It is not often I agree with the hon. member for Medicine Hat but maybe this is one of the times I do agree with him. This is a move to destroy the Prairie Farm Assistance Act—and I say that with my tongue in my cheek. I say to the hon. member for Medicine Hat that perhaps he is one in this house who has done more to destroy the Prairie Farm Assistance Act than anyone else in Canada. Tonight he deliberately started a smear campaign by referring to articles such as the one in Time magazine, before hearing the other side of the story, and I am afraid others in this house have also made statements without hearing the other side of the story.

In order to correct certain wrong assumptions I should like to clear up a few inferences which were left by the Pope report, as it is called. I attended most of the hearings. I heard the evidence. I know that the director made four accusations—

Mr. McIlraith: I rise on a point of order which I think should properly be advanced at this time. It is merely this. The reference to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act is only incidental to permitting grain grown on insured land to receive a rebate, and I submit that debate should be limited to this particular item in the resolution and not be allowed to extend over the whole subject of the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and the other matters which are dealt with under item 78 on the order paper.

If the remarks of the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek are to be limited to answering earlier remarks which may have been made before the point of order was taken, I have no objection. But if they are the start of an attempt to go beyond that, I would wish to raise a point of order.

Mr. McIntosh: On that point of order, Mr. Chairman, I would say that although the minister has given us his idea of what the resolution means I have another idea of what it means. I believe it is the thin edge of the wedge designed to do away with prairie farm assistance. That is what I am speaking about tonight and I think it demands a certain amount of explanation on my part.

Mr. Olson: I agree with the minister to some extent when he says there will be an opportunity to discuss P.F.A.A. under resolution No. 78 on the order paper. At the same time he said this resolution is simply limited to rebate certain sums collected on lands which have been reinsured. Along with that goes a clear implication, if nothing else, that P.F.A.A. in so far as its being effective on those lands where the rebate will be made, will no longer be the case; in fact, on those lands, P.F.A.A. is going to be withdrawn. Therefore, I think the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek in discussing P.F.A.A. in an extended way would be in order because in fact P.F.A.A. is going to be suspended wherever this reinsurance applies.

The Chairman: The point of order was raised previously by two or three hon. members, who I thought made a good point, namely that the resolution as it is before the committee does not deal with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, except in its reference to the authorization of a rebate. The hon. member for Medicine Hat had, to my mind, strayed some distance from the essence of the resolution. He was called to order and was generous enough to go along with the chairman and say that he would not pursue the matter further.

I think the minister made a good point when he referred to the fact that the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek may have wanted to reply to whatever charges or suggestions had been made previously. To that extent I think he should be allowed to reply to what has been said by the hon. member for Medicine Hat, subject to this limitation; I doubt whether it would be very wise for the committee at this stage to go into the whole operation of the P.F.A.A., particularly in view of the fact that item No. 78 on the order paper would perhaps be a much better vehicle by which to enter into such a discussion.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, before we get into any more difficulties in this regard I wonder whether the Minister of Agriculture would tell us if the effect and operation of P.F.A.A. is going to be withdrawn on those lands where this resolution will be operative.

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, the answer is yes in so far as lands that are going to be insured are concerned. But if we are to replace the P.F.A.A., this would take a very long time. If this resolution were to replace the P.F.A.A., all the areas would have to be under crop insurance.

Mr. Nasserden: On the point of order that has been raised, Mr. Chairman, I think this resolution does not provide for the type of discussion that would bring into play the principle of whether crop insurance was preferable to the P.F.A.A. This resolution deals with a way to improve and extend the crop insurance legislation. I believe that at the time the crop insurance bill itself was brought into the house, the house decided that crop insurance was a good principle, and that is why it was finally accepted by the House of Commons. For that reason I feel that too wide a discussion would not be proper at this time.

Mr. McIntosh: If I may speak on a point of order again, Mr. Chairman, the minister admitted that this resolution will do away with the P.F.A.A. He qualifies this by saying it may take a long time. This just confirms my statement of a few moments ago that this is the thin edge of the wedge and it will destroy the P.F.A.A.—and the minister knows that. In fact, what will be left will be those areas in which the premium will be so high that the farmers cannot afford to take out insurance. This is the thin edge of the wedge and in my opinion now is the very time it should be straightened out.

The Chairman: I might say that that debate can be allowed within the confines of the resolution. This is all the Chair can allow. The rules are there and they say that in committee debate must be strictly relevant to the subject matter. I can only bring this to the attention of the hon. member who now has the floor and trust he will abide by the rules.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I am dealing with the words of the minister, that this resolution will eventually do away with the P.F.A.A. I will refer to some of the reasons why the minister perhaps wishes to do away with the P.F.A.A.; some of the wrong impressions the country has about this particular act, and some of the wrong impressions about the remuneration that the farmers receive under this act.

I wish to refer back to the inquiry under Judge Pope, where the director of P.F.A.A. made an accusation against the supervisor in my area. I do not have to go back too far; I do not have to go over all the ground again. But the minister knows full well that when he rose in the house and made this accusation against one of my constituents, it was groundless; in fact he withdrew it later on.

Mr. Byrne: Order.

Mr. McIntosh: What is the matter with you? Do you want to get up and speak?

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, I think it is completely irrelevant to deal with the administration of the P.F.A.A. under this resolution. There is no connection whatever. The hon. member will see that there is on the order paper an item dealing with P.F.A.A., and I am sure that if he so desired, he could raise this question when that item is before the house. There will then be ample opportunity to deal with this question, but it should not be done at this time.

Mr. McIntosh: Are you asking me a question? Are you asking me whether I think it is relevant or not?

Mr. Byrne: You are out of order.

Mr. McIntosh: Are you the chairman, as usual?

Mr. Byrne: No, I am not the chairman; but it is my duty to bring this matter to the attention of the Chair.

The Chairman: Order. A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East and it seems to me that the point is well taken. This is the field which the hon. member for Medicine Hat sought to enter a moment ago and he was asked by the Chairman not to enter it. If the hon. member did go into this field I am sure it would then be impossible to stop a fully fledged discussion on that aspect of the question, which is the administration of the P.F.A.A. I suggest that the hon. member is getting away from the resolution before us when he discusses that type of detailed administration of the P.F.A.A.

Mr. McIntosh: Mr. Chairman, I was under the impression when I rose first, when the hon. member for Medicine Hat was making insinuations, that I would be given the opportunity to answer some of the statements he made. That is all I am trying to do right now. In fact, Mr. Chairman, I will cut my remarks as short as I possibly can at the present time.

The Pope report, and the hon. member for Medicine Hat, said there were irregularities under P.F.A.A. in my area. I challenge the government, I challenge the hon. member for Medicine Hat or anybody else to prove that there were irregularities in my area. I have said politics were brought into this matter, and the minister knows that when he set up this commission of inquiry it was to investigate P.F.A.A. in the whole of Saskatchewan. I have said this in the house before and I will say it again: Why did this inquiry investigate the Swift Current area only? That question has never been answered. I say to the minister now that if there were any irregularities, it is his responsibility to see that these people are prosecuted. I want to know why they have not been prosecuted. I want to know why a judge of our courts said, "I recommend that no attempt should be made to secure reimbursement from any of the farmers who received an award". If any of these farmers received an award to which they were not entitled, they should be prosecuted. As a minister of the crown the Minister of Agriculture should see that they are prosecuted.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat has raised the question of the 130 farmers who were examined in this inquiry, and the inference he left that they were wrong is absolutely ridiculous. If you read the transcript of evidence and see the question the judge asked those farmers, you will understand how ridiculous it is. You will also appreciate the danger of an inquiry such as this. A farmer stated that he had a six bushel average crop this year and as such he was entitled to payment under P.F.A.A. It did not matter how many dollars he had in the bank or how many bushels of wheat he had on his farm; he is paying for this protection—he pays 1 per cent of his sales each year. But the judge, on investigating this, with the intention of leaving the inference—which he did, and which apparently all the members of this house believe—asked the farmer this question, "You say you had a six bushel average crop this year, but you have 10,000 bushels stored on your farm. If that was on this year's crop, you would have 26 bushels to the acre?" The farmer said, "That is right". The judge dropped it there, with the inference that the farmer did have a 26 bushel average, to the acre, that year instead of six.

I could say many things about this report, particularly about the last recommendation contained therein, which is:

> I recommend that consideration should be given to placing the permanent staff of the prairie farm assistance administration under the civil service of Canada—

This is the point that bothers me. Why did the judge include these last three lines, which say:

> —in order to eliminate the possibility of political pressure beng exerted on those entrusted with the responsibility of administering the act.

I would suggest that he indicts himself here. He was not only appointed a judge by order in council, but he was appointed commissioner of this inquiry by order in council. Does he mean to say that the government or some politician forced him to bring in a report like this? I say that those three lines are an insult to 50 per cent of the public servants in Canada. I think the minister should be ashamed of himself for setting up this inquiry and ashamed of himself for not getting up in this house and explaining the truth to the people of Canada, rather than leaving the insinuation which has been left in the house for so long.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Gundlock: Mr. Chairman, before the resolution carries I have one or two things I should like to say, although I might be a little sidetracked in view of the previous remarks. I should like to draw to the attention of the committee some matters which concern my particular area of Canada as well as Canada as a whole. As I understand it, crop insurance and crop reinsurance applies to Canada as a whole. Provinces almost from coast to coast are considering taking advantage of this legislation. However, there is some doubt in my mind about this word "reinsurance". For example Alberta has no insurance agreement at the moment. I am very much in favour of crop insurance and reinsurance, but in view of the position in Alberta I should like the minister to explain how there can be "reinsurance" in a province which has no insurance to begin with.

Another point which comes to mind is a little more basic. This is a program for general crop insurance which, as I have just said, I am very much in favour of. I am particularly in favour of this bill because its provisions would apply from coast to coast as agreements are reached between the provincial governments and the federal government. I am disappointed that Alberta is apparently dragging its feet in reaching some agreement with the federal government; perhaps Alberta is one of the provinces which is asking for reinsurance before there is even any insurance agreement.

Some of these matters have been touched on in connection with a previous bill, but I find it rather hard to amend legislation before it is even put into effect and tried. In my particular area of Alberta as well as in other areas across the country it would be easy to institute a crop insurance program. I am not too sure why certain provinces are dragging their feet but as far as Alberta is concerned one reason must be that there is no crop insurance in force in the province at the moment. All too often Canadians have to have things all wrapped up with a blue ribbon before they will even look at them. I think Alberta should have taken part in this scheme earlier, and I hope the minister will even go so far as to put on record why we have to make provision for reinsurance before some provinces even have insurance.

Much has been said about the Prairie Farm Assistance Act and I should like to say something in defence of P.F.A.A. Although I have had many complaints about P.F.A.A. in my area I do not think this is due to any faults in the legislation itself. Something which we in this committee should guard against at all times, and be jealous of, is the fact that after passing legislation we often find some difficulty in giving it recognition, purely because between the time it becomes law and its application in the field many rules and regulations are appended thereto. We try to anticipate these rules and regulations in this house, regulations which in many cases are much needed; but the fact remains that the addition of rules and regulations makes it hard actually to recognize the original legislation. Sometimes these rules and regulations change the whole meaning of the act. Perhaps it is time that the rules and regulations in connection with P.F.A.A. and the legislation itself were amended, much in the same way as other legislation throughout the years comes up for revision in order to simplify it, to clarify it and to bring it back to earth.

If I may return to the subject of crop insurance and reinsurance for a moment, I have heard it suggested here that we should consider raising the levy against grain growers for the purposes of P.F.A.A. I should like to say that I am definitely not in favour of that. I should like to point out why, and try to relate my reasons to the resolution before us providing for a crop reinsurance program. Some areas have long term averages of, say 20 bushels to the acre over a period of 30 to 40 years. Let us say that the gross price throughout those years has been $1.50 a bushel or $30 an acre. One per cent of that is 30 cents an acre. This is the gross, not the net figure, and if you take 30 cents an acre for a 20 or 30 year period you have $6 or $9 an acre. Actually no benefit whatever has been received and even at today's prices the amount of money paid represents the price of a good amount of crop insurance.

I have no real complaint on that score but I do have a complaint about raising the levy for any purpose unless it is for an improvement. I can recall several years when if I had realized 1 per cent of the gross—you can figure out what that is when you get down to the net—or 2 or 3 per cent of the net I would have thought I was doing very well on my investment. I want to say very definitely that I am not in favour of raising the P.F.A.A. levy as suggested by the hon. member for Medicine Hat.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether in fairness the hon. member would also say that I suggested the awards be raised correspondingly?

Mr. Gundlock: I accept that, but nevertheless the hon. member suggested that the levy be raised. There are many areas in Canada where the farmers have contributed to P.F.A.A. over long periods and have not had to take advantage of the act. The farmers in these areas do not think that the levy should be increased. I think they would be much more in favour of crop insurance and the resolution before us at the moment. I realize that the figure I mentioned is an arbitrary one but it is not too far off the mark, and if you take that figure and apply it to a crop insurance program and add to that the contributions of the province and the federal government you have much broader insurance coverage than you could ever have under P.F.A.A. at the present time for the same amount of money. Where crop insurance programs have been instituted in the provinces in the last two or three years they have been successful. I realize this has brought about the request for reinsurance which is something that probably should have been provided in the first place, although I am not too sure about that. In all honesty and fairness I think it should be tried before a reinsurance program is guaranteed.

I spoke earlier about the ills of P.F.A.A. Probably one of the greatest drawbacks has resulted from the rules and regulations made under the legislation, and not from the legislation itself. I refer to the fact that a farmer on one side of the road may be covered under P.F.A.A. and a farmer on the other side of the road may not be. It is things like this that make the legislation ambiguous. It is things like this that in my opinion have caused members to say that this resolution is the thin edge of the wedge to get rid of P.F.A.A. Frankly I do not think it is. It may be a lever or a way of calling our attention to the needs of the legislation itself, but in no way do I think that the reinsurance plan envisaged in the resolution will take away from P.F.A.A.

There is a need for this resolution and basically I have no complaint with it whatsoever. I am only trying to point out some things that have been referred to earlier. With regard to authorizing the rebate, I may say that I have read the Crop Insurance Act and I should like to ask the minister to clarify this point. In reading the original legislation I thought it was up to the federal government and the provincial governments to cover this in their agreement on a crop insurance program. Perhaps I did not read it correctly. If this is not the case, then this is a necessary part of the resolution. However, I do not think we should consider raising the P.F.A.A. levy, nor do I think we should cast any reflection on the people who have administered P.F.A.A. throughout the years, those who are now deceased, those who are retired and those who are now working for the administration. I think they should all be complimented and that we should say to them: Well done. I hope they will take part in the crop insurance program. In fact I am very sure they will, and with their guidance and experience it cannot help but be successful provided the provinces co-operate.

I hope there will be more co-operation from the provinces. The next time the minister is in Alberta I hope he will urge the minister of agriculture for that province to participate in this program and, if I may be so brash, I would suggest that the federal minister might ask the provincial minister to consider the southern area of Alberta. I think the minister's area in particular could benefit very much from this legislation. I live in one of those fortunate areas that does not have very much hail or very many grasshoppers and has a fair amount of moisture. As far as I am concerned, crop insurance would be just fine. I have no regrets about the amount of money I have paid under P.F.A.A., but I urge the minister to emphasize the importance of this program the next time he talks to the minister of agriculture of Alberta or the ministers of agriculture of the other provinces. I am quite sure there has been enough experience in Canada already to do away with any fears that the crop insurance program will not work. However, adjustments may have to be made from time to time and perhaps we have one before us now.

I listened to an hon. member a while ago, and while I did not catch all of the translation I gathered that he hoped this program would apply to the eastern provinces. It is my understanding that it will and I should like to say that I am also very happy that this is one program at least in the Department of Agriculture which will apply from one end of the country to the other. I might be mistaken, and perhaps the minister can correct me, but this legislation could be broader than even I realize. It could apply to many crops. If it does not now, eventually it might. It could apply to the small fruit farmer, tree fruits, grain, tobacco or whatever one wished. I wonder if it might not also apply to livestock and poultry. I can recall violent hail storms that have destroyed whole flocks of poultry.

I should like to ask the minister this question and I hope he will answer it. Will this crop insurance scheme apply to the poultry farmer? I believe the minister has heard of the incidents to which I am referring. If a farmer's product is damaged by hail, whether livestock, poultry or anything else, will he be insured under the scheme?

An hon. Member: Carried.

Mr. Gundlock: If I keep on talking, you can carry me out. I have just completed my remarks and I do thank the committee and you, Mr. Chairman, for your indulgence.

Mr. Nasserden: I think this is very timely legislation. We are reminded of the fact that crop insurance legislation has not been in operation too long. It was one of those acts brought in by the former administration led by the Leader of the Opposition. The legislation arose as a result of requests that had been made primarily from the prairie provinces for a crop insurance plan. These requests I believe were the result of the satisfaction of farmers on the prairies with the Prairie Farm Assistance Act which was introduced during the days when Hon. James G. Gardiner was minister of agriculture.

The reinsurance principle is a good principle. At the time the crop insurance measure was introduced in parliament some demands were made for the inclusion of a reinsurance principle in the legislation. I believe it was the feeling of the government that such a move might encourage too swift a movement into crop insurance in those areas in which it might cost the treasury of the country a great deal of money. Now that we have had the operation of this act in selected areas in those provinces that have introduced the legislation, I think all of us in this house are in a position to realize that the reinsurance principle can be safely introduced. It would at the same time give quite an impetus to the whole crop insurance program.

The hon. member for Medicine Hat referred to the timidity with which provincial governments have moved into the crop insurance field. I for one feel that his point is well taken. I believe the provinces, not only the prairie provinces but the other provinces as well, could have moved into this field much more quickly than they have. I know there are large areas in the province of Saskatchewan where the crop insurance plan would be at least equal in benefit to the producers as the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. There may be some selected areas in which this will never be the case, but there are many areas in Saskatchewan where a crop insurance plan would be of at least equal and perhaps even greater benefit to the farmers. I hope that when the bill is brought forward the terms of reinsurance will make this possible.

I should like to correct one impression I thought I gathered from a member at the far end of the room this evening. At the moment crop insurance legislation is all-embracing so far as agricultural products are concerned. Any province can take part in it if it so desires. Of course, it is up to a province to make a decision in that regard. This is one of the things that is sometimes forgotten. Perhaps in some of the provinces in western Canada provincial governments have been willing to move into this field a little more rapidly than governments in other parts of the country because of the experience they have had under P.F.A.A.

I know that all of us are very appreciative of the effects of the P.F.A.A. legislation, and the wonderful work that has been done by those who have been associated with this program from the beginning. Their work has been an inspiration and has led to the realization of a crop insurance program in Canada. I know the people of my area would want me to commend the minister and the government for the introduction of this resolution. We hope that the bill will be as promising as the resolution.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, this resolution suggests, and I quote order 49 in today's order paper:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the crop insurance act to authorize the governor in council to enter into agreements for the purpose of establishing a crop reinsurance program—

We are no longer in the field of crop insurance but in that of crop reinsurance.

—to supplement provincial crop insurance plans.

To supplement provincial crop insurance plans, the federal government is introducing a crop reinsurance program which will double the cost of insurance to farmers. The resolution goes on to say:

—to provide for the establishment in the consolidated revenue fund of a special account, to be known as the crop reinsurance fund, to which shall be credited amounts paid by a province under a crop reinsurance agreement and out of which shall be paid amounts required for the payment of reinsurance claims;—

Insuring insurance.

—to authorize advances from time to time from the consolidated revenue fund by way of non-interest bearing loans to the crop reinsurance fund; and to authorize the rebate, to grain growers whose grain is grown on insured lands, of sums paid by way of levy under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

This resolution has been introduced by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be neither long nor elaborate. I merely wish to say this is another resolution to give further assistance to western agriculture, to prairie farmers.

During the past three sessions no resolution has been introduced to help eastern agriculture by setting up a crop insurance program for the benefit of such people as the apple growers of Quebec, the maple syrup producers, the farmers of eastern Ontario, of Sudbury and other important centres of that province or of Quebec.

Not more than a year ago northwestern Quebec was struck by disaster when not only crops were destroyed but even buildings were blown away by a tornado. It was not a tropical storm but one which came from the north and which swept away barns and stables.

At the time we asked the Minister of Agriculture to assist northwestern farmers in that province. And we were told: We have not been asked by the Quebec provincial government to come in and assist northwestern farmers in both Quebec and Ontario.

And we are always dealing in the house with resolutions to assist in farming and in the prairie provinces and western farmers. It is not detrimental to the other provinces, and I realize that the western farmers need the assistance we provide for them; however, the Minister of Agriculture should realize that in eastern Canada and more specifically in the province of Quebec, such an assistance is also required and that legislation should be passed to give satisfaction to eastern Canada farmers.

At that time, Mr. Chairman, the Minister of Agriculture could say: "I am not the minister of agriculture for western Canada only, but for all Canada."

It is precisely because we have always had to consider resolutions which favoured western Canada, and never resolutions favouring eastern Canada, that we are requesting a minister of agriculture for the east. Indeed, the present Minister of Agriculture does not seem to understand what is going on in eastern Canada.

Mr. Chairman, we are not against insuring the western farmer's insurance, but we are against, for instance, treating the Quebec farmers, the producers of maple syrup, apples, tobacco and other products in the province of Quebec and eastern Canada, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island in any other way than that in which the Minister of Agriculture is now asking us to treat the western farmer.

We are all for crop reinsurance for western farmers. I see that the Minister of Agriculture is chatting away happily with the Minister of Finance; the two of them get along perfectly, they are not listening to me, they do not even hear me, they are chatting away. Look at them, Mr. Chairman, they are chatting away and meanwhile the eastern farmers, those of Lotbinière and Villeneuve counties are wondering what the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Finance are planning in order to help them, or whether they are just dithering around with regard to the eastern farmers.

Mr. Drouin: The Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes electors are of the same opinion as those of Lotbinière and Villeneuve—

Mr. Caouette: The electors of Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, as their elected representative points out, fully agree with what I have just said.

Nor would I be surprised if the constituents of the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Dupuis) were also of the same opinion as I and his colleagues from Lotbinière and Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes.

Mr. Chairman, we are not asking for special treatment; no, but that is precisely what the Minister of Agriculture is doing at present for western farmers.

We are willing to pass this resolution and to help western farmers but, in return, I would ask the minister to introduce a resolution similar to the one under consideration which seeks to help western farmers when he receives requests from the ridings of Lotbinière and Dorchester, from the apple growers of Shefford, from the riding of St. Jean-Iberville-Napierville, in other words, from any constituency in Canada.

Mr. Chairman, there are other areas than the prairie provinces in Canada. There are other areas which are not prairies, but forest regions where agriculture is really practised, where not only wheat is grown, but where diversified agricultural products are grown. Then the minister would prove his good faith toward agriculture, and this would be beneficial not only to one section of the country, but of the whole of Canada.

On behalf of the farmers of eastern Canada, and particularly on behalf of the Quebec farmers, I wish the Minister of Agriculture would quit laughing and joking with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) and introduce a similar resolution to assist agriculture in eastern Canada, to assist the producers of maple syrup, our apple, potato and oat growers, our dairy products, in a word, all of our Canadian producers. Let him bring forward a resolution similar to the one now before us, so that the Canadian parliament may follow the same policy for the whole of Canada and not only for an area, in this case the prairie provinces.

