Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The case of Shaw against the Attorney General. There the divorce was not allowed because the court thought there was no evidence that a domicile had been acquired in the United States by the party who had applied for a divorce. But the court admitted that if a foreign domicile had been acquired, and that fact had been established, there was no doubt that a divorce granted by the court where that fact was established, would be good in the United Kingdom. That is exactly the rule we would apply here. But the hon. gentleman asks us to assume that a foreign domicile is required in any foreign country before it can be admitted that a divorce granted by the court of that country would be a good divorce. But by the law of Massachusetts, a person must not only have intended to acquire a domicile within the State of Massachusetts, but must have been in actual residence in the State for five years before the application can be granted. Now, it is declared in the statement we have before us that this party had resided the five years in Massachusetts required by the law of the State. When the hon. gentleman says that if you admit these facts, then this woman has no right to come here and apply for a divorce, I do not agree with him. The husband Manton has, under the law of Massachusetts, obtained a divorce, and all she wishes is such declaratory legislation here as to show that she is entitled to marry again. That is her position. If hon. gentlemen think that is not, according to the rule and policy hitherto prevailing in this country, sufficient to entitle her to a divorce, then it may be sufficient reason to vote against the Bill; but that is no reason for making a false declaration in the preamble. The hon. gentleman asks to give this House jurisdiction, in what way? By making the declarations cover the facts so as to bring the application within the rule that has hitherto obtained. So far as this applicant is concerned the burthen of proof is upon her. The moment the House becomes seized of the fact, and it is seized of the fact by her declaration that the court of Massachusetts did take action and grant a decree, it was upon her to show that that decree was not a valid decree, that the laws of Massachusetts have not been observed, or that the party had not acquired a domicile there, and, not having acquired a domicile, then this decree was not a valid decree. I say that the burthen of proof is upon her and not upon Manton. He is not before us, he has had no reason to come here; he is a resident of another country, he is domiciled elsewhere, and, according to the laws of the country, he has obtained a divorce which recent decisions make good and binding in this country. Whether it is so or not, the moment that fact became known to this House or the Senate, then the burthen of proof was thrown on the woman, not merely to show that she had been deserted, and that he was living with another woman, but that the divorce obtained there was not such a divorce as was binding under our law, under which recent judgments have been given. The hon. gentleman has referred to the judgment of Mr. Justice Brett, in the case of Spicer vs. Spicer, but the point was that the party had failed to prove a domicile. The principle was conceded, as it was in the case of Shaw vs. the Attorney General; the question was purely one of evidence, and the court said that the party having failed to establish the fact that a foreign domicile had been acquired, the court could not interfere with the divorce.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I shall follow the good example set by other hon. gentlemen who have spoken, and speak very briefly. With respect to the case cited by the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I judge, if I read the case rightly, that the hon. gentleman has entirely misconceived, or forgotten, the position taken in that matter. In the committee this point was made: that under the English law there is, down to this hour, not one case in which the dissolution by a foreign court, although of competent jurisdiction, of an English marriage, had been recognised by an English court. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has expressed a contrary opinion, although the facts do not support him. I will read the opinion given on that point in the case of Shaw vs. the Attorney General:

"The principles upon which the question here raised must be decided had been so recently discussed in several cases in the Court of Ultimate Appeal, that it is not necessary to enter upon the discussion at large upon the present occasion. It may be sufficient to observe, first, that Lolley's case has never been overruled; secondly, that in no case has a foreign divorce been held to invalidate an English marriage between English subjects, where the parties were not domiciled in the country by whose tribunals the divorce was granted."

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Hear, hear.

Mr. WELDON (Albert). I agree with the hon. gentleman so far.

"Whether, if so domiciled, the English courts would recognise and act upon such a divorce appears to be a question not wholly free from doubt."

The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) said it was free from doubt; but it appears that this question is still unsettled. The case of Harvey vs. Farnie goes further to support the position. I dissent altogether from the position taken by the hon. member for North Simcoe, that it is clearly the rule of English law that a court of competent jurisdiction, when the petitioner is domiciled within foreign jurisdiction, has power to dissolve an English marriage. With respect to the ad misericordiam appeal, which is not a very good ground for argument that we are called on to bastardize the issue, to declare that the man who thought he was making a good second marriage is living in adultery, I would say this: In the case of Spicer and Spicer, referred to by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper), an English court declared that an English subject, whose marriage had been dissolved by a court of competent jurisdiction in California where his wife had been living, and who had made a second marriage, had been living in adultery and bastardized the children of that marriage. If we decide this principle to-day, that a foreign court is competent to dissolve an English marriage, we are going a considerable distance ahead of any position yet taken by any English court. I do not say it is a false position. The position was stated with force and accuracy by the Minister of Justice, who pointed out that no judicial decision is in favor of it. The fact is that there is uncertainty as to the domicile, and that the domicile is not made out, as it is very difficult to make out, for the presumption of law is strongly in favor of the domicile of origin as against the domicile of choice, and under the law we are bound to do justice to all parties and not lay down a dangerous rule of law and hold that the second marriage was bad, but that the facts of the petition are substantially correct. I think the vote taken on the second reading and in the committee is a safe vote, because it is not asking the House to lay down a new and dangerous rule of law.

Mr. McCARTHY. The question in this case appears to be as to the domicile of Manton. The petitioner has not thought fit to give the committee a tittle of evidence upon that point, and we are asked to draw a presumption on a rule of law which I do not understand is generally admitted; but the burthen of proof rests upon her and she is bound to satisfy all reasonable doubts on the question of Manton's domicile. I would rather say that when the court of another country has pronounced a divorce, we, according to the comity of nations, are bound to give such credence to that decree as to assume that the petitioner was domiciled, and was a resident of that country in which the decree was granted. In opposition to the presumption there is this fact, which the committee should not forget, that this man has lived in Massachusetts for eleven years since the divorce. He came to marry in Canada, but he immediately returned and has resided there since. Where do you gather his intention to change his domicile? If living in the United States fifteen or sixteen years is not evidence as to domicile, I do not know where you will get evidence. I agree that we ought not to refuse this woman the divorce, but give her an opportunity to marry again; at the same time we do not want to do injustice to others in doing justice to her. I move the following amendment:—

And whereas, except from the allegation to that effect in the said decree of divorce, there is no evidence that the said William Manton, at the time he petitioned for the said divorce, had become a resident of the said State.

Mr. DAVIES. I quite concur with the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) on this question; but I would suggest that the hon. member has gone too far. I would not say there is no evidence to justify it, but I would say there is not sufficient evidence.

Mr. McCARTHY. I do not find any.

Mr. DAVIES. After she deserted him he went to Boston and lived there five years.

Mr. McCARTHY. I did not know of that.

Mr. THOMPSON. As I said the other evening, the principles connected with this matter are so important, and are so apt to be cited hereafter as precedents, that I venture to trouble the House with a few further remarks on the subject. First: I desire to express my entire concurrence with the remarks which have been made by the hon. member for Picton (Mr. Tupper) and the hon. member for Albert (Mr. Weldon). This Bill is opposed by two sections of opinion, one of which is opposed to all divorce, and one section which is anxious to give effect to foreign divorce, without fully considering what that may lead to. I do not say that by way of reproach, but only for the purpose of guarding against what might be a lax consideration of a foreign decree of divorce. The hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) says we are bound to give effect to the recital of the decree of Massachusetts, by which it is declared that this man had a domicile in the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. McCARTHY. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I do not mean to lay that down as a proposition, but I said in the absence of any evidence to the contrary.

Mr. THOMPSON. I am taking it purely as a proposition of law, and I say that I entirely disagree with the hon. gentleman, and for these reasons: The decree of the court in Massachusetts has no effect, no vitality, no validity at all, Mr. WELDON (Albert).

nothing it says or does is of any force until it is established in some way that that court has jurisdiction. That is admitted on both sides, and yet my hon. friends who differ from me say that we are to take the mere assertion of that court itself that it has jurisdiction. Now, I say that is entirely repugnant to the principle that the decree of any foreign country requires jurisdiction in order to give it effect and validity. If that were so, the decree of any court in the United States, with reference to a divorce or any other subject, would only have to allege that the court had jurisdiction in order to bind this Parliament or the courts. But the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy) and the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) say that the burden of proof was on the woman who is seeking a divorce here. I say that the burden of proof was on her to establish the only allegation on which this Parliament has ever shown a willingness to grant a divorce—to show that her husband committed adultery, and that she has established, when she showed that he contracted a second marriage during her lifetime; and on a plain principle of law, it is necessary for a person who relies on a foreign jurisdiction to excuse any act he has done, to prove that jurisdiction existed in the tribunal that purported to excuse it. There is a broad distinction in all cases between the regularity of a foreign decree, and the jurisdiction of a foreign court. There is a presumption in favor of the regularity of the proceedings of a foreign court, but the burden of proof has always been held to be upon him who sets up the decree as an excuse for anything, whether it be for a crime or for a mere trespass. Now, I say that the recital in this case is one which will be believed and credited by the courts, but only as a statement of the regularity of the proceedings of the tribunal, as a compliance with the law of the State of Massachusetts, but not as an assertion upon which to found jurisdiction. Now, as regards the disposition which is shown to be lenient with the defendant, the husband, I have only to say that I think he does not stand in a position to claim any sympathy from this Parliament. He is a person who, having married in Canada, left his wife here without support, and not at all on account of the circumstance that she deserted his house, or because there was a want of sympathy or of friendship between them, but on the distinct evidence that is here given from herself, and uncontradicted, that his habits were such that she could not live with him. It may be an insufficient reason on her part, but it did not justify him in going to Boston and getting a divorce which allows him to marry again, but does not allow her to marry again. It is not a fact that we are bastardizing the issue; we are simply asked to do what every tribunal does, and that is, pronounce on the evidence before us. There is the evidence; there is the second marriage; there is no evidence to justify this second marriage, and the House is, therefore, asked to pass a Bill on the ground that the second marriage was bigamous. In any other proceeding, judicial or otherwise, the court would be entirely open to proof, as to the validity of the foreign decree, and consequently as to the legitimacy of the children. Of course, there should be a natural desire not to use harsh expressions in the recital of the Bill, or to say that the second marriage was bigamous or adulterous; but against that there is the danger of putting on the Statute-book a precedent for granting a divorce for something less than adultery, as declared on the face of the Bill itself. To my mind the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe is much less objectionable, since he has made it recite the reason why the doubts have arisen, and puts the whole doubt fairly on the face of the Bill. Still, against that relaxation, there is the danger, as I said before, of establishing a precedent which will make it appear hereafter that we are giving a divorce for something less than what we believe to be adultery.

Mr. McCARTHY. Surely, we are not doing anything of the kind. It is saying, as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) said, that if such a divorce is a good one, all that can be said is that the woman should not come here; but that if the divorce is not valid, then her husband is living in adultery, and we have the right to grant her relief. We are not, therefore, creating a dangerous precedent, but we are merely settling doubts which have arisen in the minds of this woman and her advisers, not at all affecting the decree in the United States, but saying in effect that if it is a good decree, it is unnecessary for her to come here, but that if it is a bad decree, the man has committed adultery and she is entitled to relief.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) In the course of this debate, one statement was made by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper)—and, I think, rather endorsed by the Minister of Justice—which I cannot allow to go unchallenged, to the effect that the evidence showed that this man had deserted the wife, rather than she deserted him, but I fail to see on what evidence he based that statement. Here is the evidence, which was the sole evidence given on that point—on page 5, of the return of evidence:

“By Mr. Vidal:

“Q. When you left him the second time, and went to your father's to remain, did he consent to your going, or did he wish you to remain with him? A. He did not consent to my going; I came away.

“Q. Did he wish you to remain with him? A. He did not know that I was going.

“By the Chairman:

“Q. You left him without his knowledge or consent a second time? A. Yes.”

What does that prove? It proves beyond the shadow of a doubt that she left him.

Mr. THOMPSON. My hon. friend can prove almost anything by taking only a portion of the evidence.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) If there is any other part of the evidence bearing on that point, I should like to see it.

Mr. THOMPSON. I called attention to the evidence she gave as to his habits—that he was a man with whom she could not live. I admitted that that might not excuse her, but it certainly afforded no excuse to him for getting a divorce, after acting in that way.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The only thing I gather is that the man was addicted to drink, but he never beat her, or used violence of any kind, and when she left him—

Mr. TUPPER. He was cruel to her, she says.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) My hon. friend will not lay down as a proposition that because a wife conceives her husband to be cruel, declining at the same time to say in what respect he is cruel—

Mr. McCARTHY. She explains the cruelty afterwards—want of sympathy with her youth.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I went into all these matters before, and I do not intend to trouble the committee with them again. But I want to reply to the argument advanced by the Minister of Justice, that the burden of proof rests on the husband. I think some members of the committee are under a wrong impression, from the remarks of the hon. gentleman. We must remember that the decree of divorce was not put in evidence by the respondent; it was put in by Susan Ash, and on its face it was legal, showing that the Massachusetts court had jurisdiction, and that the husband had obtained a divorce from her. She did not impeach that decree on any ground that could invalidate it, either that he was not legally domiciled, or that the decree was obtained by fraud or collusion. Having put in that decree and not invalidated it, she cannot be heard now to plead that it should be ignored. The committee ought to understand the position we are standing in. No one is opposing what this woman seeks; no one opposes her getting a divorce; all we are asking is that when we are granting the divorce we should not be called on to declare on the face of the Bill, that which many lawyers in this House conceive to be contrary to the decisions of the highest courts of the realm, that this man is living in a state of adultery, and that the children of his marriage are bastards. Let this woman have her divorce, and let the divorce obtained in the United States have its legal effect. I shall cheerfully support the amendment of the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), but should it not be carried, I cannot agree to a Bill that contains a statement contrary to the facts put in the evidence.

Mr. TUPPER. The hon. gentleman challenges the statements of this woman in evidence, that her husband used abusive language towards her when under the influence of liquor, and that he was under the influence of liquor all the time, which I think is some justification for her having left him and gone home to her father.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is no evidence of that at all.

Mr. TUPPER. Let me then read the evidence:

“By Mr. McInnes:

“Q. Was he quarrelsome or abusive in his manners and language when under the influence of liquor? A. Yes.

“Q. How often was he under the influence of liquor? A. All the time.”

Let my hon. friend show me any evidence that contradicts that.

Amendment of Mr. McCarthy negatived: Yeas, 44; Nays, 58.

Bill reported.

Mr. TAYLOR moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. McCARTHY moved in amendment:

That the said Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be re-committed to a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amending the same by striking out all after the words “sixty-eight” in the twelfth line of the preamble down to the word “that” in the nineteenth line, and inserting the following in lieu thereof: “and it has been made to appear that on or about the said fourth day of September, the said Susan Ash became separated from and has ever since lived separate and apart from him, the said William Manton; and that the said William Manton, on or about the seventh day of April, in the year one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, on his petition, obtained from the Supreme Judicial Court of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, holden at Boston, in the county of Suffolk, in said State, a decree of divorce from his said marriage with the said Susan Ash, on the ground of her desertion from him, whereby the said marriage between them was, or purported to be, dissolved or annulled; and whereas, except from the allegation to that effect in the said decree of divorce, there is no sufficient evidence that the said William Manton, at the time he petitioned for the said divorce, had become a resident of the said State; and further, that the said William Manton, on the third day of September, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, was intermarried with one Mary Ford Hatch, and he, the said William Manton, and the said Mary Ford Hatch have ever since lived together as man and wife; and whereas doubts have arisen as to the validity of the said decree of divorce, and as to the right of the said Susan Ash to marry again; and whereas the said Susan Ash has, by her petition, set forth.”

House divided on amendment of Mr. McCarthy:

Mr. MITCHELL. When this Bill was up on Friday last I voted for the Bill, as it stands now. At the same time I felt that the argument advanced by the hon. member for P. E. I. (Mr. Davies), the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Weldon), and the similar argument advanced to-day by the hon. member for Simcoe (Mr. McCarthy), should have weight, and that a gross act of injustice was being done to the children of the second marriage. Under these circumstances, I shall feel bound, at the risk of being considered inconsistent now, to vote against the Bill, because its advocates have refused to do a common act of justice by rejecting the preamble and removing the charge of bastardy against the children of the second marriage.

NOVA SCOTIA PERMANENT BUILDING SOCIETY.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 131) respecting the Nova Scotia Permanent Benefit Building Society and Savings Fund (from the Senate).—(Mr. Tupper).

(In the Committee.)

Mr. MILLS. I would draw the attention of the Minister of Justice to this Bill. These parties are asking us to legislate on a question of civil rights, and this House should not entertain Bills of this class. I do not propose to oppose the Bill further.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS.

Bill (No. 151) for granting certain powers to the Canada Atlantic Steamship Company.—(Mr. Tupper.)

Bill (No. 143) to enable the Canada Permanent Loan and Savings Company to extend their business and for other purposes, was considered in Committee and reported.

DEEPENING THE CHANNEL OF THE ST. LAWRENCE.

Motion agreed to.

THE COMPANIES ACT.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 30) to amend the Companies Act.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. McCARTHY. I now propose the amendment of which I gave notice, which will be found in the Votes and Proceedings, page 174. It is to substitute a new clause for Nos. 98, 99 and 101, and the object of the change is to enable a company incorporated under this Act to amalgamate with another company, that is with a company incorporated by a special Act. This matter was brought up in the Committee on Banking and Commerce, but I had not the material with me at the time which I needed, and it stood over, and the Bill was reported without the amendments being taken into consideration there. The No. 99 in the notice is a mistake, and should be 98.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

CUSTOMS DUTIES BILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the second reading of Bill (No. 107) to amend Chapter 33 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, respecting duties of Customs.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 3,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish to amend item 72 on page 7, by adding after the words "one-quarter of an inch in diameter and over" the words "or not over two inches, for use exclusively in artesian wells, petroleum pipe lines, and for petroleum refineries."

On section 3,

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. In item 817, which reads "spruce and elm logs, $1 per 1,000 feet, board measure," I wish to strike out the words "and elm," which leaves the law as it was before.

On section 6,

Mr. JONES. Does the hon. gentleman intend making any alterations in regard to the time of admission of goods under the old tariff?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I propose to leave the clause as it is. Representations have been made of the inconvenience of it, but no tariff can be changed without a certain amount of inconvenience, and I think we have gone as far in relieving it as it is possible to go. Of course, any very special case, like a contract made by a municipality for the introduction of waterworks, or anything of that kind, would be considered by the Government on its merits, but I do not think it is possible to provide by law for going any further than this clause goes.

Mr. JONES. It was not with a view of criticising that I rose, but merely to ascertain the fact, because there seems to be some uncertainty in regard to it, which I thought at this stage should be removed by an authoritative statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite right. It is important that everyone should understand that this clause is to admit the importation at the old rate of duty of all articles affected by this Bill that were purchased out of Canada or that were in warehouses in Canada on the 13th of May, when the tariff was introduced, and in British Columbia to allow goods purchased before the introduction of the tariff resolutions and imported vid Cape Horn to have the same privilege—in Canada, generally, to admit of their being imported and entered at the old rate of duty down to the 30th of June, and in British Columbia, down to the 1st of November.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I have received a communication from some of the cap manufacturers of London, saying that they have made their purchases and also their sales, but that their goods will not arrive in this country at the time mentioned in the Bill, the result being that they will be subject to very serious loss. I cannot lay my hands on the communication at this moment, but I shall get it before the Bill is read the third time. Some of these gentlemen say that the tariff will affect them to the extent of wiping out all the profits on the sales they have made, and, in some cases, they will sustain loss.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not see how that occurs, for we have not touched the duty on hats and caps.

Mr. McCARTHY.

Mr. JONES. I think that the Government have gone far enough to meet the trade. If you extend the time any longer, the more complaints you will have. I think the first of July is a very fair time.

On the preamble,

Mr. MITCHELL. I presented to the Minister what the parties affected represent to be a case of peculiar hardship. Perhaps I can best explain the particulars of it by reading the letter I addressed to the hon. Minister of Finance, who very kindly lent it to me for that purpose just now:

"OTTAWA, 19th May, 1887.

"Sir CHARLES TUPPER, &c.,
"Minister of Finance.

"Sir,—I have the honor to call your attention to sub-section 2 of section 15 of the Petroleum Act of 1880, which reads as follows: 'All petroleum and naphtha, imported into Canada, shall be in packages containing not more than 50 gallons each,' and it has been represented to me that such requirement is hardship on the trade—increases the cost and deteriorates the quality of this article, without affording any compensatory benefit to the consumers. I would, therefore, respectfully request the Government to consider the matter, with a view to introduce legislation to amend this sub-section, so as to permit the importation of petroleum and naphtha in tank-cars, thereby granting the same facilities for the transportation of imported foreign oils as is now granted to Canadian oils, under section 9 of the same Act, which reads as follows: 'Petroleum may be removed in bulk, without inspection, from one refinery to another refinery, or other place, for the purpose of completing the process of manufacture, or placing it in packages, under a permit in that behalf, obtained from the proper officers, and subject to such departmental regulations as may be made respecting such removals.'

"I beg to offer for your consideration the following reasons why I think this request should receive your favorable consideration:

"1st. There will be to the importers a large saving in freight should they import in tank-cars, for, while a barrel full of oil weighs 400 lbs., the barrel itself weighs 65 lbs., or nearly $\frac{1}{6}$ of the whole; they could, therefore, transport in bulk $\frac{1}{6}$ more off for the same freight than they now pay transporting it in barrels.

"2nd. They now suffer great loss of oil in transit, both from leakage and breakage of the barrels, while bringing it from distant refineries in the United States, and in this case the Government loses in revenue, as the duty is paid not upon the American invoice, but upon the quantity of oil as found in barrels on arrival at destination.

"3rd. The quality of the oil deteriorates when kept for a long time in barrels; oil freshly barreled is of better quality, and as petroleum (coal oil) pays a duty amounting to over 100 per cent. ad valorem, importers cannot suffer a depreciation in quality, as it is the superior quality of the oil only, which enables them to sell it at the high price they are obliged to ask for it.

"4th. At present they are obliged to pay a duty of 40 cents on each barrel. This duty will be saved to the importer, if the oil is imported in bulk, and will assist them in paying the price per barrels made in Canada, which is necessarily higher than for barrels of American manufacture. Barrels may be purchased more cheaply in the United States than in Canada for the reason that the sub-section which I ask to be amended has necessitated the importation of all petroleum in barrels, thereby impeding the barrel industry in Canada to such an extent, that, though the country is peculiarly adapted to such an industry, I am not aware of a single factory in Canada where oil barrels are made. The importation of oil in bulk will necessitate the establishment of barrel factories here. It will be necessary to enact legislation only to the extent that sub-section 2 of section 15 of the Petroleum Inspection Act be made to read: "subject to section 9 of the same Act," as no other requirement of the Petroleum Act in any way conflicts with the importation of oil in bulk. I trust you will see your way to remedy the evil complained of.

"I have, &c.,
"P. MITCHELL."

What I desire is this: That the foreign petroleum business be placed exactly on the same footing, with regard to the manner of transport, as the petroleum industry in this country. In other words, while the present Act permits the local oil well proprietors to transport their oil in tanks, it prohibits all foreign importers from transporting foreign oil in tanks. As a very large quantity of foreign oil is used, both in factories and private houses, notwithstanding the question of cheapness and price, because of its superior quality, as the parties in the trade claim, as a matter of only common justice, that they should be permitted to have the same facilities for transporting it in the country as have the domestic oil proprietors, I see no reason why this should not be done. I got the answer from the Administration that I expected, namely, that they cannot make the change. Why, I know not; no reason has been given to me, nor can I see any reason that can be given. I, therefore, take this opportunity of bringing this question before the Committee. I will read the section of the Petroleum Act :

"All petroleum and naphtha imported into Canada shall be in packages containing not more than fifty gallons each and shall be inspected, and the packages marked, as herein required, at the port where it enters Canada, and before such petroleum or naphtha is entered for consumption; and any petroleum so imported which does not conform to the requirements of this Act shall be branded with the word 'rejected,' and shall, within ten days after the inspection, be exported from Canada, and if not so exported within the prescribed time, it and the packages in which it is contained shall be seized and forfeited to Her Majesty and shall be disposed of under regulations made by the Governor in Council."

The 10th section reads thus, with reference to domestic petroleum :

"Petroleum may be removed in bulk without inspection from one refinery to another refinery, or other place, for the purpose of completing the process of manufacture or placing it in packages under a permit in that behalf, obtained from the proper officer and subject to such departmental regulations as are made respecting such removals."

I can see no reason why foreign petroleum, for the purpose of being moved in the country, should not be placed on the same footing as domestic petroleum. On the contrary, I see strong reasons why, in the interests of the National Policy, it should be placed on the same footing. The foreign oil comes into extensive use, although the people have to pay a higher price for it, in consequence of the heavy duty, and all I ask is that the Government should place it, with regard to transport, on the same footing as the domestic oil, so that the importers may be allowed to transport it in bulk. With regard to the prices, I ask for no consideration, but I claim that the Act makes the foreign oil more costly to the people, from the fact that it has to be put into barrels before being imported, while the domestic can be carried in tanks. It also prevents a large industry growing up in this country. If importers were allowed to bring in foreign oil in tanks, a large barrel industry would grow up, and a large number of men would be employed barrelling the oil, because it must be put up in barrels for retail and sale. This is a case of injustice against the people. Almost all classes of the community use the better class of oil, which is imported from the United States, to a greater or less extent, and I see no reason why, besides the addition of 100 per cent. duty, they should also be taxed another large percentage in the way of transport.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman has stated his case very clearly, and I may say the question received the careful consideration of the Government. It is well known there is a very large and important industry in this country, the petroleum industry, and the hon. gentleman also knows that, owing to the great fall in price of the foreign article, the petroleum industry of this country has suffered very severely; and, as this is a measure that would tend to give a still greater advantage to the importation of the foreign article, it would, to that extent, injure the domestic industry. Those are the grounds upon which I do not feel warranted in bringing before the House the proposal to which the hon. gentleman has referred. The subject is one that, of course, will receive more consideration during the recess than it has been possible to give it, in the short time since it has been brought to my notice. The petroleum industry of Canada have also pressed very strongly on the Government the measures which they thought would give them greater advantages. The Government has not seen fit to comply with their proposals, but, on the other hand, they do not feel warranted in making a change of law which would give the foreign manufacturers better means of competing with our industry.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has given no reasons whatever except this: that the petroleum industry in Canada is very much depressed, notwithstanding they have got a protection of 100 per cent. upon an article that is used in every family, from one end of the country to the other, that is in use in every poor man's hut as well as in every rich man's house. Notwithstanding that industry has a protection to the extent of 100 per cent., the only reason he gives is that the industry is considerably depressed, and in order further still to prevent the people getting oil, which, both for light and safety, is considered superior to the local oil, obstructions are put in the way of the transport of the foreign article. It is a gross case of injustice, both to the people engaged in the foreign oil trade and to the people of this country. The Government had no right, besides imposing a tax of 100 per cent., to saddle the foreign oil with an obstruction such as this. We are told that the local oil producers have asked some further ameliorations; they have asked for some change as regards flash and explosive tests. The foreign oil men say they do not object to these tests, but want to be put on the same footing as the Canadian manufacturers with regard to transport. There are other industries to be encouraged besides the oil industry. People would be engaged in the barrel industry, getting logs out of the woods, manufacturing staves, working up the barrels, barrelling the oil, and a very large business would grow up. Is all that to be crushed out because the petroleum manufacturers have brought influence to bear upon the Government? Perhaps promises were made to them in the same way as promises were given to other people. I now call on the House to express an opinion whether they think it is right that, after being handicapped by 100 per cent., the foreign oil trade should be further handicapped in its transportation. In the name of my constituents, who are large consumers of this oil, I ask the change, and I think it is unjust to refuse it. There are no grounds for refusal.

Mr. LISTER. I deny the statement of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that the foreign oil is better than the oil manufactured here. I say that the oil manufactured here is equal to any petroleum oil manufactured in the world. I frankly admit that in the past the oil was inferior, but the difficulties which the refiners encountered have been overcome, and we are manufacturing to-day as fine a burning oil as can be produced in the world. In regard to the question of protection, everyone understands the ground which I take upon that, and the ground which the party with which I am associated take: but, I say that, if protection to native industries is the policy of the Government, it would be unfair to this immense and growing interest to do anything to cripple it at the present moment. We know perfectly well, as far as the United States are concerned, that the whole oil interest of the United States is practically controlled by the Standard Oil Company, and we know that they have been bringing oil into this country to sell at a less price than the cost of producing it, in order to get the control of this market. It would be against the interest of this large industry to do what my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is not 100 per cent. enough?

Mr. LISTER. 100 per cent? The moment you strangle that industry you will get the price put up at once. The people of Canada are to-day getting their oil much cheaper than they ever did before. If my hon. friend from the sea thinks he will be able to get it cheaper, perhaps he would for a time, but the moment the Standard Oil Company came here, he would have to pay a higher price; and to put the trade restrictions which my hon. friend proposes here would be to give them an advantage of at least 15 or 20 per cent. more. So long as this is the policy of the Government, that interest—the oil industry—ought to be protected and preserved against the United States as any other in the country. If free trade is to be the order of the day, that interest must go with the rest, unable to exist without a high rate of duty; but, if protection is to rule, that industry, which is a Canadian industry, a purely native one, an industry belonging peculiarly to Canada, should be looked after as well as any others.

Mr. SCRIVER. I differ entirely from my hon. friend who has just sat down, in the first place, as to the relative merits of the Canadian as compared with the American oil. If he will come down to the frontier where I live and get the opinion of the people there and have a fair test of the two oils, he will be satisfied that he is mistaken. Where he lives, away from the frontier and where the two oils are probably not used, they may think that the Canadian oil is equal to the American oil, but you cannot make the people of the Eastern Townships believe anything of the kind. I can speak from personal knowledge on that point. I have in my own house made use of the best quality of Canadian oil that I could get, and have compared it with the American oil, not the best quality, but what is called in the States the "headlight oil"—and I must say that the best Canadian oil is decidedly inferior to the American oil. As to the price, and as to Canada being made a slaughter market for American oil, that is mere nonsense, because you can go and buy any quantity of oil across the border at 8½ cents a gallon for which we pay 15 cents or 16 cents here. The Americans are exporting immense quantities of that oil to foreign countries, and it is not the price in Canada which governs it, but the price in foreign countries. My hon. friend speaks of the action of the Liberal party in regard to that article. I think he was not in the House when the Mackenzie Government was in power.

Mr. LISTER. I said nothing about the action of the Liberal party, but I spoke of the principles of the Liberal party, which I said were perfectly well known.

Mr. SCRIVER. I will remind the hon. gentleman of the principles which were put in force at that time. When the Mackenzie Government was in power my hon. friend, the Chairman of this Committee (Mr. Colby), brought forward a motion in favor of the reduction of the duty on oil, and, although the Finance Minister at that time opposed it, and called upon the House to vote it down, he gave the pledge that a reduction would be made next Session. I think it is a misfortune in the interests of the country that a change has taken place in the Government, and I think one of the mistakes which has followed has been to continue the exorbitant duty on this article, the effect of which is to occasion great hardship throughout the country, and worse than that, as far as morality is concerned, it has led to any amount of smuggling. As my hon. friend in the Chair knows, coming as he does from a frontier county like myself, there is no limit to the smuggling in this country, and no wonder; when a farmer goes to a store on the Canadian side and pays 28 cents or 30 cents for an imperial gallon of petroleum, and he can go a few miles from the frontier on the other side and get his five gallon can—wine measure, I admit—filled for 50 cents—it is no wonder that smuggling is carried on, and it will be carried on until a reasonable duty is imposed on this article. I heard that one of the issues in the county adjoining that of my hon. friend was the increase of duty on petroleum, and I heard that the hon. gentleman who was elected there as the successor of a gentleman whom we all regret, pledged himself to obtain an increase of duty to that which now prevails.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. My hon. friend knows that the duty is the same as the free trade Government fixed it at.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Yes, but the excise duties were changed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think not.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Oh, yes, they were.

Mr. LISTER.

Mr. SCRIVER. And, besides that, the difficulties in the way of importation since then have been increased, a higher test has been imposed, and other vexatious restrictions have been imposed upon the importation of that article; and, as an hon. gentleman reminds me, the importation in bulk is refused. I did hope that the Ministry would be prepared, in the changes which they proposed in this tariff, to make some reduction in the exorbitant duty now imposed upon this article.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would call the attention of the House to the point brought forward by my hon. friend from West Lambton (Mr. Lister). He admits that the duty is 100 per cent. now levied upon oil, and he says that, if we make this change which I ask for, it would be taking off an advantage of 15 to 20 per cent. which the local refiners now have. If that is so, the fact is that the people of the counties which are not oil producing are paying 120 per cent. duty on this common article of oil.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If you take one part of the evidence of a witness, you must take the whole. The member for Lambton (Mr. Lister), and I have no doubt he is speaking from personal knowledge, has stated that the objection which existed before to the Canadian oil has been removed, that in fact as good an article is now produced in Canada as any one need desire to use. Therefore, the ground for the relief you seek has to a large extent been taken away, and that part of his evidence must be taken with the other. I may tell my hon. friend who has brought this matter forward that he is perfectly well aware that the people of Canada never purchased this oil as cheaply as they do to-day; that instead of having to pay a high price for it, it is now at the very lowest point, while the article itself has been sufficiently improved, I think, as to make it all that any person may require, while the price is much less than it was at the time to which the hon. gentleman refers.

Mr. JONES. I think the Minister of Finance must know that very little Canadian oil is used in the Maritime Provinces. So far as I am aware, the oil used there comes entirely from the United States, and if the proposal of my hon. friend is in the direction of lessening the cost of such an important article in domestic economy as this oil undoubtedly is, I think it should be entertained by the Government. With all due justice to my hon. friend on my right, and with every desire to promote one industry as much as another, still I hardly think that the whole Dominion can be expected to pay tribute to one section of the country, because notably the Maritime Provinces are called upon to pay very largely in that direction. We do not use oil from western Canada to any extent. We get our oil from the United States.

Mr. McMULLEN. When the Minister of Finance states that oil is sold as cheaply now as it has been in the past, I say the statement is not correct. When I was in the trade myself a few years ago, I sold oil for a York shilling a gallon. Now, this tariff reaches the pockets of the poorer class to a greater extent than it does those of the rich. Those living in cities and towns can better afford to pay for this high oil than the farmers. I have listened to the remarks of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), and I endorse his statement that it is highly desirable that every reasonable advantage, in keeping with the interests of our oil trade, should be given to importers of the better classes of American oil. I am glad to hear the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) say that they are now manufacturing as good oil at Petrolia as is produced on the American side. If anything has tended to improve the production of that article, it is the fact that the Americans, notwithstanding the duty that has existed, have sent in oil into this country simply because the Canadians could not supply the same rectified article that is produced on the other side. If we have now commenced the manufacture of an article as good as the American oil, I do not see why we should still further restrict the importation of American oil, as we are asked to do now. We know that in the past there has been a combination in oil. I know myself a refinery in a city in western Canada, the stockholders of which have for years got their dividends just the same as if the refinery was running, although it does not refine a single barrel of oil. The stockholders of that refinery got their dividends at the end of the year, and, perhaps, more than they could have made if they had been running the factory. Now, I say that a law that will permit a combination of this kind to be formed for the purpose of subjecting the poor consumers to exactions in this way, is not a just law, particularly when it strikes at the poorer classes heavier than it does at the richer classes, as this law undoubtedly does. I hold that we should not by any action of this House increase the advantages that are now enjoyed by the producers of coal oil, by further embargoes being placed upon the importation of a better article. If our people cannot produce it, I should fancy that 100 per cent. ought to be enough in the way of duty. While we are, perhaps, disposed to grant the same measure of protection to the producers of coal oil as to others, I think they should all be placed on an equal footing. I do not know any industry in Canada now that is reaping the advantages of 100 per cent. of protection but the producers of coal oil, and I do not think that we should in reason be asked to place upon consumers of coal oil an additional levy in order to put further sums in the pockets of those producers, simply because they want to keep out of the market altogether an article that, owing to the fact that we are not able to produce it at all, has in the past been imported into this country.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I congratulate the hon. gentleman from West Lambton (Mr. Lister) on his having learned so well to repeat the stock argument of protectionists. I knew the hon. gentleman was naturally clever, but I did not give him credit for learning the lesson in so short a time. He states the old argument that, although we pay 100 per cent. to the producers, still we get an article cheaper on account of the protection. Then again he states that we get just as good an article as we can get from the United States. I take issue with him there. I state without fear of contradiction that the Canadians cannot make as good an oil as they produce on the other side, for the simple reason that the raw material is not here to make it out of. It is a well known fact that the oil produced in the oil regions of Canada, with the exception of a small quantity produced at Bothwell, is of a lighter character than that produced in the United States, and you cannot by any process that has ever been invented make as good an oil here as you can get from Pennsylvania. You have the proof at your hand in the fact that men will buy oil on the other side and pay the duty in preference to buying Canadian oil. I am glad the hon. member for Northumberland has brought this matter up, because oil is an article of universal consumption in this country; the poorest as well as the rich have to depend upon it for light. Now, why in the name of common sense should we compel the poor laboring people of this country to pay two prices for an article that they must have. Why, Sir, the amount of money that is taken out of the pockets of the poor people of this country is something enormous, and all for what purpose? Simply to enable a dozen men to live in wealth and luxury where there is not really business for half of the number. That is the simple truth of the matter. The hon. gentleman says that it is a good thing to have American oil kept out of the country because in this way we give employment to our own people. That is the old argument of the protectionist for the protection of Canadian oil and everything else that is to be protected.

Mr. CASEY. I agree thoroughly with what has been stated by my hon. friend from South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), that the effect of this change in the tariff will be to place an additional tax upon those who use coal oil.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no change in the tariff. It remains exactly as it did when hon. gentlemen opposite were in power.

Mr. CASEY. I understand exactly the changes that have been made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No changes have been made. The hon. gentleman is altogether mistaken.

Mr. MITCHELL. What we complain of is this: That inasmuch as by the Act of 1886 the transfer of coal oil within the Dominion of Canada is permitted to be made in tanks and in bulk by local producers, the importers of foreign oil are confined to barrels. That is the distinction to which I have called the attention of the Government, and I ask that they make a change in that regard. This they have refused to do. If I am not misinformed, the present Government, of which the Minister of Finance is the mouth-piece at present, has placed a duty upon the packages since the exit of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), and an inspection charge of 30 cents per barrel in addition. So they have added to the duties since my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie) went out of power.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman does not mean that oil was not inspected by the late Government?

Mr. MITCHELL. I mean to say that a tax of 30 cents a barrel is imposed by the Government. You can understand that I think. The hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) has said you must take the whole evidence of a witness, and, referring to himself, he has said that I have only placed part of his evidence before the House. I placed the whole evidence of the hon. gentleman before the House; but the hon. gentleman evaded half my case. I do not pretend to say that I confined my case to the character and quality of the oil as between domestic and foreign. That is not the objection I make. It is true the hon. gentleman for Lambton (Mr. Lister) gave his testimony. But it is on another point that I showed that great injustice was done towards the foreign importer, the fact that, irrespective of the quality of the oil, the facility of transfer is so great in one case, and the obstacles are so great in the other, as to be equal to 20 per cent. in addition to the 100 per cent. duty, making in all 120 per cent. duty which the people pay to encourage the oil producers of this country. The hon. gentleman says that oil was never cheaper than it is to-day. There is the testimony of a number of hon. gentlemen, not only dealers but consumers, to speak as to the quality and price. The hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong), as well as the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver), and the county of the latter gentleman is situated on the border, says that oil can be bought for 8 cents a gallon on one side of the line, while it is 15 cents on this side. The fact is that there is no more flagrant act in the tariff as it stands to-day than the question of oil, which affects every one of the four millions and a half of people in this Canada of ours. It is a question that I hope yet, notwithstanding that my hon. friends in the Government have refused to do it, will be dealt with before the Session closes—I will not press a vote on it now—and I hope they will be prepared to consider this matter with the view of remedying an act of great injustice to the people.

Mr. CASEY. The arrangement under discussion, as the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) has shown conclusively, is by no means the same arrangement as existed under the previous Government. It discriminates against the consumer in favor of the Canadian manufacturer. The contention of the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) is quite correct, that better oil can be obtained in the United States than is made in Canada, and at a lower price than in Canada. The contention of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is right, that the present arrangement militates against the consumer and increases the price to the consumer. I, therefore, most heartily endorse the demand of the hon. member for Northumberland, that this arrangement should be rectified. The Canadian producer is allowed to import American oil in bulk and barrel it and make an increased profit, while the wholesale dealer, if not a producer, is not allowed the same privilege in regard to American oil. No doubt the refusal to grant relief, which is required in the interests of the consumer, is owing to promises made in the oil districts during the last campaign. I am informed that in the oil districts other promises were made, that in East Lambton it was promised to increase the protection on oil in some shape, and the Government feel that the least they can do for East Lambton is to leave the producer of oil with all the privileges he at present enjoys. It is the old question of the few against the many, and a very extravagant case of it. If protection be desirable in some instances, I do not think it is desirable in this instance, although the principle of protection may be admitted. I believe that the many who want light—and I am sorry from the present political complexion of this House that the majority in Canada want more light—will be deprived of it for the benefit of the few who produce the illuminating material. For this reason I enter my protest in the interests of the many against the interests of the few.

Mr. LISTER. A word or two in regard to the remarks of the hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong). First, as far as the question of oil is concerned: I know that the hon. gentleman has a large fund of information in regard to farming and insurance matters, but he knows nothing at all about the oil business. I am no more a protectionist than he is. I have always taken this ground so far as this particular industry is concerned, that it would be improper and impolitic for this or any Government to rudely abolish the system which they have inaugurated. If that is to be done, I have always held it must be done gradually. The hon. member for South Middlesex (Mr. Armstrong) said Canadian oil was light and American oil heavy. The American is light and the Canadian is heavy; consequently, the Americans are able to take a greater quantity out of the same quantity of crude than the Canadians can obtain. But the difficulty in Canada, as regards the quality, has been that the producers have had no trade regulations. Every man who thought proper to enter into the refining business, made oil just as he thought proper, for the purpose of obtaining the greatest possible profit. To-day all the oil trade of Canada is under trade regulations. The refiners have entered into an agreement by which the quality of oil must be of a regular and standard quality, and the price is the very lowest price compatible with those men being able to live. So far as the manufacturers to-day are concerned, they are manufacturing an oil better than ever manufactured in Canada, and an oil equal in every respect in its burning qualities to that manufactured in the United States, and safer, so far as inflammable qualities are concerned, than any made in the States. The hon. gentleman has told us that there is a duty of 100 or 120 per cent. I say there is no such duty at all. The hon. gentleman will readily understand that the amount of the duty depends on the cost of the refined article. Sometimes it is 60 per cent., sometimes 50, sometimes 70; but, be that as it may, as far as this industry is concerned, under the previous Administration this protection or duty, or whatever you may be pleased to call it, was put upon coal oil, and under that duty the industry has gone on and assumed the proportions it has attained to-day. And I may say to hon. gentlemen that, in spite of the high protection which the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) speaks about, the oil industry of Canada to-day is in a most depressed condition. Crude oil is worth less than 70 cents per barrel, and this is a lower price than has been reached, except on one occasion, in the whole history of the oil trade in this country, and refined oil is cheaper than it ever was before. I will not pretend to say that it is as cheap as it would be if there was no duty upon it at all. I do say, however, that, if you take off the duty, the Standard Refining Company have but one object, and that is to secure the Canadian market, one way or the other, and destroy the oil interests of Canada, and, if they succeed in doing that, the people of Canada would have to pay a much greater price for their oil than they are paying to-day. This is a large industry in this country; it is an industry belonging exclusively to Canada, and if there is any industry which requires to be fostered in this country it is the oil industry. I have no sympathy with the remarks of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) who is a free trader in corn meal, but who is a protectionist in almost everything else, except oil.

Mr. MITCHELL. No; I must correct the hon. gentleman. I am a free trader in corn meal, because it is an article of common use among the poorer classes of the country; it is an article which cannot be grown in this country, except to a small extent in two counties, in the most southerly part of the country, one of them being the county of my hon. friend from West Lambton, and the other the county of Essex. Outside of those counties, I do not think there is a barrel of corn meal produced for marketable purposes in all Canada, and I say a tax of 40 cents a barrel upon corn meal, an article which is consumed so largely by the poorest of the poor, is an outrage. I am a free trader in corn meal, and I would be a free trader in everything else if we could only get free trade. I was deluded in 1878 into supporting what was then proposed—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question, question.

Mr. MITCHELL. You will get the question when I am ready to give it to you. I say I was deluded into supporting the National Policy at that time. It was proposed that there should be a maximum of something like 25 per cent., and in no case was it spoken of then that a duty should be placed on such articles as flour and corn meal. I was deluded into supporting it; I went to my county and manfully carried out the arrangement which was made—carried out a policy to protect our own market for our own people. But who at that time, in the various arguments or speeches which were made on that subject, ever dreamed that on some articles in the commonest use among the poor people, we would have a duty placed running up in some cases as high as 100 per cent.? Whoever dreamed of putting 40 cents on a barrel of corn meal? Certainly not I. Whoever dreamed of putting 50 cents per barrel on flour, which the poor people use and which they must import? Did I ever conceive that the iron, which enters into the consumption of every man from one end of the country to the other, should be taxed all the way up from 50 to 90 per cent.; that the duty on iron water and gas pipes, which the hon. gentleman has been putting before us and altering three or four times since the tariff was brought down, should have a duty imposed upon them ranging all the way from 60 to 90 per cent.—the pipes which are used for various purposes in connection with building both in the city and country? Were such duties as these any portion of the National Policy? Certainly not. I have no hesitation in saying that the tariff as amended this year is a Nova Scotia tariff, based on the principle of building up certain localities, such as Nova Scotia, at the expense of certain other portions of the country

I mean to say more than this, that the tariff has descended into being a revenue tariff and not purely an incidentally protective one, and, therefore, it is one into which I, at least, was drawn; it is a false protective tariff, carried on by the force of the brute power which they boast on the other side.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Where am I out of order? Is there anything wrong in speaking of brute force or brute power, in carrying through a measure?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. MITCHELL. Get up and state your point of order if you want to do so. I wish to justify myself when I am challenged with being a free trader. I am a free trader if we can get free trade. I say we should open our arms to the Americans if they would open their arms to us; but I would put a reasonable protection on the industries of our own country, if they refuse to give us access to their markets. But I am not a protectionist to the extent of imposing duties of 90 or 100 per cent. on articles like these; on articles such as oil where there is 100 per cent. with an additional 20 per cent. owing to the other obstructions which are placed in the way of importation.

Mr. McMULLEN. When the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Lister) stated the broad fact with regard to coal oil, as well as with regard to many other things, that once you remove the duty and place the manufacturer here in a position in which he will have to compete with the American manufacturer, you would immediately wipe out manufacturing institutions and raise the price far beyond what it is to-day, he was using an argument entirely fallacious. Take the article of coal oil: in the United States to-day the consumer is buying his coal oil at from 10 to 12½ cents per gallon. I would like to ask any hon. gentleman if he thinks that the sixty millions of people in the United States are subject to be imposed on to the extent of paying double the price for coal oil, simply because by the efforts of the producers in that country, they have managed to wipe out of existence the producers of coal oil here. I say it is sheer rot to talk such nonsense; and I am satisfied, if the duty was wiped out to-morrow, our consumers would be getting their coal oil as cheap as they are in the United States, and of better quality than we are now getting it. This article is one which is consumed by the poorest classes of this country as well as the rich, and if you take coal oil to-day you will find that it is sold at a price just about so far above the American price as the amount of protection granted by this House. Just in proportion as the protection goes up just in proportion does the price go up, and it is, perhaps, to-day a slight fraction less than what you could import it and pay the duty and sell it in this country. The refiners get together and they estimate the cost of importing and the cost of bringing the article from the other side; they find out what it can be laid down for here, and then they add the duty, and they say that is the price that it will be sold for. We know that there is a combination in oil; we know that a few years ago that combination was broken by the refractory conduct of one individual, and I know of persons in the retail trade who were almost ruined because they had to sell coal oil at twelve and a half or fifteen cents for which they had paid twenty-three cents. I say it would be the same to-morrow if you would remove the restrictions upon the importation, and allow it to come into the country; you could sell it for ten or twelve cents a gallon less than it sells to-day, and the contention of the hon. gentleman that it would go away up in price is a mere farce; there is nothing in it.

Mr. LISTER. I would ask the hon. gentleman how much coal oil is worth to-day. He can buy any quantity of the best refined oil at 14 cents per gallon wholesale.

Mr. McMULLEN. That may be very true, but you can buy it in the United States for 10 cents retail.

Mr. BAIN (Wentworth). I think it is time somebody put in a word on behalf of the consumer of coal oil, for we have been legislating time and again in the interest of different classes. All I have to say to my hon. friend for West Lambton is, that if coal oil is so low in price to-day, it is because there has been some little internal difficulty among the gentlemen who control the coal oil production. It is an open secret in the west that the coal oil ring expected certain advantages from the Government as the result of the recent elections. Not satisfied with embarrassing the importation of American coal oil, by annoying tests and regulations, they have practically, in the face of the duty, added very materially to the difficulties of introducing it, and have largely crowded the American coal oil out of our market; and it is simply by force of the fact that parties living at some distance from the boundary have to pay the duty before they can get the oil; but they do pay the duty, and they do consume that oil. I am pleased to hear from my hon. friend from Lambton that the Canadian coal oil is so much improved in the process of refining that it can now compete with the American oil. If so, the manufacturers have no great difficulty to contend with in respect to the introduction of American oil. I believe, so far as I can learn from experts in the business that there is no one single article in our tariff so thoroughly and effectively protected to-day as the coal oil interest of Canada, and I hope the Finance Minister will retain sufficient backbone to decline to make any further concessions in the interest of that monopoly. Those of us who have had a little experience in past years, remember that for years the whole people of this Dominion were taxed directly for the benefit of a small monopoly that controlled the whole business, and fixed the rates just to suit themselves. Well, if they cannot manage with a duty that seems to range from 70 to 100 per cent. I think we had better enquire whether this is not one of those industries which is costing us too much to protect. I do hope the Finance Minister will not make any further concessions to the coal oil ring in the west, and that we shall not be compelled to pay any further tribute for the advancement of their interests.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. The hon. member for West Lambton says I do not know anything about oil matters. Well, I can tell him that I lived for many years in the immediate neighborhood of the largest refining district in the Province of Ontario, and knew it thoroughly, and I will tell him what I know about it. The manufacturers were enabled by the tariff to form a combination, and I have seen refineries standing still, and not running a barrel from one end of the year to the other. The owners of those refineries were going about like gentlemen. They clubbed together and decided what refineries should run, what quantity they should produce, and what refineries should stand still; and the man whose refinery stood still got a share of the joint profits. That is what I know about oil. It is just the old story—wherever protection is effective, it allows a chance for rings of that description to be formed. I am not surprised at the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) feeling strongly on this subject, because it bears with peculiar hardship on his Province, and the other Provinces by the sea. They have not only this enormous duty to pay on the oil, but they have to pay for the immensely long haul besides. This is just one of the attempts that have been made to compel the people of the east to trade with those of the west, and vice versa. We all know how it was with coal. The Government tried to compel the people of Ontario to use the Nova Scotia coal, and the result was that the Ontario people used American coal and paid the duty; and, vice versa, they tried to compel the people of the Maritime Provinces to buy Ontario grain, and they bought the American grain, and paid the duty. The fact of the matter is that whenever you try to fight against geography, you fight a losing battle. The hon. member for West Lambton says that the oil industry is very much depressed just now. That is very easily accounted for. The fact is there are twelve men trying to get a living where there is a living for only one or two, and the Government are trying to bolster them up and to help them to do it, and make the poor consumer pay the cost of it.

Mr. BOWELL. I wish to call attention to the fact that the fees have not been changed since 1879, and the restrictions as to the importation of coal oil are also contained in the original Act. Neither is the duty on packages much more than formerly. It is, I think, 20 per cent. The duty on barrels was 25 per cent., but that was changed to a specific duty in order to avoid difficulties which arose in connection with the ad valorem duty.

Mr. SCRIVER. It was increased 10 per cent., because the duty of 20 per cent. on barrels valued at $1.50 was 30 cents, and it is 40 cents now.

Mr. BOWELL. The duty was put on barrels, in some cases, at a valuation of $2; the contention was that the valuation should be $1.50, and not $2.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. Minister must not contend that the duty was 25 per cent., because I am certain it was 20. I have seen a great many invoices, and never was the value put at more than $1.50.

Mr. BOWELL. That was one of those anomalies which existed in the Customs Act. If a barrel was brought in plain, or as a pork barrel, it paid 25 per cent. If it were ruled as a package it came in under the package clause—and I am not sure that the hon. gentleman is not correct—it paid 20 per cent. But I merely rose to point out that the fees were not changed on these articles.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am not objecting to the fees; but what I mean to say is that 120 per cent. advantage given to the domestic oil men is an obstruction in the way of the foreign man importing in bulk, and that is what I want to see removed as a matter of fairness, and it is something I am sure the House will realise, and that the country will think ought to be done.

Committee rose and reported amendments.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the amendments made in committee be read the second time and concurred in.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like the Minister of Finance, now that he has heard the opinion of the House, and a pretty general opinion, in favor of reconsidering the matter, whether he will take it into consideration.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman knows that it could not enter into this Bill anyway, because it belongs to another Department, the Department of Inland Revenue. The subject will receive the consideration of the Government during the recess when they will have more time to investigate it.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is something.

Mr. BROWN. I was out of the House for a few moments when the intimation was made that the export duty on elm logs had been dropped. I now ask the permission of the House to make a few remarks, and to express the hope that the Government have not dropped the question entirely, but will certainly fully enquire into the matter during recess. One of the most important debates, perhaps, that has taken place in this House was on the question of the export duty on elm logs. It was shown that a very large interest was affected by that duty, and that that interest deserved as much protection as any other in Canada. Upwards of Mr. ARMSTRONG.

$1,000,000 are invested in the manufacture of elm logs. These logs go in the United States free of duty, and our own people are confronted with the manufactured article made from their own logs by the Americans, while they have to pay a heavy duty, under the American tariff, when they send the manufactured articles there. Why this export duty has been dropped is more than I can understand. The whole interest of the community in which these elm logs are manufactured is wrapped up in the export duty. When the first mills were started for the manufacture of materials from elm logs, the price for the logs was $2.50 per 1,000 feet. Now that the mills at work number thirty-five, $6 are paid. In those parts of the country where there are no mills, the Americans get the logs at $3.50 per thousand. This shows that where mills are started the price is increased, and the farmers who furnish the logs are consequently benefited. This industry gives employment to a great many farmers' sons and keeps them in our own country, instead of letting them seek employment in a foreign country. The export duty which should be put on would give a fresh impetus to the trade, American manufacturers would remove their mills to Canada, and thus put a very much larger amount of money in circulation. Now, however, by letting the logs go free to the United States, we will greatly injure one of the most important industries of the country. I earnestly hope that the Government will take the matter into serious consideration. I have no hesitation in saying that they have been misinformed as to the duty, and I must express a great deal more than my regret to find that the duty has been dropped. It is in the recollection of hon. gentlemen on both sides that, when this subject came up, hon. gentlemen, whose opinions I should suppose were of a character that would lead them to be considered as the first opinions of the land, spoke strongly on the subject, and now, in case it may be supposed it is not a farmer's question, I make the assertion, which I can prove, that where there are no mills the farmers get only $3.50, whereas, where there are mills they get $6 a 1,000. I speak warmly on this subject, because I think this great interest has not been regarded aright in the great question of the National Policy. I yield to no man in my support of the National Policy, but it is not complete unless extended to an industry like the elm log business, and I hope the Government will not drop the subject.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not surprised at the warmth of my hon. friend, because, after a very animated discussion, the Government decided to impose the duty of $1 upon elm logs, and my hon. friend and the numerous gentlemen who take a very strong interest in having the duty imposed have reason to be disappointed at the change of front that is indicated by the withdrawal of the resolution. I may say, however, that among all the complicated questions that have come before me, and with the evidence that has been submitted for the consideration of the Government, there has been, perhaps, none in which it has been more difficult to arrive at a decision as to what is required in the interests of the largest number of people.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I thought you understood log rolling.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is just where the hon. gentleman has made the mistake. We are so incapable of being instructed in relation to log rolling, that we have been moving first in one direction and then in another. As I have said, the Government came to the conclusion that there was a doubt as to the direction in which the interests of the greatest number prevailed in relation to this question, and it was wiser, under these circumstances, not to take a step in advance that might prove to be an erroneous step. We have, therefore, been obliged to ask the committee to strike out its decision to impose a duty of $1 a thousand upon elm logs in order that, during the recess of Parliament, we might advise ourselves as to the best course to be taken in the public interest in regard to this question. I may say to my hon. friend that the Government will address itself assiduously during recess to the consideration of that question, and to the collection of such information as will enable them, in view of all the facts and interests concerned, to decide what course is best in the public interest.

Mr. CASEY. Is it during his residence in England that my hon. friend will consider the question?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is no log rolling there.

Mr. CHARLTON. I am glad the Government hesitated before imposing this duty. The section of Canada where elm is produced for export is chiefly in the west. This duty is in the interest of the mill owners and manufacturers, and would operate to the detriment of every man who owns land. The export and sale of logs is the source of revenue to the farmers of the district, and this duty would have the effect of cheapening to the mills the cost of the raw material at the expense of the farmer. It would injure a great many settlers for the benefit of a very few manufacturers. The hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) tells us that logs are exported to the United States, and that the articles manufactured from them are brought back to Canada and sold here. The duties imposed on the manufactured articles, and the cost of transportation of the logs and of the manufactured articles, ought to be sufficient protection to enable our manufacturers to compete with the Americans. However, the broad question is this: The duty asked for by those who wish for the imposition of it is calculated to benefit a very few individuals. It is a duty which is to be levied at the cost of a great number of individuals. Every farmer, having elm logs on his land, is interested in having the best price for those logs. It is in their interest that the Government have taken the action they have, and, if they examine into the matter, I believe they will find that the balance of advantage is in favor of the great number of the farmers, who have a hard struggle in a new country, and are entitled to get the best price they can obtain for the logs which they remove in the process of clearing.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). In regard to this question of elm logs, which seems to agitate my friend from Hamilton (Mr. Brown), I may inform him that it is simply a local question affecting the western peninsula of Ontario, and I think that anyone who, by petition or deputation, endeavors to interfere with that matter, disregards the courtesy which is due to the members from that district. If my hon. friend had told me what he intended to do in his zeal for legislation, I would have been glad to wait on the Prime Minister with him and argue the question out before the Prime Minister. This does not very seriously affect the city of Hamilton, and, if the hon. gentleman feels that it does, I am quite willing that the city of Hamilton should be exempted, and that there should be a duty on elm trees growing in the city of Hamilton when cut into logs. There is an ample protection for the Canadian mill man, in this: that the American buyer has to haul the logs to the Detroit River or Lake St. Clair, has to have them rafted across to the Michigan shore, and then they have to be hauled to the Michigan mill, and the cost of that haulage is an ample protection to the Canadian mill man. Every cent of duty placed on logs would be a direct loss to the farmer who has the logs for sale, and would be so much additional money in the pockets of the mill men. I happen to have a letter which I received before the Government had decided not to impose the duty, from an old man in that part of the country, and I think that letter tells the story pretty plainly. He says:

"In the list of tariff changes I find a duty of $1 per thousand feet on spruce and elm logs. The duty on spruce logs is a myth, as we do not export any, but the duty on elm logs is perfectly infamous. It is just $1 out of the pockets of the hard-working settlers who are clearing up the land and trying to make a home for themselves and families, and trusting to the elm to help them to clear up the lands. Why the Minister of Finance should listen to every harpy who wants to prey on his neighbor is past my comprehension. God knows the taxes are high enough on everything we buy, but if the Government are going to tax what we have to sell, pity poor Canada."

I resented the manner in which the duty was imposed by the Government after a pledge being made to me that no such duty would be imposed. Without my being consulted, without anything further being said to me, this export duty was decided on, and I am glad the Government have exercised their own good sense and judgment, and have not taken the advice of those who are not interested in any way in this matter, and that they have concluded not to impose such a tax on the farmers of the district which I have the honor to represent.

Mr. BERGIN. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson) is much mistaken if he supposes that it is only in the western peninsula of Ontario, that elm logs are produced. There is as much elm and better elm grown in eastern Ontario than in Essex. The harpies of whom he speaks I know nothing of, but the letter which he read, and which he seems to endorse, is a total condemnation of the policy that he has been supporting for past years in this House. I cannot help expressing my surprise that any hon. gentleman who has given the support which he has during years past to the National Policy should read with expressions of approval such a letter as he has read here to-day, and I do not think that, in reference to the gentlemen—I was one of them—who waited upon the Government asking in the interests of our constituents, in the interests of the producers of elm logs in this country, that a duty should be imposed, he should have spoken of us in that way. We had, I think, as perfect a right to consult and to advise the Government as to the course they should pursue as he had to advise privately and ask them not to impose the duty. The hon. gentleman seems to think he is the only person who has the privilege of finding fault with the Government of this country when they do not do what they are asked. We who waited on the Government in reference to this matter are the people who have a right to find fault with them, and not the member for Essex (Mr. Patterson), because, though they gave no such pledge to us as they gave to him, they said they would take the matter into consideration, and they brought before the House and passed a resolution imposing the duty, and now we are asked to go back on that. I do not think that is right, and I think that, after taking our advice, and taking the action they did, it ought to have been tried for one year, and not withdrawn without further consultation with us. That is the only point on which I agree with the hon. gentleman in finding fault with the Government. It is a right I do not often exercise, but I feel called upon to use it to-day.

Mr. DAWSON. I know something about the duty of pine logs, though I do not know so much in reference to the duty on elm. The duty of $2 per thousand feet B.M. imposed on pine logs has had a very good effect in the district I have the honor to represent. It has led to the erection of new saw mills at Little Current, Spanish River, Mississauga River and Thessalon River, and all that from the imposition of a duty of $2 a thousand on pine saw logs. They do not take them across now and saw them on the other side, but we have the advantage of the sawing on our side, which gives employment to large numbers of workmen. There is not one of these large mills but employs 200 or 300 workmen from one end of the year to the other, and certainly a policy which does that, which gives the manufacturing of the logs and the lumber to our own country, and gives employment to the laboring classes, is in conformity to the policy the Government has adopted. With regard to elm logs, I cannot see why the same policy should not be adopted. Perhaps there may be something exceptional with regard to elm, but I believe that, if, by imposing a duty on elm logs, you could lead to their manufacture in the country, it would be to the advantage of the country. My opinion is that it would be to our advantage to increase the duty on pine logs instead of reducing it, and also to impose a duty on all unmanufactured lumber going into the United States, so that we might have the advantage of manufacturing it here.

Bill reported.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask the hon. gentleman to allow this to stand till to-morrow, as there will be some discussion on it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Very well.

Mr. PERLEY (Ottawa). I cannot allow this question to go on without expressing my views upon it. I appreciate the excellence of the remarks made by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) in reference to the protection of logs manufactured in this country. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the sawing of this elm lumber costs at least $3 a thousand, and I submit that, on the principle of protection that this country has adopted, we are bound to carry out the principle so far as to extend protection to the labor that is expended on the sawing of those logs. I am surprised to hear from the hon. member for North Norfolk (Mr. Charlton) that the expense of getting out those logs is equal to the duties that we have to pay on lumber entering the American market. I am surprised to hear hon. gentlemen advocate that these logs should be sawn upon the other side of the line, instead of advocating a protection to the labor of this country employed in the manufacture of those logs. The cost of manufacture, the cost of sawing, and the duties which we have to pay to enter the American market, is at least $5 a thousand, and out of that sum $3 a thousand would be the least cost of sawing the lumber and getting it ready for the market of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I must remind the hon. gentleman that there is now no question before the House.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Bill is not to be read the third time until to-morrow, when the hon. member will have full opportunity of discussing it.

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER presented a Message from His Excellency the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the Message as follows:—

LANSDOWNE.

The Governor General transmits to the House of Commons the additional Supplementary Estimates of the amounts required for the service of Canada, for the year expiring 30th June, 1888; and, in accordance with the provisions of "The British North America Act, 1867," he recommends these Estimates to the House of Commons.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
OTTAWA, 20th June, 1887.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that His Excellency's Message, with Estimates, be referred to the Committee of Supply.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. DAVIES. Would the hon. gentleman state the amount of these Estimates?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The amount chargeable to capital is $300, and to Consolidated Fund, $87,375.83.

Mr. DAWSON.

Mr. MITCHELL. I might ask the Finance Minister if this completes the Estimates?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope so.

PENSION FUND SOCIETIES.

House resolved itself into Committee on Bill (No. 52) to empower the employés of incorporated Companies to establish Pension Fund Societies.

(In the Committee).

Mr. MILLS. I would ask the promoter of this Bill whether it is intended to confer these powers simply on companies incorporated under Acts of the Parliament of Canada, or whether it is intended to confer them upon all companies, whether incorporated by this Parliament or not?

Mr. HALL. By the action of the Committee of Banking and Commerce, the provisions of the Bill were restricted to companies incorporated by the Parliament of Canada.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

THREATS, INTIMIDATIONS AND OFFENCES.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 162) to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter 173, respecting threats, intimidation and other offences.

Mr. CURRAN. Before this Bill passes its second reading I have a few observations to offer that have been suggested by persons who are deeply interested in this legislation. There is no person in this community who is not anxious that proper protection should be given to every one who desires to work in any particular branch of trade, industry or any occupation whatever, whether it be in the occupation supposed to be referred to in the present legislation or any other—I believe it will be generally admitted that there is no organisation in this country that is not anxious to see such laws enacted as will enable every man to enjoy the greatest freedom. At the same time I believe there will be something that may be considered invidious, not so much, perhaps, in the present Bill, as in other legislation sought to be imposed; and in the present Bill there are some points to which I desire to draw the attention of the House in order that amendments may be made so as to make the law unobjectionable. The Minister proposes that:

"Every person who unlawfully and by force or threats or any other means, hinders or prevents or attempts to hinder or prevent any seaman, stevedore, ship carpenter, ship laborer or other person employed to work at or on board any ship or vessel, or to do any work connected with the loading or unloading thereof, from working at or exercising any lawful trade, business, calling or occupation in or for which he is so employed, or beats, or uses any violence to, or makes any threat against any such person with intent to hinder or prevent him from working at or exercising the same, or on account of his having worked at or exercised the same, shall, on summary conviction before two justices of the peace, be liable to imprisonment, with hard labor, for any term not exceeding three months."

There is, as has already been pointed out to this House, a distinction of some importance in connection with the threats that are referred to in this clause in contradistinction to the language used in other clauses of the Act sought to be amended. The threats, if we take clause 12, are threats of violence. I do not see why in the present clause sought to be amended the same language should not be used in section 10, as in other sections. There is an addition in this clause of the words, "or any other means." I do not conceive that this is a desirable addition to the law as it now stands. In fact, if we refer to section 13 of the Revised Statutes, the next section to that which is now sought to be amended, and in which these words are sought to be introduced, we find that all the means are enumerated there that may be resorted to in order to prevent in any way persons from working. We read as follows

"(a.) Uses violence to such other person, or his wife or children, or injures his property; (b.) Intimidates such other person, or his wife or children, by threats of using violence to him, her or any of them, or of injuring his property; (c.) Persistently follows such other person about from place to place; (d.) Hides any tools, clothes or other property owned or used by such other person, or deprives him or hinders him in the use thereof; (e.) Follows such other person with one or more persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road; or (f.) Besets or watches the house or any other place where such other person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be."

The law contains all this enumeration already, and I do not think, after due consideration, that the Minister of Justice will ask that the words "or any other means" after such a general sweeping enumeration should be left in the amendment now before the House. I believe also, with those who have been in communication with me, members of trade organisations, that the word "so" before the word "attempts" should be inserted; that is to say, that the attempt must be made by force or violence. In this clause which is sought to be amended, the Minister of Justice wishes to strike out the word "usually." For my part I cannot see that to strike out this word would make the law any stronger than at present. The striking out the word "usually" is strongly objected to, and, therefore, I would point out to the Minister of Justice that the word "usually" being left in the law will not in any way weaken the force of the amendment he is seeking to introduce. I am asked by an hon. member why do we object to it. We say the law covers all the charges already, and therefore the change proposed should not be made. If we take the persons enumerated in the law as it exists now, we find that this section which refers to persons on board ship speaks of: "seamen, stevedores, ship carpenters, ship laborers, or any other person usually working at or on board any ship or vessel." It has been contended that this law does not cover persons who come for the first time to work on board a ship. I do not think that such a contention can hold for one moment. The captain who has just received his documents placing him over a vessel goes for the first time on board that ship, and certainly that law would protect him although in common parlance he has not been usually on board the ship. The same thing applies to a mate or a seaman who has just signed the articles and engaged on the vessel. So with respect to stevedores. That designation covers all persons who are engaged in loading or unloading a vessel in port. He is a person usually employed in loading or unloading a vessel. The law does not apply to any particular vessel but to vessels generally, and when we say officers who are usually employed on board a vessel, we cover a whole class of persons, whosoever they may be, who are engaged in any way in or about the vessels in question. I contend, therefore, that the word "usually" should be left in the law as it now stands. I contend, also, that the words "threats of violence," which are not contained in the latter part of the amendment, should be introduced as in the first part of the section. Those who have been in communication with me also desire to bring under the consideration of the Minister of Justice that, if possible, a fine should be imposed instead of imprisonment. The present law states that any person offending against this section, shall be liable to imprisonment and hard labor for any term not exceeding three months. I am under the impression that there is no change now made in the law by the measure submitted by the hon. Minister of Justice in this respect. I would, therefore, ask that the words "of violence" be added after "threat"; that the word "so" be introduced in the second line after the word "or"; that the word "usually" be left in the law, as it covers every case which can possibly come up, and that the words "or any other means" be obliterated altogether, as tending in no way to improve the legislation now on our Statute-book.

Mr. DENISON. As the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran), has placed before the House the views of the workingmen's associations fully, I shall occupy the time of the House but for a moment. I have been requested, however, to read a few telegrams which have been received here on behalf of some labor organisations, and although I think they are unduly alarmed over the changes which are proposed to be made, and take too serious a view of the matter, it is only fair that I should read those telegrams to the House. I am informed that the telegram to which the following telegram is an answer, was one which included all the changes proposed to be made in the law:

"To D. J. O'DONOGHUE,
"Ottawa."

"The following unanimously passed to-night:—
"That whereas it has just come to our knowledge that a Bill has been introduced by the Government at Ottawa in lieu of Bill recently introduced by Amyot, directed against Quebec ship laborers, &c., in which the rights and privileges of said organisation are menaced, be it resolved: That we, the Toronto Trade and Labor Council do strongly condemn and emphatically protest against the passage of said Bill believing that although ostensibly directed to this particular branch of industry it is practically a direct blow at the rights and privileges of organised labor throughout the whole Dominion.

"G. HARRIS,
"President, T. T. & L. C."

Then there is the following one from Woodstock:—

"To D. J. O'DONOGHUE,
"Ottawa."

"DEAR SIR,—District Assembly, 138, sends her most emphatic protest against the Bill introduced by the Government with regard to labor on ship board and sincerely hopes it will never become law.

"J. WATFORD,
"District Master Workman."

The following is from Oshawa:—

"OSHAWA, 18th June, 1887.

"To D. J. O'DONOGHUE,
"Ottawa."

"Enter protest on behalf of Oshawa Trades Council against Government Bill regarding threats, molestation and other offences. Will write to-night.

"JAMES R. BROWN,
"Secretary."

And the following is from St. Thomas:—

"ST. THOMAS, 18th June, 1887.

"To D. J. O'DONOGHUE,
"Ottawa."

"Local Assembly, 4322, Knights of Labor, St. Thomas, protest against the passing of Bill introduced yesterday by Government referring to intimidation.

"ALEX. HESS,
"Master Workman."

Mr. ELLIS. I will not enter upon a discussion of the words which it is proposed to insert, "or any other means," further than to say that it will form a most objectionable proceeding from my point of view, with regard to matters of this kind. I shall not discuss the question of labor and capital, but I am of opinion that the laboring men of the country are driven pretty much to the wall under the legislation we now have, and this would tend further to shut them out from their rights. I will support the motion of the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think we should hear from the Minister of Justice the reasons why the Government have thought it necessary to introduce this Bill.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I regret exceedingly that the Minister of Justice has deemed it necessary to introduce a measure of this kind at this period of the Session. Had there been any necessity for such legislation it certainly ought to have been brought in when we would have had an opportunity of having information from all parts of the country, from parties who are interested, or likely to be interested, in anyway by legislation of this kind, so that they could have made representations on the subject to the Government and the House. I fully agree with the statements made by the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran). No great inconvenience has been felt under the present law, in the greater portion of the Dominion of Canada. There may be some isolated places where difficulty has been experienced, but, if that has been the case, it must be due to a great extent to laxity in putting the existing law in operation. And I do not see that, because those who were charged with seeing the law executed have not done their duty, we should, therefore, pass a Bill at the present time which would reflect upon an organisation which really is not deserving of censure of this kind. I cannot see for the life of me, in reading over the clause, why the present law should not afford the necessary protection for the parties interested, as it is sufficiently stringent, if properly carried out, and sufficiently provides for the punishment of any evil doers. If the amendment passes with the proposed words, "or any other means," none of us will be safe, whether we belong to these labor organisations or not. If we happen to be around where danger is going on, we are liable to be arrested, tried before three magistrates, and without hesitation committed to prison for three months. I am rather surprised at the Minister of Justice introducing such a measure. I thought he had a kinder heart than to do such an injustice to those citizens who may happen by chance to come in the way where a charge could be preferred against them. Why is this resolution directed against the labor organisations? Was it thought necessary for the wealthy capitalists? I say that it is an injustice and an insult on the hard-laboring, industrious classes in the various parts of the Dominion. If there have been difficulties in Quebec, they have not been caused by the labor organisations there, but they must be owing to some other reason. We have not heard of difficulties in other places than in Quebec; and surely all the labor organisations from one end of the Dominion to the other should not have a slur cast upon them by legislation of this kind. What does the Minister of Justice mean by the words, "or any other means?" Does that phrase embrace all classes of offences? It is too comprehensive altogether; we should place no such power as that on the Statute-book. I, therefore, feel strongly that this Bill ought not to become law at the present time. If there have been difficulties, they should have been brought before the House at an earlier period. It is unfair at this stage of the Session, when we have no opportunity of letting the whole country know the nature of the legislation that is now proposed, to spring this Bill upon us. I think the hon. Minister should not press the Bill at present, but he should put in force the laws at present on the Statute-book, which I think are sufficiently stringent. I for one will oppose the Bill.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). It seems to me that only a very serious matter can justify a Bill of this kind being introduced in the closing days of the Session. There have been no complaints before the House, and no serious trouble in any part of the Dominion, to require what looks to me like special legislation. I could not help thinking that it was invidious in its nature, when I examined the 12th clause in the Act, which I did before the hon. member for Montreal Centre (Mr. Curran) spoke. There is a great deal, I think, in the contention that that clause of the Statute, if invoked, would enable every one to engage such labor as he saw fit. It does seem to me that the Bill, directed against a special class, and providing that "by any other means" they may be dealt with and punished, is a very strong provision, and I think the Minister will have to give us some strong reason for asking us to adopt this provision. That term, "by any other means," looks as if it were intended to cover some things not covered in section 12 of the Act, and looking at that section, I think almost every means one can think of is mentioned there. Will that phrase, "any other means" prevent anyone from joining a society? Questions like that arise, and I think the Minister should give us an explanation of what he means by that phrase. It does seem to me that there is no information before the House that warrants us in adopting this legislation at this time. Unless some good cause can be assigned for it, it appears to me that the Bill had better be left over.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is nothing of a very dangerous character in this Bill, and I am sure some of the objections taken this afternoon will be entirely removed if the hon. gentlemen who have raised them will read the Bill. The hon. member for East Elgin (Mr. Wilson), for instance, said that this Bill was aimed at an honest, industrious laboring class. Will he tell me what class it is aimed at, and what class it affects? It affects no class whatever excepting a class of criminals who try to prevent other people, by threats or violence, from doing work which they have a right to do. Now, there is a complete misconception about the particular words of the Bill that have been criticised. I admit that the clause is not as precisely drawn as it might have been. The expression which the hon. gentleman has taken such exception to, "or any other means," is entirely qualified by the word "unlawfully," and the Bill is, therefore, only aimed at persons who unlawfully, by force or threats, or any other means—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Not as it stands.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). With deference to the Minister, it does not so strike me. Of course I am not a lawyer.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have no hesitation in saying that the only construction it bears is that which I state.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). If you leave out the word "and" after the word "unlawfully."

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no offence unless two things are combined, it must be done unlawfully, and it must be done by force or threats or any other means. However, as the hon. member for Montreal Centre has called my attention to it, and has pressed upon me the consideration that the Bill is to be administered by justices of the peace who may not be skilled in questions of interpretation, I have no objection to make its meaning plainer. The purpose of the Bill, as I explained in introducing it, is not to bring under the ban of the criminal law what was not under the ban of that law before, but to remove technical difficulties in the present law. I am willing to qualify the word "threats" by adding the words "of violence," and to strike out the words "or any other means;" although I think the Bill only refers to unlawful means, so as to make the law plain to magistrates who have to administer it. As for the Bill being aimed at any particular laboring class, I have merely to say that the Bill is completely silent on that question. It leaves to every laboring class its rights; but it says that whether a man usually works on board of a vessel or is brought there temporarily, his life and liberty, his property and person shall be under the protection of the law. I do not think it alters the sense of the law, but our attention was called to these matters under these circumstances. It is true, a special case has arisen in the city of Quebec, many persons think, for much more stringent and coercive legislation than now exists. I declined to ask Parliament to increase the penalties or to change the procedure under the present law; but in that connection our attention was called to the fact that the protection against violence was only afforded to those whose usual occupation was to work on board vessels; in other words one whose usual occupation was that of a seaman or a stevedore would be completely under the protection of the law, while another man, accustomed to labor at another occupation, if taken on board a ship to labor, was not protected against threats or violence. That is an honest occupation in which any man has a right to engage. One man is entitled to protection from violence as much as another, and that is the reason I ask to strike out the word "usually" in the Act. Then it was called to our attention, in the same connection, that there was no provision for this case, that, while the present law made it penal to threaten with violence any man who did work on board a vessel, while he was working or going to work, there was nothing to make it more serious than an ordinary assault and battery to commit violence against a person on account of his having so worked. The labor organisation to which the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson) referred as an honest, industrious laboring class, distinctly, and very properly, repudiated any sympathy whatever with the offences which this Bill aims at. They say they are not anxious at all that there should be any loop-hole for persons to escape out of, who offend against their fellow workmen by violence or by threats of violence, and, therefore, they are not in any way aimed at by this Bill; but the persons at whom it is aimed are those who should not be at liberty to molest or assault a man after he has done his work, on account of his having worked at a particular vessel or port. The labor organisations have a perfect right, a right recognised by law, to refuse to admit into their society persons not usually following their line of business, and to expel from their society persons who infringe their by-laws and work contrary to their regulations; but they properly disclaim any right whatever to interfere by molestation with the persons or property of their fellow citizens. Against persons outside of their organisations, who are willing to commit acts of violence against laboring men of this kind, the law should be made effective and operative. I am willing to admit, however, until some stronger case has been made out, we ought not to ask Parliament to increase the penalties.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman says these organisations have the power to admit and to expel certain persons. That is one of the rights these labor organisations possess, and its exercise in a way to prevent any member working on board a vessel might have been construed, under the original clause of that Act, as criminal. Now, that the hon. gentleman has removed that section by another means, I admit that difficulty is removed to some extent. At the same time, it appears to me it is a questionable proceeding to deal with one branch of the labor subject this afternoon, without considering the case more fully in its general aspects. As regards the community from which I come, we never had trouble with the laboring classes. They have never interfered with or prevented any man discharging his duty, in a proper, legitimate way. It appears to me this Act is almost a stigma against all those organisations that have hitherto preserved quite an orderly obedience to the law, and it would look as if this Parliament recognised the necessity of dealing with them in a more stringent manner, than appears to be called for by the the occasion to which the hon. gentleman referred. The labor class would hardly recognise the necessity for this Bill, although the change which has been made in it, has made it less objectionable than it was.

Mr. MILLS. I do not see myself that the hon. gentleman has made out a case for changing the law, nor do I understand him to point out very distinctly what offences may be committed by persons who are combined in this way that are not met by the law as it stands. The law says "every person who by force, threats, or any other means, hinders or prevails, or attempts to hinder or prevail." At the same time, a person may have a civil remedy against the party who interferes with one in his employ, and who persuades him to break his contract or abandon the enterprise in which he is engaged. In cases, it seems to me, where the parties used persuasion or used other means than intimidation, or threats, or acts of violence, the party who is wronged or injured ought to be left to his civil remedy. "Every person who unlawfully, by force or by threats, or by any other means, hinders or prevails, or attempts to hinder or prevail"—Now, a person may attempt to hinder or prevail by persuasion. He may undertake to bribe a party or to convince him that he can find more profitable employment elsewhere, and in this way a magistrate, interpreting that law, would hold that the party came within its provisions. It seems to me, it is not enough that he should prevent or hinder, but he should do so by intimidation or violence, in order to commit an offence that would justify criminal proceedings being taken against him. I am not going into a discussion of all the changes made, but I think the hon. gentleman has not succeeded in showing that the law of the country is defective as a criminal statute, and that these changes are necessary.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 6 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, 21st June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRAYERS.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE DEBATES.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it intended that the report of the Debates Committee should be considered to-day or to-morrow?

Mr. DESJARDINS. I could not make any motion now except by the consent of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The report does not disclose what the evidence is. We have heard rumours about the House, and it has been reported to me that there is no ground for complaint of which the Speaker or anyone else can take cognisance. If the House is disposed to lay down a rule—and I do not say that it would not be proper—then there would be something of which parties might take cognisance of, but, as far as I know, there is no rule and there has been no violation of any rule.

Mr. SPEAKER. This is not the time to discuss the question.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I understand that there is nothing disclosed in the report, giving any information on the subject.

Mr. SPEAKER. When the motion is made to adopt the report it may be discussed on that question.

DIVORCE—RELIEF OF SUSAN ASH.

Mr. SMALL moved that the Bill (No. 135) for the relief of Susan Ash (from the Senate) be placed on the Orders of the Day for a third reading.

Mr. DAVIES. I, for one, would not consent to that, unless the hon. gentleman will assent to the amendment which was moved before.

Mr. SMALL. That depends on what the solicitors for the petitioner will say. I have no objection, as far as I am concerned; but there can be no objection taken to this motion, which is according to the rules of the House.

Motion agreed to, on a division.

PRINTING COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I would move, if there is no objection, the adoption of the report of the Joint Committee on Printing. It is only a matter of form.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think my hon. friend will do as well to allow it to appear on the Notice paper, and move it to-morrow.

PRIVILEGE—DEBATES REPORT.

Mr. WATSON. Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to call the attention of the House to a telegram from Ottawa, published in the Manitoba Sun, and headed: "Scarth's Troubles," and which I will read:

"Before the Debates Committee this morning, Scarth had a shorthand reporter of the Hansard examined, with a view of ascertaining if the notes had been tampered with on the evening of the disallowance debate, when Scarth denied what Watson was saying respecting a telegram received from Sir John. Scarth maintained that a mistake had been made in the report, and a most annoying one, too. He repeated that what he did deny was just what I telegraphed to the Sun a few days afterwards, when he arose in the House and made the correction. He said he had just as good an ear as Hansard men, and his understanding of what was said had been borne out by many friends on both sides of the House. A number of the members of the committee made explanations—"

Mr. SPEAKER. Would the hon. gentleman just state what is his question of privilege—because it is evident to every hon. gentleman, that newspaper articles ought not to be allowed to be read here, except when it appears to the House that there is a question of privilege involved, which question must first be stated to the House, and then the House will say if it is a question of privilege, or not.

Mr. WATSON. The question of privilege is in relation to statements I made in a speech, before this House, on the disallowance debate. I am nearly done reading—

"and Scarth agreed to accept it—"

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman has not answered my question. I request him to state what is the question of privilege. If it is only to state that what is contained in that paper corroborates his statement, that cannot be allowed. If he wishes to say that the paper had said certain things which are, in his opinion, a breach of his privilege as a member of this House, I shall allow him to go on, but not otherwise.

Mr. WATSON. I maintain that what has been said in this House is reflecting on me and on what I have stated in this House. I think I have a right to state as a question of privilege that the statements that are going abroad in reference to my speech on the disallowance question, are misrepresenting the proceedings that took place in this House. Now, the article I read would give the public to understand that the Committee of the Debates had made explanations to satisfy the member for Winnipeg (Mr. Scarth), and that possibly a mistake was made by the Hansard in reporting my speech on the disallowance question. The denial that the member for Winnipeg refers to here, when he states that he got up on the floor of the House and denied the correctness of the statement, does not refer to my speech at all. The hon. gentleman rose to a question of privilege on May 30th, with reference to an article that appeared in the Globe newspaper, but not with regard to the Debates at all. I rise for the purpose of stating to this House that the statements made by myself in the debate on the disallowance question, and which the hon. member rose in the House and objected to, are reported correctly. I do not wish anything that I may state in this House to be added to or taken from. The report as printed in the Hansard is correct, and as to insinuations that the Hansard reporter had been tampered with—I suppose by myself—I may just say that I did not see the Hansard reporter that evening; I was not in the Debates office; I did not converse with him, but I remained in this Chamber until the debate was concluded.

Mr. SCARTH. I have simply to say, in case that it might go abroad that I said the reporter had been tampered with, that I never made use of any such expression; and if anyone has been led to believe that, they will be all the more led to believe it now from the fact of the hon. member for Marquette (Mr. Watson) denying it. I have simply this further to say, that the report in the Hansard is not correct; that the hon. member for Marquette stated distinctly that I had said that I had received a telegram from the leader of the Government saying that he would do away with the policy of disallowance. That I denied, and that only.

Mr. WATSON. If it is in order, I would like to read what I stated at that time.

Mr. SPEAKER. I cannot allow the hon. gentleman to enter into a debate. I do not think the House, either, would allow a debate to be resumed on a question which has been settled several days ago.

Mr. WATSON. I do not wish to enter into a debate, I simply wish to state that what has appeared in the Hansard is absolutely correct, and is what I said, word for word.

DEEPENING THE RIVER ST. LAWRENCE.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole to consider a certain proposed resolution (page 1142) respecting an advance to the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal, to enable them to deepen the River St. Lawrence at Cap à la Roche.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say that the amount that has already been authorised for the deepening of the River St. Lawrence is $2,680,000, and the amount I am asking in this resolution will make the total sum $3,005,000. There has been expended to date $2,253,504.10.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Does that include the harbor?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is for the deepening of the St. Lawrence from the harbor of Montreal to Quebec.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is the total amount spent by the commissioners?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The total amount spent by the harbor commissioners is $2,253,504.10.

