Customs are so separate that they have separate officers in every regard. There is no connection between the two Departments, and it is hoped that, when these two Departments are under the one Minister of Trade and Commerce, the subordinate officers in very many parts of the country can do the double duty of attending to the Inland Revenue as well as to the Customs. This is shortly the plan of the Government, and I invite the acceptance of the proposition by Parliament.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it would be convenient to have a little discussion for the purpose of understanding more clearly what is involved in this measure, and what the hon. gentleman's intentions are. I observe that the hon. gentleman proposes to abolish the two Ministers of Inland Revenue and Customs, and to substitute in their place two officers to be called what? Controllers?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Controllers.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Controllers, who are to be, as I understand, equivalent to the English Parliamentary Under Secretaries?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And he proposes, in addition, to place these under the Minister of Trade and Commerce?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a point which will admit in itself of some argument. In former days, under Sir Alexander Galt and Sir Francis Hincks, the Minister of Finance entirely controlled the Departments of Customs and Excise. They were, in fact, sub-branches of his Department, and I should have thought that prima facie they would more properly have been made Under-Secretaries of the Department of Finance than of the Department of Trade and Commerce. I should think it is desirable that the Minister of Finance should be in constant communication with those two officers, and that he should have them to some extent under his control. Of course this is a new departure, and we do not know how it will work, and therefore I offer the opinion under correction; but this officer whom the hon. gentleman proposes to create as Minister of Trade and Commerce will, I suppose, discharge the functions which are discharged in England by the President of the Board of Trade, who has, I think, a parliamentary under-secretary also.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No doubt the hon. gentleman is aware that in England the Chancellor of the Exchequer, to a large extent—in fact, I think, absolutely—controls the Departments of the Inland Revenue and Customs. In this, there is this practical advantage, which I think the hon. gentleman will perceive, that the Minister is in that way probably better able to obtain that close, that minute information touching the working of new taxes which I suppose the Minister of Finance will continue to be responsible for. It is not proposed, as I understand, that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be responsible for new taxation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So far as the policy of the Government is concerned in the maintenance of the balance of trade and the adjustment of the tariff, the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have a great deal to say. With respect to the adjustment of the tariff in regard to the raising of revenue, that will fall within the province of the Minister of Finance, and the hon. gentleman will see that the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, together, will, in fact, be a board to govern the whole system of taxation, but one from the trade point of view, and the other from the revenue point of view.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that, of course. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is to be a sort of consulting physician in regard to the policy of taxation, but, in the practical carrying out of this scheme, I submit that prima facie it would be better to connect these two Departments with the Department of Finance than with the Department of Trade and Commerce, in accordance with the English system, which has been thoroughly tested, and which, I believe, has been found satisfactory in its working. I am bound to say that I found—and I dare say the Minister beside the hon. gentleman has found—that there was a practical inconvenience in the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue being severed as much as they were from the Finance Department. I think in some respects we might have administered the system of taxation better if they had been, as they were in the old time, more closely connected. You cannot exercise the same authority over officials belonging to the Department of another Minister as you can over those in your own Department, and I found—and possibly some of the hon. gentlemen who preceded and succeeded me may have found—that there was considerably more difficulty in obtaining such information, and such minute information, on a variety of points as the Minister of Finance ought to be kept well acquainted with, than under the old system, when these three offices, the Minister of Customs, the Minister of Inland Revenue, and the Minister of Finance were combined in one, as they were before Confederation. I throw this out simply for consideration. This is an altogether new thing. I am not disposed to say that the substitution of an officer having special regard to trade and commerce is not an improvement on the present system of a separate Minister for Customs and for Inland Revenue. We suggested that from this side of the House some time ago, because we thought it was not desirable to multiply Cabinet officers. There is another point of considerable importance as regards the working of this Department of Inland Revenue and Customs to which I call the attention of the House and of the First Minister. Practically speaking, he proposed—and he used the word—to reduce the deputy heads who are now equivalent, I think, to what in England are called the permanent heads of Departments, to the grade of chief clerks.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I seriously doubt whether that will be found to be an improvement. In England the institution of a permanent head of a Department has been found to be of very considerable service. He is, it is true, in the last resort, subject to the authority of the chief of his Department, but, in the English Civil Service, and I hope and believe to a considerable extent in our own Civil Service, these permanent heads of Departments are found not to be so amenable to political pressure as men who occupy merely the status of chief clerks would be. And, in the Inland Revenue Department and Customs Department more particularly, an innumerable number of cases constantly arise in which political pressure is brought to bear upon the political head of the Department to relieve this or that transgressor who has violated the rules of the Department, but who is sound in his political faith. A permanent head is in those cases very much better able to uphold the discipline of the Department and to see that the rules are adhered to than a chief clerk can possibly be. I think the hon. gentlemen may, if they will, recall to mind a number of cases in which they have been pressed to make remissions, and they will see that a permanent head of the Department may be a very useful buffer between themselves and their political friends, which, in my judgment, a chief clerk will certainly not be. The amount of $400 or $500 apiece to be saved, is not a matter which the House should consider as compared with securing the services of a thoroughly efficient and permanent head. A political head, of necessity, goes in and out with a change of Ministry, and political heads appointed in this fashion will not remain for any great length of time in one Department; and, therefore, I would say that it is all the more necessary that you should have permanent heads, men of position and standing, who might maintain the rules of the Department against all comers. If I understood the hon. gentleman aright, he proposes that the new Minister is not to have a separate department, but is to have the Inland Revenue and Customs, as it were, rolled into one.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The two branches will be under him.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman does not propose to give the Minister of Trade and Customs a separate set of officers—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT—such as are usually assigned even to Privy Councillors; he will be content with the Inland Revenue and Customs. Then there remains simply the consideration of the question of salary.

Mr. MITCHELL. He must have a separate staff.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Not as I understood the proposition; but if I was wrong, I would like to be corrected on that point.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. For instance, he will have a private secretary, and then he will have a deputy head, and there will be a deputy head over Trade and Commerce; and not improbably one of the present deputy heads will take that position.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We did not hear anything about a deputy head. That will come to mean a considerable additional increased expenditure. If you have a deputy head and a secretary, I am sure that you will find, under one form or another, that some other officials will be found desirable and will be attached. Now, you mean to take a deputy head and call him the deputy head of Trade and Commerce. Well, I doubt whether that will be found as effective as a permanent head in the Department of Excise and the Department of Customs; I doubt considerably, for the reasons I have already stated and which I need not repeat. One other question remains which requires special consideration at our hands at this stage, and that is the question of the scale of salaries. Now, as the hon. gentleman knows very well in England, a great disproportion exists between the salaries of the Cabinet Minister and the under secretary. A Cabinet Minister receives a salary, for the most part, of £5,000 sterling, the under secretary receives a salary of £2,000; in some cases, I think, he only gets £1,200 or £1,500, but I think in no case does the under secretary receive more than £2,000 sterling. The salary the hon. gentleman proposes, $5,000, is very close to the salary of $7,000 the Minister receives; and I should have supposed, prima facie, that in offices of this kind where the permanent heads of Departments do not, with us, receive, except in the Law Department, more than $4,000 at the outside, they should, as in England, have been put on the same footing, $4,000. I am inclined to think for junior members of the House who will not be expected to uphold the dignity of their position as Cabinet Ministers $4,000 would be quite sufficient remuneration. No doubt the closer you come to the scale of salary of a Cabinet Minister, the more likely is the prize to be fought for by the older members of the party and the hon. gentleman particularly intimated that it was his wish to promote rising talent and give the young men a chance. In that I entirely concur, for my part. I have always believed that it was a defect in our system, seeing that younger members of either political party could hardly expect to reach at one bound, the position of Cabinet Ministers, that they had practically no opportunity to serve an apprenticeship which would have been of great value to them, and also give the Prime Minister an opportunity of ascertaining how far they were fitted to fill more important offices. That point, also, I will submit for the consideration of the House; for it appears to me, looking at the salaries we give to our permanent heads of Departments, that the salary of a subordinate Minister, who is assigned to what is practically the position of under secretary, might very fairly be put at the same figure. Of course any multiplication of offices at present is to be regretted, and I may remind the House that what I proposed at the time the First Minister alluded to, was a reduction of the number of Cabinet Ministers, from thirteen or fourteen, as they are now, to a very much smaller number, and giving them permanent under secretaries. That was my proposition. I think that thirteen or fourteen Ministers are too great a number for this country, and that number would not have been created but for the fact that our Confederation was brought about by the fusion of two political parties, and in almost every Province these two parties had to be represented; hence the enormous number of Cabinet Ministers which we create for the service of not quite 5,000,000 of people, a number in proportion much greater than those which, I think, are found either in the United States or England. That was the proposition I made, and that is the proposition, which, if I had the power, I would like to see carried out in connection with this measure the hon. gentleman has under consideration.