As I said a moment ago, we respect the prairie provinces, but we want our section of the country to be placed on the same footing as the prairie provinces.

Mr. Choquette: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very brief as I do not want to delay the passing of the resolution.

I should like to congratulate the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) most warmly on the initiative he has taken and to refute some of the remarks made by the hon. member who has just spoken.

In my opinion the government is giving its full attention to the well-being of our Canadian farmers both in the west and in the east.

Needless to say we realize that an emergency can arise in the east, and there is no doubt whatsoever that a special effort is being made to put agriculture back on its feet again in the eastern provinces. As an example, may I just mention the measure which was recently passed in order to subsidize feed grain shipped by truck, and the piece of legislation for increasing farm credit which has been passed during the present session. And, finally, the legislation passed this afternoon enabling farmers to unite and take advantage of a very comforting credit for the purchase of required farm machinery.

Of course all those pieces of legislation reflect the definite intention of the government to help all farmers, whether in eastern or western Canada. But the resolution now under study, in its present form, might leave us somewhat puzzled, in so far as it requires of course the co-operation of the provinces.

The particular case of the province of Quebec is well known: the premier of Quebec, Mr. Lesage, has indicated his intention to withdraw from many joint programs. Consequently, I feel that in introducing this resolution the minister must immediately initiate negotiations with the various provincial authorities, especially the Quebec government, in order to stir up on their part a special interest in this legislation and see to it that Quebec farmers, as well as eastern farmers as a whole, will be adequately covered, by distributing the protection granted to Canadian farmers as fairly as possible.

Mr. Chairman, again I congratulate the minister and I urge him to continue his aggressive policy in the agricultural field. I also urge him to take the necessary steps to initiate without delay negotiations with the Quebec authorities so that the farmers of that province may have all the required protection.

I might mention also that in my riding of Lotbinière, which is mostly rural and typically agricultural, farmers have incurred great losses on many occasions, and had it been possible for them to take advantage of crop insurance it would have been of valuable assistance to them, if not of priceless help.

I suggest therefore that the Quebec authorities be involved as quickly as possible in this essentially Canadian legislation so that it might be applied throughout Canada for the benefit of all farmers, from the west as well as from the east.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, I always like to hear the hon. member for Lotbinière (Mr. Choquette) discuss farm matters. Every time I put myself in the place of a farmer and I compare the speeches he now makes in the house with those he made during the last federal election.

Mr. Chairman, when the hon. member says that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) shows dynamism, I must say the farmer thinks it is rather dynamite and is getting ready to protest in no uncertain terms against the inaction of this government.

Indeed, the hon. member is perfectly aware that within a few months there will be a very strong reaction on the part of the farmers of my province, more particularly those of his region and of the lower Quebec districts.

As far as the resolution now before us is concerned, it is a piece of legislation to amend the Crop Insurance Act passed by the house in 1959. That act applies to all provinces in Canada and all can take advantage of it. However, the act must be promulgated by the province desiring to avail itself of its advantages.

Mr. Chairman, what amazes me most in this debate, is that after hearing, during the electoral campaigns of 1962 and 1963, our hon. friends opposite now facing us—

Mr. Caouette: Opposite friends facing us.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, I meant to use another expression, but I changed my mind.

Mr. Caouette: Opposite friends facing us.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, our friends opposite—

Mr. Caouette: Our opposite friends facing us.

Mr. Vincent: —and perhaps it is the reason why the hon. members for Shefford (Mr. Rondeau) and Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette)—

Mr. Caouette: I have nothing to do with that.

Mr. Vincent: —believed it at one time; as they were repeating throughout the province that this legislation had been passed solely in order to help the western farmers.

Mr. Caouette: That is right.

Mr. Vincent: I am convinced that the hon. member for Bonaventure would not dare repeat here in the house the speech he made on November 23, 1962 or those he made during election campaigns when he promised the Quebec farmers if the Liberal party was returned to office the immediate application of crop insurance legislation in the province of Quebec, saying that the Conservatives did not want to provide this assistance for eastern farmers—and Quebec farmers in particular—and, as usual, that the leader of the Conservative party was against French Canadian people and therefore against the implementation of this legislation in the province of Quebec.

The hon. member for Laval (Mr. Rochon), who I am sure talked about crop insurance in his constituency during the last electoral campaign is now as silent as a fish. Why does he not repeat here in this house what he said about crop insurance in his constituency and elsewhere in the province of Quebec?

And there are others, including the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin)—

Mr. Caouette: Another fish.

Mr. Vincent: —aspiring to the job of minister of agriculture for eastern Canada or of parliamentary secretary, who was concerned with farm questions for eastern Canada. On October 1, 1962, that is two years ago, he asked the then government to put the Crop Insurance Act into force in the province of Quebec. During the election campaign those people promised that as soon as they assumed office they would apply the Crop Insurance Act to the province of Quebec.

Mr. Rondeau: In 20 years from now.

Mr. Vincent: Today we have before us a measure to amend the act. We know that under the constitution the provinces must proclaim this act, although the federal government has no authority to force them to apply the Crop Insurance Act. We know it today, we knew it yesterday, we knew it in 1962. What I fail to understand is that our Liberal friends who certainly knew it in 1962-63 deceived the farmers of the province of Quebec on purpose, by telling them that they would be able to make this act applicable to the province of Quebec through this famous co-operative federalism.

Mr. Rondeau: They have forgotten everything.

Mr. Vincent: I am sure that during the election campaign previous to yesterday's by-election, something was said about crop insurance, but no action has been taken.

The Minister of Agriculture told us that the government had discussed over and over again the present crop insurance program and that the only conclusion they could come to was to implement what had been devised by the Conservative government as an amendment to the legislation, namely to establish a reinsurance program so that the provinces would not run too great a risk of going bankrupt within a few years with their crop insurance program.

Mr. Caouette: They remain silent.

Mr. Vincent: It has also been stated last February, and that was quite a few months ago, that provincial ministers of agriculture had met here in Ottawa with the federal Minister of Agriculture to consider the matter of crop insurance. The Minister of Agriculture has not yet told us if the provinces, apart from the three provinces mentioned, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Prince Edward Island, intended to participate under the Crop Insurance Act should the amendments now before us—

Mr. Caouette: Reinsurance.

Mr. Vincent: —be carried.

The minister has not told us if the province of Quebec would accept to participate in this federal-provincial program, to this joint plan of crop insurance in order to enable our farmers, who complain of the bad weather and frost, to take advantage of this legislation which has been passed not only for the farmers of western Canada but for all Canadian farmers.

Mr. Rondeau: Would the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. Vincent: Certainly.

Mr. Rondeau: Could the hon. member explain to us how it happens that a party in acceding to power seems to lose its memory.

Mr. Caouette: It is rather difficult to reply to that.

Mr. Vincent: It is rather difficult to answer this question.

Mr. Caouette: Yes.

Mr. Vincent: But, Mr. Chairman, I do not know what is happening to our friends across the way, but they used to talk much more on the hustings than they now do in the house and they have failed to fulfil their promises.

An hon. Member: We do something.

Mr. Vincent: They do something. That is a term which certainly makes farmers laugh. The hon. member for Lotbinière spoke a moment ago about the achievements of the Liberal party. He mentioned three things.

Mr. Choquette: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman.

I have never spoken of all the achievements. I have only pointed out a few of the recent measures that have been adopted.

We are in the process of building up agriculture. We are elected for four years, constitution grants us five years. Give us time to act. You did nothing for six years.

The Chairman: Might I invite the hon. members and in particular the one who now has the floor to limit his remarks to the resolution presently under study.

Mr. Vincent: Thank you for your assistance, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member for Lotbinière has just said that the Liberal party is in the process of building up an agricultural program, and that we did nothing for six years—

The Chairman: Order. Just a moment ago I asked the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska to limit his remarks to the resolution under study, whose object is to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, it is absolutely relevant to this amendment to the Crop Insurance Act enacted in 1959.

Mr. Caouette: Crop reinsurance.

Mr. Vincent: Today, all the new measures in this great program are amendments to acts enacted by a Conservative government. That means that the Conservative government did something in that field and all the Liberals can do is to enlarge the scope of legislation already enacted.

Mr. Chairman, I was saying that last February the ministers of agriculture of Canada got together to consider this legislation with the federal Minister of Agriculture. But even today we do not know which provinces agree to participate in this program.

The minister also tells us, and I am pointing this out, that this legislation will encourage a greater number of provinces to take part in this crop insurance scheme and that this scheme will have a wider scope.

Mr. Chairman, we thoroughly and unreservedly support this amending legislation and we wish that the present federal government may, in the spirit of co-operation it has so often mentioned, succeed in convincing the provinces to participate in this crop insurance scheme so as to ensure the necessary protection to our farmers.

Before concluding, I wish to repeat once more that this legislation does not deal specifically with a group of farmers, and that all the provinces may wish to avail themselves of its advantages. I hope therefore that the province of Quebec will accept it in order to give to its farmers greater protection.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. A few moments ago you called to order the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska, asking him to limit himself to the bill before the house. According to his interpretation the bill would come within the federal-provincial jurisdiction and the present government is not discharging its duties. Consequently, the government to which the hon. member belonged not so long ago was no more competent, and I believe also that the hon. member for Nicolet-Yamaska was way off course when he was trying to play politics with this bill. If the hon. member has—

The Chairman: Order. I do not think there is any point of order in the words uttered by the hon. member for Villeneuve at this time.

The hon. member who was speaking has concluded his remarks now, and I fail to see how a point of order could be raised in respect of remarks that are concluded.

Mr. Caouette: I thought, Mr. Chairman, that the hon. member had not concluded his remarks. That is why I raised a point of order.

If the hon. member has concluded his remarks I am happy to sit down and to say that he was way off course when he resumed his seat.

Crop Insurance Act

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege only to say that for five years now I have not been in the potato field, because I do not grow anymore potatoes.

Mr. Caouette: Do not put yourself in the potato field any more.

[Text]

Mr. Southam: Mr. Chairman, I am in favour of this resolution to amend the Crop Insurance Act. I see it is almost ten o'clock so I am not going to take up the time of this committee. Suffice it to say that I had the privilege of being a member of the agriculture committee when the original legislation was introduced in the house in 1959. I felt there was a long standing need for it and I am pleased to say that some members of the present government, who were then in opposition, and who took strong objection to the principle involved, have now seen its applicability and that it is something really worth while for our agricultural economy. Therefore I am pleased to see before us this measure to amend the Crop Insurance Act by way of authorizing the governor in council to enter into agreements with the provinces for the purpose of establishing a crop insurance or reinsurance program.

I might say that the province of Manitoba, spearheaded by Hon. George Hutton on their agriculture committee, was the first province to get this crop insurance activated. I live in an area close to one of the low risk projects and I also live close to one of the higher risk areas further to the south, so I was aware of the benefits to be derived from this particular legislation.

As I say, Mr. Chairman, it is almost ten o'clock and I want to see this legislation put through. Therefore I will not take up any further time; I merely say I am much in favour of seeing this legislation put on the books.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Hays thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: When shall the said bill be read a second time?

Some hon. Members: Now.

Mr. Churchill: Next sitting of the house.

FINANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACTS ADMINISTERED IN INSURANCE DEPARTMENT

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-123, to amend certain acts administered in the department of insurance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether my eyesight is as good as it should be, but it seems to me that it is just about ten o'clock. I wonder whether I might call it ten o'clock.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed that the Chair call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the acting house leader about the business for tomorrow and the rest of the week?

Mr. McIlraith: The next three days' business will be concerned with estimates. Tomorrow it is proposed to call the Department of Justice general administration item for the purpose of permitting a discussion of the matter sought to be raised yesterday by way of a motion to adjourn the house. When that part of the discussion on item 1 is concluded the minister will then ask leave of the committee to rise and report progress.

Then we will call the Department of Trade and Commerce, the remaining items of defence production, citizenship and immigration, public works and the unemployment insurance commission under the Department of Labour. There may be an adjustment tomorrow of the departments I have indicated, as far as Thursday is concerned.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 7, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BYRNE—REPORTED STATEMENT BY OPPOSITION LEADER RESPECTING HOUSE PROCEEDINGS

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting all hon. members of this house and you, sir, as the first commoner. On Monday last you, Mr. Speaker, in your usual scholarly and gentlemanly manner ruled on a motion under standing order 26 to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. The matter in question had to do with the alleged mishandling of the Hal Banks affair by the Department of Justice. In your ruling, Mr. Speaker, you had this to say after quoting a number of precedents—

I am informed today that the estimates of the Minister of Justice will be before the house on Thursday and that, of course, will provide an opportunity for a full discussion of this matter.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice are away on necessary business of state, with the Prime Minister either in or approaching Charlottetown, it seems to me we could have a much better, fuller and more authoritative discussion on their return. Therefore, with regret, I cannot accede to the request of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Later that day the Leader of the Opposition, speaking to a number of his supporters and admirers in Westboro—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Byrne: —female, I might add—had this to say, and I am quoting the right hon. gentleman because I have checked with Peter Jackson, the reporter for the Ottawa Journal—

Mr. Grafftey: Get on with it.

Mr. Byrne: He says that in essence these are the words used by the Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. gentleman said the whole affair would be aired in the Commons on Thursday after efforts to bring it to the floor were blocked by the Speaker earlier on Monday. I draw attention, Mr. Speaker, to the word "blocked".

Some hon. Members: Shame.

Mr. Byrne: The Concise Oxford dictionary which we use in the House of Commons defines the word "blocked" as meaning "obstructed". It is my opinion that the Leader of the Opposition owes an apology to this house and to you, Mr. Speaker, for charging that you had obstructed the proceedings of this house.

I therefore move, seconded by my hon. friend from Coast-Capilano (Mr. Davis):

That the house agrees the assertion of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition that the ruling of Mr. Speaker on Monday, October 5, in respect of the motion to adjourn the house under standing order 26 was an obstruction of parliamentary procedure and constitutes a breach of the privileges of the house and that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition be asked to make appropriate amends.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): If the hon. gentleman had communicated with any person who was there —and I repeat "any person who was there" —that person would have said that such a statement was never made, either indirectly or at all. I said that you had ruled, Mr. Speaker. The word "blocked" was never used. I can understand the use of the word "blocked" on the part of the hon. gentleman. In his case "blockhead" is another word which might have been used.

Mr. Byrne: The right hon. gentleman is indulging in his usual abusive tactics. I want to say this. I contacted the writer of this article, who says these were the words used by the right hon. gentleman. If they were not, then I believe the member of the press gallery in question should be brought before the house to explain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I am called upon to rule whether or not there is a question of privilege. The incident is one in which the Chair is supposed to be somewhat involved. In view of the explanation given by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition I have no hesitation in coming to the conclusion that no affront was meant, and that perhaps one should not be too thin skinned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

MR. LESSARD—C.B.C. INTERVIEWS WITH MEMBERS OF FLAG COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege to denounce something that took place this morning which in my opinion was an insult not only to all the French Canadian members of the house but to all French Canadians in Canada.

During the press conference the special committee on the flag held this morning the journalists and the radio and television commentators were given the opportunity and the privilege of seeing an array of the flags the committee has received, and were able to ask questions to which, of course, they did not get the answers they had hoped for. They also questioned some individual members of the committee.

The C.B.C., a crown corporation, was represented, but its English speaking section only. On several occasions the technicians filmed a close-up of certain members of the committee, that is, four members out of five from the Conservative party, six members out of seven from the Liberal party, but no member from the splinter parties and, particularly, no French Canadian member, that is, five members out of five who sit on that committee.

Some hon. Members: Shame, shame.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, this shows how little respect the C.B.C. has for justice, and it confirms the opinion of several persons who claim that some degree of discrimination exists in that corporation.

Several members of this house voiced their consternation at what is happening at present in the province of Quebec, and concerning those demonstrations against confederation and the way the French Canadians are treated as such.

This instance, by itself, is insignificant. But when added to thousands of other similar instances which are more or less an insult to the French Canadian population of this country, it explains, I believe, why French Canadians are dissatisfied with confederation and the Anglo-Saxon group.

Being financed through public funds, a good deal of which are provided by French Canadians, the C.B.C. has a great responsibility in the present economic and social climate and that crown corporation is not true to its obligations in my opinion, when it fails to foresee circumstances like those of this morning.

I hope the Secretary of State, who answers to this house for that irresponsible organization, will see to it that there is no recurrence of such incidents; otherwise, certain acts will be doubly justified.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say first of all that I do not agree with the hon. member when he suggests that the C.B.C. is discriminating against French Canadians.

Mr. Caouette: It definitely is.

Mr. Lamontagne: However, I can assure the hon. member that I will inquire about the reasons why representatives of the French network were not present at this morning's interviews.

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): That will not correct this morning's blunder, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEDURE

ELEVENTH, TWELFTH AND THIRTEENTH REPORTS OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to present in English and in French the eleventh, twelfth and thirteenth reports of the special committee on procedure and organization.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give notice that on Friday of this week, on behalf of Your Honour's committee, I shall move concurrence in the eleventh report which you have now tabled.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to give notice that on Friday of this week, on behalf of the special committee on procedure and organization, I shall move concurrence in the thirteenth report which Your Honour has just tabled.

NEEPAWA, MAN.—DISPOSITION OF C.N.R. ROUNDHOUSE

Question No. 1,829—Mr. Knowles:

1. Has the Canadian National round house at Neepawa, Manitoba, been sold or leased?

2. If so, to whom, on what terms and conditions and to what account has any revenue from such sale or lease been credited?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows:

1. The roundhouse at Neepawa and part of the surrounding land have been sold.

2. The land in question is considered as industrial property and in such cases the railway industrial development and real estate officers seek primarily to interest new railway freight traffic producing industries in locating in these areas, at the same time securing market value by way of consideration or rent in the case of a lease. The sale was made to a Mr. Wm. G. J. Tinkler of Winnipeg. It has not been company practice to disclose terms and conditions of such transactions.

FEDERAL WHARVES, SAINT JOHN RIVER

Question No. 1,847—Mr. Fairweather:

1. How many wharves are owned by Canada along the Saint John river and its tributaries?

2. What are the locations of these wharves?

3. How much money has been spent on the maintenance and repair of these wharves in 1963 and 1964?

4. Are these wharves readily adaptable to use by small non-commercial boats?

5. What publicity does the government give to the existence of these facilities in tourist literature?

6. How many of the wharves contain facilities for fuel, water, garbage disposal and other amenities?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Sixty.

2. Location of wharves:

Saint John river, 37. Barkers, Bedford, Brown's Flats, Burton, Burton court house, Carpenters, Carter's Point, Colwell's Days landing, Evandale, Fox's, Fredericton, Gagetown, Gerow's, Glenwood, Hampstead, 2—Maugerville, McAlpines, McGowan's, Oak Point, Oromocto, 2—Palmers, public landing, Queenstown, Sand Point, Scovils Point, Taylortown, Upper Gagetown, 2—Upper Maugerville, Westfield, Whites Bluff, Wickham, Williams, Wilmots.

Kennebecasis river, 1. Rothesay.

Belleisle bay, 4. Earle's, Hatfield's Point, Jenkins Cove, Long Point.

Washademoak lake, 8. Akerley's, Cambridge, Cole's island, Heustis landing, Humphrey's, McDonald's Point, Mott's, Webster's.

Oromocto river, 1. Oromocto (high water).

3. Funds spent on maintenance and repair:

1963-64	Wickham	$1,587.69
	Waterboro	165.80
		$1,753.49
1964-65	Wickham	10.00
	Chipman	600.00
	Websters	70.00

4. The following 26 wharves are readily adaptable for use by small non-commercial boats: Barkers, Bedfords, Brown's Flats, Chipman, Colwell's, Day's landing, Douglas harbour, Evandale, Fox's, Fredericton, Gerow's, Maugerville, McGowan's, Oak Point, Oromocto, Public landing, Queenstown, Rothesay, Sand Point, Upper Gagetown, Westfield, White's Bluff, Wickham, Williams, Wilmots, Gagetown.

5. The Canadian government travel bureau does not publicize individual non-commercial wharves in its tourist literature. Inquiries received in the bureau seeking information on such facilities are referred to the provincial tourist bureaux for whatever action is necessary. General publicity is given in tourist literature as to the availability of such facilities but it is not directed to one particular area, the purpose being to make it known that such facilities do exist across Canada.

6. Wharves having facilities: Evandale, water and fuel. Oak Point, fuel.

CARVING OF BLANK STONES, HOUSE OF COMMONS

Question No. 1,884—Mr. MacLean (Queens):

Is it planned to complete the carving of the blank stones in the House of Commons chamber before 1967 and, if so, have the designs to be carved been decided on and by whom?

Hon. J. P. Deschatelets (Minister of Public Works): No carving work is planned on these blank stones prior to 1967.

RESEARCH INTO MENTAL RETARDATION

Question No. 1,892—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. Is the government conducting or supporting research on the causes of mental retardation and, if so, at which institutions and under whose direction is such research being carried out?

2. For each of the last five years, what has been the cost to the government of such research?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Federal assistance under the national health grants in support of research which may provide some information on the causes of mental retardation is being made available as follows:

Dalhousie University, Doctor W. A. Cochrane; McGill University, Doctors T. Rasmussen, F. C. Fraser and G. B. Maughan; Ste. Justine hospital, Montreal, Doctors B. H. Doray and R. A. Ayotte; Montreal children's hospital, Doctor D. V. Bates; University of Western Ontario, Doctors G. H. Valentine, C. Buck and W. C. McMurray; University of Toronto, Doctors H. C. Stancer, D. E. Cannell and W. Kalow; Queen's University, Doctors R. Ginsberg, M. W. Partington and A. M. Bryans; Hospital for sick children, Toronto, Doctors D. M. McLean, P. E. Conen and P. R. Swyer; University of Manitoba, Doctor K. L. Moore; Saskatchewan training school, Doctor W. A. Zaleski; University of Alberta, Doctor D. Gibson; University of British Columbia, Doctors W. C. Gibson, T. L. Perry, J. R. Miller, H. G. Dunn, and S. Segal; Victoria College, Victoria, Doctor W. H. Gaddes.

2. 1959-60, $158,753; 1960-61, $219,548; 1961-62, $241,528; 1962-63, $246,731; 1963-64, $248,374.

*EMPLOYMENT ASSISTANCE FOR RETIRED ARMED FORCES PERSONNEL

Question No. 1,902—Mrs. Jones:

Is the government giving consideration to assisting members of the armed forces in finding suitable employment within the civil service upon retirement, especially those with wartime service in Canada only?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the Department of National Defence does maintain counselling services to assist long service personnel on retirement to make the transition to civilian life. Civilian and civil service opportunities are made known to qualified individuals. Liaison has been established and maintained with the civil service commission and other government departments with the object of informing departments of qualified service personnel available for particular openings. No distinction is drawn regarding wartime service in Canada or abroad within the Department of National Defence.

PSYCHIATRIC RESEARCH GRANTS

Question No. 1,910—Mr. Orlikow:

1. What psychiatric research projects being conducted by the universities, governments, and private foundations are being financed by federal health grants for the current year?