Mr. MACKENZIE. How much for the harbor of Montreal?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is for the deepening of the river. I was going on to explain that the commissioners have been enabled to accomplish the whole work for the amount already appropriated, $2,680,000, so as to complete the deepening of the St. Lawrence throughout its entire extent to 27½ feet at low tide, with the exception of that portion at Cap à la Roche; and the amount now asked, $325,000, will complete that work. So that throughout the River St. Lawrence, from Quebec to Montreal, a vessel, the Parisian for instance, drawing 27½ feet at low water, would be able to pass without any detention. The effect of the obstruction at Cap à la Roche is to stop a steamer drawing 27½ feet passing that portion of the river except at high water. I may state that this work has all been performed, and the interest has been regularly paid by the harbor commissioners, not out of capital but out of revenue derived from the harbor dues of Montreal. The House will see at a glance the desirability of furnishing this final amount to complete the work, the importance of which is obvious, and it is only right that the very satisfactory fact should be stated that the revenues of Montreal harbor have been found sufficient to meet the charges for interest, which have been regularly paid on the entire expenditure for this service.

Mr. SHANLY. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman, how soon does he suppose the work will be completed—the importance of which he has stated, and which cannot be over stated?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The work of deepening the harbor, with the exception of that portion for which this grant is taken, will be completed this year; but I am not in possession of sufficiently accurate information as to the estimated time that will be required for the removal of the obstructions at Cap à la Roche.

Mr. SHANLY. Is this supposed to be the last advance?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, the last advance.

Mr. SHANLY. I would express the hope that when this grant has been expended, the Finance Minister, who I hope will still be in his place here, will come down with a much broader resolution, which will propose that the Government will assume the whole of what is called the Lake St. Peter debt. I am perfectly satisfied, as I have always been since I first gave attention to the subject of navigation, many years ago now, that the enormous expenditure we have made and are making on our canals is a mis-expenditure, until we have made the river below Montreal as free as the waters of the Gulf below Cap des Monts. We are to-day expending enormous sums on the canals, we have expended enormous sums in the past, and I would ask the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Railways and Canals, as well as all those merchants engaged in the trade of the St. Lawrence, whether the expenditure on our canals has not resulted in complete and lamentable failure up to this moment? I assert that it has been a failure, and must ever continue to be a failure, so long as we continue to expend our money in the wrong direction. To-day the policy of the Government, or the principle on which they have acted, seems to have been that Montreal is the final objective point of what is known as the western trade. Montreal is in fact nothing more than a way station for this trade; and what good can it do, I would ask, to bring the trade to Montreal, when we find that when it gets there, the whole trade of the river is so hampered by port charges that vessels will not come, except in small numbers, compared with the number of vessels that go to Atlantic seaports. The Government lately, within this last year, I think, have granted a rebate of tolls on the canals. I venture to say that that rebate will prove to be, as our expenditure will prove to be, an entire failure in respect of the results expected from it, and for this reason: that it is when Montreal is reached that the trouble begins. What can be the use of bringing trade to Montreal when you find, when you get it there, as I said before, that the river below is so completely handicapped as compared with the ocean routes to New York and other Atlantic ports, that the shipping charges make it impossible to compete with those free Atlantic ports on the United States coast. We had in Montreal, two years ago, what was called the small-pox plague. It drove away business from the city, and caused the railway companies enormous loss, amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, through the loss of the passenger business. The railway companies might as well have expected to have neutralised the effects of the small-pox scare, by reducing their passenger rates, as for the Government to expect to remove the disadvantages that ship-owners have to contend with at Montreal by reducing the tolls on the canals. The truth is that vessels do not come in large numbers to Montreal, and we do not obtain any large share of the great western trade for which we are seeking. Montreal is handicapped by the enormous port charges, and river charges, and all sorts of other navigation charges, driving away from the St. Lawrence its legitimate traffic. Nature designed the St. Lawrence to be the most important route to the ocean, but it never will fulfil its destiny until we make the river, from Montreal to Cap des Monts, as free as the blue waters of the ocean below. I will say this further, that it is my fixed firm belief that if this is not to be done eventually, if the Government do not contemplate freeing the river, it will be better at once to economise our expenditure on the canals. And my reason for thinking so is this: that the canals to-day are capable of doing a very much larger trade than we are ever going to obtain, they are capable of carrying five times as much grain than has yet ever reached Montreal in any one season from the great western granary. We might just as well cease our expenditure on the canals and continue as we are doing now, to get little or nothing, a very small percentage indeed, of that trade, the greater proportion of which is the natural right and inheritance of the St. Lawrence river. We must remember that our season of navigation is rather short. We are at certain natural disadvantages arising from climatic conditions, and, therefore, the Government ought to do even more than is ordinarily done by Governments to, as far as possible, counterbalance those disadvantages under which the St. Lawrence route now lies. I trust, therefore, that after this final expenditure, which the Minister of Finance says is to be final, is made, and when this desirable improvement is effected, I may have the pleasure of being able to support, which I will do with great pleasure, a broad and comprehensive measure to be introduced by the Government to make the navigation of the River St. Lawrence, save for ordinary port and light dues, as free as the navigation of the ocean itself.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid I am hardly in a position, at this moment, to enter on a discussion of the very large and important question which has been raised by my hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Shanly). I am sure the House has listened with great pleasure to the very interesting and important statement he has made, with reference to the trade of the St. Lawrence, and the trade connected with the city of Montreal, both by the St. Lawrence and by the canals. I agree with him in the statement which he has made, that probably no expenditure ever made in this country has contributed more to the development of the country, more to the advancement of trade, more to the advantage of the whole country, than the money which has been expended in the deepening of the St. Lawrence, and the creation of this channel. The proposal which the hon. gentleman has just made is not a new proposal. It has engaged the attention of the Government from time to time, and the proper period for dealing with it in a practical form, and considering what policy the Government may adopt, will be, as my hon. friend has stated, when this expenditure has been made, and this service is completed, and when we have a navigation of 27½ feet in low water throughout the entire distance from Quebec to Montreal.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Why stop at Montreal?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have never heard that it has been proposed to extend the navigation for ships drawing 27½ feet any further than Montreal. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) may contemplate a gigantic scheme of that kind; but, certainly, I have never heard it propounded from any other source, and, therefore, I can speak of the navigation between Quebec and Montreal, and the results of the improvements which have been made in that channel as being of a very interesting and encouraging nature. The figures for last year show that in 1856 there was an increase over 1835 in ocean inland tonnage coming to the port of Montreal to the extent of 592 vessels, or an increased tonnage amounting to 209,688 tons. There was received in dues collected for the purpose of discharging the interest payable upon the debt—which interest has been regularly paid on all the advances made to the Harbor Commission—an increase from $224,897 of revenue collected at Montreal to $273,794, showing that this expenditure is, year by year, accomplishing the great object for which it is made, that is, to increase the trade and business of the port. I have no hesitation in saying to my hon. friend that the very important question which he has raised is one which has engaged, and will continue to engage, the serious attention of the Government, and that the proper time for dealing with it will be when, by the expenditure of the money which is now asked for and which, it is confidently believed, will be all that will be required to complete this navigation, the channel has been deepened to 27½ feet.

Mr. SHANLY. I am glad to hear from my hon. friend that this matter will have the attention of the Government. That, we know, is a very convenient form of expression, and, of course, my own suggestion is—if I may say that I have made a suggestion—that when the whole expenditure has been made, then, at any rate, the matter will engage the very serious attention of the Government. I have long believed, I still believe, and I will always continue to believe, that the deepening of the St. Lawrence below Montreal, to allow ships of the largest size to come up, is as much a part of our internal navigation system—an internal navigation system the finest in the world—as is the Welland canal. I look upon it as being just as important, as being as completely one of those expenditures that the Government of Canada should father, as the improvement of the Welland canal, or of any of the other links of the St. Lawrence navigation.

Mr. JONES. There is no doubt that anything which tends to remove restrictions from the navigation of the river must naturally increase the commerce of the country, and afford additional facilities for its products to reach the sea. I sympathise a good deal with the observations made by the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly), though I do not at present go to the full extent of his views. I merely rise for the purpose of saying to the Minister of Finance, that if the time should arrive when the Government should be able to carry out the views of the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly), and if the Minister of Finance should be in his present position on that occasion, I trust he will consider the general question, as applicable to our railways as well as to our canals. I notice that lately the tolls have been abolished on the western canals—which is quite a proper thing, I do not find any fault with it—but I think that, in connection with that branch of the subject, it would be proper to consider at the same time, whether the general tolls over the Intercolonial Railway, which is a Government work as much as the canals, which is intended to increase and foster the work of the country from one Province to another, should not be dealt with on the same terms. I trust the Minister of Finance, in dealing with that branch of the subject, will not increase the land carriage as well.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid that the hon. gentleman has lost sight of the fact that no sort of comparison can be instituted between a railway and a waterway. My hon. friend from South Grenville (Mr. Shanly) does not propose that we shall find the ships to navigate these waters and carry cargoes, and that is what the proposal of the hon. member for Halifax would amount to. Not only have we a free road at present, but we have more. The hon. gentleman knows that the Intercolonial Railway is little more than free to-day, that there is no charge for going on the road, that in fact there is not enough collected from the business done on the road to pay for its operation, and, while that is the case, there is no sort of comparison between the Intercolonial Railway and the expenditure on the River St. Lawrence, which has been met, and all the interest on the money required for that expenditure covered by dues collected at Montreal on the shipping of the country. I say that no sort of comparison can be instituted for a single moment, and, if a comparison could be instituted, I think the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly) would strengthen his argument by saying: Put the waterway of the St. Lawrence in the same position in which you have placed the Intercolonial Railway, only having such charges made on the trade of the country as are involved in carrying that trade on the ships which go up and down that waterway.

Mr. JONES. I think the hon. gentleman does not apprehend my argument. I understand that the canals have been built at Government expense, I understand that they have been made free to the commerce of the country. I do not find any fault with that, but there is a certain amount of the expenditure in connection with canals which has been paid out of the revenue of the country; to that extent they are a burden on the revenues, and to that extent the canals are in precisely the same position as the Intercolonial Railway would be. Of course the management of the Intercolonial Railway is expensive, but then there is a large return for the expenditure, and I merely suggested, in the interests of the Lower Provinces, that, having abolished the tolls on the canals entirely, and keeping up as we are an expense on the canals for their maintenance and supervision, I thought the same principle would enable the Government to reduce very considerably the rates on the Intercolonial Railway.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman makes this mistake: The canals are not free; they never have been free, or at any rate they are only free in almost the same sense as the Intercolonial Railway is free. There is a very small fee charged on the Intercolonial Railway for the grain which is shipped upon it, just the same as there is upon the canals. All local freights going through the canals pay to-day just the same as they always did. Freight going to Oswego by the canals pay the same as they have always paid.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE. I did not catch perfectly the words of the hon. Minister of Finance about the question of the Government assuming the debt contracted by the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal for the deepening of Lake St. Peter. As I understand the question brought before the House by the hon. member for South Grenville (Mr. Shanly), refers to the trade of Montreal in the port of Montreal, and the making of that port a free port in the near future. That is a question that has been agitated in Montreal for a long time, and on which petitions have been sent to the Government during the last ten years, and declarations have been made which were considered by the people of Montreal as promises; but nothing tangible has yet been done. I understand as soon as these last works are completed and the whole of the channel from Montreal to Quebec is deepened to 27½ feet, it is the intention of the Government to take up the question and deal with it in a liberal spirit, having in view not only the interests of Montreal but the interests of the whole Dominion. The navigation trade of the country centres in the port of Montreal, and so far as the interests of Montreal itself are concerned, it is of the utmost importance that this question should be settled as soon as possible.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do I understand the hon. Minister of Finance to give a pledge that the Government at some early day in the future is going to assume the debt of the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal for the deepening of the river, on the ground of its being a Dominion undertaking, and thus relieve the port of Montreal of the charge that has been incurred? If so, that is a very important departure from the policy heretofore adopted, and from the principle laid down when this work was undertaken. Quebec is a deep seaport; it is the natural head, if I may so speak, of the deep sea navigation of Canada; but by the energy and enterprise of the trade of Montreal, the river was deepened, so that the deep sea navigation has been extended to the port of Montreal, where the lake navigation also terminates. Of course, I do not know that the Dominion at large has any interest in the question as to whether the deep sea navigation should terminate at the port of Quebec or at the port of Montreal. The port of Montreal has a special interest in the transference of the deep sea navigation from Quebec to Montreal. It has been advantaged, but advantaged at the expense of the port of Quebec. If I understand the hon. Minister rightly, he agrees with the views expressed by the hon. member for South Grenville, and intimates that the Government will be prepared to assume this liability, and to release the port of Montreal from the burden it has hitherto borne.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid I am not able to compliment my hon. friend upon his intelligence. If he gathered any such pledge from any words I uttered, I failed very much to communicate to the House the opinions I wished to make known. Those were, that I appreciated to the fullest extent the argument which the hon. member for South Grenville had addressed to the House. I concurred with him as to the importance of the work which had been accomplished, and as to its value, not to Montreal alone, but to the whole country. I differ entirely from my hon. friend who has just taken his seat, in the view that the deepening of the great St. Lawrence up to Montreal to 27½ feet at low water, is a matter of no consequence to the people of this country. But so far from giving any pledge, I simply stated that, while we were asking for this advance, as all other advances have been asked, for the purpose of completing this work, the interest on the money was regularly paid by the Harbor Commissioners of Montreal from the revenue received from charges collected in the port, and that when this work was completed, that would be the appropriate time to submit the larger question which the hon. gentleman has brought forward, and that it would receive at that time the fullest and most careful and candid consideration of the Government; but I think I did not go any further than that.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 168) for the improvement of the navigation of the River St. Lawrence.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and second times, considered in Committee, reported and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

(In the Committee.)

St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary$82,369 51

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is an increase of $420 caused by the addition of three guards, a deputy warden, and a farmer. There is a decrease of $100 for the chief keeper, and $50 for the tailor instructor.

To provide for increase of salary to Mr. Richard Pope,
Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, from the 1st
January, 1886..... $175

Mr. MILLS. I object to this item. This officer has been shown to have been grossly negligent in his duty, and to have failed to discharge his duties, as the law requires. He was shown by his own evidence to have been grossly partial in his conduct, and to have delayed, contrary to law, the entry of the names of certain members of this House in the Gazette, thereby extending the time for filing petitions against them. In every respect, he has been guilty of gross neglect of duty, and there is but one inference to be drawn from the proposal of the Government to increase his salary; that is, that he entered into a conspiracy with some member of the Government to deliberately violate the law, and is now about to be rewarded for that disregard of duty and violation of the law by the increase about to be made in his salary. I protest against this attempt to reward a public officer, by doing that which would justly secure his dismissal in any other representative Government in the world.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen), who has just risen will, before he proceeds with his remarks, allow me to explain that when the Estimates were prepared, when this gentleman was placed in his position in the Privy Council, none of the circumstances referred to had taken place. This is simply, as the hon. member for Bothwell knows, carrying out the arrangements that were made, quite irrespective of anything complained of. I do not want to take part in the discussion. The hon. gentleman has had the opportunity of stating his views in the most emphatic terms to the House, and ought to be contented with that. He should not feel it necessary now to take up time further, because this arrangement for the transfer of Mr. Pope and this increase in his salary, in connection with the largely increased duties devolving upon him, all took place long anterior to the acts complained of. I would rather the hon. gentleman would let the matter rest before the country on the very strong statements he has made, and the very strong opinions he has expressed, than to take up further time. He will understand it is necessary, in framing the Estimates, to carry out decisions of the Orders in Council. These were anterior, and not subsequent, to the act complained of, and could be, in no sense, the reward of anything Mr. Pope did or neglected to do.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman knows very well that it does not devolve upon the Government to increase the salary. The Government recommends the increase, and the responsibility of granting it lies with the House. I am not complaining that a worthy officer has had his salary increased, but I am complaining that, in the face of a violation of the law on the part of this officer, known to every gentleman in the House, the Government should come down with a proposition to increase his salary. I notify the hon. gentleman, that when concurrence is asked for, I shall take the opinion of the House on the conduct of this officer and the proposal of the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quite in his right to do that.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is unfair to ask the Opposition to consent to this increase, when we are deeply incensed on account of the manner in which this gentleman—

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Gentleman,—scoundrel.

Mr. McMULLEN,—has discharged the duties of gazetting the returns. We have expressed our indignation on previous occasions, yet, in the face of that expression, the Government asked the Opposition quietly to consent to an increase of the salary of this officer. We cannot quietly consent to that; we are bound to reject the proposition, although this increase was decided on before this officer became guilty of the neglect complained of. Such a plea is not sufficient to warrant our accepting, at the hands of the Government, this proposal to increase the salary of a man who has committed a gross injustice against members of the House on this side.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) has just stated that he intends, when concurrence is asked and the Speaker is in the Chair, to take the sense of the House on that vote, and that will give every gentleman in the House an opportunity of placing himself on record in reference to this item; so that no one is asked quietly to concur in it, because there will be nothing to prevent any hon. gentleman from placing himself on record at a subsequent stage.

Mr. McMULLEN. Our experience in regard to concurrence is that these things are rushed through very rapidly, and at that time of the Session members are anxious to get away. I say that now is the time for us to emphasise our indignation, when the Government are asking us to give this increase of salary to this man.

Mr. PLATT. The Finance Minister has been admirably successful during this Session in putting off discussion on various matters, and so we will go on until the close of the Session will arrive and everyone will be in a hurry to get away and desirous to say nothing. I do not blame the Finance Minister for hastening the close of the Session, but there are matters which must be discussed, no matter what the anxiety of members may be to get away to their homes. This is one of the matters upon which members on this side feel very keenly. The Minister of Finance tells us that the transfer of this man was made before the acts which are complained of took place, but the proposal to pay this gentleman for those acts, and for the service which he rendered to that party, is made now, and now is the time to discuss it. I will take the opportunity on concurrence to register my vote in favor of the proposition which will be made on this side of the House. I only regret that it is this side of the House alone who feel themselves called upon to speak on this important matter; for, if it has come to this, that this country and this Parliament are prepared to keep in place and in power, and to pay an increased salary to an officer who has glaringly and flagrantly violated the laws of the land, who has, I may say, violated his oath of office, and has perpetrated upon this House an insolent letter and a lying return, simply because he has been instrumental in facilitating protests against members on this side of the House and relieving those on that side from that sort of disturbance, it is time to speak out. I feel that very strongly. I feel that in my own case, because mine is the most monstrous case of all those on record. I feel for the integrity of the Civil Service of this land, when an officer who is dignified by the name of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has been guilty of such gross and intolerable wrongs, as this gentleman has been guilty of, and when this Parliament, instead of censuring him, is called upon to increase his salary because he has been guilty of these acts of perfidy.

Mr. DAVIES. The Finance Minister seems to think that, because the Government agreed to increase this gentleman's salary three or four months before these acts which are complained of were committed, we ought to say nothing about it; but, even supposing the Government were actuated by the highest and best motives in increasing his salary at that time, motives which could not be impugned, now, after the acts of official indecency of which the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has been guilty, the Government should in honor withdraw the proposition from the House as to this increase of salary which they originally agreed to give. They cannot hope that this vote will pass in silence, or that the Opposition would readily agree to it; and I, for one, take this opportunity to express my regret that the Government should still cling to an agreement which originally might be all right; but which has become wickedly bad after the indecent exhibition that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has made of his partisanship in publishing the returns of members elected to this Parliament.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. CHARLTON. I presume that the Government are of the opinion that the state of apathy that exists in public sentiment is so great that it is impossible to arouse it or outrage it. They certainly have some reason for supposing that after the last General Election, in view of the record with which they went to the country. But it is a sad commentary on the position of things in this young country, that an outrage—I cannot designate it by any less term—is perpetrated in this way without their resentment. Here is an officer of the House who acted in a most partisan and in a most unjustifiable manner, who purposely delayed the returns of a great number of members on this side of the House, who used the greatest diligence and promptitude in returning members on that side of the House, and the result of his action in delaying the returns of members on this side, and promptly gazetting those of members on that side, is that a number of petitions have been lodged against members on this side which would never have been lodged if the returns had been published according to the date of their reception. This individual, who has failed to discharge this duty according to his obligation, deserves his own discharge from the position he holds. He should be ignominiously turned out of office. If we are to have a fair discharge of the duties of any office on the part of its incumbent, we must demand the faithful and honest discharge of his duties, and, if, in place of taking this course in regard to officials, we are to increase the salary of one who has evidently played into the hands of the Government, if we are to improve his official position and, instead of discharging him, we are to increase his salary, there is no guarantee whatever that the Civil Service will not become rotten and polluted. I regret in the first place that the Government made use of this official as they did, and I regret to see the effrontery, the hardihood and the defiance of every sentiment of public rectitude which leads them to propose to increase the salary of an official such as this.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think we have had opportunities of seeing that the Government intend to punish certain members of the Civil Service for manifesting their preference for a candidate on this side of the House. I understood the Finance Minister to say that members of the Civil Service might quietly vote, but that anything further would be beyond their duty and would be worthy of reproof. Notwithstanding that he holds those views, here we find an official of the House who not only endeavors but does tamper—for it is equivalent to that—with all the electoral returns from this Dominion. It is not disputed that he has done this. He has been asked to assign his reasons, and he has written a letter, and his letter is worse than his action, and his statements have been alleged by hon. members to be absolutely false statements, and now it is proposed to do what? To discharge him? To reprimand him? No, but to raise his salary and to improve his position. The Finance Minister cannot expect that vote to go through the House quietly. I agree with the hon. member for Prince Edward (Mr. Platt) that it is lamentable, in regard to our public affairs, that a protest against conduct such as that should only come from one side of the House. It seems to me that it is a question on which members on both sides of the House are interested; it seems to me that the liberties of the House have been infringed upon by that officer, and that hon. gentlemen on that side, as well as upon this, should agree to refuse to stamp with the approval of the Government the conduct of which he has been guilty.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). As I did on a former occasion, I desire now to enter my protest against this increase of salary, and I do so because I think that if ever there was a transaction that might be regarded as a disgrace, it is the conduct pursued by Mr. Pope. But while Mr. Pope is censurable, we have appealed to the Government time and again to say whether they are directly or indirectly connected with this transaction. And yet we are told to-day that we ought not to discuss this matter. I say that if Mr. Pope was advised to pursue the course that he did by the Government, or if he acted under the direction of the Government, I say the Government should be manly enough, straightforward enough, bold enough, to say that they advised him, and they are now increasing his salary for the purpose of compensating him for doing their work. It is very likely this is the case. Perhaps we are too harsh upon this man Pope, perhaps he was only doing the bidding of the Government, that he was only carrying out the directions of his superiors, and that now he wants to get a larger salary than he was getting before. That is only reasonable that he should expect such. It does seem like it, because the Government still cling to the idea that this man, on account of the noble work that he did for them in gazetting the returns of their friends very early and thereby shutting the Opposition off from a chance of protesting, performed useful service to the Government party. If he did I do not know but what the Government ought to pay him out of their own pockets. If he performed good work for them he certainly did not perform good work for us, and we, as an Opposition, and the country as a whole, ought not to be called on to pay for doing such work. Sir, I say this is certainly a disgraceful transaction on the part of this man Pope, and on the part of the Government. A transaction of this kind should be condemned by every member, whether he be on one side of politics or the other. If the same course is pursued in the future, how can any member be sure that his rights will be guarded and protected in this House? I regret exceedingly that the Government have not the fortitude to shoulder the responsibility themselves—as I believe now that they really are responsible for the transaction that occurred in gazetting the members. I say again that I shall be ready to vote, not only against the increase, but I shall be ready to vote condemnation to the men who advised a course of that kind to be pursued by Mr. Pope.

Mr. MULOCK. There is a phase of this case that the Government have not cleared up. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when attention was called to the unfair gazetting, the Government stated that the clerk would probably be able to afford a satisfactory explanation. During the course of the debate, a motion was made to refer the matter to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and the Government took the ground that before that reference was directed, the officer should have an opportunity of offering his explanations. He submitted an explanation to this House which I think no hon. gentleman in this House accepted as representing the facts of the case. I am perfectly convinced in my own mind that from the evidence submitted by the returning officer himself, as well as the evidence of hon. gentleman in this House, that this officer deliberately laid upon the Table of this House a communication absolutely and intentionally false. He offered explanations that could not commend themselves to the judgment of any man. He endeavored to prove that all that happened was the result of accident. Why, the doctrine of chances would not admit of any such results as came out in his gazetting those returns. The Government, therefore, knowing what they do know, causing him to do as he did, knowing that he acted designedly, as he did, have succeeded up to this moment in preventing a proper enquiry being made into these charges. The Government, therefore, are the parties responsible. This man is but a creature in their hands who has been obliged, under their pressure, not only to violate his oath of office, but afterwards to render a false account to the House of the reason why he violated that oath of office. Therefore I think that, late as it is in the Session, if the Government has any regard for the facts, if they wish to remove this charge from their own shoulders, and say it was an accident rather than the result of design, then let them refer this matter to a proper committee; let us examine under oath the persons who are cognisant of the facts; and then, and not till then, place this man in a higher position by further rewarding him with public money. If the Government refuse that, if they simply say that no enquiry shall be made, if they say to their followers in this House: It is not for you to reason, but to vote as you are directed, you have but to endorse this act—if you choose to say that, then I would like to know where is the independence of Parliament? Why, it is complained already, I hear the complaint made by members on the opposite side of the House, but outside this House, that they are not allowed freedom of action to-day.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Legion.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Name, name.

Mr. MULOCK. I can name them. You, yourself, the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Gordon) himself, I am perfectly satisfied, is not a free agent in this House.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. The hon. gentleman states what is utterly untrue.

Mr. MULOCK. I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his independence then, voting, as he does, against his own country whenever he gets a chance, because he is told to do so.

Mr. SHAKESPEARE. I deny the statement.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. gentleman may deny the statement—

The CHAIRMAN. I do not think that language is admissible.

Mr. MULOCK. Very well, I will not violate the rules of debate. But Sir, if this hon. member—

Mr. GORDON. I call the hon. gentleman to order. He spoke of what the member for Vancouver was doing. Does he mean me?

Mr. MULOCK. I am extremely glad to think this hon. gentleman does not desire to accept any responsibility for the action of the last speaker.

Mr. GORDON. Not for what you have done.

Mr. MULOCK. I am extremely glad to think that none of these hon. gentlemen desire to be put in a position by their votes—I will not say their utterances, for they do not indulge in utterances to support their unsound votes; but they do not desire to be discovered in the position which they occupy. Now, in this particular transaction, the Minister of Finance calls on his faithful henchmen to rise and endorse what the Government have done. He asks them to endorse acts that have not been investigated. The Minister of Finance asks every member of his party in this House to vote before there has been a trial, to endorse beforehand, to whitewash beforehand the conduct of an officer which has been prima facie against his oath of office. Well, if hon. gentlemen are so forgetful of their duty to their country as to do what they are told to do against their best judgment, then I think I am safe in saying—

The CHAIRMAN. I think that language is not permissible.

Mr. MULOCK. I withdraw the remark, Mr. Chairman. I extremely regret that the theme is such that I cannot say that there is no foundation for the remark. On the contrary, this and many other actions have convinced the country, if they have not convinced the House, that the Government here to-day dictates to their followers instead of discussing with them. I, therefore, think that before this vote is carried, the only right thing to do is to submit the conduct of this officer to a tribunal which will take evidence under oath; and when we have the First Minister in the witness box, when we have the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in the witness box, when we have the express officers and the officers of the Postal Department in the witness box, and the books of the Post Office Department before the committee, then I say, on my responsibility as a member here, that we will prove the falsity of the explanation, and, I think, if the truth is told we will prove that the real criminals occupy places on the Treasury benches.

Department of Secretary of State, salaries..... $1,350

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Taché was appointed from 1st July, 1886, and no provision was made for his salary until now, consequently this amount is required to be voted.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. Mr. Taché was a temporary clerk at $2.50 a day and has been acting as private secretary to the Secretary of State since five years. It is customary when a private secretary has been acting for a long time in a satisfactory manner, that he should be given a permanent position. The salary of this officer will be increased from $915 a year which he has been receiving, to $1,100 a year, which simply means the $50 annual increase for four years, that he has not received such increase as the permanent clerks.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). This is a very improper proposal. The hon. gentleman knew five years ago the duties which Mr. Taché was undertaking to discharge, and he ought to have asked for a vote at that time for the amount, and not have waited five years.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The hon. gentleman does not understand the matter. The gentleman was appointed as supernumerary clerk and private secretary. After having served a certain number of years and performed his duties faithfully, it is the custom to appoint a private secretary as a permanent officer, otherwise if the Minister disappeared injustice might be done. The same course has been followed now as was pursued when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office, and I might quote the name of a case. I only have done this because it is customary, and a due reward to a private secretary who has done his duty. It does not interfere with the organisation of the Department.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Do we understand that it is simply the appointment of another clerk in the Department of the Secretary of State and the payment of his salary at $1,100 a year, while before he was a temporary clerk at $900?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. That is the effect of it.

Mr. MILLS. Then he receives as private secretary, how much?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. $600.

Mr. DAVIES. Has he ceased to be private secretary?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. No. With respect to the amount of $100 for increase of salary to L. C. Labelle, I may say that this was voted last year. Mr. Labelle passed an examination on four optional subjects—I may say to his credit, without any previous preparation whatever—in type-writing, stenography, book-keeping and English composition. Last year there was voted for stenography that sum of money, but the Auditor General refused to pay it because the vote had not been by name. If hon. gentlemen opposite will refer to last year's Estimates they will find a vote for stenographer $762, which was intended for Mr. Labelle, and which he did not receive. There is no increase.

Mr. MULOCK.

Department of Justice, salaries.....$506 25

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to ask the Government a question, although it is not strictly in connection with this item. I understand that the librarian of the Supreme Court receives $600 a year, and it strikes me if he is an official capable of discharging his duties he receives very small pay for these services. My attention has been called to it, and I merely mention the matter that the Government's attention might be called to it. The position is a rather responsible one.

Geological Survey (allowance to Dr. G. M. Dawson)...$1,000

Mr. WILSON. I do not intend to object to this item, or to find any fault with it. I only call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the different treatment rendered this man from what he rendered to the unfortunate young man, James Fitzgerald, mate of the life-boat crew at Port Stanley. Although he performed the duties of captain, he has up to this time received no consideration at the hands of the Government. I call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the different treatment he rendered in that case, to what is rendered in other Departments.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I suppose Dr. Selwyn, the director of the Survey, was absent from the country for eleven months, and that Mr. Dawson acted as his substitute?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Of course Dr. Selwyn's pay went on the same as before, and it is now proposed to give another member of the Geological Survey $1,000 extra. What extra work did Mr. Dawson do that entitles him to $1,000 extra for his services?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Dawson is a man of exceptional ability, and, in the absence of Dr. Selwyn, was responsible for the management of the whole department. It is not proposed to give him all the difference between his salary and that of Dr. Selwyn, but to give him $1,000 as compensation for the additional duties and responsibilities which devolved on him during the absence of the head of the department.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Was he senior officer?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think so.

Mr. CHARLTON. What was his salary?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The salary of a first class clerk, I think.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the Minister of Finance is in error in saying that Mr. Dawson was senior officer. I think there is another officer who is senior as regards the number of years' service, and I say nothing of seniority in any other regard. Is it the rule to promote to such positions, during the temporary absence of the head, those who are subordinates?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The practice is, I think, to select for the discharge of duties of this kind the gentleman who enjoys to the largest extent the confidence of the chief of the Department, and upon whom he can with the greatest confidence impose those duties which he would otherwise have to perform. I do not know that it always follows that the senior officer or head clerk should be selected.

Mr. MULOCK. Nor should I say that it should always follow, and in this case I have no adverse criticism to offer against Mr. Dawson, for what little information I have about him is most favorable. But if there are others equally fit, other things being equal, I think the seniors should not be passed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I agree with the hon. gentleman that that should be the rule, as otherwise friction and dissatisfaction arise.

Department of Inland Revenue, salaries $1,109 50

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the present is a good time to have an explanation from the Minister of Inland Revenue, as to some matters in his Department which were left over, and which the Minister of Finance said would be explained afterwards. Now, I see that in addition to the commissioner and assistant commissioner and chief clerk and the chief clerk's secretary, we have nine first-class clerks, a thing which does not happen in any other Department, and which, in the absence of any explanation, looks very much like a scandal. That Department is not a very large one; it is not possible it can require nine first-class clerks, especially as we have not had near that number for the past eight or ten years. As the increase has been caused lately, I think the House and the country are entitled to a full explanation.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman forgets the fact that the Department of Inland Revenue comprises more branches than any other Department of the Government. The assistant commissioner reports with regard to those nine men that their work is such as properly devolves upon first-class clerks, and that the men who perform those duties are such as to entitle them to that rank, which they have attained, by promotion, under the law and regulations. In that Department we have the collection of excise, the collection of canal tolls, adulterations of foods, drugs, &c, weights and measures, the culling of timber, the collection of tolls on slides and booms, all these branches requiring their own set of officers and all organised under different Acts of Parliament.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am surprised at the explanation of the hon. gentleman for it amounts simply to this: That he has nine first-class clerks because he has nine, and because the assistant commissioner has made a report that it is desirable that some of them should be promoted. The hon. gentleman refers to the different branches of his Department, but there are not more branches than there were last year, and besides, it does not follow that because you carve up a Department in that way, you necessarily must have so many first-class clerks if others can do the work. According to the Auditor General's report for 1885 we had only three first-class clerks in the Inland Revenue Department, and here in one year we have these six clerks added. I say that such a proposition, with regard to a Department which is considered one of the smaller Departments of the service, is one for which I think the House is entitled to a clear and detailed explanation. I submit that if any information on the subject is contained in the report of the commissioner, that report should be presented to the House. Here we are paying nine first-class clerks the sum of $14,125. And the first-class clerks in 1885-86 were paid $4,625, an increase of $10,000.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman states that it was not done in the last year or the year before—for very good reasons. I stated that the duties these men performed were duties they were entitled to perform as first-class clerks, but inasmuch as they had not passed the promotion examinations, they could not get the benefit of their standing in the way of salary; but after having passed the examination, they are entitled to that.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman necessarily appoint a man when he passes the examination, whether there is a vacancy or not?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I told the hon. gentleman that these officers were considered as ranking as first-class, but they did not get the rank until they passed the examination.

Mr. PLATT. The explanation given by the hon. gentleman simply shows that the Civil Service Act of this country is a nuisance and an expense to the country. I have another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister, and I think it is due to him that he should have an opportunity of explaining it. I refer to a change that was made in the county town of the county I have the honor to represent, the town of Picton. He knows what I refer to—the appointment of an Inland Revenue collector for that town. The history of the case is simply this: Mr. Ross, a son of a late member of this House, the Customs collector of that town, and one of the most efficient officers of the outside service, was made collector of Inland Revenue.

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman is not stating the case altogether correctly.

Mr. PLATT. The hon. gentleman can make whatever corrections he may wish after I say what I have to say. At any rate, Mr. Ross performed the duties for the Revenue Department which are now performed by another individual, and I wish to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of explaining why a change was made. In our section of the country Mr. Ross is considered an exceptionally good officer, and no fault whatever was found with his conduct; but it happened that a near relative of an old member of this House was anxious to secure some position, and I think for the paltry sum of $100 or $150, a collector of Inland Revenue was appointed for that town. I have yet to learn that the gentleman who received that appointment has passed any examination for the Civil Service. I do not think that he is either a first, a second or a third class clerk. Why was this change made? Was it simply because a young man had received a certificate of qualification, or through political influence, or because the necessity of the service required it to be done?

Mr. COSTIGAN. The hon. gentleman is a little more sarcastic than usual in dealing with a question of this kind; but I think I can set him right. In the first place, Mr. Ross was not an Inland Revenue officer under the Act. The practice of the Department, in small communities where a limited business is done, instead of appointing salaried officers, has been to allow the collectors of Customs to collect our revenues, and give them a percentage. They are not appointed by Order in Council, but they are simply allowed by the Customs Department to perform the duties. The officer who has been appointed is a sub-collector, and he is entirely under the control of the Department, without the increase of a dollar's expense to the country.

Mr. PLATT. Did he pass the examination?

Mr. COSTIGAN. He did not require to pass an examination. If the hon. gentleman reads the Act, he will find that a sub-collector can be appointed without examination.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). One would suppose when the hon. gentleman has nine first-class clerks and a large number of assistants in his Department, that he would be able among them to get prepared an index to the Inland Revenue Act, without making a special provision of $150 for that purpose. The hon. gentleman will require, I think, to give some explanations of that.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What position does Mr. Ger-ald occupy in the Department?

Mr. COSTIGAN. He is assistant commissioner here as well as inspector of tobacco factories, but he is able to devote the greater portion of his time to the Department here as assistant commissioner.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think he is a very capable officer, and I am very glad he is promoted if promotion was necessary; but did that necessitate the appointment of another inspector?

Mr. COSTIGAN. No; he discharges both duties at the increased salary, and we save the other salary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman say who Mr. Heron is, and why he makes special provision for his preparing an index to the Inland Revenue Act?

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. Heron is an officer in the Department, who devoted his time in extra hours for a couple of years to this work.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Two years to prepare an index to one Act and some Orders in Council?

Mr. COSTIGAN. I say he devoted a portion of his extra time extending over one year at any rate, and the index was submitted to the commissioner. Another index was also prepared, but this was found to be the better of the two, and on Mr. Miall's report, I recommended this payment, which I thought was a very reasonable one. We had not nine first class clerks, as the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are we to understand that there was no index to the hon. gentleman's Act until this was prepared?

Mr. COSTIGAN. There was, but there was not so complete an index.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) If the hon. gentleman had not nine first-class clerks, he had twelve second-class clerks, and I do not think it is beneath the dignity or beyond the powers of a second-class clerk to make an index to a statute.

Department of Agriculture (allowance for the Secretary of the Department for performing the duties of deputy head)..... $700

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Explain this.

Mr. CARLING. I think the explanation is given in the estimates. Mr. Lowe, the Secretary of the Department, discharged the duties of the deputy during his absence through illness.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the deputy, Dr. Taché, unable to be in his place?

Mr. CARLING. He is. He has had a relapse.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Are we to have a renewal of this demand?

Mr. CARLING. I think not. It is probable Dr. Taché will not be able to resume his duty and will be superannuated.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The manner in which the statistics have been prepared by Mr. Lowe, and the accurate and minute information he has, from time to time, given to the hon. gentleman and his predecessors in office, the extreme accuracy with which his figures have been verified by the report of the census commissioners, shows that this officer is entitled to generous treatment at the hands of the House. There can be no doubt on that point, and I am sure the right hon. gentleman must have a very great deal of pleasure in asking the House to vote $700 in addition to his ordinary salary, as the pains that Mr. Lowe has taken to inform his chief accurately and not to mislead him, have served so useful a purpose to the Government, especially during the past two or three general elections.

Mr. JONES. I would ask the First Minister that, as a good many members desire to attend the levee of His Excellency, the House should adjourn at 5:30 instead of at 6.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly.

To pay his Honor James P. Wood for services of Deputy Judge of the County Court of the county of Perth from the 1st November (1886) to the 13th January (1887). Order in Council. $397 84

Mr. TROW. Will the hon. gentleman give some explanation in reference to that?

Mr. THOMPSON. The fact is that the county court judge obtained leave of absence and sent in his resignation, to take effect when his leave would terminate; and this is for the salary of the deputy judge between the time the judge got leave of absence and the time his resignation took effect.

House of Commons, salaries $4,800

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What additional sessional messengers are employed, and who are they?

Mr. SPEAKER. When I assumed the duties of Speaker, I found several employes extra. On enquiry, it was represented to me by the Sergeant-at-Arms and the employes who have charge of that department, that the work had increased very much on account of the increase in the number of members and the large increase of correspondence, &c., and that it was usual to appoint extra messengers. I thought it would be better to make them permanent sessional messengers, to be paid out of the regular fund, so that the House would know exactly the number employed. The same explanation applies to the pages. Every member knows that the work performed by these boys is very arduous. The pages are also necessary for the service of the Press gallery and the Hansard staff, and I recommended to the Internal Commission to have them placed on the permanent staff.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many messengers are there altogether?

Mr. SPEAKER. 45; the number before was 39 permanent, but the number actually employed was 45.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How many extra clerks are there compared with last year?

Mr. SPEAKER. I could not say what number were employed last year, but the same number are employed this year. No additional amount is asked for that service.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then, Mr. Speaker will see that there has been no saving. We have the same number of extra sessional clerks as before. We require the same expenditure to meet that, and we have eight more permanent messengers than we had before.

Mr. SPEAKER. These permanent employes only replace some who were employed temporarily. They were paid out of contingencies. There is no increase in the amount necessary for the service.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then there is a corresponding diminution in the number of extra messengers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear; that is so. They are only put in another form.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I understood the Speaker to say that there was an increase, but not a material one.

Mr. SPEAKER. There is an increase in the number of permanent sessional messengers. There is no increase in the number of clerks, but only in the permanent messengers and charwomen, and these were already employed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No one would object to the increase for the pages, because we know that they are fully employed. I have only been here some four or five years, but it seems to me that we have four or five times as many messengers as are required. No doubt they are desirous to discharge their duties, but, when we have forty-five men in the room downstairs as messengers of this House—that is a messenger for every five members of the House—and making allowance for those who are required for the service of special officers, my experience is, as the experience of every member who has spoken is, that there are three times as many employed as are required.

Mr. SPEAKER. If the forty-five messengers were in that room below, it would be found that the room was not large enough for them, but it must be remembered that at every door of this Chamber there must be a messenger, there must be a messenger attached to the clerk's office, two are employed in the reading room, there is another for myself, and a couple of servants are employed there, and there is a messenger for the accountant for doing the bank business; and I can tell the hon. member that there are not too many, because hardly twelve of them are left to perform the outside messages for the members. I think the members would find it rather hard if, when they wanted a messenger to be sent to the city on their business, there was no messenger to be found.

Extra service by members of the Civil Service in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and in the Department of the Secretary of State...$127

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This vote is for clerks employed in preparing electoral lists who could not be paid by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery as they were members of the Civil Service. The pressure was so great that clerks in other Departments were utilised, and the only way in which they could be paid was by naming them here.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

House again resolved itself into Committee of Supply.

Library of Parliament.....$1,815

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What work is this of Mr. Barthe of which we are asked to pay for fifty copies?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is the Souvenir d'un demi-siècle, by Mr. Barthe, who was a member years ago, the brother of the one who was here eight or ten years ago. It is a work which we considered we should have for exchanges.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the nature of it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is his souvenirs of the history of Canada for half a century.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which half of the century is it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I think it comes up to about ten years ago, or thereabouts. I am not quite sure.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is rather a large price to pay for a work of that kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask whether, in our exchanges from the United States, England, France, and so on, we receive anything but public documents. Do we receive exchanges of literary or historical works published in those countries?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I am not sure, but I remember that we have received from France a number of books that were not public documents.

Expenditure under Franchise Act.....$150,000

Mr. JONES. Is that for the revising barristers?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is for the Franchise Act; for the whole revision of the franchise, the revising barristers and the clerks, and everything of that kind.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We ought to know, surely, what the amount is going to be. The Government must have made up their minds what amount is to be paid to the several judges and other officers who acted as revising barristers. We see payments on account of $200, $400 and $500, as the case may be, for one or more constituencies; but, now that you are coming down for an amount of $150,000, the House is fully entitled to know what actual allowance has been made to these gentlemen for their labors.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It has not been finally settled.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think it ought to be settled. More than a year has elapsed since these gentlemen began their labors, and surely in that time the Government could make up their minds as to what is to be paid to them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that, on concurrence, we will give the information. The matter was, to a certain extent, tentative, as the hon. gentleman knows, down to the period to the elections. It was important to see its working a little before we finally decided what the remuneration of these parties should be. I quite admit the force of what the hon. gentleman says, and I think we will be able, to-morrow, to give the information he asks for.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think it is absolutely necessary that the Government should give the House this information. The hon. gentleman was not here when the Franchise Bill was introduced, but at that time there was a provision made, and a resolution was on the paper, providing what the salaries should be. The Prime Minister, who had charge of the Bill, abandoned that clause, and said he would make provision in the Estimates. When the Estimates came down he said it would not be necessary to make provision for that year. Then, last year we made a motion for this information, and it was promised by the Secretary of State and others. When the Session came to a close a certain sum was asked for, and we were told the Government had not made up their minds as to what the exact cost would be. Now, this is the third Session from the time the Bill was carried, and the hon. gentleman will see that this House would be altogether wanting to its duty to itself and country if it made any further appropriation without knowing what the actual cost for the year was going to be.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are not asking for any further appropriation. This is to cover a Governor General's warrant for money that has already been appropriated in that way.

Mr. MILLS. There are $50,000 in addition to the Governor General's warrant.

Mr. JONES. Have the Government before them any claims sent in by the returning officers that were made by the revising barristers for furnishing lists during the late elections?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. I presume they will amount to a very considerable sum?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Nothing more than will be covered by this amount.

Mr. JONES. This amount, I understand, the hon. gentleman has already paid out.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, I did not say that.

Mr. JONES. Then the Governor General's warrant was taken for money that was not required?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Governor General's warrant was $100,000 and this is $50,000 additional.

Mr. JONES. Is it contemplated to pay the revising barristers' accounts which have been sent in for furnishing the electoral lists to the returning officers? In the county of Halifax I have a copy of the bill the revising barrister charged to the returning officer for furnishing the electoral lists, which bill is $174.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Bills are not necessarily paid because they are sent in. They are all being revised, and a scale will be adopted which, I hope, to be able to lay before the House to-morrow.

Mr. JONES. I may remark that if such an account as this is sent in from every riding in the Dominion, the total amount will be a very large sum.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Halifax is an extravagant place.

Mr. JONES. I think the hon. gentleman has found it so sometimes.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think the matter is of sufficient importance to entitle the House to some statement so that we may discuss the principle on which the Government proposes to go in paying these officers.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have said that, to-morrow, I will bring that before the House.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman knows that on some lists there may be only 2,000 or 3,000 voters, in other counties the number may come up to 9,000 or 10,000 voters; and the labor and work required of the returning officer in a large county may be three or four times as great as that required in a smaller county. The Government should be prepared to regulate their scale of payment according to the work performed.

Mr. McMULLEN. We ought to have some understanding in regard to the amount that is going to be paid. Three different Sessions this question has been before the House. When the Bill was introduced, we stated on this side that we thought the operations of the Franchise Act would cost the country $350,000 or $400,000. Hon. gentlemen opposite appeared to pooh-pooh the idea, and ridicule the Opposition for making such an erroneous estimate of the probable cost. Now, the thing has been up Session after Session, and I think before this item passes, we should have some distinct understanding as to the amount it is going to cost each constituency in the whole country.

Arts, agriculture, and statistics.....$151,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. To pay C. C. Chipman for special service in connection with the Colonial and Indian Exhibition, $1,000—I may say that Mr. Chipman is the accountant of the High Commissioner's office in London. He was appointed accountant of the exhibition, and there was not a single shilling paid out in London in connection with the exhibition which did not come under his close personal supervision. A great deal of time was necessarily occupied from early morning until late at night, during which time Mr. Chipman was assiduously engaged in the discharge of these duties. The exhibition was very large, and in order to keep it under proper control, I arranged that not one single shilling should be paid for any service in connection with the expenditure that did not pass through his hands, and that did not have his personal scrutiny. When it became necessary for me to leave the exhibition and come out to this country in connection with the proposed Imperial Institute, Mr. Chipman was charged, in addition to these duties, with the general oversight and management of the exhibition, and those duties were performed in a very painstaking and admirable manner; so much so that I found upon my return that everything had gone smoothly with all the employés, with a great number of exhibitors, and with all the officials connected with the Department in London. I cannot speak too highly of his devotion to the public service in connection with this work, or the ability that he evinced in discharging his duties.

Mr. JONES. What is his salary in the Department?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. About $2,200 altogether. I felt, therefore, warranted in asking the House under the circumstances to vote a bonus, as it were, of $1,000 for his special services. I am quite certain any hon. gentleman who had an opportunity of visiting the exhibition—and there were a great many public men and exhibitors who observed what had been done—would bear testimony to the zeal, assiduity and ability evidenced in the performance of those duties.

Mr. McMULLEN. Did he draw the double salary?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He was still accountant, and an assistant under his direction was engaged in carrying on the duties in the High Commissioner's office; but he was responsible as regards those duties because he had to supervise them.
SIR CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the item, further amount required for the Colonial Exhibition (Governor General's warrant) $125,000, I would ask what was the original sum voted?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not remember the sum voted. Of course the expenditure has been a very large one. It would have been impossible to have had Canada represented on so large a scale, and so efficiently, without a very large outlay. The expenditure in Canada was $85,493.84. There is estimated as the amount to complete the expenditure in Canada: freight, $56,500, and miscellaneous amounts, $5,000—in all $61,500. That will make $146,999.94 of expenditure in Canada. Of that sum $40,000 represents freight to London, and $16,500 return freight; in all $56,500. The expenditure in London amounted in all to $116,469.90, and there are no outstanding accounts; every shilling of expenditure there has been paid and the accounts have been closed. The total expenditure in connection with the exhibition in Canada, for freight there and back and in London, was $263,463.84.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That is by far the largest expenditure ever made at any exhibition, larger than that at Philadelphia.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I observe that in the Estimates for 1886-87 only $60,000 were asked. So it appears that the expenditures have been very largely in excess of the sum appropriated.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There was a very large amount appropriated before that vote.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In any case it is evident there has been a very large under-valuation, because last year Parliament was only asked for $60,000 and now in addition it is asked for $115,000. In fact $125,000 has been expended under Governor General's warrants. It may have been very well laid out; I am not going to gainsay that. So far as I have heard it has produced good results; but it is very objectionable that when the Estimates only show $60,000 as having been applied for, $125,000 are now required; a fact which shows very considerable lack of proper information on the part of the officer who, last year, prepared the Estimates. If the hon. gentleman will look back at the Estimates he will see that that was the amount asked last year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not at all surprised that the hon. gentleman considers the amount large; it is a very large amount. Of course, I cannot speak particularly with respect to the expenditure in Canada. I have no doubt the Minister of Agriculture adopted every means in his power to limit it as far as possible; but I can speak with respect to the expenditure in London, and I have no hesitation in saying that the closest attention was paid to the outlay made there, and that we succeeded in obtaining results greater than any colony obtained, and we did so at a much lower cost.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the hon. gentleman know what the Australian colonies spent, individually and collectively?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not know. But for the decorations of the court those colonies employed very eminent men in London, and we took tenders and had the work quite as well done at a very small cost. Every means we could adopt to economise in expenditures were used, and I had an opportunity of knowing while the matter was in progress what others were paying for similar work and what we were paying, and we got our work performed at a very much smaller cost than they did. It must not be forgotten that Canada occupied in the exposition space as great or greater than the whole of the Australian colonies, and the display was one which, from the very nature of things and from the principle adopted, must entail a very large expense. The policy adopted was to invite manufacturers in Canada to send exhibits to England, and the Government undertook to send them there and bring them back. The reason why the cost of return freight has been so very much less than the cost of sending it there was, that a very large number of sales were effected and consequently there were not nearly so many goods to bring back. In arranging for the freight, means were concerted between the Minister of Agriculture here and myself in London to reduce the charges of sending them and placing them in the exhibition, and that was done at a very much lower rate than at one time it was thought possible to obtain.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The appropriation asked for by the hon. Minister of Finance, and which has already been made by Governor General's warrant, ought to have been asked for twelve months ago. The hon. gentleman has given no information as to how the Government have spent so very large a sum in excess to that asked. Some one has been at fault, some one has miscalculated, either the Minister of Agriculture or some other hon. gentleman connected with the Government, for it is clear that the Government have spent three or four times more than what they asked from Parliament, and estimated at the time the expenditure was contemplated. The hon. gentleman has given no information with regard to that matter. He has not given any justification for the course the Government have adopted in expending three or four times as much as they asked from Parliament twelve months ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was quite impossible in the nature of things to arrive at any approximate estimate. It may have been a wrong principle to adopt, but the fact that it was adopted—the principle of inviting exhibitors to send forward their exhibits and undertaking to send them to London—rendered an approximate estimate utterly impossible. I was quite at fault myself in the estimate I made and gave to the Minister of Agriculture, because I never supposed there would be anything like the quantity of goods forwarded. Fortunately we were able, step by step, to obtain greater space until at length the space originally allotted to Canada was nearly if not quite doubled, and that was absolutely necessary, in order to be able to exhibit at all the great variety of exhibits which were sent there. I think I remember reading, with a good deal of pleasure, the statement made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), when this vote was under consideration, that Parliament would not consider so much the amount expended as they would the value which they received for it; and I think I may congratulate the House and the country upon that exhibition having been of very great value to Canada, and having placed the extent and resources of this country before the British public—before visitors from India and the Australian colonies, and the outlying portions of the Empire, and of the continent of Europe—in a much stronger and more favorable light than ever before. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) says that this expenditure largely exceeds that of any exhibition which ever took place before. That is true, but I think I may say that just to the extent to which it exceeds any previous exhibition in the amount expended, it has also given to the country valuable results in proportion.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would like to enquire if the hon. gentleman knows how it came about, or if it did come about—because I can only say it was so stated to me—that there was some mistake in the matter of our exhibit of cheese, which is a most valuable portion of our agricultural product; that it was not displayed as prominently or in as good order as might be desired, at all events in the earlier portion of the exhibition.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That matter was brought under my attention, but I confess I was much surprised to see any such statements made. The fact is when the exhibition opened, a very large exhibit of cheese which had been sent forward by, I think, the Dairymen's Association of Ontario, had not arrived, but there was a gentleman there from Ontario who had himself an admirable cheese exhibit—cheese of immense size and a great variety of cheese—and it attracted the greatest amount of attention, and admirably and perfectly represented that department as far as the Canadian court was concerned. Some time subsequently, after the exhibition was opened, when there was great difficulty in obtaining space, the two gentlemen in charge of the exhibit arrived, and they were anxious to have a large space allotted to them. The cheese had in the meantime arrived, and I appropriated as large a space as I possibly could for the purpose. Subsequently, however, they decided that they would store the cheese and exhibit it at a later period of the season. The weather at that time was very hot; they said the cheese could not remain there very long without being removed, and they themselves made this proposal. I may say that I received a very kind and courteous letter from those gentlemen, thanking me very much for the manner in which I met them and endeavored to carry out their views and intentions. I may say further, that, I think in connection with the Government of Ontario, later on, when the weather was cooler, a large exhibit of cheese was sent forward, and, in fact, a market was opened and cheese was sold in large quantities by these gentlemen, who have also testified to the very thorough and efficient means that have been taken to put before the visitors at the exhibition the dairy products of Canada. So that I think my hon. friend will find on close examination, that there is no ground for a charge as to any failure having occurred in putting the great cheese resources of Canada most thoroughly before the visitors to the exhibition.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to hear that because, as the hon. gentleman knows, the statement was made, and it would be a great misfortune if anything of the kind had happened. There is another matter as to which I should like to get some information from the hon. gentleman; and here again, not having been on the spot, I can merely call the attention of the House and of the hon. gentleman to the statements which have been made. I do not pledge myself for them, but I was informed that, at the time when an attempt was being made to boom the enterprise of colonising or selling the Island of Anticosti, a large number of fruits, purporting to come from Anticosti, had been in some way smuggled into the exhibition, and were attempted to be exhibited as the actual products of the soil. I would ask if that matter was brought under the hon. gentleman's attention?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was brought very fully and prominently under my attention. The facts were these: a gentleman who was engaged in disposing of the Island of Anticosti, and who made very large proposals to the British public in that connection, applied to me to be allowed to make an exhibit of products from the Island of Anticosti, and I assigned a particular locality in the exhibition to him for that purpose. When these things were exhibited the fact of their having been the product of the Island of Anticosti was challenged. There were bears and dogs and birds of various kinds, timber of various kinds, and vegetables which appeared to be the growth of a very rich and luxuriant soil, and which would indicate a very favorable climate. I told the proprietor of the island that the statement was made that these articles had not been grown on the island, and that it would be necessary for me either to have authentic evidence placed before me of the fact that they were grown on the island, or they would require to be removed. I may say that I did not permit any of the products of the Island of Anticosti to be exhibited in connection with the agricultural trophy, where the exhibits were made of the other portions of Canada. All I can say is that all the testimony that anyone could require was furnished to me—the testimony of the parties who had raised these articles, the testimony of the captains of the vessels that had brought them to Quebec, and the testimony of the officials of Quebec who had received them, so that I was quite overborne by the testimony furnished that these products were the veritable products of Anticosti. Although I was not in a position to exclude those articles, I took very good care not to be, in the slightest degree, committed to any statements which were made by the proprietor of Anticosti, or of the persons who were endeavoring to effect its sale. When I was applied to, as Executive Commissioner of Canada, to know if the statements they put forward in the prospectus were true, my answer was invariably that I had no information which would enable me to confirm those statements, and I think the hon. gentleman will say that that was about as far as it was possible for me to go.

Mr. TROW. Having had an opportunity of seeing the exhibition, I think the arrangements were all properly made, with the exception of those with regard to the article of cheese, which has just been mentioned. I had the pleasure of meeting the gentleman who had charge of the cheese exhibit from Ontario—Mr. Ballantyne—and he told me that he was not properly treated by the parties who took charge of the exhibition; that he had not sufficient space, and that, consequently, owing to the small space allotted him, he refused to cramp up the exhibits in such a manner that they would not be shown properly. The result was that they were not shown until quite late in the season, so that he lost a very favorable opportunity to dispose of his allotment, and he had to dispose of it at a disadvantage.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have already stated that Mr. Ballantyne had not arrived until after the opening of the exhibition, and when he did arrive there was not a single cheese under his charge in England. When the exhibition was opened and the space allotted, it was occupied by a large and most admirable exhibit of cheese made by another gentleman, Mr. Miller, of Ingersoll. Mr. Ballantyne complained very much of this space having been allotted to a gentleman who, he said, was not a producer of cheese; and I told him that in the absence of any person representing a cheese exhibit, and in the absence of a single cheese from Canada, I was only too delighted to give this space to the gentleman who had such a fine exhibit of cheese. Mr. Miller made arrangements with the largest vendors of cheese in England to take his cheese. Messrs. Spiers and Pond had Canadian cheese in all their restaurants, and in fact took measures by which Canadian cheese was brought into great prominence. I can show my hon. friend or lay on the Table Mr. Ballantyne's letter to me, thanking me for the kindness and courtesy with which he had been treated, and stated that he had himself decided not to make his exhibit until later in the season. These explanations, I think, ought to relieve me from any charge of discourtesy or want of attention to Mr. Ballantyne. When his cheese arrived, the exhibition was greatly crowded, and I had not succeeded in obtaining the large additional space from the arts department which I afterwards obtained, and which relieved us very much; but I at once placed at his disposal a large space at one of the most conspicuous points in the exhibition, near the agricultural trophy. There was another gentleman—Mr. Robertson—sent over under the auspices of the Government of Ontario, who was delighted with the attention he received, and who has also borne testimony to the facilities which were placed at his disposal.

Mr. TROW. I was informed on the spot that the cheese which came from Ingersoll was sent over for sale and not for exhibition, but that Mr. Ballantyne's was sent expressly for exhibition, and that arrangements were made for that purpose prior to its removal from Canada, but there was some little delay en route—the boat did not arrive at Liverpool until a week or ten days later than she was expected; and consequently Mr. Ballantyne lost the opportunity of exhibiting the best sample of cheese in the Dominion.

Mr. ELLIS. I observe in one of the official blue-books of the Province of New Brunswick a complaint made by the agent of that Province, as follows:—

"The unfortunate mistake of employing a number of English attendants throughout the Canadian section, as well as in the offices, led to much confusion. The suppression of all the names of the active commissioners, agents and representatives from the catalogue and all other literature, as well as the omission to have distinctive badges worn by those in charge of the various sections, materially interfered with the commercial work of the exhibition.

"Many excellent openings for business were lost through enquirers being officially referred to the scientific in preference to the practical representatives. While this may have been the means of securing imperial honors for the former, it certainly did not advance the commercial interests of Canada."

I was not at the exhibition, and I do not know to what extent Mr. Cornwall's complaint is justified, but the Province of New Brunswick is of sufficient importance to have attention called to this subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I think it was unfortunate that the hon. Minister should have yielded to the solicitations of the speculators, who endeavored to float their Anticosti scheme in the English market, to give them room in the exhibition. I had not the opportunity of being there myself, but a number of Prince Edward Islanders who were there brought home a copy of the prospectus issued by those speculators, setting forth the advantages of the Island of Anticosti as an agricultural district. It was perfectly ludicrous and absurd. The most exaggerated and deceptive statements I ever read in my life were contained in this circular. Those who know anything of the Island of Anticosti could not believe it possible that honest or sane men should publish such absurd and exaggerated lies as were published in that prospectus; and the several gentlemen to whom I refer told me that the exhibit made there under the ægis of Canada and of her commissioner was very much calculated to mislead any intending investors. I regret extremely that while the commissioner thought fit to give a separate exhibition to the Island of Anticosti, and thus lent the great name of Canada to what might have resulted—I hope it has not—in deceiving a large number of the English people, he did not carry out to some extent the same arrangement with some of the Provinces. The Maritime Provinces exhibits were mixed up with those of the rest of Canada. There was no separate exhibit from Prince Edward Island, or from Nova Scotia or from New Brunswick. No one could form the slightest idea, from visiting the Canadian exhibition, that there were such places in Canada at all as New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Hon. gentlemen from Ontario seem to think that is great fun; but it was very desirable, I think, that Provinces forming a distinct and separate group, as those Provinces do, should be in some way grouped together in the exhibition, so that the special advantages they offer to intending immigrants possessing a reasonable amount of capital might be brought before the English public. That is one of the great benefits we hoped to derive from this exhibition, and, so far as the Maritime Provinces are concerned, from the mixing up of the exhibits of all three Provinces with those of the rest of Canada, those advantages were lost. But I do hope and trust that in any future exhibition we will not take the Island of Anticosti under our wing, and I hope the hon. Minister took every opportunity he had of pointing out to intending English investors the inaccuracies, to say the least, of this prospectus, which I have no doubt he saw.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I cannot add anything to what I have already stated, and that is, that I went as far I dared to go. I had no information with reference to the Island of Anticosti further than my recollection of our having in this Parliament occasionally to send aid to keep the people of the Island of Anticosti from starving. I gave no countenance to the scheme whatever. When parties applied to me, I said I had no information to corroborate the statements. But I may say that the parties who became subscribers on the representation of this prospectus—as the whole thing was attacked in the press very vigorously, and represented to be a great fraud—sent out an experienced English farmer and another gentleman to this country to investigate it. They were associated with Mr. A. L. Light, civil engineer, who it was said was nominated by the Lieutenant Governor of New Brunswick, Sir Leonard Tilley, at the request of the proposed company. Those gentlemen visited the Island of Anticosti, and they went back in the same steamer with me, and I was greatly astonished at the extent to which the gentlemen sent out to investigate the statements made corroborated them. Mr. Light made a very favorable report of the Island of Anticosti, and one of the English gentlemen purposely sent out by the parties proposing to take stock in the enterprise, made a very favorable report also, and assured me that he was not at all disappointed with the result of his personal investigation, comparing it with the prospectus which he had in his hand. So that my hon. friend will see it would not have been very well for me to go very much further. It was a very significant suggestion, when I stated that, representing Canada as I did, I had no information to enable me to corroborate any of those statements.

Mr. SHANLY. I desire to say a few words with regard to this much abused island. I feel satisfied there is no reason at all why the products which were exhibited in London should not have grown in Anticosti. I have seen products from there that would really surprise many an Ontario farmer. At the same time, I must say that the condemnation of the hon. member for P.E.I. (Mr. Davies) of the prospectus referred to is not one bit too severe. It was what I do not hesitate to call a swindling prospectus, but I say, also, that I know and believe the island can produce root crops of extraordinary growth. The island will absolutely, however, remain forever what it has always been—a desert. The reason is, it is one of those shelving limestone coasts without a safe harbor. The island has ever had a bad name for having caused more wrecks and the loss of more brave seamen's lives than any other of our coasts, because of its utter inaccessibility. Notwithstanding this, I repeat that the products grown there, though they may have been pet products raised for a certain purpose, it is perfectly certain could have been so raised.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have heard a good deal about Anticosti, and, perhaps, know as much about it as any person in this House. I had the honor of having it under my supervision in connection with the marine service for a number of years, and what the hon. member for Grenville (Mr. Shanly) has stated about the danger of its coasts, I can corroborate. It is a place that has made more graves for seamen than any other part of our coast. I know nothing about the products exhibited, I was not at the exhibition myself, and, therefore, cannot speak of them; but from what knowledge I have acquired, through a series of years,

I am satisfied that some portions of the island are susceptible of producing first-class roots, and, in some cases, very good cereals of the coarser kind. That it will ever become a favorable place for settlement, I do not believe. As to the prospectus, I know nothing. I considered it an extraordinary affair, and did not take much stock in it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Did the hon. gentleman take any stock in it?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, I did take a good deal of stock in it for seven or eight years, while I had it under my supervision, as Minister of Marine, and had every year to send aid to the island to keep the population from starving at times; but, notwithstanding that, the condemnation of the gentlemen connected with that island is too extensive. There is a great deal to be done with the island, but I admit there are great difficulties in the way. That it is susceptible of affording good living to agriculturists is quite true, but there is another reason which, in my opinion, will always prevent it being a favorable place for settlement: the difficulty of communication, the isolated position in which it stands, the absence of fixed communication with the mainland, must be a great drawback, as well as the absence of good, safe ports by which steamers can approach the island and carry on trade. The hon. the Finance Minister has stated that every economy was exercised in connection with that exhibition. Perhaps it was. I am not going to vouch, from personal knowledge, for anything to the contrary; but I will say that, in connection with the transport of goods, I heard frequent complaints while the transport was going on. I believe the arrangements in relation to chartering steamers to carry those goods were not either of the most judicious or of the most economical character. Who was to blame, I know not; but I know several merchants of Montreal complained they were not dealt with fairly in tendering for it. One, at least, of the vessels that were taken up, I am informed, and I do not vouch for the accuracy of this information, was detained a whole month after being loaded, for some reason I cannot explain. The Finance Minister has referred in very glowing terms to the great advantages which this exhibition has given to Canada. I have no doubt the exhibition has been of benefit to Canada, but whether it has benefited us to the extent of over $250,000 is another question. My own opinion is it has not. However, I will not take up time discussing that question because the thing is done, but I think a government which comes down and asks for $50,000 for a service, and then allows the expense to run up to $265,000, either has been utterly neglectful of its duties or careless in preparing the estimates; and I do not think the people, if this House had been told this service would have cost so much, would have approved our entering into any such speculation.

Mr. McMULLEN. I find the entire cost of this exhibition has been $263,000. I find that we have paid for freight on goods $40,000 and $15,000 returning. I would like to know how it is this discrepancy exists. Is it a fact that people shipped goods for the purpose of selling them and got their freight paid by the Government?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Hear, hear.

Mr. McMULLEN. We have no objection whatever to any person sending over a superior article for the purpose of exhibition and being allowed the freight; but if, on the other hand, men take advantage of the exhibition for the purpose of securing free carriage of their products, it is right we should know it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is a fact and a very important fact.

Mr. McMULLEN. I quite agree in the remarks of the hon. member for Northumberland. I think this matter has been exceedingly costly, and we should have some explanation with regard to the expenditure we are asking now to quietly consent to.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I would like to go back to the last item and correct the price of Mr. Barthe's work, it should be $1.50 instead of $11.50 which reduces the amount from $875 to $375.

To pay owners of cattle for animals killed to prevent the spread of pleuro-pneumonia.....$39,256 41

Mr. JONES. Will the Minister of Agriculture be good enough to inform me whether the Government have considered the claim of Mr. Clark, of Tatamagouche, for cattle which he was feeding and keeping there when they were taken charge of by the Department of Agriculture, and were not killed at the time? Mr. Clark, it will be remembered, thought a larger amount ought to have been awarded him.

Mr. CARLING. It has been referred to Mr. McEachren for a further report, and I may be able to give it to the hon. gentleman to-morrow. I will try to do so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to know whether these damages were paid under the express provision of the statute, whether these parties were responsible for the disease being among their cattle or not, because, if they were, the provision in the Act is that they are not entitled to compensation.

Mr. CARLING. These cattle were slaughtered on suspicion that they had disease, and Mr. McEachren, the veterinary, who had charge of the station, recommended that they should be slaughtered.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where was this done?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. At Point Levis.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Entirely?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Gratuity to C. S. Neville, late a messenger in the Department of Railways and Canals, on his leaving the service.....$383 33

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the circumstances connected with this?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am instructed by the Minister of Justice that Mr. Neville's health suffered from indoor employment, and on a medical certificate he was allowed to leave the service and receive a gratuity.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long has he been in the service?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I know that he had been in for a number of years. He was there all the time I was in that Department.

Mr. McMULLEN. What salary did he receive while he was in?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He went in at a low salary as a boy, and his salary was not high when he left.

Mr. MILLS. It could not be as high as a messenger, but it would be satisfactory to tell us the age of the party, and the length of his service.

Militia.....$2,400

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like some explanation about the first item in this: "to pay C. Campbell, second-class clerk, Department of Militia and Defence for services—compilation of correspondence and précis on the defences of Canada (prior to 1st July, 1886), $1,000." I do not suppose that Mr. Campbell can have contributed any valuable military lore to the Department as to the defence of Canada. I suppose it was only simple clerical work, and for that the allowance of $1,000 is rather large. Under what circumstance does the Minister recommend this vote to us?

Mr. McMULLEN.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I think that no more valuable contribution has been made on a very important question than the work now before the House. Mr. Campbell is a retired officer of the British navy. The compilation which he has worked up is one taken from papers which were in the home office in England, from papers in Halifax, from all the reports made to the Department of Militia at different times upon the defences of Canada, and it is also a compilation of all the despatches exchanged between the Imperial Government and the Canadian Government upon that question. I believe that no other person but one who had the peculiar knowledge Mr. Campbell possesses to a very great degree could work up this book as he has done. It is a book of very great importance, and he has spent several months—I am not sure if it was not nearly eighteen months—in working up that book from the different records and dockets. It is a book of very considerable importance to the Department, condensing the contents of fifteen or sixteen volumes. Knowing the importance of the work and the time which he gave to its compilation, I thought I was quite justified in recommending to Council to pay him the amount which appears in the Estimates. It is a confidential report which naturally cannot be placed on the Table of the House, containing, as it does, all the history of the defences of Canada, and other matters which cannot be reported, but which are considered very important and very valuable to the Department of Militia.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are Mr. Campbell's present duties, his ordinary duties?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He is a second-class clerk in the office of the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, and is in charge of a very important branch of the correspondence, which is increasing every day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. Minister will observe that, without disputing the value of the gentleman's information or the value of the confidential memoir, as I take it, which he has composed, the practice of paying our own officers large additional sums for extra work is not one which it is very desirable to encourage. What is the total salary of this gentleman, irrespective of this grant?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He receives now $1,250 per annum, and I must again repeat what I have already stated, that this is the work of a specialist, requiring special qualifications, which Mr. Campbell possesses.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman will see that any grant of this kind, in his Department or in any other Department, is looked upon as establishing a precedent that, if the head of the Department assigns to any man a special bit of work, that man is to be entitled to receive extra pay for it at a very high rate; and very special abuses may creep in and have crept in under votes such as these. In past years, we have found a number of gentlemen—I think in the Railway Department—who have practically doubled their salaries by working extra hours, and have got better pay for their extra hours than they did for their work during their ordinary hours. If this sort of thing is to be allowed to creep in, the whole of the Departments will be disorganised. I do not know anything in regard to this particular work, and it appears that we cannot know anything, but, of course, I accept the hon. gentleman's explanation that the work is valuable to the Department.

Mr. McMULLEN. On page 17 of the Auditor General's accounts for this year, there is a list of names of civil servants who have received the pay of two different offices. There are over 150 civil servants who have been paid for double services during last year, in some cases $300, $550 and even as high as $800. I think it is time this system was put a stop to. If the country is hiring a man and paying him a respectable salary for the work he performs, he should not be led to understand that he is going to get any addition in the way of a gratuity which is paid him at the good pleasure of the Minister in whose Department he serves.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has this compilation been printed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. We had only a very limited number struck off, and they are all marked "confidential." It is not a work that could be placed before the public in the interests of the service. It contains, as I have already stated, a history of all the defences of Canada, and the projected defences of Canada, and I do not think it would be at all in the interest of the service to make of it a document that could be circulated, and that might possibly travel out of Canada and be used outside of Canada.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It seems that what Mr. Campbell has done is simply to make a compilation of documents that are in possession of the Department, and that might be of service to the Government in case of hostilities. The hon. gentleman says this is a work that, although printed, cannot be published. It is a confidential work.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Very confidential.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Well, would it not have been well, before coming to Parliament to ask for an appropriation for undertaking this confidential compilation, that the hon. gentleman should have put it in the power of the House, either before a confidential commissioner or in some other way, to judge of the propriety of the compilation and of the amount that Mr. Campbell is entitled to?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I will let the hon. gentleman see what it is, and I think he will be astonished at the compilation.

Mr. CHARLTON. Where was that confidential compilation printed?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. By the Queen's Printers, I think.

Mr. MALLORY. How long was this gentleman engaged in the compilation.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not quite sure, but I think it was for eighteen months. He worked after office hours, sometimes even till midnight. I am quite certain that the amount now asked for is certainly not too much.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think that the system is extremely vicious. A clerk who has some copy and who undertakes the work of a specialist in a compilation of this sort, and who sits up late hours, so far disqualifies himself for the ordinary duties he is paid to perform. Besides that, while I am not complaining that the hon. gentleman proposes to compensate Mr. Campbell—for I suppose he encouraged him to go on with this work—it does not seem, from the hon. gentleman's statement, that Mr. Campbell has compiled anything that was not accessible to any hon. gentleman.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No, it was not accessible.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman knows that not only the Department but the public have the reports of Colonel Jarvis and of General Mitchell and others, with regard to the defences of this country.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Quite true, but several of these reports were asked for by Parliament and were always refused, because it was not considered consistent with the interest of the service to bring them down.

Mr. MITCHELL. A gratuity of two years' pay to Lieut. Col. W. T. Baird, $1,400—is he any relation to the gentleman who sits for Queen's, N.B.?

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask whether the Government cannot reconsider their decision with reference to

Col. Milson. The Minister of Finance is aware that Col. Milson entered the service of Nova Scotia previous to the Union. He left the Imperial service with the expectation, if not with the understanding, that his position thereafter was to be permanent. After a certain number of years, at the time of the Union, he was transferred to the service of the Dominion, and in the course of time his services were dispensed with, leaving him an old man, now practically without any means of support. I think he was engaged by the Finance Minister when that hon. gentleman was Premier of the Province, and I trust it is not too late to do something for him. Others have been cared for by the Dominion when they became unable to perform their services any longer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I called the attention of the Minister of Militia on more than one occasion to Col. Milson, and expressed my great desire that anything consistent with a due regard to public economy which characterises this Administration, should be done.

Mr. JONES. Was he not entitled to a pension?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No, he was not entitled to it, as otherwise he would have received it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I asked a question a moment ago. It seems to be the fashion not to answer the questions I ask. I propose to-night to get every question I ask answered, if I can. I want to know whether Mr. Baird, whose name is here, is a brother, or is any relation of the gentleman whose seat for Queen's was questioned for some time in this House?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can tell the hon. gentleman that my Department being a non-political Department, I have not been able to trace any relation between an employé of my Department and the gentleman who sits for Queen's. I did not take up the question from that standpoint. I do not know whether he is a brother, or a cousin or nephew of the gentleman who sits for Queen's.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is about as much information as I generally get. I rather take exception to the Minister of War's statement that his Department is non-political. I think there is a good deal of politics in it, notwithstanding the hon. gentleman's declaration.

Canadian Pacific Railway, British Columbia section. $40,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this for Mr. Onderdonk?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. A part of it. Of that sum, $12,013 is to pay Mr. Onderdonk for repairs of damages caused by storms and freshets, and the balance is for setting up the wharf at Port Moody on iron piles, and for land surveys.

Mr. McMULLEN. I noticed that Mr. Onderdonk got some $21,000 for building six stations on that portion of the road. I would like to know if there was any tender advertised for, or how it was that he got the building of those stations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the information to the hon. gentleman.

Mr. CHARLTON. I desire to obtain information as to the length of the wharf where the iron piers were used, and the depth of the water.

Mr. MULLOCK. Was the work for which $20,000 was charged done under tender?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not able to state; it was done since I left the Department. I will obtain the information for the hon. gentleman and lay it on the Table.

Mr. MILLS. How did the obligation arise?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think it arose from having undertaken, in the first instance, to build the pier with wood, and it was found necessary, owing to the wood being destroyed by a special worm, to resort to iron piling in order to keep up the wharf. The water is very deep there. The ships from England that brought the rails discharged at the wharf.

Mr. MULOCK. I hope that when the Minister of Finance brings the information, he will also bring any contract or document bearing on the matter, and until that is done the Committee should not be called upon to vote the item. It may be that in trying to do away with the evil effects of one worm, we are encouraging a much more injurious one in the person of Mr. Onderdonk and those connected with him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I promise before concurrence to lay on the Table of the House the information asked for, and I hope at this period of the Session that hon. gentlemen opposite will be satisfied with that.

Mr. MULOCK. I would be very glad to consent, but last year we had the very same experience, and it was a most unfortunate one, and it happened in regard to this same gentleman—Mr. Onderdonk. I do not think it is fair to call on the Committee to vote $40,000, when we have no evidence showing why we should or should not vote it. It is making a farce of voting supplies if we are called on to vote money, and on concurrence, or afterwards, ascertain that we should not have done so. I object to the passage of the item until the papers have been laid on the Table of the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think the Minister of Railways should be here when these items especially affecting his Department are being considered. No doubt in some cases the hon. gentleman who has special charge of the Estimates, having been Minister of Railways himself, is in a position to give the information to the House; but he cannot do it in reference to a great many of these new items. As he knows very well, there is no real opportunity of obtaining information unless the Minister in charge of the Department is here and prepared to give the requisite information for which the hon. gentleman has asked. This is a special case. Here is an expenditure under Governor General's warrant for $30,000. A Governor General's warrant is always supposed to have been passed after a special examination on the part of the Minister in charge of the Department, and on the ground of special urgency and importance, and Council itself makes a special examination, or is supposed to do so, into the urgency. In this case there is a double reason why we should have the information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I promised to lay the information fully on the Table of the House to-morrow, and I hope hon. gentlemen will accept that as sufficient at this period of the Session.

Mr. McMULLEN. The information I desire is in connection with the expenditures at page 195 of the Auditor General's report:—

A. Onderdonk, contract 92	$82,000 00
Removing slides between Port Moody and Savona	56,557 56
Labor and materials in connection with water service.....	7,186 74
Digging and refilling trenches, laying water pipes, constructing	7,425 85
Transport of pipes and fittings.....	865 70
Freight on 1,839 tons of rails, at $3.....	5,517 00
Labor and materials to complete 31 switches at $33.81.....	1,048 11
Stacking rails	335 28
6 station houses, at $3,500.....	21,000 00
Extra work on foundations.....	1,081 19
3 wood sheds.....	205 68

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Those items together make $178,981. Mr. Onderonk appears to be a favorite individual.

Mr. CHARLTON. It seems to me that the Minister of Railways should be present to give information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman objects I will move that the Committee rise and we will take up the Customs Bill.

Mr. CHARLTON. Perhaps at a later period of the evening the hon. gentleman might be here. At this stage of the Session it is almost impossible to have any discussion on these items at any other stage, and this is one of those items on which the House desires some information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member who previously spoke had the Auditor General's report in his hand from the first day of the Session, and yet he asks papers to be brought down at the last hour, with the effect, I will not say the purpose, of obstructing the progress of the Estimates. I do not think this is the way to facilitate the discharge of the public business.

Mr. McMULLEN. I believe many hon. members on this side of the House, out of courtesy for the Minister of Finance, have, on several occasions, consented to leave over matters with the promise of the Minister that there would be another opportunity given for discussion. We are near the close of the Session, and if we allow the present opportunity to pass there will be no other opportunity of discussing this important item.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What I object to is, not the hon. gentleman asking for papers, but that while he has had the Auditor General's report in his hand, and must have known whether he wanted the information or not, he took no steps a week or two ago to ask for it, but he has done so just now.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am quite sure that, as regards the Auditor General's report, my hon. friend will agree to accept the offer of the hon. Minister without further comment, although the enquiries must come naturally in connection with the discussion on the Onderdonk contract. In regard to the other matter of information about this particular vote, the Minister knows that members are in their rights in asking for full information. They have no opportunity of obtaining it elsewhere.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will state another reason. There are a good many items in this vote. There is another item in which I will require some information from the Minister who has charge of the Department, information which the Finance Minister cannot possibly give; and as he will not be here after the House rises, he cannot make any pledges in regard to it. That is in regard to Indiantown Branch.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will give the hon gentleman the information when we get to it. If it is not sufficient, we will endeavor to procure it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the Minister of Railways should be here to give the information. I do not think the Minister of Finance, when he casts blame on hon. gentlemen who are criticising the Estimates as they pass through, is acting properly. He says we should have asked for papers long ago, but it is the duty of the Ministers, when they come down to ask for these votes, and particularly these extraordinary votes, to be prepared to give information, and it is entirely out of place to throw the responsibility or the blame on gentlemen on this side, that they have not asked for the papers. That is my idea, at any rate.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman had, and the House had, these very items before them almost the first days of the Session; they became the subject of discussion in this House, and if the hon. gentleman wanted information as to how the money was spent, or wanted the papers, then was the time to ask for them, when they could be provided without detaining the House. I presume it would take some time now to prepare these voluminous papers and to bring them down. I contend that gentlemen have the fullest rights to criticise these votes, and to ask for all information; that I am quite willing to concede, but I think when we have had the matter before us from the first of the Session, if they wanted information they should have given the Minister an opportunity of laying it on the Table of the House, as could have been done by asking for it a month ago.

Mr. MITCHELL. We have not had that information from the opening of this Session; it was a long way on in the Session when the list of Governor General's warrants came down.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are brought down the first fifteen days of the Session.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say that is not the time to discuss these things on concurrence, but when we come to vote the money then is the time to discuss them. When a particular Minister of the Crown takes charge of these items to put them through the House, he should be fortified by the Minister having charge of these particular matters, that I think the House has a right to demand and expect. Under these circumstances, the hon. gentleman should not attempt to put the blame on gentlemen on this side, and attribute to us any neglect in not having asked for these papers. It will be charged, if we ask for the papers on every item shown by the Governor General's warrants when they come down, that we are putting the Government to expense in copying voluminous papers, and delaying the business of the House. We do not ask for voluminous papers; we want information as to what constitutes each item, and how it is made up, and the hon. gentleman in charge of the business of the House should be able to tell us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have told you.

Mr. MITCHELL. No, you haven't.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. He has told us in general terms; he has a way of rather bluffing the thing through, but he has not given us the information we have a right to expect. I say that the hon. Minister of Railways should be here to explain the things which the hon. gentleman himself may not be in a position to explain. It cannot be expected that an hon. gentleman coming here just before the election, for a special purpose, and taking charge of the most important Department in the Government—with all his great ability, and eloquence, and power—it cannot be expected that the latter qualities to which I have referred are sufficient to satisfy us if the information we have a right to demand is not given before we are asked to vote away the public money.

Mr. MULOCK. I would remind the Minister of Finance that on several occasions during the present Session hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have not only asked for the production of papers, but in many cases have obtained the order of the House for their production, without those orders being obeyed. Now, if an order of the House is disobeyed in that way, we may fairly assume that the mild request of a private member would be treated with at least equal contempt. An order of the House upon the Government to send down papers is now practically a dead letter, and before the House closes I will have occasion to illustrate wherein I think the Government has treated the House in an improper manner, with regard to papers on one very important question. At the commencement of the Session an order was issued for these papers and, although I have several times asked for them, and although the promise was made that they should be brought down, the order of the House remains unobeyed to this moment.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. What was that?

Mr. MULOCK. It was an order for a return in regard to the railway commission. I moved for that document at the commencement of the Session, the first time I could do so under the Rules of the House. I introduced a Bill affecting the railway law, and I mentioned at the time that I could not go on, and did not desire to go on, until the order in regard to the railway commission was brought down. I wished to have laid before the House the evidence up to that time taken by the commission, and to point out wherein I thought the commission was failing in its object. The Minister of Railways promised them, and after a month of time had elapsed, after I had been as patient as was reasonable, I asked him for the papers, and although he gave me a promise that they would be brought down, they have not been brought down, and the result is that the Bill did not have a second reading, although I had an opportunity several times of moving its second reading. I also take the ground which has been taken by the hon. member for Northumberland, that this is a proper time when such information should be given; that the papers should always be considered on the Table, and that they should be within reach now that they are wanted. With regard to the voting of public money, my observation leads me to this conclusion, that the House has been largely negligent of its duty in voting away vast sums of money without explanation; and when we look at the finances of the country we see the legitimate consequences of this neglect of duty by all the members of this House, irrespective of the places they occupy. There are no duties we are more bound to do honestly than to be economical in disposing of the people's taxes, and whatever the hour of the Session it may be, even if it is the last moment of the Session, I am not prepared, so far as I am concerned, to allow business to be slurred over, even if it is the wish of all of us to prorogue. We have a duty to perform and we must perform that duty.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will reserve that item.

Intercolonial Railway..... $731,895 46

Mr. MITCHELL. The same remarks apply against this item. There is some information I want with regard to this.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Will the hon. gentleman state what information he wants.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will, but you cannot give it to me. There is an item there, Indiantown Branch, $17,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We haven't come to that.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know that, but the whole of these items come together.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are dealing with a specific vote, and if the hon. gentleman wants information on that vote I shall be most happy to give any information in my power, and if I cannot, we will have to let it stand.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think we have a right to have the Minister of Railways here to give information on those items.

Mr. SHANLY. But we should take them in order.

Mr. MITCHELL. The first item is increased accommodation at St. John, $10,000. I want information—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There is an hon. gentleman behind you who has the floor.

Increased accommodation at St. John..... $10,000

Mr. ELLIS. I observed that the return of warrants laid on the table of the Public Accounts Committee there was one for increased accommodation at St. John station, $5,000, and one for $5,000, for expenditure on the erection of a wharf or the benefit of ocean traffic. Now, I live in St. John, and I can safely say there was no erection at the wharf at St.

John. This warrant was issued about the 7th of February, a short time before the elections; and while some men were employed in doing work, it certainly was not for any erection at the wharf, or for the benefit of the ocean traffic in any way.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The details furnished me of this $10,000 vote are as follows:—To complete buildings, $206.84; retaining wall, $761.80; heating apparatus, $477.50; bridge, $1,204; works in progress, $2,028; inspection, $351.73; filling in pond in centre of deep water wharf, $5,000; making a total of $10,000.