Mr. MITCHELL. I cannot say that I quite agree with either the proposition submitted by the right hon. gentleman or with the views enunciated, in all particulars, by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down. To my mind this seems equivalent to, not exactly another seat in the Cabinet, but, practically, another Cabinet Minister in Parliament. Now, the hon. gentleman who last spoke, stated very truly, that, at the origin of Confederation, everybody believed that there were more Cabinet Ministers than were necessary for the government of this country. I have never ceased to entertain the opinion myself, and I am of the same opinion now upon that subject that I have been right along—that, instead of increasing the number of Cabinet Ministers in this country, which this Act practically does, we ought to reduce the number. The right hon. gentleman says this is going, practically to reduce the expenses. Why, Sir, we have heard that stated in every proposition that has come before us. Whenever an officer has been created, or a staff enlarged in any direction, it was always going to lessen the expenses of the country. Sir, I can see how this is going very largely to increase the expenses of the country. The hon. gentleman, some years ago, divided up his Department and created four heads of Department under his own administration. We were told then it was going to facilitate public business, going to lead to an economy in the administration of the affairs of the several Departments. But what have we found? In almost every particular the expense has been increased, involving new aids, another staff of clerks, the publication of larger and more extended reports, a staff of waiters and porters, and all the contingencies connected with the several Departments. Why, Sir, the creating of these four departmental heads intensified the expenses of the hon. gentleman's Department. But if the creation of four deputy heads does not increase the expense, why not unite the Inland Revenue and Customs? There is not too much work to be superintended by one head; and if this country is to have sub-heads to administer the practical working affairs of these Departments, as there are now deputy heads, or, as he said, chief clerks, the Minister will still have to do the practical work of the Department. There would be not too much work in the two branches, any more than there is in the two branches of the Fisheries Department. I can see no reason why if there was a union of the two Departments, Inland Revenue and Customs, under one head, why not allow the new Minister of Trade and Commerce to superintend both Departments, and let the business be administered under the deputy heads as they exist to-day, or as they may be changed and improved upon—because I admit there is great room for improvement, in one of them at all events, and if satisfaction is to be given to the commercial people of this country there is great improvement called for in one of those Departments. I can see where we are going to largely increase the expenses of the country in connection with this new Department. The First Minister, as is his habit when he wants to add to the expenses of the country, and he was followed up to some extent by the hon. gentleman who last spoke, appealed to the practice in England. The practice of a rich old country like England is not in all cases to be adopted as furnishing an example for a young and poor country like Canada. I can see clearly that, if a Minister of Trade and Commerce be appointed, the work of both Departments should be carried out under his superintendence and direction, without increasing the political power of the Government in this House, or by adding practically two members of the Cabinet to the voting power and the influential power of the Government, which already has too much influence in power. These are not needed at all events, and we are going to add to this country, especially when it is in a condition not well able to bear it, owing to the depressed state of trade, a useless expense.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I regret very much that at this very late period of the Session, when the hon. First Minister has already announced the period when prorogation is to take place, that a matter of so much importance as that of reorganising the various Departments of the Government, should now be brought forward. It seems to me that this whole subject is entitled to receive from this House a far greater amount of consideration than it is likely to receive at this moment. We are near the close of the Session, and we are asked to change a system that has been in operation for upwards of twenty years, and to change it upon a statement made by the Prime Minister that has occupied ten or twelve minutes in delivery. I have no objection to such a readjustment of the administrative work of the Government as experience may have pointed out to be necessary. I have no doubt whatever that in carrying on the Government for a period of twenty years many changes have been suggested by experience and practice, which, if adopted, would increase the efficiency of the public service. But I think there are two conditions which it is absolutely necessary to observe in order that any change may be made satisfactory to the country, especially any change at the present moment. The one is that there shall be no increase, at all events, in the number of Ministers; and the second is, that there shall be a large and marked diminution in the expenses of government. It is not possible to have given any attention to the work of administering, to the appropriations that are demanded from us year to year for carrying on the government of the country, without seeing that the public service has been exceedingly inefficient and far more expensive than is at all necessary. I venture to say that in no country as poor as Canada, having as small a population as we have, is there so large an expenditure incurred for administration. I say that might be diminished. I have no doubt whatever that the efficiency of the public service might be increased and the expenditure diminished by almost one-half; and that being the case, it seems to me extraordinary that the Government should come forward at this period to increase the number, if not of the Ministers, of members of Parliament who are to become Ministers, and increase the cost of governing the country. I have no objection to the appointment of a Minister called a Minister of Trade and Commerce. Perhaps that would be an advantage, it certainly would be of some advantage if the Government were to indicate that they are disposed to place upon any Minister of the Crown the duties which ordinarily devolve on a Minister of Trade and Commerce; but I see no indication in the Bill before us that there is any intention on the part of the Government to create an officer of the Crown who is to discharge those duties. On the contrary, it seems to me there have been demands in the country, demands that are reasonable, for a Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the Government, in order to comply with the feeling of the mercantile classes, are disposed to make the appointment of a Minister whom they call a Minister of Trade and Commerce, and this Minister so appointed and so called, is to undertake the ordinary duties that hitherto have devolved in part on the Minister of Customs, in part on the Minister of Inland Revenue, and in part on the Finance Minister. That is not the work required of a Minister of Trade and Commerce. Some of the duties thus proposed to be performed by that Minister are, no doubt, duties that might be legitimately and properly transferred to the Minister of Trade and Commerce; but unless the Minister of Trade and Commerce is to undertake much more work, and is to do a great deal of work not hitherto done by any Minister, the mercantile classes will not be satisfied, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be to the people a fraud and a delusion. Where are our foreign ministers? Where are our consuls? Where are those reports with respect to our trade with other countries which would be required at the hands of such an officer, if we were an independent people? Where are they to come from? What arrangements have the Government made so that English ministers and consuls residing in those countries with which Canada is carrying on trade, will furnish us with such information as is deemed of vital consequence by the people of England? We have not the first indication that the Government have considered the subject in any way whatever. I believe a Minister of Trade and Commerce would be of immense importance to the people of this country. But what communications have the Government had with the Imperial Government on the subject? Have they said: We have trade with Spain, and we want some separate and distinct record of our trade with that country, in order that we may see exactly what our trade is, and what opportunities there are for extension; we want, in fact, to obtain from the ambassadors and consuls in every country with which we have trade, that information which is obtained for the use of the people of England? When the First Minister talked about appointing a Minister of Trade and Commerce, I supposed some steps would be taken to make him really a Minister of Trade and Commerce. But there is not the slightest indication of that intention; but we have an ill-defined Bill from which you cannot tell what the duties of the Minister are to be, and so far from the Government having made up their minds what his duties are to be, they provide in this Bill that the Governor in Council may at any time assign any other duty or power to such Minister and the duties and powers conferred on him may be transferred to any other member of the Privy Council, and so they do not know what duties are to be assigned him. They have assigned him certain duties; they do not know how long they are to remain under his control and be discharged by him, and so they take the power to adjust and re-adjust the departments, and do everything that I suppose the Government have the power of doing at this moment. Now, Mr. Speaker, there is the declaration made by the Minister, that he is going to make two subordinate Ministers, who may or may not be members of the Government. Well, Sir, notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), I do not see any reason for doing that in this case. I do not see any particular object the Government are to gain; I do not see any provision that these