2. What is the value of each grant?

3. What is the total value of these grants for mental health research being done in each province?

4. What is the total value of these grants for Canada?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Under the mental health grant the Department of National Health and Welfare allocated funds in 1964-65 toward the conduct of research into the prevention and treatment of mental illness and for the promotion of mental health in Canada at various Canadian universities, hospitals and other health agencies.

2. Forty nine research projects are being supported in the present fiscal year. The values of the grants vary from $100 to $102,341.

3. Newfoundland, —; Prince Edward Island, —; Nova Scotia, $10,252; New Brunswick, —; Quebec, $252,663; Ontario, $219,937; Manitoba, $22,830; Saskatchewan, $117,768; Alberta, —; British Columbia, $81,156; Northwest Territories, —; Yukon Territory, —.

4. $704,606.

*INCLUSION OF RAIL SIDING, WHARF CONSTRUCTION, NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.

Question No. 1,980—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. With reference to the tender call, "Tender for terminal development construction of a public wharf, at North Sydney, Nova Scotia", which closes at 3 p.m. September 30, 1964, is a rail siding included in the department's development plan and, if not, was this rail siding included in the plans when drafted initially?

2. Has the Minister of Transport received a communication from Mr. H. Moraze, president and manager of the Flotte Administrate des Iles St. Pierre and Miquelon, indicating in such a communication that a rail siding is necessary on a public wharf at North Sydney, as without this facility it would not be feasible for his government to continue using this port and what reply was given Mr. Moraze?

3. If a rail siding is not included in the present plans for which tenders close on September 30, 1964, will consideration be given immediately to the inclusion of a rail siding on the proposed public wharf for the port of North Sydney?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): 1. A rail siding is not included in the department's development plan, and was not included in the initial draft of plans.

2. Yes. Mr. Moraze was advised that under the existing plans for additional facilities to handle increased services to Newfoundland it would be necessary to relocate the public wharf, and that on the new location it would be difficult and costly to provide a rail connection. It was pointed out that other rail facilities are available in the vicinity.

3. See answer to part 2.

RESUMPTION OF AIRPORT SERVICES, BOUNDARY BAY, B.C.

Question No. 1,985—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given to resumption of airport facilities and services at Boundary Bay, B.C. airport?

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): No.

ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS ADJUSTING STATUS

Question No. 1,988—Mr. Mather:

Since the August announcement of the policy of termination of amnesty respecting illegal entrants to Canada, how many persons have come forward to adjust their status?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): From August 14 to September 25, 1964, 2,787 persons have indicated a desire to make statements in connection with their immigration status.

HARMFUL EFFECTS OF DRUG PHENACETIN

Question No. 1,990—Mr. Mather:

If, as reported by the U.S. food and drug administration, the drug phenacetin in excessive doses can be harmful to kidneys, is consideration being given to requiring labelling to that effect?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes. Consideration has been given to requiring a warning statement on drugs containing phenacetin and such warning statement will be announced to the trade shortly.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE ON TRAFFIC SAFETY

Question No. 1,997—Mr. Mather:

Having in mind the 26 per cent increase in fatal vehicular traffic accidents during the first quarter of 1964, claiming 781 lives, is consideration being given to calling, under federal auspices, a national conference to promote traffic safety?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The Canadian highway safety council held its 10th annual conference on highway safety in May, 1964. These annual conferences are attended by leaders from insurance companies, oil, rubber and automotive industries. Persons concerned with safety programs in federal, provincial and municipal government departments also participate.

Assessment is made of traffic accident trends, and courses of action are planned. The proceedings are published listing the transactions of the various working committees.

The federal government, through the Department of National Health and Welfare, gives financial support to the Canadian highway safety council. Close liaison is maintained between Department of National Health and Welfare staff and the council. Under these circumstances no consideration is being given at the present time to calling under federal auspices any additional national conference to promote traffic safety.

Questions

FARM CASH INCOME

Question No. 2,006—Mr. Asselin (Richmond-Wolfe):

What is the farm cash income, by provinces, for the first six months of 1964, as compared with the same period in 1963, taking into account the revision in income from dairying recently published by the dominion bureau of statistics?

[Translation]

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Farm cash income by provinces, January to June 1963-64[1]

UNEMPLOYMENT STATISTICS CALCULATIONS

Question No. 2,014—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. Are rates of unemployment calculated routinely for any major Canadian industrial centres and, if so, for which ones?

2. On what basis, and at what intervals, are such calculations made?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. Rates of unemployment are not calculated routinely for any major Canadian industrial centres.

2. Not applicable.

CANADIANS OVER 65 IN URBAN AREAS

Question No. 2,021—Mr. Coates:

1. What proportion of Canadians now over 65 years of age are living in areas classified as urban?

2. What has been the percentage change for this group between 1951 and 1961?

3. How many Canadians 65 years of age or over now live in centres of 10,000 or more?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1. In 1961, 69.6 per cent of the total population, 65 years of age and over, lived in urban areas.

2. The proportion of the total population 65 years of age and over living in urban centres increased from 62.6 per cent in 1951 to 69.6 per cent in 1961, an increase in the proportion of 7 percentage points.

3. In 1961, 794,067 persons 65 years of age and over lived in urban centres of 10,000 and over.

PROVINCIAL ALLOCATION OF STUDENT LOAN FUNDS

Question No. 2,024—Mr. Cantelon:

1. What were the quotas under the Canada Student Loans Act allocated to each province?

2. How much money has each province used?

[Translation]

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. The Minister of Finance stated the provincial quotas in the House of Commons on September 21, 1964, Hansard, page 8237.

2. This information is not yet available.

I.J.C. STUDY OF RICHELIEU RIVER WATERWAY

Question No. 2,030—Mr. Pilon:

Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs in a position to state whether the international joint commission has completed the study on the proposed Richelieu river waterway?

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): The international joint commission established the international Champlain waterway board in October, 1962, to conduct the necessary economic and technical studies regarding the proposed Richelieu river waterway and it expects to receive the board's first phase or feasibility report in June, 1965. When it receives that report, the commission will be in a position to consider the nature and timing of its own report to the governments of Canada and the United States.

DISTRIBUTION OF STUDENT LOAN FUNDS, NEW BRUNSWICK

Question No. 2,033—Mr. Bell:

What has been the distribution of funds under the Canada student loans plan in New Brunswick among the different educational institutions?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): This information is not yet available.

FATAL ACCIDENTS IN HOMES

Question No. 2,035—Mr. Mather:

1. How many fatal accidents have occurred in Canadian homes in the past five years?

2. What percentage of these involved children?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): 1 and 2. Fatal accidents occurring in the home, Canada 1959-63:

	Total (all ages)		Under 1 yr.		1-4 yrs.		5-14 yrs.		Total 0-14 yrs.
	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%	No.	%

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

PURCHASES OF SUPPLIES FOR POST OFFICES, MEGANTIC CONSTITUENCY, QUE.

Question No. 1,381—Mr. Langlois:

1. With reference to post offices in the constituency of Megantic (a) who authorizes purchases such as soap, brooms, towels, etc. (b) for how many years in advance of requirement are such purchases authorized (c) from which supplier or suppliers do the various post offices make their purchases?

2. For the years 1962, 1963 and 1964, what did the purchases made by each of the various post offices amount to and from which supplier or suppliers were these purchases made?

3. Are the post offices allowed to buy items required for the maintenance of buildings, such as soap, brooms, box locks, heating oil, towels, etc., in the municipality where the building is located?

Return tabled.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, will you please call motion No. 167. I ask that motion No. 168 be allowed to stand.

CALCULATION OF SOCIAL ASSISTANCE PAYMENTS TO ESKIMOS

Motion No. 167—Mr. Rhéaume:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of all studies, reports, memoranda and other documents used by the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources to determine that food prices throughout the eastern Arctic and northern Quebec had decreased during the past two years for purposes of calculating schedules of social assistance payments to Eskimos.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, some of the information asked for in this motion is clearly privileged, and I have communicated with the hon. member in this regard. I think it has always been accepted by the house that the exchange of information or advice between a minister and his employees is privileged, because it is used for the guidance of the minister. However, I have told the hon. member that so far as the working sheets and the spread sheets which we use in computing the changes in the cost of living are concerned, we would be glad to show him those. I ask him therefore, on that basis, whether he might withdraw the motion.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, on the understanding that those documents which are not privileged will be shown to me, I am prepared to withdraw the motion.

Order discharged and motion withdrawn.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WITHDRAWAL OF QUESTION ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): Mr. Speaker, I have had question No. 1,453 on the order paper under my name for the last three months. I was informed yesterday by the hon. gentleman that to answer this question would cost the government a great deal of money. The answer to this question was known to me before I put it on the order paper, but I wanted that answer confirmed by the government. If the government does not feel like doing that, then I am willing to drop the question.

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is referring to question No, 1,453, the first part of which reads as follows:

How many tax dollars have been collected each year in each province by the federal government during the past 20 years?

The difficulty in trying to give a precise answer to that question in this: In the case of corporation income tax it is difficult to ascertain from which province the tax has come, so one would not know to which province to allocate particular tax revenues.

Mr. Speaker: Withdrawn.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

HAL BANKS—SUGGESTED APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I must first say to the Prime Minister that we are glad to see him back in the house after his participation in the welcoming ceremonies at Charlottetown.

I should now like to ask him whether he has been made aware of what apparently is general information, that when Hal Banks disappeared from Canada he took with him most of the books of account, ledgers and payroll sheets of the S.I.U. If such is a fact, would the Prime Minister now consider setting up a commission to investigate this whole question of the disappearance of this gentleman, Hal Banks?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, may I thank my hon. friend for his kind welcome to me on my return to the house. Perhaps I will not be misunderstood when I say that be it ever so rowdy, there is no place like home.

I am afraid I have no information as to what Mr. Banks may or may not have taken with him when he fled this country rather than go to jail, but I understand there is to be a discussion of this matter during the afternoon. Perhaps consideration of the other point of his question could be reserved until after that discussion.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would the Prime Minister look into this allegation as to the disappearance of these documents and papers, because I think this would be most material in view of the maritime board taking charge of these things?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into this matter if it is not cleared up during the discussions.

SUPREME COURT DECISION RESPECTING REPRESENTATION AT HEARINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. In view of the decision which has been handed down by the supreme court reversing the decision of a Quebec court relating to the right of persons to be present or represented by counsel at investigations into their financial affairs, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice, in view of the fact this appears to be a very serious infringement of a commonly accepted human liberty, whether he is planning to introduce legislation to counteract the effect of the decision handed down yesterday.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): In view of the fact that yesterday I was attending a constitutional conference, and that other duties prevented me from scrutinizing the text of the judgment, all I can say today is that I plan to study the judgment and to consider seriously the matter that has been raised in the question.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask a supplementary question. May I ask the minister why the government appealed the decision of the Quebec court, which seemed to be a proper and valid decision, that a person whose financial affairs were being investigated had a right to be present or to be represented by counsel? The initiative apparently came from the federal government, which appealed this decision of the Quebec court.

Mr. Favreau: There are, of course, many factors involved in the answer which have not been brought back to my attention at the moment. I shall take the question as notice and give an answer on Monday.

PROCEDURE RESPECTING COMPLAINTS AGAINST BANKRUPTCY TRUSTEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Will the minister report to the house on the procedure persons should follow who complain against trustees in bankruptcy?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Surely this is a question for the order paper.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MEETINGS WITH ATTORNEYS GENERAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): My question is directed to the Minister of Justice. In view of the fact the meetings with the attorneys general of the provinces have been concluded and that there are numerous newspaper reports commenting on the results of the conference, does the Minister of Justice have a statement for the house concerning the decisions that were reached about the repatriation of the constitution?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the conference of federal and provincial attorneys general is not over. We sat during Monday, October 5 and half of yesterday. The conference adjourned at noon yesterday until Tuesday, October 13, the day preceding the meeting of the Prime Minister and the premiers to consider the report which we are to submit to them.

I must say that a communiqué was issued under the responsibility of, and with the agreement of, the attorneys general. This communiqué reports, and the house may take my sincere word for it, that great progress was made. As proof of their hope to conclude the matter successfully next Tuesday, all the attorneys general, in spite of the distance some of them reside from Ottawa, have agreed to come back on Tuesday to conclude the matter.

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

With reference to the minister's statement, and more specifically to the press release which followed the conference, could the minister tell us what proposals the government intends to submit with a view to clarifying paragraph 1 of section 91, as mentioned in the press release?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, all the participants in the conference—as it will readily be understood—have agreed that it would not be in the interest of the discussions to divulge where these stand, seeing we are in the very middle of the conference which will close next Tuesday.

Mr. Martineau: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Has an agreement been reached on the necessity of clarifying or modifying this clause in the constitution?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I think that if my hon. friend reads the press release he will find that it is self-explanatory and, in this connection, I must say that we are in the process of discussing this aspect of the matter.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

ENGLISH AND FRENCH REPRESENTATION ON MUNICIPAL COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State, the minister in charge of the inquiry on bilingualism and biculturalism.

Could he indicate whether he will consider the suggestion made in Toronto yesterday by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Balcer), with the approval of his leader, with a view to converting Ottawa and the federal district into a region where both nations would be on an equal footing and administered by a council with equal French and English representation?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the political organization or reorganization of the national capital and the federal district does not come under my jurisdiction.

PUBLIC SERVICE

PRINTING BUREAU, OTTAWA—ENGLISH REPLY TO FRENCH TELEPHONE INQUIRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Is he in a position to give us some explanation concerning the civil servant of the national printing bureau who, when a telephone call comes from French Canadians, answers in saying: "Another fanatic who wants to speak French"?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, following the question asked by the hon. member last week, inquiries were made at the queen's printer's office concerning the civil servant of the national printing bureau, Mr. Deavey, who, answering the telephone, was said to have made the following remark: "Another fanatic wants to speak French."

Mr. Deavey spoke that way in front of his fellow workers in the distribution division—the majority of them are French speaking—with whom he enjoys a most friendly relationship. His remark was made in fun, in all good faith, without any desire to offend anyone, and he had no idea that he was heard by the lady at the other end of the phone.

I would like also to point out that Mr. Deavey is of French and English descent, that he understands French well, although he is not at all fluent in that language, and that he regrets what he said and the results of that incident.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—SUGGESTED TARIFF INCREASE ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Will the minister explain to the house a statement he made at the turkey growers' convention in Winnipeg about a month ago? The statement was that no importations of turkeys had been made into Canada during the previous two weeks. This was before the convention. Since the convention live turkeys from the United States have been coming into Canada to the extent of about a third of a million pounds. I suggest to the minister that if he wants to protect the Canadian turkey growers he had better step up the tariff on live turkeys by 3 or 4 cents a pound. This would save the Canadian turkey growers from going broke.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): The hon. member has made a statement, and it is inaccurate at that. I have explained this situation many times. I said that turkey imports into Canada had practically dried up. As a matter of fact, the day I was in Winnipeg there were some large turkeys coming into one plant. This is one of the few plants in Canada into which they are coming. Nevertheless, there is protection of 7½ cents to 8 cents a pound and we feel, in the light of other things that are going back and forth between the United States and Canada, this is ample protection. I repeat that we are watching this situation closely and there is no dumping of turkeys on the Canadian market.

Mr. Cardiff: May I ask a supplementary question. I should like to suggest to the minister he had better get himself—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

[Later:]

Mr. C. O. Cooper (Rosetown-Biggar): A supplementary question to the question asked by the hon. member for Huron. This is the statement the hon. member said he would hand to us as soon as he got it. It reads—and I quote—

> The next move is up to Mr. Hays. Also he has not as yet explained concerning his statement at the Winnipeg convention that the situation was levelling off with no imports in the previous two weeks.

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the question, please?

Mr. Cooper: Thank you, sir.

> The total that has come in since September 1 according to reports of his own department now add up to nearly one third of a million pounds.

My question is this. They have come in at the rate of one third of a million pounds since September 1. These are the figures from the hon. gentleman's own department.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Cooper: Why? That is my point. Since September 1 these imports have been coming in. Does the minister call this a levelling off period?

Mr. Hays: I should like to take this question as notice. I would be glad to give the hon. member all the details as far as turkey imports are concerned. I have not heard from the association. As a matter of fact I have written three letters asking them to forward their suggestions, but as yet no reply has passed over my desk.

FISHERIES

REPORT OF INTERDEPARTMENTAL COMMITTEE ON LANDING OF FISH BY FOREIGN FLEETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the widespread concern evidenced by all member firms of the fisheries council of Canada, including the members of the Nova Scotia fish packers association, over the proposed relaxation of existing laws which would permit the landing of fish by foreign vessels in Canadian ports, will the minister tell the house when we may expect the report of the interdepartmental committee on foreign fish landings, which I understand has been set up to deal with this problem?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the landing of fish from foreign trawlers is prohibited under the Fisheries Act, but following representations received in recent months from foreign interests for permission to land and process fish on Canadian soil, an interdepartmental committee was asked to study the effect such action could have on the fishing industry in general. I am asking the committee to report as soon as possible.

POWER

ONTARIO—APPLICATION RESPECTING PROPOSED NUCLEAR PLANT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Ontario asked me a question related to an application made by Ontario hydro to the atomic energy control board. I informed him that an application had not been received as of the date he suggested, but I find my information is not entirely precise. An application was received by the board, in the absence of the chairman, on September 8 and is now under consideration.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the minister for saying this, and I hope a decision will not be delayed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUPREME COURT DECISION RESPECTING HUNTING AND FISHING RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and stems from the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada yesterday, to the effect that the treaty rights granted the Indian people could be upset by the provisions of the Migratory Birds Convention Act. What legislative steps do he and the government propose to take immediately to restore the traditional, constitutional right of the Indian people to hunt, trap and fish on unoccupied crown land?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the judgment is being examined at present, and after that examination it will be possible to announce what steps, if any, can be taken.

Mr. Rhéaume: Can the Prime Minister advise the house what steps he took in relation to the commitment he made on May 31, 1963, that the royal proclamation of 1763 and its provisions for the Indian people would be maintained?

Mr. Pearson: I would have to look into the matter, Mr. Speaker. I am not familiar with all the details.

IMMIGRATION

TORONTO—STATUS OF PERSONS CONCERNED WITH NEWSPAPER STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he has completed his investigation into the I.T.U. matter in Toronto, particularly with reference to people from outside Canada who are working for the papers; and, if he has completed his investigation, can the house have a report?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I hope I will have these documents tomorrow in order to report to the hon. member in this regard.

COMBINES

REPORTED SPEECH BY JUSTICE MINISTER RESPECTING CONTROL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice.

Following his speech in Montebello, would he tell the house which new steps he intends to recommend to the government to control the monopolistic or restrictive practices, as he suggested in his speech?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that if I had presented those specific views through an amendment to the restrictive trade practices legislation, that would have represented the government's views. But I can assure my hon. friend that what I did was not to announce measures, but to set out principles I always supported in the past and which are very dear to me. One of those principles consists in determining, in the field of control, whether a wider use, to put it that way, could not be made of the federal jurisdiction in the field of trade and commerce.

It is one of the things I am now considering.

I also mentioned the possibility of considering whether in future a more frequent use could not be made of measures like injunctions, which are not necessarily related to the text, in criminal matters against some people, which would perhaps make it easier to check those practices.

[Text]

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): As a supplementary question, would the Minister of Justice advise whether he is studying the possibility of amending section 34 of the act and the setting up of an advisory council, as sought by the hon. member for Ontario in the house, I believe on September 15?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, in view of the studies which have been made under section 34, and in view of the material at my disposal, I do not believe it would be necessary to appoint a committee of inquiry, although internally the matter has been the object of a relatively long study by officials of my department and other officials of government, and I shall complete my own consideration of the matter very shortly.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): May I ask the Minister of Justice whether his speech at Montebello can be taken to be in agreement with what is said to be the commonly held view of the officials of the Department of Justice, that the Combines Investigation Act is no longer of any value in dealing with problems of monopolies and mergers, and that some other type of legislation is necessary? If that is so, does the minister intend to introduce some type of legislation next session, if not this session?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend will agree that it would be improper for me to refer to the views of the officials of the department on such a matter that may be concerned with policy, but these are definitely my own views, and in the light of what I have said I intend to ascertain what might be done in the direction I have indicated.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Because there seems to be some confusion on this matter I would like to ask the minister if it is not a fact that it is not a question of any distinction between the jurisdictions of the federal government and the provincial governments, but rather the interpretation by the Supreme Court of Canada of the words "virtually eliminating all competition"?

Mr. Favreau: No, Mr. Speaker. What I was referring to was the possibility of not necessarily having to deal with restrictive practices, or at least some of them, as being criminal offences, and the possibility of ascertaining to what extent one may legislate under the heading of trade and commerce to establish procedures extending to a broader scope of practices which, in certain cases, would not brand as criminals those engaged in practices which may be found to be restrictive.

[Translation]

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the minister referred to his own opinions, can he tell us whether his own opinions are not in accord with the official views of certain other people in his department?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This question is surely not in order.

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, before directing my question to the right hon. Prime Minister, I hope you will allow me to point out to the house that I received a reply to question 1,807 from the Minister of Industry and Minister of Defence Production. This answer is in excellent French, and even if an English keyboard typewriter was used, the writer was tactful enough to mark with a pen accents on the vowels requiring them.

I wish to congratulate the minister for the thoughtfulness shown with regard to the questions we are directing to him.

Here is the question I wish to direct to the Prime Minister.

Has any agreement been concluded between the Canadian government and that of the province of Quebec so as to facilitate the establishment in the province of Quebec of assembling plants for the Peugeot and Renault cars?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I am not familiar with that matter but I shall look into it right away, Mr. Speaker.

FINANCE

QUEBEC—REQUEST FOR TAX EXEMPTION FOR NEW PAPER MILL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Industry.

Could the minister tell us whether he has received from the Dominion Tar Company a request for tax exemption, within the development program for designated areas, for the purpose of building a pulp and paper plant in Chapleau county? Could he also tell us whether such a request was accepted?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This is surely a question for the order paper.

INQUIRY AS TO AMENDMENTS TO BANK ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): I have a question for the Minister of Finance. I wonder if the hon. gentleman would tell the house whether he intends to bring forward shortly legislation concerning amendments to the Bank Act, and if such legislation will contain a change in the ceiling on interest rates as recommended by the royal commission.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): I am hoping the government will be ready to bring in legislation amending the Bank Act and that this measure will receive the prompt attention of the house. It would be inappropriate for me to give advance information as to what that legislation might contain.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

FORT WILLIAM, ONT.—PROTEST RESPECTING SURVEILLANCE OF EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): I have a question for the Postmaster General. I wonder whether the Postmaster General would investigate a report in today's Globe and Mail that surveillance peepholes are being built into the men's washrooms of the new federal post office at Fort William. If the report is correct—and I hope it is not—will the minister issue immediate instructions to halt such a manifest invasion of a citizen's right of privacy?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): In the first place, in departmental parlance these so-called peepholes are referred to as "observation niches or posts". I may admit that we have had communications with regard to these observation posts not only in Fort William but in one or two other cities. Their use in accordance with a practice which has been followed for some considerable time, and which is considered necessary by postal administration not only in Canada but in other countries.

An hon. Member: A shocking thing.

Mr. Nicholson: If the hon. member will come to my office I will be glad to give him further information.

Mr. Fairweather: I don't dare go anywhere any more; you may be watching me.