Mr. ELLIS. I think filling in a pond means a great deal more than filling in a pond.

Mr. JONES. As the hon. Minister is disposed to give information, would he be kind enough to inform us how $8,000 was expended under the Governor General's warrant on the Halifax Extension, and $7,000 on the Dartmouth Branch. I am not aware of any expenditure in the nature of permanent work having been undertaken or going on at that time in the city of Halifax. I may be wrong, but I have shrewd suspicion that this covers up some expenditure that was undertaken last February preceding the election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The expenditure of $7,000 on the Dartmouth Branch is made up to the 31st of December, 1886—in carrying on works of construction in excess of appropriation, $3,028, and to settle outstanding land claims and building bridge, $3,972. The details of the $8,000 expenditure at Halifax are: completing masonry of wall to support the track for coal shed, $479; rails for additional sidings, $480; completing buildings, $155; completing tracks, $1,960; and filling in pond at south end of dock-yard, $5,000. That is the work the hon. gentleman refers to, and in reference to that I dare say he is aware that it was made a condition of obtaining the land from the dock-yard that certain things should be done there, and this was part of that work.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When was the arrangement made?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The arrangement was made some time ago, and the work has been carried to completion.

Mr. JONES. Does the hon. gentleman think the middle of February is a desirable time to undertake earthworks?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this is rather an extraordinary statement made by the hon. gentleman. He admits that the obligation was entered into by the Government a long time ago, and yet they found the necessity for going on with the work so great that they were obliged to depart from the usual parliamentary practice and issue a Governor General's warrant for obtaining the necessary money for the purpose of filling up a pond in the winter season.

Mr. MULOCK. Was this work done in the winter season?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. What was the necessity for its being done in the winter season?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was the most convenient time for doing it, I think.

Mr. MITCHELL. If the hon. gentleman had said the most effective time, it would probably have been more accurate.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). What is the expenditure of $3,000 on the Rivière du Loup Town Branch for?

Mr. ELLIS.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is made up of the expenditure to the 31st of December, 1886, in making an addition to the wharf, $1,817; completing the work of adding to wharf, laying tracks and grading, $1,183.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Another election expenditure.

Mr. McMULLEN. What progress has been made in the construction of the Pictou Branch?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is expected to be completed in the course of the ensuing month.

Mr. JONES. Will this vote of $220,000 complete it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Indiantown Branch.....$17,000

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to know if this vote is sufficient to complete the connection between Indiantown and Farley Mills, to connect with the North-Western Railway?

Mr. TEMPLE. My hon. friend for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is, I think, the last man in this House to say a word with reference to the Indiantown Branch. I know nothing about the item at present, but I know that the road should never have been built at all. It was my hon. friend who induced the Government to build this road, and now he is continually finding fault with them for what they have done, because they have not gone far enough to satisfy him. I cannot understand the hon. gentleman. I have known him for the last thirty years, and have always had every respect for him. I knew him when he was in the Local House, and he was respected there by everybody, but something or other in the last two or three years has come across the dream of the hon. gentleman, and we can hardly make out what it is. Some think he is "looney," but I would not say that. I do not feel myself satisfied it is that, but I think the hon. gentleman must forget himself; he must be in his dotage. So far as Indiantown Branch is concerned there are two roads, and the present Finance Minister is the gentleman who consented to build this road to satisfy the hon. member for Northumberland. It was not required at all, and the hon. gentleman knows it, but was merely built to satisfy him. Now, he wants more, although he knows that $140,000 of subsidy was money wasted and lost to the country just to satisfy him. And now where is he? We could not keep him; he is the party who is always by himself. I am sorry to differ from the hon. gentleman, but I thought it was but just to myself and the Government, as I know about this, that the House should know that the road complained of is the road that the Government built to satisfy the hon. gentleman, and with which he will not be satisfied without a further outlay of $150,000 on it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I could not catch half what the hon. gentleman said; but I will set him right on one point. I was not complaining about the vote, but I asked the information whether the $17,000 was intended to complete the link from Indiantown to the connection with the Northern and Western Railway near Farley Mills? The hon. gentleman says he does not understand me. He certainly gave me a certificate of character during the early years of my life, when he said he knew me in New Brunswick. I am much obliged to the hon. gentleman for a certificate of character, but I think if a certificate of character in reference to myself and my public acts rested on the statement of the hon. gentleman, it would not carry much weight. He says he thinks I am "looney." If I am wrong in attributing that expression to him, I would like him to set me right, but that is the word he used, as I caught it. I do not know what he means by it. If performing my duties to my constituents and criticising, in a proper and parliamentary manner, the votes my constituents have to pay by taxation, is an evidence of my being "looney," whatever that may mean, the hon. gentleman is right. I can easily understand the hon. gentleman. He says this road is not wanted, but he knows he induced the Government of the day to transfer the vote from my county into his, and he got the vote because he was then, as he is now, an out-and-out supporter of the Administration, and I was one who, in the exercise of my duty to my constituents, acted from an independent standpoint. The hon. gentleman says the road is not wanted. I reply that it was wanted, and it was got when there was no railroad in that country. The vote was granted for the Derby Branch, and the hon. gentleman and some of his associates endeavored to—I will not say cheat, because that might not be parliamentary—but to deprive my constituents of the right to say where the road should be placed. The hon. gentleman who criticises my conduct as a public man and attempts to say he does not understand me, lent the weight of his aid for the purpose of trying to defeat the legitimate objects of the constituents I have the honor to represent, and whom, I think, I represent fairly, honestly and well. He knows, that if I would do as he does, if I would be a tame follower of the Government, and support them in all these extravagant votes, which have amounted, together with statutory charges, to about $50,000,000, passed in about eight weeks, I, probably, also could get the interest of $300,000 guaranteed for a bridge, and get a couple of railways established in my county, where they are just as well wanted as where the hon. gentleman has placed them. But I have the misfortune to have an independent spirit, and it may be it is a misfortune not only to myself but to my constituents, and I have not been able to get one single item in the Estimates for the benefit of my county. I will not say it is because I ventured to criticise the conduct of the Government, but I believe it is; and I have no hesitation in saying it is because I do my duty in criticising these gentlemen who are not the masters, but the servants of the people, as I have the right to criticise them. I would say to the hon. gentleman who has attempted to school me, that his standing is not such as to warrant him attempting to criticise my conduct. The hon. gentleman may be acting within his role when he finds everything right that the Government does and acts as the Government tells him, for which subserviency he gets more than he is entitled to, but when he attempts to attach names of opprobrium to me for my conduct on public question, he is stepping outside his duty. I did not object to this vote. What I did was to ask whether the sum of $17,000 was sufficient to cover the expense of constructing a link between the two points in the line which are eight miles apart, and I have a perfect right to ask for that information. I have in my desk letters from some of my constituents residing upon that Derby Branch, and I would now call the attention of the Minister of Railways to this point. I have received several communications from constituents of mine whose properties are situated on the line of the Derby Branch, and whose lands have been taken and interests have been interfered with, whose approaches and landings from the river have been interfered with, and they have been writing to me and asking when they can get the damages settled by the Department. As to the approaches from the river where the general communication is carried on, as far as the fisheries and the lumbering are concerned on that river, I have in vain tried to get these damages settled, and I would like to know if the Minister of Railways will instruct his officers to have these questions settled and taken out of the way as soon as this Session is over. I would like the Minister of Railways to state whether he will do that or not.

Mr. POPE. Yes, I will do it.

Mr. McMULLEN. The member for York (Mr. Temple) stated that this grant of $140,000 had been given in order to keep the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) in line. I would like to know whether the Ministers of the Crown are going to allow that statement to go undenied or not. We have some thirty-eight railway grants which are to come up in a few days, and I would like to know whether these are given on the same ground of keeping hon. gentlemen opposite in line, whether they are intended to prevent them from rebelling unless they consent to be brought into line. If the country is being run in debt in order to keep hon. gentlemen in line, because they choose to press something on the Government in the interest of the section they represent, it is well the country should know it. I hope the Ministers of the Crown will not sit silent and allow this to go unnoticed.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am glad the hon. gentleman has called my attention to the statement made by the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple). I did not hear his statement.

Mr. MITCHELL. Nor did I, or I would have answered it.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But I may say that, if the hon. gentleman made any statement that I was induced—because it was on my representation, as I was Minister of Railways and Canals at that time, that the vote was proposed on the representation of my hon. friend from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) for the Indiantown Branch—if the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple) thinks that that vote was influenced by any desire on the part of the Government to affect the vote of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), he is entirely mistaken. I might call upon members on both sides of the House to remember that we were receiving at that time a sort of left-handed support from the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell). He was occupying an independent position in this House at that time.

Mr. MITCHELL. As I do now.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He was leading a party—the left centre I think it was called—a very compact party, which the hon. gentleman succeeded in keeping very well in hand; but he was not regarded at that time as a general supporter of the Government any more than he is at present. The hon. gentleman, while he is sitting on the other side of the House, finds himself impelled by a sense of duty to give a very general support to the Government at the present time; and at that time he was obliged in the same way to give a support to the Government in consequence of his approving of the measures we submitted to the House. Under these circumstances he came to me and pointed out the importance of the construction of this Indiantown Branch, and I have no hesitation in saying frankly that he satisfied me that it was in the interests of the public service, that it would open up an important section of country, that it would bring traffic to the Intercolonial Railway, and that it was in the public interest that the expenditure should be made, or I would not have submitted the vote to the House. I think the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple) could not have intended to say that the Government, or that myself, as the Minister of Railways at that time, could be induced to sanction an appropriation of public money for the purpose of influencing the action of any hon. gentleman on either side of the House.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am obliged to the Minister of Finance for having given the explanation which he has. I did not hear the remark of the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple) any more than he did, but I can only say to the House, which contains a great many new members who do not know the history of this Derby Branch, that although I did not hear the impertinent and insolent remark in reference to myself, which it is stated was made by the member for York, if anyone supposed they could control me, that the Government could muzzle my mouth and keep me quiet when the public interest demanded my speech, they would do me a great injustice. The vote which I asked for the Derby Branch was to connect the county which the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple) represents with the city of Fredericton on one side and with Newcastle and Chatham on the other. I got a vote for building the Derby Branch, but afterwards the influence of the hon. gentleman and his friends at the other end of the line, together with people in my own county, was brought to bear. It was brought to bear by the hon. gentleman before he was here in the House, and afterwards, when he became a member, possessing as he then did more influence as an out-and-out supporter of the Government than one who supported them on measures which were just and opposed them on those which were unjust, of course his influence was still greater. It is true that I gave the Government, what the Minister is pleased to call a left-handed support at that time, but it was an honest support. I supported them when they were right, and opposed them when they were wrong, and that is the kind of support the constituencies of this country expect from their representatives, if men do their duty, which some men do not do. That is what is imposed upon them when they assume the responsibilities of representing a constituency. I have never cringed or crouched to the Government in order to get votes or advantages. Can the hon. gentleman say as much? I was never afraid to express my opinion in regard to the action of the Government when I thought it was wrong. Can the hon. gentleman say as much? Has he always voted according to his judgment and according to his conscience? Has he found the Government to be right in every thing? At all events, he always votes for them and supports them. I vote against them when I believe them to be wrong, and I try to keep them right. I may state, for the information of the new members who are here, that when the Government attempted to take away the vote which they had passed for this line of railway which I had induced the Government to place before the House and to induce the House to adopt, I fought hard for it, and I succeeded in carrying out the original object I had in view, when I applied four years before for this grant, before the hon. gentleman was in the House, before he ever took the first step towards the building of the road from Miramichi to Fredericton. He came in afterwards and got the benefit of my efforts, and now the road is nearly completed, though not exactly on the line which I advocated and which he and his friends from York tried to divert from the original intention of Parliament in granting the money.

Mr. TEMPLE. The hon. gentleman has made his statement again, and there is not one word of truth in it.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. I feel it necessary to call the hon. gentleman to order. He says there is not a word of truth in it. I say it is all true.

Mr. TEMPLE. Well, Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman will either take those words back or I will reply to him.

Mr. TEMPLE. Allow me to speak.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will reply, perhaps, in a way that is not parliamentary.

Mr. TEMPLE. I can do the same thing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think we will have to ask my hon. friend from York (Mr. Temple) to withdraw the statement that there is not a word of truth in it. It is impossible to carry on the discussions in this House when any one hon. gentleman uses expressions of that kind to another hon. member.

Mr. TEMPLE. Then I withdraw it. The hon. gentleman's statement, I may say, is like himself. The hon. gentleman.

gentleman has made a statement that I had tried to take away his line. I never had anything to do with that line until I came into Parliament. Not one blow was struck on that line, although the hon. gentleman says that he had done a great deal before ever I came here. I do not know of anything having been done.

Mr. MITCHELL. I got a vote of the money, that is what I did.

Mr. TEMPLE. What money?

Mr. MITCHELL. The money to build the Derby Branch, 32 miles.

Mr. TEMPLE. That was after I came here.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was before you came here.

Mr. TEMPLE. It was the same winter I came here. I did not complain that the Government had given him this vote of money for the purpose of obtaining his vote. I did not mean to say that for one moment. But he knows just as well as I do that the road was of no benefit to anybody, and never will be of any use. It will never pay the oil for running the road. Time will tell whether I tell the truth, or the hon. gentleman.

Mr. MITCHELL. The fact of the matter is this: The hon. gentleman says the money was voted after he came here. I tell him it was voted a year before he came, and two corporations got to squabbling about who should build the road, and the question of where the subsidy should be applied lay over until the next year, and when the hon. gentleman came here he induced the Government to transfer—and I think the Finance Minister will bear me out in this—to transfer the money from my end of the road to his end, the 38 miles from my end to his end of the road, and they voted a specific sum for the Indiantown Branch, and they took away my original vote and built the road as a government work. I was willing to have it done, but it was money voted a year before the hon. gentleman ever put foot in this House. As to the road never earning the cost of the oil of running, I can tell the hon. gentleman that it runs through as good a section of country as exists in New Brunswick, well settled from end to end, not a single vacant lot during the whole 18 miles the road runs through.

St. Charles Branch. $222,091.46

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Is that to complete the payment of land damages on the St. Charles Branch?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is to pay the awards of the official arbitrators and the judgments of the Exchequer Court.

Mr. DAVIES. Will that pay all the claims arising out of the building of the St. Charles Branch?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, that does not quite cover the whole. Perhaps $25,000 will be required yet. The total cost has been $1,114,240.97, the total length is 16 miles.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I am afraid the largest claims have not yet been settled. I know of a claim of more than $200,000 which has not yet been settled, and I do not know when it will be.

Mr. McMULLEN. Can the Minister give the original estimate for the construction of that road?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not remember at this moment, but it has been enormously exceeded. I submitted the original estimates to the House, and it was done in all candor. It was done upon an estimate on the part of the engineers and of persons most familiar with that section of the country, as to what the land damages would cost.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it was $350,000.

Mr. MILLS. Would the hon. gentleman tell us how much of this $222,600 is yet unexpended?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think about $40,000 is still to expend.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Machinery, $10,000— I asked a question as to whether this was charged to capital account?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, I will give you that. That item is made up of several items, among which are one lathe, $2,600; one extra heavy engine lathe, $920; one planer, $250; one locomotive driving wheel lathe for Rivière du Loup, $3,100; one dimension planer, $1,200.

Mr. MITCHELL. Rolling stock, $100,000—Was any portion of this money appropriated for the purpose of paying the hon. member for York (Mr. Temple) for snow ploughs?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think I may say no.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the information because I have heard it stated that the hon. gentleman was either supplying snow ploughs, or had sent a patent to the Government for a snow plough, and I thought it might account for his course.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was this $100,000 charged to capital account or current expenses?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is capital account. It is made up of items among which are one milk car, $2,500; 150 coal cars of 20-ton capacity, $82,500; excess of cost for furnishing 100 engines with air brakes, over the estimate, $10,000.

Mr. JONES. I hope this vote with the vote taken already, will enable the Minister of Railways to equip the road with sleeping cars. Under the present arrangement it is very inconvenient. The morning I left Halifax we had no sleeping car until we reached Bedford. Then when we came to Moncton, the car I came in went to New Brunswick and there was no car again until we came to Campbellton. I think it is running the Intercolonial Railway rather fine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It shows the remarkable economy of the administration.

Mr. McMULLEN. In regard to charging these items to capital account, I think it will be evident to any hon. gentleman that if we continue to charge to capital account all the rolling stock from year to year supplied to the Intercolonial Railway, and no sum is charged to rolling expenses, the capital account is bound to run up to a very large sum. It is absurd to buy rolling stock from year to year and charge it to capital account, and write off nothing accredited to capital account in proportion to the wear and tear, which ought to be charged to running expenses. What will be the condition of the capital account under such a system? There will be fifty or sixty millions charged to capital account, whereas the stock will not be worth more than twenty millions, because the rolling stock will be worn out. It is a most fallacious course to pursue, and the true policy is to charge rolling stock to working expenses.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken in supposing that all the new rolling stock is charged to capital account. Every part of the rolling stock once charged to capital account is to be maintained. If it is damaged either by accident or by wear and tear, it must be replaced and charged to revenue. If a dozen engines are destroyed, they must either be made over or new ones take their places, and the cost charged to revenue account. It is only the first equipping of the road with engines and cars required for increased business that is charged to capital account, but once put upon the road all charges must be charged to revenue.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will the hon. gentleman explain, if that is the rule adopted, why he has repaired certain cars and charged the amount to capital account?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman refers to remodelling sleeping cars. That is an entirely different matter. We did not own them, but it was the purchase of the cars and expenditure necessary to remodel them and place them on the road. If one of the cars is damaged repairs will have to be made, and if destroyed it will have to be replaced out of revenue account. The same applied to the Westinghouse brake. It was for the protection of life and property, but once placed upon the road, those have to be maintained and charged to revenue.

Mr. JONES. If the Minister of Finance had obeyed the order of the House and brought the return of expenditure on capital account, we would have avoided this discussion. Instead of bringing down details of expenditure the hon. gentleman merely submitted a copy of a portion of the Public Accounts, which was practically no information.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was not in the House when I stated that the Minister of Railways said it was impossible to submit a detailed return during the present Session. All he could do was to give a statement of the amounts chargeable to capital.

Mr. JONES. We never can arrive at a correct understanding of what is charged to capital account until we obtain such a return. The hon. gentleman may think it is a question of trouble.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Such a return might be prepared during the recess.

Mr. JONES. There has been abundant time to bring down a considerable portion of the information, if there had been a disposition on the part of the Minister to have brought it down; but there is an evident attempt on the part of the head of the Department to keep back the account. We can never discuss the capital account until we have a detailed account of the various items charged, and for that purpose I have been urging the Minister day after day to bring it down, and I have never got the answer which is given to-night, which is rather late.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have sent out to the library and got the proof to show whether my hon. friend (Mr. Temple) or myself told the truth.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would it not be better to say whether my hon. friend or myself made a mistake?

Mr. MITCHELL. I am using the words the hon. gentleman used. He said I did not tell the truth.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He withdrew those words.

Mr. MITCHELL. I say I did tell the truth—and that is perfectly in order. I refer to the Statutes of Canada for 1883, page 346. The hon. gentleman will not say that he was in the House then? I know he was not. In 1883 the only vote for that road was the following:

"To the Northern and Western Railway Company, for thirty-two miles of the railway from the Intercolonial Railway near the Miramichi to Morans near Denphy village, in the Province of New Brunswick, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, not exceeding in the whole $102,400."

The next year the hon. gentleman was in the House, that was in 1884. That vote was transferred from my end of the line to the hon. gentleman's end, and in this way:

"To the Northern and Western Railway Company for a line of railway from Fredericton to the Miramichi River, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole (instead of the subsidy proposed in 1883) $128,000."

The year after I got the vote, the Government took that vote from my end of the line and transferred it to the hon. gentleman's county, to his end of the line. I hope the hon. gentleman will have honor enough in him to withdraw the statement he made, and acknowledge the fact that I did get that vote the year before he came into this House, and that the vote was in the following year transferred to his end of the line.

Mr. TEMPLE. I said nothing about the North-Western line. The hon. gentleman is always turning, quibbling and twisting things.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do you say I am quibbling?

Mr. TEMPLE. I said nothing about the North-Western line; it was the Indiantown Branch I was speaking of.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was talking about the Indiantown Branch. I was not talking about the North-Western line, but about the Northern and Western Company that was to build the Indiantown Branch. The point the hon. gentleman sought to make was as to whether I had got the vote before him or not. He now stands convicted of having told what was not correct, and I have proved it.

Mr. MILLS. With respect to the item $126,687, judgment and legal expenses, in the case of Windsor and Annapolis Railway, how much is for judgment and how much is for costs?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am informed that the judgment was for $113,000 and the balance costs. The Minister of Railways is present and he has informed me that the stations on the Canadian Pacific Railway that the hon. member enquired about were given by tender. The Minister of Railways is also prepared to explain the expenditure, to which exception was taken, for putting iron piles at the wharf at Port Moody. This work was for iron piles, surveys, &c., $27,000, and the larger portion of the work was given by tender and contract. The portion which was not so given was done under the instructions of the Government engineer, and was for repairs caused by storms and freshets, amounting to $12,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. A question was also asked as to the extent of the wharf and the depth of the water supply.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The depth is sufficient to admit large sea-going ships at low water, and the extent is about 300 feet.

Mr. POPE. I may say the wooden wharf was destroyed by storms and iron piles were put outside of it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How much was expended on the work for which the iron piles were substituted?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not certain of that.

Prince Edward Island Railway..... $5,800

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When was this money expended on the Prince Edward Island Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This was for extension of Charlottetown station yard and coal shed, to fill up the water space with brush and gravel and increase the yard accommodation, and $1,200 of the whole amount was for the extension of the coal shed thereon, including crib work.

Mr. JONES. When was that done?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think late in the season.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. January and February, I suppose.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. About that time.

Mr. POPE. The only time at which it could be done was in the winter season when the brush could be hauled on the ice.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This, I think, has been left over, if I am correctly informed, for three or four years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Surely it should not stand longer.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But work which has been left over three or four years is not exactly the sort of thing for which warrants should issue as an urgent work could not possibly be foreseen.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When was this sum of $3,000 spent on the Carleton Branch Railway to complete purchase of stock?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. After the sum of $25,000 previously stated had been expended in the purchase of bonds and stock and expenses, there remained shares in the hands of private parties amounting to the above sums.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Who were they, and where do they reside?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That I am unable to say, but the hon. gentleman knows that it was necessary to acquire all these bonds and stock in order to obtain a title to the property.

Mr. JONES. When was it paid?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That I am not able to say, but there is no doubt that it was acquired.

Mr. ELLIS. I can mention to the hon. gentleman some facts with regard to this item.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I shall be glad to have assistance.

Mr. ELLIS. This stock was for a long time in the hands of local persons for small amounts. The Government bought the city stock and also that held in England, and then speculators bought this other stock up, and just before the general election the speculators became clamorous, and threatened the local managers in St. John that unless it was paid their whole influence would be thrown against them in the election, so the Governor General's warrant was issued.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It really seems to have been a bad investment, if the hon. gentleman's statement is correct.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It looks like it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Perhaps the hon. gentleman can tell us at what price the stock was sold to the Government?

Mr. ELLIS. I think it was purchased at par, because the other stock was purchased at par. I do not think there was anything objectionable in that part of it.

Mr. LANDERKIN. Right before a general election.

Mr. JONES. I see there is an item here for the Short Line Railway; and while we are on that subject I would like to ask the Minister of Railways to give us some information with reference to the Short Line Railway which is now going on to the cities of St. John and Halifax, and which, it was expected, would shorten very much the distance from Montreal to those cities. There is a good deal of anxiety at present, on account of reports that they were about connecting with the Maine Central Line, instead of proceeding with the work as originally contemplated to Fredericton, Salisbury and Moncton; and if that is the case, it would appear from the information which reaches us indirectly, that while the road would have an advantage in connecting with the American line, the distance to be gained by the connection with St. John would not be anything like what was originally contemplated. I have heard it stated by a person who pretends to be well informed, that the line has been deflected so much, owing to the lack of accuracy in the original survey, that the distance to Halifax will not be shortened fifty miles. I should like to have some information from the Minister of Railways on that point, because the expenditure can only be justified on the ground that it would shorten the distance to Halifax and St. John by over 200 miles; and if, as is said to be the case—I speak from personal knowledge—it will not shorten it more than to the extent I have named, I think the intention of Parliament will not be carried out. If the hon. gentleman is in a position to give any information on this subject, I know it would be very acceptable just now, when the question is being discussed a good deal in the Lower Provinces.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is aware that that work is in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with whom a contract has been made, and that contract is on the line originally agreed upon by Parliament, to carry the road to Mettawamkeag, and from Mettawamkeag, the company, as I understand, have made arrangements with the Maine Central Railway and the New Brunswick Railway to go to St. John. That was always the intention. The road is, therefore, being constructed precisely on the line and in the terms of the contract approved by Parliament, and the work is going on vigorously; and I am informed by the company that the line will be completed by the end of this year. The other portion of the contract requires the line to go from Harvey to Fredericton and from Fredericton to Moncton, for the Halifax connection, and that the company are also bound under their contract to construct on the line originally laid down by Parliament.

Mr. JONES. If my information is correct, they are constructing the branch from Mettawamkeag to the Central Railway, and no progress is being made on the other branch. I am aware that it is said to be under the charge of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but it appears to me the Government should exercise supervision over those roads when public money is expended on them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly, the contract is with them.

Mr. JONES. I would like the hon. gentleman to inform the House whether progress is also being made on the line from Harvey to Fredericton? I am informed that it is not.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I understand that they are concentrating their attention on the main work first, and that they will then take up the other; but they are bound by the contract to take up the other and prosecute it vigorously, and complete it within a certain time.

To pay R. W. Cooper for extra services in connection with the construction of the Tay Canal, from 1st July, 1882, to 30th June, 1885, deduction being made of an allowance of $150 already paid.....$450

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What are the services?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The superintending engineer reported in favor of this allowance to Mr. Cooper for making out the pay-lists during three years, he being a competent book-keeper, and his present salary being only $800.

To pay claims and services of valuers on Carillon Canal.....$419

Mr. MALLORY. I would like to ask the hon. Finance Minister if he is able to give me the information I asked for a few days ago, viz., whether the contractors on the Murray Canal received an extension of time for the completion of their contract.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There has been no formal extension.

Mr. MALLORY. Has there been an extension of any kind?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They have been allowed to go on, but have not had any particular time allowed to them.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. They have been absolutely in the hands of the Government—a very dangerous predicament, I may observe, when men have very large claims and a general election is pending.

Mr. MITCHELL. Not at all, when they vote right.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That depends. My impression is that these gentlemen voted wrong, and induced many others to vote wrong. With reference to this Carillon Canal, I know nothing of the services of the valuator; but the point I wish to call the attention of the Committee is, that I think it is quite absurd to take a Governor General's warrant for $450 to pay claims for the services of valuers. I think that should be paid out of the amount placed at the disposal of the Government for unforeseen expenses. I ask the First Minister or the Minister of Finance whether, as a matter of practice, they do not themselves think that the use of the Governor General's warrant for this purpose is an abuse of it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course, it is a small sum to ask the Governor General to issue his warrant for, but if there is no other way of getting the money, the warrant ought to be issued. It seems to me that the word unforeseen defines exactly what the vote is for—anything that comes up unexpectedly, such as the breaking of a lock in a canal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Governor General's warrant is expressly provided for that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Perhaps so. An unforeseen exception is one that the Government are not in a position to get the sanction of Parliament for, but this claim of the valuers for work performed in the ordinary course is not an unforeseen expenditure.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When was this liability incurred?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. These claims arise out of the construction of the Carillon dam by flooding the lands of the claimants. Compensation for five claims, $245. Services of the Government land valuator, $174.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). When was this liability created?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am not quite certain, when the flood took place.

Mr. POPE. It is not a very old claim. I doubt whether it is more than 18 years ago.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). So it became absolutely necessary, by urgency, to pay by Governor's warrant. When was the warrant issued?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On the 18th September, 1886.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Looking over the unforeseen expenses, there are items which have no business, on the principle laid down by the First Minister, to be under this heading, as, for instance, the rebellion losses commission, which might have been foreseen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is a very nice question.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is a question which, bearing in mind the use that is made of it, deserves the attention of the House. You find subscriptions to papers, books, &c., under unforeseen expenses. The reason that I call attention to it is that I have always regarded, both in practice and theory, Governor General's warrants as a serious matter, only to be used in important emergencies.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Something like an accident.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that claims of this kind fairly fill the bill.

Royal Commission on Railways.....$20,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who are the commissioners?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Sir Alexander Galt, E. R. Burpee, T. E. Kenny, junior member for Halifax, who was obliged to resign his commission.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Previous to becoming a candidate. Mr. Moberley and Mr. Schreiber are the two other commissioners. Each received $20 a day, $5 a day for hotel expenses, and railway and other fares.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What amount did they receive?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will make a note of it.

Mr. KENNY. I will give what information I can to the Committee. I had the honor of serving on the commission, but my connection with it was abruptly terminated by the action of the citizens of Halifax, who thought I could serve the country more usefully here. I have not the figures of the exact remuneration I personally received, so that I cannot give any information on that point.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is the commission still continuing?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is continuing with the other four, and the work is nearly done.

Lachine Canal, Royal Commission on leases.....$4,000

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There were two special warrants issued by Orders in Council, 20th November, 1886, and 30th December, 1886, $4,000, to meet expenses. The commission was appointed the 17th July, 1886 and is composed of Thomas Pringle, John Kennedy, C.E., E. H. Parent, C.E., chairman, and R. C. Douglas, C.E., secretary. There are ten leases.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What revenue is derived from the canal leases?

Mr. POPE. That is not in my Department. I will get the information, however, for the hon. gentleman.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When do you expect the commission to report?

Mr. POPE. Immediately. I hoped to have had it this evening, but it is not yet printed.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is one of the commissioners the engineer of the canal?

Mr. POPE. One is chief superintendent; he will get pay as commissioner in addition to his salary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Douglas is also an engineer in the service of the Government.

Residence and office for the collector on St. Anne's Canal..... $2,500

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). How was it necessary to issue a Governor General's warrant for this?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The superintending engineer of the Ottawa River canals reports that he has been called upon to remove the residence of the collector because the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are building a pier to the railway bridge at the point, and that, as the bridge will run over the dwelling of the collector, it is necessary to provide a new residence and a new office for the collector.

H. F. Perley, three years' services in superintending St. Peter's Canal..... $750

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the Minister will explain as to this?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This was submitted to the Treasury Board, and recommended and approved on the ground that Mr. Perley, who was the engineer in charge when the St. Peter's Canal was constructed, and now has nothing to do with the Department of Railways and Canals, could better superintend that work, and the repairs necessary to it, than any person else, and at a great saving to the Government, who would thus not be obliged to employ, through the Department of Railways and Canals, a superintending engineer, by giving a small sum to Mr. Perley for the performance of these duties outside of his Department and in connection with another work.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Is not Mr. Perley the chief engineer of the Public Works Department?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). He is also the chief engineer of the Quebec harbor works. I think that is for the interest of the works, because he has corrected the great blunders which were made by his predecessors. I would like, however, to know whether he is in receipt of any salary as chief engineer of the harbor commissioners of Quebec?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, the harbor commissioners allow him something every year—I think $800 or $1,000.

Mr. MALLORY. Is it not strange that this person's services were not paid for three years ago, instead of now?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He has been paid at the rate of $250 a year, but, it being a small sum, it is brought in every two or three years.

Mr. MALLORY. I think it would be better to pay him every year than to lump up the amount. That does not conduce to a proper examination of the accounts.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that he gets $250 for this work, as long as it goes on, and it has been elicited that he receives $1,000 from the Quebec trust. What is his salary in the Department?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $3,200.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That makes about $4,500. It may probably be the case that you require to pay somewhat larger salaries than you have been doing to officers of first-class grade and first-class ability, if we can get them, but I think it would be better that they should receive a larger salary fairly and squarely than that we should eke it out here, there, and everywhere, in half a dozen ways.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The fact that Mr. Perley receives that sum from the harbor commissioners is a large saving for the harbor commissioners, as the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Langelier) knows. The sum which was paid before was very large, but Mr. Perley being the chief engineer of public works, it was very important to have him there in order to prevent the blunders to which the hon. gentleman has referred continuing, and that the chief engineer should have the control of these works; and, therefore, the commissioners have allowed the extra $1,000 while this work continues.

Mr. JONES. There is another point, whether, as a matter of policy, it is wise to have the Government engineer, who receives a salary from the Government, advising any corporation which has dealings with the Government.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is under the control of the Minister of Public Works. He makes plans and directs the road, but there is a local engineer to look after the work there. He is not really under the control of the commissioners, but they give him $1,000.

Mr. JONES. We have high authority for stating that a man cannot serve two masters.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is of great advantage to the Government, who are paying this money, that the Minister of Public Works should have a man there supervising the expenditure of that money.

Mr. JONES. How, when he is in the employment of another corporation?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is really paid by the Government.

Mr. MULLOCK. These officers are really paid for their full time by the Government. When they are doing other work, they may be required to discharge the duties for which they are specially engaged. This is an officer who is engaged here for his full time and paid his full salary. If you allow him to do some other work, for which he receives extra pay, he must neglect something else. I think that paying extra salaries to men who are engaged by the year is entirely wrong. We have another illustration of that in the case of Mr. Schreiber, the railway engineer. He is employed at $4,000 a year, and for years you have been paying him, or the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has—I do not know which—for what he has had to do with the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He has been paid nothing by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Mr. MULLOCK. At all events, when that work was undertaken, his salary was increased $2,000. If he is to be paid a salary of $6,000, let it be specified.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is exactly what it is.

Mr. MULLOCK. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MULLOCK. When?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Always.

Mr. MULLOCK. It appears in the Estimates as being a salary of $4,000, and then in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway there is another payment of $2,000.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. And for this reason, that, when he ceased to be charged with duties of so onerous and important a character, and involving such great responsibility as those in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway, the salary would not be required to be continued; but, if $5,000 was stated as his salary, without showing that $2,000 was in connection with the duties of the Canadian Pacific Railway, that salary, would be a permanent one.

Mr. JONES. I suppose that $2,000 is for looking after Onderdonk and Company's rolling stock.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was part of his duties certainly.

Mr. McMULLEN. I referred before to the number of officers receiving double pay. In connection with this item I will give the names of a few which I find on page 19 of the Auditor General's report. Mr. Chamberlin receives $2,400 as Queen's printer, and $105 additional for doing Government printing. Hon. Mr. Clark, county court judge of Northumberland and Durham, got $2,264 as salary, for settling Short Line Railway claims, $700; as arbitrator Lachine Canal, $350—a total of $3,314. There is also Mr. Coursolles, French translator, House of Commons, who gets $2,200 salary; translating for printing of Statutes, $161; translating geological survey, $1,063; translating consolidation of Statutes, $1,684—a total of $5,108. Lieutenant Governor Dewdney gets a salary of $4,000, and $3,200 as Indian Commissioner, and some other items, making in all $7,216. Then Mr. Evans, chief analyst, Inland Revenue Department, eight months' salary, $1,333; services for the Board of Customs, eight months, $533—a total of $1,866. Again, D. Ferguson, Customs, Chatham, N.B., $1,200 salary, and from the savings banks, $400. J. Ferguson, ocean mail clerk, salary $1,000; trip allowances, $800; distributing immigration pamphlets, $100—total $1,900. We have again Mr. Forget, clerk of North-West Council, $1,800; rent allowance, $500. Mr. Grosse, Customs officer, St. Andrews, $1,200; for services in connection with savings banks, $400. And so on we have got 150 civil servants, who are receiving extra allowances in different capacities. Major General Middleton got $4,000 on one account last year, and $20,000 on another. We have Colonel Walker Powell, Adjutant General, $2,600, and for staff allowance, $600.

Mr. MALLORY. I agree with the hon. gentleman who has just sat down in condemning the principle of paying civil servants for extra services. In reference to Mr. Perley, I may state that I do not know this gentleman, although I presume he is a gentleman of high standing who could not be influenced by any sum he might receive. But the general principle is exceedingly erroneous, and ought not to be adopted by any Government. When we have a servant in the employ of the country at a fixed salary, he ought not to be allowed to accept a gratuity from those who have contracts with the Government.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He does not get anything from contractors.

Mr. MALLORY. I understand he is getting it from parties who are receiving grants from the Crown.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is the harbor commissioners not the contractors.

Mr. MALLORY. In that case, the harbor commissioners are expending the money of the country for other purposes than that to which it was voted by this Parliament.

Mr. MULLOCK. I think the present size of the civil servants list ought to cause the Government to have some regard for the taxpayers. A return was laid upon the Table for the year 1886, showing the number of civil servants and their salaries up to the first of August, 1885, and that disclosed a state of affairs which I think is not at all to the credit of those who are administering the affairs of the country. If I remember rightly, there were at that time over 4,000 civil servants in the employment of the Government, and they have added to that staff since they came into office something like 1,800. The gross amount paid in salaries to the civil servants up to the first of August, 1885, was between three and four million dollars a year, that is, fixed salaries, not including extra such as we are discussing to-night. When we look over the individuals and see the work they discharge, and when we consider the hours they work, and the comparative lightness of their duties, I think the Government is not doing justice to the country when they increase that charge. There can be nothing more injurious to the young men than to encourage them to believe that their fortunes are made when they get into the service of the Government. Under the very objectionable principle now established of holding local examinations several times a year for admission to the Civil Service, with now some thousands of young men who have passed examinations and are qualified to enter the service, you are offering a premium to young men throughout the Dominion to look for situations in the public service rather than to proceed independently to work out their own fortunes. I think that, as a rule, the civil servants are now paid so well that there is no excuse whatever for supplementing their salaries by extra payments.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentlemen opposite are entirely in error in supposing that we are increasing the public charge. The very reverse is the case. What they object to is our not having appointed a superintending engineer for the St. Peter's Canal, an independent officer and charging the country $1,000 or $1,500 a year for a service which we could get for $250. Then the hon. gentleman wants to have another superintending engineer for the harbor works at Quebec, and instead of obtaining the services of the chief engineer of the Public Works Department and his close supervision of the whole of this work at a cost of $1,000 a year, he wants an engineer whom we would have to pay $1,000 or $5,000 a year to perform that service. All these cases arise out of a desire of the Government to save the public money by utilising the services of the same individual to perform different branches of the service that would otherwise necessitate having half a dozen.

Mr. MULOCK. Then it is quite clear that if members of the staff can be drawn away to discharge other duties, they are not wanted where they are.

Mr. MALLORY. Did Mr. Perley, when sent to Quebec, go in the ordinary discharge of his duty?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, in the ordinary discharge of his duty. He is in charge of a work that is very important to the Government and the country. He is a talented and experienced officer, and he is certainly not paid what he should be paid. An engineer in the United States, doing the work which that gentleman does, would be paid $6,000 or $8,000 a year without doubt. Mr. Perley is sent to Quebec to look after the interests, not of the harbor commission but of the Government. We are advancing the commission large sums for a special work, and the interests of my department, of the Government and the country are that that work should be looked after, not by the engineer of the commission, but by the engineer of the Government. But in order to save a salary of $3,000 or $4,000 that the commission would have to pay, I have allowed my engineer to make plans and specifications in the Department, and with $1,000 added to the salary of the engineer of my Department from the funds of the harbor commission we obtain everything: first, supervision of those works by the chief engineer of the Department; and also the work done at the minimum rate of $1,000, which otherwise would cost $3,000 or $4,000. If that is wrong, it is a wrong that can be well justified.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman's explanation is not at all satisfactory. We are not questioning Mr. Perley's ability. We are not saying he is overpaid; I believe he is a capable and efficient officer. But he is employed by the Government, and we have a right to assume that he is paid the sum at which they think his services could be replaced if he left the Government's employment. Mr. Perley is not there to make plans for the harbor commission. The commission are to make their own plans and submit them for the approbation of the Government. The moment you allow the harbor commission or any other corporation to share in the payment to a public officer, that moment the corporation has a claim on him as well as the Government. I do not mean to say that Mr. Perley would be untrue to his obligations and duties to the Government which employs him, but, as a matter of principle, no man can serve a corporation and the Government at the same time, and have the public put implicit confidence in his administration or report. The Minister of Finance has said that an engineer is required to visit different sections—like St. Peter's Canal. You do not require a resident engineer there, but occasional visits from an engineer of the Department. I say again that it is indispensable in the public interest that public servants should not be employed by any corporation outside of the Government.

Mr. McMULLEN. This principle is undoubtedly wrong. I contend that in no instance does a corporation or business man, who transfers an employé to another place, pay him double salary. If a bank sends a clerk to another branch to inspect, they do not pay an additional salary to him when he is away. They pay his travelling or other expenses and that is all. If a wholesale man transfers an employé to perform some particular duty he does not give him two salaries. The principle is a wrong one, and the Government is laying down a precedent which may lead to civil servants making increased demands on the Government. Even postmasters, who are paid large amounts, will think the Government are establishing a principle of giving extra allowances, and they will note little points on which they can prefer extra charges. Soon no civil servant will be able to do without some little extra allowance of a few hundred dollars added to his salary. Civil servants should be led to understand that whatever duties are required of them, they must be performed without additional allowance. The principle should be laid down that civil servants must perform the duties devolving on them wherever required, and without extra allowance, except the payment of the expenses.

To pay the claim of the Kingston and Montreal Forwarding Company re sinking of barge Williams.....$1,638.79

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the circumstances connected with this item?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is to pay for a barge sunk on 9th June, 1885, near the upper entrance of the Lachine Canal by its striking some projecting bolts. The superintending engineer reported, after inspection, that the parties were entitled to compensation, and that the claim was a reasonable one. Protection has since been placed along the parts of the pier complained of.

Mr. MULOCK. Why did not this amount come in the accounts of 1886?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It had not been investigated and reported upon.

Mr. MULOCK. The accident happened in June, 1885, and it took till March, 1887, to get it adjusted. When was the report made? It seems to me a most extraordinary thing that when an accident happened in June, 1885, it should take until the spring of 1887 before the Department has investigated it and made a report. I do not know what connection that had with the events of February.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid that the party in power will have to suspend business for the time being when it is supposed an election will be held, for it is to be assumed that no business can be done then.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think the public will have to adopt another rule, and that is to view with suspicion hon. gentlemen who undertake to act upon such a principle.

Mr. MULOCK. I do not think that some of the public works completed and done under the sanction of the Governor General's warrant were altogether necessary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have known claims of this kind pending for years; the people pressing them and passing them on from hand to hand.

Mr. MULOCK. Will the hon. gentleman be kind enough to lay on the Table of the House, before concurrence, all the papers in connection with this matter?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope that will not be necessary when I tell the hon. gentleman that the Order in Council was dated on the 8th of February, 1887, and that the sum of $2,638.79 was paid in full settlement of all claims.

An hon. MEMBER. That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. MULOCK. I would ask the Minister to place on the Table the papers preceding the Order in Council —

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will make a note of it.

Mr. MULOCK. But will we get the papers?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will get what I can.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like the correspondence preceding the Order in Council, the report of the officers, &c.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have already given the hon. gentleman the report of the superintending-engineer. I may say before passing to another item that I can give the hon. gentleman now some information he asked for with regard to the superannuation of the messenger, C. S. Neville. I may say that although I do not know his age exactly, he was a young man of, I think, about twenty or twenty-one years. The Treasury Board reported that they had had the matter under their consideration, and recommended that a sum of $383.33 be placed in the Supplementary Estimates as a gratuity, being ten months' salary at the rate of $460 per annum, which was the salary he received when he left the service. He was obliged to retire on account of ill-health, and the proper medical certificate was submitted. He had been twelve years in the service.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then he must have gone into the service younger than the age which the law allows.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may have understated his age; at all events, he went in as a boy at a very small salary, which went up to $460 before he left the service.

Mr. MULOCK. So you superannuate one at the age of twenty-one, and the other day you appointed another at the age of seventy-five.

Public Buildings, chargeable to income, Quebec.....$28,475

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is rather a large item there for St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, $16,525.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That is for finishing and fitting up the new building intended for a dining hall and workshop for the tailors, shoemakers, &c. We had not enough money by the vote of last year. Then there are the materials required for carrying on the work undertaken in connection with the penitentiary.

Public Buildings, chargeable to income, Ontario.$61,830 65

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object in purchasing Victoria Hall, O'Connor street, Ottawa.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is the building in which the fishery exhibits are, and we thought that we should purchase it, as it was at a low rate considering the rent which is received from it and the large lot which is adjoining and which will allow an extension of the building at a future time when it is required. The building is a good building, three storeys high, besides the basement, and besides the portion which is now occupied by the exhibits, rents are received from the building to an amount sufficient to pay more than the interest on the purchase.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the extent of the property?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As near as I can recollect it is 100 by 100 feet, and one-half of the lot is vacant.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is this what is called the Orange Hall?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Perhaps so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where the Salvation Army has its headquarters? From whom was it bought?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I haven't got the name here. I may say that it is not bought yet. We have the refusal of the property, and I think Mr. Clemow is acting for the proprietors.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Senator?

Mr. McMULLEN. Is the price finally settled upon?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How far is it from these buildings?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is on O'Connor street, a little below Sparks street.

Mr. JONES. Could not the Minister of Public Works have found room in the new building he is putting up for the fishery exhibits? It appears to me that it might be placed in some part of the new building the hon. gentleman is erecting without incurring such a large expenditure as this. To recommend this on the ground that a rent will be received from the building is, I think, delusive, because if the Government require the building at all they require the whole of it, and they cannot expect to receive an income from it very long.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We pay $600 for one room, the main portion of the building, and both the cellar below and the hall above are rented for a considerable sum; and there is a large lot of land to build on in addition.

Mr. McMULLEN. Will the hon. Minister of Public Works submit the names of the present owners on concurrence?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I doubt very much the policy of purchasing little pieces of property 100 feet square at considerable distance from the main building. If the hon. gentleman found it absolutely necessary to purchase a building like this, I think he ought to have obtained it closer to the present building. If this thing goes on, I think it will be found to be very inconvenient to have a number of buildings scattered over Ottawa, and in order to utilise this vacant ground, we may be let in for a very expensive building in the course of a few years.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We shall probably sell the vacant lot for twice as much as the whole building is costing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you go into a speculation and make something out of it, that is another matter, but it will be different from your practicing.

Mr. McMULLEN. Does any person occupy any other portion of it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes, the Salvation Army has the upper floor.

Mr. McMULLEN. Who occupies the basement? Perhaps the hon. gentleman will let us know on concurrence.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Yes.

Mr. MULOCK. In 1885, we voted $50,000 for the purpose of erecting a building in Toronto, in connection with the examining warehouse, where importers could store their goods, and the Minister represented that it was expected that this would be a good paying investment, as he intended to charge the merchants storage. I would ask how that has turned out?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That I cannot say. I suppose the Minister of Customs can give information on that point. But so far as I am concerned, the money placed in my hands for that purpose has been applied to the erection of the building, and the work is still going on.

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the entire cost of the Orangeville post office?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $21,375, inclusive of building, site, heating, drainage and furnishing.

Mr. McMULLEN. What changes are intended to be made in the electric lighting of the Parliament buildings at Ottawa, for which a vote of $4,000 is taken?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is for the current year. The intention was to extend the electric light to the library, but we thought we might postpone that to another year. With this vote we have extended the electric light to the Senate Chamber and its corridors. We also put some few lamps on the terrace in order to see how far we were likely to succeed in lighting the square, but that was only an experiment. I do not ask any money for that purpose this year.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not see any vote in these Estimates to meet the proposition made by the municipality of Sombra, for the protection of the road and bank along the River St. Clair. As the hon. Minister knows, there was a deputation before him, and he promised to give consideration to their proposition, and to submit it to his colleagues.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I received the other day a resolution of the council of Sombra, stating that they would subscribe $10,000 provided the Ottawa Government and Ontario Government would each contribute an equal amount. The matter was laid before my colleagues, but in the meantime I had caused enquiries to be made as to whether that was the only spot on the river damaged by the steamers passing down the river, and I found that there were two or three other spots where the same thing occurs. Therefore, I am not in a position to take the matter up now. At any rate, it could not go on at present, for this good reason, that the Ontario Legislature is not in Session and will not be for a considerable time. We should wait and see what the Ontario Government will do, and if they do as the council of Sombra have done, then I will be in a position to submit the matter to my colleagues, and, perhaps, come to Parliament for a vote.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is this difficulty: if the Ontario Legislature should take precisely the same position, by no possibility will they ever come to an understanding.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman says that the stature might be the same, but the council of Sombra is the smallest body and the next body is the Ontario Legislature. The largest body will come third.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The Ontario Legislature seem to think it is rather a Dominion matter. No doubt the municipalities are interested on account of the damage to property.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). I would like to ask the Minister of Public Works whether he proposes to have the bar dredged at the mouth of the River Trent. A deputation waited on him and an officer was sent to Chatham to investigate and report, but nothing has been done since. It is very necessary, in the interest of navigation, that this work should be done, and I ask the Minister if he cannot see his way to put in a vote for it in the Supplementary Estimates?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter has not been lost sight of in my Department. I was busy at it this morning. I am not in a position to say what may be done, but we have it in mind, and I do not think it will cost much.

Grounds, public buildings &c., Ottawa.....$10,300

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The expenses on the park will not be heavy next year, as this amount will put it in such a state that it will be a credit to the Parliament and to the capital. We are not doing anything to Nepean point this year.

Mr. McMULLEN. It is not right that the electors of this country should pay this enormous sum for the purpose of beautifying the park at Ottawa. No doubt it adds to the appearance of the city, but it is not fair that it should be improved at our expense.

Harbors and Rivers, New Brunswick.....$18,800

Mr. GILLMOR. What public interest is served by building a sheer dam on the River St. John above Grand Falls?

Mr. TEMPLE. It is to direct the lumber through the proper channel in the falls which is a very bad place. The citizens of the whole country are depending upon it. It is to prevent the loss of timber on the ledges and rocks and get them safely over the side of the falls.
Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN.

Harbor and Rivers, Quebec.....$25,764 52

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What on earth is the object of this $2,000 for the experimental breaking up of ice on the St. Lawrence ship channel between Sorel and Three Rivers?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This was intended as an experiment, but the season was too late to carry it out, and the money was expended on the ice below or at the Island of Boucherville where the commissioners were. It is well known that the ice, accumulating there, formed a dam, and prevented the flow of the water, which accordingly flowed back and produced a large proportion of the floods in Montreal and the surrounding country. This was an experiment with a view to see if it would relieve that section of the country. I am not now in a position to say whether the experiment can succeed or not, but, at all events, the flood was somewhat delayed in consequence.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think these experiments are something like that of the Greely expedition to Baffin's Bay.

Harbors and Rivers, Ontario.....$15,430 33

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this amount of $6,000 for Summerstown?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There was a vote for a pier and bridge there, and, after going to work, we found that the bridge was larger than it was supposed to be.

Mr. WILSON. While I do not complain of the amount which is appropriated for harbors and rivers in Ontario, I do complain that the Minister of Public Works has not looked after a harbor in the section which I have the honor to represent, and which was brought before his attention a short time ago by a deputation which requested him to have a survey made of that harbor, and to see if it could not be placed in a proper state of repair. I refer to Port Burwell harbor. That harbor, although it is under the control of a company, I think, deserves the attention of the Department. In 1875 or 1876, the Government made an appropriation for the purpose of making improvements in that harbor. Since that date nothing has been done, and the harbor has gone into decay to such an extent that now it is impossible for vessels to enter that port. It will be remembered by the hon. gentleman that it was represented to him by his own political friends that this was an important port; that a large number of vessels sailing up and down the lake could find no shelter from the severe storms that take place there, and that they were unable to enter that harbor. In consequence of this, a large number of lives have been lost and a vast amount of property destroyed, through the neglect either of the company or of the Government to make the necessary repairs and the necessary provision at that point. I call the attention of the Government again to the matter. The Government has neglected, to a large extent, the Lake Erie shore and has only expended a very small amount of money upon it, and it is, therefore, responsible for the large loss of life and property upon that coast. I again urge upon the Minister to turn his attention to that, and to see if he cannot do justice to that locality, which has been withheld by the present Government since they have been in power. If the former Government could find their way to make an appropriation of $10,000, the present Government ought to have kept the harbor in such a condition as to enable vessels to enter it with some degree of safety. It is very unfortunate for these sailors to be upon those waters during a storm. If the Government had expended a small amount of money their lives might have been saved, instead of being destroyed on account of the neglect of the Government to make the necessary improvements.

While I am willing that ample provision should be made in every part of the country to save the lives of those unfortunate people who are compelled to sail upon the lakes, I hold the Government blameable for neglecting to save the lives and property of these people, when the expenditure of a very small amount of money might have done it. I know that with the uniform kindness of the Minister of Public Works, and with his readiness to try and please everybody, friends as well as foes, he will at least turn his eyes in the direction of these harbors this summer, and see if he cannot, in the coming Session, bring down a small item such as will put the harbor into such a state as will render it more safe to the lives and property of the people.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I understand from the hon. gentleman that Port Burwell is the property of a private company, and if it is so important that that harbor should be improved, the improvements, of course, would specially benefit a private company. In that case surely the hon. gentleman might exert his influence over the proprietors of that harbor, and get them to make some proposal to the Government, or get them to put their hands into their pockets and make the improvements themselves. At present I am not in a position to submit the matter to my colleagues and to ask for a sum of money, and I do not think that Parliament would approve an expenditure of money to improve the property of a private company.

Mr. WILSON. I will explain to the Minister the position of that harbor. Some years ago it was taken from the Government by a company, who went on and made certain improvements in that locality. After a time the original company sold out their right to the harbor, or at least the company failed, and it was taken over by an American company. I believe the proprietors of that harbor live in Detroit at the present time. They have totally neglected the harbor, but they have been collecting tolls until a recent date, when the harbor became so dilapidated that they had to give it up. The Government surely do not contend that because that harbor was formerly transferred to a company, which company has failed, and has transferred it in turn to an American company, they are going, therefore, to allow the lives of people to be lost and property to be destroyed. The company as now constituted take no interest in the harbor, and I say it is the duty of the Government in the interest of the citizens of that locality to take the harbor back from the company to which they had transferred it. If they did wrong in transferring this harbor to a company who have allowed it to go to ruin, they need not try to shield themselves by saying that it would be wrong for them to make any improvements on the property of a private company. Will my hon. friend ask me to go over to Detroit and try to get that company to come back and improve the harbor? Is that the way he desires to protect the interests of the Dominion of Canada? Is that the way he desires to have Canada for the Canadians? I say it is the duty of the Government to look after the interests of their own country, and try to protect the lives and property of the people of Canada.

Roads and Bridges..... $7,800

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Bridges over the Ottawa at Ottawa City, $6,500—these bridges and approaches are now under the control of the Government. When we asked for a sum of money last year for this purpose, it was upon guess work, and we could not know exactly in what condition the bridges were. They were found in a worse condition than we supposed, and this is for the balance of the money required for that purpose.

Public Works, miscellaneous, chargeable to income.....$36,400

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Examination in connection with the flooding of land by the River Assiniboine, $1,200—

Hon. gentlemen will remember that last year, and at the last moment, hon. gentlemen on both sides asked that an examination should take place. It was in connection with the flooding of land by the River Assiniboine, and an examination had to be undertaken to enable the chief engineer to submit his recommendations in the matter. The question of the overflow, after being discussed in the Local Legislature in 1878, in the Session of 1885 was brought under the notice of the Dominion Government, in a memorandum by Lieutenant Governor Aikens, with a request that we should take such steps as might be considered necessary to prevent the disasters caused by the flooding of that river. I think a report has been made, but I have not seen it yet.

Mr. TROW. There was a ditch dug from the Assiniboine up to Bay St. Paul, a distance of probably a mile, but, through some fault of the engineer, when the ditch was open, the water ran the other way and flooded the country from the river. I know that from observation. It must have been through some bad calculation on the part of the engineer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is this gentleman, McLaughlin?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. He is photographer of the Department of Railways and Canals, and we also use him in my Department to photograph public works, so that we are able to judge of the position of the work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is his salary in the other Department?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. $1,400, exclusive of this amount.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Here is another case where an officer is receiving two salaries.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. After this year the two salaries will be paid as one, and he will be paid $1,800.

Geological Survey.....$1,550

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On whose recommendation was this payment of $1,500 to François Mercier, Montreal, for a collection of Indian curios from the Yukon district, made?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). On the recommendation of Dr. Dawson, acting director.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did Dr. Dawson give direction to have them prepared, or did he simply find that gentleman with that collection and recommended their purchase?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The gentleman had the collection in Montreal. Dr. Dawson found it there, and considered it very valuable and worthy of preservation. It is now in our museum here, it was placed there last fall or during the early winter.

Mail Subsidies.....$4,018 13

Mr. ELLIS. Was not the amount voted last year sufficient for steam communication between St. John and ports in the Basin of Minas?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The vote was intended to be $4,000, only $2,000 were obtained, and this amount is necessary in order to carry the service out.

Ocean and River Service.....$16,950

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to the refund to W. M. McPherson, $950, why should this amount be refunded?

Mr. FOSTER. This was for the service rendered by the steamer Napoléon III. At the time of the wreck of the steamer Brooklyn, the Napoléon III was got ready very quickly and went to that vessel. No property was saved, but the lives were rescued. This is to recoup the charge.

Lighthouse and Coast Service.$1,845 12

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are the circumstances under which the husband of Mrs. Guinane lost his life?

Mr. FOSTER. He was in the employment of the Department and was drowned while coming from a wreck.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am not in the least disposed to object to this vote of $100. On the contrary, it appears to be a small vote to give for such a purpose. I am rather inclined to think that the Government have erred on the side of economy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am of the opinion that they have often so erred.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not so far in the Estimates found any other error in that direction, and I, therefore, felt it right to mention this one.

Fisheries, deep sea explorations in British Columbia..$5,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is intended to be effected by this vote?

Mr. FOSTER. The idea was, if possible, to locate the banks on which black cod were chiefly to be found. An expedition spent six weeks last year and eight weeks will be spent this year with the same object, and this vote is to cover the expenditure.

North-West Mounted Police—work and gratuity.$1,980

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Did Assistant Commissioner Crozier voluntarily retire?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. After the North-West rebellion, Assistant Commissioner Crozier applied for retirement from the force, stating although his physical appearance did not indicate ill health, he was subject to a nervous affection that necessitated a change. A medical certificate was forwarded certifying that he suffered from a nervous affection.

Mr. JONES. This is a case that should be remembered in considering the case of Capt. Fortune of Halifax. I hope the Minister of Militia will bear this in mind in dealing with that case, which he has promised to take into consideration.

Mr. KENNY. I would respectfully urge the Minister of Militia to take that case into serious consideration. That officer is entitled to every consideration at the hands of the Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps I may be allowed to go back to an item about the fisheries. On what principle has the Government discharge William Dalton from serving on board the lightship at Miramichi, after he was ordered by the Department to resume his usual work? That man lost part of his hand in firing a salute on the Queen's birthday, and he was put as an assistant on board of a lightship at the mouth of the Miramichi River, and has been there for many years—I think about nine. He was discharged this year, and the only reason I can think of for his discharge was that he voted for my unfortunate self. I suppose the Minister knows the facts, but if not I will tell him, and the reason I have given is the only reason I can imagine.

Mr. FOSTER. That, however, has nothing to do with the item.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is information I think.

Mr. FOSTER. I think the hon. gentleman has a question on the Order paper.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think I have, but I would prefer asking it now. The hon. gentleman, I think, would save time by answering it.

Mr. FOSTER. I will get the answer for him.

Mr. FOSTER.

Indians, Ontario and Quebec.....$2,920

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would ask the right hon. gentleman if he can state when a reserve is to be set aside for the Temogamingue band on Sturgeon River. These men are willing to work but, owing, I believe, to some dispute, with the Ontario Government, they cannot do so, because they cannot get a reserve, and I would like to know if there is any prospect of this dispute being settled. I visited them two years ago, and took a great deal of interest in them, and I am sorry that they should be deprived of the means of gaining a livelihood when they are quite willing to work.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am sorry to say that we cannot get any answer from the Ontario Government in the matter, and it remains where it was.

Indians, Nova Scotia.....$730

Mr. LOVITT. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman when provision will be made for the Indians on the Yarmouth reserve? They have been suffering a great deal for the necessaries of life, and for the last few years the overseers of the poor had to attend to them. There is no agent nearer than eighty miles, so there is nobody to look after them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We have $200 in this vote to purchase 20 acres near the town of Yarmouth as a reserve or camping ground for the Indians of Yarmouth county. They have no reserve, and for a long time they have been camping on the property which it is proposed to purchase, and which is reported to be suitable for them.

Mr. LOVITT. I may mention that my predecessor, Mr. Kinney, ordered certain amounts to be paid for the relief of these Indians, with the understanding that he would be responsible, but the accounts have never been paid.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not know how that is, but as regards the appointment of an agent, one will be selected when the reserve is purchased.

Mr. LOVITT. I would like the right hon. gentleman to look into these accounts I have spoken of.

Indians, B.C.....$10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is a pretty large amount. What are the objects to be provided for.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is to supplement the appropriation for the current year. The Department has been for several years carrying over the expenditure for the last quarter of the previous year and charging it against the appropriation for the next year. The total amount which is carried over and charged to the current year's appropriation is $6,500. In addition to that a third survey party was sent out by my orders, when I was in British Columbia, to survey the boundaries in the vicinity of Metlakatla.

Indians, Manitoba and North-West.....$249,623 88

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of this amount $70,386.13 is to pay the Department of Militia and Defence—for credit of rebellion expenditure—for stores taken over from the expeditionary force for Indian purposes, after the disturbances were quelled in 1885. The stores have been paid for by the Department of Militia and Defence, and this sum goes to the credit of that Department.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then, if I have followed the hon. gentleman aright, this sum would have to be added to the $179,000 in the other portion of the vote, in order to give the true amount by which the expenditure of the Indian Department has exceeded the original estimate.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I may say that the remainder of the item represents an appropriation, under the authority of an Order in Council, for stores which were served out after the disturbance, the rebels having destroyed most of the supplies. I have a statement here showing the manner in which that amount is made up.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should imagine that the destroyed stores would come in 1885-86.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. So it does, I suppose.

Mr. MITCHELL. Has it ever been ascertained yet how much the North-West rebellion has cost us altogether? I should like very much to know.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I suppose, to get that information, we would have to get returns from the different Departments—the Indian Department, the Mounted Police, the Militia Department, and so on.

Mr. MITCHELL. It would be very useful information for us at the next election, which we may have before very long.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. From present appearances I should say it would go over $7,000,000 and probably entail an additional charge of a million or half a million dollars in the shape of allowances for Mounted Police, &c.

To indemnify Mr. T. A. McLean, Registrar of Calgary, for expenses in connection with the construction of office at Calgary..... $1,070 28

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is the meaning of indemnifying Mr. McLean?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. McLean undertook to put up a building at Calgary to be used as a registry office. He thought it would cost about $1,500, the sum originally voted; but just about the time the building was to be erected the rebellion broke out, and it cost a great deal more. Mr. McLean made the difference out of his own pocket, and we are indemnifying him for it.

Mr. JONES. Had he a contract with the Government?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What was the whole cost of the building?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). This and the previous vote would make it about $2,600.

To indemnify the St. Catharines Milling and Lumbering Company for the cost of the suit of the Queen vs. that Company..... $4,000

Mr. McMULLEN. I hold in my hand a return which was brought down to the House on the 29th of May, 1886, containing all the correspondence that took place between the Government and the St. Catharines Milling Company, and also with the firm of Mr. Dalton McCarthy, a member of this House. There is also in that return an estimate by that firm of the probable cost of that lawsuit, and I will read the different items: Costs already incurred, $3,500; deposit in the Court of Appeal as security for respondent's costs, $4,000; Supreme Court costs—deposit as security for respondent's costs, $500; estimated costs of appellant's solicitors and agents' fees and miscellaneous disbursements, $300; preparing factum, estimated at 250 printed pages, &c., $500; printing, say 300 pages, $450; senior counsel fees, say $1,000; junior counsel fees, say $500; Privy Council costs—deposit as security for respondent's costs, $1,500; solicitor's and English agent's fees, $1,500; printing, say $1,000; senior counsel from Canada (Mr. McCarthy) and expenses, $5,000; junior counsel, $1,000; contingencies, say, $2,850; in all, $20,000. That is the estimate; of that amount we had paid at that time $1,500, and the balance to be provided for was $18,500. Of that balance we paid last year $10,000, and recently under a Governor General's warrant we paid $4,000; that is, $15,500 has been paid out by the Government on account of this lawsuit. I presume from this statement that this is the balance of that amount. Of course, we would like to know whether this completely wipes out these costs or not. Now, in order to give the House some idea of the bill of costs that has been put in in connection with this matter, I may state that the entire cost to the Ontario Government for defending their side of this case was $2,125.40, against $15,500 paid by the Dominion. The Dominion has paid $10 to every dollar that the Province has paid. In connection with this transaction I notice that the Dominion received altogether from the St. Catharines Milling Company $2,125 in dues, and $250 for a year's lease of a timber limit; so that we have only received $2,375, while we have paid out for law costs $15,500. Now, this does not cover all our law costs, for it appears that our law expenses are increasing annually. I notice by the Auditor General's report that last year we paid $82,577.17 over and above these costs. We paid to 27 law firms in the Dominion $72,592.12, an average of $2,690 to each firm, and the balance was divided amongst 97 firms. I think it is time a stop should be put to this business. We have a Minister of Justice who certainly ought to discharge, at least, a part of the duties that have been given to these firms. I cannot understand why the country should be asked to pay the Minister of Justice $8,000, and for every little item of law business that comes up we must employ a law firm and pay it large fees. For instance, I notice in this list the name of Christopher Robinson, of Toronto, who got $8,442 last year, and some other firms got from $4,000 to $5,000. It would be much better if we could hire one of the best legal firms and pay them an annual salary to do all the business of the Dominion than travel up and down from Dan to Beersheeba for the purpose of securing influence during elections. I notice that Mr. Wallace Rae, who, I believe, is a member of a firm of which the son of the hon. Minister of Finance is a partner, drew $3,103.64. Another law firm has drawn $5,011. Over $100,000 have been thrown away last year in law costs. It is a positive disgrace that money should be thus squandered.

Mr. MITCHELL. Before that item is carried, I would make a much better suggestion than that made by the hon. gentleman, to employ one law firm. I would suggest that the Government instead of litigating everything, whether on good grounds or not, should pay claims, even those about which there may be some little doubt.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Government are to be congratulated on their foresight, for I understand they have considerable costs by a recent decision of a court not very far from here. Will this clear our expenses as far as this suit has gone in the Supreme Court?

Mr. THOMPSON. I understand that it clears our expenses up to date.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do the Government intend to abide by the decision of the Supreme Court or to go further?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The judgment was only given yesterday.

Mr. MULOCK. As the Government have put forward this case as a test case, have they entered into an undertaking to be bound by the decision if it goes against them?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no such undertaking.

Mr. MULOCK. So that this procedure may happen over and over again. The hon. member for North Wellington has pointed out that we have paid $10 in costs to lose a suit, where the Ontario Government have only paid $1 to gain the suit. Before this item passes, the bills of costs should be laid on the Table, so that we may see where the money has gone. The account that the hon. member for North Wellington has read indicates a liberality far in excess of anything that could be justified in any court. This matter stands in the same position as the item which the Minister of Finance agreed to hold over until he could furnish the information. If the rule is sound in one case, it is in the other. We are entitled to have the bills and vouchers, so that we can judge whether our liability is such that we should place this money at the disposal of the Government. Last year we voted $10,000. The previous year we voted $1,100—we voted $11,000.

Mr. SCARTH. Oh, oh.

Mr. MULOCK. I am aware this is a source of merriment to persons which have no interest in payment of taxes, but to those who have, and who endeavor conscientiously to discharge their duties, it is a serious matter, and they are entitled to be heard. I claim that the Government should place the bill of costs on the Table. They dared not do so last year, and this year they are equally unwilling. It is, I consider, nothing short of robbery to take from the people money that is not honestly due, and pay it out without even giving this House the information it has the right to demand. This is a mode of doing business that we ought to resist.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The bills are taxed.

Mr. MULOCK. I claim there is no taxation that would bring out a result like this. If there has been taxation, let us see the bills. It may be such taxation as took place with respect to another bill, some years ago, when the bill was sent to Toronto to be taxed, and the taxing officer was a Conservative member for East Toronto in prospectus, and the taxation was made, not in the courts, but in the U. E. Club.

Mr. SCARTH. I would not speak if the hon. gentleman who has just sat down had not alluded to me. I laughed because, at one moment, he talked of $1,100, and, at the next, of $11,000, and was so muddled that he did not know what he was talking about. No wonder hon. gentlemen laugh. If he thinks to make me sit down by making personal allusion about his being able to pay more taxes than I am, because he has been left more money, he is greatly mistaken.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Whether or not, I think the Minister of Finance ought to furnish the particulars to us. The amounts appear to be exceedingly large, and, without entering at the present time into the discussion of the policy of the Government in disputing with the Ontario Government, it is declared—and it is not disputed either by the First Minister or the Minister of Justice—that the Ontario Government were able to get their side of the law costs limited to about $2,000, while ours has cost $15,500 up to the present date, with the lively prospect of costing us as much more or nearly so if we go to the Privy Council. There is now such a discrepancy established as calls for an investigation at the hands of this House. We paid before either $11,300 or $11,500—I do not recollect which—but the two sums together are seven or eight fold what the Ontario Government have paid, and I do not see how we can be charged $15,000 to date for our costs in this matter.

Mr. THOMPSON. The bills of costs in this matter cannot be laid on the Table or fully taxed, until the conclusion of the suit. The hon. member for Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has, I think, a file of the papers which have been laid on the Table, containing all that can be given. The sum of $4,000, I think, was accepted in full up to the stage to which the case has gone. So far as concerns the statement that the Ontario Government has paid only $2,000 for its share of the cost of litigation, I am not in a position either to contradict or to verify it. If they have paid only that sum, it is evident either that they have not fully paid the bills, or that they were so fortunate as to get solicitors who will work for nothing. A suit of that magnitude cannot be paid for by that amount in any part of the world, and if the hon. gentleman has ascertained the amount from the Public Accounts of Ontario, it must be simply what has been already dispensed, and the counsel fees cannot yet have been paid.

Mr. McMULLEN. I say that this statement is absolutely correct, and that it covers all the amount incurred by the Ontario Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Quite absurd. That cannot possibly be. The hon. gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. McMULLEN. I give the hon. gentleman my word that I have the evidence in my possession—evidence that he will not deny to be correct.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It cannot possibly be.

Mr. McMULLEN. I can tell the hon. gentleman that the hon. the Attorney General of Ontario came from Toronto and appeared before the Supreme Court, and no doubt he never charged any fee for his own appearance, but simply for his travelling expenses. We had a Minister of Justice here within a gun shot of the court. Why did he not go and take part in the case, without hiring a counsel to come down here from Toronto? That, no doubt, is one reason why the Province of Ontario has got off with one dollar, where we have to pay ten. Then there was an objection raised by the hon. gentleman as to the estimate placed in my hands. I say that his own deputy Minister gave his estimate that $10,000 would be sufficient to cover all costs. We have already paid out $15,000 and more, and yet the costs are not settled.

Mr. THOMPSON. I will not dispute at all the sincerity of the hon. gentleman in making this statement. On the contrary, I thought he had taken this from the Public Accounts of Ontario; and I have no doubt that that is not a full statement of the costs which will be incurred by that Province. I suppose the other 214 members of the House are aware that expenses have to be incurred for legal services, notwithstanding the fact that we have a Minister of Justice. There are legal expenses for searches and attendance, and disbursements made by our agents all over the country; and, unless I had the gift of omnipresence, it would be impossible for me to attend to all the litigation which takes place, very often simultaneously, from British Columbia to Cape Breton. Even in the city of Ottawa it would be impossible for me to attend to my duties in the Department and in Parliament, and to attend to the litigation even in the Supreme Court of Canada. The hon. gentleman has cited one case where the Attorney General of Ontario attended himself in the court. Well, in many cases my deputy has attended both in the Exchequer Court and in the Supreme Court.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Louder.

Mr. THOMPSON. There is no occasion for me to speak louder if hon. gentlemen will not talk.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I assure the hon. gentleman that I cannot hear one word he is saying.

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman could hear me if those around him would cease talking. When the hon. gentleman makes a comparison between the Crown business in Ontario and the Crown business here, he forgets that the business which devolves upon Crown officers here is a thousand-fold greater than it is in Toronto.

Mr. MULOCK. The Minister of Justice does not attempt to justify the particular item under discussion. We all know that this was a case in which there was practically no expenditure in connection with the matter of evidence. There was practically no evidence. The whole point turned upon documents and treaties. The whole thing was a matter of law, and in that regard it was no more expensive a suit than any other suit in which there is only a point of law. Last year, as my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen) has pointed out, the House was asked to make up altogether $20,000. At that time the case had been disposed of, I think, in the Court of Appeal, and the Deputy Minister of Justice made a report, which was laid upon the Table, that, in his opinion, $10,000 was quite sufficient to pay the costs. What had occurred in March, when the Governor General's warrant was issued, to justify the Government in paying $4,000 more? Everyone who knows anything about these matters is aware that no such outrageous fees as $4,000 are allowed for arguing a case which takes up only two or three days at most, in the Supreme Court of Canada. For what was this paid? The $10,000 had cleared us, the Minister says; then why give $4,000 more? If, as he says, this $4,000 is in full up to date, where is the evidence to show it? Where are the bills which he paid in full? Let them be produced, if they will stand production. If they will not, then I can understand why the Government refuse to give them to the people, but in doing so I consider the Minister and his colleagues are guilty of an arbitrary use of power.

Hot Springs reservation, near Banff Station, in the North-West Territories..... $52,000

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Mr. George A. Stewart is the superintendent of this work, at a fixed salary of $1,800. He is a surveyor and engineer, and a man of great ability.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have heard from a person who visited the Banff Springs that, so far as he could judge, the money expended there has been well laid out. I believe that, so far as arrangements have gone, the grounds are a credit to Canada. Although I do not approve of a Governor General's warrant being taken for such a purpose, in this case I think the importance of the object justified it, as the grounds are likely to become a great attraction to foreigners as well as to resident Canadians.

To purchase 500 copies of the "Parliamentary Companion" from Mr. J. A. Gemmill..... $1,000

Mr. MITCHELL. This "Parliamentary Companion" gave me a great deal of trouble last election. I had to send up to Ottawa and get all the volumes from 1867 to the present year, in order to defend myself against the nominee of the present Government who opposed me on the hustings. The author of this "Parliamentary Companion" had set me down as a Liberal-Conservative. I appeared first in 1867 as a Liberal, and I continued as a Liberal while in the Cabinet of Sir John A. Macdonald, while in his Cabinet I had occasion frequently to reassert my statement that I was a Liberal-Conservative. It was made a great charge against me that I had changed my politics, a thing I never did. If I am to have as much trouble in the next election on the same score, before I vote this money I want to see the book and see what they call me. I want the public to understand that I am an old New Brunswick Liberal.

Hudson Bay Expedition..... $4,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Can the hon. gentleman state the conclusion arrived at as to the length of time that navigation is possible?

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman will find that in the Marine report which has already come down. It is about three months and a half.

To make good the amount of savings bank funds stolen from the post office at Newboro'..... $150

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the Department hold itself responsible for losses sustained by its agents, or was there a special investigation made which justified this vote?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We do not hold ourselves responsible except under special circumstances. There was a special investigation here.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This was savings bank money that was in the hands of the postmaster.

Mr. TAYLOR. This case happened in my county. It was a burglary, the safe of the postmaster being blown open. The postmaster was one of my strongest opponents in the last election, and I am glad to see the Government has dealt fairly with him. He lost heavily himself of his own private funds, besides funds belonging to the Government. The post office inspector was sent there and investigated the matter, and I am satisfied this vote is justified.

Mr. MITCHELL. In connection with this post office business, I may as well mention here that during the last campaign, I found to my surprise that although I had circulated a great many copies of that valuable paper called the Montreal Herald in my constituency during the previous twelve months, I found that but very few copies had reached the people. I asked several parties to whom I had sent it and they said they had only got one or two. I found that the two distributing post offices in two towns had deliberately made away with the papers sent them from week to week; and in the town of Newcastle, I found that they were deliberately put into the furnace and otherwise made away with. I can prove that. I have said very little about it up to this time. I call the attention of the Postmaster General to the fact that such a state of things exists in my county, and that I found myself handicapped to a great extent by the fact that these two distributing post offices had made away with the papers. One of them made excuse that after the papers had lain a day or two in the office, he had not accommodation enough to keep them, and had put them out of the way, and this explanation I was prepared to accept, though a lame one.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think a statement of that sort, which the hon. gentleman says he can prove, merits the attention of the Post Office Department. The Government ought to institute an enquiry, and surely if the hon. gentleman can establish that statement, these officers ought to be dismissed. I think it is due to the House and to the country that upon a declaration of that sort, made by a member of the House, the Government should assure us that they will investigate the matter and dismiss the man who has acted in that way.

Mr. MITCHELL. I may say that in the case of one of the postmasters he was paralysed. He was an honorable and upright officer, but for months he was confined to his bed, and his son was in charge of the office. The man was paralysed and was not able to attend to the duties of the office; his son was in charge and this matter then came to my knowledge. I went to him after the election, not before, and I charged him with the fact, and he admitted that he had, week after week, put bundles of Heralds in the furnace, and otherwise made away with them.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Of course the Postmaster General could not investigate the matter before it was brought to his notice. Immediately the hon. member found this state of things existed in the post office it was his duty to have corresponded with the Postmaster General, and no doubt he would have caused an investigation to be held. Now that the statement is made the Postmaster General, no doubt, will cause such investigation, and if there has been any impropriety of conduct on the part of the Postmaster he will deal with it accordingly. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman desires the dismissal of those men?

Mr. MILLS. I think the Government should desire the dismissal.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I have a right to ask the question.

Mr. MITCHELL. In the case of Chatham, the postmaster was the brother of the gentleman who opposed me. I stated publicly on the hustings, on nomination day, the fact that my papers had been suppressed in the post office, and he thought I referred particularly to him. I did not, but I referred to the Newcastle post office; but the postmaster at Chatham admitted that he had obtained accumulations of the papers, that sometimes people did not come for them for three or four days, and that those accumulations he had thrown out. With respect to the office of Newcastle, against which I make the charge, I may say I did not bring it under the notice of the Department because the person in charge had been a cripple a great many years; he has become paralysed and is unable to attend to the office, which is in charge of his son; he was an honorable man and a good officer, and were it not that he was confined to his bed for months such transactions would not have taken place, and that was the reason I did not wish to make any formal complaint. But I have now made it, for I do not want to have this thing occur again with me in case of a contested election.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The destruction of papers, documents or letters appears to me to be a case for criminal prosecution. I forget how the law stands in that respect, but the wilful destruction of papers, letters and documents, seems to be a grave offence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. A very grave offence.

Consolidation of the Statutes..... $24,772 30

Mr. MILLS. Who are the parties and what were the amounts distributed to each?

Mr. THOMPSON. The particulars were given last Session. With respect to the payments made to the commissioners and for putting the volume through the press, I will give the information desired on concurrence.

Relief to Sufferers by flood in Cornwall $10,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hope the Finance Minister will give full particulars with respect to this vote. Of all proposals, a proposal of this kind, if there be any necessity for granting it, ought to be very fully explained to this House. We ought to have full details showing how the money was spent and by whom spent. If I am correctly advised the present sitting member, and the then sitting member, was one of the parties whom the Government thought fit to entrust with the administration of this money. I may say at once that unless there was absolutely no other human being in Cornwall whom the Government could trust, it was a very indiscreet and improper thing to entrust to a gentleman, about to run an election, with the distribution of $10,000 of money taken out of the public Treasury for any purpose whatever.

Mr. LANDRY. I would like to know the principle on which the Government proceed to pay money under circumstances of this kind. I know that in my own county a year or a year and a half ago a tornado occurred which swept down one of the principal rivers, doing great damage, and when I asked for an appropriation the answer I received was, that the Dominion Government could not recognise any such cases, but the Local Government would have to make provision. I can hardly make any distinction between that case and this.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It was a question of degree. If it is an ordinary loss by fire or water it is supposed that the Provincial Government will look after such matters. But if the loss is a large one, an enormous one such, for instance, as the fire of St. John, N.B., as the burning of Hull, and in this case where there has been great destruction of property alleged to have been caused by the canal works, then the Government assume the responsibility of coming to the aid and adding to the relief given by the Provincial Government and by the people. The Government assumes the responsibility of applying to Parliament to grant aid in relief of such extreme cases.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman might mention a further point of difference. The storm to which the hon. gentleman referred, occurred in his case a year too soon. The Cornwall accident occurred in January last. That makes all the difference between the case of the hon. gentleman and this case at Cornwall. Besides, it is a matter of far more serious consideration and as more influencing the Government than the magnitude of the calamity itself. I understand that many parties in Cornwall had subscribed liberally to relieve the wants of those who are suffering and had suffered loss, and those generous private contributions were subsequently paid out of the $10,000 appropriated by the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We do not know that.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman may not know it, but he has a chance to be enlightened.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I should like to know where the line is to be drawn. How does the magnitude of the Cornwall accident compare with the recent accident with the British Columbia coal mine? Did the Government do anything in the latter case?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We have placed $5,000 in the Estimates for that purpose.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Was not the loss of life the cause of families being left destitute? I want to know what kind of rule is adopted in dealing with these cases?

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman cannot state to whom the money was entrusted?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will ascertain that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman is not aware?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My impression is that it was sent to the mayor.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Because I was informed that the person chiefly concerned was the then and present member for the county, Dr. Bergin, that there were three parties of whom he was one, and we ought to have, I think, a statement of how the money was spent. Has the hon. gentleman the information?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) will be here to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then you wish to reserve the item.

Mr. BOWELL. I am informed by the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Hickey) that the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) was not on the committee of distribution.

Mr. HICKEY. I have heard him repeatedly say that he had nothing to do with the distribution of the money.

Mr. MITCHELL. There was a case probably as near home as Cornwall, or nearer, namely that of Montreal. As a question of degree I fancy that the calamity there last spring was quite equal to that of Cornwall, but I have heard of no appropriation for the relief of the people of Montreal.

Mr. McMULLEN. Was it before or after the election?

Mr. MITCHELL. It was after.

Mr. McMULLEN. That accounts for it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Will the papers be brought down?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will bring the information down—that is who expended it, and the details of how it was expended.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And who received it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

To make good to persons in Prince Edward Island amount of duties paid the United States Customs on fish and fish oil (including amount paid by H. M. Churchill) lapsed balances of votes of 1884-85 and 1885-86 $10,264 04

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) When I first brought this claim to the notice of the House, the hon. gentleman declined to pay that amount on the ground that Mr. Churchill was an American subject, and as the hon. gentleman has yielded to my argument I would like to ask how he changed his mind on that subject, and why?

Mr. MITCHELL. Perhaps he became naturalised.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) is right. He was an American subject and is now a British subject, and as a British subject this grant was made. He has been domiciled on Prince Edward Island, and he has carried on fishing there for 25 years. The grant was withheld on the supposition that he was still an American citizen, but when it was ascertained that, on the contrary, he was a British subject, it was decided that he should share in the appropriation. It is right that I should say that no money has been paid, because it was withheld under circumstances which would require it to be voted to him specifically by name.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) This amount was specifically refused to him before, though it is a claim which is good in its way, standing on precisely the same footing as that of Mr. Myrick. He was an American subject when he paid the money, he continued to be so when this House voted the money, he continued to be so until lately when he became naturalised, and, of course, if the hon. gentleman says that because a man becomes naturalised he is entitled to the money, then I think he must say that Mr. Myrick should be placed on the same footing. I would like to know if this is the case, because both men are placed in exactly the same circumstances in that respect, and I presume that what is done to one will be done to the other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman, no doubt, is more familiar with this subject than I am; but as I understand it, Mr. Churchill is now, and was when this House voted, a naturalised British subject; but the difference between him and Mr. Myrick is, that Mr. Churchill has carried on business, and has been domiciled in Prince Edward Island for over 25 years, whereas Mr. Myrick only visits Prince Edward Island during the fishing season, and is a resident of the United States.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Mr. Myrick has been there longer than Mr. Churchill; he has been there ever since I recollect, and has carried on the largest fishery business ever carried on there. He is there part of his time, and part of the time in the United States. He resides most of the winter in Boston, but his family reside on the island. He is living there, and is to all intents and purposes a British subject, so that there is no distinction between the two cases, except that Myrick carries on a business four or five times as large as the other. Both are worthy men, and men of excellent character. I know the facts of the case, and I know that Mr. Churchill was naturalised long after the grant was made; and if the House yields to the argument, that being naturalised since entitles Mr. Churchill to the money, I hope the same justice will be done to Mr. Myrick.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We will look into the matter.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I know the facts; I know that Mr. Churchill was naturalised after all this took place; I was present in the court and heard his application, so that I am not telling any hearsay.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Mr. Churchill is here at all events and the other is not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Both were American subjects, and if going through the form of naturalisation entitles Mr. Churchill to the money I understand the same principle will apply to the other.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The grant was certainly not intended to be given to American subjects, but to British subjects, and we are not giving anything to an American subject, but to a British subject.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The House will see that the hon. gentleman is playing on words. How can the hon. gentleman withhold it if he becomes naturalised.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Then will be time to deal with the question. I would not like to offer him any inducement to become naturalised.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Surely the hon. gentleman is not going to play with a matter of this kind; it is a matter of principle. Do I understand that hon. gentlemen intend to lay down the principle that one of these men is to be paid and not the other?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The other case is not before the Committee at all, and, until that time comes, I think we have nothing to do with it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, we have; because we are asked to pay a case which stands on all fours with that of Mr. Myrick.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It does not stand on all fours; one is a British subject and the other is not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman opposed the case strongly before; he said Myrick was not a British subject, and that it was preposterous and monstrous to pay him the money.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I said so, and I say so yet.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) And you say that because he has not become naturalised since for the purpose of getting this money, you will not give it to him. But if you give it to Mr. Churchill when he becomes naturalised, how can you withhold it from Mr. Myrick? On every principle of justice they are bound to pay Mr. Myrick as well as Mr. Churchill, and I think I have a right to ask the hon. gentleman to promise that he will do so.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite irrelevant to the question before the Committee. The hon. gentleman has no right to put a hypothetical case. We cannot tell whether Mr. Myrick will become naturalised or not. It is time enough to discuss his case when he becomes naturalised if he does so, and when his case comes before us. This is a mere waste of time.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Does the hon. gentleman know that he refused this payment long after Mr. Churchill became naturalised?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am not aware.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, I am; and I have seen the letter which came to Mr. Churchill refusing it. They sent the cheque by mistake, and then stopped the cheque, although he had been naturalised, and said they could not pay him before he became naturalised.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. We will see about that. Hansard will tell us about that, and I would rather take Hansard than the hon. gentleman's recollection a great deal.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am speaking of facts which are not in Hansard. I am speaking of a communication made by the Government to Mr. Churchill that they had sent the cheque by mistake.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman said he heard me say so in the House, and that is what I want to verify by Hansard, because I know from experience that the hon. gentleman's recollection is not very sound.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Well, mine may not be very sound, but it is perfectly patent that the hon. gentleman's cannot be very sound. But I say that when this House is asked to vote $1,500 to a man they refused to vote it to for the last two years, the hon. gentleman has a right to treat the House with common respect, and tell us why he has changed his opinion.