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Ministers are to have such duties devolving upon them such as devolve upon the Under Secretaries of State. On the contrary, I say the Controller of Inland Revenue and the Controller of Customs to be appointed under the Bill would not have one of those functions that devolve upon the Under Secretaries of State. Why, Sir, the Under Secretary of State is simply the counterpart of the Minister whose department he represents; he has every duty devolving upon him that devolves upon the Minister as an administrative officer. He takes a seat in one House while the Minister takes his seat in the other, and it is only intended for parliamentary convenience that he should hold such an office. The hon. gentleman's arrangement does not point to anything of that sort. The hon. gentleman proposes to appoint two controllers with duties which are distinct from each other, and from the duties of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who has wholly distinct duties to discharge. The hon. gentleman says that the duties of the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be suggestive duties; that he will collect information and assist the Government in forming the policy on the subject of trade and commerce. The duties of the Minister of Customs and of the Minister of Inland Revenue now are administrative duties. There may be suggestions growing out of those duties, but they are mainly administrative, and so they will continue to be. Now, I say that any proposition to increase the number of members of Parliament in the Government, whether you put them in the Cabinet or out of the Cabinet, will not give satisfaction to the people of this country; and there can be no doubt that the increase in the number of officers implies a large increase in the expense of the government of this country. When my hon. friend, the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), was in the Government, he had charge of the whole policy of the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway; he had charge of the canals and the public works. The Department of Railways and the Department of Public Works were combined, and he discharged the duties of Prime Minister as well as the administrative duties of these offices. What have you to-day? You have two Ministers for the purpose of administering the duties of those offices. You have the hon. Minister, the member for Compton (Mr. Pope), and you have the hon. Minister the member for Three Rivers (Sir Hector Langevin)—a Minister of Railways and a Minister of Public Works. How is it that the Government do not come down with a proposition to unite those offices? What is the object of keeping them separate? We know that, practically, the duties of the Minister of Railways are confined to the control and management of the Intercolonial Railway. Why, Sir, what extraordinary public works have been undertaken that the Minister of Public Works could not discharge the duties of Minister of Railways at the present time? Everybody knows that he can do so; everybody knows how methodical, how industrious, and how attentive the Minister of Public Works is to his duties; everybody knows that the hon. gentleman is eminently capable of discharging all the duties that devolve on both departments at the present time. Now, Sir, we know why those Departments were separated, and we know that to-day the cost of the Department of Railways is greater than was the cost of both Departments when the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) was in office. This Government promised economy to the people of this country, and they told the people of this country years ago, when my hon. friend was in office and had more to do than both Ministers have to do to-day, that his Department was extravagantly managed, and yet the cost of that Department was not so much as the cost of one of these Departments is now. If the hon. gentleman wants to practice economy, if he wants a reorganisation of the Departments, and I admit a reorganisation is possible, with a view of improvement, let him come down with a proposition to unite these two offices; let us have a Minister of Public Works and Railways instead of having two Ministers for that particular branch of the public service. Let the hon. gentleman unite the duties of Minister of Customs and those of Minister of Inland Revenue and create a Minister of Revenue, because their duties are distinct and independent from those of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and we will have, not an increase of the number of officers in the public service but a diminution; we will have increased responsibility with more order and method in the conduct of the affairs of the Government—that is, provided we have better men. The hon. gentleman proposes to have two law officers of the Crown. Well, I do not know whether he intends this as a reflection on the Minister of Justice, but I suppose that the hon. gentleman knows that confidence is a plant of slow growth, and the hon. gentleman may not give unlimited confidence to his Minister of Justice. Now, the hon. gentleman knows that he fought with a great deal of vigor and a great deal of fire the proposition made by the leader of the Opposition when he was on that side of the House to create an Attorney General. The hon. gentleman disapproved of the office, and said that it was altogether unnecessary to have such an officer. He fought that proposition vigorously, and he was assisted by the hon. the leader of the left Centre. The hon. gentleman who leads the Left Centre, is consistent to-day.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was always consistent and economical.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But the hon. gentleman who leads the Government is not; he now thinks it is necessary to have two law officers. Well, his proposition is wholly different from that made by the leader of the Opposition when he was on that side, because the leader of the Opposition did propose to confer important duties on the Attorney General. The hon. gentleman proposes to confer duties that are of no importance, and that can be as well discharged outside as inside of Parliament. The only thing he proposes is to create a Solicitor General, to provide a place for some supporter of the Government in the House, and further tamper and interfere with the independence of Parliament by increasing the number of those who are dependent upon the Administration. Why, Sir, a year or two ago we had timber limits, and coal mines, and all sorts of matters of that kind, under the control of the Government, by which the influence of the Government might be extended over the House. That means of influence is gone; it has lost its attraction for members of Parliament; it has proved illusory. Men who grasped at large fortunes found they did not get them, except in a few instances, and the hon. gentleman now undertakes to increase the influence of the Government in another way. He proposes to increase the number of Ministers by a rearrangement, a readjustment of the Public Departments. Well, Sir, I am opposed to the hon. gentleman's propositions. They are not those which the public interests require; they may be those which the hon. gentleman's interests require. They are not those that would commend themselves, in my opinion, to the people of this country. They increase the expense of government when the Government ought to put forward every possible effort to diminish that expense. They increase the inefficiency of the public service by increasing the number of officers, without defining what the duties of those officers are. Why, the hon. gentleman, it is clear from the provisions of the Bill, has not sufficiently considered the subject to know what duties he will assign to his Minister of Commerce. I am not going into the details of this measure; I am discussing the general features of the propositions, and the other Bills relating to the readjustment of the Public Departments. I will consider those when the House goes into committee upon them, but I say we might readjust the Public Departments and have a Minister of Commerce with advantage, without increasing the number of the Ministers of the Crown, and at the same time diminish the cost of administering the affairs of this country by 50 per cent.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 2,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That tends to the creation of a department in full force.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There must be a deputy for the Minister, who can take the place of the Minister and exercise the same authority administratively when necessary.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman stated that, taking into consideration the whole question, there would be a reduction rather than an increase in expenditure in consequence of this change. It would be satisfactory to the House if the hon. gentleman would furnish us with an estimate approximating to the anticipated expenditure under the proposed change. There is no disposition on this side of the House to object to any changes that are manifestly in the public interest, provided they are not accompanied with a large increase of the public expenditure. I must confess my inability to understand how such an important change can be brought about without a corresponding increase in expenditure. It may be a great advantage to rearrange the Departments, but I think the hon. member for Bothwell has pointed out very clearly that all those advantages might be secured by amalgamating the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue in one, and the Departments of Public Works and Railways in another. I think the public mind has been somewhat prepared for a change of that kind, considering the decreased railway expenditure now under the control of the Railway Department. If the hon. gentleman could give us an approximate idea of what the increased expenditures would be, I think it would facilitate the discussion of this Bill.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think that discussion would come up more properly on the Bill respecting the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue. When that Bill is before the House, it can be considered how far those two Departments can be joined together. The only suggestion made is that the Inland Revenue Department and the Department of Customs can be united. This measure is in effect doing that, by appointing a Minister of Trade and Commerce. The hon. member for Bothwell says we have not defined what that Minister is to do. The very name indicates what he is to do. He is to attend to everything connected with trade, foreign or domestic. He is to attend to everything connected with commerce in its widest signification, as having a wider scope than the word trade. He will have to look after all the arrangements for the steamship lines which have been and will be subsidised for the purpose of opening and developing foreign commerce. Then, the hon. member for Bothwell says we have not provided in the Bill for our consuls; why should we not have arranged with Her Majesty's Government for having consuls. That will be the special duty, one would say, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when he is seeking for the extension of Canadian commerce with foreign countries, to see that the aid of Her Majesty is obtained. We desire to have a Minister of Trade and Commerce whose attention will not be given to mere pound-shillings-and-pence matters, which belong to the duties of the Minister of Finance, but whose mind will be devoted to considering the various means of developing and extending and protecting our commerce. And I am proud to say, what perhaps the hon. gentleman is not aware of, that Her Majesty's consuls all over the world are instructed to report on the best means of developing the trade of every one of Her Majesty's colonies. We receive continually, and it is published in the Canadian Gazette, information from the different consuls and consular agents of the Imperial Government, acting as well for the advancement of colonial trade as that of the Mother Country. I do not see how the hon. gentleman can object, in the present position of Canada as a commercial and manufacturing country, to our having a Minister of Trade and Commerce whose duties will be altogether severed from those of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then we agree. When we come to discuss the other Bill, we can discuss how far the Departments of Customs and of Inland Revenue ought to be under the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and how far they ought to be amalgamated, with a view of saving expense. In the meantime, I am very glad to find that hon. gentlemen opposite think we ought to have this Department. It is said there will be a large staff. I do not see that follows. There must be a deputy, and one of the deputy heads of the Customs or Inland Revenue Department will most likely be appointed to that office. Then, as there is not very much departmental work for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, he need not have a large clerical staff. He can utilise the officers of the Customs and the Excise at headquarters, and I believe that the result of putting those two branches of the public service under the control of the Department of Trade and Commerce will be that the amount of clerical staff can be greatly decreased at headquarters. With separate deputy heads, these two Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue are just as much severed from each other as the Departments of Customs and Justice.