TRADE

WHEAT—POSSIBLE SALES TO EASTERN EUROPEAN COUNTRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lawrence Watson (Assiniboia): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce based on reports by the London Observer service of another year of poor crops in eastern Europe. I wonder whether the minister would care to comment on a report in this morning's Globe and Mail that all the eastern European countries except Rumania would soon be looking for further imports of flour and grain.

Can the minister tell us exactly what negotiations are going on with countries in that area with a view to extending sales of Canadian wheat this year?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): As I reported to the house earlier this session, we have already sold to those countries more than we had expected them to buy during the early part of the period covered by their agreements. We are in continuous contact with those countries through the Canadian wheat board which is, of course, responsible for the sales, and I am satisfied that if these reports are correct—and I hope they are, from the point of view of Canadian wheat prospects—we shall get our full share of the business that is going.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF VISIT TO OTTAWA BY THE QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I direct this question to the Secretary of State, and ask him whether his attention has been drawn to an article appearing in the Globe and Mail this morning under the heading "CTV Scores Beat". It has to do with the broadcast of Her Majesty's arrival in Ottawa next Sunday and it states, among other things, that the C.B.C. has shown a curious tendency to downgrade the Queen's activities.

Would the minister bring to the attention of the C.B.C. that because the corporation is not broadcasting the Queen's visit "live" on Sunday evening upon her arrival, the only people who will be able to see what is going on will be the 75 per cent who could use the private CTV facilities? Would the minister also bring to the attention of the C.B.C. the fact that Canadians everywhere want to see this visit of the Queen to Canada's capital, and there is no reason why there should not be a live showing rather than a postponed production?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I have not seen the article in question, but I will be pleased to convey to the C.B.C. the views of the right hon. gentleman.

INQUIRY OF THE MINISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue.

Can he give the house the assurance that at the next federal-provincial conference on taxation, scheduled to take place on October 14 and 15 next, consideration will be given to means of cutting taxes instead of studying ways to increase them?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: I am not certain whether the hon. member is serious. In any event, perhaps he would put his question on the order paper.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Legal and other services—

1. Administration including the office of the superintendent of bankruptcy, grants and contributions as detailed in the estimates, gratuities to the widows or other dependants of judges who die while in office and authority to make recoverable advances for the administration of justice on behalf of the governments of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, $2,109,600.

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): The estimates of my department are being called today as a result of a procedure which was adopted in this chamber on Monday, October 5, when the right hon. Leader of the Opposition moved the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a matter which, he alleged, was of urgent national interest, namely the way in which the present government has dealt with one Hal Banks.

I cannot refrain from making a special reference to the fact that such a motion should have been made on that particular date. It would be a refusal of duty on my part not to make a special note of the courtesy and the admirable sense of courage shown on that day by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Lambert: Oh, shame.

Mr. Favreau: There were three members of the government who were likely to have to answer the very serious accusations which he made and intended to press on that day. These were the Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of Labour and myself, in my capacity as Minister of Justice. It is interesting to note that this particular day was chosen when the Prime Minister was attending the ceremonies in connection with the arrival of the Queen in Charlottetown—

Mr. Lambert: Do not be so cowardly.

Mr. Woolliams: Imputing motives.

Mr. Favreau: I am just stating facts; I am not imputing motives.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Favreau: This was also a day when the Minister of Labour was attending the official opening of the British Columbia institute of technology and when I, for that day and the beginning of the following day, was chairing the conference of attorneys general sitting in the west block to try to arrive at a formula to provide for the amendment in Canada of the constitution of Canada.

Mr. Lambert: You want to see what your pals did in the past.

Mr. Favreau: Let not the right hon. gentleman state that the matter in his opinion was urgent on that particular day, because on the preceding Friday he had gone a long way toward trying to make a great deal about the fact that a Toronto reporter was alleged to have spoken to Banks on a yacht in New York harbour. I wish to note this because I do not believe it would have been fair to press any of the accusations the right hon. Leader of the Opposition made on that day, at a time when it was known that neither the Prime Minister, nor the Minister of Labour nor myself would be here to defend either ourselves, our respective departments or officers.

An hon. Member: Or Banks.

Mr. Favreau: Four charges or accusations were made against the government with relation to the matter of Hal Banks, to whom the right hon. gentleman once referred as being a demagogue in Canada. The first one—and this is one which I think ought never to have been made or entertained by a man holding so high an office as that of leader of the official opposition and who was once the prime minister of this country—was a direct accusation, without verification, against a minister of the crown to the effect that he had misled the house in making a statement. The statement referred to was that made and repeated by me, that my department or the officials under my jurisdiction had in fact requested the F.B.I. to investigate the whereabouts of Hal Banks and to report to the R.C.M.P.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that I have asked myself for some moments whether it was even dignified on my part to try to give the house facts and dates in support of the denial of such an accusation. But I think that because the matter has been in the papers and has reached the news it is important that this house should ascertain when the information was requested. First I must say that on August 18, 1964, the R.C.M.P. contacted the liaison officer of the F.B.I. by telephone requesting the information which I told the house later had been requested. On the same date—

Mr. Diefenbaker: What was that information?

Mr. Favreau: Information as to the whereabouts of Mr. Banks.

Mr. Herridge: A reporter found him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Favreau: On August 18 a letter was written to the F.B.I. liaison officer by the R.C.M.P. in Ottawa. On August 25 a second letter to the same effect was written, seeking information from the F.B.I. On August 28 the F.B.I., through its liaison officer, acknowledged the last letter. Let it not be said, Mr. Chairman, that the R.C.M.P. could have gone to the United States and itself pursued there an investigation. This, as everybody knows, in accordance with international practice, would be absolutely unthinkable and unacceptable. The investigations which the F.B.I. intends to pursue in Canada are pursued by Canadian authorities or police, usually through the liaison officers of these police forces. There are in that way exchanges of information going on throughout the year.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, will the minister, having referred to these two letters of August 18 and 25, table the letters so we may see what he asked for?

Mr. Favreau: Well, Mr. Chairman, that is about the most appropriate question that could have been put. It is much more appropriate than were the accusations of the right hon. gentleman.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is his conscience bothering the minister?

Som hon. Members: How about you?

Mr. Macdonald: You don't have a conscience.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would answer one question at this stage.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Woolliams: I do not think the minister heard me, Mr. Chairman. Would the minister answer one question now?

Mr. Favreau: We will see what the question is.

Mr. Woolliams: This question is very simple. I have been listening to the minister with great interest but would he explain at this stage why the recognizance bond did not carry a term as a condition, taking all the circumstances into account, to the effect that Banks should stay within the jurisdiction?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman may be assured that if he is patient with me I will get to that point, not right away but in the course of my remarks, which I intend to make in the order I have planned.

I have here a letter dated October 5, 1964 from the deputy commissioner of the R.C.M.P., Mr. J. Lemieux, in which all the information is given and in which he refers to the correspondence to which I have made reference. I ask for permission to table that letter which is addressed to me.

The second—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Before the minister goes on, may I say that the letters I want to see are those of August 18 and 25. What do those letters contain?

Mr. Macdonald: Respect the rules.

Mr. Favreau: If the right hon. gentleman is ready to state that he does not believe the report which has been made to me by the R.C.M. Police and in this respect insists on production of the correspondence sent and received by the R.C.M. Police—although he knows it is against the practice of the R.C.M.P. to produce copies of any correspondence—he can take the responsibility therefor and I shall make the necessary inquiry to seek their agreement for production of such copies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, let it be made clear immediately.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has referred—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a question of privilege.

The Chairman: Order. The Leader of the Opposition on a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister said that the two letters to which I referred were sent. He now endeavours to raise an alibi and hide behind the facts.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Having referred to these letters the minister does not want to produce them, for reasons which naturally are very appealing. Why did the minister refer to these letters? He now says he does not want to produce them.

Mr. Favreau: I told the right hon. gentleman that, knowing what is the practice, if he wanted to take upon himself the responsibility for stating that he does not rely on the report which has been made to me by the R.C.M.P. deputy commissioner which I have just tabled and which describes the correspondence, and if he wishes to have copies of the actual correspondence tabled, I would attempt to obtain copies and file them, but under his own responsibility.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister has referred to these letters. He acted on his own responsibility and we want to see what those letters contain.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Favreau.]

Mr. Diefenbaker: We will not have this sort of evasion.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, in view of all these interruptions I should like to say I wish I could use with as much authority as he often does certain of the expressions which the right hon. gentleman uses to make fellow members sit down, so that I could continue my own speech.

The second allegation which was made by the right hon. gentleman and which he insisted ought to be discussed even in the absence of the appropriate minister was to the effect that the government made a deal with Banks to allow him to leave the country smoothly thus, in his words, flouting the course of justice. This, of course, relates and could only relate to the way in which my department under my responsibility has dealt with the Banks matter following the time of his conviction, and from the moment he appealed his conviction for conspiracy in relation to the Walsh beating. I do not think anyone believes that I have to deny such imputations so that everyone will know and be confident that they do not conform to reality and are completely contrary to the truth and to the facts. However, I suppose that for the purpose of the record I owe it to this government and to this house to repeat for the purpose of the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: For the purpose of answering the labour leader who said that about you.

Mr. Macdonald: Order. Why do you not observe the rules?

Mr. Favreau: —for the purpose of the right hon. gentleman matters which I have already put before the house which do not seem to have been well understood and therefore need to be repeated.

When Banks was convicted an application was made for his release on bail. Under section 587 of the Criminal Code he applied through his counsel to the chief justice of the court of appeals of the province of Quebec seeking the fixing of bail in his case. Counsel was instructed, and the instructions which were given to counsel representing the federal government and the counsel representing the attorney general of the province of Quebec were to oppose completely the fixing of bail so that Banks would remain within the jurisdiction of the court and attend the hearing of his appeal.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it would be out of proportion with reality and completely illogical, once the government had attempted to take the necessary steps so that Banks might even be forced to remain in jail until his appeal had been disposed of, to say or to imply that there has been some kind of a shady deal or arrangement between the Department of Justice—because that could be the only possible department—and Banks, so as to make sure that he could leave the country very discreetly and thus flout, as has been suggested, the course of justice. I say that the very first step taken by the government of opposing any bail in the case of Banks pending his appeal completely denies any accusation or suggestion or innuendo to the effect that he would have been either pampered or assisted in leaving the jurisdiction of the courts of this country.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, would the minister allow a question?

Mr. Favreau: I am sorry, but I prefer that you ask your questions later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This is just a simple little question. Why did counsel for the crown not advise the chief justice—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did counsel not advise the chief justice that this was not an extraditable offence?

The Chairman: Order.

Mr. Favreau: The hon. gentleman will have ample opportunity to make more of his gratuitous allegations later on.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Why did you not inform the court of appeal that it was not an extraditable offence?

Mr. Favreau: The attitude taken by my department and by the department of the attorney general of Quebec was taken not only in an attempt to act passively, but to make sure to maintain Banks within the confines of the court's jurisdiction. Counsel was instructed to request that if the court felt as a matter of justice it ought to fix a bail bond, the amount of the bond ought not to be less than $50,000. Again the government has acted towards Hal Banks in a way which is directly opposite to any so-called co-operation, pampering, or assistance in his flouting the course of justice in this country.

What is more serious than the accusations made by the right hon. gentleman against any member of parliament or of government is the implication on the part of one whose profession is the law that one of the greatest judges in this country has, in disposing of the matter of bail in the case of Banks, acted in a way which was contrary to the interests of this country. I deny that completely.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege, and throw that accusation back into the teeth of the hon. gentleman. What I said was this. This government and its counsel failed to inform that eminent judge of the fact that the charge of conspiracy was not an extraditable charge. A judge must accept what counsel places before him. I made no such allegation against the chief justice of Quebec and I want to make that very clear. This is simply a smokescreen on the part of the government to conceal its failure to give adequate information to the chief justice.

The Chairman: Order. Those remarks may well be a clarification of a statement made previously by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, but I do not think there is any question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I refer to an erroneous statement about an allegation made against the chief justice.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, as a new member of parliament I have a lot to learn from the right hon. gentleman about the method of inserting remarks in the record, contrary to the rule, during the course of a statement being made by another member. I did not precipitate this discussion, Mr. Chairman, but I have attempted to make the situation clear.

The question of fixing bail under the Criminal Code and most lawyers are aware of this fact, is essentially one for the court to decide in its discretion. It is all very well for the right hon. gentleman, by hindsight, to say that not only should we have objected to any bail or bond being posted, or insisted on a very high bail, but that we should also have instructed counsel very specifically to inform the chief justice of the province that the offences were not extraditable, and that if the chief justice dared to fix bail he would have to share in the responsibility for Mr. Banks fleeing the country.

Mr. Rhéaume: You allowed him to get away. You answer that.

Mr. Favreau: You would not like this answer twice.

I hold great respect for the chief justice of my province, who was appointed by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition when he was in office, and who should perhaps be congratulated in that regard. On the occasion of that appointment I remember very clearly writing to one of my predecessors, Hon. Davie Fulton, indicating that normally one would congratulate the appointee, but that in this regard, as a member of the bar of Quebec, I felt I should extend congratulations to the minister of justice.

It is that judge, Mr. Justice Tremblay, whose judgment is being questioned, and whose exercise of discretion is put into question by the hon. gentleman. That judge, when looking at the offences charged, knew just as well as anyone else in the courtroom that they were not extraditable. Surely he exercised his discretion in the light of all the circumstances. I wish to repeat that this decision, rendered in those circumstances was a decision which could be expected as being fair on the part of the judge who made that decision on that particular day.

Mr. Martineau: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Favreau: I would much prefer you to do so at the end of my statement.

Mr. Martineau: My question relates to what the minister has just said.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, it is not only the question in relation to the posting of bond in the case of Hal Banks which is of such great interest to the right hon. Leader of the Opposition. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition referred specifically to the fact that in the bond there was no prohibition which would have prevented Hal Banks from leaving the country pending the proceedings. The hon. gentleman's statement would not really be believable if it were not written in Hansard at page 6000. He referred to the contents of the bond posted by Banks, without of course having taken the very ordinary precaution of looking into the matter. Sometimes when you look too far you are prevented from making a certain assertion because at that moment you know the allegation is wrong.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman looked far enough when he charged him with a non-extraditable offence.

The Chairman: Order; I have to interrupt the minister because his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

The Chairman: Is it agreed that he should continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Favreau.]

Mr. Favreau: I thank hon. gentlemen for allowing me to continue and I will not abuse the privilege. I may have another chance to rise at the end of the questions. The right hon. gentleman said that the alleged clause relating to preventing Banks from leaving the country was removed from the ordinary bond form. I showed the bond form, which I think has now been tabled, to the right hon. gentleman afterwards. I challenge anyone to tell me that there has been the slightest deletion from that bond form, let alone the deletion of a condition which would have assisted Banks in leaving the country. Just as the bond form, which we have been accused of tampering with has not in fact been tampered with, in the same manner the so-called deal which we are alleged to have made with Banks not only has not been made but it could not be made. The reference to it is contrary to all the facts as they exist. It could not possibly have been made in the light of these facts and I say that if it exists, then it exists in only one place, and that is in the imagination of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Martineau: May I ask a question of the minister? He said he would answer questions at the end of his statement. Is it not the duty of crown counsel to make all the necessary representations so that the chief justice, no matter what his juridical science may be, can determine whether or not a bail bond should be granted, what the amount of it should be, and so on? Should the judge not be acquainted with all the consequences of bail, particularly in this case of Banks?

Mr. Favreau: My hon. friend has just stated the normal functions of the normal crown attorney. I am not going to ask him a question, but I am quite sure that throughout his life as a crown attorney, and he was a very good crown attorney, he never had occasion to tell a judge: Beware, this offence is not extraditable. This is not the normal thing to do because one expects the judge to know. I repeat, in spite of all the innuendos that are on the record, I am satisfied just as the citizens of the country are satisfied, that counsel for the crown charged with prosecuting Banks have done their duty, and only their duty.

Mr. Woolliams: May I direct one further question to the minister? Would he deny that as late as a month ago his parliamentary secretary, who is sitting right behind him, said to a news commentator over the radio in reference to Banks, that extradition did apply and it would be used if necessary? Will he deny that statement is on tape at the present time?

Mr. Macdonald: Perhaps on a question of privilege I could deal with this matter. I deny I made the assertion the hon. member has just made.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, the members of the house and the public of Canada have been waiting for months for some answers to exculpate the government from this sad and sordid mess in which they have gotten themselves over Banks. Now they have been treated this afternoon to a tangled web of distortions and, in fact, fairy tales. The minister, try as he may, cannot get away from the facts which I will put straight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: You see, Mr. Chairman, how they believe in themselves; these infallible members over there believe in themselves merely because they happen to be sitting on the government side. They have not changed one iota since 1957 or prior thereto.

Before discussing the facts, Mr. Chairman, I want to state that there has been a serious point of order raised. The minister has referred to two letters, one dated August 25 and the other dated August 28, if I heard him correctly. He has referred to these letters in the debate. I believe the rules of this house require that they be tabled. I do not know what is in these letters. We have been given a partial explanation of what is in them by the minister. Since he has taken upon himself the responsibility to make a reference to those letters during the debate, then I believe the rules of this house require that they be tabled.

An hon. Member: Why don't you steal them?

Mr. Winkler: That is a Liberal tactic.

Mr. Woolliams: I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman, and probably we should also make it a question of order. It does seem that the Liberal members, who have been silenced by their own party, do not want to allow the opposition to speak. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that I could name the member if he wants me to, but when he states that the distinguished member now speaking should steal those letters, then he is imputing motives. I would say with greatest respect to you, Mr. Chairman, that we should ask for a little order and decorum, because if hon. members showed a little more respect perhaps parliament would receive more respect from the members of the press gallery and the public at large.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: Order please.

Mr. Macaluso: On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whom the hon. member was pointing to, but I think he was pointing at me, and if he was doing so he was completely erroneous.

Mr. Winkler: If the hat fits wear it, my friend.

The Chairman: Order, please. I would invite all members to respect the usual requirements of decorum in committee and allow the hon. member to make his speech without interruption.

Mr. Nielsen: This loud and raucous interference across the way really does not bother me at all, Mr. Chairman, because I have become rather used to it, particularly when the case is so strong against them, and when their own arguments are so weak that they have to pound their desks like the trained seals they are. What it amounts to—

Mr. Lloyd: On a question of privilege, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Woolliams: Here is the mayor of Halifax.

Mr. Rhéaume: He is not a trained seal.

Mr. Lloyd: I am not trained—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lloyd: I am not trained as a member of the bar, but I know most people in Canada would like to see less of courtroom tactics and more of reason in a properly disciplined parliament, and I would hope the hon. member could proceed that way.

The Chairman: Obviously we will not make too much progress if we keep raising questions of privilege and points of order. I would invite all members to co-operate with the Chair and allow the hon. member for Yukon to continue his remarks.

Mr. Nielsen: They don't like it, Mr. Chairman. They don't like being confronted with the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: I am sorry if I hurt the feelings of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Lloyd). He is just a seal, untrained.

Mr. Lloyd: On a question of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman, as I understand the rules inherited from the members of the bar, imputations should not be made as to the conduct of any hon. member. I suggest that the hon. member address himself to the facts and not be spinning a tale, a web of intrigue which he has constructed in his own imagination.

Mr. Nielsen: To settle the question perhaps we could have the expert advice of the Minister of Fisheries on the subject, as to the classification of the hon. member.

As recorded at page 7960 of Hansard for September 14 the Minister of Justice, in reply to a question put to him by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, said:

> I must say that although we have received full co-operation from the United States authorities the latter have not yet been able to define the whereabouts of Mr. Banks.

There can be no question whatever but that the minister did in fact request the F.B.I. to investigate the whereabouts of Mr. Banks.

Mr. Sharp: Why didn't the Leader of the Opposition admit this, then?

Mr. Nielsen: I will come to that. Now the press has come forth with stories purporting to emanate from sources within the F.B.I. which state the F.B.I. were not officially requested by the Canadian government to make any investigation as to the whereabouts of Mr. Banks. I believe those stories came out on Friday last.

The minister has made much about the timing of the presentation of the motion to adjourn the business of the house under standing order 26. That motion was presented at the first opportunity, and the reason it was introduced was because of a story appearing throughout the national press that a Mr. Todd, a responsible labour leader, had alleged a deal between the government of Canada and the S.I.U. with regard to the escape of Hal Banks.

That motion was presented at the first opportunity. It is regrettable that the minister and the Prime Minister were not here. Perhaps more ministers should have been here, because certainly more ministers would appear to be involved than the Prime Minister, the Minister of Labour and the Minister of Justice in this whole shoddy affair.

Here you have two forces, the F.B.I. in the United States and the R.C.M.P. in Canada, both backed by the full resources of their two governments, both unable to trace Mr. Banks; but a Toronto Star reporter does it in two hours. Here is the F.B.I. of the United States, who laid Dillinger and Baby Face Nelson by the heels, unable to find Banks, and it was left to a Toronto Star reporter to find him inside a two hour investigation.

What is the minister trying to tell us? What is he asking the people of Canada to believe?—that these forces of justice, great and accomplished as they are and as they have proven themselves to be, cannot find a trace of the elusive Mr. Banks, but Mr. Reguly does it in two hours, and not a very strenuous two hours at that.

Is there not justification for coming to the conclusion that there has been some sort of deal between the government and Hal Banks?

Mr. Sharp: Not at all,—a lie.

Mr. Nielsen: This is just one fact.

Mr. Favreau: That is the type of mind you have.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I seldom take exception to any remarks made in the chamber, but one has been made just now which may find its way into Hansard and I would like the minister concerned, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who said "That is a lie" to assure me that he did not intend to impute any motives so far as I was concerned in regard to that statement.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Sharp: This is contrary to the assertions of the Minister of Justice, whose word I accept.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

The Chairman: Order. I am sure the minister and all members of the committee know well there are some words that should not be used, and certainly one of them that cannot be used is to suggest that another member has lied. Actually we had this point discussed just a couple of weeks ago in committee, and if the word has been used, as suggested by the hon. member for Yukon, and if he requests that it be withdrawn, I am sure the minister would want to explain.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, he wants to withdraw.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Chairman, I would ask the hon. gentleman to withdraw his statement that the Minister of Justice is telling lies.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

The Chairman: Order. That is not the Chair's understanding of the rules. The hon. member for Yukon, who has the floor, makes a series of assertions which are contrary to assertions made by another member, and each one is entitled to his own opinion, but I do not believe another member can assert one member is lying because he has contradicted a statement made by another member.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Nielsen: I just want the minister to say he was not for a moment suggesting that I was lying. He may take exception to the statements which I made.

Mr. Sharp: Well, Mr. Chairman, I assert that the hon. gentleman's statements are contrary to what I regard as the truth uttered by the Minister of Justice.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

The Chairman: Order. I think the minister would want to co-operate with the committee and with the Chair, and if perhaps the word he used went beyond his thoughts I would ask him very simply to withdraw the word.

Mr. Sharp: I am very happy to do so. I would not offend my hon. friend—

Mr. Diefenbaker: No conditions.

Mr. Sharp: I withdraw the word.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is better.