Mr. MULOCK. I would like to ask why the Government gave instructions not to have the cheque cashed, if they sent it, as the hon. member for Queen's says, after he was naturalised?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. According to my recollection, it was simply this: The officers sent by mistake the cheque, and the moment it was found out that it had been sent, it was stopped.

Mr. MULOCK. What was the mistake, because the facts were then the same as they are to-day? If it was a mistake to pay it then, how has the mistake changed that it is paid now?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Because sir became a British subject since.

Mr. MULOCK. The hon. member for Queen's says he was one then.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Well, I suppose it was not known here.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Yes, it was perfectly well known, because he had acted on the advice of some of the hon. gentleman's friends to become a British subject, in order to get this money, and he was advised from Ottawa that that would not do—that he could not get any money that he was not entitled to before by merely becoming a British subject. Now, I want to know why the hon. gentleman has changed his mind? And if he has changed his mind because he believes that he was wrong, and that he should pay this money to Mr. Churchill, I will ask him to do the same justice to Mr. Myrick.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. When Mr. Myrick's case comes up, we will deal with it.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) What I want to know is whether the hon. gentleman will treat Mr. Myrick in the same way as he is treating Mr. Churchill, as they are both on a par.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When Mr. Myrick becomes a British subject even then he will not be on a par with Mr. Churchill, because Mr. Churchill's domicile has been in Charlottetown for 25 years, whereas Mr. Myrick's is in the United States now. Mr. Churchill is a Prince Edward Islander; he was an American subject. The other gentleman is an American citizen and has not become a British subject, but, simply goes to Prince Edward Island during the fishing season.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is mistaken. They stand on a par. They both go to Boston to sell their fish, and they both remain on the island during the fishing season. Mr. Myrick has a property ten times as large as that of Mr. Churchill. His home is in Prince Edward Island, and he has a very large house there, where he resides during the fishing season.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Where does he live during the winter?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I was going to tell the hon. gentleman, either he or his son goes to Boston during the winter to carry on their business, and Mr. Churchill does the same. There is no difference between them in that respect. Now, before this vote is carried I want to tell the hon. gentleman why he is paying this money. It is for the purpose of endeavoring to purchase Mr. Churchill's support. Just three weeks before the election the hon. gentleman sent down to his agents there to promise to pay this money to Mr. Churchill if he would give the Government his support during the election.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I thought the hon. gentleman said Mr. Churchill was a highly respectable man.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) So he is.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He must be a dishonest man if he was bribed.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Did I say he accepted the bribe? I do not know whether he did or not. I know the offer was made to him, and the hon. gentleman is now carrying the offer out.

Mr. SCARTH. He did accept it, then.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Of course, he is accepting the money.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is a bribe, I suppose, because it is being paid.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman is talking about the corruption of Mr. Churchill. Does he think that there is no wrong on his own part in using the public money to corrupt voters and to buy them; and his friends behind him laugh and glory that the public money of this country, is taken for the purpose of buying support throughout this Dominion. If the Government were honest in this matter, if they wanted to do what is right and just, if there was a spark of honesty in them, when they pay Mr. Churchill this money, which they refused before, they would pay Mr. Myrick, who stands on a par with him, his money also. But it is because they made a promise just before the election to buy his support—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not believe a word of it. The hon. gentleman is drawing on his imagination.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I would like to know when the hon. gentlemen agreed to pay this money, and to whom he agreed to give it?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I never agreed to give it to anybody.

Mr. DAVIES. How did it come to get into the Estimates?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he knows all about it. If he knows, why does he not tell it? Who went to Charlottetown? Who bought him?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) The hon. gentleman knows, I will be bound to say.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says he knows it. Does he deny that he knows it? He knows or he does not. If he knows it, he should state it; if not he should not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I am asking the hon. gentleman how this money comes to be put in the Estimates? The hon. gentleman knows—

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I do not.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) He knows very well. It could not have got there without his knowing the reason.

Mr. HESSON. The hon. gentleman pressed to have these claims paid before.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Certainly, I did.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That was just before the elections.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) No, it was not. The hon. gentleman knows I pressed for the payment of all the claims. If any were to be paid at all, I asked that all the men who stood upon the same footing should be paid alike; but the Premier singled out a class of men and said they should not be paid because they were American subjects and had no possible legal or moral claim. He refused to pay them. Afterwards, Mr. Churchill, acting on the advice of some friends of the First Minister, became naturalised in order to get the money, and he was told that would not do; he was told that he could not, by becoming naturalised, get the money, and his cheque was stopped. That was just before the elections. He was promised if he would give his support to the Government of the day the money would be paid.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Who promised him?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not know, but I know it was promised.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. How do you know?

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I know it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The more the hon. gentleman stirs it up, the worse he makes it.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) That is the fact. The hon. gentleman has not spoken a truer word. The more it is stirred up, the dirtier it appears.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Out of your own mouth you are condemned.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) It is an immoral transaction of the worst kind of which the Premier, if he had any part in it, should be ashamed.

Mr. BOWELL. When was he naturalised?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I cannot remember the day or the month or the year. It was a good while ago.

Mr. BOWELL. Was it two years ago?

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) It was before he got his cheque, and after the money was voted in this House.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). When did the Government find out he was naturalised?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is clear from the position the hon. gentleman took, when my hon. friend introduced this subject to the House before, that the rule the Government laid down would not entitle Mr. Churchill to any portion of this money, simply by his becoming naturalised. The decision of the First Minister was that Mr. Churchill and Mr. Myrick and others, on whose behalf the hon. member was making the claim, were American citizens, and not entitled to any portion of the money prepared to meet these claims. If that was a sound proposition, the mere fact that one of the parties, became a British subject, by being naturalised, would not revive a claim that had no value prior to that time. The hon. gentleman knows that to be the case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No, I do not.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And when the proposal was made to issue a cheque, when these parties became naturalised, the Government, very properly, countermanded the order and prevented the cheque being paid, because, according to the rule they laid down, the fact that Mr. Churchill had become naturalised would not put him in a better position. Subsequent to that, without any alteration in the circumstances, the Government thought proper to issue a cheque and pay this party. There must have been some reason other than that of mere naturalisation for making the payment. The statement of my hon. friend explains the whole affair. It is a hypothesis, and if the hon. gentleman can present a more rational one let him do so; but, as yet, it seems to me the explanation given by the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) has the field.

Mr. SCARTH. I would like to say this to the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies), that the more he stirs up what he calls a dirty business, the more he fouls his own nest. He sets out, first, by saying the Government attempted to bribe a man who was thoroughly honest; the next moment he said this man would not take a bribe. Now he says he endeavors to take a bribe.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is this clear enough. Here is a sum paid by Governor General's warrant as emergency. It was to have been paid by votes of 1884-85, 1885-86. Thus two years have elapsed before this warrant was issued. What was the urgency which made it necessary to pay by Governor General's warrant sums that had stood over for two years? I suppose the Minister of Finance has the warrant. What date is it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This money has not been paid at all. The reason that the Governor General's warrant was applied for, was to carry over a lapsed balance. The hon. gentleman set the example of carrying over lapsed balances by Governor General's warrants, and, as the investigation which was thought necessary to be held, in order to be able to draw the money, had not been accomplished in time to pay these parties before the balance lapsed, it became necessary to have the Governor General's warrant. But, in the case of Mr. Churchill, as there had been discussion as to whether he should receive the money or not, the hon. gentleman will see that the money was withheld, and no payments will be made until the House votes it. The Governor General's warrant was applied for, not in relation to Mr. Churchill, but in relation to the lapsed balance of the appropriation made for the other parties, and which became lapsed in consequence of want of information. I wish to show how hard it is to please the hon. gentleman opposite. Here was the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) standing up, night after night, year after year, making an urgent claim upon the Government to pay Mr. Churchill a certain sum, demanding that that money shall be paid coûte que coûte, that, right or wrong, Mr. Churchill, although an American citizen, shall be paid this money. The Government said: No, we cannot pay this money except to British subjects; and the hon. gentleman continues to advocate, in the strongest manner, the demand that Mr. Churchill, although an American citizen, shall be paid. Finally, Mr. Churchill removes the difficulty by becoming a British subject; he becomes a British subject, having lived and resided in Canada, in Prince Edward Island, for twenty-five years. When this matter is brought before Parliament, when the principal difficulty is removed and the Government yields to the demand of the hon. gentleman by proposing to pay Mr. Churchill, but not until they have the sanction of Parliament, the hon. gentleman denounces them for having done a dishonest and corrupt act. I say that the hon. gentlemen stands in this position: If it is a corrupt act for the Government, under these circumstances, to ask for the payment of money he has urged the House to pay, it was a corrupt act for the hon. gentleman to stand here advocating the claims of people, when he knows that his advocacy would be likely to obtain the payment of their claim, and enable him to retain their political support. If the hon. gentleman advocated Mr. Churchill's claim for the purpose of getting Mr. Churchill's political support, I can quite understand his annoyance at finding that the Government have decided to pay the claim.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). They decided to out-bid him.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When Mr. Churchill became a British subject, and it was found he had been a resident of Canada for 25 years, the Government decided to ask Parliament that he should, under these circumstances, get the money. The moment the Government yield to the argument of the hon. gentleman, it is found it is not Mr. Churchill's interest but his own that he has at heart; that, while he thinks he can win or retain Mr. Churchill's political support by advocating his claim here, he advocates it; and, when he finds that the Government meet the case, and are disposed to ask Parliament to grant the money, the hon. gentleman denounces it as a corrupt act, and brands Mr. Churchill as a man capable of taking a bribe and of acting from most corrupt motives. In future, when the hon. gentleman demands what he calls justice for anyone, we shall come to the conclusion that he is seeking his own interest and not that of the person for whom he speaks. When he stands here, night after night, and demands that the Government shall take money out of the public Treasury to increase the salary, for instance, of the railway employés of Prince Edward Island, we shall come to the conclusion that it is not because he does not think they are now fully paid, but because he wants to bribe them by his action in this House to support him in his election, and, if he gets a salary increased by the Government, we must come to the conclusion that he will at once denounce that as a corrupt act.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are two totally distinct matters here. I will deal with the one, and my hon. friend will, no doubt, deal with the other. The hon. gentleman is not correct in saying that the late Government proposed to carry forward lapsed balances, as he proposes to do, under these Governor General's warrants. When we found that it was necessary that money should be paid, we took the authority under a Governor General's warrant, and we paid the money.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is what we do.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, it is only under imperative urgency that the hon. gentleman has a right to use the Governor General's warrant.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This claim has existed for years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And, if he has not paid this amount up to the present moment, it is clear that he had no right to use the Governor General's warrant in this case. The only ground for using the Governor General's warrant is that the urgency is so great that you cannot wait for Parliament to vote the money. The hon. gentleman is convicted out of his own mouth, in view of the fact that he got the Governor General to issue a warrant on the ground of extreme urgency—because that is the only ground on which the Governor General's warrant can be issued—and on the ground that he could not wait for parliamentary sanction; and yet now, three or four months after, he tells us that the Governor General's warrant is not paid. I say that is treating the Governor General's warrant with contempt, and is entirely contrary to the spirit, and I think to the letter also, of the statute in that case.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. When the balance lapsed before the proof was established; the Government put itself in a position to pay it whenever the proof came in.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say that the hon. gentleman had no right to do that; and I say that it was never done in Mr. Mackenzie's time at all.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We did precisely what the hon. gentleman did.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, it is not what we did. When there was an urgency we used the Governor

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

General's warrant, and we paid the money. Here the hon. gentleman uses the Governor General's warrant and does not pay the money; and now, in the last days of the Session, after Parliament has been sitting for two months, he tells us that he has issued a Governor General's warrant and has not used it; in other words, that there was no urgency, and that the Governor General's warrant was most improperly issued.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) I have heard of the assurance with which the hon. gentleman undertakes to argue political questions, but I never saw it more exemplified than I have in the last few moments. The hon. gentleman should have got up his brief more carefully before he spoke. He says that I came here and urged that these claims of Prince Edward Island merchants should be paid. So far from that, when the proposition was made by the Premier, I said there was no legal or moral claim on the part of Canada to pay those amounts at all. On the contrary, I said that the Premier was paying over $30,000, without any legal or moral obligation, to oblige certain political friends, such as Senator Howlan and others—Mr. McDonald, the late member for King's, being one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I said nothing about the hon. gentleman in connection with the Prince Edward Island claims, except as to Mr. Churchill and Mr. Myrick.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The hon. gentleman says I came here and claimed that these men should be paid. I will tell the hon. gentleman what I did. When claims were presented which had no moral or legal sanction, and when they were passed by the Premier, I presented the claims of Mr. Churchill and Mr. Myrick, which were as strong or stronger than those that were passed; and I said, if you vote this money to Mr. Senator Howlan, who is simply a middleman, compared to Mr. Churchill, how can you deny it to Mr. Myrick, who for twenty-five years has carried on the largest fishing industry in Prince Edward Island, and has kept hundreds and hundreds of men from starvation, and has done more than anyone else to carry on that important industry. I said it was unjust to single out Mr. Howlan and his friends to be paid this money, and to refuse to pay it to Mr. Myrick because he was not of the same political persuasion. The hon. gentleman met me with the assertion that Mr. Myrick and Mr. Churchill could not have their claims accepted in this Parliament because they were American citizens. I tried to show him that that should not put them beyond the scope of our charity, because it was charity we were dealing out. There was no legal or moral claim, and I said that their being American citizens should not put them beyond a claim on our charity. I pressed this on the Government two or three times, and I was told that it was impossible that we should vote the taxes of British subjects to American citizens upon fish which they had shipped to their own country, and from whom the taxes had been exacted by the country of which they were citizens. Now, I find a vote before us here which proposes to pay one man and not the other. I have asked the Minister of Fisheries why the distinction is made, and he cannot tell me. I tell him that he has done it from political motives, and I say that he has done it from the basest motives that could actuate an hon. gentleman. He is paying the money of Canada to an American citizen.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. We are not paying it to an American citizen.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) He says he is not paying it to an American citizen, because, forsooth, he goes into a court and goes through the form of naturalisation; and then the hon. gentleman has the assurance, after last year telling us that there was not a vestige of claim for this sum, because this gentleman has taken out naturalisation papers since, to say that he is entitled to be paid and not the other, and to say that my course is inconsistent. I say that my course has been consistent from the first. I said, if you pay any portion of these claims, you must put all these men on the same footing, and that to single out Mr. A or Mr. B, because he is a Liberal, and to single out Mr. C or Mr. D, because he has a different view, is an act of the grossest tyranny; and I think the hon. gentleman, after sleeping over this matter, will be able to carry his charity a little further and will deal with both these men on the same footing, will put Mr. Myrick as well as Mr. Churchill on the same footing as a year ago he put Senator Howlan.

Mr. MULOCK. I should like to ask why was not the money paid over to Mr. Churchill?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Because it was not voted for him.

Mr. MULOCK. Why was a Governor General's warrant issued?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Because the money was not voted for that purpose. There were a number of other claimants. There was no statement that the money should go to Mr. Churchill. The lapsed balance was carried over for the benefit of other persons and not for that of Mr. Churchill alone. The name of Mr. Churchill has been inserted here in order to pay him the money which it was not proposed originally to give him.

Mr. MULOCK. I did not understand the object of putting Mr. Churchill's name in the Governor General's warrant.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was not in the Governor General's warrant. It is inserted in this vote.

Mr. McMULLEN. Then, in sending Mr. Churchill a cheque, the Government certainly must have done something wrong.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That has been explained to have been an accident, it was a mistake of the officer, and was corrected as soon as the Government knew it.

To pay B. Chamberlin for extra work $300

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to ask a question in connection with this vote. Mr. Chamberlin, who is well known to most of us, occupies the position of deputy head of a department, but his salary is on a very different scale. Is there any reason why that distinction should be made, that he should be in an inferior position as regards salary, when he is in an equal position to deputy heads as regards responsibility and in every other respect?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He may be underpaid.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He is a chief clerk, and gets $2,400.

Mr. O'BRIEN. He gets the salary of a chief clerk, and performs the duties of a responsible deputy head.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Chamberlin is a good officer, but I do not think his position is equal to that of a deputy head, either technically or in point of fact.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Under the Act of last Session, he has been made deputy head.

Customs $12,710 95

Mr. BOWELL. To provide for the purchase of two steam launches at Halifax and Quebec, $6,000—The object is to enable the officers to visit with greater rapidity the different vessels as they arrive in the harbor. I think it will be an economical arrangement rather than an expensive one. In all these ports we have to keep up a number of boats, and steam launches of this kind will take their place and can be used in running down the harbor to look after smugglers.

Mr. MITCHELL. I agree with the Minister that it would be a matter of economy, for they now have to keep row boats. As there are two steam launches now, in connection with the marine police at Quebec, I would suggest whether it is necessary to provide another one. At Halifax it is necessary. In Quebec, they are under the direction of the marine police, and would be at the service of the Customs. It appears to me that the expenditure at Quebec is not necessary. The number of vessels arriving there has fallen off very much.

Mr. FOSTER. There is only one in Quebec.

Mr. JONES. Does the Minister think $3,000 is a large enough sum to secure a proper steamer?

Mr. BOWELL. I have been told that I was not taking a sufficient sum. My intention was to purchase launches that might visit the vessels as they arrive in the harbor, for which purpose an inexpensive open launch would do. But if the Government decide to have a steam launch sufficiently large to run out to sea, it might be made available for the purposes to which the hon. gentleman has referred. I did apply to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to ascertain if he could not place that launch at the disposal of the Customs, in order to avoid the necessity of purchasing another vessel, and was told I could not. There was a yacht in connection with the Agricultural Department which was used in the cases of epidemic, in running to Grosse Isle. It was purchased for that purpose during the time of the cholera. I also applied to that Department to see if I could have that transferred to me; and I was told that in case of any contagious disease breaking out in Europe, or in any country with which we have communication, it was necessary that they should have a boat for health purposes to prevent the spread of disease.

Mr. LOVITT. If the Government are going to buy these boats I hope they will ask for tenders, because in the town from which I come there is a man who does nothing else but make these boats.

Excise.....$8,674 88

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. To pay Joseph Baby, arrears of salary as an exciseman, $230—How does it come about that you go back to 1882 to confirm a small salary? Although a small sum, this appears to be as objectionable a vote as you can well imagine, where we are called to pay a claim which appears to have accrued five years ago.

Mr. BOWELL. The Minister of Inland Revenue explained to me in the earlier part of the evening that this was not worded correctly. The gentleman entered the service at a certain sum. After the probationary term had expired he became entitled, under the excise law, to an addition to his salary. That has been running for two years and a half now, and Parliament is asked to vote the amount which he would have obtained if the law had been carried out.

Mr. MITCHELL. An explanation is needed with regard to the vote of $200 to pay D. Quinn, exciseman, compensation.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The duties of this officer are in Montreal. He was sent away by the Department to an outside place to perform duties that did not regularly belong to him. While absent, the flood occurred, and his property was destroyed.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Perhaps some explanation will be given with respect to the vote of $8,000 for preventive service.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is for special preventive service.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it for secret agents that the Minister of Custom has used so effectively?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is to prevent illicit stills.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Have there been many discovered?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Has the number increased since the duty on liquor was raised?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I believe there is greater difficulty; that as the duty increases the difficulty increases.

Railways..... $335,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I asked from the Minister of Railways or the Minister of Finance, a statement of the expenses and receipts up to first of the present month on the Intercolonial Railway. I have not seen that statement.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I laid it on the Table, and a similar statement in regard to canals.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do you remember the amount?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. About $147,000 excess of deficiency. The deficiency has increased, I think, about $147,000 this year over the same period of last year. I am speaking from memory.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You are not referring to the Intercolonial Railway?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose the hon. gentleman can tell us how many unnecessary hands—he can tell us, perhaps, within a hundred or two hundred—were employed before the election in Northumberland, shovelling snow? Perhaps the hon. gentleman was not here at the time and cannot tell us.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There was snow enough without employing men unnecessarily to shovel it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Snowballs.

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, there were enough "snowballs," and did me good service; but there was not enough power in the Government, though what they had was used without scruple, to keep me out of this House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So I understand the deficit on the Intercolonial Railway will be about a quarter of a million.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. Statements have appeared in the public prints in relation to an offer alleged to have been received by the Government for the purchase of the Intercolonial Railway. Has there been any bona fide offer made, and have the Government any intention of selling the road? If they do sell that road or entertain the idea of selling it, they will do that which will not be satisfactory to the people of the Maritime Provinces. I wish to give the Government a warning. When we entered into the engagement in London embodied in the British North America Act, the representatives of the Maritime Provinces, particularly the gentlemen representing the northern part of New Brunswick, entered into that engagement as part of the contract with respect to Confederation. It forms part of the charter of this country, and any attempt to sell the road to private parties would be a violation of the charter and of the arrangement entered into by the various parties to that charter.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There is no intention of selling the road.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not think there was, though certain parties have claimed that the Government are negotiating its sale.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am very glad the management is so good that the hon. gentleman dreads any change.

Mr. MITCHELL. The management of the Intercolonial Railway has not been such as is satisfactory to the country. I have no reason to be proud of its management in trying to array the electors of my county against me.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there any intention of leasing if not of selling the line?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No proposition of any kind has been entertained.

Post Office Department..... $3,418 92

Mr. WATSON. Is it the intention of the Government to establish at an early day a tri-weekly mail on the Manitoba South-Western Railway? The trains run three times a week and the people are at present greatly inconvenienced.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will make a note of it.

Mr. DALY. For the information of the hon. Minister and the hon. gentleman, I may say that the matter has already been called to the attention of the Postmaster General, who is about to take it into consideration. So there is no necessity for the Minister of Finance to take a note of the question.

Mr. MULOCK. I desire to call the attention of the Minister to the case of H. G. Hopkirk. I understand that he was not in the service up to the time of his appointment to the position; and the result is entirely unsatisfactory to the service. This officer, I understand, did not reach his place in the ordinary course of promotion, but was pitchforked over the heads of many seniors, and that certainly is not a proper way of proceeding.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Mr. Hopkirk had very great experience. He was, I think, a first class clerk in the Post Office Department, and was secretary to the Postmaster General for years. He knows the work of the Department thoroughly well, and is an exceedingly able man.

Mr. WATSON. While I am obliged to the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Daly) for answering my question, I must say that his answer is not satisfactory, and I would be better satisfied if the Minister would take a note of the matter, because I am aware that the matter has been brought to the attention of the Postmaster General.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am getting quite uneasy at the persistent attempts of hon. gentlemen opposite to press increased expenses on the Government.

Mr. WATSON. I think the service can be done cheaper by carrying it over the railway than as it is now carried.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You are mistaken there.

Mr. WATSON. The hon. gentleman has taken note of it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. gentleman should not encourage this extravagance by making a note of it.

Mr. BRIEN. I will ask if there is any intention of changing the mail route between Kingsville and Oxley, and making it run from Essex Centre to Oxley? Largely signed petitions have been sent in asking for this change, and though it was said in the election that promises had been given that the change had been made, I was surprised to receive a communication not long ago from a gentleman in that section, who is, I am sorry to say, a strong supporter of the Government, stating that the change had not been made. I do not think the change would cost any more; the distance one way is about twenty miles and the other only about eight, and it would be a great convenience to a thickly populated section of the country that the change should be made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Perhaps the hon. gentleman will write a memorandum to the Postmaster General on the subject.

Mr. BRIEN. It is rather late for that.

Dominion Lands—Collection of Revenue..... $37,548 88

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How long has this claim of Mr. Joseph Whitehead and Messrs. Sifton, Ward & Co. been due?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I think it arises out of their contracts on the Canadian Pacific Railway. None of the others had paid dues, and it was decided to place them in the same position as the others in that respect.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Is this a final settlement?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes. With regard to the next item in this vote—a gratuity to Mr. Donald Codd, of one month's salary for every year of service—I may state that Mr. Codd was in very poor health for a period of at least twelve months before December, 1881, when his last salary cheque was forwarded to him. The suggestion was made to Mr. Codd, through Mr. Andrew Russell, then chief clerk of the parliamentary branch of the Department, to apply for superannuation; and he appears to be under the impression that he did make an application, although such is not the case. His salary cheque ceased to be forwarded to him after December, 1881, because of the impossibility of obtaining replies from him to communications from the Department in relation to his duties generally, but particularly in regard to his vouchers for an advance of about $500 on account of travelling in his capacity as Inspector of Dominion Lands Agencies. This neglect on Mr. Codd's part was probably due to his mental as well as to his physical condition, and not to any cause connected with his honesty or probity; and although the period when the case should properly have been dealt with is now long past, yet, in view of the faithful and valuable services rendered to the public by Mr. Codd while he was mentally and physically capable, and of the mental and physical condition in which he was known to be in December, 1881, and for a considerable time subsequently, it would be reasonable and equitable to deal with him under clause 9 of the Act 46 Victoria, chapter 8, known as the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and grant him a month's salary (at the rate he was receiving when he ceased to be employed) for each year's service during which he paid superannuation abatement, which the record shows to have been from the 11th of May, 1872, to the 31st December, 1881, or nine years, seven months and twenty days. It is to cover this expenditure that this vote of $1,607.31 is asked for.

Mr. McMULLEN. I would compliment the hon. gentleman on the fact that he has just given the only satisfactory information to this House that we have been able to get from hon. gentlemen to-night.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask whether there were not, in Mr. Codd's time, several losses sustained by the Department in connection with receipts for land, and whether the Department ever recovered them.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I cannot say what the Department recovered, but I think the only case of any money which went astray, during Mr. Codd's time, and which was not recovered, was this matter of $500. Almost every month cases arose which showed that he was physically unfit for his position for some time before he ceased to be employed, and I think we have really adopted the best way of settling the matter.

Liquor License Act $26,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How much has this little amusement cost us altogether? Does this close the transaction?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will have to make a note of that.

Mr. MULOCK. Does this pay all fees?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend is going to take a note of that.

Mr. MULOCK. Last year we voted $50,000, and I think we were under the impression then that we had refunded all the fees that were illegally collected. I think we also discovered that some of the fees that had been collected never reached the Treasury at all. We were refunding what we did not get.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Oh, no. You cannot do that; you cannot refund what you haven't got.

Mr. MULOCK. What I mean is that it was intercepted on the way. Does this cover all the fees collected by the Government?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I hope so.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I believe, as a matter of fact, that a number of parties to whom licenses were issued sold liquor under the license. And when the law was held to be ultra vires, although they had sold, the hon. gentleman refunded their license. I do not think that should have been paid after they actually sold.

Further amount required for Surveys, &c $75,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This amount apparently means that there was an under-estimate of nearly one-half of the total expenditure.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). There was an under-estimate, but I think the House will have no reason to complain of that in the Estimates for next year. We have to pay out large sums to the surveyors in the spring, and this year it was so late that we had to get a Governor General's warrant for this amount.

Mr. MITCHELL. Is it necessary, when so little immigration is coming into the country, that so large a sum should be expended on surveys?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Yes; a good deal of this is to be expended in British Columbia and in the Yukon Territory, and in places where settlers desire to go in. I do not think any surveys are going on unnecessarily.

Territorial accounts $400,869 52

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I should like to know why this is introduced. Are we to have consolidated fund, capital account and territorial account henceforth and forever? Is the hon. gentleman going to open a new head of expenditure in the books of his Department?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is a capital expenditure just as much as the expenditure on Dominion lands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are certain obvious conveniences in charging it to capital, but it is bad book-keeping, I think.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that ought to be done, because this is part of the ordinary expense of the country, which must go on from year to year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is an extraordinary expenditure, in connection with the rebellion.

Mr. MITCHELL. Under the head of territorial account I find in the Auditor General's report on page 95 the small item of $618.13 for the keeper of the meteorological office in the Parish of Chatham, in the county of Northumberland. A few months ago, just about the time of the elections, the keeper died, and his son, who had been for a time doing the work, though not appointed to the office, has been, I am told, removed from the position and another person put in his place. I am sure the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries would not deliberately do an unkind, ungenerous, and, practically, so far as this party is concerned, an unjust act. The father of the young man was a Tory of the Tories, and would have voted against me had he lived, and his son is of the same way of thinking. Besides he is one of the chief supports of a widowed mother and a large family. The young man is perfectly well qualified to carry on the establishment; and to take it away from him under the circumstances, savors a little of cruelty. If the hon. Minister had known the circumstances I do not think he would have done it. I would like to know what he says about it.

Mr. FOSTER. The matter does not come up under these estimates.

Mr. McMULLEN. With regard to seed grain, I would like to enquire what security is taken for its return?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The security taken from the settler is a lien upon their land for the return of grain. They return bushel for bushel, and I am very glad to say, from all the information we can get, that we are quite likely this year or next year to get the grain returned.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the greater portion of the grain the Government bought for distribution is not still in the hands of the Government.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Oh, no; there is very little indeed in the hands of the Government. Last year there was some grain in excess of what was required for the Prince Albert district, and that was sold back to the contractors, we allowing them a little for it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman remember how many bushels they have on hand?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Very few. I cannot remember the exact number.

Mr. WATSON. What is the amount of wheat?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I will give the hon. gentleman the information to-morrow.

Unprovided Items$ 407,430 95

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to remind the Minister of Marine and Fisheries of what I have above stated about the Chatham meteorological establishment. Of course I have no right to dictate to him, and do not attempt to do so. I do not pretend, nor do I want to give him advice; but I would like to know if he made the change with the full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. FOSTER. So far as I recollect the facts, the young gentleman, who has been doing the work temporarily, has never been appointed, and I think he is still in charge of the meteorological survey at Chatham. We have the recommendation of another gentleman, and are not bound, because a person has been temporarily doing the work, to appoint him permanently. I do not think the appointment has been made yet.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Minister will understand I do not pretend to dictate to him what he should do, but I wish merely to call his attention to certain facts, which, I hope, will weigh with him. I should hope that the Minister, before making any appointment, would consider the circumstances in which the young man is situated and the circumstances of his family, because the late occupant was, perhaps, one of the best officers in the county. He was an ultra Conservative, and his son, I believe, is of the same way of thinking.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the hon. gentleman propose to go on with the Franchise Bill?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Will he make any amendments?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not aware of any. I move that when this House adjourns, it stands adjourned until to-day at 1 o'clock.

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD move the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3:05 a.m. (Wednesday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, 22nd June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at One o'clock.

PRAYERS.

PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. BERGIN moved the adoption of the fifth, sixth and seventh reports of the Joint Committee on Printing of both Houses of Parliament.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Does that include the recommendation about the papers procured by the two Houses?

Mr. BERGIN. By the Department of Printing.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. And not by the two Houses?

Mr. BERGIN. Oh, no.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Perhaps the report had better be read, that we may know what it is.

Mr. BERGIN. The committee recommend that the tenders received should be sent to the Secretary of State, with the deposits.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. The other day there was a clause in the report recommending the suspension of the law, and that the stationery of both Houses be supplied by each House.

Mr. BERGIN. We struck that out.

Motion agreed to.

NORTH-WEST CENTRAL RAILWAY.

Mr. MACDOWALL asked, What is the objective point of the North-West Central Railway? What mileage is to be built this year, if any? When the railway is to be completed? What grounds, if any, the Government have that this railway will be completed? How much of the Manitoba North-Western Railway is to be constructed this year? At what date any of the numerous railways projected to Prince Albert and Battleford are to be completed, and if not completed within a certain time, are their charters to lapse?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The objective point is the Rocky Mountains, via Battleford. Fifty miles are to be built this year. The railway is to be completed 1st January, 1891. The companies are bound to go on, and profess to have the means to enable them to go on. Fifty miles of the Manitoba North-Western is to be constructed this year. The Manitoba North-Western is to be continued under Order in Council of 6th May, 1885, at the rate of fifty miles per year.

INDEMNITY TO LT.-COL. ARTHUR EVANTUREL.

Mr. VANASSE asked, Whether a sum of money has been paid to Lieut.-Col. Arthur Evanturel, of the 9th Battalion, by way of indemnity for wounds or infirmity caused or contracted during the North-West campaign? If so, what is the said sum, and what is the nature of such infirmity?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Mr. Speaker, I am obliged to request the hon. member to consider his question as a notice of motion. On referring to the record, I find that it is impossible to answer this question without bringing down the returns which form part of the record. My hon. friend can make his motion now.

Mr. VANASSE. With the consent of the House, I move for :

Copies of correspondence with Lieut.-Col. Evanturel, of the 9th Battalion Rifles (Voltigeurs de Québec), in relation to a claim for an indemnity in consideration of wounds or infirmity caused or contracted during the North-West campaign; also, copies of all despatches, letters and medical certificates in relation thereto.

Mr. AMYOT. Would the hon. gentleman say what are his reasons?

Mr. SPEAKER. This motion cannot be put except with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. AMYOT. I do not object to the motion, but I would like to know the object sought by this motion. If it is to procure personal information, I think I can give all the hon. gentleman may require. If it is for some other public reasons I would like to know them. Surely he must have a motive.

Mr. VANASSE. I make this motion in the public interest, in order to ascertain what injuries he has received and amount he has obtained.

Mr. AMYOT. I move in amendment that the papers concerning all the allowances given to members of the North-West Force be furnished.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It would take years to prepare such a return.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The motion is as much in order as the other.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt of that.

Mr. AMYOT. Then I object to the hon. gentleman's motion.

INDIANS UNDER THE ROBINSON TREATY.

Mr. DAWSON asked, What is the amount of arrears and interest claimed by the Department of Indian Affairs as being due to the Indians under the Robinson Treaties?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Arrears, 1851 to 1867, $140,800; 1867 to 1882, $212,293.60—total, $353,093.60. Interest, 1851 to 1882, $81,920; interest on $353,093.60 from 1882 to 1887, at 4 per cent., $70,618.60; total, $152,538.60. Total, $505,632.20. From the year 1882 the Government has advanced the requisite amount, as voted by Parliament each Session, to pay the full annuity of $4 per capita annually.

ARMS IN THE NORTH-WEST.

Mr. HESSON asked, Whether the Government have seen an editorial in the Battleford Herald of the 7th instant, complaining that an order had been issued commanding the volunteers of Battleford to send in their arms for transmission to Winnipeg, to be stored there? If there is any truth in said statement, is it the intention of the Government to enforce said order?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. An order was at first given to collect these arms, to have them inspected and repaired, and put in order at Winnipeg. Subsequently, instructions were sent, by order of the Minister, to have them cared for by the mounted police. These arms are now being collected by the mounted police, and will be returned by them. In addition to the above, 200 stand of arms have been sent to Regina, 100 to Battleford and 200 to Prince Albert, in charge of the mounted police. We have in Battleford 274,000 rounds of ammunition, of which 150,000 rounds are to be sent to Prince Albert for safe keeping, in charge of the mounted police; 5,000 have also been sent to Regina.

PROMOTION IN THE CIVIL SERVICE.

Mr. O'BRIEN, in the absence of Mr. McNEILL, asked, Whether a candidate for promotion in the Civil Service, having passed such an examination as would entitle him to rank as a first class clerk, and there being vacancies only in the second class, would he be entitled to fill a position which might thereafter become vacant in the first class, without passing a subsequent examination?

Mr. CHAPLEAU. When a course of questions is given which would cover the qualifications for first class clerk, and the answers given such as would give the applicant the number of marks required for first class, there would be no other examinations.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The answer does not seem to meet the point of the question.

Mr. CHAPLEAU. I say yes to the question.

THE SHEPPARD CASE

Mr. RINFRET, in the absence of Mr. LANGELIER (Montmorency), asked, Whether the Government have received a copy of the presentment of the Grand Jury for the district of Montreal, complaining of the conduct of the Magistrates of the city of Toronto in the case of Sheppard, charged with libel?

Mr. THOMPSON. That document was received on Monday last.

FISHING LICENSES.

Mr. BRIEN asked, Have licenses for pound-net fishing in Lake Erie, county of Essex, been refused to any person or persons making application for the same? If so, to whom and for what reasons?

Mr. FOSTER. One pound-net license each to William Haskin and George Haskin were not renewed for the season of 1887—the reason being that they had sold out all their fishing plant and apparatus. Their net was found the previous season with a large quantity of fish in it, in various stages of decomposition—not having been attended to for several days, and it appears that they had not the necessary facilities for carrying on their fishing operations.

INDIAN LAND AT CAUGHNAWAGA.

Mr. DOYON asked, Whether it is the intention of the Government to see that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company pay a reasonable indemnity to the parties entitled thereto, for land taken by the company for the construction of their line of railway on the Indian Reserve at Caughnawaga?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Government will take care that the rights of the Indians to their land will be protected, and in case of any land being taken from their reserves for railway purposes, they will see that full compensation is got for it.

WILLIAM DALTON.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, Why have William Dalton's services been dispensed with on lightship on Miramichi after he had resumed his duties for the season, and was it by direction of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries? Had he in any way failed in his duties?

Mr. FOSTER. William Dalton is not this year in the service of the Department on the lightship on the Miramichi, and consequently it cannot be said that his services have been dispensed with. In former years his services have been satisfactory.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman has been misinformed. Mr. Dalton was employed by the Department, as is shown by the following letter from the agent of the Marine and Fisheries Department at St. John, N.B., as follows:—

"FISHERIES OFFICE, ST. JOHN, N.B., 3rd May, 1887.

"Mr. WM. DALTON, Newcastle.

"SIR,—I have the Minister's order to instruct you when the lightship is placed in her berth for the season, to resume on board of her your usual duties as special fishery officer among the islands at the mouth of the river. Your pay will be the same as formerly—$30 per month from time of commencement to 1st October.

"You will be guided by former instructions as to your duties, and at the close of the season send me a report of your action.

"I have the honor, &c., &c.,

(Signed) "W. H. VENNING,

"Inspector."

So the hon. gentleman will see that he was wrong, and that this man was placed on duty by the order of his Department. On the 13th May, ten days after the previous letter, Dalton received the following communication:—

"FISHERIES OFFICE, ST. JOHN, 13th May, 1887.

"Mr. WM. DALTON, Newcastle.

"SIR,—Reverting to my letter of 3rd inst., directing you to resume your old duties on board the lightship at the mouth of the river, I am now ordered by the Hon. the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to inform you that your services will not be required this season.

"I have the honor to be, Sir,

"Your obedient servant,

(Signed) "W. H. VENNING,

"Inspector."

So the hon. gentleman will see that he has not been informed on the point, some way or other.

Mr. FOSTER. The information is correct. Before the lightship had gone to her station he had received the second order.

Mr. MITCHELL. He did receive the authority?

Mr. FOSTER. Before he had gone to his duties on the lightship he had received the second order. He was not a permanent employé of the Fisheries Department, and his was simply a case of employing a man year after year at so much a month. He was employed in previous years in that way, and paid. This year his services were not taken by the Department.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have shown that his services were taken, and the man was put on.

Mr. DOYON.

DISMISSAL OF ARSÈNE L'ÈVEQUE.

Mr. GUAY asked, For what reason was Arsène L'Èveque, station master at St. Henri, on the Intercolonial Railway, dismissed? Has an enquiry been held into the charges made against him, and what has been the result of the said enquiry?

Mr. POPE. An enquiry was made, and the result was that the gentleman in question was found guilty of neglect of duty.

CUSTOMS ACT AMENDMENT.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved the third reading of Bill (No. 107) to amend Chap. 33 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, respecting duties of Customs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before the Bill is read the third time, I desire, although I am afraid it is in vain, to call the attention of the House to a few points in connection with the proposed Act. I need not delay the House by enlarging on the enormous quantity and number of the changes which have been made. They amount to very nearly 200 changes made in our tariff. They cover an enormous number of the articles which are most commonly in use, and they will result, it is perfectly clear, in adding immensely to the cost to the consumer (although probably not to the amount which will be received by way of revenue) on something like twenty or twenty-five millions of dollars of our dutiable imports now. In point of fact, Sir, when you come to deduct those articles which can hardly by any possibility be taxed, I think you will find the taxes on nearly one-half of our dutiable imports, all very heavily taxed already, have been largely increased under this statute. Now, it is not possible, and the Finance Minister was candid enough to admit that it was not possible, for us to ascertain what amount of revenue will be added by this measure. The hon. gentleman intimated that but a small amount, he thought, would be added. Now, it is possible in the long run, after these changes have worked out their probable results, that the hon. gentleman may be right, but I am inclined to think that, in the first instance, it will be found that a considerable amount of additional revenue—a good deal more than the hon. gentleman gave us to understand—will be obtained therefrom. However, it is not so much with the immediate results as with the ultimate results that the House has to deal. There is no doubt whatever that through these additions to the duties of Customs it will be found that a very large additional sum will be imposed on the consumers throughout this country, that articles of common everyday use are being taxed to a very much greater extent than they were heretofore, and there is no doubt whatever that this will result in imposing burdens on the people out of all proportion to the amount of revenue which will ultimately go into our coffers. It is a matter of great difficulty to estimate to-day what the ultimate results will be; and apparently, as far as we can judge in following out the discussions and in examining the estimates submitted by the hon. Finance Minister, the total increase to the revenue which he ultimately expects to receive can hardly exceed the sum of $500,000. I think he intimated that it would be about enough to balance the loss of duty on anthracite coal. On the other hand, there is too much reason to believe that the results to the consumers of this country will be to impose on them an additional burden of four or five millions of dollars at least, so that probably about ten times as much will be taken out of the pockets of the consuming population for the purpose of equalising the loss of duty incurred by the remission or loss of duty on anthracite coal. Now, that is an extremely serious matter. As I have shown the House over and over again, the results of our present policy are to lay enormous burthens on the consuming classes of this country, and more than all does it appear probable that those duties will fall, with ever increasing severity, upon the great farming and agricultural class throughout Canada. I do not think, at the present moment, it could be possible to devise a duty which would fall more severely on the agricultural classes than these enormous additional duties on iron. Here we find that at a time when it is well known by every hon. gentleman the consumption of iron by our farmers is daily and hourly increasing, when, owing to the diminution in the ordinary wood supply on which they formerly relied, a much larger quantity of iron is being used on the farm; when the use of expensive machinery largely composed of iron, and iron of those very classes which it is proposed now to most heavily tax, is continually increasing on the farm; when it is probable, according to statements made to me by many important agricultural implement manufacturers, that every farmer, throughout Ontario at any rate, requires to use on his farm $500 or $600 worth of implements in which iron forms the chief cost, at a time, too, as I have already pointed out, when the price of all agricultural products is lower than it has ever been known to be in our recollection—that is the time which the hon. gentleman chooses for imposing duties varying from 40 to 50, 60, and sometimes 70 per cent. on the iron articles which are most used by the farmers of this country. There is, I think, not a single article much used by farmers, which will not be found to be increased in price by these duties. From his fence down to the very shoes on his horses feet, in the case of all the implements which he requires to use, and which he is requiring to use more and more every day, we find an enormous addition made to his taxation. The same is true, though not, of course, to anything like as great an extent, in respect to our other great producing industry, the lumber industry. There, too, the hon. gentleman contrives to add more or less to the cost of production; but it is after all in its incidence, on the farming population of this country that this fresh taxation will most heavily fall. Besides imposing large ad valorem duties, the hon. gentleman has imposed exceedingly high specific duties on iron; and those duties in this case are more unfair than usual. In the first place it is quite clear, in regard to many articles of common use, that these duties will become almost absolutely prohibitive. In some cases, I find, the hon. gentleman has been imposing duties which, on the commoner grades of goods, are likely to amount to 75 or 80 per cent.; and from the very necessities of the case these duties are likely to be very deceptive in their operation. It is not possible to impose them in such a way that they will bear equally on all classes. The dearer the article the lighter the specific duty, and the cheaper and more common the article the heavier the specific duty. Over and above all that, there is another important consideration. We know that the iron industry, like other industries of that kind, is in a state of constant transition. We have seen the most extraordinary changes from time to time in the cost of producing iron that is largely consumed for all sorts of purposes, and especially for railroad purposes; and I have noticed that when a specific duty is once imposed, it is a matter of extreme difficulty, no matter how greatly the process may be improved, to induce the Government to abate that duty. If anything like a similar reduction in the cost of making iron should occur in the next few years to that which has occurred in the past few years, it is clear that these specific duties will form a strong barrier to improvement in the manufacture. A manufacturer, safely protected by a heavy specific duty, is very little likely to trouble himself in making experiments, and very little likely, until compelled, to adopt improvements which are likely to reduce the cost of the article in which he deals. For all these reasons, I think it is extremely unfortunate at this particular time that the hon. gentleman should propose to add so seriously to the burthens of the people of this country. At the same time I see no reasonable prospect of our farmers receiving anything like considerably better prices for the articles in which they deal, than they receive at present. Were it otherwise, this might be passed over with the less remonstrance, but as it is perfectly evident that they are going to be exposed to probably fiercer competition in the future than in the past, and as it is likely that the profits on the production of our most important cereals have gone down to such a point that there is only a comparatively small portion of our most fertile Provinces where the grains in which the farmers chiefly deal can be raised at a fair profit, I say it is impossible to conceive anything more insane than to choose that particular time for putting on a tax which must bear very heavily, indeed, on the great farming class of this country. It is not possible to ascertain exactly how much iron is consumed by each farmer in the Dominion, or at least in the older Provinces, but it is clear that the quantity is not only very large, but is necessarily constantly increasing from time to time, and it is quite clear that the result of these duties, and these iron duties in particular, will be to inflict a very heavy tax indeed upon that particular class. Sir, I wish that the hon. gentleman, even at this late date, could be induced to revise, at any rate, that portion of his proposals relating to the increased duties on iron. I am quite certain that within a few years that burthen will be even more seriously felt than it is at present; and I can conceive of no justification whatever, in the present state of this country, for inflicting such an enormous burthen on the people as these resolutions propose to inflict.

Mr. HESSON. Before the Bill is read the third time, I desire to make some remarks, which I was about to make yesterday, but which were held over for the benefit of the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, on a matter affecting a very important interest in this country. I refer to the question of the Government's policy, or their departure from the policy which I had hoped would be carried out, in regard to an export duty on elm logs. It will be remembered that last year the question of an export duty on pine and spruce logs was brought before this House, and the Government adopted the policy of imposing that duty. Now, I have taken the trouble to look into the Trade and Navigation Returns to see how that duty affected the export of those articles. I find that, in 1885, pine logs were exported to the quantity of 380,000 feet, valued at $2,300, an average of $6 per 1,000 feet in the log. After the export duty was imposed in 1886, it is a most remarkable fact that not only did the quantity of logs exported very largely increase, but the price obtained per 1,000 feet also largely increased. There stands out a still more prominent and important fact, that the Government received a very large amount in the way of duties from these exports. In 1886, 2,869,000 feet of pine logs were exported, at a value of $24,452, an average value of $8.50 per 1,000 feet in the log, and this in face of the fact that the Government had imposed a duty of $1 per 1,000 feet on those logs. Now, let us come to another item, more important still, that of spruce logs, on which an export duty was also placed last year, and see how the duty affected the export of that article. If hon. gentlemen who oppose an export duty on this raw product, look at the transactions as revealed by the Trade and Navigation Returns, they must be convinced that the imposition of an export duty on both pine and spruce has not interfered with the quantity exported or with the price, except to work a benefit in both cases. This duty is required, not so much to realise revenue as to protect our native capital, the raw product of the country, which, manufactured here, would give employment to our own people and produce immense wealth. There is not a man here so devoid of intelligence who cannot see that if you take a single log, export it and have it manufactured into all that the fine arts and civilisation require, there is, in the manufacture of that single log in a foreign country, an immense amount of value, both in the employment of labor and the creation of wealth, lost to our people. It is most extraordinary the Government cannot carry out the policy a little further than they have. Let them protect the elm log, and the oak log, and the ash log, and the basswood, and all that is required by trade and commerce, as a part and parcel of the best wealth of the country. We are gradually wiping out our great forests, which are the best portion of the estate God has given this country. They are being rapidly wiped out and carried away, without our getting but a very small portion of the benefits we ought to receive from them. The Americans come here; they have taken possession of our forests; they have bought, at the Government prices, our timber limits, and are exporting our wood, our lumber by millions of feet in the rough state. Let this go on for a time, and I will ask the people where they are going to land by-and-by? It is the greatest mistake the Government can make. I wish to impress this upon the Administration, because they require to be convinced that this question is of vital importance to the people. We had far better preserve that raw product in our country for the wants of our own people, and if the Americans want it, let them pay the price and the export duty as well. Let me show the effects of this policy on spruce, a large quantity of which was exported in 1885 and 1886. I find, in the Trade and Navigation Returns, 11,165,000 feet of lumber was exported in spruce logs, realising $49,474. We put an export duty of $1 a thousand feet on that, and what do you think it realized during the past year, according to the Trade and Navigation Returns? It realised $4.44 per 1,000 feet. In 1886, with a tariff of $1 per 1,000 feet, we find that the output largely increased; we find it reached 17,560,000 feet, realising $82,016. Let me show the result. This produced $4.68 per 1,000 feet as against $4.44 without the export duty, and has brought into the Treasury no less a sum than $17,566. If I were to add shingle bolts, from which we are to receive a duty of $1 per cord, we would have $20,000 export duty on these articles, which, by the action of the Government, not only produced a revenue, but, to some extent, protected the country, and has given us besides a better price for the logs exported. This is a very important consideration. It is worthy the attention of the Government. I feel that, when a petition has been presented, signed by 2,000 people, asking that an export duty be put upon elm, ash logs, and other timber in the raw state—elm $2, ash $2, stave bolts, &c., $1 per cord; basswood, &c., $1.50 per cord—when a petition signed by 2,000 settlers in the county of Kent, adjacent to the American country, where those mills and factories are erected which require that raw product, and where, by the present inter-state law, they are not able to get it through their own country as they did before, the Government should not hesitate to take action. The Americans are compelled to come here. They have fleeced our lands and bought our timber, and we should get something out of them as a drawback. It is time the Government came to the rescue and said to the Americans: You must put your mills in this country; you must make your stave bolts, &c., here; and then if you export them, our people will be on an equal footing with you. What are the facts? We have thirty-five firms who are petitioning for this duty, representing a capital of $814,000, employing 1,309 people, and with an annual output of $1,109,000. These men, living chiefly in the western part of Ontario, asked the Government to impose a duty, and they give as their reasons that the duty would not only be in their interests as manufacturers, but would be in the interests of the farmers as well. The mills in the county of Kent, for instance, are paying $6 per 1,000 feet for elm logs, while in the adjoining county of Essex, where there are scarcely any mills, and which has been exporting its logs until scarcely any more timber is left, only $3.50 is paid for the logs, and the farmer has to wait for the Americans to buy them. I am speaking here in the interests even of the men who do not seem to understand what would be the consequence if the American mills were put in their own neighborhood and gave employment to their own capital and industry. I feel deeply the importance of this question. I took an interest in it when the question of pine and spruce was brought up last year; I was one of the gentlemen who waited on the Government in that connection. I have shown by the Trade and Navigation Returns that we would be $20,000 better off by the imposition of the duty than we are. My hon. friend, Mr. Perley, who is in the trade, will tell you that, after all, the duty has not decreased the price of lumber. I believe that will be verified. So hon. gentlemen will not be permitted to infer that the advance has been in lumber generally or logs particularly. I say it arises from this fact: The Americans have cut their timber. They were found here at that time with 50,000,000 feet of timber cut in the country, and they were unable to export it unless they paid that duty on the output. I was in favor of a duty of $2 a thousand then, and I believe the country would have been so much the richer. If these logs had not been exported, we would have had them to manufacture for the use of our own people and would have been able to export the manufactured article, which would be very much better. I will read a telegram which was sent to my hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Brown), from Wallaceburg, which is in the centre of that part of the country which is most affected by this:

"In 1879 only one mill on Sydenham using about one million annually. Price paid for logs by Americans, $2.50. There are now ten local mills using about 30,000,000 feet annually; price advanced to $6 thousand; ready sale for farmers' produce and employment for their boys at home. In Patterson's locality, where no local mills, the farmer receives $3.50 per thousand from American millmen. American mills would be obliged to move to Canada or stop manufacture. Inter-State Commerce Bill would prevent them going back into Michigan. The timber is the capital of the country; why allow American mills to reap the benefit? Compare our petition of over 2,000 names, principally farmers, with Opposition petition of about 700 names, mostly from town of Windsor, in Patterson's locality. A great many bolts are made which gives more work for men, preventing the wholesale exportation of logs. Will increase manufacture of bolts, giving employment to men and boats. When we tried for export duty, five years ago, the farmers in this locality were opposed to it. Now all are anxious for it. The same thing would be repeated in Patterson's neighborhood if exportation were prevented. Within five years there has been thousands of acres denuded of its valuable timber by American millmen, far in advance of settlement."

Now, this is a very serious matter. If the Americans are taking away our timber and leaving the stumps and the undergrowth there, we know the difficulties which arise after the most valuable product of the country has gone. We know how valuable the timber has grown to be in Canada, and especially on the frontier, with the facilities which they have there, in the neighborhood of Essex and Kent and the counties adjoining the border, where they have the water to carry the timber away to the American mills. Here is another telegram, dated Wallaceburg, which reached us here to-day from an excellent business man representing $85,000 of capital and employing 60 or 70 men:

"Have just been credibly informed that three American manufacturers intended moving their plant to Canada had export duty been allowed to remain. The Government are making a great mistake

"H. E. NORRIS."

I ask the House to forgive me for occupying their attention so long, but this is a question of great importance. I have a petition here representing, as I have said, nearly a million of dollars of capital in which it is pointed out that while $6 a thousand is being paid in one county, in the adjoining county $3.50 is being paid. I say that the most valuable product of the country is going out of it, that is, the timber in an unmanufactured state, and that is a loss which we can prevent ourselves. I ask the Government to consider this matter. I have no hope that they will do so this Session, but I do hope that, before we next meet here, the Government will have so investigated the matter for themselves and will have taken the trouble to enquire into the best interests of our people as to the protection of our forests, which are the best part of all our capital and which are so rapidly disappearing from the face of the country. After having had the experience of the export duty for the past year, they will feel encouraged to give protection to that product which cannot be replaced when once it has disappeared.

Mr. ROOME. As I was one of those who waited upon the Premier, I desire to say a word or two in relation to this matter. I differ from my hon. friend from Perth (Mr. Hesson). It seems that the members who live at a distance from the elm timber are those who are agitating this matter, but the hon. members for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) and Lambton (Mr. Lister), who are most interested in this matter, have not said a word in connection with it. I agreed at first with the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) and other members, that the export duty should be put on, but I was wrongly informed in relation to that matter. Those gentlemen who came here from Wallaceburg and Dresden represented that they had $1,000,000 invested, that they were employing 1,300 or 1,400 men, and were making an output of a million a year. I was informed by them that the duty on the American side on manufactured lumber had been increased to 25 or 30 per cent. On enquiry, I have found that that is not true. It was 10 per cent. before, and it is 10 per cent. now. Again, I find that they advocated the putting of a duty on staves. They are manufacturing that as well as lumber, and they wanted a duty on the export of staves and bolts, as well as upon our lumber which is sent out of the country. These gentlemen say that, because there are so many men employed in preparing lumber for export, there should be no export duty put upon this article. I approve of the action of the Minister in removing this duty, and especially at the present time, when there are many of our farmers who have contracted largely to supply timber to the American market. During the winter months, they got their timber out at a large expense. They had two or three, or perhaps five million feet of this elm timber ready for shipment when this export duty was put on. Many of them had their arrangements made for hauling this timber to the other side, and then the duty of a dollar a thousand feet was put on. Many of these young men who had devoted their winter to this work would be ruined by this export duty. In justice to the farming class of the community, I do not think it was right to impose that duty in that way. If the Government had put on an export duty which was to come in force next year or next winter, it would not have been so bad. I have not seen one farmer come here during this Session to advocate a duty on elm logs, and the farmers are the men who are most interested. Everyone who is interested in elm timber knows that, when the land is drained, the elm timber dies. In the western part of Ontario now there is a large amount of drainage going on, and, when the water is removed, the elm timber dies. The Minister has stated that during recess he was going to consider the matter, and endeavor to find a remedy for the state of affairs that exist, and I think a better plan could not be adopted. I have the honor to represent a county in which there are a number of mills manufacturing staves and bolts. These mills have been supplied with logs during the present year, and I think no harm can come from the proposition of the Minister being adopted. During the time between the present and the next Session of Parliament, the Government can consult the farmers and the owners of timber and see what it is best to do. I am a believer in the National Policy, but I do not believe in an export duty which will do more harm than benefit to those who are most deeply interested.

Mr. PERLEY (Ottawa). I have been very much interested in the debate on this question. I was asked to join a deputation to wait on the hon. Premier upon the subject, and I have taken an interest in supporting the measure which the representative men in that industry have brought before this House. I have gone into a calculation in reference to the production of this lumber, and the sawing of these logs in the section of country where they grow, and I find that there is a sacrifice on the benefits that should arise from the manufacture thereof in this country of at least $4.25 a thousand, under the system of free entry to the United States. I make that up in this way: I consider that the sawing of these logs in this country is worth $3 a thousand—that the labor costs that much, merely to saw these logs ready for market; I reckon the slabs and refuse to be worth, at least, 25 cents a thousand for fuel or other purposes, and I contend that $1 will not over represent the profit that may fairly be taken into account in sawing these logs. That calculation on the amount of lumber, which my hon. friend has given to this House as being produced annually in one particular section, in this particular branch of lumber, 52,000,000 feet, makes a total loss to the labor and general interests of this country of $212,500. Now, I contend that the policy of protection should cover the manufacture of the products of trees in all sections of the country, as much as it covers any other trade that we have to foster and encourage; and if we allow logs to be exported free, we rob the farmers and owners of timber of their right to make a profit on those trees. My hon. friend from Essex (Mr. Patterson) has given to this House an illustration which, it seems to me, is foreign to the argument; he appears to have given the results of the manufacture of these logs in his section of the country in the interests of the exporters. If these logs are worth $6 a thousand for pine, as has been shown, and we get $3.50 a thousand on exporting them to the United States, there is a clear difference in favor of their manufacture in the locality referred to of $2.50, besides all the advantages which I have stated would accrue on the sawing in this country. Hard wood timber, as is well known, grows in many localities that have not hitherto been accessible. We see this on the line of the Canada Atlantic Railway, which runs through a section of country where hard woods prevail and where much of the pine had been taken off. On the line of that railway, in the short distance between here and Alexandria, there have been 12 or 15 mills constructed for the purpose of converting the hard wood trees into money for the use of the settlers. Last year Parliament was opposed to the imposition of an export duty. I cannot, for the life of me, understand on what ground that opposition was based. I contend that those who have been cutting their trees and disposing of them at from $2.50 to $3 per thousand had no saving of money for the trees; they merely got paid for the labor expended in getting them to market, but they sacrificed the profit that should be gained by cutting up the trees in the neighborhood where they grow. I do not know the section of country with which the hon. member for Hamilton and the hon. member who is before me (Mr. Hesson) are familiar, and whether they possess reasonable means of transportation by rail for the products of those logs. I have no doubt, however, with the enormous increase in railway facilities, that the country will be supplied in all its principal localities with means for the transportation of whatever products that section of the country may have to dispose of. On that account, no doubt, that section of country where these elm trees grow will, in a very short time, if not already, be supplied with the means of transportation which will enable them to convert those trees into the manufactured article, and ship the product by rail to any market they please. In view of this fact it seems to me most important that this industry should be protected by an export duty. I had, therefore, much pleasure in supporting the depositions which came here for the purpose of asking an imposition of that duty. I advocated the imposition of duty on pine logs last year of $2, with power to the Government to raise it to $3. I claim that the effect of that imposition of $2 on pine logs, which was imposed last Session, has been decidedly in the interest of the country and in the interest of the log producers, as has been shown by my hon. friend from North Perth (Mr. Hesson). That hon. gentleman says the duty was $1. My impression was that it was $2, with power given to the Government to raise it to $3. The effect of that duty, I submit, was to stop the shipment of pine logs from Canada to the United States, and to encourage the cutting of those logs within our own borders. That has been the result of the duty on pine logs, and I have no doubt but that the imposition of a similar duty, even a duty of $1 per thousand on elm logs, would have a similar effect; we would produce the manufactured article, and the duty would tend to discountenance the conveyance of logs across the line to manufacturers in the United States. The adoption of a similar policy in regard to elm logs would be an indication to people on the other side of the border, those who have been taking logs across, that they cannot continue to deplete that section of the country by continuing that kind of business. I must say that I felt much regret when I learned that this duty had been struck off by the hon. Finance Minister. I felt, however, after listening to the remarks of that hon. gentleman, that the Government had given consideration to the subject, and that when the matter came up another year it would result in the imposition of an export duty. I admit there is some force in the argument of the hon. member for Middlesex (Mr. Roome), that those people who have gone in during the winter and taken out elm logs might consider it unjust that the Government should take advantage of their operations last winter to impose a duty on the logs which they had taken out to convey to their mills in the States. But the steps taken and the expression given by the Government will, I hope, give those people to understand that the matter has received the consideration of the Government, and that they will deal with it, and that sufficient evidence will be given to satisfy the Government as to the desirability of imposing an export duty. There are many sections of the country that produce growths of hardwood, such, for example, as the section which the hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin) is going to open up by railway communication, and many other localities. I, therefore, consider it important that the Government should give attention to this subject, and no doubt they will impose a proper duty upon this article, and that thereby labor may be protected and our people enabled to deal with this trade in the best manner possible, and direct their efforts to the conversion of timber into money.

Mr. EDWARDS. From the beginning of the Session up to the present time I have not taken up the time of the House for a single moment, and I would not, on this occasion, occupy it for any length of time, even if I was capable of doing so, but for the reason that I wish to record my strong approval of the course of the Government in withdrawing the duty proposed on the export of elm logs. My hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Perley), who has just taken his seat, is a protectionist. He believes in imposing a protective duty as against the agriculturists of this country on all that they import, but he also wishes to impose an export duty on their product. I hold that elm trees, growing on our farmer's lands, are as much his property and his products as are his wheat, barley, peas, and everything he produces, and it would be a very great injury to impose an export duty on his products. To carry this principle fully into effect, it would be just as reasonable to say that the wheat and barley of this country must be manufactured in this country; that we shall not export it as it is grown, but must manufacture it into meal. I think that would be entirely wrong, and I think it would be quite as wrong to impose this export duty on elm logs. Now, I would like to ask the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Perley), if he would like the principles he has advocated carried fully into effect, because, if they were, the lumber which he produces and which I produce, would not be exported in boards or deals, but would have to be manufactured into sashes, doors, and other articles of that kind.

Mr. PERLEY (Ottawa). I did not take that ground at all. I took the ground of protection to the manufacturer.

Mr. EDWARDS. That our boards and deals, instead of being exported in that form, would have to be manufactured into sashes, doors, blinds, boxes and other articles of that kind.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And give employment to labor.

Mr. EDWARDS. Then, with regard to the idea which seems to prevail in the minds of a great many hon. gentlemen, that the Americans would have to pay this export duty instead of the people of this country, I say that idea is entirely wrong. The time has not arrived, and will not arrive for some time, when our lumber will be an absolute necessity to the Americans. A great many believe that the price of our lumber is fixed in this country, but that is a fallacy. The price is fixed in the American market, and we have not one word to say in fixing the price. Elm logs are not a necessity to the people of the United States. The question with them is simply one of transport, because there is in the Southern States a far greater quantity of lumber than we have in this country, and it is simply a question of where the lumber can be transported from most cheaply. I say that it would be a great injustice to our farmers, a class of the community to which this country is far more indebted than to any or all other classes combined, to impose an export duty on elm logs. I am glad, indeed, that the Government have seen fit to withdraw that imposition, and I hope that nothing will occur during the recess to cause the Government to change their mind. They need not fear a defeat in any degree in a matter of that kind. For my own part I may say that I came here to advocate what I believe to be in the country's interest, and not those which are in the interest of any party; and when the Government move as they have done in this matter, or in any other matter which I believe is a matter of justice to a class to whom this country is far more indebted than to any other class—that is, the agricultural class—when the Government do this, they shall always have my hearty support.

Mr. ARMSTRONG. I add my congratulations to those of the hon. gentleman who has just spoken, to the Finance Minister for the stand he has taken in this matter. I am very glad that he has seen fit to withdraw this obnoxious impost. It shows that, tossing for so many years on the stormy sea of politics, it has not taken out of him all the milk of human kindness, and that he still feels for the poor struggling masses of the country. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown) made glorious speeches on the great benefits which would arise to a certain class of the community from this duty, and the hon. member for Hamilton made a statement about the price which was paid for these logs in the country—and I think the hon. member for Perth confirmed the statement, viz., that the price paid was $6 a thousand. Now, during the last two years these logs have been cut on my land, and during that time the highest price paid for them has been $3.75 per thousand, and that in face of the fact that there were two mills within four miles of the ground on which they were cut. I may say that I am not interested in the matter, because I do not derive a cent's worth of benefit, because I allow them to be taken out simply because I want to get the land cleared, and the people who take them out cannot afford to pay for them at the price they get at present. That being the state of things where there are mills, the contention of the hon. gentlemen, if carried, would simply amount to this: that the men who own the mills would be enabled to still further reduce the profits of these poor struggling settlers, and give them $1 a thousand less for their logs. Then there are large tracts of country in the west and south-west of the Province of Ontario, where the people are not within reach of mills at all, and if the views of these hon. gentlemen should prevail, the result would be that these poor creatures would either have to take what the Americans—with whom it is, as the last speaker said, simply a question of transport—saw fit to give, or be cut off from their markets altogether. That is the system which these hon. gentlemen advocate with so much eloquence. I need not tell those who have lived long in Ontario, of the hardships of the early settlers in that Province. We were cursed by a system introduced by the Government—not by the present Government; I do not blame them for it, but I blame the Government of that day—of handing over the lands of the country into the hands of speculators. The country was cursed from one end to the other, and the result was that prices running all the way from $2 to $10 an acre had to be paid for wild land, by honest, sturdy, hardy settlers, who spent a lifetime in paying these speculators an amount which the Government should never have allowed them to collect. The same thing is going on now. In the western part of Ontario there are men who would be afflicted by this proposed change—men who are paying $10, $15 and $20 an acre for wild land, land which is hard to clear; they have been toiling and striving to make a little part of their living from these elm logs, and now these gentlemen come forward and say: Take 25 per cent. off the earnings of these poor men in order to benefit the mill owners. The hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) boasts that he has a petition representing nearly one million dollars of the capital of these monopolists, and he asks that this provision may be enacted in their favor and against the interests of these poor people. These men—the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) and the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Brown)—are samples of the class to which they belong—men who look down with contempt from their solitary grandeur upon these poor people, and ask this House to sanction taking the bread out of their mouths. That is precisely what this system amounts to. The whole tariff is a hardship on the farming community generally, and an increasing hardship; and yet this Session you have been increasing the burden upon that class from one end of this country to the other. In the older settlements of the country, where the farmers are comparatively wealthy, they are more able to bear the burden than those in the more woody and sparsely settled districts. I must say again that I commend the humanity of the Minister of Finance in refusing to impose this additional tax, and I hope it will never be imposed. In the interest of Muskoka and other northern parts of this country, I am sorry the export duty on spruce logs has been imposed. The Dominion Government, where they have jurisdiction, and the Provincial Government, where it has jurisdiction, have deprived the settlers of the pine of the country, and I suppose a great deal may be said in favor of that course. The lumberman is always the pioneer of the settler; he gives the settler employment in the winter, and thus enables him to procure the necessaries of life for himself and his family in the early days of his settlement; therefore the restriction on pine may be justifiable. But the spruce has been left to the settlers, and I hope the duty upon spruce logs will be wiped out. In Muskoka and the other northern parts of Ontario, where there is a hard and rocky soil, spruce logs are almost the only resource left to the settlers out of which they can make anything; but by the duty imposed one-fourth of this advantage is taken from them. I hope that this system will soon change, so that these people may get some chance to live.

Mr. MASSON. I do not wish to prolong this discussion, especially that branch of it which relates to the export duty on elm logs. That, I think, has been sufficiently discussed already, especially as the Minister has promised to consider it during the recess. I desire, however, to say a few words on the question of the effect of the present tariff and the proposed tariff on the agricultural community of this country. It has been the refrain of hon. gentlemen opposite, from their leader to the last of his followers, that the present tariff always has resulted in the oppression of the agricultural classes. Now, as a representative of a rural constituency, I do not think I would be doing justice to my constituency or to myself if I sat silently by and heard those statements, which I consider far from the facts, hurled across the House. I have been well acquainted with the requirements of our agricultural classes from boyhood up; I know well what the condition of that class was before the introduction of the National Policy, and I know well its condition now, and I am free to assert that the agricultural classes of this country to-day are far better off in every respect than they were before the introduction of that policy. We have been treated to-day to a very brief speech from the hon. gentleman who has lately assumed the leadership of the Opposition; I refer to the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). In the brevity of his speech he is worthy of imitation, and I will try to imitate him. That hon. gentleman dwelt much on the same refrain, that the duties now proposed will be detrimental to the agricultural classes. He ventures the prophecy that the increased duty on iron will add to the price of everything composed of iron, and will prevent improvement in machinery. These are exactly like the prophecies that were made, perhaps by the same hon. gentleman—at any rate, by many gentlemen who think with him throughout the length and breadth of this country—in 1878, when they said that the increased duties would increase the price of agricultural implements and retard improvements. Have those prophecies been fulfilled? Have not agricultural implements improved since then more rapidly than they ever did before, and has not the price of agricultural implements decreased? We were told also that the higher duties on woollen, cotton and other goods would increase their prices in this country; we were told that every cent of duty that was imposed would be added to the price. Has that been the case? So far from that, tweeds and other woollen goods manufactured in Canada have greatly improved under the National Policy, and are now greatly superior to those which were manufactured prior to the introduction of that policy; and, notwithstanding their improvement in quality, these goods have decreased in price, I am informed by those in the trade, about 25 per cent. We are told, however, that the price of farm produce has decreased, while everything that the farmer has to purchase has increased in price. I deny that that is the case. I look into the farmers' houses and over their farms, and I can place my eyes on very few things that are actually imported. Of all classes in this country, I believe the agricultural class consume the fewest imported goods, and, therefore, the burden of the import duty falls most lightly upon that class. In the face of these facts, I hope the hon. gentleman will allow the House, especially those on this side of it, to believe that his prophecies to-day will fall as far short of realisation as did those he made in 1878. With regard to the effect of the tariff on the price of farm produce, we find, by looking at the Trade and Navigation Returns, that the importation of wheat into this wheat-growing country in 1878 was about 8,000,000 bushels per year, and reducing flour to bushels of wheat, we find that altogether about 7,250,000 bushels of flour and wheat were imported for home consumption into Canada in that year. Now, how has the duty imposed on wheat affected that importation which came here to compete with the Canadian-grown article? We find, by the last Trade and Navigation Returns, that the importation of wheat and flour has fallen to about 1,000,000, or about one-seventh of what it was in 1878. In coarser grains, especially in those that were imported, namely, oats, peas and corn, we find that there has been a vast reduction also. While, in 1878, we imported oats over 2,000,000 bushels, in the past year we only imported some 98,000 bushels. While, in 1878, we imported 7,500,000 bushels of corn, that competes with all the coarse grains of this country, and the free importation of which tends to reduce the price of all coarse grains, we imported last year only some 1,750,000 bushels. Referring to the exports, I find that, in wheat, we actually exported only about the quantity we imported, seldom running over 1,000,000 more, so that the quantity we had to export was just a trifle over what we were importing, from year to year, and in some years it was even less. We were told that, notwithstanding that state of affairs, the duty placed on American wheat to prevent it coming in, would, in no wise, affect the price. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), on a former occasion, told the House that the price of wheat had actually fallen instead of increased; and he insinuated, if he did not assert, that we had been told the duty would increase the price. If any statement was ever made that the duty would increase the price, that preventing American grain coming here would actually increase the price, that statement must be taken to mean that it would increase relatively the price, comparing, not the price of one year with another, but of one market at the same time with another. It will be admitted that Liverpool was, at that time, the ruling market of the world in reference to the price of wheat; and when the hon. member for South Oxford told us that, in 1878, wheat was at 90 cents a bushel in Toronto on the 1st October, he forgot to tell us that it was at that time $1.41 in Liverpool. While it ranged from 90 cents to $1 in Toronto, it was from $1.41 to $1.50 in Liverpool. The difference shows, taking on an average the highest and the lowest of the prices, a difference of 51 cents between the Liverpool and Toronto prices; and when the hon. gentleman told us that wheat in Toronto, on the 1st October last, was only 76 cents to 77 cents, he forgot to tell us that while it had fallen in Toronto from 90 cents to 76 cents, it had fallen in Liverpool from $1.41 to 38½ cents. It would be absurd to suppose, if the Liverpool market governs this market, that wheat would be higher, in 1886, in Toronto than it was in Liverpool, while in 1878 there was 51 cents difference in favor of Liverpool. The relative price has actually increased, and we have come some 30 cents nearer the Liverpool price. Taking the 1st October, 1886, and quoting from the Toronto Globe and Mail, which the hon. gentleman quoted, we find 21 to 22 cents was the difference between Toronto and Liverpool; while, going back to 1878, we find the difference was 51 to 52 cents. It may be urged that there have been other elements brought to bear to cause that decrease, that there has been a reduction in rates of freight, but I call the attention of this House to the fact that the present difference between Toronto and Liverpool will not pay the freight. Consequently, the consumption of our own wheat in our own country has had the effect of making us, to a certain extent, almost independent of the Liverpool market, and we are not actually governed by it. The excess we have to export has to go there, but, as the purchasers are not forced to export as they buy, they can wait their opportunity, and, on an average, have the markets in Canada higher, in proportion to the markets in Liverpool, than the freight between the two countries would actually warrant. I submit that the reason for this reduction is, that we have, by the development of the industries in the country, increased the consumption; and by preventing or restricting the importation of American grain, we have tended to allow the Canadian wheat to be consumed in Canada. Besides the large quantity that was imported, there is this view of the case to be borne in mind, that the American wheat harvest comes in earlier than ours, that their mode of harvesting and threshing has a tendency to bring their wheat earlier in the market than ours, and, before the tariff, they could take advantage of the Canadian markets when they were high, so that by the time the Canadians were ready to market their grain, the large milling establishments were supplied with American grain. Therefore, the dealers who bought from the farmers had to sell to others in the cities, and they had to export to Liverpool. I do not intend to occupy the attention of the House by going into the other matters, referring to other crops. I only call attention to the large decrease in the importation of coarse grain. I had, at an early stage, prepared figures in reference to the coarse grains. What I said in reference to the relative price of wheat, as compared with the Liverpool market, applies with equal force to the relative prices of coarse grains as compared with the American market, only that the change is in this way: That, whereas, before the introduction of the tariff, coarse grains in the United States were always a little higher, they are now generally the other way. Whenever the occasion did arise, when the price was higher in Canada than in the United States, this country was flooded with American grain, and down would go the Canadian prices to their normal condition, a little below the American. Now, especially for the last two years, the tendency has been the other way, and our prices have been, on the average, a few cents above the American.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Especially barley.

Mr. MASSON. As I stated, I do not intend to go into the details of these grains. I spoke rather to call the attention of the House to the fact that the tariff had a tendency to relatively increase their prices. But there is one exception, and that is barley. We never did import any barley to any extent, consequently the duty placed on barley has no effect in that direction. It has, however, no injurious effect, because we are in the same position now that we were before. In 1878, we exported seven and a quarter million bushels, and last year we exported eight and a quarter millions. If we had the control of the American tariffs instead of our own, if we could take off the duty on Canadian barley going into the United States, that, no doubt, would be a great boon to the farmer. Without detaining the House any longer, I may say that I trust that the prophecies of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), in reference to the increase in the price of agricultural implements and of everything else made from iron, will be no better realised than the prophecies which he made in 1878. I feel confident that in this he will be absolutely mistaken. If anything, the tendency of the increased tariff will be to foster improvements in agricultural implements, and especially the specific duty, because, in that case, if the same duty has to be paid on an inferior article as is paid on a superior article, the person exporting it from the other side into this country would certainly feel more disposed to pay the duty on the better article, and in that way I think the whole tendency of the tariff—especially the specific duty—will be to improve our machinery.

Mr. SEMPLE. I admired very much the remarks of the hon. gentleman on the other side who was speaking so very eloquently in the interests of the logs. That is a small interest and a sectional interest, but I must give credit to the hon. gentlemen for the way in which they endeavored to make the best of their case. That, however, is a matter in which only a few will be affected, but the question which the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) has touched is far-reaching. Anyone who knows anything of agriculture knows that the agriculturists of this country use every day in their life something which is made of iron; and it is nonsense for the hon. member for North Grey to tell us that the increased cost of the raw material will not increase the cost of the articles which the farmers use. I have here some circulars which I will read, and which were sent to a friend of mine. One of them is from Wood & Leggar, of Hamilton:

"Owing to recent changes in Customs Tariff, we beg to advise the withdrawal of all former quotations; we will be pleased to furnish prices upon application."

Another is from Adam Hope & Co., of Hamilton:

"Owing to the greatly increased duty on iron and steel, we have to advise you that all quotations on cut nails, iron and steel, and all goods manufactured therefrom, are hereby cancelled."

The other is from the Massey Manufacturing Company, of Toronto, which says:

"To give you an example of how rapidly material has advanced in price, we may say that iron and steel, of various sizes and shapes, have advanced during the past week or ten days to the enormous extent of $10 to $15 a ton, and pig iron has gone up $2 to $5, and everything else in about like proportion. Since writing the above, and after careful consideration, we have about concluded to issue a new advanced price list on June 1st, and, therefore, will not guarantee to fill any orders at present prices taken after that date."

Now, if this means anything, it means that there is to be an advance, and that advance takes place on everything which the farmer uses. We even heard from a gentleman from the Maritime Provinces that, in Prince Edward Island, there would be a considerable loss to them in regard to the iron which is used in the boats they build for fishing purposes. The member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) is evidently speaking a great deal by theory. I see by the "Parliamentary Companion" that he is a lawyer. He is nothing the worse for that, but these men do not speak generally from practical experience of these matters, as the farmers do. He has told the House that agricultural implements were high in price and that they had got cheaper. That is a reasonable thing when you consider the circumstances. I remember that the first reapers which were produced for the farmer lasted for twenty years, but those that are manufactured lately are made to sell, and are very slim and flimsy in their construction. It is the same with regard to stoves. In fact everything is flimsy nowadays, and, though it may be true that these things cost less, still they are dearer in the end. I can assure the House, and these circulars that I have read show, that the price of iron is increased, and, if a person wants to build a grist mill or a saw mill, or buys a threshing machine, or uses implements of any kind, he has an increased price to pay, and I consider that at the present time farmers are not in a position to stand this increased raid on their pocket-books. The decrease in the value of farms in Ontario from 1883 to 1884 was $30,000,000, and there were 196,000 acres cleared. Calculating that at $20 an acre, it would make an increase in value of $3,920,000, or a total decrease of more than $33,000,000 in one year. In the riding which I represent, I find that in the last five years the population has decreased by about 1,100; so there is no reason for asking the farmers to pay this extra tax which is to be put on articles which they use. Although I am a new member in this House, I have seen during this Session very little factious opposition. The people are aware that there is now a very heavy debt and that, with the addition of something like $5,800,000 to that debt, a duty must be put on somewhere, but there ought to be some discretion used, and I hope we shall have an opportunity of seeing who is in favor of putting an additional burden on the producers and who is not. There is another fact quite as important, and that is the feeling with which Great Britain regards this increase on the iron duties. While we sang yesterday with the utmost loyalty the National Anthem, and I hope we were sincere in it, I consider we have good reason to doubt the loyalty of those who have legislated against Great Britain in our tariff. In reference to the iron duties, I will read you an article from a leading journal in England, the Standard, which says:

"This is the way her statesmen practically illustrate their conception of Imperial confederation. The obvious truth is that Canada has given no thought to our interests, but only to her own. If the new tariff is persevered in, instead of drawing nearer together, the colony and the mother country must drift further apart, until one day complete severance takes place. Why should we waste a drop of blood or spend a shilling to shelter countries whose selfishness is so great that they never give a thought to any interests but their own? 'Buy our products and lend us your money to work your destruction with' is the political creed of Canada, and of more countries than Canada, and it is a brutally selfish creed. The success of the United States misleads the colonial democracy everywhere. The colonial democracy ignore the fact that but for English capital, protection would never have been a qualified success in the United States. The glamor of seeming success there blinds the Canadian democracy to the curse it lives under, a system which can only bring disaster. Unfathomable, indeed, are the depths of human stupidity. The Canadian tariff, as it existed before Sir Charles Tupper's last addition, was causing the ill-knit fabric of the Dominion to crack at its joints, and the additional strain may rend it asunder altogether."

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman is quoting an article from the London Standard, a paper that refused to publish the address passed by this House to Her Majesty. The only paper in London that did not publish that address; and I appeal to the hon. gentleman at this advanced period of the Session to hand it in to the reporter and consider it read, if he wishes it to appear as part of his speech, I think it is intolerable at this period of the Session for an hon. gentleman to read to this House a long article from a London newspaper.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This gentleman, I think, has not addressed the House before.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I have listened with interest to his address, and will listen to what he has to say, but to read a whole column from the London Standard paper that refused to publish the address to Her Majesty the Queen, passed by this House, is, I think, hardly the thing at this time of the Session.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Which particular address was it? Home Rule or the other?

Mr. BOWELL. The one passed by the House.

Mr. SEMPLE. If the hon. gentleman does not wish to hear it read, I can dispense with that; but I have only a few words more:

"It is a piece of folly for which there is not so much as a plausible excuse; our trade will not, however, be much influenced by the change. The result will probably be that we shall send a little less iron to Canada and buy a good deal less of her agricultural produce and timber."

There is no doubt something in that. Another hon. gentleman has touched on the same subject. He says that one effect of these duties will be that we shall have to pay more for our money if we do not buy anything from England. We practically say: The Dominion will take your money but we will buy nothing from you. For the deplorable state of feeling mentioned in this paper, hon. gentlemen opposite have themselves to blame.

Mr. JONES. I do not suppose that my hon. friend from South Oxford expected that his argument would have had the effect of inducing the Government to change their policy with regard to the tariff. That question was discussed at an earlier stage of the Session, and I do not propose going over all the articles enumerated under the tariff, nor to refer again to all the arguments adduced on that occasion. Since that tariff was brought down to the House, we have found a general feeling of indignation from all classes of the community. We have heard representations from all sections of the Dominion; we have found business men and agricultural people, our mining people, our fishermen, all uniting in a condemnation of this enormous increase in the iron duties; and we have found, as the hon. gentleman who preceded me, says, that it has aroused a feeling in Great Britain which, I am sure, hon. gentlemen in this House will admit it would have been better for us to avoid. I do not pretend to say that the British people have any right to dictate to Canada with regard to our financial concerns, but I do say that when there is a set determination to exclude from the Dominion of Canada British products, as is evinced by this tariff, and when we find such a feeling of intense excitement among all the manufacturers in the old country, where delegations have waited on the Government, and where it was even made a subject of enquiry in the Imperial House of Commons, I think the Finance Minister cannot afford to disregard such an emphatic condemnation, on the other side of the water. Sir, the question of the iron duties is one which has more behind it than would appear on the surface. The hon. gentleman, in introducing this measure, said it was going to develop a great industry throughout this Dominion. I believe, Sir, that it will have no such effect, at least immediately. I believe it was framed solely with a view of getting a large revenue to meet the extravagant appropriations which the Government are asking from this House from time to time. After having exhausted every means of taxation, after having put a duty on every article that entered into the daily use of the consuming classes of this country, the hon. gentleman then had a resort to the iron duties as the only means by which he might realise a million and a half or two millions to meet the extravagant expenditure which he asked from this House. During the short recess I visited Halifax, and in the conversation with hardware merchants there, I asked them to give me from their business returns a fair statement of what the practical effect of these changes would be. I hold in my hand a statement prepared for me by one of the largest and most influential hardware concerns in the city of Halifax, Messrs. Stairs & Co., and I think the Minister of Finance will acknowledge it a good authority and worthy the consideration of this House. I asked these gentlemen to give me in detail the bearing of this tariff, so far as it regards all those articles which enter into the tariff. I assume there are very few gentlemen in this House who are so intimately acquainted with the iron industry and the hardware business, as to be able to state with exactness the effect this change is going to have upon the business of this country. Therefore, I thought it was in the interest of the public at large that I should apply to a source which would be recognised as an authority, even by the Minister of Finance himself. Taking the first article on the list which they gave me, I find the article of shovels, which are used very largely. The Minister of Finance told this House the other day that the duty on shovels would amount to 37 per cent., if I followed him rightly, and at the same time he proposed an increase of 5 per cent. on the original proposition submitted. My friends in their estimates gave me the duty as 79 per cent., and with the 5 per cent. additional it would be raised to 84 per cent. On hay forks they gave me the duty at 46 per cent., fish forks at 49 per cent., boiler plate iron at 65 per cent., angle iron at 70 per cent., cut nails at 50 per cent., varnish at 50 per cent., pig iron at 50 per cent., besides a bonus of $1.50, making the advantage which the producer of pig iron would have equal to 75 or 80 per cent. protection. This is not all. Here we find a protection granted on those different branches of the iron industry ranging all the way from 46 to 84 per cent., and in addition there must be taken into account the expenses of importing, that is to say freight, insurance, commission, interest and other charges incidental to such enterprise, amounting all the way from 20 to 25 per cent. So if you take shovels on which there is a duty of 84 per cent., and add 20 per cent., you will find that the manufacturers of those shovels have a protection of 104 per cent. against all outside competitors. So with angle iron on which there is a duty of 70 per cent. The percentage may not be quite so high but adding the 20 per cent. the rate is brought up to 90 per cent., and on pig iron the rate is 100 per cent. Let hon. gentlemen opposite consider for a moment the effect this is going to have on the country. The hon. member for Centre Wellington (Mr. Semple), has shown the House, by a circular he read from a large hardware concern, that the prices of iron had advanced from $13 to $15. That is just the amount of the duty which has been imposed under this tariff. It was natural that it should advance. All the holders of large stocks of iron, would, of course, immediately take advantage and advance their price in proportion to the increase of the tariff, because they knew well that the moment their stocks were exhausted they could not replenish them from any other source under the old price, adding the additional duty which this Bill asks us to approve to-day. Every article into which iron enters has increased 50, 60 or 70 per cent. Look at the way iron enters into all industries. Every wheel that rolls over our streets, every animal that is shod uses iron or steel, and this tariff will add 50 per cent. to the cost. Hon. gentlemen will realise this fact when too late. They are willing to be deluded or captivated by the eloquence of the Finance Minister, in pointing out the great industry that is going to be developed here under this policy, and that if it is developed iron will not be so high as the present duties would place it at. But hon. gentlemen know well that if our iron industry is developed, and it will take a long time to develop it, those manufacturers of iron will do what other manufacturers have done and will do—they will either combine and make arrangements not to undersell each other, or they will place the price of their own article just a little below what would be the cost of importing the British article; and consequently our people will have to pay to the full extent the duty in every relation in which iron enters into our domestic uses. I hardly think the hon. gentleman could have estimated the extent to which this is going to be a burthen upon our people. The Minister of Finance told us that we use about 280 lbs. of iron for every man, woman or child in the Dominion, that is a very large amount and no doubt a correct one; and when a calculation is made on the basis of 280 pounds for each individual, and it is remembered that the price is going to be increased 50 per cent. under the operation of this tariff, he would be a bold man who would not hesitate and receive the advice even of the Opposition in regard to this matter, which is going to bear so heavily on the consumers of this article. There are other branches of trade in regard to which the tariff is equally objectionable, which we could point out if time permitted; but I am not going to deal with those to-day. I take those more prominent articles because they affect us in a large measure, they being articles of greater value. But all the smaller articles that enter into the hardware business are affected to the same extent. I do not expect any arguments from this side of the House, or even from England, remonstrances from friends or foes, will cause the Government to pause in their downward career.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. JONES. I say in their downward career, because they are going to extract from the pockets of the people a large amount of money annually, and are going to appropriate it, as they have appropriated money, in an extravagant manner year after year in undertaking enterprises which the condition of the country does not warrant. I would, therefore, ask hon. gentlemen opposite to pause before they place such a burthen on the shoulders of the people, which it is more easy under the hon. gentleman's régime to impose than it will be for his successor to get rid of. I wish hon. gentlemen and the country to fairly consider the application of this tariff on the articles to which I have referred, and I think after the House adjourns and after the country at large realises to its full extent the enormity of the increase in the way I have indicated, the hon. Finance Minister will not receive that approbation of the country at large which he has already received from his own friends and supporters in this House.