Mr. MILLS. Not necessarily.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. They are both branches of the public revenue, and I believe that, with one Minister having them both under his supervision, having them both under his eye every day, he can arrange so that this severance, this complete severance may be avoided, and that the number of clerks under those two Departments at headquarters may be considerably diminished. If it is proved that the efficiency of the public service requires a large clerical staff, we must have it, as the hon. gentleman knows that expense is a secondary consideration when compared with efficiency; but I believe there can be equal and increased efficiency, when those two Departments are under one Minister, with a less amount of clerical assistance, than under the present system. It is an experiment. Whether hon. gentlemen opposite or we be in power, it is the interest of every Administration to try and earn public applause, if nothing else, by an economical and efficient administration of affairs. No Government has any great interest in filling offices with too large a staff of employes. But, to return to what I was speaking of just now, I believe that this system of putting those two great branches of revenue, foreign and domestic, under the Minister of Trade and Commerce, will greatly tend to the efficiency of those two Departments and to the diminution of expense.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman has, I must say, rather skilfully evaded the very pointed question put by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones). He wished to know whether the hon. gentleman had fully considered the question of expense, and whether he was prepared to give this House a statement of what the increase would be. The hon. gentleman treats the question of expense very lightly, and intimates that he hopes to have efficiency but not economy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman evaded giving a direct answer to my hon. friend. There are some branches of the subject before us on which, of course, I would not give an opinion with great confidence. I suppose those who have been Ministers of the Crown are more competent to discuss certain branches of the question, but there are other branches which, I think, even the humblest intellect can clearly understand. Anyone who takes up the Public Accounts can see that each Department costs from $24,000 to $150,000 a year. Those who have, as I have, watched for years the working of the Departments, find that so far from an attempt being made, when a new Department is created, to economise in any direction, the efforts of every subordinate—I speak not of the heads—are to enlarge the sphere of the Department as much as possible, and to make it as important, so far as expenditure is concerned, as possible. This new Minister of Trade and Commerce will have his deputy, of course, and his staff corresponding to his position and Department.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I did not understand the hon. gentleman to say no. My hon. friend asked him to define the duties. He answered that the name defined the duties. That reminds me of the story of a gentleman who asked what the duties of an archdeacon were. "Why," was the answer given, "an archdeacon is a man who performs archidiaconal functions." I oppose this change chiefly because I believe it will add very largely, yearly, to the expenses of the country. My short experience has taught me that, as soon as a department is created, whether it be a new department, or a division of an existing Department, the two divisions make haste to bring their expenditure up to an amount equal to that of any other Department. They seem to think that they will occupy an inferior position unless their expenditure is as great as the expenditure in the other Departments. There may be an advantage in having a Minister of Trade and Commerce who will devote special attention to that branch of the service, but it seems to me we could have had that without increasing the expenditure. The hon. gentleman could have merged the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue into one; he could have had a Minister of Revenue alone who would have control of both Inland Revenue and Customs. The hon. gentleman then could have had his Minister of Trade and Commerce, who would devote himself to the higher branches, and to relieve the Minister of Finance from that portion of the work from which he is to be relieved. That could be done without any increase in the service. The two staffs are there, the one in the Inland Revenue, and the other in the Customs. The hon. gentleman has not said why that course was not adopted. It is a simple one, one to which there can be no objection. The hon. gentleman not having offered any objection to it, I assume there are none to offer. The hon. gentleman proposes to adopt the system of appointing Under Secretaries of State. So far as I am able to judge, I think a movement in that direction would be of no small service.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Hear.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) But to do that the hon. gentleman ought to reorganise the whole service. If it were reorganised as it could be; if he had the firmness to put his hand to the work, no man could do it better—from his long experience we will concede that—a fewer number of Ministers would carry on the work efficiently, provided they had a sufficient number of under secretaries. This would give good training to young men, who, instead of being pitchforked into the seats of Cabinet Ministers, would be put in the subordinate positions of under secretaries. But the hon. gentleman has not taken that course. He could have carved out six or seven Departments of State with six or seven Ministers controlling them, and then have his Under Secretaries. The system he thinks a good one would be introduced, and there would be no increase of expense. But it appears to me that the hon. gentleman does not seem to care very much whether the cost to the country is increased or not; and, of all times, it seems to me that this is the time when our energies may well be devoted to the reduction of the expense, to the reduction of all unnecessary expense, while, instead of that, propositions are made from day to day the ultimate result of which can only be to increase that expenditure without, as far as I can see, increasing the efficiency of the service. I venture to say that two years will not go over our heads without our finding the new Minister having a complete staff, as my hon. friend from Northumberland has said, from the deputy head to a doorkeeper, chief clerks, first-class clerks, and all the officers who belong to one of the great Departments. We were told a year or two ago, when the hon. gentleman divided the Department of Public Works and Railways, that it was because we were engaged in the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and that the magnitude of the work was such as to require the entire energy of one man and of one mind. There was something to be said for that, and the House agreed to the proposition, and the Department of Railways was created and was separated from the Department of Public Works. The reason which existed then has ceased now, but is it proposed to make those two Departments into one? Not at all. The work connected with the Canadian Pacific Railway has ceased; the work which the new Minister was to supervise and control is at an end. The hon. gentleman certainly has still to control the Intercolonial Railway, and some other roads, but so he had before the Departments were separated; and I believe that the hon. gentleman who is at the head of that Department will not take the responsibility of saying that after the Canadian Pacific Railway is completed, one Minister could not very well discharge the duties of Public Works and Railways and Canals. Our public works are not so large as they were, and I hope they will not be as large as they were. There is no reason why those Departments should not be amalgamated, but we never hear of any such proposition. A year or two ago, a small Department—the Department of Marine and Fisheries—was divided into two in order to give an office to somebody. Has there been a decrease of expense in that Department? Not at all. You find first-class clerks, and second-class clerks, and so on, in each branch of that Department, and the expenses have been largely increased. The hon. gentleman has now had an opportunity of reorganising the whole system, and he has great power in the House, and great power with his supporters, to enable him to do that. I believe that he could very well reduce the number of Ministers and of members of the Cabinet in creating Under Secretaries of State, and largely reducing the public expenditure, but he has not done that. Instead of that, he makes a proposition which will involve an increase of between $30,000 and $40,000 a year. I have taken the trouble to go over the expenditure on the Departments, and I find that the average cost of each Department is between $54,000 and $64,000, and I undertake to say that this new Department will not be long before its cost is equal to the others.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman who leads the Government has told the House that the officers in the Department of Customs and in the Department of Inland Revenue are largely a reduplication of each other.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I did not say so. I said they were largely administrative.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). He said more than that. He said that many of the duties which were undertaken by the one might be discharged by the other. How does he propose to reduce the expenditure? By merging these offices under one Minister? Not at all; but by putting one under a Controller of Customs and the other under a Controller of Inland Revenue. The distinction is to be kept up. The distinct organisations are to be kept up. How then is he going to bring about a diminution in the expense, and to put an end to that duplication of offices which at the present time is altogether unnecessary. I do not object, as I have said, as we all on this side have said, to the hon. gentleman having his Minister of Trade and Commerce. We think it is well to have a Minister of Trade and Commerce, if you give him the duties of a Minister of Trade and Commerce to attend to; and that will be quite sufficient; but you should unite the duties of your Minister of Customs and your Minister of Inland Revenue, and have a Minister of Revenue. Let him discharge the duties which would devolve upon him. They are quite sufficient, and they are distinct from the duties of a Minister of Trade and Commerce. In that way, you may secure economy by placing those two Departments under one Minister, and by putting an end to unnecessary offices, and to the salaries which now go to pay those unnecessary officers in the two Departments, which could be combined in one, and the saving would supply you with the means to pay the staff of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. We have suggested to the hon. gentleman a way in which he may economise and may diminish the number of offices. The hon. gentleman says that his provision is practically the same as the English provision for Under Secretaries. I say it is not the same. The Under Secretary in England has the same duty as the senior officer to discharge. He is not a member of the Cabinet, but his administrative duties cover the same ground as those of his senior. He takes a seat in one House while his senior takes his seat in the other. It is a matter of convenience, and they are there to explain their administration. They can do in England what we cannot do here. Men in England do not refuse office because they cannot afford to accept it, because they cannot accept the small salary which is attached. They are mostly men of fortune; but how many men here could accept $2,000 or $3,000 a year and discharge the duties of a subordinate Minister? Our circumstances are altogether different and require a different policy to be pursued; we have adopted a different policy, we have acted upon a different policy, and the hon. gentleman knows that his proposition is not one to change that policy and to introduce the English system, but is merely one to increase the expense and to make the machine of government more expensive, more unwieldy, and more cumbrous than it is at present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It seems to me that the hon. gentlemen opposite ought to unite on some ground of opposition. The hon. gentleman says he is opposed to this, and believes that the English system would not apply here. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) says otherwise, and the hon. member for Prince Edward Island (Mr. Davies) sees a great deal of merit in having young men brought in as members of the Government without their being members of the Cabinet, but he thinks this is going to cause a great deal of expense. He does not object to bringing in the subordinate members of the Government. That cannot be his objection, for he approves of that. Then his objection must be that a man is called the Minister of Trade and Commerce instead of Minister of Revenue. We will have the Minister of Finance. You do not want to do away with the Minister of Finance? Then, they do not object to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and then they desire a Minister of Revenue, so they desire three Ministers by way of economy, while we only propose to have two. We propose to have a Minister of Trade and Commerce—that is one; we propose to have a Minister of Finance—that is two. These hon. gentlemen propose three, but we propose, instead of a third Minister, to have two subordinate Ministers, and two of the hon. gentlemen opposite approve of that course. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the hon. member for Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies) say: Yes, that is very good. It is cumbrous, expensive and adding to the inefficiency of the Department, says the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills). Well, gentlemen, settle it among yourselves, agree upon it. In the meantime I believe we are introducing economy. The hon. gentleman says: Why do you not propose to unite Public Works and Railways? We have not much encouragement from hon. gentlemen opposite, when we come down and propose to diminish the number of Ministers when we are attempting to simplify a Department, and to reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers. This is an attempt to reduce the number of Cabinet Ministers, and to bring forward the young talent of this House and enable them to acquire training in the public service. It is of very great importance indeed, that men should not at once step into the more important offices of the Government, and at the same time be members of the Cabinet, and potential in governing the political destinies of the country, and the great questions connected with the Dominion as a whole. Now, it is quite clear, if the Minister of Trade and Commerce is honestly chosen for his ability, if he has under his Department the Inland Revenue and Customs, if he sees the work under his own eyes of these two branches of the public service, he can at once discover where there is a redundancy of employment, where there is an opportunity of uniting the work in the same hand. The hon. gentleman says: Well, there are two deputy heads in that important Department of Marine and Fisheries. There must be, in order to have efficiency, and an efficient classification of the work, and you must have men specially adapted and trained. Take for instance, the Department of Marine and Fisheries. The officer who is in charge of the fisheries has got specific duties to attend to, requiring special study, special aptitude and attention to that branch, to look after the encouragement of the fisheries, to look after the protection of rivers, to look after the development of that great branch. Then the Minister Marine has got most multifarious duties connected with navigation, with shipping, both on the great lakes and on the greater ocean. These classifications are absolutely necessary, and it is quite absurd to say that we are going to promote efficiency by making, for instance, one man look after all the questions arising in the Customs, and all the very difficult questions that arise with respect to the administration of Excise. You must have special officers for both these branches, and our proposition simply is that for each of these branches there will be a political head who will be in Parliament, and who will have special charge of each of these classes. Depend upon it, this is a well meant attempt, and I think will be a successful attempt, to carry out increased efficiency and increased economy as well.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may take occasion to remind the First Minister that I myself expressly stated, in discussing his remarks, that the system I should prefer was that which was explained by the hon. member from Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), of largely reducing the number of Cabinet Ministers. I took occasion to say that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And the hon. gentleman knows that it is not an opinion of yesterday, that I have expressed it in my place in Parliament on various occasions and at various times; and that I thought the circumstances attending Confederation had caused a far greater number of Cabinet Ministers than we need.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Quite true.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I may say this to the First Minister, that we have been discussing this matter, so far, in a very fair and friendly spirit, I think, and if the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), who has devoted a great deal of attention to the working of constitutional systems, differs from me, or my hon. friend from Queen's, P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), I think it is quite proper that he should state his views.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think, when we are taking this up in the fashion we are, that the hon. gentleman is quite fair in saying that there is a great discrepancy of opinion between the hon. gentlemen on this side. We are candidly and fairly giving the House our opinions, and in that we are strictly in accordance with our duties. But if there is a slight difference on the main point, we are all agreed that we would like to see the number of the Cabinet largely reduced, and that is the point in reality between us and the First Minister. However, so much for that matter. The point to which I want to call his attention is this: I heard him just now declare that he wanted the Minister of Trade and Commerce to be able to concentrate his whole mind and attention on those large and broad questions affecting the trade and commerce of the whole Dominion, which are becoming more and more important every day. That was his contention. He did not want him to have to do with the pounds, shillings and pence side of the question. He stated that; I took down his words at the time. Now, I may say it appears to me that if he is head of the Department of Customs and the Department of Inland Revenue, of necessity an enormous number of questions will arise which will have to be referred to that head, that they will occupy his time very much, to the exclusion of the larger duties which the hon. gentleman desires to assign to him. The inferior members in the Administration who are specially charged with the administration of the Department, will find themselves unable to decide these questions without an appeal to the Minister, whether he be Minister of Trade and Commerce or whether he be Minister of Finance; and if the hon. gentleman's object be, as he says it is, that the Department of the Minister of Trade and Commerce should give special attention to the larger questions, the mere fact of his being the official head of Inland Revenue and Customs will, I think, greatly interfere with his discharging that function. The President of the Board of Trade, although I do not know that he is quite as important an official in the British Cabinet as the hon. gentleman proposes to make this officer, is obliged, if my memory serves me, to keep in constant communication with all the numerous representative commercial bodies throughout the kingdom, and he is obliged also to keep a special eye over the consuls and foreign commerce of the country. Those are his two chief functions, they occupy him fully. In Canada we have not got so much foreign commerce as yet—although I hope that, in course of time, it will attain to a much larger development—as to exact the same engrossing attention. But as the hon. gentleman knows, we have an enormous number of cases submitted to the Minister of Customs and the Minister of Inland Revenue, in the nature of appeals and pleas for remission, and pleas for consideration, and all that kind of thing. Now, my opinion is that these will come, in the vast majority of cases, to be decided by the officer of Trade and Commerce, and if you make him the head of that Department that he will find that they will absorb almost his whole time and attention.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I may say in the first place that I quite appreciate the spirit in which the hon. gentlemen opposite have approached this question. They are really assisting the Government by their advice in discussing the measure, and my remark was merely a good-natured chaff across the floor about differing opinions among gentlemen who, politically, are known to be associated, but it is quite right that in a question of this kind in which the whole House are interested, every hon. member on both sides should express his opinion. The hon. gentleman points out that the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce will be greatly taken up by the number of questions that will arise in the Customs Department, as well as in the Inland Revenue Department. But the hon. gentleman must remember that the Minister although not a Cabinet Minister is, so far as the public is concerned, a member of the Cabinet, and his decisions will be just as binding as if he were a Cabinet Minister and called the Minister of Customs. The Department will be under his supervision and control. The Minister of Trade and Commerce will have the supervision of those two Departments, and he will have the controllers of the two Departments under his management.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the hon. gentleman permit me to read him a phrase in the clause, which is very full and very strong. It says:

"Any duty or power assigned to the Controller of Customs or the Controller of Inland Revenue shall be performed or exercised subject to the direction and control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce."

Those gentlemen will be, therefore, practically in the position of inferior officers, subordinate officers, Under Secretaries or what you will, to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. That is the intention of the Government, I suppose?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is so. But the hon. gentleman will remember that the Chancellor of the Exchequer in England never has Customs or Inland Revenue cases brought before him; they are all dealt with by other officers, although he is nominally at the head of the whole fiscal system. However, in order to meet the view of the hon. gentleman on that point I will consider it in the other Bill whether—because, to a certain extent, all reorganisation must be tentative and experimental—I can insert a clause that those two Departments shall be under the control of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or under any other head that the Governor in Council might order.

Mr. BURDETT. It is to be regretted that a measure of this importance has been brought forward so late in the Session. As the leader of the Government has intimated that we should forward the business as much as possible by making our speeches as short as possible to hasten prorogation, I would respectfully suggest that this measure should be allowed to stand over until next Session, in order that members may ascertain what are the views of the people in regard to it, and whether they consider it will benefit the country or not. I think that would be the proper action to take. I see no necessity to have this measure passed this Session and before the country has expressed its opinion upon it, because the Bill provides that it need not be brought into force until a later period. It is still more important, in my judgment, that this measure should be postponed, because other matters which are more urgent and which are forcing themselves on the attention of the country, should be discussed and should occupy the attention of the House. The first in importance is that of commercial union with the United States—unrestricted trade with our neighbors. That question is now agitating the country, and it must necessarily occupy the attention of this House. The right hon. gentleman may smile if he sees fit, but there is such a feeling in the country, there is so much uneasiness in regard to the way in which public affairs are being managed, there is such a feeling of gloom prevailing that there may be a political revolution in this land before many years have passed. Then there is the question of universal suffrage to be discussed, and also the large question of pensions and superannuations. The pruning knife should be applied there, and it is necessary to consider how this is to be done. There was no one subject more agitated before the people than the question that this country is too much governed. What was meant by that was that we had too many legislators.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I really must rise to a point of order. The hon. gentleman is not speaking to the third clause. He is speaking on every possible subject. We are in committee, and hon. members should only discuss the clause before it.

Mr. MILLS. The right hon. gentleman has discussed the general principle, and he undertook to reply to me after we were in committee.

Mr. BURDETT. I was saying that the pruning knife should be applied. I understand that a larger number of new members were returned to this House at the last election than to any other Parliament since Confederation, which is to my mind a clear indication that the people desire a different order of things, possibly not a change of Government, but a different management of public affairs; and if there was one pledge given by the candidates to the electors more frequently and more vehemently than another it was the pledge that they would aid in every possible way to secure economy in the public service. I found since I came here every ingenuity used to devise means to increase the expenditure; we have increased the number of senators and it is now proposed to increase the members of the Government under one guise and another. It is idle to argue on the ground of economy that you can increase the number of officials in the Government. I should like to know when the right hon. gentleman has ever introduced such a measure during his political career and has not urged that it was introduced with a view of economy, and I should like to know any one case in which such measure did not increase the public expenditure. I think the object of the Bill could be attained in a different way. If it is desired to have a Minister of Trade and Commerce, unite the offices of Minister of Customs and Minister of Inland Revenue under one head, and place this office under another head. That would be a satisfactory arrangement. I am not aware that any of the hon. gentlemen are overworked, for they appear to enjoy ample leisure; they take rest, and they visit their friends, and travel the same as other people do. They are not, therefore, overworked, and those two positions could be united under a Minister of Trade and Commerce in the way I have indicated. Then, if it is desired to have a Solicitor General—and I should think it is hardly desirable under existing circumstances—unite the offices of Minister of Railways and Minister of Public Works. The cause for the separation of those two positions having passed away, there is no reason why they should not be united, and have a Solicitor General to occupy one of those positions without increasing the expenditure. For my part, I am opposed to having understrappers in the Government or anywhere else. Any man in the Government should be in the Cabinet and bear his share of responsibility for the measures of his Department; and when charges of mismanagement were brought against his Department he should not be able to screen himself behind a subordinate officer, who would be used as a scape-goat, in time of need, to bear their sins into the wilderness of public obliquity. I entirely object to that system. If it is necessary to have such changes as have been suggested, abolish the useless and expensive office of High Commissioner to England. The reasons given for creating that office have proved to have no foundation, and that office should be abolished and this new office of Minister of Trade and Commerce created in its place, if it is absolutely necessary. We were told that if a High Commissioner were appointed in London, our financial arrangements would be conducted by him; but we find this Session that a payment of $29,000 has been made to one gentleman for putting through a loan. We were also told that we would save the expense of Ministers going to and fro between here and England so frequently. But they have gone more frequently, and it is apparent that that office could be very conveniently abolished. As the Finance Minister was brought back by the party because it was absolutely necessary to do so to prevent the storm breaking over the heads of the Government, why not retain him here and let that useless office of High Commissioner go by the board? From the position taken by him here, it is manifest that the political life of the Government would be very short without him. It is useless to have all these offices, and if the United States can manage with five Ministers I fail to understand why we cannot do with a like number. I know it has long been the practice to refer to English precedents for an excuse, when English precedents will answer the purpose, but why should we not go to a country which is nearer to us, and has a system more like our own in this direction—a country from which we can draw a useful example of economy in the management of public offices. It is said that this Minister of Commerce would look after the shipping of our country, but I have been enquiring among those of the Maritime Province members whom I know, and they all tell me that the policy of this Government has driven the shipping from their coasts—that it has destroyed their shipping trade. As far as the Solicitor General is concerned, it appears to me, from the large amount of law fees which are now paid to friends of the Government outside, that such an officer is not necessary; but if he will do all the work which is done by these outside gentlemen, to whom enormous and extravagant fees are paid, it may pay to appoint him, and unite the other two offices as I have indicated. I would urge upon the Minister that he should permit this matter to stand over until next Session so that we may ascertain in the meantime what the feelings of the people are on the subject. He may feel the pulse of the people through the press or at the bye elections, and, as there is no urgency in the matter, I hope he will postpone the measure until next year. I think that in the meantime hon. gentlemen could better employ their time in applying the pruning knife to the present extravagant and inefficient officers under the Government, than by adding new offices at an increased cost to the people.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The hon. gentleman has said that, in all probability, no other officers under the head of the Department would be necessary, except a deputy head. Why then does he take power by this clause to appoint a number of these other officers? He is taking that power because he knows it will be found necessary to have these other officers and clerks. I don't know whether the hon. gentleman was serious—he seemed to be speaking in a rather humorous way at the time—when he said that the proposition advanced from this side of the House would cost the country more than the one he proposed. Let us take the figures and see. Now we pay $7,000 a year to a Minister of Customs and the same amount to a Minister of Inland Revenue. The hon. gentleman proposes to reduce them to $5,000, calling them respectively Controller of Customs and Controller of Inland Revenue. Then there will be the Minister of Trade and Commerce at $7,000, and a Deputy Minister at $3,200, making $20,200 as against $14,000, which is the amount now paid. Does any hon. gentleman in this House, much less the right hon. gentleman himself, believe that the deputy head of such a department—a personage of much more real importance than the political head, will not have his chief clerk? Of course he will have a first-class clerk and second-class clerks. We know that the

Mr. BURDETT.