Mr. Nielsen: I seldom take exception to words used but I would not want readers of Hansard, even though they are few, to get the impression that the minister used an expression he did not want to. It is my belief that the explanation offered by the minister is more an exercise in metaphysics than it is an explanation of the law. All we want, and all we have been asking for throughout these months, are the facts. But we cannot seem to get them from the minister. He says counsel appointed by the crown opposed bail. He is a member of the bar. Having read his biographical history I am sure he has wide experience at the bar and as Minister of Justice he is gaining it now, perhaps a little more slowly here than he did while in private practice. But he knows as well as I do and as well as his colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs does, that in every recognizance crown counsel always makes certain that there is a provision in th bail bond which would prevent the accused from leaving the jurisdiction. Certainly that has been my experience in these matters against a background of some ten years prosecuting for the crown. It is not up to the judge to prepare counsel's case for him. It is up to counsel to make sure his documents are in order before he puts them before the judge. Is it not natural that we who are familiar with the customary and usual practice in matters of this kind should wonder why this particular provision was left out on this occasion? Is it not natural that we should proceed from there to examine Mr. Todd's statement that there has been some sort of deal, or some connivance, between the government and Mr. Banks?

Mr. Favreau: Would the hon. member answer a question? Is he ready to state that the form provided by the Criminal Code in the case of a bond posted on appeal contains a clause providing for the prevention of the appellant leaving the jurisdiction? Will he not agree that in the province of Quebec, in the practice of the court of appeal, the bond which was signed by Banks was the usual and common form continuously used in that province?

Mr. Nielsen: The minister knows as well as I do that the procedure governing these matters is the one set forth in the Criminal Code of Canada and that it applies uniformly throughout the whole of Canada. It is no different in Quebec. It is the same as in any other province or area of Canada. The hon. gentleman knows, too, that fundamentally a recognizance is the same on appeal as it is on trial. He knows, also, that the provision as to remaining within the jurisdiction is a provision which is normally there before a person goes to trial or appeal.

Mr. Favreau: On a question of privilege, that ought not to be left on the record uncontradicted. It is contrary to the practice in the province of Quebec and it is contrary to the facts.

An hon. Member: There is no question of privilege.

The Chairman: I recognize that. But the Chair has to listen to at least one sentence before forming an opinion. I am sure the minister realizes there is no question of privilege here. It is the minister's privilege after the hon. member has spoken, if he has an opportunity to get on record, to correct statements which he thinks are wrong. But there is no question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, the minister holds his view as to the practice and I hold mine. I dare say that a great many other lawyers in the country, including prominent lawyers in Quebec who have made certain statements on this subject to the press, hold views which are entirely different from those held by the minister. But is it any wonder that since these views are held by a number of people we should ask that there be an inquiry to determine just how deeply the government is involved in these arrangements.

The crown, said the minister, opposed the bail application. But the crown did not, according to my information, advance any argument in opposition to bail being granted. The crown did not explain—as is the duty of counsel; not of the judge or the court—that the offence with which the court was dealing was a non-extraditable offence. This is a practice so common that there should be no need for it to be repeated to members of the bar who have any knowledge whatsoever of the practice which prevails. Counsel should have told the judge that the court was dealing with an accused person who was charged with a crime which was non-extraditable.

Why were such instructions not given to the counsel retained by the minister's department? Is it any wonder that in the absence of such specific instructions people come to the conclusions that they do with respect to these arrangements with the S.I.U. and with Banks.

I wonder, too, why counsel did not acquaint the court with the record of Mr. Banks—a record which I read into Hansard during the debate on the S.I.U. bill; a record which I described as being "as long as your arm"; a record which was appended to the order in council which was signed when Banks was admitted to this country by the Liberal administration of the day. Why was not the court informed of this record, and why were these facts not placed before the judge so that he would be better informed and able to decide whether or not there was any likelihood of Mr. Banks leaving the jurisdiction? I dare say that had this record been produced to the court then, either this particlar provision would have been inserted in his recognizance or he would not have been granted bail at all.

The facts are these. Banks was granted bail in an amount of $25,000 for a five year conviction.

Mr. Byrne: Those are the only facts so far.

Mr. Nielsen: That is a cheap price to pay to get out of the country—$5,000 a year.

Mr. Woolliams: Especially if you are using someone else's money.

Mr. Nielsen: Five thousand a year for freedom. And he was allowed—I use that word "allowed"—to leave Canada by the fumbling and the bumbling, intentional or otherwise, of the government—a government for which the Prime Minister must take responsibility by reason of his position as head of the government, and for whose actions the Minister of Justice, together with his colleague the Minister of Labour, must also take responsibility. I do not know whether or not there are any other ministers there from Montreal. I do not know their backgrounds. But there have been some statements made with regard to radio tapes and the like which may arouse a little fear in the minds of some of those ministers and maybe in the minds of some backbenchers as well, and the thought that Banks would be a fine fellow to get out of this country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Nielsen: No amount of squirming can cover up—

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member permit a question? I understand he alleges there was some sort of deal with Banks to buy his freedom at the rate of $5,000 per annum. I take it, then, that the hon. member alleges that the chief justice was in on this deal, as he would have to be if such a deal were made.

Mr. Nielsen: This is a very clever but very shallow contrivance on the part of the hon. member who, I understand, had his fortunes changed by some sort of a deal in Ontario, to shift emphasis from the real issues which confront the minister and the government to some side track. All this is a red herring. The court and the judge have nothing to do but their duty, and their duty is to decide on the basis of material which is put before them by counsel, material which counsel has responsibility for producing pursuant to instructions.

What was counsel instructed to do in this case? Remain mute? To rise and say merely: "We oppose bail"? What arguments did counsel present? If none were presented, why the silence? All these interventions and smokescreens are merely designed to hide the facts. The fact is, and it is abundantly clear, that the Minister of Justice—and I do not know how many collaborators he may have had on the front benches over there—made it easy for Banks to leave this country.

An hon. Member: Slander.

Mr. Nielsen: And they may have had good reason for making it easy for him to leave the country. We have seen the material that has appeared in the column of the eminent member for Port Arthur, saying that Banks was mighty cosy with the Liberal party; saying that he referred to the Liberal party as his Ottawa bureau. No wonder then, if these allegations are correct—about which the minister says nothing, nor any other cabinet member—there is some anxiety that not only he leave the country but stay out of the country.

An hon. Member: Who brought him in in the first place?

Mr. Woolliams: Illegally?

Mr. Nielsen: What the minister is saying in effect is that what the resources of the Canadian government, of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, of the United States government and of the federal bureau of investigation could not do over three months was done by Mr. Reguly in two hours.

Mr. Bigg: At the cost of $2 for a taxi.

Mr. Nielsen: The minister is saying that this task of finding Mr. Banks was beyond the resources of these two governments and these law enforcement agencies. The hon. member for Renfrew South and the minister have been trying to foist the blame, deliberately, with regard to the bail application, on to the judge who presided over the court at the time the application was made. The minister had some rather critical remarks to make—

Mr. Favreau: Several.

Mr. Nielsen: —of the motivation of the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, as a member of the bar, in making this statement. I put that same charge to the minister, because I say it is pretty shoddy tactics to try to foist the blame for the government's inadequacies, deliberate or otherwise, on to a judge. It was the minister's responsibility to instruct counsel properly; it was the minister's responsibility to see that Banks came to justice; it was the minister's responsibility to see that the court was properly advised by counsel instructed by his department.

An hon. Member: It was the court's decision.

Mr. Nielsen: I hear an interjection that it was the court's decision. Naturally it was the court's decision; the court was the only agency that could make such a decision. It is a fact that it is the court's decision. But what is the court going to do if a plaintiff comes in and remains mute? Is the court going to give judgment for the plaintiff, or is he going to decide the case on speculation which may or may not exist in his own mind? What is the court going to do with regard to a bail application if it is not told anything about the man concerning whom the application is made?

Mr. Winkler: He had not thought of that.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a very sad and sordid record that the government has in this regard. Its record and actions in this regard have tarnished not only the minister and the officials, whom he has not only the responsibility to direct but to guide, but they have tarnished the reputations and characters of the Prime Minister who leads this government and of the Minister of Labour; and, as I say, there may be other cabinet members involved as well. Only time will tell, and I wish Mr. Banks could tell.

Mr. Woolliams: He will talk, after the election.

Mr. Greene: You guys won't be talking in here after the election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: That is wishful thinking.

Mr. Hales: You speak from experience, Joe.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, in closing these few words of reply to the minister's statement I want to say this to him. I have said already that counsel, if they did not bring these matters to the attention of the court, were improperly instructed and I think there are certain motivations in this regard that should be explained by the minister or whoever did instruct those counsel. I think the minister should explain just what representations were made by counsel to the judge. These are explanations that could have been made and could have helped clarify this situation; could have helped clear the tarnished image that the government has assumed as the result of the whole sordid affair.

But instead of adopting that course the minister adopted one of attacking the right hon. Leader of the Opposition for bringing forward the motion last Monday. It is my personal view, with which undoubtedly members opposite will not agree, that this government brought Banks in, approved his actions, and he was encouraged and fraternized with by the Liberal administration right up to its defeat in 1957. The Liberals were the people that brought him in. In fact, in order to accomplish this they twisted and altered and reshaped the Immigration Act and the procedures that were operable under that act.

This is what was done in order to bring in this gentleman who is now so elusive.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member put on the record the name of the minister concerned?

Mr. Winkler: Who was the minister of the day?

Mr. Nielsen: The former minister, Mr. Harris, was the gentleman concerned. He is the gentleman who, in accordance with my understanding of the facts—

Mr. Greene: Which is very limited.

Mr. Nielsen: —brought representations to bear. The hon. member for Renfrew South can check these facts if he wants to be accurate himself, and if he thinks they are wrong he can rise in his place any time and correct me.

Mr. Greene: Mr. Chairman, would the hon. member permit a question? I know the hon. member is very critical of the handling of Mr. Banks both before 1957 and since April, 1963. I wonder whether the hon. member could tell us in what way, between 1957 and 1963, the Banks matter was better handled than it was previously.

Mr. Nielsen: There is one gentleman in this house who can do that much better than I, because he was an assistant deputy minister from 1955 to 1960—and he now occupies the portfolio of Minister of Justice. At the time he was an official of the department; he was undoubtedly acquainted with all the facts; he was undoubtedly acquainted with the advice given to the government of that day—and no one can tell me that a minister of justice, unless he has very good, substantial reason, is going to act without the advice of his officials.

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member permit another question?

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Greene: Is the hon. member alleging that the shortcomings between 1957 and 1963—

The Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Martineau: Put it on the order paper.

The Chairman: Order. I think I should bring to the attention of the hon. member the fact that his time expired a few minutes ago. I was giving him additional minutes; but I do not think they should be used up by answering questions.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Nielsen: With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I might be permitted to continue.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, I think we should extend the same courtesy to the hon. gentleman as was extended to me in regard to my speech.

Mr. Douglas: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to extending the hon. member's time; but this debate is only for this afternoon and I am sure the other parties in the house have speakers they want to put forward. If the hon. member is only going to be a few minutes, that is fine; but if he is going to take some time I think hon. members from other parties should be given an opportunity to take part in this debate.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I want to be completely co-operative in that regard. I think the matter is of sufficient concern and importance that the debate certainly should not end this afternoon and perhaps it might be carried on tomorrow; because I am going to move an amendment this afternoon in connection with these estimates and other parties in this house may wish to debate the amendment at some length.

I was speaking of the former minister, Mr. Harris, and the order in council which was signed and which admitted Mr. Banks into this country. There was appended to it a list of the convictions of Mr. Banks. Since that admission a long record of approval, of association and of amity between the Liberals and Mr. Banks has emerged. The latest episode is Mr. Bank's decamping under the noses of the government and under the noses of the most experienced law enforcement agencies.

Not only that, Mr. Chairman, but is it not curious that Mr. Banks, to use the word of the Minister of Justice, "discreetly" left the country? He discreetly left the country in a cream cadillac with Quebec licence plates, loaded to the gunwales with all the records of the S.I.U., passing through the Canadian port of exit and the immigration port of entry to the United States.

An hon. Member: They did not know it was he.

Mr. Nielsen: No, they did not know it was Mr. Banks, although he had his cadillac on parliament hill when the demonstration took place. I am sure the minister saw it then and also a good many members of the R.C.M.P. saw it as well. I say that no party could do more for a friend. This is a friendship which is undoubtedly reciprocated by Mr. Banks.

In the good old days of Liberalism before 1957 Mr. Banks had his Ottawa bureau functioning pretty smoothly.

A government which has this sort of record by association with this gentleman, with the complete mishandling of the affair which has allowed Mr. Banks to escape Canadian justice, brings serious doubt on the capacity of the Minister of Justice to retain the portfolio he holds. In our view the minister should seriously consider submitting his resignation to the Prime Minister. Perhaps he should follow the precedent of the previous postmaster general. Before the Norris commission Banks said he got along with the Liberals; that appears in the report. He got along fine with them. In addition to letting him into the country the Liberal government even sent him to the international labour organization convention at Geneva. What a representative to represent Canada in a discussion such as that.

Mr. Macaluso: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I am sure the hon. member does not want—or perhaps he does—to leave such a falsehood uncorrected. He said the Liberal government sent Mr. Banks. The fact is the government accepted the recommendation of the Canadian trades and labour congress, now the Canadian Labour Congress, which nominated Mr. Banks to attend the convention. That is on the record.

Mr. Nielsen: If this government does everything the Canadian trades and labour congress recommends, that is one matter. In 1955 the government paid Banks' way to Geneva to represent Canadian labour. He was sent over by the government because he was such a friend. I wonder at the degree of dignity and distinction with which Banks represented the Canadian government and Canadian labour while in Geneva. As late as 1963 in his report to the seafarers international union convention—this appeared in the column of the hon. member for Port Arthur—Banks attacked the Norris commission. He also attacked the previous minister of labour, now the hon. member for Ontario. He spoke very approvingly of the Liberal government, saying that the enemies of the S.I.U. were not finding the same willing ears as when the Conservative government was in power. That is what the friend of those opposite said.

Mr. Moreau: He was wrong.

Mr. Nielsen: Now we have the interprovincial member for York-Scarborough again.

Mr. Douglas: A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Chairman, there is only about an hour and ten minutes left in this debate. While I think the hon. member is making a useful contribution I do not think he should be allowed to take up all the time. He has been speaking now for about 45 minutes and I think some other hon. members should also be allowed to take part. If the debate continues tomorrow he can speak again, but I do not think that the other parties should be shut out completely.

Mr. Nielsen: I realize the quandary of the hon. member for Burnaby-Coquitlam but I certainly shared my 30 minutes with all the hon. members who interjected and made speeches during the time I have been on my feet. I do not think I have been speaking for 30 minutes but I will take my seat and move my amendment so that the committee might study it.

May I close simply by saying this, that the Liberals caused Banks to be charged. He was convicted and they let him go, to bask in luxury on his yacht in New York, a yacht which was provided by the S.I.U. for the purpose of Mr. Banks. And let us not believe for a moment that the S.I.U. would provide such facilities for Mr. Banks if he had lost all his usefulness to that union organization.

This raises another possible suggestion here, and that is: Has the control of the S.I.U. really slipped from Banks' hands?

Mr. Herridge: That is the question.

Mr. Nielsen: The S.I.U. do not provide these facilities for nothing. Because of the manner in which the government has failed to act on this matter; because the minister has shown a singular lack of understanding of the function with which he is charged in carrying out the responsibilities of his office; because of the degree to which the law, good order and justice in this country have been dragged in the mire by the inaction of the minister and of the government as a whole, it is both my belief and the belief of a good many of us on this side that the minister is no longer fit to hold the portfolio of Minister of Justice. Therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton South:

That vote No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Justice be reduced by the sum of $16,999.

That will leave by way of salary for the minister $1 per annum.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the only possible reason for spending a day or maybe two days in debating the now famous Banks case is that there is some reason for believing Mr. Banks still exercises part or all of the control, the evil control, over the waterfront unions that he exercised for many years. It seems to me that if we believe that, and I still believe he has a great deal of influence, we ought to look at the record of what has happened.

Mr. Chairman, I should like to begin my remarks by stating that I am not sure how I will vote on this amendment if and when it comes to a vote. Having heard the amendment I do feel it worth while to remind members of this committee about the claims of brilliance, competence and efficiency which were made by front and backbenchers on the other side, and claims regarding how they would run the business of this country smoothly, carefully and efficiently. We all remember the broken budget, and we are now faced with this situation.

I do not blame the present minister entirely for the situation which now exists because he did to some extent inherit this situation, but I do suggest that the former government could have acted during its tenure of office and clipped Mr. Banks' wings. Certainly the ordinary people of this country who become involved in minor difficulties with the law will not have a great deal of respect for the kind of justice we have in this country, in view of the manner in which Mr. Banks has escaped the penalties imposed.

Before dealing with matters which have been discussed today, I should like to refer to two statements made by the present Minister of Justice. The other night on a television program in response to the question as to why the former Liberal government had not deported Mr. Banks, the present Minister of Justice replied that the former minister of citizenship and immigration, Mr. Harris, had accepted the advice of the immigration appeal board which heard Mr. Banks' appeal. I checked my impression in this regard very carefully with others who had heard that response. Of course that is not a true statement of the facts. The immigration appeal board, set up to hear Mr. Banks' appeal and headed by Mr. St. Onge, a senior official of the department at that time, recommended that Mr. Banks be deported. The former minister, Mr. Harris, overruled that decision of the appeal board in the last week he held that cabinet post.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of privilege. The hon. member is referring to something which took place outside this house. While I realize it is not the practice of the hon. member to distort words and facts, and I know he did not intend to do so at this time, if he will recall correctly that interview on television he will realize I referred not to the immigration appeal board but to an inquiry made by the minister. Furthermore, one could hardly place any weight on that television interview because at least one third of my words were deleted. I do not think one should rely on that videotape program, because my remarks were taken out of their proper context.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, my relationship with the present Minister of Justice is such that I of course accept without question his statement that he did not say the former minister had accepted the recommendations of the immigration appeal board. However, I do not think it is important to my case whether the present minister made that statement or not, because the fact is that Mr. Walter Harris, at that time the minister of citizenship and immigration, did reject the recommendations of the immigration appeal board during the last week he held that cabinet position, and approved the granting of landed immigrant status to Mr. Banks. He did so I am sure with complete knowledge of a dossier on Mr. Banks, which related to Mr. Banks' life before he came to Canada.

Instead of granting that landed immigrant status to Mr. Banks by ministerial order, which is the normal practice, Mr. Walter Harris had a special order in council passed by the government, regularizing that status. In other words the whole cabinet became involved in this matter. The effect of this order in council was that Mr. Banks' landed immigration status dated back to 1952, instead of from 1954 when the case was finally disposed of by Mr. Harris. Had that not happened, I suggest it might have been easier to deport Banks when it was finally realized, belatedly, that he really ought not to have been allowed into Canada in the first place.

Mr. Chairman, one could cite incident after incident of this nature, and I am sure it is this type of thing which makes a great number of people in this country wonder about the close connections which existed between Mr. Banks and members of the former government, cabinet ministers and backbenchers, past and present. That is the kind of common story which is circulating in every city in Canada, in newspapers, in the labour field and in the business community. I am not suggesting the minister is responsible in any way at all, but he ought to know that that is common gossip across Canada.

In discussing the prosecution of Mr. Banks several days ago the present Minister of Justice said that all the information required was available to the former government. It is not my job to defend the former government, but I think Mr. Banks' letter to the shipping companies, which came to the attention of Mr. Bernard Wilson, and through him to the former minister of labour, wherein he promised that the S.I.U. would indemnify the shipping companies if they were sued because they had not lived up to their contracts with other unions, could have been used to prosecute Mr. Banks.

The minister said that the former government did have all the information necessary to prosecute Mr. Banks. I have been informed by individuals who worked on the Banks case and know the facts, that while the Department of Justice did have a great deal of information including the testimony of Richard Greaves in 1958, and of Michael Sheehan in 1960, and knew that Walsh had been beaten in Owen Sound, it did not have evidence of any overt act in which Mr. Banks participated and for which he could be prosecuted. It did not have information or evidence linking Mr. Banks with this particular offence. In the opinion of the lawyers with whom I have discussed this situation, no charge could have been brought successfully against Mr. Banks until 1963 when the Department of Justice obtained the evidence from Mr. Bruce Smith, which he subsequently gave in court, to the effect that one of the persons present during discussions in Mr. Banks' office phoned him and asked him to establish the whereabouts of Mr. Walsh so that, as it later turned out, Mr. Walsh could be beaten. He testified further that he visited Mrs. Walsh, ascertained where her husband was in Owen Sound and communicated the information to people who went to Owen Sound and beat Walsh. Without this information the conspiracy charge certainly could not have been made to stand up. In fact, Judge Wagner devoted two pages of his judgment to Bruce Smith's testimony and to its importance.

I do not believe it is really of much value to say that the Liberal government or the Conservatives should have done it. In my opinion, it indicates that both sides have been rather slow on the job. It has been stated in many quarters, and I think I am right in saying that at least one member of the board of maritime trustees has been quoted to this effect, that we are worrying too much about the whereabouts of Mr. Banks. This was before it was proven he was in New York. It is stated we were worrying too much about whether he had gone to the United States or somewhere else. After all, these people said, the main thing is that Banks is gone and his position of influence in the S.I.U. has disappeared; the punishment of this Mr. Banks is not really very important. In fact, it has been said by some people that it is a good thing to get him out of the country. Well, Mr. Chairman, one would think that Mr. Banks had been convicted and sentenced to five years in prison because he had violated a traffic law. We ought to keep in mind that Banks was sentenced to five years by Judge Wagner, who is now the attorney general of Quebec, because the beating of Captain Walsh for which he was responsible was, and I quote from a newspaper report of Judge Wagner's charge, a manifest act of gangsterism, agreed to, prepared, ordered, directed and supervised by Banks.

We should remember that this act of violence, of beating and gangsterism, is just one of hundreds of which Banks was accused in testimony before Mr. Justice Norris. If members of the committee are interested they can turn to the schedule prepared by Mr. Justice Norris on page 444 of the report, and continuing for half a dozen pages, where they will find listed incident after incident, name after name, of people who were beaten and beaten so severely that many of them were incapacitated and permanently damaged. I am not one of those people who believe that our system of justice will work if we depend only on punishment. I am one who believes in rehabilitation. Surely, if a person ever deserved to be punished for his acts, it was Mr. Hal Banks. I suggest that when he can sit in the United States and thumb his nose at the Canadian people and Canadian justice, it is a disgrace not only to the government and the Minister of Justice but to the people of Canada as well.

I want to deal with this question of Mr. Banks and his presence in New York. It is interesting that the Minister of Justice, day after day, and it seemed even today, talked about the alleged presence of Mr. Banks in New York. How much proof do we need? Does the minister have to see Mr. Banks in person before he believes that Mr. Banks is in New York? Surely that has been established. Since I came to this house I have not been known as the greatest admirer of the R.C.M.P. However, Mr. Chairman, I still retain some of the ideas that one picks up when he is young. One of the common ideas which the R.C.M.P. have not done anything to destroy—I think that is putting it mildly —is that the R.C.M.P. always gets its man. It seems to me incredible that the R.C.M.P. and their friends and colleagues in the F.B.I. of the United States, could not in fact find a man as easily identifiable as Mr. Hal Banks. I have great respect for the Minister of Justice. I do not have to look at the letters which he tabled. I take his word for the fact that he asked the R.C.M.P. to get on with the job. However, I cannot believe that the R.C.M.P. and the F.B.I. were told this was an A-1 priority project. I cannot believe that if they had been told that they would not have been able to find Mr. Banks. If I believed that, Mr. Chairman, I would have serious doubts about the ability of both organizations. If I were minister of justice I would begin to think that perhaps we ought to reorganize the structure of the R.C.M.P. If they had been given instructions that this was an important matter, they could have found this man.