Mr. McDOUGALD (Picton). This is a subject of sufficient importance to justify me in asking the attention of the House while I refer to the changes made in the tariff. The changes embodied in the Bill now before the House are the greatest made since the National Policy was adopted by Parliament in 1879. I do not deny that they are far reaching, and that their consequences will mark an era in the progress of this country. As hon. gentlemen are well aware, in 1878 the question at issue between the two great parties was that of protection to Canadian industries. That battle was fought out, and the Government led by the present Premier was sustained on that occasion. In 1882, the same question was raised and fought out fairly on every hustings throughout the Dominion. The verdict of the people given on that occasion was a distinct and emphatic endorsement of the course of the Government. In 1887, the Government policy was again an issue, to a certain extent; it was an issue, at all events, so far as the Administration of the day are concerned. The policy they laid down clearly and boldly on that occasion was one of protection, and the verdict given was emphatically in support of the National Policy of protection to Canadian industries. The position occupied by hon. gentlemen opposite during that contest was a somewhat varied one. On some occasions they opposed the National Policy, on others they trimmed on it; but those who were entitled to speak with some authority on behalf of the party desired the country to understand that the manufacturers had nothing to fear from a change of Government. Therefore, if the principle of protection be right, if it is a principle which has been adopted by the country, I think it is the duty of the Government to carry out the verdict of the people and apply that principle where the circumstances of the case will justify it. As an advocate here of the rights of Canadian labor, I recognise the important step which has been taken in the interests of the people, and I think the application of the policy of protection to Canadian labor will receive from the country the same endorsement which it will receive in this House. If there is one principle which underlies the whole operation of the National Policy more marked than another, it is the principle of developing the natural resources of the country, by the protection of the Canadian labor engaged in these operations. Exception has been taken to the changes in the tariff, notably in relation to the iron industry, and the prediction has been made that the changes will result in adding largely to the burdens of the consumer. That there may be some increase, until there is a further expansion of the iron trade, is, of course, undeniable, but in the end I think the results will show a different conclusion. The hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) estimates that some four or five millions annually will be added to the burdens of the people by the changes which have been made. I can arrive at no such conclusion from my examination of the subject. In connection with the changes which have been made, and notably with regard to manufactures that are used by the farmer, speakers on the Opposition benches have raised a great outcry; and I observe that special objection has been made to the imposition of specific duties. The statement has also been made that specific duties operate as a barrier to the improvement of manufactures. If we look at the development of manufactures in other countries and study the legislation which has brought that about, we will not be justified in coming to such a conclusion. In almost all civilised countries of the world which have made any progress in manufacture, this system of protection prevails. With the exception of the case of Great Britain, we will look in vain to any great country advanced in manufactures, to-day, that has not a protective policy in force. I think Turkey is the only other European country of any consequence in which that policy is not in force. If we look at the marvellous progress which has been made in the improvement and development of manufacturing industries under protective duties, and especially under duties which are specific in their character, we cannot come to the conclusion that the imposition of specific duties will operate against the improvement of the manufacturing industry. Reference has been made to the objections taken in Great Britain to the recent tariff changes. I think those references rather show a justification for the changes which have been made. They point out conclusively that those changes are in the interest of Canada, and I think it is the first duty of a Canadian Parliament to look after the interests of the people of Canada. The objections are not altogether against the rights of Canada to make those changes, but, on account of the depressed condition of the iron industries of Great Britain, it is considered somewhat inopportune to apply those duties at the present time. But, if we look at the course of iron and steel importations into this country for a series of years, I think we will be justified in coming to the conclusion that it is time for Canada to take a decided stand in connection with this matter. When we consider that every year over thirteen millions of dollars on the average has been sent out of Canada since Confederation, to pay for articles which ought to be manufactured and produced in this country, I think we are now justified in taking up the question and dealing with it in a manner which will redound to the interests of the country. In connection with the quotations of figures which have been made, I desire to call attention to the question of agricultural implements. It is said that the price of these implements will be largely increased to the farmer. Now, the duty on agricultural implements, with few exceptions, has not been changed. Of course the duty on the raw material which goes into the manufacture has been increased. Reference has been made to the articles of shovels, hay-forks, pitch forks and other articles of that kind, as if the increased duty would have to be paid by the consumers in this country. I think our experience in the past will not justify us in coming to such a conclusion. In such articles as shovels, when they are made in this country, and there is sufficient competition, the price will be regulated by the cost of production, and I think experience will show that in agricultural implements there will be no material increase of price upon such as are made in this country. The increased duty on the raw material entering into a shovel is not one and a-half cents for an ordinary shovel, and the increased duty on the iron and steel entering into a mower or reaper is not over fifty cents. On a common garden hoe the increased duty for raw material is less than one cent., and the increase in duty on pig-iron which enters into the ordinary castings is only one-tenth of a cent per pound, so that this increase will not be seriously felt. In relation to the question of stoves, an increase in duty of one-tenth of a cent. per pound will not have the effect of increasing the price of these articles, and I may say that I speak from authentic information received when I state that the changes have not increased the selling price of stoves. On iron ploughs, which usually cost from eight to ten dollars each, the increased cost on the raw material entering into the manufacture, if the whole duty is paid, will not amount to more than fifty cents. I think the quotations of duties given by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) are somewhat exaggerated. If he will examine the tariff he will find, for instance, that while he puts the article of boiler plate at 65 per cent., in the form in which it is commonly used in Canada it is subject to a duty of only 12½ per cent., and for angle iron the duty will not approach 70 per cent. On large angles there is only a revenue duty, but on small angles made in the country the duty is $10 per ton and 10 per cent. In relation to the duties on pig iron, which he places at 50 per cent., I may say that if you take the importations for a series of years, which is the safest guide as to the amount of duty which will have to be paid, you will find that the average is less than 30 per cent. for the last seven years. The hon. gentleman speaks of the increase on iron amounting to $10 or $15 per ton, but I may say that the whole duties on bar iron do not in any case exceed $13 per ton, so that the increase cannot be from $10 to $15 per ton, as the hon. gentleman said. As to the articles manufactured out of iron and steel being increased 50 per cent. on the present value, I think experience will not bear out that statement, considering that the increase of duties on the raw material is small in comparison with the labor which will be involved in manufacturing the article. In relation to the higher classes of manufactures which are used by the consumers in this country—the articles on which the duties have chiefly been placed are not used directly by the consuming classes—they are used largely by the manufacturers, and what the consumer may have to pay will be the cost of the article in its finished shape. The duty on the higher forms of imported articles, as a rule, has not been increased more than 5 per cent. on the average over the former tariff, so that it is clearly impossible that the consumer will have to pay 50 per cent. more for the finished article. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) also says that this change is made for the purpose of taxation, in order to obtain $1,500,000 or $2,000,000 more revenue. This does not altogether harmonise with the statement the hon. gentleman made on this question at an earlier stage of the Session. At that time he told us that this change in the iron duties was made in the interest of one corporation, that of the Londonderry Iron Company, and that the application for the change was only made on its behalf. These statements, however, will hardly be sustained by the evidence of the facts. The advantages of increased protection to iron manufacture, I am aware, were pressed by delegations representing over $20,000,000 of invested capital, and coming from every Province of the Dominion east of the Red River, except Prince Edward Island. And as to the extent of revenue that will be realised from the changes, the hon. gentleman is very widely astray in estimating it at from $1,500,000 to $2,000,000. It will be noticed that in the application of the duties there are a great many exceptions—that a good many articles are still admitted at the revenue tariff rate of 12½ per cent., while the duties upon iron used in the shipping industry will be refunded under the drawback system. Taking the imports of iron and steel manufactures for last year, and applying the present duties to them on the supposition that the same quantity will be imported this year, the increased duties on that quantity would not amount to more than $7,000 altogether; and that will be largely offset in the first year by a smaller importation. The effect of this increase is also diminished by the fact of some additions having been made to the free list, and by the removal of $500,000 of duty on anthracite coal.

Mr. McDougald (Pictou).

Objection can hardly be taken by free traders to this readjustment on the grounds of taxation, as it will result in the burdens of the people being more equally distributed than they were when the duty existed on anthracite coal. Now, reference has been made to the effect of these changes in the tariff upon the condition of the farming class. It has been said that the farmers are exposed to a fiercer competition than they were formerly. That is no doubt true, and that is another reason why the farmers should seek for an extended market in Canada, over which they will have control, rather than destroy that market by the importation of foreign goods. It has been said that the American agricultural laborer has been reduced to competition with coolie labor by the importation of wheat grown in India and other eastern countries. That change has not been brought about by protection, but has been brought about notwithstanding protection; under a revenue tariff the American agriculturist would lose his home market in addition to being exposed to the competition of coolie labor in the European market. The importance of the iron industry to Canada may be estimated from the fact that, on the average, since 1868 over $13,000,000 in value of the manufactures of iron and steel have annually been imported into this country; and these importations have been coming to a greater extent, in many cases, from protected countries during the last few years than they have been coming from Great Britain. It is instructive to examine the classes of articles that have been imported into this country, and to note how the course of trade has been changed from Great Britain to countries that have protective tariffs. If we take the bulk of the articles into which skilled labor enters, we find that they largely come from the United States, and that the American manufacturers of such articles are rapidly displacing those of Great Britain in the Canadian market. As to the rate of duty necessary to protect the iron industry, and the methods being adopted for that purpose, we are only following the footsteps of other countries which have made any great progress in the manufacture of iron or steel. Let us examine some of the countries of Europe that have established these industries, and see what their condition was at the time they were started. Take Belgium, a country which depends altogether on imported ores, and which has not all the natural resources for the manufacture of iron and steel that Canada possesses. That country, up to 1866, had a specific duty of $4.76 per ton on pig iron, which was subsequently reduced to $1.01 per ton. On bar iron the duty up to 1866 was $9.53, which was subsequently reduced to $1.95. In each of these cases the duty was specific, and not ad valorem. The advantage of a specific duty is that it prevents under-valuation, and the use of false invoices; and although in operation it may be somewhat higher on the cheaper classes of goods, which are chiefly used, still these are the classes which can be most successfully made at first, and the manufacture of them educates the artisan in his business, eventually enabling him to compete in the manufacture of the finer goods. In Belgium the reduction of duty produced little effect on the quantity of pig iron received into that kingdom; but, notwithstanding the decrease in duty, the home production rose from 470,767 tons in 1865 to 655,565 tons in 1872; and, after that industry became thoroughly established in Belgium, and the protection was reduced to a very low rate indeed—to a merely revenue tariff—we find that that country, in 1880, made 610,000 tons of pig iron, 450,000 tons malleable iron, and 95,000 tons of steel, and exported 319,548 tons of iron and steel manufactures. In Germany a similar system of protection was adopted, and the duty was ultimately reduced. Starting in 1860 with a duty of $4.96 per ton on pig iron, it has been reduced to $1 per ton. Yet the production rose from 395,000 tons in 1860 to nearly 2,000,000 tons in 1879. Belgium, notwithstanding the reduction of the duty, holds its own in the manufacture of iron, and is a close competitor with Great Britain in the markets of the world to-day. In this connection Sir Lowthian Bell, after examining the question on behalf of all the manufacturers of Great Britain, says:

"All experience justifies the conclusion that, whenever profits in any particular branch of industry attain a position superior to that in other manufactures, capital is attracted thither; and, apparently, it matters little by what means this position is arrived at."

Another country to which I will allude in connection with this subject is France, a country which, in 1882, imported 10,243,000 tons of coal for carrying on its manufacturing enterprises. The duty on pig iron imported into France was, in 1860, $9.53 per ton; in 1864, $7.78 per ton; and in 1865, $2.92, which is the duty at present in operation. On bar iron the duty in France at present is $9.93 a ton; iron rails the same duty; iron plates, $13.88 a ton; steel rails, $11.75 per ton; steel plates, $17.83 per ton. The production of pig iron rose from 992,000 tons, in 1866, to 1,733,000 in 1880. Although, in France, the coal has to be imported, 90 per cent. of all the iron used in that country is of French make; and not only is the coal imported, but 38 per cent. of the ore as well. As regards Great Britain, which is the only great country in the world that has adopted free trade, we find that, in the earliest stages of the iron industry, it was protected as highly as we propose to protect it here. In 1750 it was enacted that no tilt hammer or mill for working iron or furnace for steel be permitted to be erected in America. In 1785 the exportation of tools and engines for iron works was prohibited under the penalty of a fine of £200 and forfeiture. In 1785 a £500 fine was imposed for enticing iron artificers to emigrate. In Great Britain the following were the duties imposed:—

"The duty on bar iron from 1795 to 1835 ranged from $13.65 to $31.63 per ton. In 1836, on cast iron, the duty was 20 p. c.; wrought iron enumerated 80 p. c.; steel and its manufactures, 50 p. c.; wire, per ton, $577; hoops, per ton, $115."

Great Britain never adopted the policy of free trade in iron until she reached that position when she manufactured half the pig iron in the world. In the earlier stages of its manufacture, iron was highly protected in England. As regards the development of the iron and steel industry in the United States, the position is a most remarkable one. That country imposed a duty of $28 a ton on rails; now it is $17 a ton. On pig iron the duty was $9 per ton; now it is $6. On bar iron, the duty is now $16 to $24 per ton, and on puddled iron it is $16 per ton. And this is a protective country which is driving the British manufacturer, in the highest articles of manufacture, out of the Canadian market. The position of the United States for cheap manufacture of iron cannot be compared with the position of Canada in that respect. From the ore fields of Michigan to the Pennsylvania coal is 1,000 miles; the coke from Connellsville to Chicago, has to be brought 600 miles, and from Connellsville to St. Louis, 750; and there is high authority for the statement that the average carriage of the United States ores is 400 miles, and of the fuel 200 miles. It is true, the position in the new field in the south is somewhat of an improvement on that in the Pennsylvania and other districts; but, on examination, it will be found that even the new field in the south cannot compare in position with Canada. The most favorably situated place is Birmingham in Alabama, which is 276 miles from tide water at Mobile. From Chatanooga, Tennessee, the distance to tide water at Brunswick, Georgia, is 419 miles; from Chatanooga to Hickman on the Mississippi is 321 miles, and to Pittsburg, by the Ohio and Tennessee rivers, is 1,000 miles. With regard to the enormous development of iron and steel manufactures in the United States, which have grown up in a few years, I will refer briefly to an article copied from the recent statistics of iron and steel production in the United States, taken from the London Economist of 14th May, 1887:

"The production of steel has made rapid progress of late years in the United States and the total output is now larger than that of Great Britain. The production of Bessemer steel ingots in the United States was 2,269,100 tons in 1886 against 1,570,520 tons in Great Britain, and the production of steel rails was 1,574,703 tons against English production of 730,343 tons. In addition to this there was the production by the open hearth system, and other methods, the grand total being:

United States	2,562,502 tons
Great Britain	2,384,670 "

This shows that the United States, in iron and steel manufacture, is even rivalling Great Britain. The question has been raised as to the extent of the Canadian market for the manufacture of iron, and it has been said that our market is too limited. Let me point out that we have, to-day, in Canada a consumption, without rails, which is equal to the production of iron in Great Britain in 1800, and equal to the production of the United States 50 years ago. I think a more opportune moment could not be taken than the present for founding this great industry on a substantial basis. Now, as to our resources and condition for the successful manufacture of iron, two of the most eminent manufacturers of Great Britain reported on the resources of Canada, based on the exhibits at the late Colonial Exhibition, as follows: I take this from Gilchrist and Riley's report on the iron making resources of the British Colonies, at page 51:

"Canada is extremely rich in both coal and iron, the ores that are, perhaps, of chief importance, from being found near to coal, being those of Nova Scotia, British Columbia and west of Lake Winnipeg."

After referring at considerable length to the iron deposits of Canada, Gilchrist and Riley make this observation:

"From the above a general idea of the distribution of iron ores in Canada may be obtained; and after hearing of such rich and varied deposits, it may surprise many to learn, on the authority of Dr. Selwyn, that in the whole of the Dominion, there is only one blast furnace, making coke pig iron, at present at work (although there are several in the Province of Quebec producing charcoal pig) and one rolling mill in connection with puddling furnaces, while the total value of iron and steel imported in various forms for the seventeen years since Confederation reaches the sum of $230,741,434, equal to an annual average of 13½ million dollars."

In connection with this subject, the Iron Age, a high authority on this subject, makes this note in a recent issue:

"The Canadians argue, and no one acquainted with the facts will dispute the assertion, that they have extensive deposits of both coal and iron ore favorably located, notably in Nova Scotia, for the manufacture of crude and finished iron."

The question may be asked why this industry has not flourished in the Dominion in the past, in connection with the policy of protection. The answer is that that policy has not been properly applied to the manufacture of iron. The woollen industry has been protected, from its first stage to the finished products. If we take the case of pig iron, on which there was a duty of $2 a ton, and which required 10½ days' labor in its manufacture, we find that on the product of a ton of pig iron, which required 19½ days' labor, the duty was only 10 per cent., or from $1.60 to $2 per ton, while on the finished article which requires 27½ days' labor the duty was 17½ per cent. It is evident that this protection was not sufficient. When once the industry is established the competition regulates the price, according to the facilities of the country for the manufacture. The importance of this industry to Canada may be judged from the operations of one concern in Nova Scotia for the last seven years. From 1880 to 1887 the Londonderry Iron Company disbursed for labor, fuel, freight, &c., in Canada, $4,873,159. That was all for labor, &c., in the country, and the production was not more than would supply one-fifth or one-sixth of the iron required in Canada, even in the cruder forms, without reckoning the finished articles made from this iron. This one industry produced 144,131 tons of pig iron, 28,968 tons of bar iron and forgings, 14,843 tons of nail plate, and 11,466 tons of wheels and castings, while they used for raw material 895,895 tons of ore, 620,652 tons of coal and 121,628 tons of limestone. The importance of this iron industry to Canada may be gathered by the examination of its relation to the coal required in the smelting and in the manufacture of iron. In relation to the admission of anthracite coal free of duty, the members for the mining counties in the Lower Provinces have been somewhat severely criticised, but, in view of the advantage which will result to the Dominion at large, we are willing to submit to that criticism, because a largely increased consumption of coal will be required in the manufacture of iron, and whatever bituminous coal is required in that will more than compensate for the admission of anthracite coal free. It requires for 250,000 tons of pig iron, in order to smelt it, 750,000 tons of coal; for the conversion of 170,000 tons of pig iron into puddle bars it requires 340,000 tons of coal, and for the conversion of 170,000 tons into bar iron, 160,000 tons of coal are required, making a total of 1,250,000 tons of coal required to produce 250,000 tons of iron. I think that is a sufficient answer to the objections which have been made on these grounds. An objection has been made that this is a tax in the interest of Nova Scotia. I think that is an unfair view to take of a question like this. It is a question whether a great national industry is to be protected or is to be allowed to remain in abeyance. The Parliament of Canada has in the past protected other industries which exist in one section only. The petroleum industry of western Ontario has been protected from the earliest days until now. A very high protection has been granted to petroleum, and under that protection there is now a production of nearly eight million gallons a year. That protection has been of great advantage in maintaining the industry, and I think that the protection which is given the iron industry will result in developing that great interest, and under conditions which will give to the consumer articles which are manufactured out of iron on very fair terms, and probably as cheaply as they can be obtained to-day. If Canada has one thing to be proud of, if Canada has one thing which will raise it in the scale of nations in the future, it is the fact that on the two ocean shores, on the shore of British Columbia and on that of Nova Scotia, it possesses both coal and iron, and that gives it a position which is occupied by no other country on this continent.

Mr. ELLIS. The hon. gentleman seems to me to have repeated the speech of the Finance Minister over again. The fact that these highly protected countries are not able to export iron shows that protection is practically a failure. The fact that $187,000 worth of iron were imported by the United States last year more than they exported, seems to me to answer all the facts the hon. gentleman has stated. I rose, however, to present to the House a statement made by James Pender & Co., manufacturers of horse shoe nails, of St. John, New Brunswick, which is as follows:—

"The system of drawbacks will not do justice to this industry, and if the duty shall be continued the business will be greatly hampered and overweighed in its contest with foreign manufacturers, and the export trade in this class of goods greatly jeopardized, and this, so far as the manufactory in St. John is concerned, will be greatly regretted, as it has taken some five or six years to work up the export trade, and which has doubled during the last two years, and the proprietors think the business could be doubled again during the next two years if the duty were removed from the iron used in their manufacture. The iron is imported from Sweden, and cannot be produced in Canada, and therefore any tax upon it is a tax upon raw material not produceable in the country. The European competitors in this business get their iron free of duty, have cheaper labor, and save freight and insurance across the Atlantic.

"The following comparative statements will show the cost of sufficient iron to produce a ton of nails in Sweden and Canada, similar iron being used in both cases:

"The present cost of a gross ton of iron in Sweden, £8 13s. 0d. or.....	$ 42 08
"Add one-third to cover cost of waste.....	14 03
"Making total cost of enough iron to make ton of nails to Swedish manufacturer.....	$ 56 11
"Same, first cost in Sweden for Canadian manufacturer.....	$ 42 08
"Freight and insurance to Canada.....	5 37
"To this add one-third for waste.....	15 82
"Making total cost of a ton of iron to Canadian manufacturer.....	$ 63 27

Mr. McDougald (Picton).

"By the above it will be seen that the iron costs the Canadian manufacturer $7.16 per ton more than it does the Swedish manufacturer, even if the iron were admitted into Canada free of duty.

"I am aware that the Government allows a drawback upon the nails exported, and the following table shows the effect of the drawback upon the business. As the law now stands the condition of the Canadian manufacturer is as follows:—

"Cost in Sweden of a gross ton of iron.....	$42 08
"Freight and insurance.....	5 37
	$47 45
"Duty on 2,240 lbs. at $13 per 2,000 lbs.....	14 56
	$62 01
"Add one-third to cover waste.....	20 67

"The duty as now propounded will be a little less than the above.

"From this $82.68 deduct the drawback which is payable on weight of nails exported, at the rate of 90 per cent. of duty, which amounts to $9.83, the weight of nails being 1,680 lbs. as the product of a ton of iron, the waste being 25 per cent. in making up.

"Thus the total cost of the iron under the tariff, as lately altered to the Canadian manufacturer, sufficient to make a ton of nails, is $72.85, against the cost of a similar amount of material to a Swedish manufacturer of $56.11, which places the Canadian manufacturer at a disadvantage, as against his Swedish competitor of $16 74, or $9 58 per ton in favor of free rods, under the proposed change this would be reduced to about $8.60. A business handicapped in this way cannot succeed, and it should be just as much a part of the National Policy to protect the manufacturers of the Dominion who are competing with those of a foreign country in foreign markets, as it is to encourage our own manufacturers who are seeking here to have control of our domestic markets."

In reference to the constituency from which I come, this tariff is one of the worst which has been placed upon our people. I have not received a single letter in favor of this tariff, but I have had letters upon letters against it. I hope the anticipations of the Minister will be realised, but I fear not. If they are not realised in regard to the city of St. John, I am afraid this will add to the depression there. We are now suffering severely from the depression. Our ships, our fishing industry, our lumber, all the natural industries of the country are depressed, and what has the National Policy to give us? Gentlemen from Ontario want a tax on corn and corn meal, and on all the products of Ontario as against us. Gentlemen from Nova Scotia want the same thing on coal and iron in the interests of that Province.

Mr. JONES. No, we do not.

Mr. ELLIS. In all that I am unable to see any good in the future for the constituency which I represent.

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Masson) told us that he could see nothing on a farmer's place that paid duty. I have been a farmer for many years, and my experience is that there is a duty of 35 per cent. on most of the goods we use, on the cottons for instance, and I also know that upon woollen goods there is a duty of from 28 to 44 per cent. I have a statement here from a friend of mine, a dry goods merchant, and he states that the average duty is 27 per cent. which means 33 per cent. to the consumer. I can only suppose that in North Grey, as they do not pay any duty, they must wear homespun. He also told us that the manufacturers had created a market for our own surplus produce. Now, I hold a statement of the exports and imports of the Dominion in my hand, from 1878 to 1885. I find that in 1878 we had a surplus of 2,873,832 bushels of wheat which was sent out of the country, and in 1885 we had 2,295,662 bushels. I can explain why more grain has not been sent out of the Province of Ontario. The reason is that it has not been paying us to raise oats for the last few years, and a great many of the best farmers in the Province have gone into grazing instead of raising grain. Yet we are sending out nearly the same quantity that we did in 1878. Now, with respect to the price of wheat, I find from the Mail newspaper that, from 1874 to 1878 inclusive, the average price of spring wheat was $1.10 per bushel, and in 1886 the price was only 75 cents. per bushel. We find with respect to oats that the average price was 42 cents a bushel during the period from 1874 to 1878, and during the last period it was only bringing 32 cents a bushel. For peas we were receiving in the first period 71 cents per bushel, and we are now only receiving 50 cents per bushel, and yet we are told that the condition of the farmers is better under the National Policy at the present time than it was before that policy was adopted. We are also told by the same gentleman that we are exporting a surplus of oats. Now, I find that, in 1878, we had a surplus of 268,549 bushels of oats, and we consumed all the rest that we raised; when we come down to 1885 I find that we exported 2,025,683 bushels, showing that the consumption is not keeping up with the production, and showing that the National Policy has not given us a market for our surplus produce.

Mr. McNEILL. Would my hon. friend tell us how much oats we got from the United States in 1878 and 1885 respectively?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). In 1878 we got profits of over \$2,000,000 on grain exported during that year, and during last year we only received \$78,000 on grain exported from this country. I find that, in 1877, wheat was 10 cents higher in Toronto than it was in Chicago; I find in 1878 it was $8\frac{1}{2}$ cents higher in Toronto than in Chicago, and in April, 1887, it had gone up in Chicago until it was $1\frac{1}{2}$ cents per bushel higher than it was in Toronto. If it is not the National Policy that has brought about this change, I would like some hon. gentleman to tell me what it was. We were told that the National Policy was going to give us Canada for the Canadians. It was going to increase the price of grain. I hold that it is fairer to compare the prices of grain between the United States and Canada, than it is to compare them between England and Canada, because the United States also sends her surplus produce to the English markets. Now, when we find that, in the markets of Canada, wheat has fallen 10 cents a bushel since the National Policy was introduced, while the prices have increased in the United States, we must come to the conclusion that the National Policy has been an injury to the farmers.

Mr. McNEILL. Would my hon. friend answer the question I asked him?

Mr. McMILLAN (Huron). The Trade and Navigation Returns are open to the hon. gentleman, and if he wants the information he can find it there. Now, the hon. the Finance Minister tells us that we can get our goods as cheaply today as we did before the National Policy was introduced. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman how that can be? Is it not a fact that woollen goods coming into Canada pay from 24 to 42 per cent. and even 45 per cent. duty? Upon cotton goods we pay a duty of 27 per cent. Now, when a merchant goes into a warehouse in Glasgow to purchase goods, he is not asked whether he is going to take those goods to a free trade country or to a country with a protective tariff, but he pays just as much for goods coming into Canada as a Scotch or English retail merchant would pay for them for a local market. But when a Canadian merchant comes to this side with his Scotch goods he has got to pay 27 per cent. duty, which means 33 per cent. to the consumer. Now, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McDougald) told us that the price was not going to be much increased on iron goods under the present tariff. I say that no greater injustice has ever been perpetrated upon the agriculturists of this country than the proposed duty upon iron. Every article that we use upon our farms, all our implements, all our machinery into which iron enters, have to pay an increased price of at least 10, if not 15 per cent. I think I will be able to prove to this House, before I take my seat, that that is the view taken by some of the most important manufacturers of agricultural implements in the Province of Ontario. I will read a letter from a manufacturer who says:

"DEAR SIR,—Yours of the 2nd instant is received, and in reply would say that we are feeling the effect of the new tariff in the great advancement of raw material to such an extent that we cannot purchase the material now and sell the machines without an advance of 10 per cent. and save ourselves. We are just writing a large steel rolling mill in Nova Scotia, who have advanced the price of their goods to such an extent that we will have to decline receiving them, and cease building machines, unless we can get a higher price for them"

I would ask the hon. gentlemen opposite whether they are in a better position than the manufacturers themselves, to speak as to the effect of these iron duties. I am afraid that the "silver lining," of which the Minister of Finance spoke when introducing these tariff changes, will entirely disappear when his duties begin to take effect in the country, and that his very sanguine anticipations will never be realised. He told us that we would manufacture our own iron and steel, and by that means a population of 300,000 would be added to the Dominion of Canada. But I find, in making a calculation in reference to some other lines of goods manufactured in this country, that, provided we manufactured every article we import of dutiable goods, it would only add a population of 122,000. I will state, for the information of the House, the amount of iron that entered the United States after their protective policy had been in operation for over twenty years. In 1885 there were \$33,903,227 worth of iron and steel entered. In 1886 there were \$36,031,777 worth imported into the United States. When we find that such has been the experience of the United States, how can we expect the anticipation of the Finance Minister to be realised in Canada, seeing that here we have a country with two thousand miles of frontier and a depth of only sixty or seventy miles, whereas the United States is a compact country with all the advantages of settlement from the Rocky Mountains to the seaboard. I think it possible that iron goods, such as agricultural implements, can be manufactured as cheaply here as across the line. We have been told that there is no class in the community so much benefited by the National Policy as the agricultural class. I state this, from my own experience, that no class of the community has suffered so much in consequence of the National Policy. I should like to know the first article in respect of which the National Policy has given us a home market. We have been told that it brought a home market to our doors. But we have exported a great deal more of such articles as cattle, cheese, sheep, eggs and butter since the National Policy than we did before it became law; and at the same time we have been called upon to pay more for everything we purchase, and have received lower prices for the articles we have had to sell. I warn hon. gentlemen opposite that one of the causes of the present depression is the large amount of money taken out of the hands of the agriculturists. We were told before the National Policy was introduced that it would not involve an increase of duty, but only a rearrangement of the tariff, and the First Minister told the country that his Government had been able to manage public affairs with a smaller amount of taxation in the past than the then Government required, and that, consequently, they would be prepared to manage the country with lower taxation in the future. Have those promises been fulfilled to the people of Canada? I say no. Up to last year over \$44,000,000 had been taken out of the pockets of the people by the increased taxation raised under the present tariff. No doubt a very large amount has gone into the pockets of the manufacturers, while no class of the community has contributed to the burthen of taxation so largely as the farmers. There is a small cloud rising in the west. It may not be larger than a man's hand at the present time, but before four years have passed it will have spread over the whole land, and farmers will be coming here and demanding that their rights be recognised. I acknowledge that the class in whose interests the Government have been legislating is a very useful class, but I remember the statement of the Finance Minister that in order to have a National Policy you must have a policy to promote the interests of all classes and industries. But I tell the hon. gentleman now that his policy has failed to advance the most important industry in Canada, and that is the agricultural industry. In 1878, \$4,000,000 of manufactured goods were exported by the Dominion, while in 1886 only a little over \$2,000,000 worth were exported; at the same time the exports of agricultural products and animals reached for that year \$39,000,000. It is, therefore, evident that agriculture, being the most important industry in Canada, is the industry to which the Government ought to turn their attention in the first place, because, I hold that if agriculturists are not in a prosperous condition, no other class can be prosperous, and I believe, to-day, three-fourths of our farmers are not making receipts and expenditures meet, on account of the very large reduction that has taken place in the price of our agricultural products and of animals. Fat cattle, to-day, do not realise more than $4\frac{1}{2}$ cents per lb., whereas some years ago 6 cents and $6\frac{1}{2}$ cents were obtained for animals of the same description. Yet we are told that the farmers to-day are better off than they were before the National Policy was imposed. We are told this almost every day, and I was very much surprised to hear hon. gentlemen opposite advocating a duty on elm logs. The land that grows the elm logs is mostly in the hands of the farmer, and to impose a duty on that class of product is the same as to impose a duty on the products of the farm. If the Government place a duty on logs they might as well impose an export duty on wheat, and say that all the wheat shall be ground into flour in Canada. There is, in fact, more reason for this than for an export duty on elm logs, because it is a well known fact that wheat is in a better condition to grind before it leaves Canada than it is after it is exposed to a sea voyage. With respect to agricultural machinery, we paid 35 per cent. under the old tariff and 10 per cent. has been added, making 45 per cent. I repeat, that there is no class having greater cause to complain than the farmers, and next Session we hope to find large deputations of farmers here demanding just legislation in the interest of the most important industry in the Dominion.

Mr. PATTERSON (Essex). I will not occupy the time of the House more than five minutes in order to make a personal explanation. I am told by an hon. member that the statement is made that I have done as I have done, with respect to the export duty on elm logs, because I am interested with Michigan middlemen. The man who made that statement is a coward and a calumniator. I am not acquainted with any of the Michigan middlemen, I have not had any correspondence with them, I have acted in this matter solely in the interest of the farmers of Ontario. Had I acted as the paid solicitor of any company or individual I would have had a precedent in gentlemen who have been or are members of this House, and who make much greater pretensions than I do. I know too much what is due to my own self respect and to the honor of this House, ever to have acted as the paid advocate in any matter which came before this House. In the course I pursued in this matter I have been actuated by a desire to serve the farmers of my riding who have stood by me faithfully for fifteen years, and for whom I have been able to do so little in return. The hon. member for Cornwall (Mr. Bergin), and I regret he is not in his place, referring to this the other evening, thought it was inconsistent on my part when I took such a stand on this subject to be also an advocate of the National Policy. When I supported that policy I did not suppose it would ever be developed into what I call a policy of monopoly. I look upon this question of the duty on elm logs, in the small district of country which only is affected by it, as a matter of monopoly; but if hon. gentlemen will come up to my part of the country and bring their statistics with them and explain the matter to the farmers in such a way as to satisfy them that it is in their interest that an export duty should be imposed, I shall support that policy. But so long as those who are most interested think that it is not in their interest that this duty should be imposed, so long as they think that competition increases the price to them, so long shall I continue to advocate their interests here. That is the sole motive I have in the matter.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I wish to engage the attention of the House for a short time upon the question which is under discussion this afternoon. Representing as I do an agricultural section of the country and a very intelligent class of farmers, who have for years been feeling the burdens imposed upon them by the National Policy, and who have never seen the benefits which hon. gentlemen say are to be derived from that policy, I think I would not be doing my duty if I did not express to the House and country their opinions on this matter, believing as I do, and as they do, that a National Policy of this character can be of no benefit to a class which exports a large surplus of their products every year. In 1878 the farmers of this country were told that the markets for the agricultural population were glutted largely by the introduction of materials of a corresponding character from the United States market. That was not the fact, but the farmers, having been laboring with other classes under a period of depression for four or five years, were willing to listen to almost any Tory who they thought would offer a means of removing that depression, and I believe a large number of the Liberals of this country were led by the promises then made by hon. gentlemen opposite and their satellites to support the Tory party on that occasion. The farmers are one of the most important classes—nay, the most important class of the community; they represent 60 per cent. of the entire population; we have no less than 600,000 farmers in the Dominion of Canada; they are the largest employers of labor, and that being the case, I think we have a right to consider their interests before and above the interests of any other class which comes under the consideration of this House. We know that they have invested in their avocation ten times as much money as all the manufacturers of this country. The interest on the investment of the farmers for one year would buy out nearly all the manufacturing interests in this country, and that being the case, their interests demand the attention and consideration of every consistent representative of a farming district in the country. As I said before, the farmers were told, in 1873, that their own markets were glutted by a foreign product, and though the Liberals of the country told the farmers that that was not the case, events had not developed enough to show, by facts and figures, that the results which we predicted would follow. If we compare the so-called glutting of the market, in 1873, with what is taking place to-day, it will be seen by every impartial man, no matter on what side he may sit, that the statements made to the farmers in 1873, and which led them to support the National Policy, were not based on facts. I have consulted the Trade and Navigation Returns, and I find that, in 1873, 1,587 horses were brought into Canada from the American side to compete with Canadian horses, and as the Tories said at that time, to glut the market. Now, it was perfectly plain that that number of horses would not glut the Canadian market, but, admitting that it did, how much more was the market glutted in 1886, when 2,251 horses were imported from the American side?

Mr. HESSON. How much duty was collected on that?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). It did not matter to the farmers whether there was duty to be collected or not, so long as they had to compete with an over-supplied market. I am astonished and amazed that a man professing to have so much sense as the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) should ask such a foolish question at the present juncture. It did not matter to the farmer whether there were $900,000, or even that many millions of duty collected; so long as these articles were in competition in the open market with his own products he had to abide by the result of the competition without regard to the duty. In 1878, we imported 10,506 sheep, and no doubt the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) told his followers that this country was being made an American sheep market, and that as a result the farmers did not receive the same price as if there was a duty to meet those sheep at the border and prevent them from coming in. But I point out to him that, in 1886, we imported 30,427 sheep, or three times as many were brought in in competition with the Canadian farmer in 1886 as there were in 1878. I would ask the hon. gentlemen opposite where is the protection which they promised to give the Canadian farmer in the item of sheep. Then, in 1878, we imported of swine 14,704, and those swine, according to the statements of the Tories of that time, glutted the market; but, in 1886, under the protective duty imposed by these gentlemen we imported 16,488. Then of butter we imported, in 1878, 111,557 lbs., which would not be one-fiftieth of an ounce for every individual in the country, though it was said that the market was glutted; but, in 1886, under the aegis of the National Policy, 325,201 lbs. of butter were imported, or nearly three times as much as in 1878. And yet we are told that the Canadian market has been pre-ferred to the Canadian farmer, so that he may sell his butter and realise higher prices. Then we were told that bacon was largely imported from the other side, and that the Canadian farmers were not in a position to realise as high prices as they should if this article was shut out of the Canadian market. The quantity of bacon imported, in 1878, was 2,845,109 lbs., while under a high protective duty, which was to prevent the importation of bacon, we import 3,564,495 pounds. We were told that the manufacturers in this country would engage such a large number of hands that there would be a large demand for pork, and that the farmers would, therefore, realise higher prices. We imported, in 1878, 10,248,000 lbs., and in 1886, 14,308,040 lbs.—over 4,000,000 more pork brought into competition with the product of the Canadian farmers in their own market in 1886 than there were in 1878. Again, take the article of lard. We were informed that over 2,250,000 lbs. of that article were imported into this country in 1878; but we imported over 3,000,000 lbs. in 1886. With regard to cheese, we were assured that American cheese was coming into the Canadian market in large quantities, and shutting out Canadian cheese or reducing the price. But the quantity imported in 1878 was a mere bagatelle—only 88,000 lbs., whereas we imported 1,000 lbs. more in 1886. These figures show that the protective duties placed on these leading products of the farmers of this country, did not give them that protection which was promised to them. And yet we hear hon. gentlemen continually lauding this National Policy—national humbug, will I say, so far as the farmers are concerned; for never, since its introduction, has it put one single dollar, directly or indirectly, into the pockets of the Canadian farmers. True, it is an entirely different matter from the manufacturer's standpoint, but it has been of no benefit to the farmer whatever. That is one promise that was not redeemed. Was there any other promise made in that year? Yes, there was. The farmers were told that the prices they got for the various cereals and products of the farm would be increased, and that they would get the control of the Canadian market. I have a table of facts and figures on that subject, and I challenge successful contradiction of one single figure that it contains. I have consulted the best authorities on the prices prevailing on the 15th of March in each year, from 1878 to 1887, inclusive, and they were as follows:—

I want to call attention to the particular article of wool. In 1878 the Tory orators—and their voices are almost resounding in my ears at present—when addressing agricultural audiences, declared that as soon as we got protection, the large woollen factories that became established in this country would buy all the wool the farmers had to sell, and that when the manufacturers would be competing with each other for the wool, the farmers would get a larger price for it; yet these gentlemen knew quite well at the time that there was no such prize in store for the farmers. I ask, have the farmers realised the high prices that were promised them in 1878, under the fostering care of the National Policy? The figures I have given show that the price of wool has been reduced from 34 cents to 21 cents a pound, a loss to the farmer of 12 cents. on every pound of wool he produces. Now, taking the total average losses which the farmers have incurred from the reduction in the prices of the articles I have named, an average farmer loses every year $129.70. How does this affect the county of Huron, one of whose railways I represent? There are in that county 7,855 farms of 100 acres each—say 7,000 farms, making ample provision for waste lands. A loss of $129.70 on each amounts to a loss on all the farms in that county every year of no less than $907,900. The farmers of Huron every year receive that much less for their produce under the present policy than they received during the Government of my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie). Yet hon. gentlemen opposite get up with a certain degree of confidence and assert that the farmers are in a more prosperous condition than they were before. We are told that the land is now worth, acre per acre, as much as before. How can that be possible? Does not the value of land depend on the amount of production and of profits? Does not the value of bank or railway stock, or of any stock, depend on the percentage it pays to the stockholders as a dividend? If the dividend is small, the stock goes down. So it is with the farming community. We were told that the people sustained the National Policy in 1878, and endorsed it in 1882. I deny that the people endorsed it in 1882. In 1882, the Government did not go before the same jury as they did in 1878. They had gerrymandered the entire length and breadth of Ontario to such an extent as almost to obliterate the previous landmarks of the constituencies, so that the result could not be taken as the criterion of the opinions of the people. Besides, the reaction had not set in completely. For the first few years a rush was created by moneys being taken from other sources of investment and put in manufactures. Sir Leonard Tilley, the then Minister of Finance, said that the time had come and would continue for the next ten years, when the manufacturers should put out full sail in every part of the country. Many people who had their moneys invested in careful and canny—if I may use a Scotch expression—business, acting on this advice, withdrew their money and put it in manufactures, which led to a certain increase in employment. The farmers also had good crops. The leader of the Government said, in his celebrated speech at Park Hill, that the clerk of the weather was a good Conservative and that accounted for the good crops. I think that good Conservative is surely dead, and I hope the hon. gentleman will succeed in replacing him. There were good crops in 1881, 1882 and 1883 in Canada, while there were bad crops in foreign countries. This raised the prices to our farmers, who were led to believe that the rise in prices was due to the National Policy. They consequently, to a large extent, endorsed the policy, which, in their ignorance they supposed gave them the prosperity that came from the good crops and the high prices alone. The readjustment of the tariff now proposed is of such a character that it does not weigh equally on the shoulders of the rich and the poor, but falls with the greatest weight on the people who are the least able to bear it. Take, for instance, the article of organs. We are all fond of music, and it is becoming popular to have a music box in almost every house in the country. The daughter of the mechanic or the laborer can enjoy music just as well as the daughter of the millionaire, but if the farmer wants an organ, he must pay 30 or 40 per cent. duty, while the millionaire can get in his grand piano at 20 per cent. duty.

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron).

Again, if the ladies of those millionaires want to wear sealskins, they get them in at 15 per cent. duty, while the wife of the mechanic, if she wishes to wear an imitation seal, has to pay 30 per cent. Again striped shirting, largely used by the laboring classes, is charged from 35 to 40 per cent., while the fine check shirting used by gentlemen, and not adapted to working people, only pays 30 per cent. The gross fabrics used by lumbermen, farmers and others pay 40, 60, 80 and even 100 per cent., but the fine blankets that are imported from France to keep the bodies of the millionaires warm in the winter pay only 30 to 40 per cent. Take silk dresses. There is 32½ per cent. charged on calico and prints, while silks and satin and velvet only pay 30 per cent. Take, for instance, chromos which adorn the houses of the people who have not the means to go to Italy, France and Spain, and get copies of the old masters. These are charged 20 per cent. duty, while the millionaire, as in the case of an hon. gentleman opposite who went to New York and paid no less than $46,000 for a grand picture to adorn the walls of his grand parlor, gets his valuable pictures in free of duty. Any person who imports a work of art that is considered excellent, or is the copy of the work of some great artist, gets it in free of duty, while the workman has to pay duty on the simple chromos that adorn his walls. It is said that to encourage art we should let valuable pictures in free, so that our artists may have something to incite them to greater efforts; but what has the poor farmer and artisan to do with them? Why should he have taxes imposed on him so as to give advantages to those favored classes? The same statement applies to carpets. If a mechanic wishes to buy a carpet, he is charged 35 to 50 per cent. duty. If any hon. gentlemen opposite, whose pockets are fuller than his head, wishes to put on his floor a rich and beautiful carpet, he pays from 25 to 35 per cent. for bringing it into the country. Is that right in the interest of the country? Besides that, they have placed a high protective duty on the simple remedies that the poor people use to take away their aches and pains. There are many people suffering from rheumatism, and such other things, as my hon. friend, the doctor, yonder is acquainted with, and yet those hon. gentlemen opposite come down and place a duty of 50 per cent. on proprietary medicines, when many hundreds and thousands of the Canadian people believe that they have a virtue, although I may not.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Does my hon. friend object to the duty on patent medicines?

Mr. MACDONALD (Huron). I do most positively object to it to that extent, because I believe that if any one thinks these medicines are good, if any one thinks they are better than a tonic which he might receive from the hon. gentleman yonder, if anyone believes that Wizard Oil is good for his joints, and for his sinews and muscles, he has a perfect right to buy it, and yet the Government of this country has imposed a tax of no less than 50 per cent. on those medicines. What shall I put in opposition to this? We had a discussion the other day in regard to the Grand Victoria Park among the Rocky Mountains, and that is to be bought up and put in order at the public expense, to allow the rich people, who have rheumatism and aching through their bodies and joints, to go there and receive the benefit of the sulphur springs, and the balmy air of the mountains, and the refreshing breezes, while the people of this country who cannot afford to go there are not allowed to obtain these simple remedies without paying the unreasonable duty of 50 per cent. I challenge any hon. gentleman opposite, doctor or layman, to point out one of these proprietary medicines which are made in the country. I might go on to point out the burdens of this National Policy which has pressed heavily on the farmers and on the laborers of this country. It has been said that the farmers are the muddills of the country. They are in one sense the muddills, because they are the foundation of the prosperity of this country, but I fear that, by the legislative action of hon. members on the other side, they will not be actually made the mudsills, but will be pressed deeper and deeper into the mud by the policy of undue and additional burdens upon them.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I do not rise to make any lengthened remarks. I am sure that this debate has been prolonged to a much greater degree than was intended when it began. I only desire to say that I heartily agree with my hon. friend from Huron (Mr. Macdonald) in regard to the feeling which we should have for the great agricultural class of this country. As a medical man, I can, however, scarcely agree with him that the Government are putting an imposition upon any class when they tax the patent medicines. We will not quarrel with him on that point, however, but I will make a proposition to the hon. gentleman, and I will ask him if he will accompany me in a visit to the Minister of Finance and ask him to take the duty off patent medicines and place it upon sulphate of quinine.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The admirable speech of my hon. friend the senior member for Pictou (Mr. McDougald) has rendered it unnecessary that I should say anything in regard to the question which has been under discussion to-day, but I wish to call attention to the statement which was made by an hon. gentleman on the other side that a great injury has been inflicted upon Canada in England by the proposals which I have had the honor to submit to the House in connection with the tariff. I will meet that statement by reading a very short extract from the Financial News—

An hon. MEMBER. Send it to Hansard.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The extract I am going to read is so short that it is not necessary, and I do not wish to burden the Hansard with the whole article. I will read a single paragraph, which I am sure hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will be glad to hear. The Financial News, after a full examination of the position of Canada and that of the other self-governing colonies, says:

"Canada has been the most prudent borrower of all our self-governing colonies, and she is carrying now the smallest burden of public debt in proportion to her means and population. At the end of 1885 there were in the Australian colonies, including New Zealand, three and a quarter million people, and in Canada four and three-quarter millions. At the same date the Australian governments were owing to this country nearly 141 millions sterling, or an average of £43 14s. 1d. per head, while the public debt of Canada was little more than 40 millions, or an average of £8 11s. 11d. per head. The Australian and South African colonies combined have a population about as large as that of Canada, but the aggregate of their public debt is more than four times as great. It amounted in 1885 to over 165 millions sterling, as compared with the Canadian 40 millions sterling.

And they go on to say that the result of the position which Canada now occupies in the estimation of the financial world, in view of the statements I have been able to make to this House in the Budget speech, is that our 3½ per cents are exchanged at 103½, and I may say that since that date the Canadian 3½ per cents have sold freely in London—as freely as they could be obtained—at 103 ex dividend, that is to say, without the dividend which is to accrue on the 1st of July. I hold in my hand the Economist, which is, perhaps, the highest financial authority in England, in which our 3½ per cents are not only quoted at the figures I have mentioned, from 102½ to 103½, but our 4 per cents are quoted as high as from 110 to 111. I give that to hon. gentlemen as the position which we occupy in England in presence of the measure we have recently taken. I will not take up the time of the House in answering the remarks of hon. gentlemen who pointed out the hostility which had been excited in England in consequence of this tariff, because the speech of my hon. friend has completely met that. An hon. gentleman on the other side said that my hon. friend had favored the House with a rehash of the Budget speech. It is right and it is honest that I should say that if there is any one hon. gentleman more than another who is able to instruct the House in regard to this great and important change in regard to the iron industry, it is my hon. friend the senior member for Pictou (Mr. McDougald), and, further, I may say that the Budget speech is much more indebted to the hon. gentleman than the hon. gentleman is indebted to the Budget speech.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to say a word or two in reference to the topic discussed by the Minister of Finance. The hon. gentleman was not in the country when this discussion took place as to the comparative liabilities of Canada and the Australian Provinces. If the hon. gentleman had been aware of that discussion, he would hardly have made the statement or read the sentence from the News which he read on the present occasion. It is clear that the author of that sentence was not very familiar with the subject that he discussed. Now, the hon. gentleman knows right well that all the public works and undertakings, all the important railways constructed in the Australian colonies, are the property of those colonies. They are public works, and a large portion of the liabilities that those Provinces have incurred in the construction of those works are met by the freights and charges imposed upon the traffic, and the passengers upon those lines of railway. If the hon. gentleman wishes to institute a fair comparison between the Australian colonies and Canada, it would be necessary to add to the public debt of Canada the whole of the debt that has been incurred by the various railway corporations that are found in every portion of the Dominion. Now, I am not going at this moment into the discussion of that subject, because it is quite foreign, as much of the discussion on that side of the House this afternoon has been, to the complaint made by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright). That hon. gentleman pointed out that the Finance Minister had enormously increased the burdens of the people of this country, and hon. gentlemen opposite labored assiduously to show that this increase of taxation is not a burden, that in fact taxation, instead of being a burden, is an actual benefit to the population. Then, Sir, we have had the statement made by the hon. gentleman that this benefit does not depend upon the wisdom of the expenditure of the taxes that are collected from the people, but the very fact that taxes are taken out of the pockets of the people, which are in the form of protective duties, in itself confers a special benefit upon the population. Then we were told over and over again this afternoon by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. McDougald) and by the hon. gentlemen on that side, that the people of this country would be seriously injured if they undertook to trade with foreign countries. Why, we were told they would be sending their money out of the country. Well, that is what we are doing when we carry on trade with other countries. Surely we have no money here, any more than people have elsewhere, except what we earn, and if we can earn more money by applying ourselves to one particular industry than another, we ought to be permitted to do so, and to purchase what we require in the cheapest market. That is all we are doing when we carry on trade. If hon. gentlemen opposite were to stand up and say that every man ought to be his own tailor and his own shoemaker, because he was paying something out of the family and it was going into the pockets of his neighbor, everybody would see the absurdity of the proposition. And yet the proposition that is seriously elaborated this afternoon, and supported by any amount of fallacious statistics, is a proposition exactly of this sort. Now, I am not going to imitate the example of the hon. gentleman. It would be a waste of the time of the House, at this period of the Session, to enter into a discussion of the kind. Sir, Mr. Hobbs says there are men who, when their interests are at stake, will seriously argue that the three angles of a triangle are not equal to two right angles, and the argument of the hon. gentleman, and the one that has been commended by the Finance Minister, is an argument exactly of this class. It is an argument to prove that that which may be scientifically demonstrated to be true, is not true after all, and that that which experience and the most exact reasoning show to be sound, is the height of political wisdom. Now, the hon. gentleman has told us over and over again that he has not very seriously increased the burden of taxation on the people of this country in the imposition of these duties on iron. I hold in my hand an invoice from Andrew and James Stewart, of Glasgow, representing a sale of certain kinds of tubing—gas tubes, screwed and coupled, $\frac{3}{4}$ inch, 1 inch and $1\frac{1}{4}$ inch in diameter; galvanised tubes $\frac{3}{4}$ inch and $1\frac{1}{4}$ inch in diameter. I find that the amount of this bill is \$430, and that the amount of taxation is exactly \$368; 85, or $85\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. duty; add to this freight and insurance, and then the taxation will be double the original price of the article. And yet the hon. gentleman has sought to persuade himself and the House, and I suppose he hopes the country, that we are doing the right thing, and are pursuing our own interests in trying to attract capital and industry to those pursuits that require a protection or bounty of 100 per cent. in order to enable manufacturers successfully to engage in those operations.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It has been usual in this House to allow the Finance Minister to close the debate on a question of this kind. I waited to give the hon. gentleman an opportunity to rise, but I am not surprised that he did not avail himself of it, but took occasion to make a speech to which he could not receive a reply.

Mr. MILLS. But the hon. gentleman does not pretend to say that none of his friends are able to answer?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I waited until you were to put the question before I rose, and I say that courtesy to this House required that the hon. gentleman should not take an opportunity, when my mouth was closed, to address the House upon this subject. But, Sir, I do not complain, from a party standpoint, I rejoice. I do not intend to say one word in reply to the hon. gentleman except this: We, in the Conservative party, will listen with great pleasure, will read with great pleasure, the speech of the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), the speech of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), and the speech of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills); they will read these speeches with great pleasure, because they will recognise that these gentlemen are pursuing a contrary course to that pursued by the distinguished gentleman, the leader, for many years, in this House, of the great party opposite, and whose absence from this House and the cause of it, I am sure, every hon. gentleman in this House deplures. That hon. gentleman who is now absent heard my statement made in the Budget speech that he had committed himself to the policy of protection in the country, and he neither challenged nor answered my statement; he spoke again and again before he left this House, but he never uttered one word in reply to the statement that he had committed himself and his party to the policy of protection.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I say that, in the absence of that distinguished and hon. gentleman, the Conservative party, that great party who believe that the interests of Canada require that they should continue to control the public affairs of this country, will learn with great pleasure the fact that the prudent course adopted by the leader of that party has been abandoned by hon. gentlemen opposite, and that those who now lead that party have again raised the flag of free trade in this country, have again denounced the policy of protection in this country, and again put themselves before the people in the same attitude that has kept them where they are since 1878, and which will keep them where they are until they retract and repudiate the doctrine they now profess.

Mr. MITCHELL. I am certainly surprised at the speech delivered by the Minister of Finance at this stage of the debate. I am not speaking for any member on this side of the House except for myself, and when the hon. gentleman refers to hon. members on this side, who have abandoned their policy of protection, I can only say for myself that I entertain the same leanings I did in 1878 with respect to the moderate protection of the industries of the country. But when the hon. gentleman states that the hon. gentleman who leads the party on this side, who is not now in his place, departed from his principles, I must say that what I understood the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) to say in all the public statements he made, was this: that the country had twice endorsed the principles advocated by the First Minister, who came down in 1878 and asked the country to adopt a policy of moderate protection. What is the state of things to-day? Does any one pretend that the Bill under discussion is a Bill in any sense one for moderate protection? I say it is not. I entertain the same feelings I did in 1878, when I came out and sacrificed myself in order to secure protection for the industries of the country. But I find that hon. gentlemen opposite have made a pretext of protection to come before Parliament and the country and impose on the people burdens under the name of protection, a revenue tariff which is going to be oppressive and inflict great injury on the people. I think the hon. Minister, at this late hour of this debate, and this late stage of the Session, ought not to have launched out into one of those tirades of which he has just given us an example. It would be very much better for the hon. gentleman to confine himself to the facts, that the policy we are now called upon to endorse, and the Bill we have under consideration, is a Bill for the protection of the industries of Nova Scotia, not the policy for which I fought with them in 1878. I do not know what course may be pursued by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House; I speak for myself. I entertain the same feelings as I entertained in 1878, but I will resist, as far as I can, all attempts made, year after year, to force a different tariff on the country. It is most destructive to the interests of trade to constantly change the tariff; it interferes with the operations of merchants and paralyses those operations; and even now we have a tariff which very few can understand. Do we believe that if we had told the people, in 1878, that we were going to impose duties equal to 90 or 100 per cent. on iron products, that the country would have accepted the National Policy? No, they would have indignantly rejected it. But hon. gentlemen have got into position, they have managed to get into the saddle, and time after time by the use of the enormous sums which they have secured from the increased revenue, they are able to throw here a sop in the shape of a railway bonus, and there a sop in the shape of a railway bonus, and they have corrupted the constituencies of this country and by that means have been enabled to hold power. I see a smile on the face of the Premier. He is well known to be an able and a clever man, and a very cunning one too, and he will no doubt smile on this statement I am about to make—he will smile in his sleeve—that hon. gentleman opposite think: We have got them now, and we have them for a long time to come; we have rolled up a debt that it will be impossible to pay unless we continue to keep up the taxation on the people which we impose by this Bill. I knew that would draw a smile from the hon. gentleman. With him I know it is: after me the deluge. He cares about nothing but to retain power. This is the position in which matters stand. I tell this House that, taking the four millions of acres of land granted as subsidies to be worth one dollar per acre, we will when we close this Session to-morrow or the next day have placed on the people $55,000,000 of taxation, and that will waken up the echoes from one end of the land to the other and make the people hesitate before they again support the right hon. gentleman.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Nobody will believe you, because the statement is not true.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman thinks no one will believe my statement. I think my reputation for veracity and truthfulness will compare favorably with that of the hon. gentleman.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I congratulate hon. gentlemen opposite on the accession to their ranks.

Mr. MITCHELL. If I was guilty of the exaggeration for which the hon. gentleman is noted, then I would not be surprised at the House being unwilling to believe my statement. I did not intend to speak on the subject; I have been drawn into it by the overbearing course pursued by the Minister of Finance. But I did intend to read a letter which I received from a gentleman, who asked me when the tariff question came up to read it to the House, and I will do so, now that I have replied to the tirade which the Minister delivered on hon. gentlemen on this side who have chosen to discuss a Bill, which they have a right to do:

"MONTREAL, 23rd May, 1887.

"J. M. COURTNEY, Esq.,
"Ottawa.

"DEAR SIR,—In answer to your favor of the 21st instant, for which I am obliged, allow me respectfully to request you will be good enough to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the inadequate protection on railway car springs and axles, as mentioned in your favor to hand.

"While the duty on raw material is 50 per cent and over, the protective duty on car springs and axles the limit is 35 per cent. This is against the manufacturer in Canada, and detrimental to my interest and other makers in this country. Hence, I respectfully claim the consideration at the Minister's hands which he promised me on Monday, the 16th instant, when I had the honor of waiting upon him at Ottawa. I find, on reference to the tariff, a duty is put upon ordinary carriage springs and axles of 1c. per lb. specific and 30 per cent. ad valorem.

"There is no reason that I can see why an exception should be made in favor of railway springs, and think that spring makers are entitled to equal consideration with other manufacturers. With the duties on bar steel and railway springs as fixed, American and other manufacturers will have the advantage of us, and will be able to undersell us in Canada. This can hardly be called National Policy. Anticipating a readjustment of the Tariff, I have the honor to remain,

"Yours respectfully,

"B. J. COGHLIN, per J. O."

Mr. Coghlin is one of the leading hardware and spring manufacturers in Montreal. If the statement is true, then very great hardship is inflicted on the gentleman engaged in that business, and the tariff, as regards those engaged in the trade which this gentleman is prosecuting, is not a tariff which has any National Policy in it.

Mr. LAURIER. There is one remark which fell from the lips of the Finance Minister which should not be allowed to pass without some further criticism. The hon. gentleman has attempted to associate with his policy the name of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake). I say, and I leave it to the intelligence of this House and also to the intelligence of the Minister of Finance, that nothing could be more bad taste than to attempt to say that because the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) did not discuss this question, it was because he did not dare to state his views.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I did not intimate that he did not dare to state his views.

Mr. LAURIER. Then what did the hon. gentleman mean?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I stated in my Budget speech in plain and distinct terms that the member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) had committed himself in the most unqualified terms to the policy of protection,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Read the speech, you have it in Hansard; and he assured the manufacturers of this country that they had nothing to fear. I congratulated the House and the country upon the fact that the time had arrived when we were at one on that question. I made that statement in the presence of the hon. gentleman himself; he addressed this House again and again, between that time and the time at which he was unfortunately obliged to leave the House, without his ever having questioned the accuracy of my statement or the soundness of the inferences I drew. That is what I said.

Mr. LAURIER. If the hon. gentleman meant, when he referred to the speech of the hon. member for South Durham (Mr. Blake) what he has just stated, I have nothing more to say, because the speech is there and it speaks for itself. What that hon. gentleman said was this: that if his party were returned to power they would not act like a bull in a china shop and try to demolish everything, but that everything would be revised where it should be revised. I am glad I have drawn from the hon. Finance Minister the disclaimer which he has made—that his reference to the attitude of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) were not as I understood him. I understood him to say that if the voice of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) had not been heard on the question, it was simply because he had changed his views.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will find my speech in Hansard exactly as it was spoken.

Mr. LAURIER. I accept the disclaimer of the hon. gentleman, and since he has made that disclaimer I have nothing more to say. The views of the hon. member for West Durham (Mr. Blake) are well known. He has not attacked every item of the tariff, but he has urged his views again and again, and no one of those views with more force than that the present tariff, or the tariff such as it was before this last revision, was oppressive to the working man and the poorer classes of the community; and I am sure that if he had his voice and were here to-day, he would say that it was ten times, yes a hundred times more so than ever before.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I am not going to debate this question on its merits but I must say that I think that when the Finance Minister rebuked my hon. friend from Bothwell (Mr. Mills) for speaking after him, he should have set the example of not introducing new matter, and making statements which he knows we on this side could not agree with. I find on looking over Hansard that what I am now about to bring before the House has not apparently been considered at any length, and that is the clause providing for the extension of time with regard to goods purchased before the 13th of May. Now, I think it is desirable that the Minister of Customs should, if he has not already done so, publicly state now whether he has made rules which will guide his officers in the various ports, and what evidence he is determined to accept as satisfactory with reference to the purchase of these goods. I think it is desirable that there should be perfect and absolute uniformity, and that it should not be left in the discretion of the officer in one port to accept as proof what would be refused by the officer in another port. I think the Minister must already have devised and detailed a plan as to what evidence he deems satisfactory, and I think it would be in the interest of the country that he should publicly state now whether that evidence shall be the production of the original letters ordering the goods, or whether they must be certified by affidavits from the country in which they were purchased, and all that is required to make this proof. I think it is only reasonable and in the interest of the public that this should be made known.

Mr. BOWELL. There is nothing unreasonable in the request of the hon. gentleman. Just as soon as the Government determined on the policy which has been pursued with reference to the extension of the time for the admission of goods purchased before the 13th of May, instructions were sent to each port as to what would be considered evidence which would enable the importer to enter goods at those rates, that evidence being, first, the production of the order which had been sent to the European or other market for the goods, and, secondly, the evidence from the party from whom they were purchased that the order had been received and accepted prior to that time. The object in giving that instruction was this: orders might have been given for goods, and then cancelled; after the extension of the time, importers could have cabled to parties in a foreign country ordering them to forward the goods. In all cases where it is deemed necessary from the character of the importer and the fact that the evidence is not sufficiently strong in the way of letters, invoices and other documents, then they are instructed to take an affidavit. The fullest instructions, I think, have been given to meet every case, as it was a matter which was discussed very fully by the commissioner and those who were charged with carrying out the details.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Will all these be revised at the head office?

Mr. BOWELL. Certainly not.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I think there should be absolute uniformity. I do not know whether the character of one importer can count for more than that of another—

Mr. BOWELL. I am glad to have the hon. gentleman put that sentiment on record.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that British Columbia gets four months longer in the way of an extension of time than the other Provinces, and I cannot understand why so much time should be allowed. It also appears to me that the 1st of July, under the circumstances I narrated the other day, gives too short a time. I think it should be made the 1st of August, but four months extra is, under the circumstances, an unreasonable time for British Columbia.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say that some of the rails imported for the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway were six months coming from London and Victoria. It is only goods imported into British Columbia via Cape Horn that are admitted up to the 1st of November, and experience proves that the time is not too great, because part of the condition is that they must have been purchased in England prior to the 13th of May. No purchase after that can be imported into British Columbia under the old duty, and that being the case we had to be governed by our own experience as to the time which was frequently occupied in transportation.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I did not quite understand what the Minister of Customs meant by saying he was glad I had put myself on record. I sat down expecting that he would go on.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Putting yourself on record in strengthening the Minister's hands in dealing alike with every person.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I understood the Minister to say that in certain cases an affidavit might be required if the character was not just so, and it seemed to me that one rule should apply.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant).

Mr. BOWELL. The hon. gentleman does not go quite far enough. I said that if the character of the individual and of the evidence produced—the documentary evidence I meant—was not sufficient, then an affidavit might be asked for to sustain that evidence. It has been contended by merchants and gentlemen interested, that the character of the importer should have a great deal to do with the settlement of cases in which the law has been violated—cases of smuggling, under-valuation and so on, and I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say that, in the administration of the law, when a distinct principle is laid down, it should be administered to all alike, no matter who the individuals may be.

Mr. WATSON. I would call the attention of the Minister to the fact that importers in Manitoba and the North West are placed at a great disadvantage, as compared with those in the east, on account of the limited time allowed for bringing goods into the country which were purchased prior to the passing of this Act. The time was extended to the 1st of July. The importers in Manitoba and the Territories who have communicated with me state that they will not be able, in some instances, to have their goods brought in by that date. I think, in fairness to the Manitoba and North-West merchants, an extension of time should be granted to them.

Mr. SCARTH. I would like to say this, that the other members for Manitoba have brought before the proper Minister the subject the hon. member for Marquette has spoken of, and that we have received from the Minister a letter stating that he will look thoroughly into the matter, and do what he can in the interests of Manitoba.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I beg to say that the Government have fully considered this question. The importers of Halifax and St. John made a strong representation to the Government, stating that the season is earlier in Quebec and Ontario than in the Maritime Provinces, and that they ought, therefore, to have an extension of time. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is aware that the season is still earlier in Winnipeg than it is in Quebec or Ontario. On the other hand, the importers of Toronto and Montreal, especially those of Toronto, have represented to the Government that as the goods reach Halifax and St. John earlier than they can reach Toronto, the merchants of the Maritime Provinces have advantage over them. All these matters have been considered, but it was found absolutely essential to fix a time. The 1st of July was fixed, and will have to be regarded and accepted by everybody. I do not think I can extend the time either in the Maritime Provinces or in Ontario and Quebec, or in the North-West on any of the grounds stated. As I understand, there is no difficulty in the way of entering goods in Winnipeg, Toronto or Montreal, the moment they reach Canada. Therefore, I wish it to be distinctly understood that there can be no extension beyond the 1st of July.

Mr. WATSON. Has British Columbia an extension of time?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It has no extension of time, except as regards goods imported via Cape Horn, by which route it sometimes takes six months for the goods to reach the country, and then it is only for goods ordered before the 13th day of May.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed. It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the Chair.

After Recess.

DIVORCE—RELIEF OF SUSAN ASH.

Mr. SMALL moved the third reading of Bill (No. 135) for the relief of Susan Ash (from the Senate).

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to know whether the hon. gentlemen who have charge of the Bill, are prepared to amend it in accordance with the wishes of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House. The complaint is that the preamble of the Bill made untrue allegations as to the facts of the case. It is evident that the only ground upon which the promoters seem to depend is that, if the untrue allegations were admitted, the application would not fall within the rule recognised as the rule upon which Parliament is willing to dissolve the marriage bond. It is a well settled rule in the courts of England and the United States, that where one party obtained a legal discharge of the legal bonds the other party is equally released, though the court may have made no declaration with regard to that party. It appears that Susan Ash, in her petition, admits that her husband was already divorced by the Supreme Court of the State of Massachusetts, but in this case it appears that this Susan Ash, in making her application, admitted that her husband was already divorced from her under a judicial proceeding of the Supreme Court of the State of Massachusetts, that he had resided there for the time required by the law of Massachusetts before making application, that he claimed to be a resident of the State, having domicile there, that after obtaining that domicile he made application in due form for a discharge from the marriage bond and obtained a decree, that the decree of the court was set forward by this woman in her evidence. The moment she stated that fact, and stated it as a fact, she was under obligation to prove, if she wished to obtain a divorce on the ground that her husband was living in a state of adultery, that he had not acquired a domicile in the State of Massachusetts, and that he could not legally obtain a discharge from the marriage bond which could be recognised in the courts of this country. She has not done that. The burden of proof was on her throughout, and if the promoters of the Bill wish to obtain the support of those who have already voted against its third reading, it is necessary they should remove their reasonable objection by making the preamble of the Bill to conform to the facts. It seems to me a monstrous proceeding to call upon members to make an untrue allegation, and an allegation calculated to cast a stigma upon the character of the other party, and upon his children as well.

Mr. SMALL. I do not feel disposed to accept any amendment at this stage, for the reason that if an amendment is made and the Bill sent back to the Senate, it may be thrown out.

Mr. TUPPER (Pictou). I hope my hon. friend will not insist upon taking a vote on the Bill as it now stands, for this reason: there is danger that, in consequence of the different members of the House who believed that Susan Ash should have relief, but differ as to the manner in which the preamble should be drawn, she may obtain no relief at all, which would be a most unfortunate result for this application. I would ask that the suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's (Mr. Davies) should be accepted as a way out of this difficulty. It will enable those who differ as to the manner in which the Bill should be drawn to support the Bill in the amended form. The suggestion of the hon. member for Queen's, after consultation with some hon. members in the Senate, is simply to eliminate from the preamble the declaration that the woman is living in a state of adultery. Those who do not believe that the Massachusetts decree is valid and binding, would be thus able to vote for the relief of Susan Ash, on the grounds that the husband committed adultery, and those who believe that the decree of divorce obtained by the husband is valid, would be able to vote for granting relief to Susan Ash for other reasons—reasons, perhaps, not good in a court of divorce, reasons, perhaps, political as to the right and power of Parliament to declare invalid a marriage for any cause it may think proper. While still holding to the opinions I expressed on a former occasion, I am prepared to accept an amendment in that direction, and to vote for the relief of Susan Ash.

Mr. MULOCK. I voted in the committee for the Bill as presented to the House, and I did so under the impression that the Senate would not consent to a Bill for divorce which did not contain the allegation now complained of. I have since spoken with a prominent member of the Senate that the Bill would pass that body, if the objectionable recital were excluded from the preamble. I would, therefore, advise the promoters of the Bill to fall in with the suggestion of the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Tupper) and consent to the removal of this objectionable recital. There appears to be a common opinion on both sides that this woman is entitled to relief, and it will reflect much credit on our intelligence if we cannot succeed, by the removal of a few formal words, in granting her that relief.

Mr. SMALL. I am quite willing to accept the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) As far as I can gather, all those interested in the Bill are in favor of the amendment the hon. member for Pictou has outlined; that is, that a certain objectionable phrase be removed in the preamble. I move that the order for the third reading be discharged and the Bill be referred back to Committee of the Whole for further consideration.

Motion agreed to, on a division, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) moved that all the words in the preamble, commencing in the tenth line, after the words "sixty-eight," be struck out, namely, "That on or about the said fourth day of September, 1868, owing to the said William Manton's conduct, it became impossible for her to continue to live with the said William Manton as his wife;" and also that the word "pretended" in line 18, be struck out, and the word "alleged" substituted therefor, and that in the 19th line, the words "in a state of adultery" be struck out.

Preamble, as amended, agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed, on a division.

THIRD READING.

SUBSIDIES TO RAILWAYS.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell) moved that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on Bill (No. 164) to authorise the grant of certain subsidies in land for the construction of the railways therein named. He said: I wish to ask permission to add a clause to this Bill that was omitted in the draft of the Bill itself. The following is the clause:

"The said grants, and each of them may be so made in aid of the construction of the said railways respectively, in the proportions and upon the conditions, fixed by the Orders in Council, made in respect thereof,—each of the said enterprises being respectively subject to any modification thereof which may hereafter be made by the Governor in Council, and, except as to such conditions, the said grants shall be free grants, subject only to the payment by the grantees respectively of the cost of survey of the lands and incidental expenses, at the rate of 10 cents per acre in cash on the issue of the patents therefor."

Motion agreed to; Bill considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

SUPREME AND EXCHEQUER COURTS ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved that the House concur in the amendments made by the Senate to Bill (No. 111) to amend the Supreme and Exchequer Courts Act, and to make better provisions for the trial of claims against the Crown. He said: There is a very slight amendment. There was a provision made, that until the Act came into operation, pending business should be proceeded with as before, and the Senate added the words "in which the hearing has commenced, or in which the cause has been set down."

Amendments concurred in.

ELECTORAL FRANCHISE ACT.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the second reading of Bill (No. 114) to amend the Electoral Franchise Act.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether he is prepared to consent to amend this Bill in such a way as to permit voters' lists to be amended in those constituencies where the elections are being contested. The hon. gentleman knows that it is stated that, in many of the constituencies, the electoral lists are seriously defective. Of course, it might turn out that a seat became vacant from some unforeseen circumstance, but the risk is not very great. But where petitions are filed against sitting members we know that the facilities which the law affords for unseating a member, not simply on account of his own conduct, but on account of the misconduct of some of his own agents during the heat of an election, is so very great that it would be quite improper if the House failed to make provision for a proper election list in such constituency. We know that the last list was, in many constituencies, seriously defective. I need mention no other case than the list in the county of Kent. There were, I think, 1,450 names put upon that list whose right to be there was contested by the Reform party. We know how that list was made up. I have the list here; if it was not so late in the Session I would read a statement to show how the revising officer proceeded with its preparation. When the court of revision sat an effort was made to strike a number of those names off the list, and between three hundred and four hundred were so struck off; but there was a difference between the counsel who were asking for the removal of the names and the revising officer. A writ of mandamus was obtained from one of the Superior Courts, and that officer was ordered to correct the list in accordance with the contention of the counsel in those cases. It was agreed between counsel and the revising officer that the rule which the Superior Court had laid down with respect to those particular cases should be applied in other instances; but, after the ruling was given, the revising officer refused to be governed by that understanding, and so the list continued to be seriously defective. I believe at the last election, in some of the polling divisions, a large number of persons came to vote there from Detroit, men who had never been in the county. Fictitious names were put on the lists, the names of persons whom the people in the locality had never heard of before. When those persons had recorded their votes they took the next train for the American side. There was no possibility of punishing them for having made a false declaration, and having voted upon it. Their names still remained there, and the result was that what was done at the last election might be done if another election took place. This House would be wanting in its duty to the country, if it failed to make provision in those constituencies. We pointed out to the First Minister, and hon. gentlemen who were associated with the Government when they introduced this Bill, that it would entail serious expenditure on the country, that it was cumbersome and defective, that it could not be enforced without very large expenditure, that it would entail not only a great expense in order to pay for revising officers and publication of the lists, but serious expenses upon the parties who were seeking election to Parliament in order to keep those lists reasonably accurate. The hon. gentleman did not accept that view, and our experience of it has been borne out by the experiment; and now the hon. gentleman, instead of repealing this Bill and going back to the old policy of utilising the lists that were in force in the various Provinces, proposes that a period should be allowed to go by without any amendment of the lists taking place. We know that a considerable number of our population are migratory; they move from place to place; they go wherever their interests for the time require them to go and where those interests are best served, and I do not overstate the case when I say that, within twelve months, there is an average change of 10 per cent. in the voters' list, if the list is carefully revised. So in an ordinary list of 6,000 voters there will be a change of 600 every year, and that of itself, when you look at the average majority secured by those who run for Parliament, is a very large number, and a number sufficient to turn the election either for or against any particular candidate. That being the case it seems to me we would be acting most improperly if we failed to make a revision, at all events in those constituencies where we see that, in all probability, an election may take place, because I think we may fairly assume that the House would not be exercising due diligence and precaution, wherever a seat is contested, if it did not anticipate an election and make all necessary provision to obtain a correct voters' list. To appeal to the country on any other list would be manifestly unfair. Why, when the representation of Haldimand became vacant twelve months ago, and it was asked why the Government had not issued a writ in accordance with the decision of the House in that case, the First Minister said the voters' list was not completed, that the qualifications of the voters having been changed it would be improper to proceed with the election until a new list was completed in accordance with the provisions of the law. The reason which the hon. gentleman thought sufficient to justify him in refusing to go forward with the election in that case should justify this House and I will go now further and say it should make it the imperative duty of this House, morally at all events, to take all necessary steps to see that a proper voters' list and one in accordance with law is prepared so that the elections when they take place may be a fair and honest expression of the opinions of the electors in each of the constituencies where such an election takes place. I do not wish to detain the House, because I am anxious, as I am sure all hon. gentlemen are, that this Session should be brought to a close.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I am glad to hear those expressions from hon. gentlemen opposite, and I hope they will assist us in facilitating the discharge of public business, and they can do so by pressing upon the attention of the Government the propriety of securing a proper voters' list in all those constituencies where an election is likely to take place.

Mr. THOMPSON. I explained very briefly to the House when I introduced the Bill, the principle on which it was founded. The electoral lists all over the country last summer were revised with keen contest on both sides, as regards the political parties, and the hon. gentleman has called our attention to one county in which he says important defects still exist in the revised lists. I think the object of the Bill would be antagonistic to the amendment which the hon. gentleman proposes. The object of the Bill is that the electoral list, having thus been established with as great care and diligence, as regards the parties interested, as can be expected, it is desirable to suspend this year's revision in order that steps may be taken, by information which is now in our possession, to considerably reduce the expense of the revision. The circumstance of defects having occurred in the revision is, of course, unavoidable. I am not in a position to know, except from the statements which have just been made, as to any defects with regard to the county of Kent, but I well conceive that, in many constituencies, there may be defects, owing to the want of full and accurate information; and, no doubt, if that revision took place again this year, defects would occur in spite of any amendment which could be proposed. The proposition of the Bill is, that the revision so made shall be held in force for another year with a view to economise, first, with regard to the expense of revision this year, and, secondly, with a view of establishing some permanent change in the Bill which will economise the expense of the revision hereafter. I can see no reason why we should say, as regards any county of which it may be said that defects have occurred, that it should be made an exception. The same thing might be said of any county, and the vacancies which the hon. gentleman points to as possible to occur, in consequence of petitions having been filed against the sitting member, might occur for any other reason in other counties, so that there would be a distinction made between one set of counties in respect of which petitions have been filed, and those in respect of which vacancies have occurred in any other way.

Mr. JONES. It appears that the Government are under the impression that they are going to gain some advantage by retaining the lists in their present shape. That can be seen on the face of the matter without much difficulty. When this Act was passed, and when it was submitted last year to be carried into effect, it was a new Act; we had a new class of officers created for the purpose of carrying it into effect, and while I will not pretend to say that in every case they did not discharge their duties fairly, I know that in many cases there was marked partiality and very great complaints made against the revising barristers; so much so that I know, in some counties, and notably in the county of Halifax, there are suits going on at this very moment against the revising barristers for having omitted names which were proved in a proper and legitimate manner, but were left off on the final revision. The Government are asking a most extraordinary power. They ask to suspend the operation of an Act which they themselves put on the Statute-book only one year ago. That is an evidence, in the first place, that the Act is an improper one; it is an evidence and admission on the part of the Government that it has imposed an expenditure on the tax-payers of this Dominion which they can no longer advocate. But, having accomplished their purpose at the general election, hon. gentlemen think now that with the advantages which they gained through partisan revising barristers they can assume the role of economists, and come down and ask the House to suspend the operation of an Act which they themselves placed on the Statute-book. The hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) pointed out very properly the position taken by the Government a year ago, when a vacancy occurred in the county of Haldimand. What was the argument of the First Minister on that occasion? The hon. gentleman delayed the issue of the writ for the county, on the ground that the electors should be consulted, up to the very last moment, that the actual electors of that county should have an opportunity of saying who should represent them in Parliament. What do they propose now? They propose, not that the electors of 1887 shall elect the representatives in the case of vacancies occurring in 1887, but that the electors of 1886 shall elect the representatives for 1887. Why, it is a monstrous proposition. It could only come from a corrupt Government. It could not come from any Administration in any British possession or in any part of the British dominions, which had any regard for consistency or for British usage or practice. I say emphatically, in the presence of hon. gentlemen opposite, that there is no Administration in any part of the British dominions that would dare to bring down a Bill to suspend the operation of an Act, and ask that the representatives to this Legislature should be elected by the electors of the previous year. We know that, with the experience gained during the last revision of the lists, those revising officers who carried out the behests of the Government are still there. We know very well, and have reason to assume, that they would understand their duties better to-day than they understood them when the Act was new to them; and I have no doubt that many of them have enough conscience left to discharge their duties well. But be that as it may, the Government have no right to step in and prevent them. I contend that the Government are guilty of an arbitrary, unconstitutional and improper exercise of authority and interference, in attempting to prevent the electors of this Dominion, where vacancies may occur, from giving free expression to their desires and wishes as to who shall represent them in Parliament. I had hoped that there was still some sense of propriety lingering on that side of the House, although we have looked for it in vain during this Session. We have seen votes which the Government have—I will not say compelled—but have induced their supporters to give, with reference to important public matters, which have caused astonishment not only in this House, but throughout the country, and now, in the closing days of this Parliament, they are again to ask their followers to record their votes for a measure which would indicate that they have not yet fully exhausted their servility. I say, Mr. Speaker, that we might hope, if there was any independence in this House, that they would insist upon the Government carrying out, in full force and effect, the Act which they themselves created, and not shelter themselves under the miserable pretext of economy, when that idea of economy is violated every day and hour during this Session, as proved by the votes which they have submitted. No one knows what may happen; as the hon. member for Bothwell has said, all things are possible, and the proposition of my hon. friend is just as fair to one side as to the other. While hon. gentlemen may sit on the Treasury benches, and say to themselves: We have gained an advantage in the revision last year and are going to hold that advantage, the country will hold that they are not properly fulfilling their functions as Ministers of the Crown if they take upon themselves the responsibility of suspending the Act, and preventing the people of this country from giving full, free and ample expression to their will.

Mr. PRÉFONTAINE. I do not see why the Minister of Justice refuses to accept a proposition so fair and just as that of the hon. member for Bothwell. We all know that the lists were not prepared with due care last year. There is no doubt that, in many constituencies, they were not prepared to the satisfaction of the electors. For instance, in the county I have the honor to represent, although I attended most of the meetings held for the revision of the lists, there was a meeting in one parish at which I could not be present, and the result was that in that parish 75 spurious votes were entered on the list, and were cast in the election, so that what was a majority of 88 in July was reduced to a majority of 40 in February. Now, suppose that the county of Chambly should become vacant. I do not suppose it can become vacant as the result of the protest which has been entered, but it may from some other cause. In that county the Government might venture to hold an election with the chance of redeeming it, because they have in one parish 75 voters who have no right to vote, but whom the friends of the Government got placed on the list. Many other counties may also become vacant; and if the Government have any real intention of doing justice to all parties, they should accept the proposition of the hon. member for Bothwell. For my part I am not ready to give up the principle of the Franchise Act, as against the franchise being placed under the control of the Provincial Governments. I am opposed to the revision of these lists by barristers; but the Government have promised that next year they will introduce a measure more just and economical than the one we have now. But when the Opposition are not ready to bring on a discussion for the repeal of the Act, the least that could be done would be to accept the amendment which will be proposed for allowing a revision of the lists to take place in counties where there may be elections.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). I think that the list used in the county I represent was the most impure list in the Dominion, and I think I may safely say that no revising officer performed his duty so unjustly and unfairly as the revising officer in that county. His modus operandi was this: Before preparing the list, he exercised no care whatever to see that the names placed on it were entitled to go on. He was very careless in that respect, allowing every name submitted to him to go on the list. The consequence was that we sent in appeals against no fewer than 1,400 names. We took the ground that it is the duty of the revising officer to see that the list he is preparing is a fair and just list, which he did not do. There were on the list names of people who never lived in the county, names of people who had died two or three years before, names of people who were not more than 15 or 16 years of age, and names of people who had no property at all in the county, and, consequently, had no right to vote. When the appeals were sent in, the revising officer showed his strong partisanship and his lack of justice in the manner in which he proceeded with them. According to the law 14 days' notice previous to the time of holding the court must be given to the person against whom you appeal; but the judge held that because we had not kept a copy of the notice we had sent, it was, therefore, no notice at all, although the parties who actually received the notice appeared in court and stated they had no right to vote. On that ground that partisan revising officer would not hear our appeals. Then, according to the Act you must serve a notice on the revising officer as well, informing him of the party against whom you appeal. The revising officer had an office in the town of Chatham and had a deputy there. The revising officer was scarcely ever in his office, and, for the sake of convenience, the notices, instead of being served on the revising officer in the street, were served on his deputy in his office. His deputy asked him if he would accept that as a sufficient notice, and he replied that he would; but when the cases came before him in the court, he threw out the appeals, because, as he said, the notices had been served on his deputy instead of upon himself. The consequence was that, on appeal to the high courts in Toronto, I am glad to say the case was decided in our favor on every point, and a mandamus was ordered to issue to compel the revising officer to do what he should have done before. Of course this cost a large sum, but we were bound that we would not submit, and we got a mandamus from the Superior Court at Toronto, to compel the revising barrister to hear the appeals. We applied for this mandamus simply for the town of Chatham, and we asked the revising barrister if he would hear the outside appeals without a mandamus, and he said he would. Consequently we did not apply for any except for the town of Chatham. We succeeded, notwithstanding the partisanship of this revising barrister, in striking off no less than 360 names in that town alone, and this, in spite of every objection that could possibly be taken by the revising barrister. Every difficulty was thrown in our way, all the expense he could possibly heap on us we had to pay, but, notwithstanding all that, we succeeded in having 360 men struck off the list. When we wished to have the outside appeals heard, the revising barrister, notwithstanding the promise he had made us, refused to hear them because we had not applied for a mandamus. That is the true state of affairs in the county of Kent. There may possibly be an election there in another year, and that list contains 1000 names that ought not to be on it at all. In many municipalities the lists were made on the 1885 list, the last revised list before the Franchise Bill was prepared. Consequently, two years have passed by, and there are hundreds of people who were entitled to vote in 1885 who are not entitled to vote now. The only object in holding an election is to obtain an expression of the will of the people. Therefore, it would be wrong to insist in making this legal for the county of Kent. I think the proposition of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is a very fair one, namely, that there should be exception made of those counties in which there is likely to be an election within a short time, and I hope the Minister of Justice will accept it. I have no doubt that the lists can be greatly improved. The lists in the county of Kent contain a great many names that have no right to be there at all, the names of men who have never lived in the county and of men who died two or three years ago; while there are hundreds of men who hold property and have lived there two or three years, whose names are not on the list. It would be a great act of injustice to the electors of the county of Kent if a revision were not made. I am strongly opposed to the Franchise Bill. I believe a great mistake was made in passing it. It has proved very expensive to both political parties, and I may say the Conservative and the Reform party in the county of Kent are one on the subject that the Bill should be done away with. But while the Act is retained, I hold that an exception should be made for the county of Kent, and that the lists there should be revised again this year. It would be a great injustice to the town of Chatham, where there are a great many young men, mechanics and laboring men who have acquired the right to vote, should a revision not be allowed.