Inland Revenue Department last year had no less than nine first-class clerks, and so it will go in the new Department all the way down the gamut to the doorkeeper. He has omitted the private secretary, but he must know that the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have a private secretary, and so it will go all the way through. I think the hon. gentleman will find that my estimate for the extra amount is a very moderate one.

On section 4,

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should say that the fourth clause was out of place in connection with the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That clause was put in most of the Acts with regard to the Departments, in 1867, and I think it should be put in here, especially as it can do no harm.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It was put in at a time when the whole business of the Government was tentative. Now the hon. gentleman has been for the greater portion of twenty years at the head of the Government, and surely the period of tentative government ought by this time to be over; we ought by this time to be able to settle down to a proper system of institutional law and decide what are the precise functions of the various Departments. We had the Department of Indian Affairs in the Interior, and now the hon. gentleman has transferred it to the Presidency of the Council. There was the Police Department, which was put under the Secretary of State, and afterwards under the Minister of Justice, but is now under the Presidency of the Council. So these various duties, instead of being indicated by being placed under a particular officer, are made to travel from one Department to the other, so that the name of a Department is no indication of the functions it is discharging. The hon. gentleman takes power in this Bill to transfer those duties, which are so properly indicated by the name, to another Department of the Government—to, say, the Minister of Justice, the Secretary of State or the President of the Council. It seems to me that if it is proper to create a Minister of Trade and Commerce, to discharge the duties which devolve upon a Minister of Trade and Commerce, there is no necessity to travel those duties on circuit from one Department to another.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It occurs to me that the clause is a valuable one. It gives the Government power, if any particular branch happens technically to be under one Department, to transfer it to another, and the hon. gentleman has himself given an instance of the kind. He mentioned that the Mounted Police were under the Department of Justice, which is, perhaps, the proper place, as they are police officers. But the Minister of Justice of that day, in the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite, did not like that arrangement, and he transferred the Mounted Police to the Department of the Secretary of State. Then it was thought that the Mounted Police should be under the Department that has to deal with the Indians, and with the Indian movements, because the police force is really there to restrain the wild Indians of the west. The hon. gentleman's instance shows the value of this clause, which, at all events, can do no harm.

On section 5,

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I would ask the hon. gentleman if he really thinks this clause is necessary? There is such a provision with respect to the other Departments, but it is not carried out. Here we are just verging on the close of the Session, and we have been looking for the Fisheries report day after day for twenty-one days, but it has not been distributed. For my own part I do not expect to get it, though perhaps we may get it as a present just when we are going home.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Or get it after you go home.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I wish to insert a clause here to provide that the Bill shall not take effect until it is brought into force by proclamation.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not a measure of urgency then? Better let it stand till next Session.

Amendment agreed to.

On section 6,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I see that the hon. gentleman provides for the appointment of a deputy, but no provision is made for the salary of that officer.

Committee rose and reported progress.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 111) to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, and to make better provision for the trial of claims against the Crown.—(Mr. Thompson.)

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman intend to transfer to the Exchequer Court the exclusive jurisdiction in every case, so that the Supreme Court shall cease to be a court of original jurisdiction in any respect?

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is not necessary to go into a discussion of the general principle of the Bill now, but I think it is certainly not an improvement on the existing means for the administration of justice. The Supreme Court, besides being a court of appeal, is a court of original jurisdiction as an Exchequer Court, and I think the public would have been better served and satisfied if the hon. gentleman had allowed that jurisdiction to continue, and, if he thought necessary, had appointed an additional judge to the Supreme Court. Under the Bill there will be a great many important matters to be tried in a court consisting of one judge, and almost every case will be followed by an appeal. The hon. gentleman, I am satisfied, has taken a retrogressive step in proposing this change.

Mr. THOMPSON. I would remind the hon. gentleman that Exchequer cases are now tried by only one judge.

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). What is the objection to the course proposed by the hon. member for Bothwell of increasing the number of the Supreme Court judges, if necessary, and maintaining the Exchequer Court as it is at present.

Mr. THOMPSON. It would be directly contrary to the principle of this Bill, and open to these objections. In the first place, we would have no distinct tribunal, but we would have seven judges, each of whom would be charged with Exchequer business; and there would be this additional disadvantage, that all the Exchequer Court business of the Dominion would be concentrated in the city of Ottawa. It would be practically impossible for the Supreme Court judges, discharging appellate duties, also to travel all over the country to take evidence on petitions of right; but the judge under the Bill will go to the points where it is most convenient to take evidence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The judges of the Supreme Court of the United States have jurisdiction as Circuit Court judges. The whole United States is divided up into circuits, one of the judges of the Supreme Court is united with the District Court judge on every circuit. I can see no difficulty in dividing up Canada into circuits, and the Supreme Court judges going over the country in the same way. That would meet the objection of the hon. gentleman, and he would accomplish all he proposes to accomplish, so far as the board of arbitrators are concerned, if he would subordinate that board to the Supreme Court in its Exchequer capacity.

Mr. THOMPSON. In the United States there are Circuit Court judges of the Supreme Court, who are not the judges who sit to hear appeals.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman is mistaken. There are two courts in the United States besides the Supreme Court—the Circuit Court and the District Court. The District Court judge sits with the Supreme Court judge in the Circuit Court. The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken in supposing that the judges of the Supreme Court of Appeal do not also sit as Circuit Court judges.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think I am not mistaken at all. But the question is not material to the present argument. If Parliament will give me anything like the staff, considering our territory, that the United States Supreme Court has, and is willing to bear the expense, my objection will be removed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is no difficulty about the expense.

Mr. LANGEЛИER (Quebec). There would not be any more expense than in the system proposed in this Bill. The objection of the hon. the Minister of Justice would have weight were there too few judges in the Supreme Court to do the business required. But as he proposes to create another judge, any objection on that score disappears. The additional judge, which he proposes to name, he might add to the Supreme Court, instead of giving him special jurisdiction, and any one of the judges of the Supreme Court could then exercise in the Exchequer Court the special jurisdiction under this Bill, without interfering with the business of the Supreme Court. I cannot understand the objection to employ one of the judges of the Supreme Court in these cases. In the Province of Quebec we have the Court of Queen's Bench, which has an original jurisdiction and an appellate jurisdiction—original in criminal matters, and appellate in other matters, and no difficulty arises. Some difficulty did occur until a few years ago, owing to the fact that the number of judges was insufficient, but since the appointment of an additional judge the court of original jurisdiction and the court of appellate jurisdiction may be held at the same time. There is no reason why the same cannot be done here. Further, if you appoint one judge to deal solely with one kind of business, you cannot expect to obtain the services of so able a man as if you were to appoint an additional judge to the Supreme Court. The hon. the Minister of Justice says there is an objection to taking away a judge from the Supreme Court; but this has been going on whenever the Exchequer Court is held. I have seen a judge of the Supreme Court occupied at the Exchequer Court in a case which took up three and a half months of his time. I have no objection to the plan of handing over the business of official arbitrators to a regular court. That suggestion was made by the leader of the Opposition when the Bill of last year was introduced, a Bill very different from the present one. The leader of the Opposition then suggested, as an improvement to the Bill of the Government, that it would be better, instead of appointing a special court of arbitrators, to give the duties of arbitrators to the Exchequer Court. I do not see why this plan should not be adopted.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not see the slightest advantage in such a scheme, and the hon. gentleman has not given any reason in its favor. He has merely stated that it has occurred to his own mind that the plan would be a good one, without stating why it would be preferable to the one proposed. He thinks my objection to it was badly taken, because the judges at present go on circuit and hear petitions of right. So they do, and, as far as their appellate duties are concerned, no great inconvenience has resulted. We are, however, transferring to them all the duties of the board of arbitrators, and instead of having one of them occasionally going on circuit as at present, we shall have at least three of them engaged permanently in circuit duties. If, on the other hand, we give the Exchequer Court business to one judge, he shall have no appeal duties to discharge. We would not do better by giving him a thousand dollars more and compelling him to hear appeals likewise. A great advantage will be obtained, as regards certainty of practice and speedy despatch of business, by placing all this kind of business in the hands of one judge, instead of having to inconvenience the judges of the Supreme Court by asking them to deal with those cases, when they have many other important duties to attend to.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). If one judge is able to attend to all this work, I do not see why an additional judge in the Supreme court would not be sufficient also for the work. If it is expected that one judge alone will be able to attend to those duties, I do not see why an additional judge, who would be a member of the Supreme Court, would not be able to attend to them, and he would, besides, have the assistance of the other judges when they have leisure, which very often happens; whereas, under this Bill, he would have no assistance at all. This will entail the necessity of appointing more judges hereafter, as one judge will not be enough to exercise the jurisdiction. Either the business of the court will be neglected, or it will be necessary to increase the number.