It was common knowledge in newspaper circles, it was common knowledge in the labour movement and I suggest, Mr. Chairman, it was common knowledge amongst R.C.M.P. officers, that it was extremely likely—I think I am speaking quite cautiously—that Mr. Banks was in New York and, in fact, was in the section of Brooklyn in which the newspaper reporter found him. I think this man is an excellent newspaper reporter, but I, for one, do not believe he is more competent, more efficient, than the highly skilled policemen in the R.C.M.P. and F.B.I. I say it is important that we have this discussion because I believe, as do many other people who have had some acquaintance with the S.I.U. and other seamen's unions, that Mr. Banks still exerts an important influence in the S.I.U.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Orlikow: Well, Mr. Chairman, we will prove it as soon as the Minister of Labour will use the power he has to bring the board of maritime trustees before the industrial relations committee.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

Mr. Orlikow: Day after day, week after week, members of this house have been on their feet begging the minister, entreating the minister, imploring the minister to get the board of trustees before the industrial relations committee. I wonder what else we have to do? Who are these people? Are they gods? Are they completely independent people or are they people appointed by the government of Canada under an act passed by this parliament? They should have been here long ago.

Mr. Macaluso: That is still not proving what you are saying.

Mr. Orlikow: I hope the hon. member has the courage to get up and speak, but not on my time.

Mr. Macaluso: I will when you are finished.

Mr. Orlikow: You can speak when I am finished.

Mr. MacEwan: That will be a real treat.

Mr. Orlikow: It is easy to talk.

An hon. Member: Pay no attention; he is a blabbermouth.

Mr. Orlikow: I know he is a blabbermouth, and I am not worried about that. This is not the time—

Mr. Macaluso: I rise on a point of privilege, Mr. Chairman. There is no member in this house who is a greater blabbermouth than the hon. member who is now speaking.

Mr. Orlikow: That was neither a point of privilege nor a point of order, and I will give it the respect which it deserves, which is none at all.

This is not the time to discuss in detail what is going on in the S.I.U. I wish to point out to members of the committee that an election is now being held, approved and supervised by the board of maritime trustees, an election in which 10 of the 12 persons running for top offices were part of Mr. Banks' machine.

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Orlikow: The hon. member does not have to believe me. He can read the report of Mr. Justice Norris where the people now running for office are listed. These are the people who will be running the organization after the election. They worked with Banks before, and we have the greatest reason to believe they will continue to work with him.

Something else has come to my attention which the Department of Labour should investigate. The board of maritime trustees approved the sending of a number of Canadian seamen to a school in New York, at which they are supposed to learn the elements of democracy. The school is called the Andrew Furuseth school and is run by the S.I.U. of North America. According to the information I have, in the interval when Mr. Banks could not be found he was acting as a teacher at this school where Canadian seamen, liberated from his domination, were being sent for instruction. I suggest that the Minister of Labour get on the job.

In a recent edition of the Canadian Sailor, published by the S.I.U. of Canada, it was announced with great fanfare that the licence division of the S.I.U. was being cut adrift from the Canadian organization and that they were going to form an independent organization. Let us just look at that and see the control which Mr. Banks may still have.

What is happening is that they have applied for a charter in the Atlantic and gulf division of the S.I.U. of North America, which is also known as the brotherhood of marine engineers. It is a constituent part of the marine engineers beneficial association of North America, and I have been told, by sources which have proven very reliable up until now, that the marine engineers beneficial association, which is dominated by Mr. Paul Hall, the president of the S.I.U. of North America, will very shortly be run by one Mr. Harold Banks, so that the licensed seamen on the great lakes of Canada will again be under the domination of Mr. Banks.

It is for reasons like that that we are interested in Mr. Banks. We are interested in what happened. We are interested in why he is not serving the sentence which Judge Wagner thought he should serve. I place no responsibility for what happened in the past on the present Minister of Justice. I merely close by saying that there are so many rumours, so many allegations, so many vicious stories being carried from one end of Canada to the other about former ministers of the Liberal government, about former members and present members of parliament from Montreal, about the amount of money which the S.I.U. of Canada gave to Liberal election campaigns while Banks was in control—there are so many of these stories that if the Minister of Justice is interested, and I think he is, in the good name of parliament, in the good name of democratic government, in the good name of his own party, and if he wants to assure the public that these stories are not true, he ought to move very quickly to appoint a judicial inquiry officer who could look into the whole story of the S.I.U. of Canada and of Mr. Banks, and make a report to the people of Canada which would for the first time make them feel justice is indeed being done.

Mr. Olson: At the outset I wish to say we in this party are getting a little weary of having the pot call the kettle black and vice versa. We have listened for a number of years to the charges and countercharges being hurled by the Conservative and Liberal parties across the floor of this chamber. It seems when one party is in office members of the other in opposition seem to find a number of reasons why there is some dereliction of duty, and then when they exchange positions they argue the case from the opposite viewpoint.

We think the Minister of Justice has been a little less than frank and completely open during the past few days in some of the answers he gave to questions about Hal Banks. It does not seem credible that the minister could be completely unaware of the fact that Mr. Banks had left Canada. Furthermore if the minister had been in communication with the R.C.M.P. and the F.B.I. it seems hardly credible he was not aware Mr. Banks was in New York.

It can be accepted that the minister, perhaps, could not make an official statement respecting these matters, but in many of his replies he tried to leave the impression he was not at all aware of the whereabouts of Hal Banks. In such a situation, and considering the anxiety respecting this whole matter across Canada, it would be well for the minister to be a little more frank with parliament because I am certain he has the support of all parties in it, and the support of the vast majority of Canadians in seeing to it that the kind of gangsterism which is under review is stamped out.

I am not a lawyer and am not going to get into the so-called legal procedures that it is alleged should have been taken. My information is that crown counsel did ask Judge Wagner not to grant bail at all, and this would have had the effect—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Wagner had nothing to do with it.

Mr. Olson: —of keeping Mr. Banks in custody. It seems to me this is as far as he could have gone, and that this was the maximum request that could be made. I am also informed that counsel asked that bail should not be set at less than $50,000, if bail were in fact granted. To suggest that crown counsel was at fault when he did not remind the judge that extradition proceedings could not be taken with respect to the crime in question, does not hold a lot of weight with me because I am certain the judge must have been fully aware of that fact.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: He said he is not a lawyer.

Mr. Woolliams: I just want to put this question. Mr. Justason is crown counsel for Calgary appointed by the premier of Alberta. I have been in court with him on many occasions.

An hon. Member: What is your question?

Mr. Woolliams: Don't worry, you hounds who want to talk but will not make a speech. I know the hon. member is not a lawyer but does he not agree that it is the responsibility of counsel for the crown to set out the facts, and that on these facts a judge makes his decision—not on hearsay or on propaganda, which might be the kind of propaganda we read in periodicals and so on? It is on the evidence that a judge makes his decision, and without that evidence being before him how can he make a proper decision?

Mr. Olson: I will get round to the hon. member's question in a moment. The point I was trying to make is this: If the Conservative party is now trying to hang its whole case on the fact that crown counsel did not advise the judge that extradition proceedings could not be taken, it is a pretty weak case. I say this because it is evident to anyone following the case that crown counsel did in fact ask that no bail be granted at all, so Banks would have been kept in custody—

An hon. Member: Prove it.

Mr. Olson: I cannot prove it. I have not got the transcript of evidence before me. But this has been stated in the house a number of times and I suppose it is as true as the allegation that this information was not made known to the court.

I think we must separate the two matters which are before the committee. One consideration before us this afternoon has to do with the fact that Banks was able to escape from Canada and avoid the punishment to which he was sentenced for the crime against Mr. Walsh and the beating at Owen Sound. The other matter which is of interest to the committee and to the Canadian people is whether or not action has been taken by the government to ensure that there shall be no repetition of the incidents which have caused disruption of shipping on the great lakes—that there shall not be a perpetuation of the gangsterism which took place during Hal Banks' reign. I think we should be satisfied to some degree at least that certain action has been taken by the Department of Labour and by this house to have Banks removed from his position as president of the S.I.U. In consequence there has been reasonable peace on the great lakes during the past weeks and months.

But there are some disturbing rumours circulating, and the hon. member who spoke before me drew attention to some of them. They are to the effect that Banks may not have been removed far enough, as yet, from the labour scene. This is something which concerns all members of the house. As I said earlier, I do not intend to go over this whole question again, but I should like to review the record very briefly.

This crime of conspiracy for which Mr. Banks was convicted and sentenced related to an event which happened on August 18, 1957. If members will look at schedule 31 which was referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North they will find numerous entries there telling how people were beaten, and so on. Then, if they look to the right of the page, to the column under the heading "Action Taken", they will find time after time nothing whatever was done to deal with these offences during all those years from 1957 to 1962 when these terrible crimes were taking place. Has the law, or have procedures taken under the law, been sufficiently changed that it is no longer necessary to have an inquiry by a royal commission before anything can be done about crimes of this sort? These beatings had been taking place over many years, yet there was apparently no civilian authority with sufficient resources, strength or jurisdiction to deal with them. If this situation has not been remedied, then the House of Commons has an important task before it to see that the law is enacted and administered in such a way as to enable us to deal with these crimes without, first of all, the necessity to appoint a royal commission to bring them to light, after which there are further months of waiting before any charges are laid.

In the course of his report, Mr. Justice Norris made a number of recommendations and, as we read at page 312, he says:

Local police forces are not equipped to deal with mass action by irresponsible persons. All police forces, federal, provincial and municipal should extend their efforts to the utmost in co-operation with each other—avoiding jurisdictional jealousies—to the end that there shall be certainty in the enforcement of the law and that respect for the law will be maintained. It should not be difficult by co-operation between all police forces to reach a common understanding as to action in connection with labour disputes. It might be that police officers should have some special training on labour matters.

I know of no action which has been taken by this government or by any other jurisdiction to carry out this recommendation. As I have suggested, we had to wait from August 18, 1957, when Captain Walsh was beaten, until July 17, 1962, before anything effective was done about it. If nothing has been done to change this situation there are obviously very serious weaknesses in the enforcement of law in this country. I am more concerned that these should be corrected than I am about whether Hal Banks is brought back to Canada or not.

We know Hal Banks has been sentenced to five years. I suppose two points of view could be taken. One would be that no man should escape justice and that we should have him back and compel him to serve his five year sentence. Afterwards of course he would have paid his penalty to society and would be free to get back into the labour movement, if it would allow him to do so. The other point of view which could be taken is that as long as Banks is outside Canada with this sentence hanging over him we shall probably be rid of him for life, as far as his entry into Canada is concerned. It is not easy to decide which of these alternatives is the more desirable. But we must take some action to see that there is no likelihood of these crimes of violence recurring, and it is the responsibility of the minister to see that his department, together with all the law enforcement agencies of this country is able to deal with gangsterism of the type which has been evident over the past seven or eight years.

I do not want to be too critical of any one. As I said at the outset of my remarks I am getting a little tired of hearing the kettle call the pot black. If we turn back to the debate of October 9, 1963 when the resolution to set up the maritime trusteeship was before the house we find that some interesting remarks were made by the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario, who had this to say as reported at page 3372:

The Norris commission was set up at the behest and the demand of the Canadian Labour Congress because the situation on the great lakes was intolerable. It is obvious to everyone that no government could impose such an inquiry on unions without great criticism from the labour movement in Canada unless it were done at their request. The labour movement is suspicious of moves of this kind, and unless and until they themselves feel the time is ripe for such an inquiry governments cannot move in this direction.

Mr. Chairman, I contend that if crimes are being committed, if gangsterism exists—and I presume the former minister of labour knew of the situation prior to July, 1962—a government ought to have sufficient courage to take measures to deal with this lawlessness whether or not such action is pleasing to the labour unions. If the former minister of labour expressed the attitude which motivates governments when considering whether or not action can be taken in circumstances where labour unions are involved, I can only say we must demand a complete change and the turning of a new leaf as far as law enforcement in Canada is concerned.

What concerns me, Mr. Chairman, is that apparently it was this reasoning that kept the former government from doing anything about the disruption of shipping on the great lakes, and the gangsterism that was taking place there from 1957 until 1962. That is not sufficient reason, and in my opinion it was a despicable dereliction of duty on their part.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Chairman, I wish to rise on a question of privilege. I think the hon. member who now has the floor is speaking about two different matters altogether. The first one he mentioned was the setting up of the maritime trusteeship over a union in this country. The reasons I gave were quite correct; it had nothing to do with any prosecutions or any acts of violence being committed by any member of any union. At that time there was not any evidence available with which to make prosecutions and secure convictions; there was none. There was not sufficient evidence, as the hon. member for Winnipeg North said, upon inquiry to make any prosecutions of Mr. Hal Banks with regard to any rumoured assault or battery which may have been committed at that time. It was not until the Norris commission reported that, based on that report and the advice of legal counsel from Toronto, charges could be laid.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Ontario is a little confused with regard to what I am referring to, and I will quote his words again. I was not talking about the setting up of the maritimes trusteeship at all. I will quote his words to him:

> The Norris commission was set up at the behest and the demand of the Canadian Labour Congress because the situation...was intolerable.

Then he went on to explain that no government, and I suppose he was referring to his own government, would have the courage —in this connection, Mr. Chairman, I will quote his exact words:

> —no government could impose such an inquiry on unions without great criticism from the labour movement in Canada—

This is talking about the Norris commission and these are the words of the hon. member as reported at page 3372 of Hansard for 1963. Following that, if it had not been for that commission being set up I do not believe we would have yet reached the stage where we would have dealt with Hal Banks.

Mr. Starr: I agree—because there was no evidence before then.

Mr. Olson: The fact remains that from 1957 until 1962, while there were dozens and dozens of assaults and crimes of all kinds committed on the lakefront and in the maritime areas in general, nothing was done. Even up until that time it is the statement of the former minister that until the Canadian Labour Congress was ready to accept this kind of inquiry—that is, the Norris inquiry—he did not have the courage to even initiate an inquiry.

We have the Norris recommendations. Some of them have been acted on; some of them have not. But if we are again moving into a situation where Hal Banks—and he is not the only one—is in fact going to have a great deal of influence and is going to be in a position where he can continue this kind of gangsterism, then we have the responsibility to change the law in some respects. I might also point out that one or two other things have not been taken care of by the present government, because at page 311 of his report Mr. Justice Norris says this:

> I recommend that special counsel be appointed to review all the facts available with a view to ascertaining whether charges should be laid in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario against Banks, McLaughlin and others—

That has not been done up to this stage either. Banks has been charged, convicted and sentenced. McLaughlin, to my knowledge, has not been charged, and the others to whom Mr. Justice Norris referred have not been charged. We would like the minister to take the kind of action that will make it impossible for Banks, McLaughlin and the others to whom Mr. Justice Norris referred to perpetuate their control over the S.I.U. and also their being in a position to engage in crimes of conspiracy, and so on.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I just want to say again that we should have united action in this matter from all parties in the house. I was rather proud of the House of Commons the day we passed the maritime trusteeship bill because there was almost unanimity that here was a situation that was intolerable so far as we were concerned, and we were prepared to deal with it on that basis, in spite of demonstrations that were taking place on the lawn outside the House of Commons and in spite of some fears with regard to what the labour unions in Canada might think of us. This is not a matter of whether or not you are in favour of labour unions and the work they do; it is a matter of whether or not you are in favour of enforcing the law and whether or not you are in favour of protecting people against this kind of gangster.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would like to impress upon the Minister of Justice that we think some progress has been made in cleaning up this mess, but that there is a great deal of work to be done. We would therefore urge him to get on with it as soon as possible and take into account some of the other recommendations Mr. Justice Norris has made.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I would like to follow on right after the hon. member for Medicine Hat, in view of the references he made to the observations and recommendations of Mr. Justice Norris at page 311 of his report with respect to possible prosecutions. I think, in view of statements attributed to Mr. James Todd of the Canadian maritime union and repeated in this house by the Leader of the Opposition last Monday, it is desirable to set clear the record in respect of the prosecutions and action taken by the government following upon those recommendations.

The hon. member read part of the middle paragraph appearing at page 311 of Mr. Justice Norris' report and referred to the fact that Mr. Justice Norris recommended that special counsel should be appointed to look into the facts referred to and the evidence of assaults and other violence referred to by Mr. Justice Norris. Perhaps I might go on and read from page 311 where Mr. Justice Norris says:

> In my opinion, the available evidence is such that the actions of these persons, upon proof of the facts,—

I would lay stress upon those words:

—are outside the exemptions provided in sections 409-411 of the Criminal Code of Canada. Counsel should also consider the evidence to ascertain whether charges should be laid against Banks and others for conspiracy to commit indictable offences, particularly in connection with acts of violence such as the beatings of Walsh and others. Consideration should also be given to prosecuting Banks and others under section 4, subsection 4, of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act on the grounds of intimidation and coercion.

I would like to refer to the fact that following immediately upon this recommendation the former minister of justice, Hon. Lionel Chevrier, announced to this house on July 18, 1963, that two eminent counsel—and if I may say so, perhaps the two most eminent counsel in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec—had been retained by the government for the purpose of examining those charges. I would refer to the fact that the crown retained Mr. John J. Robinette, Q.C., of Toronto, a former treasurer of the Law Society of Upper Canada and a man who occupies perhaps a pre-eminent position at the common law bar. The crown also retained the leader of the Quebec bar, Mr. Jean Martineau, Q.C., who was then the bâtonnier of the bar of Montreal. These two gentlemen were immediately retained for the purpose of examining the evidence given by various parties in respect of offences and other matters to the Norris commission, and they were also retained to advise the R.C.M.P. on additional investigations that should be carried out.

Following on this appointment the two counsel considered at once not only the broad recommendations but some other factual and notorious matters which had come to the attention of the crown in respect to the activities of Banks. I observe that the special crown counsel specifically recommended that conspiracy charges should be laid not only against Banks but also against Richardson and Carsh, the two other accused in connection with the Walsh beating. The conspiracy charges were laid on October 23 and on November 5 Banks was arrested. Subsequent to this, on May 1, 1964, Banks was convicted of these charges.

Let me also point out that the crown counsel, after very extensive investigations of the evidence and other matters, arrived at the conclusion, on the basis of further investigation by the R.C.M.P., that charges should be laid against Banks in connection with the beating of one Richard Greaves, and in due course these charges were laid against Banks and others for conspiring to injure and commit assault upon Greaves. These charges have yet to come up for trial.

I would also point out that extensive examination was made by counsel into evidence based on the various financial records and accounts of the misuse of funds which Mr. Justice Norris had referred to in the course of his report. It was the opinion of the crown counsel that there was not sufficient evidence adduced either from the investigations or before the Norris commission, or from the report of Mr. Justice Norris himself, to justify prosecution either for theft or embezzlement. Let me repeat for the benefit of the committee that this was the recommendation of the two most eminent members of the bar in Ontario and Quebec.

At the same time the two counsel were also invited by the government to consider charges on a broader basis against Banks and his union associates. In the course of the recommendations of Mr. Justice Norris he suggested that a general charge might be laid against Banks and others with regard to the pattern of beatings and intimidations which is so graphically set out in schedule 31 to the Norris report. It was the conclusion of the counsel in this particular respect that once again there was insufficient evidence available to support a general charge of that kind.

The two counsel were specifically invited as part of their responsibilities to consider the incidents arising out of the affairs which came very close to us here, the appearance of the seamen on parliament hill. As a result of their investigations they recommended that a charge be laid against Banks, McLaughlin and others in respect of the walk-off from the ships. That particular charge comes up for preliminary hearing in a matter of a few days.

What I should point out, and what perhaps is not evident to members of the committee who are not members of the legal profession, is that none of the charges which have been laid and which were laid on the recommendation of counsel were in respect of extraditable offences. In fact, none of the specific charges referred to by Mr. Justice Norris in the passage to which I have just referred were in respect of extraditable offences. The only charges which seemed to offer any reasonable prospect of successful prosecution were in respect of theft and embezzlement; and it was the specific finding of counsel that no effective charges could be laid and they recommended against such charges being laid. These were the only possible charges which in fact would involve extraditable offences.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I would wish to counter most strenuously the assertion made by Mr. James Todd of the Canadian maritime union that the crown only chose those charges which they knew were not extraditable. The crown chose those charges upon which there was available evidence and upon which, on the advice of very eminent counsel, there would seem to be reasonable prospect of successful prosecution; and I would point out that the crown, on the basis of the advice and assistance of those counsel, have had particular success in several of those prosecutions. Therefore I would say that the charges made by Mr. Todd and which were repeated in the house by the right hon. gentleman in support of the application he made to move the adjournment of the house were completely unfounded. They appear to have been made on a misunderstanding by Mr. Todd of the actual terms of the Norris report, and they were evidently made by Mr. Todd without any knowledge or realization at all of the available grounds for prosecution under the Norris report.

I think it should be amply clear to all, Mr. Chairman, that the crown should not be laying charges where there is no evidence to support them. Widespread investigation by Mr. Justice Norris, with the assistance of many others, including people in the shipping industry and in the unions, was made concerning the events surrounding the operations of the union, but these investigations failed to disclose any evidence on which to found a charge. I think this committee should summarily reject the innuendo involved in Mr. Todd's statement that only special charges were laid.

Mr. Herridge: That was the commissioner's job.

Mr. Macdonald: Let me point out to the hon. member that under the order in council appointing the commissioner the commissioner was to make widespread investigation into all the operations surrounding the St. Lawrence and great lakes seaways, including the operations of the S.I.U. and the activities of Mr. Banks. It is in respect of these that Mr. James Todd suggested there was a selective laying of charges. I say to the hon. members of this committee and to Mr. Todd that that is a completely false allegation and one which no responsible labour leader could in all conscience make.

Mr. Woolliams: How many labour leaders are responsible?

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. Macdonald: Well, I will not develop the suggestion of the hon. member for Bow River.

This afternoon we heard from the hon. member for Yukon, who made what seemed to me a large number of innuendos about people on this side of the house and about the manner in which this case has been handled. I hesitate not one moment to reject them as completely untrue and as being a completely unfair and twisted statement of what has taken place on this matter. Let me refer in particular to the point the hon. member made about the statement made earlier by the Minister of Justice. The hon. member suggested that in some way it was a neglect of duty on the part of the minister that there was no provision in the bail bond recognizance that the accused should not leave the jurisdiction. I have had occasion to speak previously in this regard. I have also had occasion to speak to it in response to the Leader of the Opposition, on which occasion he read into the record the wrong form used in these cases. I would point out to the hon. member, as I pointed out to him then, that it is not true to say that there is any customary form under the Criminal Code which is used for this purpose on appeals and which includes such provision in a bail bond recognizance.