Mr. LAURIER. I would be disposed personally to look upon this Bill as a step in a right direction. I have always looked upon the Franchise Act, and my opinion is not a solitary one, as being an unmitigated evil. Under this Bill, we are to have at least one year's suspension of evil, and there is reason to hope, from the congratulations showered on the Minister of Justice for the step he has taken, that next Session he may be induced to propose the suspension of the Act for another year. After this relief we may be relieved one year more from the incubus, so that from year to year the Act may be suspended and never more applied. If I did not anticipate that the Minister of Justice would take the step he has just taken, I would have insisted on bringing forward my motion for the repeal of the Act altogether. However, at this stage of the Session, and since the Act is to be suspended, at least for one year, there is no reason to propose its repeal now, and that question may be left open for another Session. As the Act is, after all, to remain in force—whether it be a vicious or a bad Act, as it is believed to be by hon. gentlemen on this side, or a good Act as it is professed to be by hon. gentlemen on the other side—it would be only just and fair that the proposition of my hon. friend for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) should be adopted. The Minister of Justice has not met the proposition of my hon. friend by a very strong argument. The only argument he brought was that such an amendment would discriminate between counties, that it would leave the law in force in some counties, perhaps contested counties, and would prevent it being in force in other counties where an election may also take place. The hon. gentleman argued that, though there was no possibility of elections at this moment, in certain counties there might be some. It is a possible contingency, but a very remote one, while the contingency in the other case is a proximate one. It is therefore just and fair that, if there are counties where elections will take place, the law of the land should be applied, if, in the opinion of the Government, it is worth applying at all. If the Government have confidence in their law that the lists should be revised every year, they cannot deprive those electors of the benefit of the application of that law. The Government cannot have forgotten that, last year, one of the reasons given for the postponement of the election was that the lists should be prepared, and a new electorate called on to pronounce upon the policy of the Government. The same reason should apply here, and I would suggest to the hon. gentleman, in no unfriendly spirit, that he should accept the amendment of my hon. friend.

Mr. WATSON. As representing a county in which the election has been protested, and there is a chance of another election taking place before the end of twelve months, I hope the Minister of Justice may see fit to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell. As has been stated by previous speakers, there are many electors in different constituencies who are changing, and, unless the list is revised in the county of Marquette, a large number of the people in that county who are entitled to vote, will be deprived of their franchise in case of an election taking place before another revision. So far as I am personally concerned, I am opposed now, as I was when the Franchise Bill was under discussion, to having a Dominion list at all. Our local lists are more liberal than the present Dominion franchise. I do not find fault with the revising barrister in my county. He has acted very fairly, and I have no fault to find in that regard, but this Act, as well as other Acts, requires the people to be educated so as to understand the Act, and in the first revision of the lists a large number of the electors did not know what was necessary to be done in order to have their names placed on the list. Consequently, many who should have voted were not placed on the list. Now, they are educated to the fact that they were deprived of the right, and they have made application to have their names placed on the list at the revision which it was expected would take place during this month. It will be a great injustice to many of the residents in the county of Marquette who are qualified to vote, if we do not have a revision. At this late stage of the Session, when all members are anxious to get through the work of the House, I will not detain the House, but I do hope the Minister of Justice will agree, at least, to have a revision in those constituencies where there are protests against the sitting member. While I believe in the Government economising, I do not believe in their economising at the expense of the electorate. I think the electorate should have the fullest power accorded to them of expressing their will at the polls, and I hope that, ere long, as has been stated by the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Laurier), the Government may see fit to withdraw this Bill altogether, and that, when it is necessary to have a list for Dominion purposes, it shall be based on manhood suffrage.

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise simply to make a suggestion in relation to this matter, because the Session is drawing to a close, and we have a great deal of business to get through to-night and to-morrow. Occupying the position of one who gave notice of an important amendment to the Franchise Act, to adopt the principle of manhood suffrage, I desire to say that I have made up my mind, owing to the lateness of the Session and the fact that no object can be accomplished by endeavoring to induce the Ministry to change their policy at this stage, to let the Ministry take the responsibility of passing the Act as it stands now, and so save the time of the House and let us get away to our homes. I was amused at the simplicity of the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Campbell), whose very admirable speech I listened to with pleasure. I am sure that he will be an ornament to the House, but I can only ascribe his simplicity to his inexperience in dealing with the gentlemen who now sit on the Treasury benches. Why, he stated that if this list were revised, the probability was that he would get a thousand more votes. Did he suppose that the Ministry, did he suppose that the First Minister, who has got the advantage of having the control of a thousand votes in that constituency, would be simple enough to give away that privilege? Did he expect that from a Ministry which has seated in this House a gentleman who had a minority of votes? No, certainly not. So the discussion is useless, and I, therefore, give notice that I will not press my amendment for manhood suffrage, but, when the Bill comes up again, or early next Session at any rate, I shall make it my duty to press upon the House, as I did two years ago, when the Bill was under consideration, the necessity of simplifying the law by weeding out these fancy franchises, by removing these restrictions and conditions, and these numerous limitations, and adopting the simple plan of giving a vote to every man over twenty-one years of age who has paid the taxes. That is my idea of what ought to be the franchise in this country. I do not know that any suggestion I may make will have any effect with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, but I think it would be well if they would allow the Government to take the responsibility of this measure to-night, and so to get on with the other business of the House.

Mr. MULOCK. I think the Minister of Justice ought to make one exception to the provisions of this Bill. It is well known that there is a gentleman occupying a seat in this House under very exceptional circumstances. I refer to the gentleman sitting for the county of Queen's, New Brunswick. When he offered his explanations to the House, he stated that he was dissatisfied with the revision of the list in his county, and that, as soon as those lists were properly revised, he would resign the seat he felt he was not entitled to occupy; and, if this Bill is made law in its present form, it gives this hon. gentleman an excuse for continuing to be—I will almost say, an intruder—a stranger in this House. The Government took the responsibility of confirming that gentleman in his seat. He said that he would resign when the lists were revised, and at that time he had reason to assume that the revision would take place in the ordinary course, that is, at the present time, and hon. gentlemen who supported the Government in their attitude on that question were, no doubt, influenced to some extent by the pledge which he gave that he would resign when the lists were revised, namely, during the present year. If the Government say that there shall be no revision, they relieve him from the responsibility of carrying out his promise, and, more than that, they continue to allow to exist what I think is a gross violation of everything that is right. If it were necessary to have a complete revision in the whole country for the sake of purging the House of a person who ought not to be here, I say let that purging take place, even if it is at some cost. There is nothing we ought to guard more carefully than the rights of the people, the only rights they have which distinguish them from bondsmen. But, if by this Act you again enforce the conduct of the returning officer for the county of Queen's, you do it at a great expense, and it will not cost much simply to have the Act in force this year for Queen's, N.B. It will not cost more than $1,000, I presume, or $2,000 at the most, and certainly the country would be willing to be relieved of the odium of having a stranger here representing a constituency for which he was not elected, at a cost of $2,000. The Government have got themselves into this position by passing the Act in question. By the action they are taking now, they admit that the Act was bad and objectionable.

It has cost about half a million of dollars to put it into force for one year, and now that they have the House elected, they find that there was something in the protests of the Opposition. Disapproving as I did, and as I do, of the Act, I think the Government ought, at all events, to make an exception in regard to Queen's, New Brunswick. Further, I think the Government is guilty, in this proposition, of a departure from the recognised institutions of Canada. It has always been the custom to have annual revisions of the voters' lists, and now we are asked to do away with that, and to disfranchise a large number of electors, and to give the franchise to a number of people who ought not to have a vote. That is the consequence of this Act. I quite agree with the hon. member from Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) that the proper solution is to do away with all he justly describes as fancy franchises, and let us come down to the theory of manhood suffrage.

Mr. WALDIE. The county I represent has claims to a revision of its franchise which, I think, should not be overlooked. There are in my county several villages that are water resorts, and among the inhabitants of those resorts some 150 names were added to the voters' lists under the present revision. I think those names were properly added, because they were residents there in the year 1885, but they have not been residents in the county since 1885, and to permit those who are only temporary residents to become permanent voters and to vote in 1887, or 1888, merely because no revision has taken place, would be very unfair and unjust. In addition to the 150 names in the village of Burlington and the town of Oakville, many other changes have taken place in the county of Halton, and the number at present qualified is fully 30 per cent. greater than it was when the present list was made. A larger number of young men have become of age, and unless the lists were revised again, they would be excluded from the privilege of voting in another election. Some of these young men were volunteers in the North-West, they have been serving their country and have come back into the county, and being now of age, they have a right to vote. I say it would be very unfair not to have a revision of the lists, if there should be another election. Although the expense is to be regretted, still the rights of those who are qualified to vote should be secured to them.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to raise my voice in opposition to the Franchise Act, both as it now stands and as it is proposed to amend it. I have visited a large number of my constituents, and both Conservatives and Liberals are universally of opinion that the Franchise Act ought not to have been passed in the first place. It was exceedingly expensive, and it has been the occasion, according to a high authority, of producing in the witness box a class of oaths which ought not to be taken. In many cases we know perfectly well that parties who are desirous of getting their names on the voters' lists, have gone into the witness-box and made statements which are not in accordance with the facts. If we need an argument against the Franchise Act, we need not look further than the Bill, which the Government propose to the House to-night, to suspend its operations for a single year. Why are we asked to suspend the operations of this Act? Is it not virtually an acknowledgment that the Act is exceedingly expensive, more expensive, I venture to say, than the supporters of the Government in the House are willing to submit to? After having had some experience in the operation of this Act, I venture to say they are not willing to support the Government in continuing it in operation as it now stands, and I believe that force has been brought to bear on the Government by their own followers, either to repeal or suspend its operations. As regards my constituency, I don't think I have anything to gain or to lose by a revision of the list; but, independently of my own interest, I say it is unfair to a large number of men who, since the present revision was made, have become of age, or who have moved into the county and become property owners, tenants, or occupants. In case another election took place—and none of us can tell when an election may take place—it is unfair that these men who have a right to exercise the franchise, should be deprived of it. I think the proper course for the Government to pursue is not to amend the Act in the direction they propose to-night, but to extend the franchise, and to allow every young man who is 21 years of age, and a resident in the county for a proper length of time, to exercise the franchise whenever an occasion presents itself. I think if any argument is needed in favor of abolishing this Franchise Act, which was to be so inexpensive and such a boon to the electors, it is the fact that the Government are compelled, after it has been in operation one year, to propose to suspend its operation on account of its expensiveness.

Mr. McMULLEN. There has not been a proper revision of the lists in Centre Wellington for the simple reason that the gentleman charged with that duty took no interest in the revision, as there was no candidate in my county on the other side. The result is that there is a large number of qualified persons in Centre Wellington who were not put upon the lists at all. Now, if there were to be another election, it would be highly desirable that those who are qualified should be permitted to exercise the franchise. I hardly think that the Government would, at this moment, desire to prevent any person, who has the right, from exercising the franchise when an opportunity arises. I am sure that in my riding, there are two or three hundred whose names ought to be on the list, and would be on the list if there was a revision. I quite agree with the suggestion of the hon. member for Bothwell that where a protest has been entered, and where it is probable that an election may take place within a year, it is but just to the electors of that riding that every opportunity should be given them of putting their names upon the lists. I am not now speaking in my own interests at all, but in the interest of the people generally who have a right to vote.

Mr. CHOQUETTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, while we are on this subject, I wish to call the attention of the Government on the qualification of the revising officer of the county of Montmagny. It seems to me that a man who, under the Election Law, cannot be returning officer, is still less qualified to act as revising officer, because this last mentioned official has judiciary powers, and powers which are much more extensive than those of a returning officer. Under the Election Law, chapter 8, section 7, a man who has been found guilty of corrupt practices has no right to be returning officer. Well, probably the Government are not aware of the facts connected with the revising officer of the county of Montmagny, and has appointed him at the request of a man who was interested in having him appointed, in order that he should put on the list names which have no right to be there, and that he should refuse to insert others who were perfectly qualified to be there. Now, I will refer the Government to the Judiciary Reports of Quebec, volume 9, page 84, where it is stated by the judges of the Superior Court, that Hubert Hébert, who is to-day revising officer for the county of Montmagny, was found guilty of corrupt practices in the controverted election case of Bernatchez and Fortin. Hubert Hébert was at the time an officer of the Government; he was agent at the St. Thomas Station of the Intercolonial Railway, and although he was an officer of the Government, he was busy canvassing during the whole time of the contest, and when the election was contested, in 1883, he was convicted of corrupt practices. I presume that the more a Government official meddles with politics and the more he works for his party, the better he is rewarded. It is what we have seen lately. When the Government passed the electoral franchise law, they hastened to appoint this Hubert Hébert, whom these judges of the Superior Court had declared guilty of corrupt practices, as revising officer for the county of Montmagny, and the Government by referring to the Judiciary Reports of Quebec will see the name of their revising officer, of their public official, branded as a corruptionist in the elections. And it is this man who has just been put at the head of a county, and in whose hands extraordinary judiciary powers have been vested. I am satisfied that the Government were not aware of these facts when they made this appointment, and that they have acted on the suggestion of a man, who, I repeat it, was interested in having Mr. Hébert appointed to prepare the voters' list. Now that the Government are in possession of these facts, now that they have before them the judgment of the court, now that they know that this public servant has not even the privilege of acting as returning officer, I have no doubt that the Government, for the honor of the county, for the honor of the Government themselves, will hasten to repeal this appointment, and, if necessary, to appoint another person to that office.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MILLS. I do not want to detain the committee by proposing amendments which the Minister of Justice will not accept. I would say further, however, that the oath taken by the voter requires amendment, and that can be done without adding to the expense or inconvenience. At the present time there are many persons who have gone to the United States whose names are on the voters' lists; some, indeed, have become naturalised as American citizens. They are no longer the subjects of Her Majesty, and under our law they are regarded as aliens and foreigners. But it would not be perjury for one of those parties to declare on oath that he was a natural-born subject of Her Majesty. We have all along the border counties people coming from Michigan and Ohio during the elections whose names are on the voters' lists, and who vote, although they have become naturalised citizens of the United States. I would suggest to the Minister that he amend the oath so that the party must declare that he is a natural born or a naturalised subject of Her Majesty and has not become a citizen or naturalised subject of any other state. That change would exclude a great many persons who should not be permitted to vote.

Mr. THOMPSON. I think it is not desirable to introduce such a change into a measure that is purely temporary. It will require to be very carefully considered, as a matter of policy, and it will be considered in the preparation of a measure to be brought down next Session. Such a declaration would disable from voting a great many persons who ought to be entitled to the franchise, persons who in early life left Canada and went to the United States and engaged in occupations there which required them to take the oath of allegiance, but who finally returned to the country of their natural allegiance, settled here and brought up families and owned property. It does not seem to me that those parties should be disqualified.

Mr. MILLS. Our law declares that such persons are aliens, and they are required to give notice and take the same proceedings as any other foreigners to become British subjects. That is the provision of the law as it stands.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is another amendment in the same line which the hon. gentleman should introduce if the law is to be changed; we should return to the oath administered in 1882. If I understand the present oath correctly it has this effect: If you suspend the law for a year a very considerable number of persons who are not intended to have the right to vote will vote; whereas, the old oath provided that the man taking it should swear that he was a resident within a certain time of the electoral district, which appears a reasonable and fair proposition. If the hon. gentleman would return to the oath of 1882 he would prevent a considerable number of irregularities which will undoubtedly take place otherwise.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In preparing a future measure the Minister of Justice will no doubt consider all these proposals, and will endeavor to meet the views of hon. gentleman as far as he can agree with them. Only a few months will elapse, and then we will meet in January, and the hon. Minister will have time to perfect the measure before the House meets.

Mr. MILLS. Within those few months, we may have had sixty elections. I think there has been that number of petitions filed, at least I have been so informed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If there are to be sixty elections the hon. gentleman must remember that this Bill would not come into force until 1st November, and that most of the cases would be decided before then, that the writs must issue before November, and the elections must be on the present list, and so all his arguments in favor of the amendment amount to nothing.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman forgets what he did in the Bothwell case.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I have received a communication from a riding where it is possible there will be a contest. I am informed that the effect of postponing the revision of the lists for a year will be to deprive 600 men of the right to vote, and confer that right on 500 electors who should not possess that right. The Minister will remember that the present lists were made on the assessment of 1886, and if elections take place in 1888 they would be on the same lists. By that time the electorate might be almost entirely changed, and men would be voting who are not entitled to vote, and the reverse would be the case, and altogether the result would not be a satisfactory state of things. The committee are aware that I am in favor of sweeping away the Act; but while the Minister does not seem to be willing to repeal it, this may be a first step towards its repeal.

Bill reported.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS. I hope the hon. gentleman will allow it to stand till to-morrow

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I hope the House will be in a position to prorogue to-morrow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think that is very unreasonable and quite impossible. We have got nearly one hundred items in the Estimates which have not been yet passed through Supply, and there is the whole of concurrence to be taken up. I do not see how we can possibly get through all that in time to prorogue.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If hon. gentlemen opposite will work as well as they did yesterday and the day before, I think we can do it. Of course, it is all the same to members of the Government whether they do or not; we have to be here in any case, but I know the vast majority of this House on both sides are exceedingly anxious to get away to-morrow, and I think with the assistance of hon. gentlemen opposite we can do so. Of course, without it we cannot.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I don't think it is possible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I think, in the meantime, the hon. gentleman should allow the Bill to go to the Upper House.

Mr. JONES. No, no; to-morrow.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I move the third reading of the Bill.

An hon. MEMBER. I object to it.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. You cannot object to it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I object to the third reading.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Taking two steps at the one sitting is not in accordance with the usual custom.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At the end of the Session it is continually done.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Only by universal consent.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The three steps can be taken on any Bill, if the majority of the House wishes. It is not a matter to which one member may object.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think my hon. friend (Mr. Mills) should let it go on, unless there is some special reason against it. We all want to get through the business, though it may be that our duties may call upon us to pursue a course, in the way of criticism and examination, which may prevent our proroguing to-morrow. I hope we may be able to do it, but if we find our duties require us to criticise particular items we must do it. Unless, however, there is some special reason I think the hon. gentleman should allow the Bill to go through.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed, on a division.

SECOND AND THIRD READINGS.

The following Bills were read the second time, considered in Committee, read the third time and passed:—

Bill (No. 153) to amend the Immigration Act.—(Mr. Carling.)

Bill (No. 154) to amend the Revised Statutes, chapter fifty one, respecting Real Property in the Territories.—(Mr. Thompson.)

THE INDIAN ACT.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 160) to amend the Indian Act (from the Senate).

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). What is the object of this?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. At present the Indian agents practically decide the question who have and who have not a right to share in the distribution of the annuity money, subject to an appeal to the Superintendent General; and this clause gives a still further appeal to the Governor in Council.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). I thought that this probably had reference to the question which was raised by the Mississaugas of the Credit, in reference to their participation in the interest of the money which was placed to their credit. Certain members of the band represent that it should go only to those who were members of the band, I think, in 1828, and that the others should be excluded.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That is another question, and it belongs to the questions which are dealt with generally by the Superintendent General. This provision has reference only to individuals.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman will see that this Bill deals somewhat summarily with an important body of free and independent electors.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That has always been done.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). But they have recently become voters. When a man has the franchise he possesses considerable influence; and if these voters are to be at the mercy of the Superintendent General and of the Governor in Council, to judge what their rights are, they are in a somewhat different position from ordinary citizens who are supposed to be governed by the law of the land.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. From the fact of their being electors, if they are wronged they can have their wrongs brought up in Parliament through the medium of their representative.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). The hon. First Minister will remember that, last year, I expressed the hope that a solution of the dispute that had arisen among the Mississaugas would soon be arrived at. I understood that the difficulty was that there was no power in the Act to determine who were and who were not members of a band, and I presumed that this Bill was a movement to settle that dispute. I would like to know what shape that matter is in. Another point I want information on. There is a discrepancy between the report of the Indian Department and the report of the Auditor General with reference to the amount of the trust funds of that band. According to the former, there was a balance to the credit of the Mississaugas, on the 30th June, 1886, of $186,906, while, according to the latter, the balance on the same date was $114,251, a difference of over $72,600. That requires explanation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I will make a note of it, and will be able to give the hon. gentleman an answer as to the discrepancy to-morrow.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I would ask for information with reference to the dispute that has arisen between the Chippewas and Munceys on the Caradoc reserve. The Munceys claim a portion of the territories that were originally reserved for the Chippewa Indians for their own use. The Munceys have been there, I think, since the beginning of this century. The Chippewas demand that the Munceys surrender to them a mile square, but the Munceys have added to their possession a much larger portion of the reserve than a mile square. Would the hon. gentleman have a right to consider that dispute, and give a decision upon it under this section?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Certainly not. The Muncey claim was fully and carefully reported upon by the Department of Justice. If the hon. gentleman is interested in seeing the report, I will get it for him.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I will be very much obliged to the hon. gentleman if he will.

On section 2,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is to give the Superintendent General and his officers the same power of examining witnesses on oath, respecting questions arising as to Indian lands, as the Minister of the Interior has with regard to Dominion lands. It is the same clause exactly as in the Dominion Lands Act, only it applies to Dominion lands.

On section 3,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is repealing subsection 5 of section 26, because it gives the same powers as are given by sections 54 and 57.

On section 4,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This is to prevent the Indians on a reserve cutting valuable timber for fuel, which they are apt to do. That clause is required for Indians who are not so civilised as the electorate the hon. gentleman speaks about.

On section 5,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. In some places, for instance in British Columbia, where the reserves are very small, a railway takes possession under the expropriation clause, and the Indians are deprived of the places they are accustomed to live on. It is no compensation to give them money or interest on any sum that may be found payable by the company. This is for the purpose of inviting the Government to see that the Indians be not removed unless another reserve be given them.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). There is a railway projected from the city I live in, that will go through a reserve if the Indians are willing. The hon. gentleman has no objection to that.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Not the slightest.

On section 7,

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This is giving a great deal more power to the officers than they have now. The old section required that the officer must have testimony supported by affidavit before acting. Now he has power to act peremptorily.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The present law provides that timber shall not be cut without authority on Indian lands or reserves. There is no difference between Indian lands or reserves.

On section 8,

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. This amendment is made in the interest of morality:

The Superintendent General may stop the payment of the annuity and interest money of, as well as deprive of any participation in the real property of the band, any Indian who is proved to the satisfaction of the Superintendent General guilty of deserting his family, and the Superintendent General may apply the same towards the support of any family, woman or child so deserted.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). Does not this bring out very clearly the anomalous position in which we stand with reference to these people, that the head of the Government shall have the power, of his own motion, not only to stop the annuity and interest of a free and independent elector, but deprive him of participation in his real property.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. My hon. friend and I will discuss that next Session, when we will have a hard fight on the Indian clauses of the Franchise Bill.

Bill reported, and read the third time and passed.

TREATS AND INTIMIDATION.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Thompson for the second reading of Bill (No. 162), to amend the Revised Statutes, Chapter 173, respecting Threats, Intimidation and other Offences.

Mr. PERLEY (Ottawa). I will read, with the permission of the House, a communication I have received from the Capital Assembly of the Knights of Labor on this Bill:

"Sirs,—At a large and enthusiastic meeting of 'Capital Assembly,' Knights of Labor, of Ottawa, held last Saturday evening, 18th June, the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—'Resolved, that in the opinion of Capital Assembly, 5,222, Knights of Labor, of Ottawa, no necessity exists for the measure introduced by the Dominion Government on Friday last in the House of Commons, amending chapter 173, Revised Statutes of Canada, and enters its earnest protest against the passage of the same into law, and that a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the Government as soon as possible.' In compliance with above instructions I take the earliest opportunity of forwarding you, as one of our representatives, a copy of the same, and would express the hope that when the Bill comes up in the House you will read it, whether the matter meets your approval or not.

"Yours respectfully,

"GEORGE GALE,

"Master Workman.

"OTTAWA, 21st June, 1887."

Mr. MCKAY. I have received the following telegram from the Knights of Labor Association, of the city of Hamilton:—

"We forward protest against the passage of the Bill at present before the House.

"JAMES KENNY,

"Secretary of Association."

Mr. RYKER. I have also a protest from the workmen, Knights of Labor, in the county of Lincoln and Welland:

"I wish to protest on behalf of the 25 Assemblies of Knights of Labor, in the counties of Lincoln and Welland, numbering nearly 4,000 wage earners, against the Government measure to be substituted for the Bill introduced by Mr. Amyot.

"ANDREW J. CARROLL,

"District Master Workman,

"Niagara District Assembly."

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I have also a telegram stating that the individuals telegraphed Sir John (I suppose that is Sir John A. Macdonald, the Premier), and I have no doubt he has the telegram in his possession:

"Telegraphed Sir John protesting before yours received.

"THOS. E. KILROY."

This is dated Windsor.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Yes, I received a telegram from Mr. Kilroy, but I understand that the Knights of Labor had Mr. Amyot's Bill before them, and that all their protests are against what they call the oppressive clauses in that Bill.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. THOMPSON. moved to add at the end of the eighth line after the word "threats" the words "of violence;" to strike out the words "or any other means" in the ninth line; and to add in the sixteenth line after the word "threat" the words "of violence."

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). The Minister of Justice has not, up to the present, offered us any sufficiently valid reason why this Bill has been brought before the House at this time. If there had been any great grievance existing in any part of the Dominion, and necessity had been shown for a Bill of this nature, I think we should have had before this petitions asking for an alteration in the existing law; but, up to the present time, we have had no such petitions, no representations from any individuals, or number of individuals, that the law as it existed upon the Statute-book was not sufficient to accomplish all the purposes designed by this Act. Therefore, without any petitions, without any agitation expressive of a desire that the Act should be changed, I think it is premature for the Minister of Justice, at the last moment of the Session, without giving an opportunity to the different sections of the country to be heard from, to bring this Bill before us. We have had an illustration that the country was not aware of the nature of this Bill, because, though it may be in some particulars different from the Bill which was introduced by the private member, yet, in substance and in fact the various organisations which petitioned against the other Bill are equally opposed to this Bill. It is true that the Minister of Justice introduced some amendments, but I ask what is the necessity for this Bill? Has there been any failure of the present law? Have the authorities where there has been any violation of the law, attempted to put the law into force, and have they found that it was not sufficient to punish those who violated it? I am not aware that there has been any attempts on the part of the authorities to enforce the law against wrong-doers, when the law has been found to be effective in any particular. The present law is quite sufficient to punish wrong-doers. These various organisations do not wish to have a law to shield them from just punishment when they violate the law, but they reasonably say that, as long as that law has not proved to be abortive in any respect, and that wrong-doers can be punished under that law if it is put in motion, this legislation is virtually a direct insult to the various combinations or organisations throughout Canada. In view of the fact that the Minister has not shown wherein the law has failed, I ask if it is reasonable that these people should have reflections thrown upon them, that the slur should be cast upon them that it is necessary to legislate in this matter. I feel that it is wrong in principle, even if the measure is not more restrictive than the one now on the Statute-book, that there should be an attempt on the part of this House to place on the Statute book a direct insult to these organisations. In view of the state of the Session, I think the Bill should remain over. Let the authorities try to enforce the law as it is now. The First Minister is very ready to say that there are only a few months before the House will meet again, and no great wrong can exist during that short period. He makes that appeal to the House, and I make this appeal. After a few months, you will have the opportunity of seeing whether the law will work efficiently, the authorities can put the law in force, and, if they find, after bringing the full power of the law to bear against those who are doing wrong, that it is not sufficient, then you can come a few months hence and introduce a law, and give all parties an opportunity to be heard and to represent their case fairly and justly before the House. This is only a matter of equal justice and equal rights to all. Why should you attempt to catch a verdict against these people at this time? It is not in the best interests of the country that legislation of this kind should be brought forward at this period of the Session, when no necessity has been shown for any change of the law. There has not been an attempt to put the law in force, and it has not been found to be deficient and incapable of being executed. I am, therefore, opposed to the Bill.

Mr. AMYOT. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Wilson), wants equal rights for all. Doubtless he knows the state of the harbor of Quebec, and has seen in the newspapers reports of what is going on there. If equal liberty to all means liberty to a certain society to prevent all others from working, I am certainly not in favor of that liberty. I understand that equal liberty to all means the liberty of every one to do what is right. Working at a ship is a thing that is right, and when you prevent citizens from working at a ship you do what is wrong, and you take away the liberty of others under a false pretext of liberty for yourself. The hon. gentleman says that no petition has come up for this measure. Well, Sir, when last year we passed a number of criminal Acts, did we ever see one petition in favor of them? Not that I am aware of. The hon. gentleman says he has received telegrams from the Knights of Labor. Does he mean to say that this Bill is aimed against the Knights of Labor? Does he mean to say that there is a party in this House who are more friendly to the Knights of Labor than to other classes? Are we not all friends of the workingmen? Are we not all friends of the prosperity of all classes of society? I am as great a friend of workingmen as any one, but I am a friend also of the people at large, and when I see a certain society taking illegal measures to prevent others from working, I say it is something we should put a stop to. As long as the Knights of Labor keep within the bounds of justice, and of the law, they will be protected, and they will find friends everywhere. I am not against the Knights of Labor, but I say that, in Quebec, the ship laborers, or some 60 of them, were incorporated under pretence of being a mutual benefit society. Now that they have got the subscriptions of a large class of people and have become powerful, they have passed by-laws imposing a high tariff on ship captains, and the captain has no right to move his ship an inch without paying them enormous wages. He is bound to employ a certain number of men, and if he does not submit his cargo is ruined. The ship laborers are there, they do not kill people, but they gather by hundreds on the wharf, and those who dare to go to work against their will, know what is likely to befall them that evening, or the next day, when they happen to be alone or when darkness overtakes them. There has been no petition, it is true, but I may say for the information of the House, that when I had the honor of presenting the first Bill, which was much more stringent than this one, I received a telegram from the Quebec Board of Trade, among whom are some political friends of the hon. gentleman. I will read the telegram:

"At a meeting of the Council of the Quebec Board of Trade held this morning, it was unanimously resolved to approve entirely of the draft of the Bill now before the House of Commons, introduced by Col. G. Amyot, member for the county of Bellechasse, and entitled: 'An Act to protect work on Board of Vessels'; and I have been authorised on behalf of the Board of Trade to ask you to cause to be added to the Bill in question, sections Nos. 114, 115, of chapter 71 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886; as we strongly believe that in dealing with offenders in a summary manner, it will put a stop to the great injuries the trade of this city has suffered for a number of years past. Your strong influence in favor of the above suggestions will much oblige,

"Yours truly,

"T. LEDROIT,

"President.

"Certified,

"F. H. ANDREWS,

"Secretary."

It is a well known fact that some years ago the harbor of Quebec was visited by hundreds and hundreds of ships, and it is a well known fact that the conduct of the ship laborers has driven away the shipping from Quebec. Not only do ships avoid Quebec, but many ships do not come to Canada at all now, on account of the difficulty caused by the ship laborers of Quebec, and this has given a bad reputation to the city and to the whole country abroad. We must put a stop to this at once. To-day, the merchants of Quebec importing goods from Europe are obliged to unload them at Montreal, and to bring them back to Quebec by railway or in small boats. Mr. Fitch, who has a large establishment at St. Romuald, near Quebec, has been informed by the large ship-owners that they will no longer load his matches in Quebec harbor, and he has to send them to Montreal to be shipped from there to Europe. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, there is no more shipping at Quebec, so to speak. The trade all goes elsewhere, because the ship laborers wish to earn a month's wages in two or three days' time, working eight or nine hours a day. Commerce is not able to support that charge. The ship laborers are organised; they have got funds and physical force; and yet we are asked in the name of liberty to sustain them when they try to prevent other men from working for reasonable wages. The ship laborers gather on the wharf and intimidate and prevent other men from working, and that is what we call liberty for all! Equal rights for all! I say no; I say it is a use of illegal means to restrict the liberties of others. If the hon. gentlemen represented authoritatively the Liberal party, if he was speaking in the name of the Liberal party, I would say to him: the name of your party is a fraud, because liberalism I take to mean liberty. But here you take away the liberty of a whole people for the benefit of a few who have incorporated themselves into a society under the false pretence of benevolent purposes. The actual law is insufficient, it does not deal with threats. It only speaks of those who are working at ships, who are usually employed; it excludes all those who do not usually work. The ship laborers have organised themselves into a society. A ship comes in, and is to be loaded or unloaded. If the ship laborers ask too much, the captain or ship owner applies to some other workmen, who are willing to do the work. The actual law will not protect that class who don't usually work. I am sorry the Government has consented to take away the words, "or other means," because even amongst those who belong to the ship laborers' society, some would like to work in spite of their by-laws if they could. If to-day this society passes a by-law, saying: If you work you will lose your share in this society, or you will be expelled from the society, or you will be obliged to pay such and such a fine—in that case the words "other means" would reach these classes. But as the Government has decided to take away those words, I will not insist. The present Bill is a step in the right direction. At present, although the ship laborers may not strike a blow, they are there exercising no less an intimidation by silence, if I may so speak, so that nobody dares to go to work. But when the offence is more clearly defined, other men will dare to go to work. If you say that there are no petitions in favor of this Bill, I would remind you that we have in this House the Mayor of Quebec, who is in a position to tell you that the Bill is needed in the interests of that harbor. I suppose if those occurrences happen in other harbors, members representing those cities would be very happy to find on the Statute-book a law dealing with those offences. Some years ago we had Quebec crimps, who went on board ships and stole seamen. A stringent law was passed, at the suggestion of the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), under which such offenders were liable to be sent to the penitentiary. What was the consequence? Two offenders were sent to the penitentiary, and since then there has been no crimping. If we had a stringent law dealing with these organisations, which are the ruin of society and the shame of this century, there would be liberty for labor for every class. It has been said that this would be a stigma on our society. I heard an hon. member the other day make that statement. Surely that was a mere farce. We have laws against stealing, murder and crimes of different kinds, and these do not cast a stigma on society, and the proposed law would not cast a stigma. The law is absolutely required for the city of Quebec. It may be required at any given moment for any other city. Its effects will be simply this: It will be a safeguard for the liberty of labor among every other class; it will stop the disposition manifested to prevent liberty of labor; it will give the city of Quebec a chance of obtaining a share of commerce, and it will remove the bad reputation, which I am sorry to say, the ship laborers of Quebec have obtained for the country.

Mr. BURDETT. I am no friend of coercion either in the shape of capital or labor. I think all just and legal means ought to be adopted to prevent unlawful combinations and illegal acts on either side. But I submit that this Bill should be amended so as to permit the party accused to be tried by a jury, if he desires. In any event, it should be provided that the trial should be before a police magistrate or police commissioner, if there be such in the vicinity, instead of being before two justices of the peace. While I am not speaking against the integrity of justices of the peace, they often may be directly or indirectly interested, and they are not always capable of judging as to the distinction between original intent and lawful or unlawful acts, however honest their intention may be to acquit or convict, in case of innocence or guilt. I, therefore, suggest an amendment in that direction. I, moreover, suggest permitting the option of a fine instead of imprisonment in every case. It is pretty well known that where combinations exist, in many instances innocent or almost innocent persons have been led into the maelstrom of illegal combinations, even women and children have been led in that direction. Although convicted and found guilty of an offence in the eyes of the law, they ought not, in many instances, be sent to prison, and have that stigma cast upon them for life. I respectfully submit the proposition that the trial be by jury, if the party so elects, or, at all events, that it be before a police magistrate or commissioner, and that there should be the option of imposing a fine instead of imprisonment.

Mr. WELSH. I approve of the Bill. I think it will be for the benefit of ship owners, and it will only take effect in the case of those who violate the law. Combinations are very dangerous in any port, and they tend very much to injure its trade and commerce. A few years ago there was a combination in Montreal of the towing service. I happened to have two ships going up there that month, and the towage bills amounted to $2,000 odd. A month or so afterwards the price fell. But this shows that combinations, if not regulated properly, tend to retard the progress of a port, and prevent ship owners from sending their vessels there. It would be well to pass this Bill, for it only applies in cases where a man commits a criminal violation of the law and tramples on the rights of others. I am not opposed to any combination for the benefit of laborers or anything of that kind, but when they take the law into their own hands, and force their own opinions on others to the injury of the ports and the public, it is time to have a law passed to deal with such cases. I will support the present Bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not view this as a Bill hostile to any labor organisation. If I thought it covered any special legislation against the labor organisation or capital organisation I would be no party to the passing of the Bill. But I have had some experience in regard to the very subject in respect of which this Bill is proposed to meet the difficulty. I recollect fifteen or sixteen years ago, when I held the responsible position of Minister, and had to deal with this question, that an intolerable nuisance existed in Quebec. The crimping system had become so bad that the ordinary methods of law were completely paralysed. There were laws to prevent persons from interfering with others who wanted to labor, laws to prevent crimps coming on board ship, but when they were arrested and taken before a magistrate in nine cases out of ten they were acquitted. It was necessary to do something, for affairs had got into such a state that crimps actually went on board a ship and forced men to desert and dragged them on shore, and a man was shot who refused to desert; and, therefore, extraordinary steps had to be taken to put an end to this lawlessness. I introduced the Bill, which stands on the Statute-book to-day, and it was not in force more than twelve months when not a single crimp was to be found in St. Peter street or Mountain street in Quebec. It completely removed the difficulty. When you meet with lawlessness you must take extraordinary means to cure the evil, and I agree with the hon. member near me (Mr. Burdett) in regard to giving police magistrates in Quebec power, either with or without the conjunction of the two magistrates, to deal with such offences and without appeal. The law at present on the Statute-book is found to be defective, inasmuch as if the people are not customary laborers at the work, the intimidation is no offence. The object of passing this law was to prevent intimidation against any one, and this defect being discovered, it should be remedied, no matter what may be the prejudices of the Ship Laborers Society or the Knights of Labor or any other organisation. I entirely agree with the suggestion to strike these words out of the Bill, and, if it is desirable, to give the magistrate of Quebec jurisdiction to deal with these cases without appeal.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to say one word of explanation which may be useful in regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Bardett). He thought that this power should be exercised by police magistrates and stipendiary magistrates. It will be seen by section 10, chapter 178, of the Revised Statutes—the Summary Convictions Act—that all powers which are conferred in any portion of the Statutes on two justices of the peace, may be exercised by any judge of the sessions, recorder, police magistrate, district magistrate or stipendiary magistrate, so that the hon. gentleman's suggestion is already complied with. As regards petitions on this subject, I agree with hon. gentleman that they are not called for or necessary. We are continually amending provisions of our Statutes in any respect in which we find them to be technically defective, and we are doing nothing more in this case. We are not increasing the stringency of the law, or adding new penalties, or changing the proceedings, but we are simply saying that the will of the Legislature, as plainly expressed, shall not be defeated by words—accidentally inserted I presume—which are entirely inapplicable to the conditions with which the Legislature was dealing. As to this being a slur on any labor organisation, it seems to me, if I may say so without offence, that the slur against the labor organisations is on the part of those hon. gentlemen who contend that the labor organisations are combined for the purpose of committing these offences.

Mr. MITCHELL. The hon. gentleman does not refer to me?

Mr. THOMPSON. Not at all. If they are not combined for those purposes, the Bill does not apply to them. I may say to the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wilson), that the delegates of these labor organisations which have met me—and I have seen delegates from Toronto, Montreal, Quebec and St. Catharines—have distinctly declared, every one of them, that they have no sympathy with the persons who commit those offences; that their organisations are not formed for the purpose of enabling such offences to be committed, and that persons who commit those offences, whether members of those organisations or not, are working entirely out of the scope of such organisations; and, therefore, the delegates who met me, and who, I am sure, represent the labor societies as fully as any gentleman in this House can, distinctly repudiate that this is a slur against them, or that this legislation would affect them as labor societies. I may say further, that I met a delegation from the Ship Laborers Society of the city of Quebec, who are more immediately affected, it is said, by this legislation. They were represented by their legal counsel, a gentleman of eminence in the city of Quebec, and he discussed the features of this Bill with me, and agreed entirely with me that, even as originally introduced, the words "threats or any other means" was qualified by the word "unlawfully," but urged upon me, inasmuch as the law had to be administered by magistrates, that it would be well to have no doubt as to the true meaning and interpretation of the Act, and he said, in the presence of a large number of members of the society, that if the words "of violence," and the words "any other means" were struck out, the Bill would be entirely acceptable to them. Now, that is the very class of persons who, it is said by hon. gentlemen opposite, would be aimed at by this Bill, but if their own solicitor says that they have no sympathy with the persons committing these offences, and if the amendment removes all objections, it seems to me that the observations as regards the casting of a slur upon any organisation whatsoever, are uncalled for.

Mr. MITCHELL.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). I think the observations of the hon. Minister of Justice, as regards the Knights of Labor, are very true. I do not think there is any class of the community who would sympathise so little—or have any sympathy at all—with the unfortunate state of affairs that appears to exist in the city of Quebec, as the Knights of Labor. It is against their platform altogether, and they have no sympathy with such conduct. In the city of Toronto at present, although there are about 1,200 men out on strike, we do not find that there is a single act of violence mentioned, and the state of affairs there redounds very much to the credit of the Knights of Labor. I consider, however, that it is wrong to introduce this Bill at almost the last hour of the Session. We have been sitting here since the 13th of March, and a Bill of this importance, affecting as it does a large number of the people of Canada, should not be introduced and pressed on the House at so late a period of the Session. It may be, after the representations which have been made by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) as to the state of affairs which is existing in Quebec, that such a Bill is necessary, but what the Knights of Labor object to is that the Bill should be passed though the House in the last days of the Session, without time to consider the merits of the case. We can readily understand how that body should be very sensitive about any legislation which is affecting their rights. One hon. gentleman has stated that these combinations are a bad thing. I do not think so. They are the only way the mechanics and laborers of this country have of elevating themselves, and they have done more, by the orders and associations which have existed amongst them, to elevate their moral and religious standing, than anything else which has taken place. We have combinations amongst manufacturers, we have the Manufacturers' Association, we have oil rings and stoves rings and iron rings, and all kinds of rings, and these are all right enough in the estimation of some hon. gentlemen. The Government of the day are taking every means in their power to protect wealthy manufacturers; they are protecting the iron manufacturers; they are protecting the coal mines of Nova Scotia by over $100,000, and carrying their coal for nothing. But here is a measure affecting the rights and interests of the working class of the community, and it is introduced at the last day, and almost the last hour, of the Session. Such a Bill may be necessary but it should be delayed until next Session, or should have been introduced earlier in the Session, so as to have given the labor organisations throughout the country an opportunity of discussing it, and expressing their opinion upon it. Why, Sir, it is only some 48 hours since this Bill was introduced.

Mr. THOMPSON. It was introduced five days ago.

Mr. CAMPBELL (Kent). And now the hon. gentleman wants to press it through the House at race horse speed, although we have telegrams from large and respectable bodies of people in Toronto, Hamilton, St. Catharines, Windsor and other places, asking that the Bill shall be delayed until they have time to investigate it and express themselves upon it. I think the Minister of Justice should delay the Bill till next Session, and if it is then found to be in the interest of the people I am sure there is no class who will favor its passage so much as the Knights of Labor. They are opposed to all such disloyal means, and such a state of affairs as are represented to exist in Quebec, and I hope the Minister of Justice will, in deference to the representations made by a large number of assemblies, consent not to press the Bill at this late stage of the Session.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I regret exceedingly that the Government feel that it is their duty to force this Bill through at the present time. I did not intend to convey, nor did I convey, in the remarks I made, that the various labor organisations in any way desired to violate the law or enter into a combination to do a wrong or injustice to any class of the community, as they are a law-abiding class. I said that this law was proposed purposely to prevent the labor organisations from enjoying the right to protect their labor, and the Minister of Justice represented me as stating that I regarded this Bill as a reflection upon them. I do say so. It is directed against all labor organisations, and it implies that it is necessary that the strong arm of the law should be used to restrain those organisations from exercising what they regard as their rights and privileges. As for any wrongs being done in Quebec to parties who desire to labor on vessels, I think I have shown that those abuses have not been increasing to any extent. It is true it has been stated that there are telegrams from the mayor and other parties in Quebec asking for this legislation. It may be that they consider it in their interest that such legislation should take place. I believe they state that for some cause or other the shipping is leaving Quebec and going to Montreal, and it may be that they attribute this to the high wages which they have to pay for loading and unloading vessels there. I do not think, if they enquire into the facts, that they will find this to be the case, but they will probably find other causes for the impairment of the trade of Quebec. I do not think my hon. friend from Bellechasse (Mr. Amyot) should be quite so warm against me on this subject. He said that if I represented the Reform party, he did not believe in the principles of that party. I do not represent any but my own views, and I do not ask my hon. friend to accept them. I think my views are, perhaps, too liberal for so recent a convert. But while I deny that there is any intent on the part of the various labor organisations in any way to violate the law or interfere with the rights of other people, they hold sacred and dear the rights they possess, and they desire that the same laws should be meted out to them as are meted out to other classes, and that is all they ask. They ask no more, and they are not content with any loss. My hon. friend says we often pass Bills that have not been petitioned for. Is the discovery of the difficulty in Quebec so recent that they did not know of it until a few days ago? Did they make no representations to the Government of that difficulty previous to the introduction of this Bill a week or two ago? I say that this is too short a time in which to pass legislation of this kind, affecting, more or less, all of the labor organisations from one end of the Dominion to the other. It is possible that, if hon. gentlemen enquired into the expenses of loading and unloading vessels in Quebec, they might find that the work was done more cheaply there than at Montreal. I am told that such is the case. With reference to the statement of the Minister of Justice that the various labor organisations had an interview with him, and expressed themselves through their legal advisers as perfectly satisfied with this Bill, I ask why are the delegates still here protesting against it?

Mr. THOMPSON. The hon. gentleman misunderstood me. I said it was the Ship Laborers Society of Quebec who had counsel.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I had an interview to-day with one of the members of the Ship Laborers Society of Quebec, and he strongly opposes such legislation as this. I also had interviews with delegates from the various labor organisations who protest against the passage of the Bill. But they say if the Bill must pass, let it be amended so that it may bear upon us as lightly as possible. Then, how can they be satisfied with the passage of this Bill? Has there been any petition from them asking for it? On the contrary, we have had petitions presented from every part of this Chamber against its passage. If the Government believe that the interests of society require such coercive legislation, and are willing to assume the responsibility of it, all I can say is that I have done my duty in protesting against it in the interest of a class who I think are, perhaps, not sufficiently represented in the House—an upright, honest class, who do not wish any legislation that would in any way have the effect of legalising any wrong doing, but, on the contrary, are desirous of obeying all the laws on the Statute book, and for that reason are anxious that our laws may be made to bear evenly upon all classes, so that all classes may be placed in a position of equality under the law.

Bill reported.

Mr. THOMPSON moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. WILSON. It would be better this Bill should stand over until to-morrow, and give the delegates an opportunity of seeing whether they cannot make representations or offer amendments to the Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed, on a division.

COUNCIL OF THE NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the second reading of Bill (No. 163) respecting the Council of the North-West Territories.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the second time, and considered in Committee.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I regret very much that the hon. gentleman has found it necessary to adopt legislation of this sort. We have had nothing like this in the Empire since the time of Queen Anne, when the triennial Parliament extended its own life for a period of four years longer. The hon. gentleman proposes to continue the existence of a body elected for two years for a period of three years. The Government are greatly to blame for not having taken this subject into consideration, and provided a Bill to meet the difficulty at the beginning of the Session; and I think the hon. gentlemen from the Territories, who have proposed so many Bills and proclaimed the importance of their measures, should have brought this subject to the attention of the House at the beginning of the Session. Had the Government proposed to give the people of the North-West proper representation in the Council, it would not have been necessary to take the unusual course of extending this Council's term of existence.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentlemen elected for the North-West Territories will receive with humble submission the chastisement the hon. gentleman has given them, and will be better boys next time. The hon. gentleman says that never since the time of Queen Anne, when the Parliament extended its existence from three to seven years, has a proceeding similar to this taken place, but the hon. gentleman will remember that the action of the triennial Parliament saved the country. The term of the North-West Council is extended not for a year, but to the end of the next Session, and this will save the North-West a very great deal of inconvenience, and I have no doubt it will be generally acceptable to the North-West.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman might, without much inconvenience, in a more constitutional way, have done his duty.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed, on a division.

SUPPLY—IMPRISONMENT FOR LIBEL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House again resolve into Committee of Supply.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Before that motion is put, I beg to say that it has been brought to my notice that an important trial took place in the city of Quebec, of Mr. Maguire, for maliciously libelling one of the members of the House of Commons. He was convicted of the offence, and fined by the judge and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. It is also stated that the Minister of Justice has recommended His Excellency the Governor General to exercise the prerogative of the Crown on Mr. Maguire's behalf, and to discharge him from imprisonment. That is a matter of such importance that the hon. the Minister of Justice ought to inform the House whether he has received from the judge who sat in that trial a report of the proceedings, and whether the request, the recommendation he made, to His Excellency was one of which the judge approved. This is the proper and legitimate time for making an enquiry of this sort into what seems to me to be an interference with the civil administration of justice.

Mr. THOMPSON. I do not question the propriety of the hon. member's course in making the enquiry at this stage, but I must express the regret that he did not give me information he intended making such enquiry, because I would have had the papers, and given him more full information than I can from memory. It is a fact that, in the case of Maguire, application was made three or four weeks ago for his release by a petition which alleged various grounds. Among others it was stated that his state of health was such that he was unable to endure the confinement, and that his life was in danger, and the petition was accompanied by a medical certificate to that effect, signed either by his usual medical attendant or by a practitioner called upon by himself to make an examination. I declined, in accordance with the usual practice, to act on such certificate or representation, and made the ordinary presentation to the judge who tried the case, and the surgeon of the gaol for a report of the trial, and an official report of the surgeon as to Mr. Maguire's health. These reports were received a very short time before his release. The report of the judge stated the various circumstances connected with the trial, and indicated that, as far as the merits of the case were concerned, he remained of the opinion that his sentence was not an improper one, as regards severity, but he stated, in view of the circumstances mentioned in the petition and the certificate in regard to health, that the health of the prisoner was a circumstance he had not considered in passing the sentence, and one which he thought it would be right for the executive to consider, or which he left for the executive to consider. I forget the exact words, but I am stating the substance. The certificate from the surgeon of the gaol indicated that the prisoner was suffering from a disease which can probably have only a fatal termination, and that a further confinement would have the result of shortening his days. The ordinary principles which governed us in regard to advising the executive interference in such cases, seemed to me to justify the action which we took upon the certificates, and it was upon that alone that I advised the exercise of the executive clemency.

Mr. LAURIER. Under the circumstances, as disclosed at this time, there is no occasion as far as I can see, for me to either approve or blame the action of the hon. Minister, but I think he has been imposed upon, for I am informed that Mr. Maguire is in this city now, and is in good health.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). I saw him here this afternoon.

Mr. LAURIER. I am not disposed to criticise the action of the Minister, but I think the hon. gentleman would meet the wishes of the House by laying the papers before us at an early day.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

THE 9TH BATTALION.

Mr. AMYOT. I am sorry to have to take a few minutes of the time of the House, but I am afraid it will be the last opportunity I shall have this year. I would not do it if only myself were concerned, but a certain report to which I am going to allude, contains an account which is unfair and unjust, and which reflects upon the officers of a battalion which did its duty the best way it could in the North-West. I refer to a report of the Department of Militia and Defence, Appendix No. 4. In that there is an account dated 27th September, 1886. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that we came back from the North-West in July, 1885, so that more than a year had elapsed. This account shows that the battalion would be indebted to the Government in the large amount of $1,571.42. In a few words, and in a few minutes, I hope to demonstrate that this account is simply fancy, and that, perhaps, there is not one word of truth in it, and that it was the most unjust and ex parte piece of business that could be brought before a Parliament. First of all, the paymaster, Major Guy, says he warned the paymaster of the 9th Battalion that the rations could not be drawn in kind. It is proved on oath that the paymaster of the 9th does not know a word of English, and, as the paymaster in question, Major Guy, does not know a word of French, and there was no translator, it is hard to understand how the warning was given. Three witnesses proved in court that Lieut. Col. Lamontagne told Major Dugal that the officers were allowed to draw their rations in kind. The report says:

"The corps was overpaid on account of rations, forage, &c., at Quebec for the month of July by Lampson, in September, 1885."

And the account charges the officers of the 9th with that amount paid in the month of August or September, and calls upon them to refund it. Here is the official letter of the Department:

"QUEBEC, 31st August, 1885.

"Sir,—I beg to inform you that, according to instructions received from the Deputy Minister of Militia, the 9th Battalion are entitled to draw field allowance and rations to the 21st July; from that to the end of July, net pay only; no men to be included for pay who were not with the corps in the North-West. The claim of $3 per company for books has been disallowed.

"I r. main,

"Your obedient servant,

"FREDK. LAMPSON,

"Major."

That is addressed to Lieut. Col. Amyot. Nearly a year after that, after having paid that amount according to orders from Ottawa, Major Guy, ex parte, without consulting us at all, prepares and files a report in the office condemning us to refund those amounts, and this is published under the responsibility and under the signature of the head officer of the Department as a just thing to do against the 9th Battalion.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). They ought to disband them altogether.

Mr. AMYOT. Do I hear the word "dispense"? You did not dispense with our services when we went to the North-West. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was glad to see us there. In this account Col. Evanturel is charged with a saddle and bridle, not accounted for, and one set of driving harness. It is known by the Department, and it is known, or should be known, by the hon. the Minister of Militia, that these articles have been returned, that the harness was left at Calgary, and that this is a false charge against Col. Evanturel. He knows, or he should know, that the saddle is in the armory at Quebec, and he knows, or he should know, that this account is false. If you take Col. Amyot's account, you find one Mexican saddle and bridle charged against him and not accounted for. The Minister knows, or he should know, that, in September or October, 1885, that Mexican saddle was duly returned at the arsenal, that the receipt was given, and yet, nearly two years after that, under his own signature, he pretends before the country that Col. Amyot has got that saddle. It is a false report. The report is honored with the signature of a great man, I admit, but, whatever may be the dignity of the signature, it does not give the right to state a thing which is false, to charge the colonel of the 9th Battalion with actions which he has not committed, to say that he is in possession of a saddle when the hon. gentleman knows, or should know, that it is not the case. He produces that account more than a year after, he charges me with that when these things have been returned nearly two years ago, and he does this at the end of this Session, hoping, I suppose, that I would not see it, and that he would leave the country for another year under the impression that the colonel of the 9th was acting improperly. This is not fair. This is not just. This is not the recompense that a battalion which has done its duty, as the hon. gentleman has admitted in this House, while engaged in the operations of war, should expect for its services. This account speaks of a Capt. Perreault. I never had such a man in my battalion at any time. On page 49 I find:

"This officer being the quartermaster is specially responsible, through his commanding officer, for the rations and forage issued by McGibbon to him at Calgary for the use of the battalion returning east, and these are not accounted for in any way."

Mr. Speaker, this is false. There were never any such rations given to us. Further on, we are charged with a car load of provisions. That is false. We never received any such thing. When we left Calgary, Major McGibbon gave us an officer called a supply officer, who furnished us with meals while going down to Winnipeg. If a car load of provisions was given to us, we did not know it. We do not know what became of it. But to put in a report a charge that we received a car load of provisions and did not account for it, is unfair and unjust. It is an official—I will not say the word lie, because it is not parliamentary; but give it the name you please: it is a false charge. Col. Roy is charged with a saddle and bridle. I am sure the Ministers generally of the Cabinet do not know the persecution to which we are subjected by one of their number, but the Minister of Militia should know that Col. Roy long ago returned that bridle. I would only give one or two items to show the House how the accounts are made in that Department. They speak here of a Lieut. D. W. Morris. There is no such man in my battalion. Capt. Ponny is charged with the same accounts as the other captains, though he was in the North-West only half the time of the expedition. It shows with what accuracy Major Guy has prepared the report. He begins by saying that no accounts were signed, or something to that effect. Why, Mr. Speaker, the accounts were signed by nearly every one of the officers, by the quartermaster, by the paymaster, and by the commandant of the battalion. He undertakes in that report to interpret the law, and to dictate to the officers their duties, and the chief officer of the Militia Department allows one of his subordinates to give a military lesson to one of the commanders of the battalion, and he thinks that is discipline. I protest against that account as ex parte. An arbitration has been made by three officers, and the account has been reduced to about $400, instead of $1,500. That was done months ago. Though the Department published the first report stating the account to be over $1,500, they have not had the generosity to say that the officers of the Department have reduced it in that way. Is that dealing fairly and equitably towards the battalion, which was ready to go, and did go, to the North-West, although the circumstances were so painful? It will be borne in mind, says the report, that up to the date that Major Guy was relieved from duty, no account whatever was given of the two cars of rations issued to the battalion on leaving Calgary by Major Mc

Gibbon. There never was one car of provisions given to us. This is an official mistake, an official misrepresentation of the facts. Then, in this report we are charged with having received five horses at Calgary. Mr. Speaker, this is entirely false. By the order of the general commanding, four horses arrived at Calgary; one was unserviceable and was refused, I took one, and my two majors took each one, and they were returned in Quebec, or the value of them was paid. Some other horses came to Calgary. We had nothing to do with them. I might ask his officers there what he did with them. They had some for the use of the brigade, but we never had anything to do with them, and to charge us with having received those horses is not only unfair, but it is false. That part of the report is false, and it is also most ungrateful, and its publication, under the circumstances, shows that there is something wrong somewhere. I think it seldom happens in a country that has been defamed by soldiers, that the chief head of the Militia Department treats those who have devoted themselves to the defence of the country in such a way as the 9th is treated now. The writer of the report says he does not know the value of the horses, but he supposes they may be worth $300, and he charges us with $300. Let the hon. gentleman sue us before a court of justice, and, perhaps, he will find out that instead of having received those horses in the North-West, we worked considerably for the country without ever being paid for it. Now, there is a war claims commission. If there was not a war claims commission, the report of the officers named at Quebec to revise the account, would have amounted to nearly nothing. The war claims commission charges us with certain amounts for making mattresses, $48. That is false. After a detachment of the 9th went to Fort McLeod, they met the Mounted Police, they met a most efficient officer there, Major Cotton. He had some mattresses made up, and he thought it would be better to ask for a few others to be made, and to put straw in them. We knew the straw there was very dear, and it would save the money to keep the old straw longer. He got them made on account of the Mounted Police, and they were used as a loan by the Mounted Police, and now he calls upon the 9th to pay for them. We are charged with our subsistence in the Rocky Mountains. I have already said that if we had not been fed in the Rocky Mountains we would have been fed in Winnipeg. We are charged $100 for straw hats and helmets. Well, when the company came back to Winnipeg they had small hats, with nothing to protect their eyes. A medical officer reported that the soldiers required straw hats on their heads. It would have taken me, I suppose, about fifteen days or three weeks to communicate with Major General Strange, under whose direct command I was, as the senior officer of the district. But being commander there, and having the doctor's certificate, I decided, as I thought I had a right to do, to give to the officers and soldiers straw hats or helmets, or whatever I could find in Calgary to protect their eyes. It was my duty to do so, I took the responsibility of it, and if it was to be done again I would do it, because I consider that volunteers are not dogs, and that they may wear hats to protect themselves. Well, that is charged to the 9th Battalion. This, Mr. Speaker, gives you an idea how this account has been made up. It is now published and forms part of the official documents. It is not stated in this document that the commission has reduced the account, and we would appear for another year as debtors to the Government for a large amount, if I had not been allowed by the House to stand up here and protest against these proceedings, and to give to this honorable House an idea of how we are treated. Major Guy blames us for having brought down our three horses, and he said we might be forced to refund to the Government the cost of their transportation. Major Guy, who has been employed so long, I do not know at what cost, to find out claims against the 9th Battalion, to satisfy the hatred of some who do not share my political feelings, might look at page 261 of the Regulations and Orders of the Militia of Canada of 1883, and he would there find that "no field officer has, on any account, to accompany the battalion on active service, unless he is accompanied with a horse." Yet, Major Guy said we did not want our horses, and we should have left them at Winnipeg, and that we are liable for the pay of their transportation. The commission says that the officers did not draw their rations in kind, so an allowance is made of forty cents per day. The law says that the Lieut. Col. in command of a battalion shall have an allowance of $1 per day. What right has the Department to take away from a field officer 60 cents a day? Let the Department pay their just debts provided by law. The Government already admitted owing money to some of the officers, but they do not apparently think of paying them. If they follow out their orders and rules and pay their debts, the matter will soon be settled. I hardly believe the Minister of Militia has initiated all these matters, but I am sorry to see his signature at the bottom of the statement, and he should have delayed the publication of that account. He should have published at the same time the correction of it made by the commission, and he might have tried, as was suggested by the commanding officer of the 9th Battalion, to settle the affair amicably and not trouble the country with these accusations which are false, unjust and unfair to those who have done their duty to the best of their ability.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. The hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat displays an extraordinary feeling, it seems to me, in the discussion of what appears to be merely a matter of account. The hon. gentleman to night, as on other occasions, has mounted his charger and gone to the wars against the Minister of Militia. And why? The hon. gentleman in dealing with this question should remember that those accounts have been made by the accountants of the Department of Militia, that every voucher which has been placed in the hands of the officers in making up those accounts, can be produced by the Department, and an opportunity will be given to the hon. gentleman to disprove whatever he considers it is possible for him to disprove in the charges made against him by the Department of Militia. I can say that the feeling which the hon. gentleman attempts to convince the House and the country as existing between the 9th Battalion and the Minister of Militia, is altogether imaginary on his part, and I do not wish the hon. gentleman to assimilate the case of the officers who were charged by the accountant of the Department with certain amounts that have not been accounted for, with the case of the 9th Battalion. On no occasion can the hon. gentleman find that the 9th Battalion has been accused or attacked by myself, or by any of the officers of the Department. It was, as can be easily understood, the duty of the Department in dealing with payments arising out of the North-West troubles, to account to the country for the money which the Department had received to deal with the troubles which unfortunately took place, and it seems to me to be most unjust for the hon. gentleman in discussing this question, merely to say that it is false, it is untrue, without attempting to advance a tittle of evidence to show that the accounts as claimed by the Department of Militia, are not true and just what they ought to be. The hon. gentleman has not advanced a tittle of evidence to show that those accounts, prepared by the accountants of the Department, are not based on the vouchers and facts as known to the Department.

Mr. AMYOT. Is not the report of the commission, which reduces the account from $1,670 odd, to about $400 against the officers, evidence?

Mr. AMYOT.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I am not prepared to take up item by item the accounts laid before Parliament; but in the preparation of the accounts the officers of the Department would have no feeling against the hon. gentleman and against his battalion, and they merely carried out their duty according to the accounts and vouchers they had before them. The hon. gentleman on more than one occasion has said, and he stated it the other night as will be seen in Hansard, that among the officers who had been selected there had been one who had not been selected by him, and that officer had been imposed on the battalion by the Minister of Militia. I quote from the Hansard exactly what the hon. gentleman said:

"Here is another sum of $126.35, but it is not due by an officer of the 9th, but by an officer who belongs to the regular army, whom the Minister of Militia has himself sent to England, and for whom I am not responsible. There is another item of $115.25, not due by an officer of the 9th, but by an officer imposed on the 9th by the Minister of Militia. He is not related to me: the hon. gentleman knows to whom he is related."

"Sir ADOLPHE CARON. Name."

"Mr. AMYOT. Surgeon DeBlois—cousin germain."

I stated at the time that that officer had been appointed upon the recommendations made to me by most of the officers of the battalion, and I stated also that, if my memory served me, among those recommendations was a recommendation from Lieut. Col. Amyot himself. And to show how much reliance can be placed on the statements made, in the excitement of debate, by the hon. gentleman, I will read to the House the very telegram which he himself addressed to me, asking me to appoint that very Surgeon DeBlois, whom he says I imposed on the 9th Battalion. Here is the telegram:

"QUEBEC, 1st April, 1885.

"To Hon. A. P. CARON.

"Doctors Roy and Watters sick. Will you authorise Arthur DeBlois, doctor, to be attached to battalion.

"G. AMYOT."

Upon the receipt of that telegram I replied, on the same date, as follows:—

"OTTAWA, 1st April, 1887.

"Lt. Col. G. AMYOT.

"Quebec.

I authorise Doctor De Blois to be attached to 9th Battalion.

"A. P. CARON."

The hon. gentleman on the same day continued his correspondence by telegraph as follows:—

"QUEBEC, 1st April, 1885.

"Hon. A. P. CARON.

"Ottawa.

"Bought boots. Trying to have balance. Asking medicine chest; condemned. Want De Blois authorised to buy. Want instruments. Do best to be able to start to-morrow; men ready

"G. AMYOT."

I read those telegrams to the House so as to show that the hon. gentleman has forgotten a good many of the telegrams which he sent, and has forgotten a good many of the facts, and, possibly, some of the facts which he has forgotten relate to the very accounts he is complaining of, and upon which he has expressed such a very strong opinion. These accounts have been made up by the officers of the Department, and if there is any amount due to the Department, that amount must be collected, and the hon. gentleman will have an opportunity, in another place, of disputing any or all of these accounts. I do not intend, at this late hour of the evening, to go into the details of the report to which the hon. gentleman has referred, but I repeat again, that during the whole of the troubles, I have not heard a word of complaint, except from the hon. gentleman, about any of the accounts which have been made up by the same officers in the Department of Militia. I am perfectly certain that when the hon. gentleman looks into the matter more closely and more calmly, he may possibly change his opinion, and he may not find that such bad feeling has been shown towards the officers of his battalion by the officers of the Department of Militia.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Customs Department—salaries..... $300

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Is this Mr. T. J. Watters who receives an increase of $200 the gentleman who received the money for seizures?

Mr. BOWELL. Yes.

M. DAVIES (P.E.I.) Why is his salary increased?

Mr. BOWELL. He is accountant of the whole Department, and his work has increased so enormously that I thought he was entitled to this increase of salary. I wished to avoid that which hon. gentlemen opposite have been complaining of so much, that is, the bringing down of items for sums to pay for extra work. The records of the Department show that Mr. Watters is there until ten or eleven o'clock at night.

Department of Indian Affairs—salaries $650

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What has been the position of Mr. W. A. Orr heretofore, and what are the special reasons for increasing his salary from $750 to $1,100? It seems a pretty sudden leap.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is promoted to a second-class clerkship, and this is the minimum salary.

Departments of Justice and Fisheries $2,100

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I notice that in the salaries for the Department of Justice, and the Department of Fisheries, there are seemingly two new officers. I supposed we were going to economise, but this does not look like it.

Mr. FOSTER. With reference to the Fishery Department this will be an economy. The vote is to provide for an additional second-class clerk, an officer who is found to be necessary in the Department. The gentleman to be appointed already receives pay out of contingencies.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Then the hon. gentleman has really been paying this officer in another way?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). And, therefore, I suppose there will be one less charged to contingencies.

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards the officer in the Department of Justice, the accounting of that Department has been recently increased very largely by the addition of accounts which were formerly kept in another Department, and the work has been found to be rather large for one accountant. Last year we abolished a third-class clerkship, which I now propose to restore, with the exceptional provision that the clerk shall be appointed at the maximum salary, in consequence of his having technical qualifications as a skilled accountant.

Penitentiaries—salaries $1,000

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the present salary of the storekeeper at Kingston Penitentiary?

Mr. THOMPSON. $900. There is an increase on account of his exceptional qualifications in the service. He is the only present officer who receives the maximum that he will be entitled to under the new Act. The other evening, when the main Estimates were being passed, I gave an explanation with regard to an increase there that should apply to this officer. He is a very valuable officer for the purchase of stores in connection with the penitentiary.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I wish to mention a matter, which I mentioned before. I see that the hon. gentleman proposes to increase the salary of the warden of the Manitoba Penitentiary by $100. This officer was at Battleford with General Middleton and a Mr. Hayter Reed. I called the attention of the Minister of Militia to the fact that there was a half-breed named Charles Bremner living in the vicinity of Battleford, and having in his possession $7,000 worth of furs; that he was arrested and sent to Regina, and afterwards discharged because there was nothing against him; that during his absence his furs were taken possession of by the military; and that General Middleton, this man Bedson, and Hayter Reed, divided the furs amongst them. There can be no doubt about the matter—these three parties, instead of protecting the property of an innocent man, took it and divided it amongst them. I believe this matter has been brought to the attention of the Government. I would like to ask the Minister of the Interior whether the matter has not been brought to his attention?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). No, it has not. There may be something of it in the report of the commission, but that has not yet been received.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Has the hon. gentleman never heard anything about it?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). Nothing except what the hon. gentleman himself said in the House a short time ago.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I say that men occupying the high official positions of these men ought not to engage in looting business of that sort. When men occupying such positions go into an enemy's country, perhaps, according to the laws of war—the law of the country being suspended, and no one owning any property by law—a proceeding of this sort might be allowed; but when a man goes into his own country, and is paid, and is liberally paid, by the public for the services he is discharging, and, instead of exerting his authority to protect people and to preserve their property, uses his position, because he thinks that the public are not likely to become cognisant of his conduct, to rob a citizen of his property, especially when the man is a half-breed, living beyond the influence of public opinion and the reach of public intelligence, the Government ought not to come down to Parliament and propose to increase his salary, as is done in this case. I say those men ought to be called to account for their conduct, and they ought to be held responsible to the law of the land for what they have done in this matter. I do not think we are discharging our duty to the people of this country when we permit officers, who conduct themselves in this way, to escape that censure which their conduct richly deserves.

Mr. SCARTH. The hon. gentleman has made statements here for the second time without bringing forward the least evidence for what he has said. I know Mr. Bedson, the warden of the Manitoba Penitentiary, much better than I know the hon. gentleman, and I am prepared to say that Mr. Bedson is as honorable a gentleman as the hon. member for Bothwell or any other member of this House, and I think it ill-becomes the hon. member for Bothwell, in the absence of a man of Mr. Bedson's character, a servant under the Government for many years, and a gentleman who went forward in the rebellion and did as good work as any other man in that rebellion, to get up in this House and accuse him of conduct that he is not able to prove.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I believe the Government have in their possession the proof of the accuracy of the statement which I make. I have my information from persons who profess to have personal cognisance of what was done. I was given a copy of a receipt that was taken by the force at the time this property was taken possession of. I was told how the property was distributed, and how trunks were filled with the furs and sent out of the settlement. The hon. gentleman talks about Mr. Bedson's character. I have had opportunities of knowing something with regard to the conduct of that officer, which I mentioned to the hon. members on the Treasury benches, and if the hon. member for Montreal West (Sir Donald Smith) were here, he could bear testimony which would be very different from that which the hon. gentleman has set up.

Mr. THOMPSON. As regards this officer, when his salary came under consideration in the main Estimates, the hon. member for Bothwell asked if the Minister of Militia and myself had been aware of a charge of that kind having been made by one Bremner. I replied that I had not heard of it before, and I have not heard of it since. If Bremner has been aggrieved in the way the hon. gentleman describes, it is very extraordinary that he has not made a complaint either to the Minister of Militia or to myself, in whose Department, Mr. Bedson is serving. With all deference to the hon. gentleman's parliamentary experience, it strikes me as novel and somewhat unwise that an officer of the public service, and so far as I know of honorable service, should be stigmatised as a thief when the person he is alleged to have robbed has not laid a single charge against him, and when the officer has not had an opportunity of answering any complaint. If the hon. gentleman had made a statement the other night with the positiveness that he has done now, I would have called upon Mr. Bedson to answer it; but the hon. gentleman put it in the form of a question, and down to this moment Mr. Bedson has not had an opportunity of answering this charge. I beg to say that this is not an increase in his salary. When the main Estimates were under consideration I stated that the officers of the Manitoba penitentiary were, for a number of years past, in receipt of larger perquisites than the officers of any other institution. Not only were they in the receipt of fuel, which was not customary in the other penitentiaries, but Mr. Bedson has been receiving rations as well, and an enquiry elicited the fact that those perquisites are worth very nearly $1,700 a year. I asked the House to give an additional allowance of $100, and this is a further additional allowance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am inclined to think that the hon. gentleman is right in the supply of the perquisites. Looking over the Auditor General's Report, I find certain items to which I called the attention of the Public Accounts Committee, with respect to this same Manitoba penitentiary, and which I consider as very decidedly objectionable. I am not disposed to take umbrage at some trifling expenses incurred by some of those officers, but when I come upon items like these:

"Governor General's visit—Colored cotton and print, $20.38; champagne, 2 cases, $65; medoc, 2 cases, $17; port, 1 gallon, $6.50; sherry, 1 gallon, $6.50; whiskey, 2 gallons, $5."

I think that the management of this penitentiary has been lax, to say the least of it. I think it is very unfair to His Excellency that his visit should have been used for the purpose of allowing expenses like this to be incurred. We know that in this country there is a very strong feeling indeed on the temperance question, and it is not right that, under the guise of a visit paid by the Governor General to a penitentiary, an expenditure of this kind should be incurred and charged in this fashion. There is no doubt whatever that this visit of His Excellency was made the occasion of a certain amount of guzzling on the part of a number of persons who chose to avail themselves of that opportunity to go out there, and it is not, in the state of public opinion, right or proper that such items should creep into our Estimates. I called the attention of the Public Accounts Committee to this, and enquired by whose authority it was done. If not done by the authority of the hon. gentleman, it is clear there were irregularities in connection with the penitentiary, which shows the management has not been in all respects what it should be.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Mr. THOMPSON. This is not at all an evidence of mismanagement of the penitentiary, and has no reference to the system of perquisites at all. At the time His Excellency was about to make a visit to the penitentiary, the warden telegraphed to the Minister of Justice for the time being—I had been sworn in but not elected—to state that His Excellency was about to visit the prison, and asked whether he should be permitted to entertain him. He received from the acting Minister of Justice the reply that he might to the extent of $100. I regret more than the hon. member himself, for the sake of the dignity of His Excellency, that this item should appear as it does in the Public Accounts. I cannot help thinking it was put in the Public Accounts, not for any wise or proper purpose, and it is likely to convey the impression that there was irregularity in the management of the prison.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think it was a judicious permission. I do not at all approve of this practice of considerable sums being voted—I am not straight-laced in these matters—in providing liquors on occasions of this kind.

Legislation, Senate.....$2,100

Mr. McMULLEN. What is the name of the law clerk and what is his salary?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. $2,200 and this makes it $2,500.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I cannot see what reason there is for these increases. These officers have been receiving these salaries for a considerable number of years, and I do not see any reason why any increase should be made. Here one increased $300 and the other $400. These are not regular statutory increases, and some reason should be given why they are proposed. The work of officers in the Senate is considerably less than the work done by our officers here.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. These increases are not made by the Government but by the Senate themselves.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not think that justifies them.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We are not in a position to give all the figures the Senate ask for increasing the salaries of these officers. I understand the law clerk has still less than had his predecessor. The sergeant remains on as clerk of the French Journals besides being sergeant. His salary was $1,200, and I have given him $100 more for his work as clerk of the French Journals. This office had become vacant by the death of Mr. Taché, and the Senate thought it well to divide the work between two, giving $400 to the sergeant-at-arms and the other $800 to the assistant clerk of French Journals, who is Mrs. Taché, widow of the late officer.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On concurrence I propose to reduce the Estimates by $1,200.

CORNWALL FLOODS.

Mr. BERGIN. The hon. member for South Oxford asked for an explanation yesterday with regard to the sum of $10,000 voted for the relief of the sufferers by the Cornwall flood. According to Hansard he spoke in this way:

"If I am correctly advised the present sitting member and the then sitting member was one of the parties whom the Government thought fit to entrust with the administration of this money. I may say at once that unless there was absolutely no other human being in Cornwall whom the Government could trust, it was a very indiscreet and improper thing to entrust to a gentleman about to run an election with the distribution of $10,000 of money taken out of the public Treasury for any purpose whatever."

Afterwards he said :

"Because I was informed that the person chiefly concerned was the then and present member for the county, Dr. Bergin, that there were three parties of whom he was one, and we ought to have, I think, a statement of how the money was spent. Has the hon. gentleman the information?"

I am not going to find fault with the hon. gentleman for asking information as to how the money was spent; but I could not have imagined before, that partisanship would, under such circumstances, have carried any hon. member of this House so far as to charge a man, in the face of such an appalling calamity as that which befell the town of Cornwall, with being so deaf to all humanity and charity as to abuse a position which he had not, but which that hon. gentleman thought he had, to deprive the sufferers, the starving, the naked, the houseless, and the homeless of that which was sent in the hour of their distress by the Government for their relief. Let me say to the hon. gentleman that I had no more to do with the distribution of the money than he had. Let me tell him that from the moment I was advised by the Government they would respond to our call for relief, I took care to have nothing, directly or indirectly, to do with the distribution of the money. I asked the mayor to call a meeting of the citizens. He did so, and there was a large number of citizens present. They appointed a committee, consisting of one gentleman as chairman, from each ward, and of which all the clergymen of the town formed a part. That money was distributed almost entirely under the direction of the clergymen of every denomination in the town, without respect to persons, and I think there is no man who will charge men like the Rev. Canon Pettit, the Rev. Father Murray, the Rev. Dr. McNish of St. John's Church, and the other clergymen, who, if they have any politics, have different political views, with having abused their trust and applied this for political purposes. As to the local chairmen, there were two chosen from each political party, and everything was done to prevent any misappropriation of that money, and, after it was all expended and there was no further necessity for relief, then these gentlemen arranged for an audit, and whom did they select as their auditors? One was an officer of the Government. They thought it was only due to the Government, who had granted this money, that their officer should be taken as one of the auditors, but the other was one of the most violent partisans of hon. gentlemen opposite though he is an honest man, the registrar of the county. Could it be possible under such circumstances, that there could have been any improper interference with the distribution? Under ordinary circumstances I can forgive a charge of that kind being made, but under circumstances such as those which occurred at Cornwall, I cannot forgive any one for suggesting that one could be so lost to all sense of duty, all sense of right, all sense of charity, and all sense of justice as to divert this grant from the intended purpose under the conditions in which these people were.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has taken a very extraordinary view of a very proper question which was put by me. We had a perfect right to know what was done with the money which was given by Parliament out of the ordinary course, under very exceptional circumstances, and at a time which shortly preceded an election in which that hon. gentleman took part, and there was the best possible reason for making an enquiry as to how the money was disposed of, because, if the hon. gentleman had anything to do with the disposition of that money, it would have been a most improper act. The practice of giving money in cases of calamity requires to be closely watched, and I am very glad to hear that the hon. gentleman had nothing to do with the distribution, because that would have been very improper, and would have shown how closely these matters should be watched. The information was given to me that the hon. gentleman was largely concerned in the distribution of this money, and it was in the discharge of my duty that I asked the question I did. It is of very little moment to me whether the hon. gentleman is pleased or not.

Mr. BERGIN. It may not be a matter of very much moment to the hon. gentleman, but it ought to be. It may not be a matter of very much moment to him whether he asperses the character of another hon. gentleman or not, but it ought to be. It may not be a matter of very much moment to him whether he stands well with the country or not, but it ought to be. And I maintain that a gentleman who holds the high position which he holds in the ranks of the Opposition, ought to be careful of the honor of gentlemen who hold positions in this House. The hon. gentleman must recollect that I stated in my opening remarks that I found no fault with him or anyone else for enquiring how this money was spent, but I did find fault with the manner in which that information was asked for, and to show that I did him no injustice, I read his own words, and I will repeat them again. He went so far as to say :

"Unless there was absolutely no other human being in Cornwall."

There could be no other construction put upon it than that this grant was sent to me, and was so sent with the full knowledge that I must be a very dishonest man and would misapply it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have to repeat that, had it turned out that the hon. gentleman had anything to do with the distribution of this money, it would have been a most improper thing. The Government were not prepared to give the information when I asked for it because they had not the details, and I was perfectly justified in what I said and I repeat everything I said on the subject.

House of Commons $6,472 20

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the occasion for these eight additional messengers? I should have thought that we had enough of them already.

Mr. SPEAKER. I stated last night that, when I assumed the duties of Speaker, I found there were several extra employes who had to be paid out of the contingent fund, and I thought it would be much better to have them placed on the permanent staff. I think that the employes generally are much better under control when they are regularly on the staff than when they are employed as extras. As I said last night, this does not impose any greater burden than before. The messengers are fully employed for the convenience of members, and would be missed if they were not employed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Do I understand that this is not an increase, but that these are men who were in the service before?

Mr. SPEAKER. They were.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was not in the House at the time he made his explanation, otherwise I would not have repeated the question. I agree with my hon. friend that it is better that these officials should be paid in this way than under the head of contingencies, but my experience of messengers about the House, though I have not the same opportunity of judging as Mr. Speaker has, is that we had enough of them before, and if eight were to be employed in addition to those who were employed before, it would have required some information. However, as I understand they are not additional in the proper sense of the word, but are merely transferred from the contingencies to the regular account.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I desire to bring in a provision to pay the indemnity and mileage of the late Robert Campbell, $1,021.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I have not the slightest objection to that, but does it not require an additional message?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This was placed in the Supplementary Estimates before the Governor General's message had been printed, and it does not appear in this. It was included in the message as brought down.

To pay Captain J. Wilson for services as returning officer at Algoma..... $ 150

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are we to understand that the gentleman who acted as returning officer, was the Collector of Customs at Sault St. Marie?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He has been returning officer for many years.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We know the position of Algoma is exceptional, but still, appointing a Collector of Customs as returning officer, is a precedent which would be more honored in the breach than in the observance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He had performed the duties previously in several elections with great acceptance. It is a very large district, and he knew how to manage it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was informed at the elections for Algoma that very considerable irregularities had occurred in the polling district, which matter, I believe, is now before the courts. The people did not know until the date of the election, where the poll was to be held. How does this officer come to be paid $150 extra?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. He is paid $150 for his work as returning officer.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All returning officers receive a certain sum without their coming to Parliament for it. This must be an extra clearly; I have never seen this vote before, to my recollection. Is clause 51 a new clause?

Mr. BOWELL. The clause provides that we shall not pay any officer any extra money unless it is voted by Parliament.

Mr. DAWSON. The irregularities which the hon. gentleman has heard of, are more in imagination than in reality. The district of Algoma is of enormous extent, as large as all the Maritime Provinces combined, with Newfoundland and Gaspé added. The duties there of a returning officer are very onerous indeed. Last winter, when the election was going on in the depth of winter, and in the midst of snow storms, the returning officer very nearly sacrificed his life in his endeavor to do his duty. To say that irregularities occurred, and that the people did not know where the polling stations were to be, is not borne out by the facts. The polling stations are where they always have been since the district was organised. They knew perfectly well where they were to be, and all these idle reports are merely put out by disappointed candidates.

Arts, Agriculture and Statistics $17,500

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Aid to agricultural societies in the North-West Territories, $10,000. How is that going to be distributed?

Mr. CARLING. In the same way as is done by the Local Governments of Ontario and Quebec. Where there is a society of fifty members, subscribing $50, the Government will give the $3 to their one.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may take this opportunity to detain the House for a moment in relation to an enquiry that was made by the hon. member for South Oxford in regard to the exhibition, as to the statement that dissatisfaction was expressed by Messrs. Ballantyne and Macpherson in regard to the cheese exhibit. I will read the letter which was written to me by those gentlemen when they left London:

"LONDON, 20th May, 1886.

"DEAR SIR,—The cheese shipped by Mr Ballantyne on behalf of the Ontario Government, have now arrived and, being too late for exhibition purposes at opening of exhibition, will you kindly give the undersigned an order for the delivery of the same so we can store them in a cool place and will be available for use in the colonial market and restaurants during the holding of the exhibition. We think this will be the best means at our command to give the English public an opportunity of testing the good qualities of Canadians Cheddar cheese. We may add that the cheese referred to has arrived in the best possible condition. We also propose to keep 100 of these cheese till fall to assist in making a good display of dairy products sometime during the months of September or October. This will test the keeping quality of our cheese, which is a fact of importance to have the public know. With many thanks for your kindness, and courteous attention, we are, Dear Sir,

"Yours respectfully,

"THOMAS BALLANTYNE,
"D. D. MACPHERSON."

I give that to the hon. gentleman as the evidence. I will also read from the report of the Ontario Agricultural College:

"Good service was rendered by the cheese of the make of 1885, before mentioned, and sent over in care of Messrs. Ballantyne and Macpherson. Often prominent dairy experts would say that while our Canadian cheese was very fine, when comparatively new, it lacked good keeping properties. To such I would sample these cheeses over one year old. Among the well known dairy experts to whom I showed these cheese were Mr. H. F. Moore, of Frome, and Prof. Fream, of Downton Agricultural College. The expressed opinion of both was that these old cheese were as fine as any cheese in the whole exhibit, and so fine that to them the cheese awarded the first prize at Frome Dairy show, would have made but an indifferent second. At Frome is held the largest cheese show in England. Mr Moore did us the justice and service of writing an article to the London Times containing the same statement."