Mr. THOMPSON. The addition of one judge to the Supreme court would not meet the case. He would be clothed, not only with Exchequer Court jurisdiction and duties, but with appeal duties likewise. He would have as much to do in the Court of Appeals as the present judges, yet you would expect him to discharge all the Exchequer Court business and all the business of the Dominion arbitrators.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There are one or two difficulties which the Minister of Justice can hardly have considered. If you have but one judge, he must be familiar with both languages, as he would have to hold his court in Quebec as well as in the other portions of the Dominion. No matter what eminence he may have attained at the bar, it is absolutely necessary he should speak French as well as English.

Mr. AMYOT. We have any number of men who know both languages.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So you have, and that means the judge must be taken from the Province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman will see when he, through necessity, must take a judge from the Province of Quebec to discharge the duties of judge of the Exchequer Court, he could strengthen the judiciary of that court, so far as Quebec is concerned, by making him a judge of the Supreme Court, because then you would have three judges in the Supreme Court acquainted with the Quebec civil law where you have only two to-day. That would be a considerable advantage. The hon. gentleman says it will require three judges to discharge these duties, but if you appoint one in a separate court and he alone is able to discharge them, I do not see the force of his statement.

Mr. THOMPSON. At present there is a rota of duties in the Supreme Court in relation to Exchequer business, and suitors can only expect the judges of the Supreme Court to take Exchequer business in the intervals when they are not called on to perform their other duties. For that reason, if we require all the judges to do duty in the Appeal Court, we can only take the intervals of their time between appeal terms for the other business, and it would require more than these intervals to dispose of all the Exchequer business.

Mr. THOMPSON.

On section 7.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not propose to reopen the discussion, as the hon. gentleman insists upon proceeding with his Bill, but, suppose this new judge cannot act in the case of illness, as the whole jurisdiction is withdrawn from the Court of Exchequer, what provision is to be made?

Mr. THOMPSON. That is provided for. He appoints a deputy judge.

Mr. DAVIES. You do not utilise the judges of the Supreme Court?

Mr. THOMPSON. No.

On section 15,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I see that notice has been given of the introduction of a Bill by the Minister of Customs. Of course, I do not know what that is to be, but I was wondering whether he was contemplating the adoption of some suggestions which were offered last year, as to the reference of questions of Customs seizures to a judicial decision, instead of leaving them as at present.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Does the hon. gentleman ask whether the Customs decisions are to be referred to this court?

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Last year there was a good deal of discussion on this point, and the hon. member for Glengarry at that time, following my hon. friend from Chateauguay (Mr. Holton), suggested that, in questions of seizures, after the goods had passed out of the charge of the Government, the duties having been paid, the recourse must be had then, not by way of appeal from the decision of the Customs Department, but at the instance of the Customs themselves, in order to recover the goods in the court, and that there should be something like there is on the other side of the line in reference to that matter; and he said that if the Minister of Customs did not introduce a Bill looking in that direction this year, he would feel it incumbent on him to do it himself. Of course, the then member for Glengarry, whether he has felt it incumbent on him or not, is, unfortunately for him and, perhaps, for the country, not now in a position to introduce such a measure. The Minister of Customs has given notice of a Bill to amend the Customs Act, and I was anxious to know whether he proposes to cover that point, because it is not covered in this Act.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, it is not. I rather think my hon. friend the Minister of Justice will carry on this Bill on the lines he now proposes. The Minister of Customs has now under consideration the question whether, in his measure, he will throw that additional jurisdiction on this court. That is at this moment under consideration.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). If the jurisdiction is limited as it is in this Act, could the Minister of Customs afterwards do that?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice says he could.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman seems to have changed the phraseology somewhat. The old jurisdiction clause provided that there should be jurisdiction in regard to any claim against the Crown or any officer of the Crown. Does the hon. gentleman know that, in England, it is customary to sue the Crown by suing the officers of the Crown—the Secretary of State for instance. I suggest that those words ought to be put in, because there are many suits which must be brought against officers of the Crown in England and cannot be brought against the Crown itself.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 96), to incorporate the Dominion Oil Pipe Line and Manufacturing Company.—(Mr. Moncrieff.)

ST. JOHN'S AND IBERVILLE HYDRAULIC MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

Mr. COURSOL moved the second reading of Bill (No. 119) to grant certain powers to the St. John's and Iberville Hydraulic and Manufacturing Company.

Mr. BOURASSA. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the question is put for the second reading of this Bill, I desire to make a few remarks to the House on this question. I must say, in the first place, that not one land owner having a river frontage on the Richelieu River has ever addressed a petition or a demand of any kind to this House in favor of this measure. On the contrary, we have learned that nearly all the river proprietors were ready to sign petitions against the adoption of this Bill. If that has not been done, it is owing to the fact that we have only received this Bill to-day. The petitions which were sent here in favor of this Bill have been drafted from the notices given by the company, and the Bill was sent in too late to allow of petitions against its adoption being sent here before its second reading. I believe, however, that if proper time had been allowed, these petitions would have been signed by seven-eighths of the proprietors having a river frontage on River Richelieu, on River du Sud, on Pike River, on Missisquoi Bay, against the passage of this Bill. After the experience we have had, the hon. member for Iberville (Mr. Béchard), the hon. member for Missisquoi (Mr. Clayes), and myself, we can certify that if this measure is adopted it will entail great losses on the river proprietors by causing their lands to be almost constantly flooded. The promoters of the Bill pretend that they will favor navigation by keeping the low water level two feet higher than what it is now. And at St. John they say that they will thus aid the Government in protecting navigation. I can assure this House that there are no less than 25,000 or 30,000 acres of land on which a crop is never put in except at times when the water is quite low. We have the experience of our forefathers on this point. In years gone by, fisheries had been built near the St. John's Rapids, which raised the water from 1½ feet to two feet. Well, as long as these fisheries were there, the proprietors were unable to get the value of 25 cents on any acre of the lands which were so flooded. We succeeded in having these fisheries removed; these lands were restored to cultivation, and regained their original value. I am satisfied that if the hon. Ministers who compose the Government were perfectly informed of the real state of things, they would never have allowed this Bill to be brought before the House, or, at least, they would not have allowed its second reading. I hope the House will not allow it to go any further. I will not move that this Bill be rejected, because it is not customary to do so with regard to private Bills; but I think the Government have the right to act as they think best, and if they can see their way to it they will confer an immense favor on the counties which I have named, and which have an interest in not having this Bill adopted; and I will resume my seat in the hope that justice will be done to the river proprietors.

Mr. BÉCHARD. As my hon. friend from St. John's (Mr. Bourassa) has said, there is strong opposition to this