I would also point out that whatever may be the practice in other provinces in this country, and whatever may be the practice in these matters as opposed to the substantive law, the practice of the courts varies from province to province. It is not true to say that under the rules of the courts of the province of Quebec it is customary to have any such form of recognizance at all. I would point out—and here I am really retailing the opinion of the eminent counsel who have been advising the crown—that I am advised that it is not and has never been the customary practice in the courts of the province of Quebec to include any such provision in a bail bond such as that referred to by the hon. gentleman.

We have heard a great many wild and unfounded statements both inside and outside the house retailed by members of the house and also members of the press. One of them which I would reject most strenuously, and one of the imputations made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, is that in some way the R.C.M.P. should assume the responsibility for the fact that the federal bureau of investigation of the United States were unable to locate Hal Banks. I point out, as the minister pointed out in his introductory remarks, that it would not, either in accordance with international law or in accordance with sound practice, be proper for the R.C.M.P. to engage in investigations with respect to a Canadian citizen in a foreign country, and more particularly in the United States. One can imagine the storm that would be raised in this house if the reverse situation took place, and the F.B.I. carried on such an investigation in Canada.

An hon. Member: Is the F.B.I. that bad?

Mr. Macdonald: That may be a good question, but I do not think it is fair to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, after following their instructions and requesting the assistance of the federal bureau of investigation in this regard, that they should be required to bear the onus, which some hon. members would like to put on them, for the non-discovery of Banks. As the letter tabled by the minister very aptly discloses, the R.C.M.P. were instructed, and followed up those instructions, to request the assistance of the F.B.I. in locating Banks. If the F.B.I. did not or could not do so, I do not think the responsibility should be placed in any way on the R.C.M.P. I think I may be joined by many members of this house in saying that we resent the imputation of incompetence, which has been made by some hon. members opposite, in respect of the R.C.M.P.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that we should perhaps bear in mind just exactly what the situation was at the conclusion of the former government's tenure in office, or even before the publication of the Norris report and the commencement of action by this government. We should bear in mind that Mr. Banks was in strong control of the seafarers international union, free of any kind of prosecution for the various offences that had been taking place during a period of five years of a reign of terror on the Canadian great lakes. No action was taken at that time by the government then in power to prevent him from carrying on with those particular activities.

Mr. Chairman, it might be useful to make some reference to schedule 31 of the Norris report, and more particularly to the sad category of assaults and other violence which took place during the course of office of the government of hon. gentlemen opposite. I refer particularly to schedule 31 at page 444 and following of the Norris report, which lists incidents of assaults, beatings and terrorism, commencing with the beating of Captain Walsh on August 18, 1957, and further incidents on November 6, 1959, January 30, 1960, August 1961, October 31, 1961, April 26, 1962, April 28, 1962, April 29, 1962 and so on, page after page. These incidents include intimidations, beatings, telephone threats and harassments. What did hon. gentlemen opposite do about that situation then? The response of the former minister of justice was just a shrug of the shoulders and the statement that they could not do anything about it because it was beyond federal jurisdiction.

I should like to refer hon. members to schedule 15 of the Norris report and appendices at page 407, which is a letter from Mr. E. D. Fulton, the then minister of justice, which in part reads as follows:

> As I explained to you in my previous letter, the constitutional and legal position is clear that the primary responsibility for the maintenance of law and order and the protection of property rests with provincial authorities.

Mr. Sharp: Who said that?

Mr. Macdonald: That is what Mr. Fulton said. He then continued in this letter as follows:

> The acts complained of are in the nature of offences against the Criminal Code and any investigations and prosecutions in respect thereof are matters to be undertaken by local police authorities and provincial crown attorneys.

An hon. Member: Who drafted the letter?

Mr. Macdonald: It does not matter who drafted the letter. Who signed the letter?

This is a new Tory theory of constitutional responsibility in Canada, in which they take no responsibility. This is a new theory not of constitutional responsibility but of constitutional irresponsibility.

May I recall, Mr. Chairman, that when hon. gentlemen opposite were in office they were quick to take the credit for anything that took place, such as for the sale of wheat to China. In that regard the hon. member for Qu'Appelle, at great expense to the taxpayers, flew out to Hong Kong after the contract was negotiated, for the purpose of pushing the civil servants into the background and taking credit. However, when it comes to a question of accepting responsibility, as the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings has said, "No, we are not responsible for that letter, just because my colleague signed it".

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the hon. member a question.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make it clear that I am not yielding the floor, but simply allowing a question.

Mr. Fisher: I cannot understand how you can accuse the Conservative government of having responsibility. If that is the case, why do you not read into the record what Hal Banks himself said about the Liberal party, the Conservative party and other parties?

Mr. Macdonald: The hon. member for Port Arthur appears to be very much persuaded by statements made by Mr. Hal Banks. He is the man he would rely upon in this regard. At page 249 of the Norris report Mr. Justice Norris has this to say about that supporter of the hon. member's case:

> Banks is capable, decisive, egocentric, intolerant and ruthless. He is of the stuff of the Capones and the Hoffas of whom the dictators throughout history, from the earliest times to the totalitarians, Hitler and Stalin, are prototypes.—In his mouth, the use of the word "democracy" is sheer blasphemy. For him the "big lie" and the failure to remember are ever-ready weapons and shields.

That is the witness the hon. member for Port Arthur calls upon to support his case.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

The Deputy Chairman: Order.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Macdonald: Mr. Chairman, I only have a few minutes left and I think I should be allowed to complete my remarks.

An hon. Member: Six o'clock.

The Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Progress reported.

Mr. Speaker: This afternoon during the proceedings of the committee of supply the Minister of Justice presented a letter for tabling. With the permission of the house, the Chair will regularize the proceedings by having the letter tabled now. Is it agreed that the letter be now tabled?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, during the debate this afternoon I raised a further question concerning the minister's reference to letters of August 15 and August 28, and I suggested that by the rules of the house he is obliged to table them also. I am wondering whether Your Honour will now make a ruling.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I said that I would not affront the R.C.M.P. Perhaps I did not use exactly those words, but I said I would not accept the implication that their report should not be accepted, and then asked for leave to table that report which you now have in your hand, and which is in fact a letter from the R.C.M.P. to me.

I also said I would attempt to obtain leave to produce copies of the two letters referred to in this report, if my hon. friends on the other side of this house would accept the responsibility for insisting that I do so. I am not asking for the tabling of them.

Mr. Nielsen: Speaking to the point of order, I may say that the rules of the house are specific. The minister made reference to the letters and by reason of that fact I believe he is required to table them.

Mr. Speaker: My intention has been drawn to standing order 59, paragraph 4, which reads:

> The chairman shall maintain order in the committees of the whole house, deciding all questions of order subject to an appeal to the house; but disorder in a committee can only be censured by the house, on receiving a report thereof.

Mr. Nielsen: May I ask what Your Honour intends to do concerning the question of order relating to the tabling of the two letters referred to by the Minister of Justice on his responsibility?

Mr. Speaker: This is a matter for the committee. I read paragraph 4 of the standing order to indicate this. It is now after six o'clock, and I intend to leave the chair.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Justice hides again.

PROCEDURE

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Speaker: If I could have unanimous consent to revert to presenting reports, I should like to present the fourteenth report of the special committee on procedure and organization.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: I wonder if, for the convenience of hon. members, we could ascertain the business of tomorrow? The Acting Prime Minister promised we would have the estimates of the Department of Justice up on Thursday, and that was confirmed by Mr. Speaker himself when this was discussed on Monday. I presume we shall continue with this debate tomorrow.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I said, when I was asked the other day, the Minister of Justice would introduce his estimates for the purpose of this particular item not later than Thursday; that is what I said.

Mr. Woolliams: No, no.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend and I do not quarrel about things like this. Hansard has what I said.

Mr. Churchill: When we looked at Hansard, I almost raised a point of privilege to inquire whether or not Hansard had been altered. The statement was on Thursday, and Mr. Speaker, as reported on page 8725 of Hansard said:

> I am informed today that the estimates of the Minister of Justice will be before the house on Thursday—

This was the understanding in the house at the time.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend does not want to create a situation which does not exist. Later in the afternoon I went to the hon. member for Bow River, the Leader of the Opposition was not here, and told him about this. He did not have any authority to act for the Leader of the Opposition, but would take note of it. There is nothing out of the way in the situation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: So there will be no mistake about what the Secretary of State for External Affairs said the other day, he said this matter would come up on Thursday; that is what he said.

Mr. Woolliams: As the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentions, he did speak to me. He said it might not be possible Thursday and he would bring it up Wednesday. I said Wednesday was a short day and I had no authority to speak for the party. He said well, likely it could go on on Friday. The fact is we have been cut off, silenced by choosing Wednesday.

Mr. Speaker: Well, I do not want to intervene. Surely, the parties can get together and reach an agreement on this matter.

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, it is true that the minister for external affairs (Mr. Martin) stated a few days ago that we would discuss on Thursday the Hal Banks affair.

Tonight we did not reach a definite conclusion, and that is what Her Majesty's loyal opposition wishes us to know. Then, when can we further discuss the case of that individual? That is what I would like to find out from the Minister of Justice or the minister for external affairs.

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, knowing my hon. friend, the member for Villeneuve, I am convinced that, were he aware of what I will say in a few seconds, he would not continue this discussion in the absence of the minister, particularly after the charges made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

It is evident that, if such a statement was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, there was a misunderstanding, not exactly between us, but there was a lack of precision in stating the business of the house.

Tomorrow I shall be away from Ottawa on official business.

Mr. Caouette: Not political business?

Mr. Favreau: No, not political business.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the minister be available on Friday?

Mr. Woolliams: Yes.

Mr. Favreau: I will be available on Friday. I will try to tell the right hon. gentleman what he is doing when he is putting that question. It would be so easy now for us to have the balance of the debate on the balance of my estimates.

An hon. Member: When?

Mr. Favreau: I did not plan to be here on Friday, but I will be here. There was a serious reason for me not to be here.

Mr. Smith: You are the house leader; why should you not be here?

Mr. Favreau: I will announce the government business that has been planned. I could undertake to bring my estimates next Wednesday if it is agreeable to the house.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I rise on a point of order. If there is no more co-operation than that on the part of the government, I will not argue it at all. We are prepared to take it on Friday because he is going to be away tomorrow. There is a motion before the house which deserves the earliest consideration of the house, and Friday is that day. It does not in any way incommode the minister.

Mr. Favreau: The right hon. gentleman has lost his sense of proportion, his sense of relativity and his sense of distinction between the time when he was prime minister and the time he is Leader of the Opposition.

Tomorrow we will deal with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. They will be followed by the estimates of the Department of Defence Production, those estimates which are left to be discussed. After that, we will be dealing with the unemployment insurance commission under the Department of Labour, and those estimates will be followed by a discussion of the estimates of the Department of Forestry.

It being eleven minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 8, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HERRIDGE—AGE LIMIT FOR MEMBERS SUGGESTED BY MEMBER FOR PORT ARTHUR

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I rise on a question of privilege under rather painful and unusual circumstances. My question of privilege refers to an article in the Chronicle-Herald of October 7 which reads as follows: under the heading "Suggests Age Limit for MPs",

> No member of parliament should be allowed to be in the Commons for more than 10 or 12 years, and no person over 60 should be a member, Douglas Fisher, New Democratic party member for Port Arthur, said Monday.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: The article continues:

> Mr. Fisher, 45, now in his eighth year in the Commons, was speaking to the Canadian club here. He said that if men over 60 were eliminated from the Commons a breath of fresh air would be let in.

I trust there is some inaccuracy in this report. There may be. But if it is correct I rise on a question of privilege because I consider these remarks to be a reflection on the contribution by many experienced, mature and competent members of this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

MR. GRÉGOIRE—ENGLISH SPEAKING CONDUCTORS ON OTTAWA-MONTREAL TRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I wish to raise a question of privilege on my own behalf and also on behalf of all French Canadian members of this house.

Yesterday afternoon I received a visit from a few students from the University of Montreal and, while they were in my office I did my best to convince them that bilingualism was making headway within the federal government and the crown corporations. In fact I almost had them convinced that considerable progress had been achieved in that field.

However, a few minutes later with the same students I boarded the 5.20 p.m. C.N. train which runs between Ottawa and Montreal, two cities with a very large proportion of French speaking people. However, I was most disappointed and humiliated when I noticed that the two conductors on that train did not speak a single word of French. Needless to say, I was subjected to the sarcasm of those students whom I had tried to convince that bilingualism was growing within crown corporations. They were especially critical about the Quebec members of parliament who, they said, were making no headway in their representations to the federal government. Such representations, they said, were merely a subject of derision.

I therefore ask the Prime Minister to have an inquiry made in that respect so that steps may be taken to prevent the recurrence of such a situation.

MR. CHAPDELAINE—LETTERS ON HOUSE OF COMMONS STATIONERY FROM DEFEATED CONSERVATIVE CANDIDATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gérard Chapdelaine (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of personal privilege, although the matter is of general interest to all members.

Recently the defeated Conservative candidate in Sherbrooke county during the 1962 general election, has sent, as still do most Quebec Conservative members, to someone in Sherbrooke county, a letter of congratulations. This is something I have no objection to. However, this letter was typed on a House of Commons letterhead and was placed in an envelope also bearing the House of Commons heading. The letter is addressed to Mr. Robert Delisle, Sherbrooke University, Sherbrooke, Quebec. It reads as follows:

> Dear Robert. May I join your parents and friends to congratulate you warmly for the Molson trophy you won at the golf tournament of Sherbrooke University. I wish you a great success in your studies and a very brilliant career. My best wishes are with you. Sincerely. Maurice Allard, Member of Parliament for Sherbrooke from 1958 to 1962, present secretary of Hon. Léon Balcer.

Water Levels and Pollution

Mr. Speaker, I think that the paper placed at the disposal of the members of the House of Commons is not intended to be used by defeated members or candidates. I am ready to table this letter so that all the hon. members might see it.

I would like this matter to be referred to the privileges and elections committee to find out who supplies Mr. Maurice Allard, former member of parliament for Sherbrooke, with the stationery he uses to promote his nomination or his popularity in view of the next general election.

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: There being no motion to this effect, I can only proceed with the business before the house.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCES TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION ON WATER LEVELS AND WATER POLLUTION

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I wish to inform the house that the governments of Canada and the United States have agreed to place jointly before the international joint commission a reference on the level of waters of the great lakes. I also wish to inform the house that the governments of Canada and the United States have agreed to place jointly before the international joint commission a reference on pollution in the great lakes. In view of the interest which the house has taken in these matters it may be the wish of the house that these references, which are in the form of letters written by the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the international joint commission, be printed as an annex to Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house agree to this method of proceeding and to printing these letters as an annex to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of letters referred to above see appendix.]

EGGS—ANNOUNCEMENT OF DEFICIENCY PAYMENT

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish to inform the house that a deficiency payment of 2 cents per dozen will be paid on eggs marketed during the price support year ending September 30, 1964. Payments will commence at the end of this week.

The national weighted average price received by producers for grade A large size eggs for the 12 month period was 32 cents per dozen, or 2 cents below the support price of 34 cents. Producers are eligible to receive the deficiency payment on grade A extra large, grade A large and grade A medium size eggs, to a maximum of 4,000 dozen. Based on 1961 census information, it is estimated that the full year's production of about 95 per cent of the egg producers is less than the 4,000 dozen eligibility limit.

Total payments will approximate $1½ million.

FINANCE

UNION CARBIDE STOCK ISSUE—STATEMENT BY QUEBEC REVENUE MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I direct my question to the Minister of Finance. I should like to ask whether his attention has been drawn to a speech delivered by Hon. Eric W. Kierans, the Quebec revenue minister and one time president of the Montreal and Canadian stock exchanges, regarding the floating of the $60 million security issue in Canada by the Union Carbide corporation. Does he agree with Mr. Kierans when he says that this action will have a serious adverse effect on the Canadian balance of payments, and would he tell the house what ideas he has as to the steps which are to be taken to prevent the prejudicial effects of things like this in the future?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the speech referred to has not been brought to my attention. As to the last part of the question, I hope more Canadian subsidiaries of foreign concerns will follow the example of Union Carbide.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the minister whether he agrees with Mr. Kierans, who took a pot shot at the mentality of this government, when he said that if there are any more deals like Union Carbide in this country we will have a balance of payments problem all over again very soon.

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, I do not know who is taking pot shots at whom, but I do not agree with the allegation of my right hon. friend.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked about what Mr. Kierans said.

IMMIGRATION

DENIAL OF PERMISSION TO BRING IN CHILDREN OF JAMAICAN IMMIGRANT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration regarding a story which appears in this morning's issue of a Toronto newspaper concerning a Jamaican nurse's aid who came to Canada from England about a year ago and who has been denied permission to bring her two children. The ground given by the special immigration inquiry officer was that these children were illegitimate. He is quoted as having said that Jamaicans were not allowed to enter Canada if they had children who were born out of wedlock. I want to ask the minister if the decision in this case, which was heard last Friday by the immigration appeal board, has been upheld and, if so, would the minister not agree with the statement made in this newspaper report that this whole business smacks of injustice?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as soon as my attention was drawn to the events which took place in Toronto with regard to Miss Daisy Maud Henry, I asked my officials to supply full particulars on the case.

First of all, I would like to say that all the proceedings instituted in Toronto, either at the time of the inquiry or at the time of the appeal, were based solely on the fact that when Miss Henry filed her application for admission to Canada she failed to mention that she had two children. All subsequent proceedings were of a technical nature and dealt with the fact that Miss Henry is alleged to have made a false statement, which effect was to disqualify her for admission to Canada.

Now at no time was action taken by the investigating officers, or by the court of appeal, which might lead to believe that Miss Henry was being discriminated against in any way.

On the other hand, the newspaper Globe and Mail reported certain statements made by some high official of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I admit that if these words were spoken about a person who is not of the white race, the matter is very serious and, as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration I shall see to it that the official concerned, if in fact he did say these words, bears the consequences of such an attitude toward a person who is not of the white race.

Let me say then that the case was judged by a court of appeal and that it has now reached my office. In my capacity of minister I shall be able to use my discretion in reaching a final decision in the case of Miss Henry.

[Text]

Mr. Douglas: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If it is correct that this lady is to be deported from Canada because she made a declaration in which she failed to mention the fact that she had two illegitimate children in England, will the minister exercise his discretionary power to reverse the order of the appeal board deporting her from Canada?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member is aware, the minister, under the Immigration Act, has the power to reverse the decision of the court of appeal.

Also, besides the technical aspect where there was a false statement, surely there are other factors the minister must take into account when considering the problem. For instance, the fact that this person now wishes to settle in the country, bring her children over and get married. Therefore, on humanitarian grounds, the minister will have to take into account some other factors and that, in the interest of the country and of the family involved.

[Text]

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, I have a further supplementary question I should like to direct to the right hon. Prime Minister, asking him whether it is not time to introduce amendments to the Immigration Act to end the state of affairs under which the Department of Citizenship and Immigration is a law unto itself, by providing for the right of appeal against decisions of this department to the legitimate courts of the land?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, without accepting all the observations made by my hon. friend about the department of immigration, I agree that it would be desirable, as has been stated more than once in this house by this government, to make some changes in the Immigration Act. I hope the time will come when we will be able to do that, after completing the business now before the house.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question I should like to direct to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister as yet received the report of Mr. Joseph Sedgwick concerning the custody of persons held on immigration charges and appeal procedures?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I did not receive lately any report on Mr. Sedgwick's activities.

I simply know that Mr. Sedgwick had to go to England for a few weeks and that he will be back in the country on October 15. With the co-operation of my colleague, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), I hope to receive Mr. Sedgwick's report by the end of November at the latest.

[Text]

Mr. Aiken: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fairweather: A supplementary question—

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are two members who wish to ask supplementaries, first the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka and second the hon. member for Royal.

Mr. Aiken: Mr. Speaker, mine is related to the previous question. Does the minister intend to table the report or to make it public when it is received from Mr. Sedgwick?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Yes, Mr. Speaker. As I said, I will be very glad to table the report in the house so as to permit all the hon. members to look into it.

[Text]

Mr. R. Gordon L. Fairweather (Royal): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister would consider the possibility, as was urged at an earlier time, of establishing a committee of the house to study and discuss the ramifications of the Immigration Act so that situations like this Jamaican case can be dealt with by law and not by discretion.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to look into that question.

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. While we are talking about immigration, is the Prime Minister willing to consider the fact that the immigration department is at the moment helping or paying Canadian citizens to go and establish themselves in the United States?

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. He said he hoped to be able to do this when we get the business now before the house completed. I put this question to him. Has there really been a serious study and review of the law and regulations governing immigration matters, and is there now legislation ready to put on the order paper in this regard?

Mr. Pearson: There has been a serious study made, Mr. Speaker, quite as serious as was made between 1958 and 1963 and with better chances of results.

Mr. Starr: Are we ever political today.

[Translation]

Mr. Langlois: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the hon. minister a question.

A while ago when I asked another question some members thought I was referring to Mr. Banks.

Could the minister tell the house why the Canadian government is spending money to make people come to Canada, while in the Thetford area money is being spent to pay the expenses of Canadian citizens who are leaving Canada to settle in the United States?

Why does not the government spend money to help those Canadian citizens settle right here in Canada?

Will the minister inquire as to where this money comes from? Will he also amend the law to remove these anomalies?

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. member is extremely vague. If he could give me further information in this respect, I would be very glad to make an investigation in order to determine to what extent my department may be concerned by the incident to which he referred.

Mr. Langlois: I will be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. E. Nasserden (Rosthern): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the government has set up a committee of cabinet to study the Immigration Act and the general procedures followed under it.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): This important matter is under continuous consideration, and there is a cabinet committee dealing with it.

[Later:]

Mr. Nasserden: Could the Prime Minister supplement the reply he gave to my question by telling us who are the members of the cabinet committee studying the Immigration Act, so that if hon. members have suggestions to make they can send them on?

Mr. Gordon: Send them to the minister.

Mr. Pearson: I understand the hon. member is asking for the names of the members of the cabinet committee which is studying this subject. It is not customary to give publicity to the membership of cabinet committees and I do not think this custom should be broken.

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF CASES OF GREEK SEAMEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. It has to do with some 12 or 15 Greek seamen who have been convicted of illegal entry into Canada and have appeals coming up in Toronto. I refer particularly to the case of one Elios Veitsas. Is the minister not of the opinion that these people, good potential citizens, should be given the opportunity to settle in our country regardless of the circumstances under which they entered Canada? I ask this question particularly in view of the fact that the officials contend that the minister has given instructions that the appeals of these people should be opposed with all the force at the command of counsel appointed by the government. Those are the words that are given to me. Will the minister not reconsider this matter, inasmuch as these men have been in jail for a couple of months, they want to come into Canada, and are good potential citizens? Rather than persecuting them should we not encourage them?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): I am quite astonished at the statement which was made a few moments ago by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition to the effect that legal advisers are instructed by officials of the department to be as strict as possible in every case brought to court.

On the contrary, I think that officials of the department and legal advisers should merely ensure that justice be meted out to all citizens of this country and that existing laws are respected.

Respecting the attitude of the minister and the persons who enter this country legally, normal proceedings are provided for by the law. An appeal may be made before a court, and a final appeal may be made to the minister under the Immigration Act.