I will read one single extract from the report of the gentleman who was sent over subsequently by the Ontario Government:

"The location occupied by the Canadian exhibit of butter and cheese was, perhaps the most prominent in the whole Canadian court. Canada had a large trophy composed of the various agricultural products of the Dominion: Sheaves of wheat, barrels of flour, sides of bacon, little tins of honey, jars of apples and fruit, agricultural implements, &c. These were arranged in a most symmetrical and artistic combination. Right beside this, in a prominent place, and where it would best attract the attention of visitors, was located Ontario's cheese and butter. For this advantage Mr. C. C. Chipman, the acting commissioner, is entitled to our thanks * * * Good service was done the country by the shipments of cheese sent from here in the spring. I did not forget that I had been sent to represent the interests of Ontario in this matter, and I was fortunate enough to get possession of some of these cheese, which had not been placed on exhibition at the opening by reason of their not arriving in time."

It was a matter of some importance; and having devoted a great deal of time and hard labor to make this exhibition a success, and having done it without—from the commencement of the exhibition at Antwerp to the Colonial and Indian Exhibition—incurring one dollar of expenditure to the country in connection with any position as Executive Commissioner, I felt it right to detain the Committee in order to put this matter right.

Militia $116 66

Mr. McMULLEN. By the Auditor General's report I observe that Dr. Bergin, who, I suppose, is the gentleman who recently addressed the House, drew $1,800 for services as Surgeon General. Is he still so engaged?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I have answered that question already. I stated that Dr. Bergin was appointed as Surgeon General; that he had no duties to perform at present, and consequently he was not under pay.

Mr. McMULLEN. I see there was also a deputy Surgeon General who received $1,573. Have we that officer now?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Mr. CHARLTON. How long is it since the Surgeon General was performing duty and under pay?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. He has not been under pay for a long time. His pay ceased almost immediately after the termination of the trouble; I cannot remember the exact date. He was under pay for six or seven weeks afterwards to wind up his accounts and settle matters connected with his branch.

Mr. McMULLEN. He received pay up to the 1st September, 1885, which is more than a few weeks after the trouble closed.

Railways—Intercolonial..... $180,900

Mr. JONES. I suppose this amount is to increase the accommodation at Halifax?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Mr. JONES. Does the Minister of Railways propose taking any immediate step to acquire the property there for the improvement and enlargement of the terminal facilities at deep water?

Mr. POPE. I intend to have an investigation made as soon as possible. Whether it will require property to any large extent to be acquired, or whether we can manage to lay a track on the wharves must depend on the result of the investigation, and I intend to have that made as soon as possible.

Mr. JONES. I hope there will be no loss of time in making an investigation.

Mr. KENNY. I beg to remind the Minister of Railways that early in the Session I placed in his hand plans and papers and a petition for a subsidy for the Halifax and North-Eastern Railway, or as it is called, the Musquodoboit road. This proposition has excited much interest in Nova Scotia. It starts from the eastern side of the harbor of Halifax and passes through or near the gold mining districts of Waverley and Oldham, and then the agricultural district of Musquodoboit, and ultimately reaches the Pictou coal fields. A subsidy has been granted to the road by the Local Government, and I hope the Minister of Railways will take the subject into serious consideration. I notice that no provision has been made so far this Session. I may remind the hon. gentleman also that he received the plans for a proposed line from Bedford to a point on the Windsor and Annapolis Railway, a loop line about ten miles in length, to go through from Bedford to a point six or seven miles west of Windsor Junction. Both those documents have been placed in the Department of Railways, and as yet no official response has been made to them.

Mr. POPE. I really did not think it was necessary to make any official response, for the hon. gentleman has been so anxious about the matter that he has called upon me before breakfast and after dinner, and has pushed me at all hours. I may say that so far as the railway is concerned, the profile of the road was placed in my hands and is in my office. I am afraid it runs a little parallel to the road now in existence; but, at all events, I found it quite impossible to give aid to all the railways that were brought before me. I felt that this one, under the circumstance, might lie over for the time being, and the hon. member had pushed me so hard that I was not likely to forget it, and if I forget it he will, no doubt, bring it before the House.

Mr. JONES. I suppose this would more properly have come before the House when the items of railway subsidies were under consideration, and I had intended then to have adopted the same course adopted by my colleague with respect to those two branches. The first branch, the branch from Bedford, a loop line to connect with the Windsor and Annapolis or Intercolonial Railway, would intersect a very fine portion of the Sackville valley, and would prove a very great convenience to the people of that district. They held several meetings and enlisted the sympathy of the Local Government, and it would not require a very great expenditure if the Dominion Government were disposed to afford the company the usual assistance, while I do not think it would be a competitor with the Intercolonial, because it runs in a different direction rather from the line followed by the Intercolonial Railway. I hope the Minister will still keep it in memory, and, if not this year, we will another year have an appropriation. With respect to the road from Halifax harbor to Pictou: That is one of very considerable importance. The hon. gentleman says the papers are in his Department, and I thought we had a fair prospect of having a subsidy granted to that line, because the Minister of Finance, during his visit to Halifax, led the promoters to understand, and, I am informed by them, gave them his promise that an appropriation would be made for that road during this Session. I have heard from several parties interested in that line, that such an assurance was conveyed by the Minister of Finance, and I know his own political friends gave it out during the election campaign that they had his assurance that the subsidy would be granted. Aside from that, the road on its merits is a very desirable one, for which I think the Minister would be justified in asking the House for an appropriation. It goes through a splendid settlement, one of the finest agricultural sections in the eastern part of the Province. I am sorry the Finance Minister has not been able to carry out what I understand was the promise he made on the occasion, and I know his failure to do so will cause great disappointment, particularly to his own political friends.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I can only say the hon. gentleman was misinformed. What I did say with reference to the railway policy of the Government was said publicly and in the hon. gentleman's presence. A deputation waited on me in connection with the road; they pointed out that it was to run from the village of Dartmouth up into the fertile district of Musquodoboit, and I explained that the Government of which I was a member had taken great interest in the promotion of those railways, that subsidies had been granted to them, but that it was not in the power of myself or of any other member of the Government to pledge the Cabinet to any matter upon which a decision had not been formally arrived at, but that I would see that the merits of the road would be fully and fairly represented to my colleagues for favorable consideration, as they had been represented to me, but I made no pledge whatever.

Mr. JONES. I can only say that the decision of the hon. gentleman will involve great regret to his political friends and the public generally.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see that a portion of this vote is for applying electricity for lighting the cars and steam for heating them direct from the locomotive. I would ask what mode was adopted for applying the steam and generating and applying the electricity?

Mr. POPE. I can only say that we will adopt the best mode we can find, but that the plan has not yet been decided upon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I wish to state to the Minister of Railways that three years ago, when the present Minister of Finance was Minister of Railways, I referred to some claims on the Intercolonial Railway, when he stated in reply to a question by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright), that this was the last claim of the kind on the Intercolonial Railway. I rose and reminded him that I had submitted some claims on Section 16, and he at once assented to the fact of those claims having been made, and said the matter would be enquired into and dealt with. The Finance Minister moved from this to a higher and more important sphere, and the matter was left in charge of the present Minister of Railways, for whom I have great respect, but of whom I must say that, as regards paying claims in connection with public works, he is one of the toughest customers I ever met. Although I pressed this claim, and quoted the statement of the present Finance Minister, I found great difficulty in getting him to take it up. After a year and a half, however, it was referred to the Dominion arbitrators, who made a favorable report, which has now been in the hon. gentleman's hands some fifteen or sixteen months. Unfortunately for my clients, I have not been in favor with the Administration during that time, and I have not been able to get the hon. gentleman to pay these claims; in fact, I am not sure whether he has considered them. There are only some four or five small claims; they have been reported upon favorably, and I would ask if he will consider them and pay them.

Mr. POPE. I sympathise with the hon. gentleman in the delays which have been caused by my predecessor in not looking into the matter. The hon. gentleman knows my predecessor was slow in looking into any claims from the Maritime Provinces. However, I have already taken action by sending on the arbitrators. I have the report, and I can tell the hon. gentleman that I will take action very soon, though whether I pay them or not is another matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would really like a more distinct promise from the hon. gentleman. I remember that about the same time another claim was reported upon, in connection with the tug Sultan, and I got the cold shoulder from both of them. This other claim was in the hands of the Minister of Public Works, and, though I could not get it paid till the elections came on, I then found that my adversary, who was running in the interest of the Government, managed to get it paid. The hon. gentleman has surely read the report; he knows that the claims are just, and I trust he will give me an assurance which I can convey to my constituents that the claims will be paid.

Mr. POPE. The hon. gentleman can assure his constituents that I would have looked into the matter long ago, but that I was afraid of its being an election dodge. I will look into it now.

Mr. MITCHELL. Although it is not exactly in line with the other matter, perhaps the Minister of Public Works will give me his attention for a moment. I brought under the notice of the hon. gentleman, when I was rather an admirer of his in former years—I am rather an admirer of his yet, because I think he is honest, only for his surroundings—I brought under his notice the matter of building a wharf at Neguac. A report was made that it would cost some $3,000 and it was for the purpose of facilitating the lading of the daily steamers at that place the settlers having to carry their produce on small boats, owing to the difficulty of landing. About three year ago, my hon. friend gave me more than half a promise that the money would be put in the Estimates, but the next year I was rather out of favor with the Administration, and, while I know that the hon. gentleman's personal feelings towards me were as good as ever, his official feelings were somewhat changed. I have never been able to get him to consider this small claim of $3,000 since. There is something like $50,000,000 representing statutory obligations and votes of Parliament, and I do think, considering that not $1 has been granted on any application I have made—and I made only two or three moderate ones—the hon. gentleman might redeem that half pledge which he made to me three years ago and build this wharf at Neguac.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman is right. He spoke to me several times about this wharf, and Mr. MITCHELL.

in accordance with his desire and my promise I brought the matter before my colleagues. Every application made to my Department for works was laid before my colleagues, and from the Council room my estimates came just as we find them here, and Neguac was not there.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the hon. the Minister of Railways if he has made arrangements for the electric light for Halifax station at North street and at Richmond, respecting which I had an interview with him a short time ago.

Mr. POPE. I have sent for a report as to that.

Repairs to road dyke along Lake St. Francis$4,000

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). What is it for?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Between the village of Co-teau Landing and the mouth of the River Beaudet, on the North Shore of Lake St. Francis, several portions of the road are exposed to the full sweep of the waves, and it is in danger, and this dyke, which is three feet high and four feet wide, and costs $1.14 per lineal foot, is to be erected to protect it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). Does the municipality or the Province contribute anything?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Public Buildings, Ottawa—to provide for settlement of claim of W. Farquhar & Co., contractors for the Library Building $3,046 06

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This must be a very old claim?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This was refused by the contractors at the time, but they have finally accepted it.

Public Buildings, New Brunswick.....$17,800

Mr. MITCHELL. Might I ask at whose request $500 is asked for the Chatham quarantine buildings. I have never had any representation made to me that they required repairs or alterations, and as the representative of the county, I think I would have been informed of them if they were needed. Hon. gentlemen are ready enough to put votes in the Estimates that are not asked for, but they are not so ready to put in what I know is required. I suppose it was my antagonist who was put up to oppose me in my election who asked for this vote.

Mr. CARLING. I think it was recommended by an officer of the Department there. I do not remember.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the hon. gentleman bring the information some time?

Mr. CARLING. I will do so.

Public Buildings, Quebec.....$46,000

Mr. LAURIER. What is the vote of $7,000 to the St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary required for?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It is for a number of items, principally for steam pipes and steam fitting throughout the building.

Mr. LAURIER. Is there any prospect of the works at the cliff under the Citadel at Quebec being completed during the year?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This vote of $4,000 will finish the work. There were a number of large boulders and other rocks which threatened to come down.

Public Buildings, Ontario.....$222,312 92

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I hardly think $10,000 would cover the cost of building an examining warehouse in Kingston, if it is to correspond with the Custom house and post office.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We get the site free.

Mr. MITCHELL. It seems extraordinary that the Government should contribute to build fire stations in Ottawa.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The explanation is that we pay no taxes in Ottawa on our buildings. We have the city fire department as well as the police to watch our buildings, although we have our own Dominion police. The city police do their duty towards the Government, and several times the fire department of the city has been called upon to come to our relief. The city corporation found that our buildings are so lofty they required better fire accommodation, larger number of reels and fire apparatus, and acquired a central station not far from our public buildings. This is the Government's share of the contribution.

Mr. MITCHELL. I presume the hon. gentleman recommended that to Council.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. It was not struck out, was it?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. It was not, since it is here.

Mr. CHARLTON. I see a post office is given to Cayuga. There are many towns in my county larger than Cayuga and more entitled to a public building.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. In South Oxford there are three or four towns five times the size of Cayuga, which are without public works. I hope the Minister of Public Works will provide them with public buildings, Inland Revenue offices, &c.

Mr. PLATT. It is not likely the people of Cayuga will object to the vote, but there ought to be some system applying to the distribution of party patronage. Much larger towns at present are overlooked, although many of them have the right to claim the fulfilment of promises made before the elections. I would ask the Minister of Public Works if representations have not been made to him on behalf of the town of Picton. There is a strong feeling of disappointment in that town, on both sides of politics, at there being no vote in the Estimates for public buildings there. During the elections last winter, a rather wealthy individual of the town purchased a lot expecting it would be the site of a public building, and this purchase was made a few days after the visit of the hon. the Minister of Customs. I am not aware that the hon. gentleman has had a word to say on the subject since. I had hoped my hon. friend would have pressed the Minister of Public Works not to disappoint the people of Picton. The system which governs the selection of sites for these public buildings is on a wrong basis, as members of Parliament are expected to urge upon the Minister the claims of their particular localities, and more weight is given to political considerations than to any other. It is somewhat degrading, when one is pressing claims which are just, to find that the Minister sends some political partisan to look into the claims. Many times I have refrained from pressing claims, for the reason that, when I have spoken, I found that letters had been addressed to particular supporters of the Government in my locality, telling them that if anything came in the way of Platt better not do it. The Government should lay down some plan by which towns that contribute a certain revenue to the Treasury would receive certain grants. The town of Strathroy comes in for a grant of $4,000 although it is not a county town. I say it is simply a disgrace to the management of this part of the public business that it should be conducted in this manner.

Mr. BOWELL. I should like to know if the hon. gentleman has any knowledge of any promises that I made, directly or indirectly, when I was visiting his county in reference to public buildings? I am not responsible for anything that other people may say, nor am I responsible for the nonsense talked by the hon. gentleman. I know nothing of the purchase of any lot, and I made no promises.

Mr. PLATT. It is simply a remarkable coincidence.

Mr. BOWELL. I do not know anything about any coincidence. You may be judging other people by yourself.

Mr. JONES. What is this vote of $75,000 for the Government printing bureau for? Is it for the machinery?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This is for the building.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is this to be erected?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. On the banks of the canal, in rear of the City Hall.

Mr. JONES. I am going to make a suggestion, which probably will not be acted upon, in connection with this public printing. I think the people of this country must be very much interested in the legislation, and at present they have no more idea of the business which goes on in this House than they have of the business going on at Washington or in London. We find sometimes, when the right hon. gentleman makes a speech on an important subject, that the speech is copied in the Toronto Globe and possibly in the Montreal Herald, but, if any other hon. gentleman, no matter how prominent he may be, makes a speech on the ordinary questions of the day, it is not copied in the papers of the other side. Consequently, the information regarding the legislation of the country, the reasons which the Government may have for the policy they are pursuing or the views of the Opposition on the other hand, are not laid fairly before the people. I think it would be in the interest of the country, if the Government are establishing a bureau of printing, to make an arrangement whereby additional copies of the Hansard could be printed at that establishment and distributed free.

Mr. HESSON. Yes, you would like to see yours copied.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman need not be afraid. I suppose he is afraid of having what he says in the House read elsewhere, but I will guarantee the hon. gentleman that the people would not take up much time in reading what he says. I think, if copies of the Hansard were distributed to the newspapers and by them free to their readers, it would be in the interest of good government in this country. I make this suggestion now, and I hope that at some time the Government may see their way clear to act upon it.

Mr. McMULLEN. In reference to this vote of $4,000 for the Strathroy post office, Custom house, &c., I understand that Strathroy is not a county town. I understood that the Government had laid down the principle that they would not erect these buildings except in county towns. I have called their attention to three towns in my riding that have almost as much population as Strathroy, and I think there is the town of Listowell, in the riding represented by the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson), which is entitled to a post office if Strathroy is entitled to one.

Mr. HESSON. We will have that next year.

Mr. McMULLEN. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is neglecting his duty in not pressing that on the Government. If the Government are going to lay down the principle that they will only erect post offices in towns where they will gain political support, we had better know it. If they will erect post offices only in cases where there is a protest entered, and their action is likely to strengthen the chances of the member who supports the Government, the country had better know it. It appears that that is the course adopted. The hon. gentleman who represented the riding in which Strathroy is, in the last Parliament, is not here now. There is a protest, I believe, and to strengthen the prospects of the present member, the Government recommend a vote of $4,000 to erect a post office there. If that is not the moving cause, why has the Government not erected a post office in the town of Listowell, in the county of North Perth, and in Mount Forest, which is a town of 2,500 or 3,000 of a population, a larger place than Strathroy? The whole thing is conducted on a miserable, rotten system.

Mr. ROOME. I have the honor to represent the county in which Strathroy is situated. I made application for this not in order to influence votes, but on the ground of right. I made no promises. I carried the election over the head of the gentleman who had represented the constituency by a majority of 105 honestly and fairly. I do not apprehend any particular result from the protest. If I should be unseated from any cause, in consequence of some of my supporters having been too strong and having done something they ought not to do, I can go back to my constituency and can be elected not only against the man I ran against before, but against any man in the county or out of it. I did not ask for this grant on that ground. I asked for it because I considered we were entitled to it. Strathroy is a town with a population of 4,300, and I found that there were eight towns in Ontario and Quebec, leaving out the Lower Provinces, which had received post offices in the last two years having no more population. I thought that, when the Government were expending money for other counties, the county I represent, and the town in that county which is now referred to, were entitled also to consideration. I, therefore, made the application, and the Government have granted it on no other ground than justice and fairness.

Mr. HESSON. I should feel grateful to my hon. friend from North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), for taking such an interest in my county, but it is so characteristic of him to take an interest all round that I suppose it is a matter of course. I may say, for the information of my hon. friend, that I can look after the interest of my county without any assistance from outside. Though his suggestion was offered in a friendly manner, I do not believe it was intended in that sense. If I had pressed the Government to erect a post office in the town of Listowell, which is a thriving and prosperous town, a progressive town, and if the Government had put a sum in the Estimates for the post office there, the hon. gentleman would have been the first to have stated that I had approached the Government in order to strengthen myself in my constituency. I have prudence enough to know how to manage my own affairs, and I shall take good care that the town of Listowell is not neglected in this distribution, not of favors, but of right.

Mr. McMULLEN. Mr. Speaker, —

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am going to stand here as long as I feel inclined.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Question.

Mr. McMULLEN. You had better keep your mouth shut. I want to say, with regard to remarks which dropped from the hon. member, that I have no objection to his applying for a post office for his town of Strathroy. I commend him for doing so and for pressing upon the Government to grant it. The complaint is this: that the Government have in the past laid down a plan for the erection of post offices in Canada, and that now they appear to have departed from it. It appears to me that the Government always make the grants on certain grounds, which grounds are that they will tend to strengthen the party which supports them in that particular section. We are talking now with regard to Strathroy; we had Cayuga a few moments ago, and I presume the post office was established in the latter place for the same reason as at Strathroy. I am sure if the hon. member for North Perth (Mr. Hesson) wanted a post office at Listowell, with his well known influence with the Government he would only have to ask for it to get it. I know he has a great many warm friends there, and I am sure they would be glad if he would exert his great influence with the Government to get a post office at Listowell.

Mr. McMULLEN.

Mr. HESSON. When the Government desires to build a post office in Listowell, it will not be upon the suggestion of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. LISTER. So far as Listowell is concerned, I think that for a few years, at all events, it ought to take a back seat and look forward to getting a post office. I have a word or two to say about these public buildings. I am not impugning the motive of the Government at all in erecting post offices in different sections of the country, but I think some rule should be laid down. Of course it is the duty of the Government to erect these public buildings in cities, and I think next to the cities the leading towns of the country should have these advantages before the smaller places are favored. Of course, the cities have them now, and many of the county towns throughout the country also have them, but there are many large county towns in the Province of Ontario that are not served at all with public buildings, much to the disadvantage of the people. I do not blame the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Montague) for getting a post office in Cayuga. I understand there are a couple of villages or towns in that county larger than this one, and if it is entitled to a post office, they have a greater claim. There is also Gananoque, where the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Taylor) has succeeded in getting a public building. Almonte, a comparatively small place, has a public building. On looking over a return I asked for a couple of years ago, I find that a large number of towns, with a very small population, have had considerable sums expended on them in the way of public buildings. Now, I do not think that is right. Whether the Government do it for the purpose of securing support or not, this is a matter entirely in the public interest. The principal places in the country should first have these public buildings. My hon. friend has spoken about Sarnia. That is a place of over 6,000 inhabitants, and it has not a public building. It is the distributing point for mails in all directions, east, north and south. It is a place that yields a very considerable revenue to the Government indeed, and it is a place that ought to receive some consideration in respect to public buildings. I hope that it is not to be deprived of public buildings simply because it returns a member in opposition to the Government, because in that case I fear it will remain without public buildings as long as the right hon. gentleman leads the Government. I live in the hope, however, that within a few years, if not a few months, our places will be changed, and that then justice will be done to Sarnia.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We have here two pages of the Estimates for public buildings, amounting to several hundred thousand dollars, and I do not see one constituency here mentioned where these buildings are to be erected, that is represented by a member on this side of the House. I think this principle runs through the whole of these Estimates, that the hon. gentleman treats the public revenues of the country as the private patronage of the party, instead of undertaking to serve the public interest and to expend this money where the public interest demands. It is plainly spent with a view of promoting the interests of the party and strengthening this or that hon. member in his constituency. Now, when the hon. member for East York was at the head of the Government, he acted upon the principle, in the erection of public buildings, that the places that yielded the largest revenues for the purpose to which the building was being erected, should first be supplied. That principle, I believe, was uniformly adhered to. But when the hon. gentlemen opposite came in we find little places like Sussex, down in the constituency of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and Cayuga, and other small places, enjoying the expenditure of a large sum of public money, while larger places, where the public interest demand an expenditure of this kind, are entirely overlooked.

North-West Territories..... $110,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. North-West Mounted Police buildings, $100,000. Where are these buildings to be erected?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The buildings that existed previous to the increase of the force from 500 to 1,000, were only temporary buildings made of logs and clay. When I visited them three years ago they were all tumbling down. The idea at that time was to erect cheap buildings, because we did not know where the barracks would be finally built. These buildings will be built at Regina, Calgary, Fort McLeod, Lothbridge, Medicine Hat, Maple Creek, frontier outposts, Touchwood Hills, Battleford, Fort Saskatchewan, Prince Albert.

Mr. MITCHELL. Lieutenant Governor's residence, repairs, $3,000. On whose recommendation was this amount put in? I had the honor of visiting him two years ago, and I thought the building was quite good enough.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The hon. gentleman had no time to look over the building as I did. The building is a very poor building. The question was whether we should not ask a very much larger sum this year to build a proper building for a Lieutenant Governor. The present is a very cold building, and was really erected as a temporary residence; and certainly before a year or two have elapsed we shall have to come down and ask a sum for a new building.

Mr. DAVIN. The building is wholly unfit for a Governor's residence, and it is only because Governor Dewdney is accustomed to frontier life that he is enabled to live in such a house; and the time cannot be far distant when a proper residence will have to be built.

Mr. MITCHELL. I take the sample as like the stock; not only the building will have to be replaced shortly but also the Governor.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman mentioned several places at which it was contemplated to erect police barracks; will this vote pay for the whole?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it is only a commencement. I think $75,000 or $100,000 more will be required.

Mr. CHARLTON. This appears to be a very large sum for the housing of about 1,000 troops. As elaborate buildings are not required, I thought the present vote a rather large sum; and I trust that proper economy will be exercised in these expenditures. I hope the Government will not indulge in the erection of elegant buildings, but bear in mind that they need be of only a temporary character, as we will not require the police there for many years.

Buildings and grounds..... $33,500

Mr. JONES. Why should we pay money for the maintenance of Major's Hill park? We are doing a good deal for Ottawa. We have purchased the Orange hall, we have agreed to build a fire brigade station, and now we are called on to vote money for the park.

Mr. CHARLTON. Major's Hill is certainly a very beautiful spot, and I only regret that the financial state of the country is not such as to enable us to expend much money there, for it is an ornament to the city. Our public grounds are becoming more and more beautiful, and the plan the Government have evidently adopted is no doubt correct, but they need to exercise economy in these matters.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. We have been endeavoring to put the grounds at Major's Hill in good order. There are two hollows there, and when we get the water in it will improve the appearance. I have not had much money to expend, but we ask for small amounts each year, and are thus getting the work done by degrees.

Harbors and Rivers, Nova Scotia $126,912 98

Mr. MITCHELL. The first item is one involving an important principle, and I should like the Minister to state if it has been applied to the other Provinces. The vote reads:

Refund to the Government of Nova Scotia of expenditure incurred by them since 1st July, 1867, in connection with piers, breakwaters, public wharves, &c. considered to be of Federal importance..... $71,512 98

Has the same principle been applied to the Province of New Brunswick, because, if it has, I think we shall require further Supplementary Estimates to pay us for the money expended on breakwaters and other works.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This vote is for the purpose of recouping the Nova Scotia Government for payments on works of Federal importance. The Nova Scotia Government claimed that since Confederation they have expended large sums on public wharves, Federal wharves in reality, and, therefore, they asked to be reimbursed those amounts. They made a much larger claim than this is, and the Chief Engineer of the Department investigated the claim, and the result was a report showing the number of piers and breakwaters and works that can really be looked upon as Federal works. The others were considered as merely local works, and the cost could not be assumed by the Government. The expenditure made on those works considered to be Federal works was shown by proper vouchers to have been made.

Mr. MITCHELL. What I asked was whether the same principle had been applied to the Province of New Brunswick? If no, I think it should be applied; and we would like to know whether the hon. gentleman is going to apply the same principle to the other Provinces.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No such demand has been made by the New Brunswick Government, and I am pretty sure that they are not in the same position as the Nova Scotia Government, because this is an expenditure made by the Government in Nova Scotia since the 1st of July, 1867. If the New Brunswick Government have some breakwaters under the same circumstances, and if they make as good a case as Nova Scotia, I have no doubt they would be treated equally.

Mr. MITCHELL. I know all about the principle, and this is not the first time that application has been made for monies in connection with the wharves throughout Nova Scotia. I call attention to the fact that there are in New Brunswick similar wharves which ought to be declared Federal works, and on which the public money of New Brunswick has been expended; and the hon. gentleman may rely upon it that now that we know this principle is going to be applied New Brunswick will make an application. I think the Local Ministry are very remiss in not having done it, because as it is the first time that we have had this principle applied,—

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it was applied in Prince Edward Island before.

Mr. MITCHELL. Prince Edward Island always gets the start

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How does the hon. gentleman's Department define those words "of Federal importance?" They may be confined to large works, or extended to works of the most infinitesimal character.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Of course each work had to be examined specially for that purpose. For example, if it is a shipping place, if it is a breakwater that forms a shelter for vessels, it is considered a Federal work, and so with important piers, and so on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Does the Department lay down any qualification as to the size of the vessels? This a matter of considerable importance, because, unless a pretty stringent rule is laid down, it is clear that they will be extended ad infinitum.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. No, it cannot, because all these piers have been examined and this selection made. The others are left to the local authorities, so that this closes the matter altogether.

Mr. DAVIES (P.E.I.) I do not think that any arbitrary rule can be laid down. It must be left to some extent to the judgment of the gentleman who does the inspection. The hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell), is no doubt speaking in the interest of the Province of New Brunswick, but if he is he will not urge the Dominion Government to take over those piers. The best of our piers were taken over some years ago. The Government does not pretend to keep them in repair, and the result is that the people are without the accommodation that they used to have, and the hon. gentleman at the same time has largely increased the fees which were formerly exacted. It has not been a boon to the people, though it was a boon to the Local Government of that time, who were deeply in debt, and whom the hon. gentleman wished to assist.

Mr. JONES. The expenditure in the case of Nova Scotia is somewhat different from the wharves referred to by the hon. member for Queen's, P.E.I. (Mr. Davies), as it is for breakwaters, for the protection of our commerce, all round our coast, rather than for the accommodation of the ordinary business of the country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is outrageous that among all the millions which are being spent for this service the single application which I made for my county, and which was promised three years ago, should be rejected. I hope the Minister will reconsider this vote and put in $3,000 for Neguac.

Harbors and Rivers, Ontario $87,300

Mr. LISTER. I would remind the hon. Minister of Public Works of an interview which I had with him the other day, respecting a sand bar on the River St. Clair, opposite Point Edward. Since I spoke to him on the subject, a vessel loaded with coal struck on the sand bar, and her owners were put to great expense in getting her off, and, in addition, the vessel which helped to take her off the bar was seized by the Customs authorities. This sand bar has been getting larger day after a day and week after week, until it is now an absolute danger to navigation.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I have not lost sight of that and am taking measures with regard to it.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think this expenditure of $5,800 for settlement of claims for damages to property on McGregor's and Little Bear's Creeks is one that the Committee will do well to consider. I may say, for the information of the Committee, that, at the urgent solicitation of the former member for the county of Kent, the Government undertook to make improvements in McGregor's Creek, a small tributary of the River Thames at the town of Chatham. They undertook to deepen that creek by dredging it. The result was that the banks of the creek caved in and loosened the foundations of some buildings in the main street, without in the slightest degree improving the navigation of the creek, which was really of no value and could not be improved. The Government now come down and ask for $2,300 to pay for damages which they caused in that way.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I would like to call the Minister's attention to the fact that the harbor at Port Stanley is not in a good condition. The railway company are not taking that interest in it that they are bound by their agreement to do, and it is rapidly filling up. I am not asking the Government to incur any expense. All I wish is that they should insist on the railway company expending the full amount that they collect by way of harbor tolls, and carry out the agreement they made with the Government when they took possession of the harbor.

Mr. CASEY. I can corroborate the statement of my hon. friend with regard to Port Stanley. It is just on the boundary—between our ridings. I examined the harbor carefully last summer, and I found that the harbor was filling up so rapidly that vessels had not room to turn around in the basin, which fills up with mud every spring from the creek that runs through it. The piers are also becoming very rotten, and the whole harbor is in a most ruinous condition. The railway company, as my hon. friend states, have a lease of the harbor from the Government, and are bound to spend all the revenues of the harbor in keeping it in repair. I am afraid they have not done so. But the revenues of the harbor have run down of late, owing to two causes—first, the National Policy, which has stopped the importation of fruit at Port Stanley, and, secondly, to the policy of the railway company who have stopped the importation of coal, which used to go that way to London, and force it to take the long haul to London from Detroit. It is the duty of the Government to see that the agreement is carried out, and if the revenues of the harbor are not sufficient to keep it in repair, it is the duty of the Government to see that enough is expended to place it in proper condition.

Slides and Booms $11,400

Mr. CHARLTON. I beg to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the appropriation of $2,000 for Quinze Rapids on the Upper Ottawa. This sum is entirely insufficient to accomplish any useful purpose. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is acquainted with the locality or the necessity of improvements there. These rapids form the only obstruction to navigation between Grand Lake and Lake Témiscamingue, and the opening of that stretch would open a great timber expanse of the Upper Ottawa. The work is a very important one, and it would take five or six times as much as this vote to accomplish the object.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Some $3,000 or $4,000 were expended there two years ago, and I was under the impression that this additional sum of $2,000 would be sufficient. But I have had representations made to me since these Estimates have been laid before the House, and I see that instead of this being sufficient for the work, it may require $10,000 or $12,000. However, if we see that more is required, we can arrange it for next Session.

Mr. BRYSON. This is a matter of great importance to the lumbermen in that section of the country. As the hon. member for North Norfolk has pointed out, these rapids form the only obstruction in the Ottawa River between Lake Témiscamingue and the sources of the Ottawa, and by opening up that he would facilitate the passage of timber all the way from Grand Lake to Lake Témiscamingue, opening up 2,000 or 3,000 miles of territory which is now held under timber license. The lumbermen of that section will be making demands on the Minister at an early date to see that it is improved.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is this vote of $400 to pay Mr. Palen for work done on the Gatineau booms in 1874?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. This matter was investigated by the Senate, and a report was made by a committee of the Senate, expressing the opinion that Mr. Palen should be paid. He has received only $600, and the Auditor General thought we should have a vote to pay the balance.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is a very doubtful and questionable thing that the money of the country could be paid on the recommendation of the Senate. I do not think the Senate have any business to investigate claims against the public. That ought to be done, if done at all, by the Government. Although the subject is a small one, hardly worth noticing, I object that a Senate committee should sit on claims against the Government, and that, on its report, even so small an amount should be paid. They are travelling out of their jurisdiction in acting as a committee of investigation, or rather as a court of claim, for the Dominion.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The Government, after looking into this matter, paid $600 several years ago, believing that the amount was due, and after looking at it since, finding $400 were not paid and were due, they put this item in the Estimates.

For repairs to hull and engine of steamer Northern Light and a new boiler.....$20,000

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) The Government should build a new steamer and not patch up this vessel. It will be a great disappointment to the whole Province that this old steamer should be again put on the route.

Mr. FOSTER. My officers report that when she is repaired she will be as good as now.

Mr. DAVIES. That is not possible. The Local Government, who are in accord with the Government of the Dominion, have presented a claim for some millions of dollars, because the Dominion Government have not carried out their contract as regards the Northern Light. It is all nonsense for the Government to talk of carrying out the contract as they did in the past, because the Northern Light is not fitted for the work. This shows a lamentable want of energy on the part of the Government.

Supplement to Revised Statutes..... $1,500

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). That makes the cost of the Revised Statutes over $100,000.

Mr. THOMPSON. This is not in connection with the Revised Statutes which have already appeared, but in connection with the other volume which is nearly ready.

Roads, bridges, &c., at the Hot Springs reservation near Banff Station, N. W. T..... $15,000

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) Is that additional?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). It is for next year. The superintendent asked for much more, but we are taking a vote practically for the construction of a road to Devil's Head Lake, a distance of seven miles.

Clothing and maintenance of patients from the North-West Territories in the Manitoba Asylum for the insane..... $4,788

Mr. DAVIES (P. E. I.) How is this estimate arrived at? Is it so much per head?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). From 1877 to 1885-86 the smallest amount appropriated in any year for the government of Keewatin was $5,000. For several years a considerable proportion of this sum was found to be requisite for service; and at the suggestion of the Auditor General it was cut down to $1,500. If the accounts, to pay which this item is necessary, had been rendered promptly the appropriation would not have been reduced in the manner mentioned—at least for 1886-87. There has been, however, a great increase in the number of insane patients from the District of Keewatin in the Manitoba Asylum, there having been nine during the year 1885-86, and eleven during the current year 1886-87. It may be mentioned that up to the 20th of February, 1885, these patients were confined and treated in the lunatic ward of the Manitoba Penitentiary; but since that time they have been maintained in the Manitoba Asylum for the Insane.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). We ought to have some further information on this subject, for really I do not know where the hon. gentleman gets his inhabitants. There are no people in the district of Keewatin, as far as I know, except the Indian population. The white population of that district were at the settlement of Rat Portage, which is now in the Province of Ontario, and at the Icelandic settlement at Gimli which is now included in Manitoba since the extension of the boundaries. Now, there is not a single white settlement in Keewatin.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I suppose the hon. gentleman knows that there are half-breed is there.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not.

Dr. Rand's Micmac Dictionary.....$1,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What has that cost us altogether?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There was $1,000 voted before, and this is to complete the publication of the work.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It may have an anti-quarian interest.

Histoire Géologique des Familles Françaises$1,000

Mr. DAVIES. What is that? What is the public interest in that?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. That has been published for the last four years. It is a work on the origins of the French Canadians, published by the Abbé Tanguay. It is a work of great merit, and Parliament has voted $1,000 for the publication of each volume. I have no doubt, if the hon. gentleman looks at the work itself, he will see its value.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is a very interesting collection.

Mr. PLATT. It may be an interesting collection, but are those who read and receive that work not able to pay for it themselves? There appears to be some $4,000 or $5,000 paid for printing these works, and it seems to me that it is simply a sop to the printers or publishers, as the public have no interest in these works.

Bartlett's work on the coal and iron productions of the Dominion, 1,500 copies..... $1,000

Mr. JONES. What is this?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is a work which has been distributed. 750 copies have been distributed, and the rest will be distributed.

Mr. JONES. If it was intended to convince the people that there would be an advantage in increasing the iron duties, 50, or 60, or 70 per cent., I think it should be paid for by those in whose interests it was made.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will read this work it will satisfy him that it contains a great deal of information. A thousand dollars barely covers the cost of printing, the compiler receives nothing whatever.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What I have seen of this work does not impress me very highly. It struck me as being simply a puff or advertising of divers coal and iron mines, and not written in a way calculated to impress persons of sober judgment with a great opinion of the author's services. If this is to be paid for, it ought to be paid by the owners of coal and iron mines.

Mr. BROWN. A number of my constituents have applied to me for copies of that book, and after having received it they pronounced it one of the most valuable works in connection with the iron industries, that has ever been produced in Canada. I have to bear testimony on behalf of men who do use their sober judgment in Hamilton, a city having large industries in iron.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I dare say that men who are going to make 100 per cent. out of the duties which have been imposed, will regard the book as very valuable.

To pay Mr. Dunscomb, services rendered in connection with the search and seizure of the Atalaya in 1870.....$490 06

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This goes back for 17 years. I know Mr. Dunscomb to be a good officer, and I dare say there may be some justification for it, but to go back 17 years to pay a claim does appear to me out of reason.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If it is due, the sooner it is paid the better.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If this claim was just, it should have been investigated and paid before.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. He has been trying to get it from the Imperial Government.

Mr. THOMPSON. I may explain that the services of Mr. Dunscomb were rendered under the direction of one of my predecessors. I think there is a mistake in the date, 1870 should be 1879, because he was directed to perform these duties by the present Chief Justice of Nova Scotia. The circumstances were that direction came from the Imperial Government to have this ship and her cargo seized. Mr. Dunscomb was entrusted with that duty, and in discharging that duty, and during the detention of the vessel and cargo, he incurred a very considerable amount of expense.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There was a Spanish vessel believed to be fitted out as a filibuster to attack Cuba.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I remember the case now. But certainly the estimate ought to be more carefully drawn.

Mr. THOMPSON. After a considerable time Mr. Dunscomb was paid by the Imperial Government for searching the vessel, but he was paid nothing in interest on those disbursements that he had made, and nothing for his own services.

Territorial Accounts..... $524,754 45

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Grant to officers of the Department of Militia and Defence for extra services in the rebellion, $2,925—What are the circumstances under which the hon. gentleman recommends this?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I need not recall to the memory of hon. members that these officers during the troubles worked very hard indeed, and rendered services which require some recognition. I made a recommendation to

Mr. JONES.

Council asking that three months' extra salary be paid those different officers whose names appeared in the Estimates.

Mr. JONES. Is it for the present year or last year?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. For next year.

Mr. JONES. The services in connection with the North-West rebellion are now over.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I waited after they were over to propose this recommendation.

Mr. JONES. Was there any vote previous to this?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. No.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). The hon. gentleman should tell the Committee how the sum of $513,000 is to be expended. We have had a great many final settlements as regards the North-West rebellion, and yet we are now asked to vote upwards of half a million dollars at three o'clock in the morning.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). The hon. gentleman knows that a commission was appointed to enquire into the losses of settlers and merchants arising out of the rebellion. The commission visited various parts of the North-West. They have prepared their report—I have not received the full report, although I have received a preliminary report. The applications before them amounted to $1,250,000. They have gone very carefully over them upon principles which they have laid down, and they have determined that this amount of $513,000 should be paid as losses suffered by merchants and settlers.

Mr. JONES. Is this final?

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). This is final. The only reason why we do not bring down the list is, that I think we should have an opportunity of looking at the report before the figures are given; but the moment the report is received the statement will be submitted to Council, and the amounts will be paid in the ordinary way.

Mr. MILLS. That report ought to have been submitted to this House. This is a large appropriation and the House is called upon to assume the responsibility of making it.

Mr. WHITE (Cardwell). I have done my best to obtain the report, but it is not desirable to submit the preliminary list until I have had an opportunity of going over the evidence and ascertaining on what principle the commission have acted.

Publication of Proceedings of the Royal Society..... $5,000

Mr. DAVIES. I do not think there are $5,000 in the whole Estimates more thrown away than is this money.

Mr. MITCHELL. They say there was a little history about this matter. At first the item was omitted, but a good deal of pressure was brought to bear on the Government to have it inserted.

Committee rose and reported resolutions.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved that when the House adjourns it stand adjourned until 10:30 to day (Thursday).

Motion agreed to.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD moved the adjournment of the House.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 3:10 a.m. (Thursday).

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, 23rd June, 1887.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at 10.30 a.m.

PRAYERS.

REPORTS OF THE DEBATES OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. COLBY moved the adoption of the first and second reports of the Joint Committee of the Library. He said: The chief recommendation of the committee—I was engaged in other committees at the time and was not able to attend it—was that the reports of the House prior to the publication of Hansard, which now exists in a permanent form, be gathered together and reprinted, and that the whole series of Hansard be indexed from the commencement after that publication has been done.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Is there any recommendation in the report about the reorganisation of the staff?

Mr. COLBY. No.

Mr. SCRIVER. I understand the cost of indexing will be $10,000, besides the cost of printing the volumes.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. There is no item in the Supply Bill to cover this proposed expenditure. It is not customary for the House to adopt a report which involves the expenditure of money without the recommendation of the Crown. If we adopt the report the result will be an expenditure of probably $10,000.

Mr. SCRIVER. For indexing alone.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. Under these circumstances, it would be better to leave the adoption of the report over. No harm would be done by waiting a few months, and then the Government, after considering the matter during recess, might come down next Session with a vote for this purpose.

Mr. SPEAKER. At the last meeting of the committee it was ascertained that the cost of indexing would be about $2,700—we had a tender for that sum—and the printing of the portion of Hansard from 1867 to 1874, which is now in scrap book form, would cost from $6,000 to $7,000. So that the total cost would be about $10,000.

Mr. SCRIVER. That was the cost of indexing.

Mr. SPEAKER. Not only for the indexing, but for the printing of the Hansard itself.

Mr. SCRIVER. I did not understand that.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. The report of the Joint Committee on the Library is now before the House. We now know exactly what the suggestions are. It will be the better course to let it stand, and it will be sufficient notice to the Government, if they think a vote should be asked from Parliament for that purpose, to bring a vote down next Session. This is the course generally followed when it involves a sum of money.

ENQUIRIES FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PERLEY (Assiniboia). In an early stage of this Session I asked for a certain return of lands sold by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to certain parties in the North-West Territories. I have been unable to obtain that return, and it is now too late to serve the purpose I intended. I wish to impress upon the Minister the very great importance of this matter, and to ask him to have it brought down this Session. It is no child's play; I am not asking the question or moving in the matter for the purpose of securing popularity, but for the purpose of relieving a very great wrong and injustice to the people of that country.

Mr. MITCHELL. I asked for some information the other day from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. He promised to let me know the causes of the discharge of William Dalton, and through whose influence he was discharged.

Mr. FOSTER. I have not anything to add particularly to what I said yesterday. Dalton was simply a temporary employé. For several years he had been sent down to the lightship on the Miramichi river, and he received so much per day for his work. This year there were other applicants as well as Dalton. In some way or other, without my knowledge, Dalton received orders to go to the lightship. Afterwards I had the order recalled, and the order was recalled before Dalton got to the lightship.

Mr. MITCHELL. By whose influence was Dalton discharged?

Mr. FOSTER. That was a departmental matter. I take the responsibility on myself.

Mr. MITCHELL. Was there any fault found with Dalton?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think there was.

Mr. MITCHELL. I want to know who is at the bottom of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose I will have to look upon myself as responsible for it.

Mr. MITCHELL. I quite understand that. But I want to know upon whose recommendation Dalton was recalled from service after having had for ten days orders to go?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it is necessary to mention the recommendation.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think it is. Hon. members are entitled to this information, and I think I have a right to it.

Mr. FOSTER. If the hon. gentleman will put a notice on the paper next Session I will bring down the papers connected with the matter.

Mr. MITCHELL. I will, if I am here. The House should have that information. I have treated the hon. gentleman fairly and I am entitled to the information. The Minister may take the responsibility of refusing the papers now if he likes.

SUBSIDIES IN AID OF RAILWAYS.

Mr. POPE moved that the House resolve itself into Committee to consider certain proposed resolutions (p. 1,142) respecting the granting of subsidies to railway companies, and towards the construction of railways therein mentioned.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I presume that the hon. gentleman is prepared with the information we have several times asked for, and which has been very imperfectly furnished, regarding the names of the parties applying, and the other information upon which he is proceeding in making these grants.

Mr. POPE. The applications have been laid on the Table, and I will give the information on each item as far as I can when it comes before the committee.

Motion agreed to, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. POPE. I have every confidence that the principle of granting these subsidies, which has been approved of time and again by this House, will be approved of on this occasion, and for that reason it is unnecessary for me to make many general remarks upon these grants. The Government found themselves in this position: that they were asked for very large amounts and were able only to give very little in comparison to the amount asked. The larger portion of the grants are for the extension of roads already begun, or incomplete, or to make connecting links, or to enable roads to get longer distances. When this system was adopted in 1882, it was stated that our object was to build interprovincial roads, or long lines of railway that naturally, as we thought, came under the jurisdiction of this Parliament. We have gradually extended that system, and I have come to the opinion that the Local Governments ought not to involve themselves in giving subsidies very largely to railways; and we have felt that that duty devolved upon us, as far as we could fulfil it, of aiding not only the longer or interprovincial lines, but the local roads. For instance, in the Province of Quebec this system has been found to be of very great advantage, in opening up new fields for settlement, as the people there will not go to the great North-West, but would rather go to the manufacturing centres of New England. Under these circumstances, I think it is unnecessary to go further into the general question.

Mr. McMULLEN. I have to express my regret that the Government have decided to continue, in a new Parliament, the policy of subsidising short lines of railway, in the present financial condition of the country, when every sensible man must see that these grants will lead to increased taxation and increased debt; and, after having had two deficits in succession, I say it is imprudent on the part of the Government to start out on this career of demoralisation which is going to be inaugurated by these resolutions. The object of the Government undoubtedly is to delude the electors, particularly in constituencies where protests have been entered, into the belief that it is in their interest to support the Government. The Government has even got down so far as to subsidise lines $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles long. Though I admit that it would be reasonable and desirable that the country should be opened up, and that railways should be aided where at present there is no railway accommodation at all, I think that in many of these places where there is competition already, this is a barefaced act on the part of the Government to try and control the constituencies from year to year. I notice there are 38 roads altogether, and of these there are thirteen under 12 miles, and seven of 6 miles and under. We have come to such a point that if a man wants a short road to his mill or factory, he will only have to apply to the Finance Minister for aid, and no doubt, if he could show that it would aid in the support of the Government, I have no doubt it would be granted. This policy of granting aid to these short lines, in our present financial condition, shows to what desperation the hon. gentlemen are driven. When the Ontario Government inaugurated the policy of granting aid to railways, they laid down the condition that the roads should not run where there was accommodation already, and that there should be a certain local financial basis for those railways. They would not give any aid, nor would they countenance any scheme that did not first show a financial basis in the shape of municipal aid. That was a prudent course to adopt, but we find a different course adopted here. A man comes from a constituency in which he has a narrow majority, and he gets up a railway scheme—some branch of an existing system, some little switch or some little job of that sort—and he comes to the Government and asks them for aid for that scheme in order to strengthen his prospects in the constituency. Constituency after constituency is treated in this way. We have had in Parliament this year an exhibition that ought to be sufficient to open the eyes of any beholder. Any member who had a charter on hand received the consideration of the Railway Committee and the House; in many cases charters have been granted that did not stipulate from what point the proposed railway was intended to start, where it was going to, or what particular district the road was intended to traverse. I am glad to know that a change is to be made in that practice, and that the House will not be asked in future to put up with the indefiniteness with which we have granted charters during the present year. I have no doubt that many of these schemes are intended to secure competition, if possible; but in many such cases subsidies are sought in order to secure competition which the trade of the district is not sufficient to sustain. In many cases the trade is not sufficient to pay the running expenses of the existing road. No doubt the two great competing lines of this country are very anxious to reach points where perhaps one has the control of the trade. I know a place myself where there are two competing lines, and yet you cannot ship a car load of stuff from that competing point east or west at as low a rate as you can from points where there is no competition. I know several cases of this kind in western Ontario. So it cannot be for the sake of competition that the Government are adopting this system, but because they consider it necessary, in their own interest, for the sake of their political life, to strengthen their small majority in every way they can, and it does not matter to them how much they add to the debt of the country so long as we can borrow, and so long as the people will bear the burden of the additional taxes which they lay upon them. The people of this country have been deceived and misled. They were deceived in the last election, and they were deceived prior to the last election. This system of granting aid to all sorts of railway schemes was introduced years ago for the purpose of deceiving the people. During the last election representations were made by hon. gentlemen opposite which were not sustained by facts. The hon. Minister of Interior came to my own constituency and made a statement that the facts would not bear out. He stated that the net debt was \$196,000,000, when it was really \$223,000,000. He stated in my own town that the per capita interest was \$1.65, and made a comparison with the per capita interest that existed at the time of the Mackenzie Government. I know, and he knows in his own soul, that the statement he made on that occasion was not true. He tried to mislead the people of this country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

The CHAIRMAN. That language is not admissible.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The hon. gentleman says that a member made a statement that he knows is not true. That is not in order.

Mr. McMULLEN. He made it outside of the House. I make the statement in the House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. That makes no difference.

Mr. McMULLEN. I am quite willing to withdraw the statement.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Whether a statement is made outside or inside of the House, I hold that the hon. gentleman is bound by parliamentary rules, and I appeal to the Chairman.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was going to come within parliamentary rules if the hon. gentleman had let me.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I say the hon. gentleman is out of order, and I want your decision, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McMULLEN. I withdraw the statement, and I am exceedingly sorry that the English language does not afford another to take its place. I was saying that the hon. gentleman had stated that the interest charged was $1.65 per head at that date, when he should have said that it was over $1.93 per head. I say that the recent elections were carried by statements which were not in accordance with facts, and the Government, in order to perpetuate their existence, are resorting to these railway schemes. If the Government, instead of increasing the indebtedness of the country, had asked this House to vote 10,000,000 acres of land in the North-West to provide for subsidies to companies that would undertake to build railways in the older Provinces where they are needed, I would not have had any serious objection to it. But they are not doing this. They are asking the people of this country to grant money for which they will have to submit to taxation. The hon. Minister of Finance has inaugurated a new tariff from which he no doubt expects to receive a very large revenue, and I have no doubt he will. I have no doubt he or his successor will come next year and will say: that he is very glad to announce to the House a large surplus, and from that he will contribute to the construction of more railways. But I say it is unfair to the farming community of this country, who are going to suffer severely under this tariff. I could not permit, without making my solemn protest against it, this system of debauchery which has been inaugurated by hon. gentlemen opposite to be carried on for the purpose of keeping the Government in power. It is evident Toryism will live in this country so long as the resources of the country are sufficient to buy out constituencies. So long as Toryism has existence, so long will the people have to submit to exactions to keep hon. gentlemen opposite where they are; but the people are beginning to wake up to this system, which is nothing short of a barefaced attempt to buy up constituencies and demoralise the people. We have been on the downward path since 1878. I know statements are made that the people are better off; but go into the country from township to township, and ask the farmers how they stand, and you will find they are beginning to realise they are not as well off as they were, and that there is something wrong somewhere. I admit hon. gentlemen opposite have been able in the past to draw the veil over the eyes of the people; they did so very successfully at the last elections, though I am confident that the hon. the First Minister, in his inner consciousness, expected on the 22nd February to be defeated. He knew that his course had been such as to merit condemnation at the hands of the people, and if it had not been for the deceit, treachery and fraud practiced by hon. gentlemen opposite on the people, they would not sit where they are now. Were it not for such schemes as the gerrymander scheme, the Franchise Bill and others, hon. gentlemen opposite would not be where they are. I enter my solemn protest—

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I wish to call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the extremely disorderly conduct of some hon. members opposite. My hon. friend is perfectly right. These things ought to have been presented to us for discussion at an earlier period, and he is undoubtedly justified in calling attention to the important facts connected with the financial position of the country, when we are about to grant large sums of money. If the First Minister and the Minister of Finance desire to facilitate business, they will join with me in insisting that order prevails; they ought to know from old experience, that my hon. friend is sure to say what he wants to say.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the hon. member for South Oxford that business will be expedited if the hon. gentleman is allowed to express his views without interruption. We all want to get away; perhaps the hon. gentleman does not. There are limits to endurance. If the hon. gentleman uses insulting language, that does no good to anybody, that kind of language will be resented. It does no good, and certainly does not elevate the hon. gentleman in the opinion either of this House or of the people outside. I hope hon. gentlemen on this side will allow the hon. gentleman to make such remarks as he likes, after his own fashion, in his own eloquent way; and if he commits any parliamentary breach, to which he is rather inclined, I have no doubt you, Mr. Chairman, will keep him in order.

Mr. McMULLEN. I was about concluding my remarks, were it not for the interruptions. The hon. gentleman has referred to unparliamentary remarks. I am sorry to say politics have reached a point in the country that renders it almost impossible for a man to keep within the words admitted as parliamentary, and yet give expression to his views on the outrageous facts that come before us in the discussion of public business. In dealing with those facts and with the history of the hon. gentlemen opposite, it is difficult to refrain from using expressions that suit the circumstances, and which we are sorry to find parliamentary usage will not warrant. The course of the hon. gentlemen opposite in dealing with these subsidies is not a proper course under the circumstances. We have just emerged from a war within the North-West, yet in a few seconds we passed an amount of $500,000 to balance the expenses connected with that unfortunate affair. From beginning to end, that affair showed that had hon. gentlemen opposite discharged their duty, the debt of the country would not be to-day within $6,000,000 or $8,000,000 of what it really is, and in order to hide from the people the true inwardness of the whole business, they pay money out of one pocket and put it in the other. A point has been reached in the history of this country that is to be deplored by every lover of his country. I must express my sincere regret, in the interests of this country, in the interests of the people who sent me here, in the interests of the generation who will come after us, that we are going to leave to a free country such a legacy of indebtedness, such an enormous burden, that it will weigh upon them and upon their resources for years and years after hon. gentlemen who are now here have ceased to discharge the duties they are now discharging; and, in place of those who follow us looking back with pride upon the past history of the country, they will mourn and bewail the unfortunate degradation and ruin that characterised the acts of those who are now discharging the duties of representatives of the people.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I am glad to see that the words of my hon. friend have had some effect even on the hardened consciences of hon. gentlemen opposite. I want to call the attention of the committee to the position in which we are placed on this side of the House. These resolutions were laid on the Table late on Tuesday night. On Tuesday night we were kept in committee up to about half-past three in the morning. Now, does any hon. gentleman suppose that members on this side of the House can, by any possibility, have had time to examine and study the bearing of the papers in regard to these railroads, when they were laid on the Table on Tuesday night, when we sat up to half-past three in the morning, and had to commence again at one o'clock yesterday and sit till three o'clock in the morning. There is some rule and some reason that ought to be observed in these things. I cannot pretend, I do not pretend, no human being will pretend on this side to discuss these proposals intelligently and fairly as they ought to be discussed. We will have to content ourselves with such scraps and such a modicum of information as may be doled out to us by hon. gentlemen opposite, and we have no opportunity, nor has the country any opportunity to test the information given to us by hon. gentlemen in regard to these matters. That is not the way in which public business ought to be conducted, and I for one must protest against it and disclaim all responsibility about the passage of any of these matters. It is quite true that, if I had had the power, I would have stopped these proceedings from the start. I disapprove of the system, and I think it is very clear, even looking at this very proposal that the hon. gentlemen have introduced, a system of railway grants which will, in my judgment, lead to a complete revision of the financial basis of Confederation, in regard to the position of the several Provinces. Take this in connection with the grant which was made the other day to Prince Edward Island, and the reasons which were assigned for it. I pointed out at the time that the propositions laid down in the Order in Council would inevitably open the door to all sorts of demands from the other Provinces, and those demands will come, there is no doubt, in good time and in a very short time. Here, apparently, the system which has been already inaugurated has been extended in such a fashion that I do not believe it would be possible now to construct a siding in any part of this Dominion, for which a precedent for a parliamentary grant could not be found. I look at these resolutions, and I see a grant for one road of five miles; I see a grant, a little lower down, to another road—the Joggins road, wherever that may be—for a mile and a quarter, and I see a whole series of little grants—some of them may be, as the hon. the Minister states, extensions—but it does appear to me that the propositions submitted to us are running the whole system into the ground. I cannot, for the life of me, conceive how the hon. gentleman can justify the grants to these roads as roads of Federal importance, or which, under any fair construction of the railway policy, or even by themselves, can come to us and demand assistance. But what is more important is this: We know that the various Provinces throughout this Dominion have granted severally very considerable sums, though varying very much in amount, to railway enterprises within their borders. I have before this warned the Government, and I again warn them now, that most assuredly the Provinces will not be content until some fair readjustment takes place, so that all those which have advanced sums in aid of railways may be recouped in proportion. I say that the whole spirit of this scheme is entirely opposed to the Federal system under which we live, and I say more, that the Province of Ontario, which receives a very small proportion of these subsidies, having regard to its population and the grants which are made to other Provinces, will undoubtedly prefer a demand, and will have a right to prefer a demand, that it should be compensated, and that the various municipalities in that Province should be compensated for the sums which they have advanced. Now, bearing in mind the debt we have already incurred, it is clear to me that in one shape or another these various grants will involve other grants to ten-fold at least, or it may be twenty-fold the amount proposed to be given here, before we see the end of this system. As to this first item, I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the fact that, in these papers which have been laid on the Table, as I have said, only last Tuesday, there does not appear to be any detailed information as to who the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company really are, what they have done, what reason the Government have to suppose that, if this subsidy is granted, the line will be completed. I do not know much about the road, but I wish the Minister of Railways to give us a short statement, which these papers do not appear to contain, of the various facts connected with the road, and the grounds which have moved him to make this grant; because I suppose the hon. gentleman has not quite laid down the rule that he is going to recommend $3,200 a mile to be granted to anybody who asks for it, no matter whether there is the smallest possibility that the road will be constructed or not. If the hon. gentleman is going to lay down that rule, it would be well that we should know it. It would have the merit, at least, of being distinct and clear, and of affording equal facilities to everybody; but I do not understand that to be yet the policy of the hon. gentleman, and so I want him to explain, if he knows, who this company are, what they have done, what they propose to do, and his grounds for supposing that this grant will be made use of for the construction of these 12 miles.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not propose to detain the House at any length at so late a period of the Session, but I think I must relieve the mind of the hon. gentleman opposite of the apprehension he seems to feel that this Government is inaugurating, or has inaugurated a very dangerous policy in regard to this matter. I suppose the hon. gentleman will be very much surprised if I tell him that he is responsible, and the Government of which he was a member are responsible, for the policy as it now stands before the House.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. No, Sir.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will allow me to explain what I mean. I am not charging that as a matter of reproach to the hon. gentleman, but I credit him with it, as I think the country should credit the hon. gentleman and the Government of which he was a member with the inauguration of this policy. Even in regard to the very objections which he has taken to the resolutions which are now before the House, I will show that he himself specially, and the Government of which he was a member are responsible. I do not say this as a matter of reproach, because I say it was a credit to them that they adopted that policy, that they did it in the interests of the country, and that it was eminently in the interests of the country. They found that a number of parties in various sections of the country, and notably in the Maritime Provinces, were engaged in the construction of small branch lines of railway which they believed would open up traffic, and, if constructed, would develop the country, and would be of advantage to the country. They found that these parties were not able to carry out these railways, that they had not the means of efficiently carrying out that policy of constructing short branch lines of railway, and the hon. gentleman came to their assistance, and very properly, by adopting the policy of loaning them old rails.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Well, will the hon. gentleman allow me? I do not think he will find any cause for merriment in it. I say, Sir, there is the policy, there is the policy you have before you to-day. It was the policy of the Federal Government coming to the assistance, not of interprovincial lines of railway, not of great trunk lines, but coming to the assistance of small and struggling companies. I say that the hon. gentleman cannot escape the position I put him in, that he considered it his duty, and rightly so, to develop the trade and business of the country by aiding these feeble companies to construct small branch lines of railway. If the hon. gentleman will turn back to the record, he will find that road after road of that description, small branch lines of railway, were assisted by him in the most efficient way that he could do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Not a dollar of money.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. But I tell him that when he gave a thousand tons of rails to a company, he gave them money's worth.

Mr. MACKENZIE. The rails were not given, they were only loaned.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I quite admit that, and my hon. friend will see that I am taking no exception to what he did. I am proving that what he did was a wise policy in assisting in the most effective way he could these small branch lines that he found were unable, with the means at their disposal, to complete their roads efficiently, to iron them and furnish them with rails and fish-plates and the means of putting the roads into operation. I am quite willing to admit it was a loan, but the hon. gentleman knows that it was a loan, practically, in perpetuity. That was the condition of things that we found. We have followed the hon. gentleman's policy, as we have always followed the hon. gentleman in everything which we believed was a good example for the Government to follow.

Mr. MACKENZIE. When you did not follow me you went wrong.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It is very likely that we may have been wrong in some instances, but that must have been from a want of intelligence on our part, and the hon. gentleman knows we are not responsible for that; and if we could not see eye to eye with the hon. gentleman in all respects, he must give us credit for having followed him whenever we came to the conclusion that he had set us a good example. Now, Sir, that is the foundation of this policy, this wise and judicious policy that is now before the House. The hon. gentleman says there is a line of a mile and a-half in these resolutions. So there is. But that, also, is following the hon. gentleman's policy. In one case where a road was completed and in operation, a road five miles long, leading to a coal mine, the hon. gentleman furnished that company with new steel rails at the public expense, and laid the track for them, in order to take that road to a coal mine.

Mr. MACKENZIE. In order to benefit the Intercolonial Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was to connect a coal mine in the county I have the honor to represent, the Spring Hill coal mine, with the Intercolonial Railway, for the purpose of facilitating traffic and obtaining coal on the best terms he could for the use of the Intercolonial Railway. It was a wise and good policy, and if it was good in that case, is it not equally a good policy for my hon. friend behind me to subsidise the Joggins Coal Mining Company in the same way, to the extent of furnishing $3,200 a mile to provide a superstructure for the company at the Joggins, and to bring the company into competition with the Spring Hill Company, and not leave the Intercolonial Railway dependent altogether on the Spring Hill coal mine? The hon. gentleman will see that in subsidising the Joggins Railway Company in the same way that he subsidised the Spring Hill Company, the same public interest is at stake, and the same good is accomplished for the country. But when the subsidy that was taken last year came to be applied, it was represented by the company, largely composed of leading gentlemen, many of them supporters of the hon. gentleman from St. John's, that an additional subsidy was required for the mile and a quarter that was necessary to complete that line of railway. Now, there is the whole policy. I say it is a sound policy; I say that no expenditure this Government can make, provided it is judiciously done, there is nothing that will lighten the taxes upon the people of this country more than a judicious appropriation to assist great and important railway enterprises, in order to open up the traffic and to develop the trade of the country. When we expanded this principle, that instead of furnishing or loaning rails, we should grant a subsidy equal to the superstructure of the road, to ironing it with rails, by a grant of $3,200 a mile, we did it upon this principle: that wherever an assistance of $3,200 a mile would attract from private sources the additional capital to complete the road, we had the best evidence of the advantage of its construction, and that it would so increase the trade and business of the country as would increase the revenue to a larger extent than would pay the interest on $3,200 a mile. Now, that was the ground on which this policy was extended. I say that I believe a wiser appropriation of public money was never made. Now, the hon. gentleman seems to think that this is a matter that should rather fall upon the Local Legislatures, in providing for these local roads. I have shown that that was not his policy. I give him credit for wisdom in adopting the course he did; but I go further, and I say that among the difficulties in which Confederation is involved at this moment, the principal difficulty is the want of means of some of the Local Legislatures to carry on the business of the Provinces, with the subsidies and the local revenues. They have not had the means to subsidise railways; they have had to use the money that was, under Confederation, intended to provide for other services, such as roads, bridges, education and things of that kind. It has involved them in difficulties, and from this reason has arisen the necessity of subsidising local roads. We have a direct interest in subsidising local roads; we have a direct interest in every mile of railway we build, because it increases the trade and business of the country, and these increase the revenue which comes to us. But if the construction of a road by the aid of the Local Legislature doubles the revenue of the Province, not one shilling of it inures to the Local Government whose treasury has been depleted in order to bring about that result. There is the whole question, I think, in a nut shell. I do not see that it can be opposed. I do not mean to say that errors may not have been committed in applying the policy, and that it might not have been applied more judiciously, but I say that if every shilling of this appropriation was called for—and that has not been our experience—I doubt if the whole $1,700,000 will be expended—it would conduce more to the progress and prosperity of Canada than by appropriating it in the way that has been described. While I entirely disagree with very many of the statements made by the hon. member for North Wellington (Mr. McMullen), I entirely concur with one statement, viz: that you could injure the country instead of benefiting it by promoting railway companies where there is not enough business for the roads that exist already. It is by assisting in the construction of branch lines, or of short pieces of roads to connect existing railways, that appropriations are valuable. If you expend this money in promoting competition, by the construction of roads not needed to do the business of the country, you will be doing injustice both to the country and the enterprises already in operation.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I must congratulate the hon. gentleman on having an amount of confidence which no other human being possesses. No one but the hon. gentleman would have proceeded to justify a policy, which was announced with a great flourish of trumpets as a new departure, and most emphatically a new departure it was, involving the addition of very many millions to the public debt, on the ground that the hon. member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie) had loaned a parcel of worn-out iron rails, which he could not sell, to two or three little branch roads in Nova Scotia, thirteen or fourteen years ago. I must say that if that is the precedent on which the hon. gentleman rests his action, I do not know a more absurd precedent, if the hon. gentleman will excuse me for saying so, ever presented in justification of a great policy.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was stated at the time this very policy was proposed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It was not proposed by the hon. gentleman who loaned a parcel of old worn out iron rails to small lines in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. It is absurd to propose this as a justification, and I decline to accept the credit bestowed on the hon. gentleman or myself in connection with this system of subsidy. There is no possible connection between the matters; and a public man of the ability which the Minister of Finance possesses can hardly have formed so low an opinion of the intelligence of both sides of the House as to gravely propose that as a justification. If the hon. gentleman be correct in saying that his object is to improve traffic, particularly as regards the Intercolonial Railway, I hope he will be more successful in the future than in the past, for, judging from the returns laid on the Table the other day, the position of the Intercolonial, after all those grants for additional roads, is growing very rapidly worse.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The traffic is not declining.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The expenses of working are increasing.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is another question altogether.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is an enormous deficiency on the first ten months of the current year.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is very exceptional.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If you take the enormous sums charged to capital, and if you add the deficits, and, further, the enormous amount of capital sunk by hon. gentlemen on those various operations on which we have a large interest to pay yearly, I say the position is far from satisfactory. I have not touched the main objection I take to this whole business, and that is: you will most assuredly be compelled to meet the claim of the various Provinces, some of which have invested enormous sums in railway undertakings.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. They are met by the resolutions.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I say they are not met by the resolutions. Here you give $300,000 or $400,000 to Ontario, with a population of two millions. That is not a fair proportion under the resolutions before us. In addition, millions have been granted, or are to be granted under other resolutions laid before the House at an earlier period.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will examine the others he will find that the amounts are pretty equal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I do not see so. I do not think that if these grants are to be made Ontario has received anything like the amount to which it is entitled. The point is one which will most assuredly be brought up to us from time to time. It is clear that once you depart from the wise and correct rule of only granting the assistance of the Federal Parliament to objects really and truly of a Federal nature, and which can be shown to be so, every Province and every section of a Province has a just and clear right to compensation. The hon. gentleman has had to admit that in the case of Prince Edward Island.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That was exceptional.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. And what the Government have done in the case of Prince Edward Island they will have to admit in regard to each individual section of each Province which does not receive what it considers fair compensation. There will be no end to this thing. However, what I chiefly rose to repudiate was the kind impeachment which the hon. Minister preferred against myself and my hon. friend from East York (Mr. Mackenzie), as having been concerned in inaugurating this subsidy system. We give the hon. gentleman the whole credit of it; we disclaim it altogether; on his shoulders let all the profit and benefit rest. Let the glory be his.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I wish I could take it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. We are not going to hold ourselves in the slightest degree responsible, nor did we ever bring down any proposition to Parliament which, in any true sense, could be quoted as a precedent for the resolutions now under discussion.

Mr. CHARLTON. The hon. gentleman has endeavored to saddle the responsibility for the present system of railway subsidy on the Mackenzie Government, and this reminds me of a story. A gentleman, dining at an hotel in New Orleans, ordered champagne. A countryman, who was present, helped himself, whereupon the gentleman said: "That is a cool proceeding." The countryman said: "It is cool; I reckon there is ice in it." I think there is considerable ice in the hon. gentleman's argument, that the policy of granting railway aid had been inaugurated by the Mackenzie Government, because they had loaned a quantity of old, worthless, worn-out iron rails to branch roads to the Intercolonial Railway.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Worth $20 a ton in cash.

Mr. CHARLTON. They were o'd iron rails loaned to branch lines to the Intercolonial Railway, upon condition that they should be returned when required, or paid for. This, the hon. Minister says, was the inauguration of the present system of granting millions, not to branches of Government railways, not to railways of Federal importance, and which might have a legitimate claim to Federal aid, but to small corporations over the country, the grants being made, in nine cases out of ten, to serve political purposes, and political purposes alone. The hon. gentleman talks as if this was a sound policy. This is a most dangerous policy. The day it was inaugurated, in 1882, was a most unfortunate day for this Dominion. We have since that time, granted many millions for railway subsidies. We have opened the door to a system of grants of which we are unable to see the end. We have, in making those grants, opened the door to further claims for enormous amounts. The grants made so far have been very disproportionately in favor of Quebec, and also of the Provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Ontario, which must pay about 60 per cent. of all the taxation incurred by this policy, has received comparatively nothing; she has not received probably 10 per cent. of the whole. That Province will be clamoring at the door of the Dominion Parliament for an adjustment of its claim, and the Minister has inaugurated a policy which will lead to log-rolling, to taking hold of the throat of the Government in days of emergency by Provinces or by sections, and which will place the Government at the mercy of cliques, rings and combinations. Do we not remember the events which happened in room No. 8 some years ago, when the Government were taken by the throat, and afterwards voted eight millions of subsidy. They did it, not because it was sound policy, or because they wished to do it, but because they were obliged to do it, to tide themselves over a particular difficulty and save themselves from defeat; and we are liable to occurrences of that kind every Session we sit here. They have opened the door to endless financial trouble and difficulty; there is no justification for such a policy in the present financial condition of the country. It is not a sound policy, but, on the contrary, it is a most unsound and dangerous policy. It will be used by an unscrupulous Government in times of election, as it has been used, to make promises to ridings, to sections, to Provinces, for the purpose of securing political support. Does any hon. gentleman in this House doubt that promises of subsidies have been used in the past in such a way as to influence the result? Will the hon. gentlemen deny that they have been used in a way which I will not designate, but in such a way as to influence the elections in various ridings and Provinces.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I will frankly admit, if the hon. gentleman desires it, that this policy has commended itself so entirely to the approval of the great body of the people of Canada that I think it was a source of strength to the Government.

Mr. CHARLTON. Public sentiment, as the hon. Minister knows, has been appealed to by the most mercenary of all motives, causing many of the electors, as well as sections and Provinces, to believe that they could only secure certain advantages by voting in a certain way, and thus supplying a motive by which each should attempt to secure a share of the plunder and take a tug at the Dominion Treasury. It may be said that many ridings are pleased with this policy; I have no doubt many ridings in Nova Scotia are pleased with it, but that does not prove that it is right. Opening the public Treasury in this way may be agreeable to them, and may tend to strengthen the Government which promises thus to abuse its trust, but it is not a good thing for the country, and it is an evil which is bound to go on increasing. Public sentiment is already sadly debauched, and this system will increase the evil. The hon. gentleman says the amount of these grants this year is $1,700,000, though I believe the total sum is nearer two and a quarter millions; and the First Minister alluded to them the other day as being very modest in their character. But I say that with our present debt, having voted away the public money at the rate of five millions for every week we have been in Session, this spending of millions to placate particular ridings, or sections, or Provinces, or to induce them to support the Government at the general elections, or to pave the way for the bye elections—is a policy which is not for the good of the country, but is one calculated only to meet the pressing political necessities of the Government; it is in this way that the system will be used, and, therefore, I say it is a vicious system, and it was an unfortunate day when it was inaugurated in this country. It is an evil which will go on increasing, for there will always be a temptation on the part of the Government to use the credit and revenues of the country, for the purpose of strengthening themselves, by making grants which, in nine cases out of ten, are not in the public interest, but are dictated solely by the political exigencies of the Government itself. The assertion of the hon. gentleman that this system would lighten the taxes of the people is an absurd one. Many of these roads are built in sections where they will do very little to develop the country, and the subsidies to be granted in this way are not granted on the consideration of how far they will tend towards the development of the country, but how far they would add to the political influence of the Government of the day. The hon. gentleman says that the difficulties connected with Confederation were largely caused by this old system of the Provinces granting subsidies to railways which the Dominion Government have now taken out of the hands of the Provinces. Sir, this is a preposterous assertion for the hon. gentleman to make. I say that the difficulties which have arisen out of Confederation have been largely due to the system which was adopted of giving annual subsidies to the Provinces, and thus inducing them to become perpetual claimants for greater favors. The Provinces do not realise that under this system they pay in more than they receive, and the system itself is one which offers a premium to extravagance on the part of the Provinces, and at the same time involves the Dominion Government in difficulties by the temptation to a reckless expenditure of public money. I say that if the Provinces had been left, like the States of the American Union, to provide for their expenses, we would have given encouragement to a system of economy, instead of a temptation to the extravagance which now prevails. This I say is the difficulty which surrounds the Confederation, and it is one which will continue to menace us in the future, in the way of constant demands for additional subsidies. I realise that this is not an hour for long speeches, and I only rose to put my views on record with regard to this most vicious system. I predict that the result of this system will be most disastrous to this country. No Government, however honest it may be, can resist the pressure, after the precedents have been established, and the system inaugurated, and the Government of this day will inevitably use its power in this way to strengthen itself among the electors. This Government has done so, and will continue to do it, and before the present Parliament expires there is no telling how many millions will be added to the burdens of the country, for the mere purpose of enabling hon. gentlemen to tide over political difficulties in which they may be involved, and assisting them in any political exigencies with which they may be threatened.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. While I do not mean to say that it would be possible to equalise these subsidies, you must deal with the condition of the country, the efforts the people are making to develop their resources, and so on; but the hon. gentleman is under a misapprehension with reference to what has been done. There have been subsidised under these resolutions and those of a similar kind, up to the present time, in Ontario, 89½ miles; in Quebec, 910 miles; in New Brunswick, 350 miles, and in Nova Scotia, 118 miles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are those roads which have actually been gone on with, or only subsidised?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Those are roads to which subsidies have been granted.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. You don't know how many miles have actually been gone on with?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes; 650 in Ontario and 297 in Quebec.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That includes the Canadian Pacific Railway, I suppose.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Will the hon. gentleman name the lines?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I haven't the information before me now, but the Journals will show.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I do not think that the speech made by the hon. gentleman, in undertaking to show that the Government of the hon. member for East York initiated this policy, was worthy of him. The policy was initiated by the hon. gentleman himself, when he declared that certain classes of roads were for the general advantage of Canada. The hon. gentleman caused that declaration to be made in order that he might initiate the policy which we are now carrying into effect. The hon. gentleman has introduced a policy that is revolutionary, and he knows that it is in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of the British North America Act. After the hon. gentleman's declaration, I would like to know what railways the Provinces could charter that would be under their exclusive control. By the British North America Act, the Provincial Legislatures, no less than the Legislature of Canada, are entitled to incorporate railway companies. They are entitled to incorporate any railway company that lies wholly within the limits of the Province. By availing himself of a provision of the British North America Act that was merely intended to enable this Parliament to combine railways that previously existed in the Provinces, in order to form one continuous line, the hon. gentleman is abusing that power in order to adopt a policy that practically excludes the Provinces from effectively controlling any railway corporation they may create. The hon. gentleman knows that the Legislature of Ontario and the municipalities of that Province have together spent $20,000,000, since 1867, in aid of railways that are incorporated by that Legislature. That Legislature would never have aided those railways if it had supposed that it would cease to control and direct them. Now, the hon. gentleman cannot expect that the Government and people of Ontario will rest content that this House should go forward in the policy that has been adopted, without that large sum being recouped to them. The hon. gentleman has said that this policy is one to lighten taxation. Well, he introduced it in 1883, and I would like to know in what Session the taxation of the people has been lightened since that time. On the contrary, the hon. gentleman has increased the taxation this very Session. The truth is, that while he asks the Parliament of Canada to aid in levelling up in the poorer districts, he is at the same time levelling down in those districts which are more prosperous. He is adding to the burdens of the people, and he is taking away from the people capital that belongs to them individually, and is investing it in corporations that return to the people nothing. That is the policy the hon. gentleman has inaugurated, and I say it is impossible that such a policy can continue without leading to radical changes in our system of Government. Why, what has been done? The British North America Act declares that certain railways are local. It is a matter of fact; there is no difficulty in determining what roads are local, and are consequently under the exclusive control of the Local Legislatures. But the hon. gentleman has broken down the barrier that separates Provincial and Dominion jurisdiction with regard to a most vital matter—the expenditure of public money. The hon. gentleman having gone thus far, cannot stop. The Provincial Legislatures, by their pecuniary interests, were able to hold localities in check, but the hon. gentleman has no such power, and Session after Session the expenditure and the debt have been increasing for the construction of railways of no benefit to the people at large. And so the resources of this country, which, if wisely husbanded, might be applied to works of great national and general advantage, are being frittered away in localities where no advantage can be derived from them. Looking at the map which the hon. gentleman has laid on the Table, I find that the hon. gentleman has marked the new lines of railway, and there is hardly room on the map to mark some of the lines without obliterating some existing line. The Government are proposing to build new roads where roads already exist—not, perhaps, precisely on the same ground, but in the same immediate neighborhood; and it is impossible, especially in districts where the soil is not of the very best quality, and where agriculture is not in the most prosperous condition, that any great advantage can be derived from expenditures of this sort. Among the railways which are subsidised I see one called the Harvey Branch Railway, which is in the county of Albert, New Brunswick. It runs to a private ship yard, and was built to promote the private interests of the proprietor of that yard. When built it was aided by a local subsidy, which was more than sufficient to construct it. The proprietor of the road built it, not with scrap rails, but with rails which were considered as worn-out altogether, and it has never been running except simply as a siding to the ship yard. The road has been in operation for four or five years, and the hon. Minister presuming, I suppose, on the ignorance of the House and the indifference of his supporters, comes down here on the last day of the Session and asks the House to discuss these resolutions, when he knows that he has worked up the members on both sides of the House into a condition that makes it difficult to go on with business at all. This subsidy is to rerail this side line, and, perhaps, do more, because I apprehend that $3,200 a mile will be more than sufficient to rail it, and the proprietor will be able to put money into his pocket. The hon. gentleman is not dealing fairly or ingenuously by the House when he comes here and asks us to make an appropriation towards the building of a road that is already constructed, and that has been in operation during all this time. He proposes here to use a road that, I say, is simply a road running to a ship yard, and which has been used for no other purpose. I do not know how many more roads there may be in exactly the same position, but I must say the proposal of the hon. gentleman is in this respect very little short of an outrage. The hon. gentleman might as well propose to rebuild or repair a saw mill. I dare say, if we had time to examine the other proposed subsidies, we would find other grants of the same sort. The House is kept in the dark. We are not given the information which would enable us to form a judgment. The Government evidently look to the votes of their supporters, and consider that to them reflection, information and judgment are entirely unnecessary. Like one of Shakespeare's characters, the less they have of conscience the better for them.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I desire to express my disapproval of the manner and the time in which these resolutions were brought in. The House has now reached that period when one cannot give them the consideration they deserve. In fact, the mover occupied hardly five minutes in explaining those various subsidies, showing very plainly that either he thought it better to give as little information as possible or else considered he was unable, at this advanced period of the Session, to spare the time for the necessary explanations. Resolutions of this kind ought, in all fairness, to be laid on the Table in reasonable time, and the Minister, in introducing them, ought to explain why he asks us to vote these large sums. One of the reasons given by the Minister, and the only one which had any weight, was that the Local Legislatures ought not to be permitted to embarrass their financial condition, and, therefore, it was in the best interests of the country that the Dominion should assume the cost of these roads. I may say, in this connection, that we have before made the claim that the Provincial Legislatures and municipalities should be recouped the aid they granted to railways, for which they burdened themselves heavily; and if the Dominion Government think to grant subsidies to these roads, the municipalities ought to be relieved, to a certain extent, of the expenditure they have incurred in this connection. Judging from the resolutions before the House, the best interests of the country are not intended to be observed in granting those subsidies. There are other large portions of the country in which railroads would be of greater benefit than the sections provided for in the resolutions. We were told in glowing terms of the great portions of our country yet undeveloped, which were going to be opened up, and of the extensive iron ores that would be developed in a few years by this policy; but I have looked in vain on the paper to find any provision for these new sections. If, then, these grants are not given to develop the resources of the country, what can be the motive of the Government in introducing these resolutions? There is evidently something behind the scenes in granting these resolutions, and it would appear their sole object is the obtaining of political support. The Government, instead of having the interests of the country at heart, have evidently only regard for the interests of their supporters. In the greater portions of the sections where those roads are subsidised they will enter into competition with other lines, and are really not required, except as bids for political support. To my surprise, I find on the paper, the Niagara Central gets a subsidy for a large amount for the construction of that line, when its promoters stated they could not construct it. If the company is unable to construct it, why was a subsidy granted? It would appear to most people that, in granting a subsidy to this line, which the promoters say they are not going to build, the object is to enable them to dispose of their charter. Is this in the interest of the public? Their object is plain. They should go to that portion of the country where it would develop the country to advantage, and to the benefit of the Dominion at large, but, on the contrary, almost every bonus that has been granted here is for the purpose of pure log-rolling, so as to secure political support. Here is another illustration of the course that the Minister of Railways is pursuing. We find that the Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway was subsidised in 1886 for 37 miles, in all $118,400. That same road is to be subsidised now with a different length. It appears that it has diminished in growth. An hon. member says it is older. It is reversing its growth with its age. We find, however, that the same sum is to be granted to the same company as was granted in 1886, though this year it is only 27 miles long instead of 37 miles. We understand that, unless there are exceptional circumstances, only $3,200 a mile is to be granted, yet we find according to this resolution, the length of the road having been reduced by ten miles, that they are to get $4,400 a mile over that portion. Those who know that country will agree with me that a road can be very easily built there.

The CHAIRMAN. Would it not be better to discuss a particular item when we reach it? We have not reached a single item yet. We are discussing the general question.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am discussing the general question. I do not wish to encroach upon the time of the House, but I want to show that there has been no just consideration of the mode of granting subsidies to railways, and, therefore, I contend that the remarks I was making were pertinent to the general question.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not rule that the hon. gentleman was out of order, but suggested that, perhaps, it would be better to discuss the item by-and-bye when we reach it.

Mr. WILSON (Elgin). I am very thankful for your suggestion. I was about to show by this illustration that the Government is not governed by any fair consideration as to what will be for the best interests of the Dominion. If we are to be told that the policy of the Government is that in future there shall be no more expenditures on account of railways by the Provinces, it is the bounden duty of the Government to come down with some comprehensive scheme whereby they may be able to recoup to the various municipalities, or at least to the Local Legislatures, the bonuses they have granted on account of the construction of railways. The Minister of Finance says that these roads will be for the general advantage of Canada. If that be so, the Local Legislatures have expended a large amount of money for that purpose, and it is no more than right and proper that the Dominion Government, when they assume control of those local roads, should come down with a general measure and compensate the Local Governments. The system which is now inaugurated by this Parliament is the most pernicious that has ever been inaugurated in any Parliament. I do not believe it is possible, though it is intended, that the members of this House could so far forget themselves as to vote for a grant to a certain railway merely because it was going to benefit their own locality. They can hardly be so selfish as that, and I cannot believe that this intelligent Legislature could be so influenced by such sordid motives; but, while the members of this House might resist a temptation of that kind, what effect can it possibly have on the electorate throughout the various municipalities? It is a vicious system, in keeping with the various courses that have been adopted by this Government since it took power in 1878. Its whole course has been intended, as far as possible, to debauch the electorate so as to retain the present Ministers in power. If one means would not suffice, some other means had to be adopted. The only object of those gentlemen is to retain the sweets of office. They cling to them with a pertinacity worthy of a Conservative and of no other politician. In view of the course into which the country is drifting, the time may not be far distant when we will see that a Government which legislates simply to keep itself in power no longer deserves the confidence of the people at large.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I desire to recall to the mind of the Minister of Railways the questions I put in reference to this St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway. I suggested before that it would have been convenient to have had a sort of memorandum accompanying these reports, giving a succinct statement of the grounds on which the Government recommended the grant, what security or what reason they have for supposing that the road would go on, and matters of that kind. In the first instance, would he kindly let us know who are the parties who compose this company, is the company in existence at all, and has it built any part of the road? Is it a new scheme altogether? What are the circumstances connected with it?

Mr. POPE. It is a company, the St. Catharines and Niagara Central Railway Company, which is proposing to build this road. The company has graded, I understand, a considerable portion of this road—I do not know exactly how much. There have been bonuses voted, as I understand, to the extent of $260,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. For these 12 miles?

Mr. POPE. For these 12 miles.

Mr. RYKERT. $184,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. These have been actually voted?

Mr. POPE. They have the right of way given to them. They propose to build it out of their own means. They are very wealthy men, some of them I know are quite able to build the road themselves. Mr. Neelon and Dr. Oille and other gentlemen connected with the project make it certain that the road will be built.

Mr. MACKENZIE. What is the distance between the two roads?

Mr. POPE. I could not say.

Mr. RYKERT. About six miles.

Mr. MARA. The resolutions before the committee will be, I must say, a great disappointment to the people of British Columbia, when they find that the Government have declined to grant assistance to any of the lines contemplated in that Province, while they are granting millions of dollars to assist lines in the older Provinces. When the Government inaugurated their policy of subsidising railways in 1882, the Province of British Columbia was not in a position to take advantage of that policy, owing to its isolated position and the enormous cost of transportation. But with the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway there are now no difficulties in the way of railway construction through the mountains, where plant, material and supplies can be landed in the interior of British Columbia with the same facility as in the older Provinces. But as soon as we leave the main line of railway, then our difficulties commence. In the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway the requirements and development of British Columbia were never taken into consideration. Both the Government and the railway company very properly selected the shortest route to the coast, the one easiest built, and the one possessing the fewest physical obstacles. But that line is not, and never will be, a line that can develop the resources of British Columbia without branch lines or feeders, lines that will tap the agricultural districts of the south, and the rich mineral districts of Cariboo in the north. Now, in discussing this question of subsidising railway lines in British Columbia, I was very much disappointed to find the members of the Government taking the position that, owing to the very large expenditure in building the Canadian Pacific Railway, for some time to come, we cannot expect any aid or assistance. Well, any members of the House, who have been over the Canadian Pacific Railway, will have observed that a very large proportion of the expenditure in building the line was for the sections between the base of the Rocky Mountains and Eagle Pass, a portion that is almost inaccessible to the residents of British Columbia, far removed from agricultural settlement and the centre of civilisation; and as far as expending the money within the boundary of our Province is concerned, it might just as well have been spent on the shores of Lake Superior. Every pound of material, every tool that was used on the work, every animal employed on the work, as well as every pound of grain to feed the animals, and every pound of provisions used in feeding the men, came from the east, and as soon as the work was over the men, with their earnings, were taken back to the eastern Provinces, and not one dollar of that money was spent in what might be called British Columbia proper, although it was spent within the boundaries of the Province. So far as the people were concerned they derived no direct or indirect benefit from the construction of a large portion of the Canadian Pacific Railway, except quick transportation to the coast, and in that respect each of the other Provinces derive the same advantages east that we do. Now, I think I can show from the returns of Trade and Navigation, that British Columbia is entitled to some aid and assistance from the Government in subsidising our lines of railway. I find that the exports from 1850 to 1886, inclusive, were nearly $21,000,000, and during the same period we paid, in Customs duties alone, $5,368,219, and Excise, $415,849. I find that the increase in duties from 1880 to 1886 was 96 per cent. I find in looking over the statistics of the Province that there is the same evidence of prosperity. Real property has increased from 1880 to 1885 at the rate of 59 per cent. and personal property at the rate of 47 per cent. The returns for 1886 are not in the library, but I think they would show the proportion to be much greater. The increase in school children is 63 per cent. I find that the amount paid in Customs by the people of the Dominion at large, per head, is $4.49, and the amount paid by the people of British Columbia, per head, is $17.66, or 400 per cent. more than in any other Province in the Dominion; therefore, I think, we have a just claim to our proportion of the railway subsidies that are granted to lines in the older Provinces. The question then arises, have we any railways in a position to claim assistance from the Government? I may say we have three, first there is the Cariboo Railway, which has been promoted by the Provincial Government. The Government of British Columbia have for some time past endeavored to assist quartz mining in Cariboo, and they realise that the only way to do so is by giving cheap transportation. With that object in view, they sent Mr. Bell, an engineer of high standing, to examine the route, and he reported that a line can be found 288 lines in length, that can be built for seven and a half million dollars. I will quote a few extracts from his report:

"Within a few years railroad lines have been extended and settlements advanced. Ores that could only be worked if they would yield from $25 to $50 per ton, are now found to be rich as they can be mined at a very reduced expense. Dump piles formerly considered worthless are now valued at many thousands of dollars. Tailings allowed to go to waste in former years are now being prospected and assayed. The concentration of these tailings will furnish employment for many men in the near future."

"In this connection it is worthy of notice that a large percentage of the fifty millions dollars worth of gold hitherto taken out of British Columbia came out of Williams Creek, and yet it is a habitual assertion by all British Columbia miners, that there is as much gold in the bottom of Williams Creek to-day as the amount that has been taken out."

"The same authority above quoted says:

"The value of gold in the tailings not only of the quartz, but the hydraulic mines, is something enormous. It is considered by the most practical miners in California that at least one-half of the gold in placer mining is lost—or rather not saved."

"There are already open to inspection in the Cariboo region quartz ledges varying in width from seven to seventy feet, and ranging in depth from 20 to 180 feet, from each of which the average assay of last year, recorded in one assay office in Barkerville, was very satisfactory."

"If then these ledges were in a further state of development (as they very soon will be, owing to the aid afforded by your Government), who could doubt the proportions that business, upon the only road serving this district, would be likely to assume."

"Seeing that your Government, after considering well the responsibility that attaches to aiding by loan, upon certain conditions, the development of quartz mining, has seen fit to take that step, it would naturally appear that no better proof of greater confidence as to what the future of quartz mining in British Columbia is likely to become could well be displayed, nor any stronger argument used in forwarding the building of a road into that district which has commanded confidence enough to gain so valuable a concession."

"But the quartz ledges now open in British Columbia are not a large percentage of those known amongst practical miners to exist in the Cariboo district, and if cheap transportation to these mines were only available, then, by a parity of reasoning, no long time would elapse before the same activity in mining in British Columbia would take place that followed upon the construction of railways in California."

I may say there are already lodes and veins in British Columbia that have been tested and are so far developed as to warrant the assertion that if we possessed railways to give cheap transportation, these mines would offer employment not only to thousands but to hundreds of thousands. The next line for which application was made is the Kootenay and Athabasca road. In regard to that road I would simply say that it is a line intended to open up a very large timber district on the Kootenay River, and valuable mines on the border of Kootenay Lake. The British Columbia Government, being so far convinced of the bona fides of the company, gave them a grant of 300,000 acres of land. The next company that is in a position to take advantage of a subsidy, and which, I might further say, has a claim on the Dominion Government, is the Shuswap and Okanagan road. It is intended to run to Okanagan Lake, a lake over 75 miles in length and navigable all the year round. When the First Minister was in British Columbia last year, a deputation called upon him and placed this matter before him, when, I understand, he led them to believe that assistance would be given this Session. That road will run through the richest agricultural district in the Province. A short time ago the Government sent an engineer and an expert to report on the statements made by the company. The report verifies the statement that there are 340,000 acres of land in that district that cannot be surpassed, not only in British Columbia, but in the whole Dominion. There has been a yield of wheat equal to 60 bushels to the acre, not over small fields but covering fields of a hundred acres in extent. The average is put down at what is considered to be a low figure, viz., 32½ bushels to the acre for the entire district. When we find British Columbia importing annually 50,000 barrels of flour, and we have there 340,000 acres of the finest wheat land in the Province, I think the pro-motors of this company may fairly claim assistance from the Dominion Government in furthering their National Policy scheme. This company has received the support of the whole of the Province of British Columbia from one end to the other. At a meeting of the Board of Trade, a board sitting three hundred and fifty miles from this proposed line, the following resolution was passed a short time ago:

"Whereas, a large area of rich and agricultural land will be opened up by the construction of the Shuswap and Okanagon Railway, and mineral and other resources will be developed thereby much to the advantage of this Province and the Dominion at large;

"And, whereas, the Provincial Legislature, after having evidence brought before them as to the desirability of developing this portion of the Province by the said railway, have granted the said railway company a bonus of $4,000 per mile, or not more than $200,000;

"And, whereas, this bonus is entirely inadequate to enable the promoters to carry on the undertaking:

"Be it, therefore, enacted, that the British Columbia Board of Trade respectfully urge His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to grant to the Shuswap and Okanagon Railway Company a liberal subsidy which will enable them to carry out this very desirable enterprise; and that the secretary be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution, with the seal of the board attached, to the honorable the Minister of Railways, and also to forward copies of said resolution to the British Columbia members of Parliament at Ottawa with the request that they may use their best endeavors in furtherance of the scheme."

When the Provincial Government, with its slender income, grants a bonus of $200,000 to a railway 51 miles in length, a bonus equal to one-third of the annual revenue of the Province, I think the Provincial Government as well as the railway company have a strong claim on this Government for some aid and assistance to that line. As hon. members are exhibiting signs of impatience, I will not occupy the time further, but will express the hope that if, at the next Session of Parliament, the Government grant assistance to any lines, the Shuswap and Okanagon will stand first.

To the Vaudreuil and Prescott Railway Company, for thirty miles of their railway, from Vaudreuil towards Hawkesbury, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $96,000.

Mr. POPE. The total cost of the road will be $600,000. The municipalities have furnished the right of way free, and I am informed that municipalities have voted, or are about to vote, a subsidy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Of what amount?

Mr. POPE. I do not think I have the amount; but I know such is their intention.

Mr. MACKENZIE. Make that a condition.

Mr. POPE. Not one dollar of subsidy will be paid until the road is built.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this a railway in existence in any way, or is it only projected; has any work been done?

Mr. POPE. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then it entirely depends on that subsidy, and what the municipalities give, and what the private proprietors choose to put into the undertaking.

Mr. LABROSSE. Part of the road is already begun. While I am very thankful for what the Government have agreed to do, I think they should have granted aid for fifty miles so as to reach Caledonia Springs, which is largely frequented every year. Thirty miles will not reach further than to Hawkesbury, and fifty miles is at least what is required. The Government would do well to change the grant in this respect.

To the Richmond Hill Junction Railway Company, for five miles of their railway from Richmond Hill Junction to the Northern Railway of Canada to Richmond Hill Village, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $16,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this a mere spur?

Mr. POPE. It was chartered by 49 Victoria, Ontario Legislature. The estimated cost is $10,000, and after this grant and local bonuses are paid $14,000 will be left to be raised by the company.

To the Drummond County Railway Company, for thirty miles of their railway from Drummondville towards Nicolet, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $96,000.

Mr. POPE. This railway has been commenced. The company are quite able to build the road, and they ask for this subsidy.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is an extension.

Mr. POPE. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is Nicolet the final point?

Mr. POPE. It is to connect with another road—the Great Eastern.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What other resources has this company got in the way of municipal bonuses or subsidies.

Mr. POPE. They have some subsidies, but the proprietors are largely concerned in the finance of the road.

To the Joggins Railway Company, for one and a quarter miles of their railway extending from the southern end of the portion subsidised by 49 Victoria, chapter 10, to the wharves, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, not exceeding in the whole $4,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose I may, without offence to the Maritime Provinces, confess my ignorance of Joggins, and ask for information?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. It was the first coal mine opened in the county of Cumberland. It is on the bay, and the original company who worked the mines, built a line which was subsidised last Session connecting their coal mines at Joggins with the Intercolonial.

Mr. JONES. I think these resolutions show that, as the hon. gentleman stated the other day, he is quite able to take care of his own county. I do not object to that, but I wish the hon. gentleman would exercise his powerful influence in favor of some other lines in his own Province. The expectations which he held out to the people there have not been realised. I am informed that during the last election he led the people to believe that it was the purpose of the hon. gentleman to subsidise the Musquodoboit to Stewiacke.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that I said anything of that kind on the platform?

Mr. JONES. No; but he had a deputation of his political friends, as well as his political opponents, and I understand that he gave them the strongest possible assurances that this road would be provided for this Session. If such were not the case it will only place those gentlemen, among whom are some prominent citizens of Halifax, in a very awkward position. That road has been subsidised by the Local Administration; it runs through a very fine agricultural country, and while the hon. gentleman was giving subsidies to four roads in his own county, I think it was hardly in accordance with his public position and duty, to leave this road without assistance. No doubt the hon. gentleman has taken into consideration the fact of certain contingencies arising in his own county before very long, but I do not think that some of these appropriations could be justified on as strong public grounds as some of the others to which I have referred. There was another road which was also subject to political discussion, and that was the Hants Central, and it was considered in the county of Hants that the Government would give a subsidy to help to build a bridge between Truro and Windsor. I believe that was canvassed in the county, though I do not say the Government promised it. I say that no more proper expenditure of public money than that could be made under this policy, as the road traverses a fine district and very materially shortens the distance. It has also a subsidy from the Local Government. I repeat my regrets that two roads of such prominence, passing through such a splendid agricultural district, and with a future of such great promise, have not received the consideration of the Minister of Finance when he has been able to secure aid for four lines in his own county.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Would the hon. gentleman mention that all the railways in my county which are subsidised are less than 21 miles in length?

Mr. JONES. But the hon. gentleman has given nothing to some of the other counties.

Mr. PUTNAM. I regret that, among the many railway schemes that have been subsidised this Session, the claims of the Hants Central Railway have been overlooked. I would like to urge upon the Government the importance of that road. It will bring the counties of eastern and western Nova Scotia some 40 miles nearer together for commercial purposes. It will also open up a fine agricultural district second to none in that Province. There are also along the line a large number of valuable mines and minerals which are only partially developed, and which are practically at a standstill for want of railway communication which would provide an outlet to the market. This would also be one of the shortest and most direct routes of travel through the Province as well as to and from the United States. I would like to say one word in reply to the remarks made by the senior member for Halifax (Mr. Jones) at an earlier part of this Session. I think he stated that it was owing to promises made in connection with this road that I occupied a seat in this House. I can say most positively that I made no promises in any way in connection with this road, and never asked the Government to make any promises, or approached the Government or any member of it to obtain any promise for this road. But I believed then, as I believe now, that the Government will render such assistance to this road at the next Session of Parliament as will secure its construction at an early day.

Mr. JONES. I did not intend to convey the idea that the hon. gentleman owed his seat here to any promises that had been made. What I wanted to convey was that the general promises made by the Government to construct railways in the Province of Nova Scotia extended to the county of Hants as well as to other counties, and had a large effect in influencing public opinion, the advantage of which the hon. gentleman participated in. I am not in a position to say that the hon. gentleman made any promises with reference to this road; but he must see that the discussions which were going on throughout the Province gave him an advantage in the impression which was created that the Government was going to assist the road for which he asked assistance, as well as other roads, and, to that extent, it was in the interest of that county, as well as the Province. That was all I intended to convey.

To the Moncton and Buctouche Railway Company, for two miles of their railway from the west end of the portion subsidised by 49 Victoria, chapter 10, to Moncton, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $6,400.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How comes this little road of two miles to be wanted?

Mr. JONES.

Mr. POPE. It is part of a road that was built last year, and for which a subsidy was granted with the exception of these two miles.

To the Beauharnois Junction Railway Company, for thirty miles of their railway from St. Martin's towards St. Anicet, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $96,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this an existing road?

Mr. POPE. This road was chartered by the Legislature of Quebec. It extends from St. Martin's to St. Anicet, a distance of about 20 miles. It is estimated by the company to cost $500,000. I have seen a large deputation from the district who told me that they were quite prepared to vote bonuses to the road, and I have no doubt it will be built.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Has anything been done on it?

Mr. POPE. No.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It would be satisfactory to know what the municipalities are going to do, because the road is not likely to go on, I take it, unless they contribute to it.

Mr. POPE. It is sure to go on, because it is assisted by the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself.

To the Harvey Branch Railway Company, for three miles of their railway from the southern terminus of the Albert Railway to Harvey Bank, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $9,600.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is this road?

Mr. POPE. It is in Albert county, New Brunswick. It is an extension of the Albert Railway. There was once a railway over these three miles, but it has fallen into such disuse that it cannot now be run.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it a branch of the Intercolonial Railway?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. As I understand, this is really a grant to repair three miles of railway that have fallen into disuse. That is a different proposition from building a railway.

Mr. POPE. I have refused in all cases to repair roads, and I would refuse this if it were not part of another road.

To the Brantford, Waterloo and Lake Erie Railway Company, for eighteen miles of their railway, from the town of Brantford to the village of Hagarville or the village of Waterford, or some intermediate point on the Canada Southern Railway, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $57,600.

Mr. POPE. This railway was chartered by the Parliament of Canada, 49 Victoria, chapter 20. It is designed to extend from Berlin to a point on Lake Erie, and will pass through a magnificent agricultural country. The company estimate the cost at $126,000. They state that they are promised bonuses from the municipalities through which the line will pass, and which with this grant and their own resources will enable them to complete the work, and I have no doubt it will be completed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Was a bonus granted to other portions of this road?

Mr. POPE. I do not think any other bonus has been granted. The claims of this road have been pressed upon me for a year or two, and I made a partial promise to some of my hon. friends last year that I would try and do something this year if the matter was brought before me. It has been brought before me by the mayor of Brantford and others.

Mr. PATERSON (Brant). This road is not part of the South Ontario Pacific Railway. That is an entirely different project. For this road a charter was got two or three years ago. It runs southerly and connects with the Michigan Central Railway. It was intended originally to run north to intersect the Credit Valley division of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but since the new project has arisen that has been left in abeyance.

Mr. WILSON. If it be the intention of the Government to give aid to railways, this road should get it; but I would call the attention of the Government to the fact that there is another road, the line running from Plattsburg to Ingersoll, and from Ingersoll to Aylmer. I would impress upon the Government the necessity of taking that road into consideration.

To the Dominion Lime Railway Company, for seven miles of their railway from a point on the Quebec Central Railway, in the township of Dudswell, to the Dudswell Lime Company's quarries, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $22,400.

Mr. POPE. This is in connection with the Quebec Central. It runs through a very important section of country which has had no aid whatever from the Government. There are two important lime quarries and a granite quarry which this will open. It will be a portion of the Arthabaska county railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is not built yet.

Mr. POPE. No; but the company are quite able to build it.

To the South Norfolk Railway Company, for seventeen miles of their railway, from Port Rowan to the town of Simcoe, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $54,400.

Mr. POPE. The intention is to connect with the Grand Trunk Railway, which, it is supposed will operate the road after it is built. They have assistance from the municipalities, and with this assistance they feel quite safe to build the road.

To the Jacques Cartier Union Railway Company, for extending and completing their railway, a subsidy of $40,000.

Mr. POPE. The railway was subsidised to the extent of $200,000. In the arrangement with the North Shore Railway this whole subsidy was consumed; they had not completed their road to the point described.

Mr. MITCHELL. I can give the Minister of Railways a little explanation in explaining this item. This road, subsidised by the Government, was bought by the Grand Trunk Railway when they bought the North Shore Railway in order to keep it out of the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway, and have a monopoly of the Quebec trade. When they agreed to sell the North Shore road on the proreure of the Government, influenced by the Quebec members, who met in room 8, when the First Minister was taken by the throat, metaphorically speaking, this little arrangement of the Jacques Cartier road was part of the scheme which the Grand Trunk Railway put in, and for which they were paid some $200,000. When the Canadian Pacific Railway were forced to take over that road against their will, and the Grand Trunk Railway forced to sell it against their will, in order to placate the Quebec members, headed by the Secretary of State, the Government had to bring pressure on both these important interests to have the matter settled; and when the Canadian Pacific Railway took over the road, they consented to pay the whole cost, and rejected the Jacques Cartier road. The Grand Trunk Railway kept the road, and in his annual return, president Tyler took credit for the fact that they had made nearly $100,000 profit out of the deal on the North Shore, and had the Jacques Cartier to the good. Now they come in, and we may as well understand it, and the Grand Trunk are getting that $20,000 of a bonus to enable them to continue and extend a road which the Canadian Pacific Railway considered so useless that they would not have it in the deal though they were getting it for nothing.

Mr. DESJARDINS. I do not know all about the past history which has been related by my hon. friend the member for Northumberland (Mr. Mitchell) especially as to what occurred in No. 8, but what I know is that the line of the Union Jacques Cartier was built, and that the parish of St. Laurent was to suffer with it on account of that, but they accepted the transaction because they supposed it would serve their own traffic. When the arrangements between the Grand Trunk and the Pacific took place, that line was set aside and became useless for the purpose for which it had been built, and the Grand Trunk was refusing to continue trafficking with that line because it would not pay. So the parish of St. Laurent and the others interested in that railway, the parishes of St. Laurent and Sault au Recollet, came to the Government and asked for the extension of the line in order to reach a point where the line would really become an important local railway, that is to say, Sault au Recollet. There are large water powers which cannot be used because of the deficiency in communication, and so the Government helped in this way. It was really an indemnity to the parish of St. Laurent for the rights they had already acquired on that line. The House will remember that a subsidy of $200,000 had been granted towards the building and extension of that line through Sault au Recollet to St. Vincent de Paul, which amount was afterwards used by the Government to carry the transfer of the North Shore line to the Pacific, so out of the $200,000 that line is left with the $20,000 to continue and perfect it. I think it is a very fair grant.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not object at all to the granting of the vote. The only thing is that I think the House is entitled to information; and, as the hon. gentleman who seems to be leading this side of the House asked for information which the Minister of Railways seems to be lax in giving, I thought I would assist him in placing it before the House. I know the locality. I have often driven out to the Back River. It is a very pleasant road, and a very nice drive. There is not much business, but it would be useful to extend it.

To the Teeswater and Inverhuron Railway Company, for twenty-four miles of their railway from Mount Forest to Walkerton, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $78,800.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this constructed in part?

Mr. POPE. No, it connects at Mount Forest; then it is intended to go on to Walkerton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Where is the terminus to be finally?

Mr. POPE. At Inverhuron. At present it is at Walkerton.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That will mean a further subsidy, as a matter of course?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the total length?

Mr. POPE. It will be about twenty miles longer.

To the Oshawa Railway and Navigation Company, for seven miles of their railway from Port Oshawa towards Raglan, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $22,400.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What is the object of this little bit of a spur here?

Mr. POPE. This is for a short line of railway. The hon. gentleman knows better than I do that the town of Oshawa is a very important town, and that there is a great deal of manufacturing of all kinds going on there. This railway, in the first place, is to reach the railway running through there and then to be extended to the lake.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Oshawa is only two or three miles from the lake.

Mr. POPE. It is said to be seven.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Are the town of Oshawa the parties who contribute the balance of the money?

Mr. POPE. Oshawa is going to contribute pretty largely.

To the Chicoutimi and Lake St. John Railway Company, for thirty miles of their railway from Lake St. John towards Chicoutimi, or from Chicoutimi towards Lake St. John, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $96,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. That is very vague.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is an extension.

Mr. POPE. No, that is not an extension. It is an entirely new line to connect with the Lake St. John Railway.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Apparently it may begin either at Lake St. John or at the other end.

Mr. POPE. It does not matter where it commences. When they come to make the contract that question is arranged.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the distance only thirty miles? I think there must be another thirty.

Mr. POPE. It is seventy miles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. So it means really a grant more than double than if they proceed.

Mr. POPE. If they go on with this and open up that country, I shall be most happy, if I am here, to make a further grant to that road.

Mr. MITCHELL. You do not intend to leave, do you?

Mr. POPE. I am thinking that over.

To the Great Eastern Railway Company, for thirty miles of their railway, from the River St. Francis to the Arthabaska Railway, at St. Gédéon station, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $96,000.

Mr. POPE. This fills in a gap between a piece of railway which was built last year and the Arthabaska Railway.

Mr. MITCHELL. Where is the Arthabaska? In the North-West?

Mr. POPE. Not quite. It is in a most celebrated part of Canada. Part of it is in the Eastern Townships. When I say that, I know the hon. gentleman will be satisfied.

To the Ontario and Pacific Railway Company, for six miles of their railway, from the northern end of the portion subsidised by 47 Victoria, chapter 8, to the town of Perth, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $19,200.

Mr. POPE. That is just to enable them to go on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have they built the remainder?

Mr. POPE. They have built a portion of it, and they want to get to the town of Perth, to connect with the railway there. They have not built the remainder, because the whole line that they have chartered is 400 or 500 miles long. They reported to me that they had commenced the work last year between this and Cornwall.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman does not know how much is constructed?

Mr. POPE. I do not.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is any of it in running order?

Mr. POPE. No, and not a dollar has been paid on it.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The hon. gentleman has ground to believe that it will go on?

Mr. POPE. I do believe so as regards this point. I do not think they are very likely to build the whole of it.

Mr. POPE.

To the Caraqueet Railway Company, for six and one quarter miles of their railway from Lower Caraqueet to Shippegan, in lieu of the subsidy granted by 49 Victoria, chapter 10, a subsidy not exceeding in the whole $32,000.

Mr. POPE. This is a substitute for a subsidy already granted, and this is to complete the line.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was the subsidy for which this is substituted?

Mr. POPE. $3,200 for ten miles and this is to enable then to extend it to an important point on the lake.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this an addition or a diminution? The hon. gentleman says for 10 miles, and now we are granting for 7 miles.

Mr. POPE. It neither adds nor diminishes. It is not a variation of the former route.

Mr. MITCHELL. This seems to be doubling up the road and giving $4,500 instead of $3,200 per mile, making the distance less, but the outlay is just the same. Can the hon. gentleman tell whether this line is near navigable waters on an ocean or bay?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes, it begins at Shippegan.

To the St. Lawrence and Lower Laurentian Railway Company for the section of their railway from Grand Piles, on the St. Maurice River, to its junction with the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway, in lieu of the subsidy granted by 47-49 Victoria, chapter 59, for a line of railway from Grand Piles, on the St. Maurice River, to its junction with the Lake St. John Railway—a distance of about fifty miles, a subsidy of $217,600.

Mr. POPE. This is the extension of a line that was subsidised last year. Nothing of it has been completed. Surveys have been going on, and they expect to commence early this season.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What are their means? Have they municipal bonuses or private means?

Mr. POPE. They expect a local subsidy, and with this subsidy and their own means, they hope to be able to build the road.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This is a very considerable increase in the mileage as compared with other roads. A subsidy of $217,600 for 50 miles is something like $4,200 per mile instead of $3,200.

Mr. POPE. No, $3,200 per mile is the subsidy. There are not 50 miles, there are only 22 miles. That is the old subsidy. It is found to be a very difficult road. Some two years ago exactly the same vote was given, only it was not so clearly defined.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is really a bonus of $4,352 per mile.

Mr. POPE. It is exactly the same vote that was taken before.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. All the same, the fact remains that this is a departure from all the other grants made here, apparently, except one. Almost all the others are confined strictly to $3,200 per mile. This will be made a precedent for granting an increased subsidy if there is any special difficulty. You are not supposed to overgo $3,200 per mile.

Mr. POPE. No, we do not. There must be something very special if we do, and this is very special, because it is a very difficult road. They have built twenty miles, which will be of no use, and unless they build the rest, the shorter distance will be better for the public, and will cost them as much as the longer one.

Mr. MITCHELL. I think the principle is a bad one. It will be quoted hereafter, and it will be difficult for governments to resist claims of the same character. I look with some suspicion upon this vote.

To the Lake Temiscamingue Railway Company, for four short sections of railway, in all about two miles in length, to overcome the rapids of the Ottawa River, known as "La Mi-Charge," "La Cave," "Les Erables," and "La Montagne," and for the construction of wharves and landing stages at these rapids, to connect the Canadian Pacific Railway at Mattawa with Lake Temiscamingue by steamboats, railways and other works (in lieu of a portion two miles in length, out of the eight miles of railway subsidised by 48-49 Victoria, chapter 59, under which about six miles of railway have already been built from the foot of Long Sault proper to the foot of Lake Temiscamingue, and in lieu also of the subsidy granted by 49 Victoria, chapter 10), a subsidy of $12,400.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Considering the enormous objections the hon. gentleman had to mixed railway and water stretches, this seems rather strange.

Mr. POPE. There is no money in the vote at all. The money has been expended under the vote, but we could not pay it because it was not clearly defined how it was to be paid.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it simply for the convenience of the lumber interests in that region?

Mr. POPE. There is a very fine settlement up the Ottawa River.

Mr. BRYSON. I may, perhaps, be permitted to explain with reference to these water stretches. In the year 1885, I had the honor of introducing a deputation composed of the president of the Temiscamingue Colonisation Company and his directors, to the Minister of Railways. We urged upon him the necessity of opening up those water stretches by subsidising portions of the line, and in the Session of 1885 the Government subsidised a portion of the road which ran from the foot of Lake Temiscamingue to the head of Lac de Sept Lioux, a distance of about six miles. The subsidy was granted to the extent of $25,000. Since that time the different water stretches have been utilised, and it has been found absolutely necessary to construct a small line of railway along the different points of the rapids, for instance, at the rapids "La Montagne," "Les Erables," "La Mi-charge," "La Cave," the water stretches are utilised, and there is in all a distance of two miles of railway. I may say that it is very commendable on the part of the Government to come forward at this period and give an additional subsidy.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Carried.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it is only reasonable we should get the information. What the hon. gentleman is saying is very interesting. But this again is a very special departure. There will be absolutely no end to the applications that may be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. This is for the purpose of connecting several stretches of water to enable lumbermen to bring their timber over. I think the object is a good one, and I do not oppose the vote.

To the Carillon and Grenville Railway Company, for twelve miles of their railway from St. Eustache to Sault au Recollet, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $38,400.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Please explain the vote.

Mr. POPE. It is for the Carillon and Grenville Railway; the road is of the length of twelve miles. It will make a connection between two pieces of railway.

To the Minudie Branch Railway Company, for five and a-half miles of their railway from its junction with the Joggins Railway, near the River Hebert Railway bridge, to the village of Minudie, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $17,600.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this a constructed road? Is it being constructed by a railway or by private enterprise.

Mr. POPE. Nothing has been done so far.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Who is responsible for its construction?

Mr. POPE. A charter has been obtained from the Local Government of Nova Scotia, and the company expect to obtain from that Government a subsidy towards the construction of the five miles.

Mr. MITCHELL. I desire to call attention to one feature that struck me last night in connection with the vote of $70,000 for wharves in Nova Scotia. The explanation given was that the engineer of Public Works had been directed to discriminate between works of a purely local character and those for the benefit of the Dominion. I am not opposing this policy or expressing an opinion on it; but I want to point out where it is going to land us. The principle established by last night's vote, that the Provinces shall be recouped by the Dominion for money expended on public works declared to be for the benefit of the Dominion, will, no doubt, be applied to railways, and, if so applied, there will be no end to the liability involved. I do not offer any opinion as to the justice of it or not. But I call attention to this fact, that it is impossible to know where it will land us. Claims will be made by the different Provinces, and Ontario has already claimed twenty millions, and the principle on which that claim is based was acknowledged by last night's vote. I am afraid this policy is going to cause grave complications in the future.

To the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway, $3,200 per mile, not exceeding $64,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There are no details of any kind given.

Mr. POPE. This is an extension of the road built by the Grand Trunk Railway. I think it is from Brousseau station to Dundee. It is proposed to build this extension for the purpose of tapping the trade of northern New York and taking it to Montreal and the Maritime Provinces.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many miles are to be built for $64,000?

Mr. POPE. It is all to be completed, 23 miles.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What conditions are attached to this grant?

Mr. POPE. That 23 miles shall be built.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is simply a sop given to the Grand Trunk Railway, which has been hardly used by the Government lately, the Canadian Pacific Railway having had everything.

To the Cornwallis Valley Railway Company, for thirteenth miles of their railway from Kentville to Kingsport, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $41,600.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is this a de facto road?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. This is a branch of the Windsor and Annapolis Railway to a shipping point on the Basin of Minas, Kingsport.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is owned by that company?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. No, it is to be constructed by the Cornwallis Valley Company, which has been organised for the purpose.

To the Nova Scotia Central Railway Company, for thirty-four miles of their railway a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $108,800.

Mr. EISENHAUER. I was very much surprised to notice that the Government had failed to fulfil their promises made last Session in regard to the local company. This will be a great disappointment to the people of Annapolis and Lunenburg as well as to the railway company. The Minister of Railways said last Session that he regretted "that he had not been informed of the importance of this road earlier, so that this road would have been placed in the list of those subsidised by this Bill. However, the Government would come down with a measure of relief next Session." Further on he stated that this was a very important road, and after hearing all that had been said he felt that, perhaps, the Government ought to have included this road in the Subsidy Act. And again he said that next Session the Government would come down with a measure of relief for that road. Now, after admitting all this, they only subsidise part of the line, and that, I think, must be very injurious to that company, and the road will be delayed for at least a year, unless we get a definite promise from the Minister that he will subsidise the line next Session.

Mr. POPE. I should be very sorry to injure the hon. gentleman, but if he urges it very hard I shall have to strike this out.

Mr. EISENHAEUER. I am not complaining for myself, but I think it is due to the company, as well as to the county, that we should understand whether the promise of last Session is to be kept. It really was a promise.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think we are entitled to know.

Mr. EISENHAEUER. I understood the hon. gentleman to say, in a private conversation, that it was the intention of the Government to provide for a subsidy to this road, and, if he will say so now it will be satisfactory. I think the hon. gentleman should answer.

Mr. JONES. The Minister of Railways need not think he can bluff members of the House by threatening to withdraw votes which he has deliberately placed in the Estimates. That has been attempted on two or three occasions, but hon. gentlemen need not think that hon. members on this side will be prevented from criticising these resolutions by any such remarks as the hon. Minister of Railways has just used. The hon. gentleman finds himself in a difficult position, and to get out of the difficulty he attempts the game of bluff, but that is well understood. This matter is one which has been pending for a long time. It was pending during the time of the late member for Lunenburg, who, we are told, represented that county with great ability and fidelity. But he does not seem to have had influence or ability enough to be able to induce the Government to subsidise a road which the Minister now admits was in the interests of the country. It was also understood that that gentleman was sent for here in the last part of the Session, in order that he might bring such influence as he was supposed to possess—but which he failed to exercise when he was in the House—to bear upon the Government to carry out their promise of last Session. The railway is 78 miles long, running from Annapolis to Lunenburg. Previous to the last election, and after Mr. Kaulbach had failed to secure from the Government, of which he was such a consistent and ardent supporter, any actual subsidy, he obtained from the Minister of Railways a letter which he exhibited in the county of Lunenburg, pledging the Government to a subsidy for the whole line of railway during this Session, and that letter was turned round at the corner and endorsed "I approve of this.—John A. Macdonald."

Mr. POPE. Read it.

Mr. JONES. I have not got it, but the hon. gentleman will not deny that such a letter was addressed to Mr. Kaulbach, approved by the leader of the Government.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Where is the letter.

Mr. JONES. It was shown through the county during the election in the vain attempt to influence the electors to return a supporter of the Government. Having failed in that attempt, they now turn round and say they are going to give a subsidy for only 34 miles. The company went to

Mr. EISENHAEUER.

New York and raised $60,000 or $70,000 on the faith of the promise which was made, and their money has been expended on the work, and now they are told that a subsidy would be granted on only 34 miles of the road. At first I believed it was the intention to limit the expenditure to the county of Annapolis where it would be best calculated to assist the hon. gentleman in view of a certain contingency in that county, I say that this failure of the Government to keep their promise will paralyse the whole undertaking. It is a breach of faith on the part of the Minister and the Government, because they have it in black and white, endorsed by the First Minister, whose approval of a matter of that kind, of course, carries great weight with hon. gentlemen on that side. I am informed that this refusal of the Government to carry out their promise will paralyse the efforts of the company and put them in a very embarrassing position, so that they cannot go on at all. If it is not too late, I think the Minister should reconsider this matter, and deal with that road in the same way which he is dealing with others which are of much less importance.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am much inclined to think that the hon. gentleman's object is to get this grant struck out of the resolution. I believe that is the object which the hon. gentleman has in view. The hon. gentleman knows that Mr. Kaulbach, the late representative of the county of Lunenburg, pressed the construction of this road upon the Minister of Railways in the most urgent and earnest manner. He went to every member of the Government, and year after year he urged upon them the great importance of the construction of this road. It was rather a large undertaking; it involved a considerable expenditure of public money, but he represented that his constituents in the county of Lunenburg were extremely anxious that the road should be constructed. Finally the urgent entreaties and strong representations made in this House and out of it, as to the importance of having this road constructed, induced my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and the leader of the Government to express the intention of asking this Parliament for the means of constructing it. The Government supposed that the people of Lunenburg attached great importance to that road; but they found that when Mr. Kaulbach went back to the county, the gentleman who had succeeded in obtaining this promise of support from the Government for the construction of the road, was defeated, and that the county of Lunenburg had sent a gentleman here to oppose the Government that had expressed its desire to construct the road. The Government would, therefore, be perfectly justified in accepting the action of the people of Lunenburg as a reason for not proceeding with this work, and in holding to the conviction that they did not wish it done. As the Government are prepared to give a certain amount of aid, I think, looking to the future construction of the road, that ought to satisfy hon. gentlemen opposite. But I believe, from the tone of the speech made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Jones), that he is very anxious that the Government should strike out this grant, as I think the Government would be justified in doing after the manner in which it has been received. As to the hon. gentleman's references to the future of Nova Scotia, which I think it was somewhat indelicate for him to make, if he is as well prepared to meet his constituents in the county of Halifax, which he will probably be called upon shortly to do, as I or anyone standing in my place would be to meet the people of Cumberland, he would be a very fortunate man.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman says that this railway had engaged the attention of the Government for a long time prior to the representations of the late member for Lunenburg. This is in singular contrast to the statement made by the Minister of Railways at the close of the last Session, who, in reply to the hon. member for Digby, said that he regretted very much that the subject had not been brought to the attention of the Government. The late member for Lunenburg seems to have interviewed every member of the Administration except the Minister of Railways, and it appears that that gentleman was such a subservient follower of the Administration that they could afford to treat him with contempt, knowing that they could always rely upon his support. They found no reason for pledging themselves to make provision until they found that they had to do so in view of the elections coming on. But that is a point which they will have to settle with the people of the two counties of Annapolis and Lunenburg. But the people of those counties will be very much amazed to find that the Government had disregarded the written pledge of the hon. Minister to aid this road this Session, and there is no excuse for their not carrying it out. With regard to what the hon. gentleman said about the future, I hope he will not be very much worried on my account. If he is disposed to lecture hon. gentlemen as to the propriety of forecasting the future, I hope he will administer a little parental advice to the gentleman in this House representing the county of Pictou, who occupies a close relation to him. I recollect that, in the early part of this discussion, that gentleman made reference to the more than probability, as he was good enough to say, of my having to face the electors of Halifax. Therefore, whatever indiscretion there was on my part in referring to the future—and I do not intend to take the hon. member for Pictou as an example for me in that matter, or anything else in my political career—the hon. gentleman had better confine his advice and his admonitions to the narrower circle to which I draw his attention. With reference to the ultimate result of the elections, perhaps if I had all the adventitious aid which the hon. gentleman has successfully managed to obtain for himself in Cumberland in times gone by, as well as in the late election, I might have been in this House, if I had been so anxious to be here, during the whole time. We know by what means the hon. gentleman has always carried the county of Cumberland. We know well that on previous occasions the hon. gentleman had men there to exercise an influence which was more acceptable than himself, and stronger than himself—an influence to which he owes his election on many previous occasions as well as during last February; and I think that when these explanations come to be made before the proper tribunal, the hon. gentleman will not be in a position to take as much credit to himself for his strength in that county as he has presumed to take here to-day.

For a railway from Woodstock towards Centreville, twenty miles, a subsidy not exceeding $3,200 per mile, nor exceeding in the whole $64,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What sort of a road is this?

Mr. POPE. This is a new road, and is to run through a fine country. The work is generally very light. It is understood that there is to be a subsidy from the Local Government, which, with this subsidy, will enable the company to go on with the work. It is part of a road which connects with another road at the boundary line.

For a railway bridge over the St. Lawrence River at Oteau Landing, on the line of the Canada Atlantic Railway, a subsidy of 15 per cent. on the value of the structure, not to exceed $180,000.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Railways if his attention has been called to the claims of the Maskinongé and Lake Nipissing Railway. I understand that the company got a charter from this Parliament two years ago. They have applied to the Quebec Government for a land subsidy, and that Government have made a grant of 4,000 acres a mile for the construction of railways following that line, and were prepared to make the grant by Order in Council to this company. A memorandum has been prepared and sent to the Government and the members of the House, and a statement from the members representing that district was also forwarded to the Minister of Railways; and I am sorry that no attention has been paid to these representations, and that no provision has been made for that line. This railway is one of vast importance to the country, and especially to the Province of Quebec. I hope, if the Government are not prepared to grant a subsidy now, they will consider the question during vacation, and next Session put this railway on the same footing as the others.

Mr. POPE. There are a good many railways in the same position as this. This railway which is 400 or 500 miles long, asked for a subsidy of $5,000 per mile. That was entirely out of the question. We had to consider the question of uniting as many pieces, of building as many links as we could, and giving smaller subsidies.

Mr. BEAUSOLEIL. I do not find fault with the Government for not granting a subsidy of $5,000 a mile. The Government might not consider that a proper amount to grant, but that should not prevent them granting this road what is granted to others. This has been subsidised by the Quebec Government to the extent of 65 miles, and I would urge on the Dominion Government the necessity of also making a subsidy to procure the building of this branch.

Mr. PLATT. My attention has been called to the absence of any resolution with reference to another railway, which may be called a colonization road, and which will open up to a large extent the back regions of Ontario. I do not speak from a provincial standpoint. I regret that, in the discussion of railway subsidies, provincial lines should be drawn at all, for, in my opinion, we should consider these railways from the point of view of the benefit they will afford to the whole Dominion. The whole argument in favor of the Government railway policy is that it is the duty of the Government to construct such roads as will develop the undeveloped regions of the country. I have in my mind the proposed extension of the Ontario Central Railway, in which I am not directly interested, but which will open up a region of country not yet opened up. The bold policy announced by the Minister of Finance this Session, with regard to opening up the iron industries and the undeveloped regions of the country, justified us in expecting that a subsidy would be granted this line; and on the strength of that expectation, financial arrangements were made, which the absence of any provision in these resolutions will cause to fall to the ground. The policy of the Government has been such as to justify the promoters in expecting a grant. A bad policy may be well administered and become tolerable, and a good policy may be so administered as to become intolerable. The excuse of the Minister of Railways for not subsidising colonisation roads is that they are too extensive, and he has adopted the policy of satisfying, by grants to short branches, as many sections of the country as he can, in order to extend his political influence. I trust, however, that the Government will see the necessity of subsidising such lines as the Central Ontario and the Maskinongé and Nipissing. The roads subsidised by these resolutions are, in a great measure, connecting links, and in 9 cases out of 10 are built by rich companies through the rich portions of the various Provinces, where the people are able to build the roads themselves, if there is any absolute necessity for them. With regard to the general policy of the Government in the matter of subsidising railways, I have opposed that policy, but I claim that if we are to depart from the older and wiser plan of leaving these roads to be dealt with by the Provinces, let us follow the policy out to its full extent by subsidising lines which would develop portions of the country not yet opened up.

To the Lake Erie, Essex and Detroit River Railway Company, for 27 miles of their railway in lieu of the subsidy granted by the Act 49 Victoria, chapter 10, a subsidy not exceeding $118,400.

Mr. MITCHELL. I see there is a doubling up in this. The vote last year was for a distance of 37 miles, and this year, although the amount is the same, the distance is only 27 miles.

Mr. CHARLTON. Is it an actual subsidy of $4,014 a mile?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. CHARLTON. I thought the policy was not to exceed $3,200 per mile.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Except under very exceptional circumstances.

Mr. POPE. It was impossible for them to build the road with that subsidy. If the House thinks the vote is improper, I am willing to strike it out.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

Mr. POPE moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 170) to authorise the granting of subsidies in aid of the construction of lines of railway therein mentioned.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the first and second times, and House resolved itself into Committee.

(In the Committee.)

On section 1,

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I desire to ask whether this Harvey Branch Railway Co., where three miles of road are to be subsidised, has yet been built, or whether it is for improving a road which has been already in operation for the past four or five years. I understand that this is already constructed, and has been in operation for four or five years, that it terminates in a ship yard and was built in the interests of the ship yard, and I want to know if this amount is to be expended upon a line which is already in operation?

Mr. FOSTER. The Albert Railway was built very largely by means of help from the municipalities through which it passed, and it had no assistance from the Government. This is a branch from the main line. My hon. friend seems to think it runs simply to a mill. I am informed that it runs through a very good section of country, which is thickly settled. The road was partly built some time ago, and at present it is unrailled, and this is to rail that part of the road and make it a part of the Albert railway.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is, then, to rerail the Harvey Branch which has been in operation four or five years.

Mr. FOSTER. You may say it has been in operation, but it has been a very mild kind of operation indeed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I was not in the House when the item of 15 per cent. on the Canada Atlantic bridge was put through. What is the policy of the Government as to these bridge structures? Is this 15 per cent. the sum they intend to vote for bridges of an important character at railway crossings, and how do they arrive at 15 per cent.? What is the reason for selecting that particular proportion?

Mr. POPE. The reason I selected that was because I thought it about the same as we were giving to the road, that it corresponded to $3,200 a mile.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. On the supposition that these railways would cost $20,000 a mile?

Mr. POPE. I stated that this would only be given to bridges which cost $100,000 or upwards.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. This a matter of some consequence. Do I understand that the hon. gentleman has laid down the principle that this grant is to be made to no bridges costing less than $100,000?

Mr. POPE. Yes.

Mr. LANGELIER (Quebec). Do I understand that, according to the policy of the Government, they will be prepared to grant the same assistance to the Quebec bridge?

Mr. POPE. Every bridge will come on its own footing, but to my mind it is a very reasonable thing to do, to grant to a Quebec bridge or a Montreal bridge, or any other bridge 15 per cent., so long as we are subsidising the road of which the bridge forms a part, and I think this bears the same proportion to the cost of the bridge as $3,200 per mile does to the cost of the road.

Mr. SCRIVER. Before this is carried, I would ask the Minister of Railways whether, with reference to the proposed grant to the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company of $3,200 per mile, any condition as to where or how this money is to be expended, will accompany this grant of money. The Minister is probably aware that the road is completed, at least to the Province line. The connection with the American system of railways is not completed, though it has been commenced. It would be very desirable that that connection should be completed, and that this money should be expended for that purpose.

Mr. POPE. I think I can satisfy my hon. friend in that matter. This is intended to complete that connection, to draw, as I have stated, the trade of northern New York to our line.

Bill reported.

Mr. POPE moved the third reading of the Bill.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Before you read that Bill for the third time, I think it is only due to my hon. friend the member for East York (Mr. Mackenzie), to read to the House the resolution which, according to the hon. Minister of Finance, is the germ and the true parent of this whole railroad aid system. What Mr. Mackenzie did was this:—

“Mr. McKenzie moved that it is expedient to authorise the Government to make a temporary disposition of iron rails, as they are removed from Government railways, by loaning them to companies constructing railways which may be regarded as feeders to Government lines, such rails to be returned weight for weight to the Government stores at the junction of such lines.”

All I can say is, Sir, that the grain of mustard seed has grown into a great tree, and the fowls of the air are going to lodge in its branches.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

On resolution,

Office of the Queen's Privy Council.....$25,902 50

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). I think here is an item that I understood the Minister of Finance was to be reduced.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I may say, Mr. Speaker, that considering the late period of the Session, and the indications I have received from the other side of the House that it would protract the Session at least a day or two to ask concurrence in these items to which exception has been taken by hon. gentlemen, I propose to drop all those items in the Estimates that have reference to the increase of salary of Mr. Pope. Therefore, I move to reduce this item by $350.

Motion agreed to.

On resolution,

Department of Inland Revenue $41,880

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There was an explanation promised as to a matter to which exception was taken, and I think very justly—that was the enormous increase in the number of first-class clerks, of whom there were not less than nine in the Department of Inland Revenue. At the time that item was passed, full particulars of that increase were promised, and we desire to have from the Minister of Finance the reason why this enormous number should be considered necessary.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I think that explanation was given at a subsequent stage by the Minister of Inland Revenue, when the hon. gentleman may not have been in the House. The apparent large number of first-class clerks in the Department is due to the fact that there are so many branches—Excise, Weights and Measures, Canals, Slides, all of which have statistical and financial heads.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Out of a total of twenty-seven clerks in this Department there are nine first-class, and this is a decided abuse of the system, and is not warranted.

On resolution,

Railways and Canals, Canadian Pacific $180,100

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Under this head I notice the statement that under an Order in Council, dated 11th December, an allowance of $2,000 is made to Mr. Schreiber. What is the intention of the Government with respect to this matter, when is this allowance to stop?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I assume the moment the work is completed. A vote of $180,000 has been taken this year.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have had the whole work transferred to them.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The matter is not yet quite closed.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is it expected to close in 1888?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Then whatever may be done with respect to Mr. Schreiber, that particular vote will drop.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Yes.

On resolution,

Salaries and Contingencies of the Senate $59,488

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I move to reduce this amount by $1,200 for salary to Clerk of French Journals and Deputy Sergeant-at-Arms.

Motion agreed to.

On resolution,

Contribution to Imperial Institute $97,333 33

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I understood when the vote was taken that this sum is our contribution in full for this purpose, and that we have not pledged ourselves in any shape or way to any annual grant.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The hon. gentleman will see by reference to the papers that that has been stated in the most explicit terms to the Committee who have been dealing with the subject.

On resolution,

Immigration, salaries $229,525

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. With respect to this resolution, I need not trouble the House with a repetition of the arguments which are advanced on this side as to the policy of this grant; but it appeared to me that in the report of the Immigration Committee, which was laid on the Table of the House, but not passed, there had been some serious error as to the numbers. I do not see how the Department arrived at the conclusion that there were only 67,999 unaccounted for. It appears to me that the returns laid on the Table from the Department show conclusively that there are something over 100,000. There is no possibility of reconciling the statement in the report of the committee with the statements contained in the census and the returns in the reports of the Department of Immigration. Those reports show clearly that considerably over 100,000 have to be accounted for instead of 67,000. If the Minister of Agriculture has any statement to make on the subject I shall be glad to hear it, because, taking the reports of his predecessors, I find myself quite unable to understand how these figures are arrived at.

Mr. CARLING. I must say that I was not prepared to answer the hon. gentleman's question, as I did not expect it. I can promise the information later on.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. But when later on?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). On the judgment day.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The truth of the matter would appear to be this: That the report in question has been arrived at simply on speculative principles, and by a sort of hypothesis to the effect that large numbers of persons were improperly counted in as settlers who should not have been counted in. That appears to have been the explanation arrived at. We may as well admit the fact that, from whatever cause, over 100,000 people reported as settlers have gone. I do not see any way of getting out of that, and, therefore, I regret that the Minister cannot give a proper explanation of what appears, on the face of it, to be a very erroneous statement.

On resolution,

Quarantine $77,988

Mr. SCRIVER. I would like to enquire with reference to the Lazaretto at Tracadie. Some years ago I listened with painful interest to a statement made by Mr. Anglin, then member for Gloucester, N. B., with reference to this institution; on that and other accounts I felt a good deal of interest in it. Is the number of these unfortunate lepers diminishing or increasing? I would also like to know whether any report is made by any medical officer in charge of that institution to the Dominion Government, or is it more directly under provincial control?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I am afraid I have not that information, but I believe the number of patients has been comparatively stationary for a considerable time. The hon. gentlemen are aware that all efforts to extirpate the disease or overcome it have proved abortive, and the only thing to be done is to keep the patients isolated as much as possible, and prevent the extension of the disease. The numbers, I think, are about the same; some die and some take their places, and some new cases occur.

On resolution,

Pensions, Veterans of War of 1812 $6,630

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. How many of these veterans remain?

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There are 221 veterans receiving $30 each, 49 pensioners receiving $30 each, and one pensioner in Quebec receiving $60.

On resolution,

Pensions, re Rebellion $30,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When this item was before the Committee I called the attention of the Minister of Militia to the great apparent discrepancy between the pension paid to Mr. Swinburne, who received $730 because his son was shot, and the pension paid to Mrs. Brown, who received $250 because of her son, who was a lieutenant, having been killed in action. I requested the hon. gentleman to investigate the matter. He was good enough to show me the report of the officers in charge, but they do not appear to give any good reason for such an enormous discrepancy. I would not wish to diminish the allowance made to Mr. Swinburne, but Mrs. Brown seems entitled to more consideration than she has received.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. My hon. friend will understand that the Department is guided altogether by the reports of the commission charged with the duty of investigating all these cases. It struck me also that there was a great discrepancy between these two cases. It appears from the papers that in the one case a farm was left behind, while in the other case there was nothing left. Capt. Swinburne was the sole support of his family, and when he died they were helpless. In all these cases the Department follow absolutely the recommendations made by the commission.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the hon. Minister looks into the matter I think he will find that Mr. Swinburne had a salary equal, I should imagine, or more than equal to any income that could be derived from Mrs. Brown's farm. I am told that the matter attracted considerable attention in the part of the country where they belonged, Mr. Brown having been a lieutenant and Mr. Swinburne a captain. I shall not press the subject further than to inform the hon. Minister that the information given to me was that Mrs. Brown really required assistance almost as much as Mrs. Swinburne.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. I can inform the hon. gentleman that after his remarks on these cases, I gave instructions to have them investigated de novo, so that if circumstances arise to justify the Department in increasing the allowance to Mrs. Brown we will do so.

On resolution,

Mrs. Delaney, wife of Indian Agent killed at Frog Lake. $400

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. If the Minister of Militia will look at his notes, he will find he promised some explanation in respect to Mrs. Delaney and Mrs. Gowanlock. The question was raised as to whether some allowance should not be made to Mrs. Gowanlock, whose husband lost his life.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I made the enquiry, and the answer was that, in the one case, it was the life of an official, and in the other, that of Mrs. Gowanlock, her husband was not a government official.

Mr. BARRON. I understand that Mr. Gowanlock had been employed by the Government to go there, and establish a mill for the benefit of the settlers. He was to that extent in the employ of the Government. He would not have gone, had he not been induced by the Government to go. In that respect the Government should recognise his widow's claim, more especially as he was really acting in the service of his country in repelling the Indians at the time of the massacre.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. If the hon. gentleman will give me a memo. I will bring the matter under the notice of the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT. This matter has been brought under my notice, and I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Barron). I believe Mr. Gowanlock was in the service of the Government. Mrs. Gowanlock is a lady whom I know very well, she having been born and bred in the immediate vicinity where I reside, and I happened to meet her last Session and received communications from some friends of hers. It appears to me the circumstances in her case and Mrs. Delaney's are very similar, and I will be glad if the Government will do something for Mrs. Gowanlock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT.

On resolution,

Royal Military College, Kingston $59,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I called the attention of the Minister of Militia to the fact that a number of the young men who had left the college had not paid the charge of $100, and he was good enough to lay on the Table a statement of those who had paid. I observe one-half have paid and the other have not. The Minister stated there were some doubts in the Department just as to whether those who had not paid could be compelled to pay. It is, at all events, a very undesirable state of things, that when a dozen men leave the college under precisely the same circumstances, $100 each should be exacted from one-half and that the other half should pay nothing. It would be better, in the interests of the public service, that the amount should be refunded to those who paid rather than such a distinction should be allowed to exist.

Sir ADOLPHE CARON. There was never any doubt in the minds of the Department as to our legal right to charge the $100. The only question was whether we could recover this amount. Under the circumstances I do not see how it would be possible to refund it. It has gone into the Treasury.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would be very happy to suggest the way: the Minister of Finance can move that the $600 or $700 be refunded.

Mr. JONES. The hon. gentleman says there is a legal right for charging this amount; if so there must be a legal right to collect it, and that legal right must still exist with reference to those who have not yet paid. It would, at all events, be better to adopt the suggestion of the hon. member for South Oxford and refund the amount to those who have paid, rather than have the distinction that now exists.

On resolution,

Sault Ste. Marie Canal..... $1,000,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have tenders been asked for this work?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Not yet.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Have the engineers' reports been received?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. There have been elaborate reports made some time ago, on two occasions, and Mr. Page is now considering the whole question fully. Very full plans, and surveys, and estimates are in the Department, and Mr. Page is considering the whole thing.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is the hon. member aware whether these original reports were for the same depth of water as that which is now required? The size of the vessels navigating these lakes has increased so enormously that it would be important to know that. I think the hon. gentleman stated that eighteen or nineteen feet of water was required in this canal, which I would suppose would mean a depth of twenty feet.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Of course, this vote is taken with a view of having a first-class canal.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. It is decided to go on with it, is it?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. That is the intention.

On resolution,

Rideau Canal, Swing Bridge at Smith's Falls.....$10,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Minister of Finance promised some information in regard to that, as it was thought the amount was rather large.

Mr. HAGGART. This is for the purpose of building a bridge over the Rideau Canal, in the village of Smith's Falls. I think $10,000 would hardly build the bridge. I believe the municipality contribute a good deal towards it in the shape of approaches to each end of the bridge.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What was stated, if I recollect aright, was that a swing bridge was already in existence which it was proposed to remove.

Mr. HAGGART. There is a bridge below, but it is intended to build a bridge along the line of the main street.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When the matter was up for discussion, the hon. member was not present, and it was intimated that this was changing the bridge from one place to another. If it is building a new bridge, that is another thing, but if it is merely moving a bridge a hundred yards or so, it would not cost so much.

Mr. HAGGART. It is building a new bridge.

PROROGATION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have received a communication from His Excellency the Governor General's secretary, informing me that it is His Excellency's intention to come down for the purpose of prorogation to-night at 8 o'clock.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Positively? Then we might save some money by protracting this discussion.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I am afraid that would not be successful.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

On resolution,

Repairs, Furniture, Heating, etc. $115,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I would ask the Minister of Public Works what he computes the average expenses incurred for a post office and custom house of the class that he is erecting so liberally throughout the Dominion to be?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. In the larger places, not including, of course, the cities, the buildings would cost about $1,600 to $1,800, plus the fixtures and the furniture.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. What about is the actual cost for heating and keeping such a building in repair?

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. I could not exactly say. The caretaker costs generally from $350 to $550. Then the heating of the building might cost about $200, light, $90, and contingencies, perhaps $150; so that altogether the cost would be $1,000 or $1,200.

Harbors and Rivers, Ontario $78,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I will only make one remark about all these votes, and that is that the excellent intentions of the Minister of Finance have been terribly defeated in his Supplementary Estimates, for I observe that the most of them are about three times as much as he gave us to expect some time ago.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. The Supplementary Estimates have not absorbed the balance that, in my statement, I showed to the House, as the estimated surplus a year hence.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think a very considerable deal more will come out of these extra taxes than he informed us.

Subsidy to a line of steamers between France and Quebec $50,000

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is there any further information about this?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I laid the Order in Council on the Table of the House. A steamer is now on her way, or has arrived.

On resolution,

Intercolonial Railway $1,600,000.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I notice that in the ten months of this fiscal year, about $2,500,000 have been expended. What is the estimate of the expenses for the remaining two months? Is it likely to bear any proportion to the cost for the preceding ten months?

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. Certainly not. That large amount was owing to the snow.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I suppose it would not be unreasonable to assume that the remaining two months would require about $200,000.

Mr. POPE. I could not say.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. I do not think it would be very far from that sum.

Mr. POPE. The expenses in connection with snow are estimated at $250,000 for the winter.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Is that extra or the total amount?

Mr. POPE. Extra; we have never had anything approaching the quantity of snow since 1875.

Legislation, House of Commons—salaries, &c. $3,727

Mr. SCRIVER. While we are upon this item I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the inadequate accommodation provided for the men who attend to the pasting and despatching of documents for hon. members. The room in which they are forced to work is one of the most uncomfortable in the building, and my sympathies have been greatly excited more than once at the inconvenience and discomfort which they experience in doing their work. I think the employes in that room are perhaps the hardest worked of any in the buildings, and as I do not give them very much work to do myself, I feel more at liberty to speak of the matter. I would like, if it were possible, that some additional compensation should be given to those men, and I think as soon as possible they should be provided with another room.

Mr. CHARLTON. I would corroborate every word which has been said by the hon. member for Huntingdon (Mr. Scriver). If there are any employes of the House who earn their wages and do not eat the bread of idleness, they are the men who work in that room. Their work is harder, perhaps, than that of any other employé of the House.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN. As to the locale of those men, that will be taken into consideration in connection with the other suggestions made by hon. members with regard to accommodation for committees, and for certain bureaux. The question of indemnity will also have to be considered, but I am not in a position to say what will be done.

On resolution,

Franchise Act $150,000

Mr. BARRON. I wish to draw attention to a matter which appears to me to be irregular. I see that Judge Boyd, of Toronto, gets a superannuation allowance of $1,600, and I understand that the statute provides that when a judge is superannuated and is appointed to any public office under the Crown, the salary he gets in that office is deducted from his superannuation allowance.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, no.

Mr. BARRON. I will read the provision of the statute:

"If any judge of a county court, after having continued in office as such judge for a period of at least ten years, becomes afflicted with some permanent infirmity, disabling him from the due execution of his office, and resigns his office, or if a judge of a county court, after having continued in office as such judge for a period of at least 25 years, resigns his office, Her Majesty may, by letters patent, under the great seal of Canada, grant to him a pension equal to two-thirds of the annual salary of which he was in receipt at the time of his resignation, to continue henceforth during his natural life.

"2. If any person, receiving a pension under this section becomes entitled to any salary in respect of any public office under the Government of Canada, such salary shall be reduced by the amount of such pension."

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. If the salary is larger than the pension, of course there will have to be a reduction; but the principle, I understand is this: A judge or any officer having a superannuation allowance may be called upon to do any work he is fitted for, and he must be paid for it over and above his superannuation allowance, but the sum so paid him with his allowance must not exceed what his salary formerly was. It would be a great pity if the Government could not avail themselves of the services of a retired judge in duties they are peculiarly fitted to perform.

On resolution,

Surveys of Indian Reserves in Ontario and Quebec...$1,930

Mr. SCRIVER. I was very much pleased to learn that a deputation waited upon the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs not long ago with reference to the Indian lands in Dundee, which are occupied by settlers under long leases, and that the hon. gentleman was in favor of some arrangement under which those leases might be commuted. Having given some attention to this question, I am satisfied that such a commutation would be both in the interest of the Indians and the settlers, and I rise to express the hope that the hon. gentleman will give his early attention to the matter, and use his powerful influence to induce the Indians to consent to some reasonable term of commutation.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. It is quite true I have seen the assessors, and I have also seen a series of deputations from the Indians. This question has occupied the attention of the hon. gentleman and of myself for some time. It is an exceedingly troublesome question. The difficulty is that the Indians have strict legal rights to all those lands. Leases were given, some for 30 years, and others for 99 years. The former have long expired, and the latter have also expired. The Indians say that they want their lands and that they will not have anything else, and according to the strict law they have a right to them. At the same time I think it would be exceedingly hard to take them away from the settlers who settled upon them under leases early in the settlement of this country. It was thought at the time those leases were given, that the Crown had no right to grant the estates in freehold, and they met the supposed difficulty by granting long leases, thinking, as we are apt to do, that a lease for 99 years was equivalent to a freehold. The settlers on those lands have made great improvements, and I think it would be a harsh and unwise proceeding to expel them. On the other hand, the Government are the trustees for those Indians, who say, we want our property, and therein is the difficulty. The only equitable mode of settlement is that suggested by the hon. gentleman, which I greatly favor, that there should be some commutation on the value of the estates, so that instead of depriving the settlers of their lands they should pay a reasonable sum in consideration of being allowed to retain the improvements they have made. I shall carry out my promises of taking up this question immediately, and hope to have it settled some way before next Session; and if we find there is no means of bringing the parties to an amicable settlement, it will be in the power of the Legislature to cut the Gordian knot. The hon. gentleman knows an attempt was made years ago but failed. We must endeavor between now and next Session to get a commutation agreed upon between the settlers and the Indians.

Mr. SCRIVER. The hon. gentleman is in a measure mistaken with regard to the 99 years' leases. Very few have expired, and the great bulk of the tenants have the privilege of renewing them. Most of the 30 years' leases have expired.

RULES RESPECTING PRIVATE BILLS.

Sir HECTOR LANGEVIN moved that the report of the Special Committee appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in revising the rules respecting Private Bills, in so far as they relate to the incorporation, or to the amendments of the Acts incorporating railway companies, be adopted, and that the said rule be made a Standing Order of the House.

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). There is another matter that I think the Government would do well to consider before we meet again, and consider some other rules of the House besides the one dealt with by the committee, and I refer to the time of our sitting. It does seem to me that we would greatly improve the proceedings of Parliament if we were to meet at an earlier hour than three o'clock in the afternoon, and if we were to avoid evening sessions, at all events, until towards the close of the Session. If we were to meet here and get through our committee work before twelve o'clock, and then meet in the House at one o'clock and sit till six, it seems to me we would be putting in a good day's work, quite as much as any ordinary individual is qualified to within twenty-four hours. We would then have our evenings to study the Bills submitted by the Government, and the private members would have an opportunity of reading the reports, and we would come here the next day prepared to deal intelligibly with the questions that are submitted for our consideration. Most members who take an active part in the proceedings of the House, are aware that we have little opportunity for the consideration of those important questions that are submitted to us, except when they are actually before us, and we propose to take some step with regard to them in the House; and this is all the more true because the measures of the Government are scarcely ever introduced in the early part of the Session when the members have more leisure than at a later period. As a rule, neither the members of the Administration nor members who have private business that they wish to submit to the consideration of Parliament, do so at a very early period. They give notice to the House, and then several days pass before these measures are before us, so that we have no opportunity of considering them at a time when we have the most leisure. Now, if we were to meet here during the hours of daylight, and were to undertake to transact our business within that time, and have the evening at our disposal, as they do in most other legislative bodies, I am satisfied we would get through more business in a shorter time, and in a more businesslike manner, and a great deal of that irritation in discussion which grows out of weariness and physical exhaustion, would be avoided. Now, I hold in my hand a statement—which I will not trouble the House at this moment with reading—showing the hours of meeting in all the representative legislative bodies of the world, and I believe this Parliament and that of the United Kingdom are almost the only ones where a large portion of the business is transacted in the hours of night. Now, I think we ought to have a reformation in that particular. I am satisfied that we would improve our parliamentary proceedings, that we would increase the efficiency of this body, and we would be enabled to consider and deliberate with more care the public measures that are submitted to us. I earnestly press upon the attention of the Government the propriety of changing our practice in that particular, and I ask them at the next Session of Parliament to give a change of this sort a fair trial. Let us try the experiment for one Session and if hon. gentlemen find that it does not prove satisfactory, we can revert to the old practice again. But I am satisfied that if we were to adopt it for one Session, we would never go back to the barbarous practice that has hitherto prevailed with regard to the sittings of this House.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Would the hon. gentleman be good enough to hand to Hansard the statement that he speaks of?

Mr. MILLS (Bothwell). It is hardly in the state in which it could be handed to Hansard.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Then he would kindly correct it and hand it in at any time so that we can see it. It is important that we should see the action of other Legislatures. I have seen the experiment tried once or twice, perhaps two or three times, and both sides found that it was not successful. If an Opposition was not a very powerful Opposition, or was not imbued with the idea of removing the Government of the day, fixing an hour would do no harm. But our experience was—and the experience of the Government of Baldwin and Lafontaine was—that whenever an hour is fixed, and the Opposition had any party purpose to gain, a discussion always arose and was kept up until that hour. In Supply and matters of that kind, when they think that the Government might, perhaps, be thrown over, it was found that the practical obstruction of discussing until a fixed hour really rendered a day a lost day. A distinguished financier, who was a member of Baldwin's Government, stated that they could never carry anything until after one o'clock at night. However, the matter will be discussed between now and when we meet again. I would say that I do not see how any better opportunity of reading up the measure before Parliament would be gained by an adjournment before dinner time. If the Commons meet, say, at ten o'clock, they will sit until one, and then if they go to lunch and come back to Parliament at once, and keep in Parliament until six, and then go to their dinner, as a general rule the vast mass of members will not feel inclined to sit down to read dry Bills, dry measures, after dinner. If there were an evening lecture, or a soirée, or a theatre, or anything of that kind, I am afraid those attractions would draw away all except stern martyrs to duty like the hon. gentleman and myself. However, perhaps it might be well to try the experiment, and we have got an Opposition that has assisted the Government, after exercising, of course, their due right in criticising the measures and administration of the Government—I repeat that we have an Opposition now which has really assisted the Government. If we were always sure of an Opposition of the same kind, I think, perhaps, the experiment might succeed. But then you know with the accumulation of errors of the present Government, the hopes of the Opposition will gain strength, I am afraid, and if a fixed hour were settled that could not be overcome, I am afraid the measures of the Government would advance with very slow and cautious pace, and the acceleration which we have witnessed for the last week or ten days we would not see under those circumstances.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. There is an important difference between then and now. At the time to which the hon. gentleman has alluded, members were paid by the day, and, unless I have been grossly misinformed, the proceedings were delayed under those circumstances. Now, members are paid by the job, and there is a general disposition to get through.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I thought the Government only were paid by jobs.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. The Government may make by their jobs—that is quite another question. This difference, however, alters very materially the condition of things from that which existed in the right hon. gentleman's early parliamentary experience. I was not a member of the old House when that system prevailed, but I have heard that it was one of the causes of unnecessary delay that led to the Session being spun out. I think I have heard the First Minister state that was the case.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. No doubt it was so.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Our present system offers strong inducements the other way, and I do not think in that respect the results that the hon. gentleman fears will be as likely to occur. It would be a very great improvement if our hours could be shortened. It is not conducive to the proper discussion of public affairs that very important questions should be debated at two, three or four o'clock in the morning. However, what I rose to call attention to was in regard to another matter on which there will be, except on the Government benches, much less difference of opinion. It will very greatly conduce to the convenience of members if the Government could see their way to fix, except in the case of a general election, some definite date early in the year for the meeting of Parliament. It is a matter of very great inconvenience to the majority of members to be summoned to Ottawa or kept here during May, June and July. It would very greatly tend to lessen inconvenience of serving the country in Parliament if a rule could be established that Parliament, bar the case of general elections, would meet some time in January. I am willing to concede a few days to the necessities of the Government knowing how it is myself. But I think we ought to have a standing rule that Parliament should meet not later than 31st January. Were that done, I believe in almost every case the House would rise by Easter or by first May, and I think that hon. gentlemen on both sides will agree with me in saying that were such a rule established it would be beneficial to the country and good for themselves, more particularly if the public were given to understand that we would adhere to our rules with respect to the introduction of Private Bills, and that gentlemen who wanted legislation must give notice in due time. I think many of the hon. gentlemen's supporters, as well as my hon. friends on this side, will be ready to press on the Government the desirability of fixing on some such rule as I have suggested, and I am quite sure after two or three years' experience of it we would never depart from it were it made a definite rule.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I quite agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman in regard to Parliament meeting early in the year. On the principle that Parliament is summoned by the Crown, we could not fix by statutory enactment the time of the meeting of Parliament. But we came to a sort of agreement some years ago, that Parliament should meet at the end of January or in the first or second week of February at the latest, and I think that has generally been carried out.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. I think it has been departed from. Last year we did not meet until 1st April.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER. On 27th February.
Mr. MILLS (Bothwell).

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. There was some reason which I cannot recall at this moment for the meeting of Parliament being postponed till 27th February. I remember that members from Ontario opposed the meeting of Parliament until after 24th January, on the ground that they were interested in the municipal elections. Here are the dates of the meeting of Parliament: 1867, November; 1868, April; 1869, February; 1870, February; 1871, April; 1872, March; 1873, October; 1874, March; 1875, 4th February; 1876, 10th February; 1877, 8th February; 1879, 7th February; 1880, 13th February; 1881, 12th February and 9th December; 1882, 9th February; 1883, 9th February; 1884, 17th January; 1885, 29th January; 1886, 28th February. So that we meet of late years early in February as a rule.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. Still I think we might meet a little earlier. It would answer every purpose if a definite clear understanding was arrived at that, without grave cause, Parliament would meet at or about 1st February.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I agree with that.

Sir RICHARD CARTWRIGHT. When the House meets later, members suffer great inconvenience and loss. There is another reason which the Minister of Finance in his professional capacity, if I may allude to his professional capacity, will thoroughly appreciate. It is, that sitting late in hot weather is very injurious to hon. members who are compelled to remain in the House for many hours, and it should be avoided.

Mr. SCRIVER. I was not present when the Minister of Public Works made the motion now before the House for revising the rules relating to Private Bills, but I understand that he embodied a proposition to have a model Bill for railways, which is to be followed in all instances, unless some good reason for departing from it is presented; and that, in addition to all applications for railway charters, shall be accompanied by plans. I approve very much of the adoption of such rules. My limited experience in the Railway Committee satisfies me that a great deal of time has been lost through the want of such a Bill, and that we have chartered a great many companies when we had no plans presented to satisfy the committee that those projects were anything more than paper projects. I would, however, remind the hon. gentleman—because he was a member of the Quebec Legislature when I was a member, a good many years ago—that similar rules were adopted there, but they were not enforced. Time after time companies came before the committee without such plans as the rules required them to have, but for some plausible reason or other the rules were waived. I trust that if the Minister of Public Works continues to be—as I trust he will be as long, at least, as the present Administration is in power—the very efficient chairman of the Railway Committee, he will do all in his power to exact the rigid compliance with these rules.

Mr. AMYOT. Would it not be well to have a rule in this committee, as there is with regard to private companies, that the action shall be tried where the cause of action arose?

Sir HECTOR LANDEVIN. I think the hon. gentleman had better leave the model Bill as we have adopted it, and experience will teach us what other amendments should be made. I think the Bill will be a great improvement in the work of the committee of which the hon. gentleman is a member. He must have seen that without close attention to the work of the committee and long hours we could not have got through with the work of the Session, so that it became necessary to adopt a Bill of this kind for the purpose of curtailing our work. I think when the principal seat of a company is determined by the Act, the company will be served there by any process of court which may be issued against them. However, that is one of those matters which may come before the committee when the Bill will be before us.

Mr. AMYOT. I am entirely in favor of the Bill; I think it is a great improvement.

Mr. DAVIN. I wish to call the attention of the House to a misapprehension on the part of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) last night. When the right hon. gentleman, the First Minister, was putting through his Bill extending the life of the North-West Council, the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), I being absent for a short time, made the statement that I had introduced several Bills and that I had allowed them to slide. A similar statement was made in a paper with which I believe the hon. gentleman is connected. That statement on the part of the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) is unjust to the Government and unjust to me. I put three Bills on the notice paper. With regard to one of those Bills, namely, the one dealing with the Torrens Act, every feature of it was adopted by my hon. and learned friend, the Minister of Justice. The principal feature of another Bill, dealing with homesteading in the North-West, was conceded by the hon. member for Cardwell (Mr. White), the Minister of the Interior. I know it was a misapprehension; I know the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills), is too fair and candid a man to wilfully make a misstatement in this House, but it illustrates the need of some reform in the direction indicated a few minutes ago by the hon. member, because it showed that the strain on his faculties has been such that he has been unable to observe what has gone on in this House; but it will be seen that with regard to two of those measures, the hon. gentleman's statement was not quite correct. In regard to the third measure, dealing with the establishment of Provincial Governments in the North-West Territories, I introduced that Bill as embodying the wishes of the North-West Council, expressed by resolution. I found, however, when I came down here, that my colleagues, who were in communication with their constituents, thought the time had hardly come for such a measure. I found there was a general feeling amongst members of the House that the time had hardly come for the establishment of Provincial Governments in the Territories, and I found that the Government held the same opinion. And, Sir, in the capital of the North-West Territories a meeting was held at which resolutions were passed. These resolutions were sent to me, and they stated emphatically that they were, on the whole, well content with the Government of the North-West Territories as it exists at present. Under such circumstances, I thought it would be impertinent on my part to attempt to push forward that measure. I have thought, therefore, that it would be desirable to let the hon. member for Bothwell (Mr. Mills) know the exact facts of the case, because, as I have said, his statement made here and elsewhere is unjust at once to the Government and myself.

Report respecting Rules for Private Bills concurred in, and Resolutions ordered to be made Standing Orders of the House.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved that the House again resolve itself into Committee of Ways and Means to consider the following resolutions:—

1. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending 30th June, 1887, the sum of $3,212,934.13 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.
2. Resolved, That towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty for the financial year ending 30th June, 1888, the sum of $23,512,661.96 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Mr. McLELAN. I may say referring to a previous question by the hon. member for South Oxford (Sir Richard Cartwright) that, as near as I can get the information, the amount paid to the Canadian Pacific Railway for post office services, on the main line from Montreal to Port Moody is $78,372.96. The total amount we paid to that line was $221,707, and to the Grand Trunk $295,190.

Motion agreed to, and House again resolved itself into Committee of Ways and Means.

(In the Committee.)

Mr. CASEY. Before the resolutions pass, I want to ask a question regarding the Labor Commission which was appointed some time before the meeting of this House, to enquire into the condition of laboring men. Although the House has been in Session for more than two months, we have as yet had no report from this commission. I want to ask the Government what the Labor Commission is doing, and when we are likely to have a report from it as to its proceedings. I suppose it has taken a large quantity of evidence. What evidence it has taken up to this time I think should have been submitted to the House; but I hope that that evidence, as well as whatever evidence it may take before the House meets again, will be submitted to the public during the recess.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. The Labor Commission was appointed before the Government had come to the determination to dissolve the House. The moment we came to that determination, we thought it well to postpone the meeting of that commission, because if it had gone on to hold meetings it would be held, and justly held by the country, to be an electioneering machine. Therefore, it did not meet at all. I think the Government will likely appoint one or two more gentlemen on the commission, and they will set to work during the course of the summer. The commission has held no meetings and incurred no expense as yet.

Mr. CASEY. Will the Government see that the labor interest—the labor organisations—of the country are represented on the commission?

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. Oh, yes.

Committee rose and reported resolutions, which were read the first and second times, and concurred in.

Sir CHARLES TUPPER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 169) for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1887, and the 30th June, 1888, and for other purposes relating to the public service.

Motion agreed to; Bill read the first, second and third times, and passed.

House rose during pleasure.

House resumed.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD. I desire, at this late hour, to retrieve an omission of mine. I do not know whether the hon. members in the House have observed the beautiful bust of the late Duke of Newcastle in the library. It is not only a good likeness but a work of art, executed by the first portrait sculptor in England, perhaps in Europe, Mr. Boehm. It was the property of Sir Edward Watkin, a great friend of the duke, who was good enough to send it to me for the purpose of being disposed of in Canada in the manner I thought best; and I sent it here to add to the arts and treasures of our library. The bust is a beautiful work of art of itself; if you will observe, it is on a pedestal of black marble, which was modelled by the sculptor who made the figure of Africa in the Albert Memorial in Kensington Gardens. It is altogether a most valuable present in every way, besides being valuable as the portrait of the Duke of Newcastle, than who Canada had no better friend when he was Colonial Minister. I presented it to the library in the beginning of the Session; and, in the report of the librarian, it is stated to be a contribution from me. That is a mistake. I was merely the agent who presented it to our National Gallery. I wish to have that corrected; perhaps next Session I may ask the House to give expression to its gratitude for the very handsome present added to our treasures by Sir Edward Watkin.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Trow.

Mr. TROW. I suppose it is imperative that I should say something, however, though it is with great reluctance in the presence of so many hon. gentlemen who are so much more capable of addressing this House. I know that we are all anxious to leave for our respective places of abode, and I think it would be out of place on my part or on that of any other hon. gentleman to occupy much time in making a speech. We have had a variety of speeches of late in abundance. I may say that some of our friends have had a diarrhoea of words. Probably more business has been done within the last 48 hours than should have been done in a full week. However, it may be all right, but I think it would have been better, in regard to some measures that have been passed, if there had been more time for thorough discussion and greater ventilation, for the purpose of analysing and perfecting them. Yet, all in all, I think we have had a very favorable Session. It has been short. I must congratulate the members of the Government, who have attended to their duties remarkably closely, and especially during the past week. I am happy to see that the Premier is in his usual trim, and I hope he will continue so for many years to come. He not only astonishes the members of this House, but he astonishes the country at large, when, having been so many years in the service of the country, he is still possessed of all that vim, energy, activity and determination to do business. We have no desire that he should leave this scene of action, but we have an anxious desire that he should change positions from that side of the House to this. That is all. However, considerable of the business of the Session has been tolerably well ventilated. There is one measure of the Minister of Public Works, the chairman of the Railway Committee, which is a model Bill in reference to railways. Notwithstanding all the legal talent we have on that very large committee, I do not know but that something else might be done. I think in future it will be necessary, perhaps, to muzzle a few of our professional men. Notwithstanding the talent that we have on that committee, I notice that one Bill went to the Senate giving authority to the directors of a company to execute the trustees at such time and in such manner as they thought proper. If the Senate had not perfected that Bill, the trustees of that railway would have been in a very dangerous position. It would have been a very serious matter for the trustees. I must also congratulate the Finance Minister. This is a day for congratulation. I think the Minister of Finance has exceeded his usual determination to do business this Session, and I hope he will return renewed in health and vigor to his duties in the old country. I understand he is going to Madrid to perfect some treaty, and I hope he will long remain there—I mean in London. I had the pleasure of meeting the hon. gentleman in England last Session, and he paid probably more attention to me than I anticipated, or probably than I deserved. I know that I received invitations and tickets from the Minister of Finance to dine with the Mayor of Liverpool, the Mayor of London, the Mayor of Edinburgh, and half a dozen other Mayors, and I was sorry that my circumstances were such that I could not embrace the opportunity of being at those dinners, because I should have taken great pleasure in attending them. However, on the whole, I think we have had a very pleasant Session.

Sir JOHN A. MACDONALD.

There have been some little bickerings. Of course we may always expect that. We must naturally differ. We are constituted so, and probably it is best that we should be. Our minds are so framed that we cannot look upon one object in the same manner. Even the Apostles did not. They differed among themselves. It cannot be expected that poor frail mortals like members of Parliament can be perfect. But I can assure you that the members of the Opposition are highly essential, probably more so than the members of the Government. I regret exceedingly that our respected leader has suffered from such affliction, owing to his onerous duties, that he had to leave this House much against his own will and very much against the will of his followers on this side. He has devoted followers, and we hope that next Session he will be able to return to his duties renewed in vigor. Sir, we expect a great future, we expect to be over on the other side of the House, well, in 12 or 15 months, at least. There is no doubt that we were designed by Providence to occupy that position. I do not wish to criticise too severely the acts of our hon. friends opposite, but it seems to be the opinion of the country that we are woefully in debt. At this period of the Session I have no time to enumerate the number of millions—because we count in millions here—that we have spent this Session. I think the very last Bill we passed ought to have received more criticism than it did, and if it had been presented a few weeks earlier, no doubt it would have received more criticism. I think the system of delaying important measures is to be condemned. I also think it is a vicious system to bonus bits of railway here and there, of two or three miles. I suppose there is no Government perfect, and perhaps if our friends had been on the other side of the House, they might have taken the same course, but I doubt it very much. At all events, we are happy that we have such a distinguished gentleman in the Speaker's chair. I have not heard one word in disparagement of his rulings, or of the proficiency of his conduct as Speaker of this House. While the present Administration is in power, he will no doubt occupy that position, and I do not know but that even if a change should take place, our friends would be rather inclined to continue him in that office. We had great respect for the late Speaker and for other Speakers, but the hon. gentleman who now occupies that chair, and who is so fluent in both languages, certainly seems to have understood the rules pertaining to his office thoroughly at the outset, and he will, no doubt, continue to improve Session after Session. I hope he will be long continued in that position by one party or the other.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I am certain that every member of this House will cordially join in the felicitations and congratulations offered by the hon. gentleman who so worthily represents Her Majesty's Opposition here to-night. Your selection for the high position which you illustrate and adorn had my approval, as I had no doubt but that you would most worthily perform the duties of your high office, and maintain the dignity and preserve the privileges of the House of Commons. It has been my good or bad fortune to occupy a seat in the Canadian Parliament since 1863, and my relations with your predecessors have always been of the most pleasant and friendly character. In the future, as in the past, I have no doubt but that the same kindly relations will obtain. We understand that you propose to visit the Mother Country during the coming season. We trust that you will have a pleasant and profitable voyage, and that you will return with renewed energy and vigor to your parliamentary, legal and martial duties. I think that we have reason to congratulate the House and country on the condition of prosperity which obtains. With the prospect of an abundant harvest, our country may be ranked amongst the most favored of nations. We have had in the main a pleasant Session, and, although under parliamentary system some friction must obtain, yet, on the whole, our system appears to work as well, if not better, than those of the older civilizations. We regret exceedingly the absence of the hon. leader of the left centre. With the maximum of intelligence and the minimum of following, he always, in all his parliamentary experience—by his boldness and independence, and his fearless criticism of all public measures—commands the respect and attention of the House. In this way, not only is the public service benefited, but the Session is so much protracted, greatly to the profit and advantage of the public generally, and the inhabitants of Ottawa and the surrounding counties particularly. A magnificent testimonial would fittingly mark the appreciation of his public services. We all regret exceedingly the absence, through illness, of the leader of Her Majesty's Opposition, and trust that he may be restored to his wonted health and vigor. We join most heartily in the expression of Mr. Trow with regard to the fact that the great statesman, who has played so important a part in the building up of the Dominion, should have been able to perform his part with such singular vitality and intellectual vigor as he has manifested during the Session. We trust that he may be long spared to continue and consolidate the question. We were happy to welcome to our parliamentary ranks the hon. Minister of Finance. He came to us with renewed energy and power. In the old land he had done us good yeoman service, as Minister for the Dominion. We trust that he will convey to the great monarch, whose jubilee we have just celebrated, our congratulations on Her having reached the fiftieth anniversary of Her reign, as well as the assurance of the love, affection and loyalty of the Canadian people.

PROROGATION.

A Message from His Excellency the Governor General by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:—

MR. SPEAKER,—

His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of the House in the Senate Chamber.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY:

The Commons of Canada have voted the Supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the Public Service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Excellency the following Bill: An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money required for defraying certain expenses of the Public Service, for the financial years ending respectively the 30th June, 1887, and the 30th June, 1888, and for other purposes relating to the Public Service, to which Bill I humbly request Your Excellency's assent.

To this Bill the Royal Assent was signified in the following words:—

In Her Majesty's name, HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL thanks Her loyal subjects, accepts their benevolence, and assents to this Bill.

After which His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to close the First Session of the Sixth Parliament of the Dominion with the following

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In relieving you from further attendance in Parliament, I desire to convey to you my appreciation of the diligence and earnestness which you have shown in the performance of your important duties.

I thank you in the Queen's name for the cordial and affectionate congratulations you have offered to Her Majesty on the completion of the fiftieth anniversary of Her happy reign.

I have taken care to transmit your loyal Address to be laid at the foot of the Throne.

The readjustment of the tariff for the purpose of further developing our home industries upon principles which have been received with such marked acceptance by the people of Canada, will, it is confidently expected, in an especial manner encourage the working of our vast mines of iron and coal, and promote the production within our own country of all the more important iron manufactures.

The establishment of a Department of Trade and Commerce, under the supervision of a responsible Minister, and the measures you have passed for the better organisation of other Departments of Government, will, I trust, tend to aid in the extension of our home and foreign trade, as well as to improve the efficiency of the public service.

The numerous Acts relating to railway and other industrial enterprises to which I have given Her Majesty's assent, indicate a steady growth in the national progress of the Dominion, and your liberal appropriation for the construction of the Sault Ste. Marie Canal ensures the completion of our great system of inland navigation at an early period.

Our agricultural population will, I am sure, learn with much pleasure of the provision you have made for the maintenance of the Experimental Farm in this vicinity, and the establishment of auxiliary stations in the several Provinces.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In Her Majesty's name I thank you for the provision you have made for the requirements of the Public Service. I shall see that it is applied with all due regard to economy.

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I trust that under the blessing of Almighty God the present promise of an abundant harvest may be fully realised, and that when we meet again I shall be able to congratulate you on a still further increase in the general prosperity of the country. Meanwhile I bid you farewell.

The SPEAKER of the Senate then said:

Honorable Gentlemen of the Senate, and

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is HIS EXCELLENCY THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S will and pleasure, that this Parliament be prorogued until Tuesday, the second day of August next, to be here held, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until Tuesday, the second day of August.

The Parliament of the Dominion of Canada was then prorogued to the 2nd day of August next.