I wish to assure the members of this house that every time I must exercise the prerogatives granted to me by parliament, I exercise them in the interests of the country and of any immigrant who may be an asset to Canada.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would like to ask the minister what he means by "in the best interests of the country". In particular I ask him whether he instructed the officials that these appeals were to be opposed, to use the expression that is before me, "with all severity". I would also ask him to look into the case of Elios Veitsas, this 19 year old sailor whose brother lives in Toronto, and who has been subpoenaed to appear on October 15.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, at the right hon. Leader of the Opposition's request, I shall be pleased to investigate this particular case in order to establish what procedure was followed; however, the principles I mentioned a while ago still stand.

[Text]

HAL BANKS—REVOCATION OF LANDED IMMIGRANT STATUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Has the minister considered the provisions of section 3(b) of the Immigration Act, which are mandatory and which have the effect of revoking Canadian domicile in such a case as that of Hal Banks? If so, and if he feels that this section applies as I do, is the hon. gentleman now considering the revocation of the landed immigrant status granted to Banks?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I have indeed checked this section and, a few weeks ago the department authorized all immigration officers in the country, if by chance

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Banks appeared at some immigration office, to immediately make an inquiry in order to ascertain whether Mr. Banks' departure from the country affected his Canadian domicile. If, in fact, Mr. Banks left the country to reside abroad, on a permanent basis, under the Immigration Act this may affect his Canadian domicile, and then he may no longer be admittable to Canada unless he can claim admittance under other sections of the act.

[Text]

Mr. Nielsen: Since the provisions of section 3(b) are mandatory, does the minister not feel he should apply those provisions to the case of Mr. Banks?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: No, Mr. Speaker. An inquiry has to be made first.

[Text]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CYPRUS—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON PRESENT POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. Last week I asked a question related to Cyprus, following the agreement for military aid that was signed between the government of Cyprus and the government of the U.S.S.R. At that time there were no details available but now, in view of the fact that Archbishop Makarios is playing a rather prominent part in the meeting of non-aligned nations in Cairo, and also in view of the fact that there has been no improvement in the Cyprus situation, can the Prime Minister inform the house what is happening in relation to the negotiations at the UN level and also in direct contacts between the governments of Canada and Cyprus?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret I cannot answer this question at the moment. I know my hon. friend the Secretary of State for External Affairs did ask for a report on the first part of the question. However, he is not in his seat today as he is indisposed, but I shall try to get the answer tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister and ask him has the government made any representations to the United Nations to change the role of Canadian troops in Cyprus, in view of reports that they have been handed all the dirty jobs on that island?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I saw that report, I have made inquiries, and the information I have received indicates that it is most inaccurate and unfair to say that only the Canadian contingent in Cyprus had been given difficult assignments.

INTERFERENCE IN DOMESTIC AFFAIRS BY MEMBER OF FRENCH ASSEMBLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. B. Nesbitt (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but in his absence I shall pose it to the Prime Minister. Does the government intend to protest to the government of France over what would appear to be a serious interference in the domestic affairs of Canada by a member of the French assembly? I refer, of course, to press reports that appeared in numerous papers last Monday.

I have before me a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of October 5, reporting the address of one Xavier Deniau, French deputy from Loiret, to a meeting of the St. Jean Baptiste society in Trois Rivieres last week, in which he advocated that the province of Quebec separate from Canada, pointing out the advantages that might accrue to that province by so doing. As a further question I would ask the Prime Minister if he would investigate the matter to see whether these alleged facts are correct.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I shall be glad to look into that question, Mr. Speaker.

INDUSTRY

QUEBEC—DISCUSSIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I asked the Prime Minister whether there had been an agreement between the Canadian government and the Peugeot and Renault plants in order to facilitate their establishment in the province of Quebec. At that time he informed me that he would inquire.

Can he tell the house whether his officials have had the time to supply him with this information since yesterday?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the matter is still under consideration, but I hope there will be an announcement for the house within a day or two.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EQUALIZATION OF PAY FOR PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the President of the Privy Council. Inasmuch as the government for many years has had in various cities across the country a class of employees known as prevailing rate employees, who receive a rate of pay based on the average wage for that type of work in their specific areas, instead of having one established wage rate for all such employees across our nation, as is the case with civil servants and military personnel, what steps does the government intend to take to end this discrimination against its employees in low wage areas?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put that question on the order paper.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to debate it tonight at ten o'clock.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUPREME COURT DECISION RESPECTING HUNTING AND FISHING RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for the Northwest Territories asked a very important question of the right hon. Prime Minister, who replied that he was not familiar with all the details of a certain aspect of the question but would look into it. Is he now in a position to reply to yesterday's question relating to Indian affairs?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, not today but perhaps tomorrow, or Monday at the latest.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—INQUIRY AS TO STEPS TO MAINTAIN PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware of the greatly aroused feelings of Saskatchewan turkey producers since it was announced over the radio that one farmer sold 99 turkeys and after he paid for dressing them all he was left with was $10? Would the minister look into this serious situation?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I shall be glad to do so, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): As a supplementary question, in view of the large number of questions we have had on this matter does the minister intend to replace the quotas on United States turkeys coming into Canada, or does he intend to increase the tariff on live turkeys so as to bring it more in line with the tariff on dressed turkeys?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, this is a policy matter on which we will be glad to inform the house when it is formulated. We are looking into it now.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker. This matter of import quotas and an increase in the tariff on turkeys coming into the country is very important, and an announcement of government policy may be too late to do anything for turkey producers if the minister does not give an answer now and say something will be done. Is he prepared to say the government will take steps to assist such people?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of policy, but seeing there is such great interest in this question perhaps I should make hon. members familiar with it.

Yesterday the hon. member for Huron made certain statements and inquiries concerning the importation of turkeys into Canada from the United States. A supplemental question was asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar which related to the relative rate of current turkey imports in comparison with those earlier this year.

The latest information on the turkey import situation is that up until the end of August a total of 7,763,903 pounds of turkeys, both eviscerated and live expressed in terms of eviscerated weight, had entered Canada from the United States. Subsequent to that date the imports have been as follows. During the week ending September 5, 185,892 pounds; week ending September 12, 135,500 pounds; week ending September 19, 83,752 pounds and the week ending September 26, 45,112 pounds, making a total for the month of September of 450,256 pounds, bringing the total imports to that date to 8,214,159 pounds.

Inquiries of the Ministry

The hon. member for Huron indicated that at the turkey growers' convention in Winnipeg, about a month ago, I made the statement that no turkeys had come into Canada during the previous two weeks. The actual statement I made—and I quote from the manuscript of my address—was:

—with the result that imports of American turkeys into Canada all but stopped during August—in fact, in recent weeks the only movement has been a relatively minor one involving only one plant.

The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has queried the statement that imports are levelling off, basing this query on the assertion that one third of a million pounds of turkeys have come into Canada during September. As I have indicated, under one half million pounds came into Canada during that period, but in comparison with earlier months this figure does represent a distinct levelling off or slowing up of imports, since during the month of June in excess of two and a half million pounds were imported, while the figure for the month of July was in excess of two million pounds. In August imports dropped to about three quarters of a million pounds.

As I have indicated previously, I have asked the Canadian turkey federation, both at a special committee meeting held at the time of their annual convention and subsequently in writing, for their suggestions as to the best way of meeting this problem consistent with Canada's over-all trade interests. As yet I have received no reply. However, I can assure the house that this matter is one which is engaging the active interest of the government.

Mr. Winkler: I thank the minister for those statistics, and having heard them I should like to ask him this question. Is it a fact that imports as of the end of September show an increase of considerably more than 100 per cent when related to imports under the previous system of import quotas during the last full year of imports from the United States?

Mr. Hays: I whould like to check the figures in that regard, but what the hon. member says could conceivably be correct. He will understand, however, when considering trade between Canada and the United States, that we had to export from this country $1,300 million of agricultural products this year, and that 30 per cent of all the agricultural products we produce has to be exported. In these circumstances we must consider the over-all picture of these exports very carefully if we are not to hurt one area or another.

Mr. Winkler: A supplementary question—

[Mr. Hays.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Is this question really pressing? It is probably important, but must it be answered at this moment? We have had a long discussion on the turkey question.

Mr. Winkler: I agree with the minister that we must move carefully in making some of these decisions, but does he not think that the previously accepted pattern working to the benefit of Canadian turkey producers was a satisfactory one?

Mr. Hays: Of course that was contrary to our international obligations, and I suppose this is something we much watch very carefully or other exports are liable to be hurt, to the detriment of Canadian producers.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—THREATENED EVICTION OF WIDOW FROM VETERANS HOUSING PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. L. Chatterton (Esquimalt-Saanich): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Veterans Affairs. With regard to the Fraserview subdivision, the Postmaster General told us on Tuesday he would deal with individual cases. A pensioner widow with two young daughters, Mrs. E. Johnson of East 55th avenue, was taken to hospital with a stroke because of mental anxiety—

An hon. Member: Order.

Mr. Chatterton: I am preparing my question, Mr. Speaker. She was taken to hospital with a stroke because of mental anxiety over possible eviction and will not be in a position to make representations on her own. Will the minister look into this case and refer it to the Postmaster General for compassionate consideration?

Hon. Roger Teillet (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I will be glad to look into the matter, certainly.

PENSIONS

CANADA PLAN—INQUIRY AS TO INTRODUCTION OF RESOLUTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In the full knowledge of the fact that there are 31 days in October, is it not possible for the Prime Minister to undertake that the new legislation respecting the Canada pension plan will be on the order paper before the end of this month?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I think it is safe to give the hon. gentleman that assurance.

STATEMENT RESPECTING INTERVIEWS WITH MEMBERS OF FLAG COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the critical remarks the hon. member for Lake St. John (Mr. Lessard) made yesterday, the C.B.C. have informed me that there was no discrimination, that no unfairness was shown toward the French speaking members who are on the flag committee.

According to regular procedure the cameramen in Ottawa whom the producers had appointed took the pictures required for this type of program for both the English and French networks of the C.B.C.

The silent pictures taken at yesterday's conference were televised over both networks last night in exactly the same manner. The films merely showed the tremendous number of designs that have been submitted and the various members of the committee were only seen in the background.

Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member should have ascertained the facts before raising such a grievance which, under the circumstances, has no foundation whatsoever.

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, on the point just raised by the Secretary of State, could he tell us why the C.B.C. saw fit, this morning, to set up its cameras at the door of the flag committee in order to shoot what had been forgotten the previous day?

Mr. Lamontagne: No, Mr. Speaker.

AIR CANADA

CONSULTATION WITH GOVERNMENT RESPECTING NEW EMBLEM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Acting Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will direct it to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Did the president of Air Canada consult the government before adopting the company's new maple leaf emblem?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): I will have to look into that matter.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NOTICE TO PERSONNEL TO BE COMPULSORILY RETIRED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): I should like to ask the Associate Minister of National Defence whether, if reports to the effect that a number of officers at defence headquarters are to be released during the next nine months are accurate, it would not be possible to give these gentlemen at least six months' notice of the termination of their employment. Press reports indicate there will be just three months' notice.

Hon. Lucien Cardin (Associate Minister of National Defence): Yes; according to a press release by my colleague the Minister of National Defence it is expected that between now and May of next year perhaps a thousand officials will be compulsorily released. The question of notice prior to release has been considered very carefully, and it is felt that a 90 day notice is sufficient.

Mr. Churchill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. If the plan has been made to retire such a large number, surely they are entitled to more than 90 days' notice. I do request the minister to give them notice now so they can make their plans for next May.

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Speaker, I think it has been understood for some time now that members of the services will be released. I believe most people who are in the services now have looked into this possibility. We have of course to decide which people will be compulsorily released. This will be done in three stages. I think some will be advised in November, another group will be advised in February, and the last group will be advised in May. We believe that a 90 day notice is a sufficient period.

Mr. Churchill: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Does the minister really believe that keeping these gentlemen in suspense—

Mr. Diefenbaker: Keeping everybody in suspense.

Mr. Churchill: —is a satisfactory method of dealing with this matter? The associate minister has said they have already decided who shall go.

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is becoming very argumentative.

Mr. Churchill: That is a fair question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. H. Russell MacEwan (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the minister can give the house and the country any idea as to how many of these officers are near retirement age.

Mr. Cardin: I could not answer that question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: This is surely a question for the order paper; there is not any immediate urgency about it.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

QUEBEC—DELAY IN PAYMENT FOR WINTER WORKS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Langlois (Mégantic): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Labour. Last year the government made grants to municipalities with respect to winter works. Certain municipalities have not yet been reimbursed for the works undertaken last winter, and they are now faced with the obligation of borrowing to carry out this year's winter works. Could the minister tell the house whether he is going to live up to his responsibilities in that respect?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: Once again, this is a question for the order paper.

NATIONAL PARKS

BANFF—MEETING WITH COUNCIL RESPECTING MOTEL CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): I have one more question, Mr. Speaker. I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources concerning Banff. I will put my question in two parts. Is the minister prepared now to meet the elected council of Banff; and second, is he not well aware that one of our land developers of Alberta, namely Mayor Hawrelak, is the man behind the syndicate building this particular motel in that area which is zoned against this kind of development?

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I would like to serve notice of my intention to debate this question at ten o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

1. Departmental administration including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the detals of the estimates, $5,180,500.

The Chairman: Order. House again in committee of supply; vote No. 1 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1965.

Mr. Scott: Mr. Chairman, since the adjournment last week I have had an opportunity to read the speech of my colleague from Burnaby-Richmond in which he dealt in general with the policies of the government. I do not want to repeat any of those matters, except to say that I certainly endorse the views that he expressed.

This afternoon I would like to lay before the committee a problem that concerns almost every household in Canada, and urge upon the government that some action be taken to meet the problem. I am referring, of course, to the old problem of the consumer in Canada and the extent to which he is deprived of adequate protection against such things as unfair packaging, high interest rates and a general lack of information upon which he can make an intelligent choice. The size of this group is to me astonishing. The recent studies that are available indicate that approximately 90 per cent of the personal disposable income of Canadians is used to directly satisfy the demands of individual consumers for goods and services. This represents two thirds of our gross national product and amounts to some $27 billion each year being spent by the consumers in Canada.

It is therefore obvious that this group is represented in every household in Canada, and it is urgently necessary that something be done to deal with the problems they face. At the present time the government is active in the general consumer field, but the degree of activity is so scattered among the various departments that it is very doubtful that any really cohesive plan can be developed for the consumer market. For example, the Department of Trade and Commerce has a weights and measures division; the Department of Agriculture has a consumer section and a section for the inspection of meat and other foods; the Department of Justice has an anti-combines section for price fixing, which is relatively ineffective; the Department of National Health and Welfare has its food and drug directorate; the Department of Defence Production has a consumer section; the Department of Fisheries has an information and consumer branch. In short, Mr. Chairman, while there is activity in this field, it is scattered among all the government departments.

The suggestion I would like to put to the government is that they create a department of consumer affairs, headed by a full time minister to devote all his attention to the affairs of this new and important department. As you know, Mr. Chairman, every other economic group in Canada has a department to speak for it. We have the Department of Trade and Commerce, concerned with business in general; we have the Department of Industry; we have the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Labour. All these departments deal with important organized groups in the community, but for the consumer there is nobody to speak on his behalf, at least in any co-ordinated way. We feel very strongly that the time has come for the creation of a new department of consumer affairs.

This, of course, is not our own idea alone; members of the house in speeches outside the house have advocated a similar program. The hon. member for Northumberland in a recent speech advocated such a change; the consumers association of Canada has advocated such a change; the credit union associations of Canada have made representations to the government along the same line. All these groups have tried to point out to the government the urgent problems of this important section of the community and the very real need for a special department to handle their affairs.

It is interesting that the United States is again ahead of us in this whole field. In that country there has been an enormous amount of research undertaken, and various legislative acts have been passed for the protection of the consumer. We should like to suggest to the government that they bring into effect a bill of rights for the consumer setting out what are his rights in the jungle of the competitive trade world.

I think there are four basic rights. First of all, the consumer ought to have the right to safety, to be protected against the marketing of goods which are hazardous to health or life. Second, the consumer should have the right to be informed; to be protected against fraudulent, deceitful or grossly misleading information, advertising, labelling or other practices; and above all to be given the facts he needs to make an informed choice. Third, the consumer ought to have the right to choose; the right to be assured wherever possible access to a variety of products and services at competitive prices; and in those industries in which competition is not workable—and there are many—a government regulation substituted constituting an assurance of satisfactory quality and service at fair prices. Finally, the consumer must have the right to be heard; to be assured that the consumer's interest will receive full and sympathetic consideration in the formulation of government policy and fair and expeditious treatment in its administrative tribunals. I think if we were to bring into effect a bill of rights for the consumer we would go a long way toward dealing with this very important problem.

There have been various voluntary agencies at work in Canada, the most notable being, of course, the Canadian consumers association. This organization has done a great deal of work in testing various products which are on the market and in making the information available to the general public. But it is handicapped for money and just does not have the tremendous machinery for publication that is available to the government.

I am thinking of some of the tests they have made. For example, they recently issued a statement declaring that they had conducted tests of thermometers of Japanese or German origin. These thermometers bore the following statement: "This clinical thermometer has been rigidly inspected and tested in accordance with standards established by the national research council". On examination, Mr. Chairman, it turned out that none of the thermometers which bore this guarantee passed all the C.A.C. tests, and the C.A.C. magazine concluded that they considered this to be misleading to consumers and that it was contrary to the section of the Canadian Criminal Code which forbids the use of the national research council's name in advertising unless all its specifications are met. This is just one of dozens of examples where the public are being hoodwinked by this type of fraudulent advertising.

In other cases the same organization, the consumers association of Canada, conducted tests, for example on cans of fruit juice, and it was found that of the 20 ounce cans in particular which were tested only one in every nine contained the full 20 ounces. Again there was a whole series of misleading representations on the packaging. Although one particular instance does not sound very serious, when this is multiplied millions of times over, thus reflecting the quantity of sales, it is evident that the public are being gypped and fraudulently treated.

The same organization conducted tests on milk cartons and found that the contents of the cartons which were investigated varied in amount all the way down to four fluid ounces below the amount specified on the label. Thirteen brands were found to be below the amount advertised, which again is another flagrant example of how consumers are gypped. The files of those interested in this subject are bulging with examples of fraudulent and misleading advertising to which the public are being subjected by various companies, apparently with immunity to our present laws.

Another tricky gimmick which is used is to state the number of ounces contained in the various packages. Indeed, to analyse them the housewife would need to have an I.B.M. computer in order to establish whether the various ranges were competitive. These are some examples which can be seen at any of our local general stores. Spic and Span have a one pound three and a half ounce package for 41 cents, a two pound eight ounce package for 82 cents and a four pound six and a half ounce package for $1.40. How on earth is the housewife in the busy rush of the day going to divide up all the fractions of ounces so as to decide whether one package is more economic than another? Surf sells a two pound 10 ounce package for 73 cents and a five pound package for $1.19. Again, how is the shopper to divide the fractions back and forth? Another example; Colgate toothpaste sells at 44 grams for 39 cents, 82 grams for 61 cents, 162 grams for 94 cents and 238 grams for $1.19. Again how is the housewife to break this down so as to establish whether or not there is a proper price relationship for the product? Pepsodent toothpaste sells at 41 grams for 33 cents and 80.5 grams for 59 cents. How is there any assurance of a properly calculated price unless the housewife takes a calculating machine to the cashier's desk with her? Another example; Clover Leaf pink salmon, three and three quarter ounces for 25 cents, seven and three quarter ounces for 35 cents and 15½ ounces for 69 cents. I challenge anyone but a brilliant mathematician to do the fast calculations required to establish whether this is a proper competitive price.

I have a whole list of these examples here, Mr. Chairman, which I could read into the record, but I do not intend to do so because I think it is quite clear that this business of the broken ounces and the variations in price make it absolutely impossible for the consumers of Canada to know whether they are being gypped or are in fact getting true measure. We are all aware of the gimmick on the package which declares "10 cents off" or "15 cents off," whatever it may be. We can all go into a supermarket and buy a large can of coffee which has on the label "10 cents off," or "15 cents off." In fact these printed labels are part of the package itself and bear no relationship whatever to the price paid by the consumer. In short it is another gimmick to hoodwink the public.

Those of us who are serving on the special committee on consumer credit along with the gentlemen of the other place are already shocked and dismayed at the evidence which has been given of the degree to which Canadian consumers are not aware of the interest charges which they are paying. All of us are astounded at the mountainous rate of interest being gouged out of the Canadian public through lack of disclosure, hidden bonuses, special charges, all of which are lumped together in the price of the product being sold. So as I say I think the housewives and the general consumers of Canada simply do not have the faintest idea whether or not they are being properly protected. Indeed, the whole business of the way in which goods are packaged and the housewife defrauded is, in my view, something which comes down to the responsibility of this government.

As I have said, the late President Kennedy was very aware of this problem, and early in his term of office sent a message to the United States congress in which he accepted on behalf of the federal government that the federal government, by its very nature, was the highest spokesman for all the people; and he accepted the principle that the federal government has a responsibility to the unspoken-for consumer to see that adequate legislation is brought in and that adequate provision is made for his protection.

Clearly, Mr. Chairman, if there is going to be any serious attempt on our part to get into this subject it simply cannot be done by leaving the problems of the consumer in the hands of each individual minister in so far as they relate to their departments. All we will have by doing so is a disjointed and generally chaotic approach to a $27 billion industry. It seems to me that the representations which have been made by various groups to the government ought to receive serious consideration.

We should like to suggest, for example, that the post office be used for the displaying of information which would be useful to the consumer. There is already a great deal of material that could be made available to the consumer. Second, we should like to see stiffer laws, for example, for the testing of drugs and cosmetics before they reach the public. All of us will remember the thalidomide tragedy of a year or so ago. All of us will want to see that never again will there be any possibility of anything of this sort getting on the market. We should like to see a re-examination of this kind of thing before it is allowed on the market, because there is nothing so cruel as to permit the sale of useless material, or material which will perhaps do harm.

We should also like to see stiffer laws in respect of credit abuses. Many members in all sections of this house have introduced bills calling for greater disclosure of interest charges so the buyer will know precisely what he is paying for the money he is borrowing. I have yet to see any formula which would work, other than the one proposed by the credit union league representatives when they appeared before the special committee on consumer credit. They did produce a formula which would make this clear. We should like to see some limitation upon interest charges generally. We realize this is a dangerous area, because in many ways we merely drive the money supply somewhere else, but something should be done about an upper limit on gross interest charges.

We should like to see some consideration given on behalf of the consumer to the opening up of alternative credit sources. I understand, for example, that chartered banks would be very interested in getting into the field of consumer credit, and would provide it at less than one half the price Canadians are now paying, if certain changes in the Bank Act could be brought in. We hope to raise this question when the Bank Act is under revision.

We should like to see something done in the form of the truth in packaging legislation which has been introduced in the United States. There has been considerable discussion there in this regard, and I think it was Senator Hart who pioneered in this field. He has introduced an excellent bill called the truth in packaging bill, which goes through all the abuses to which the consumers are now subjected and attempts to regulate the exploitation that is taking place. I think there is a good lesson to be learned here so far as our internal commercial policies are concerned.

We should like to see a department of this kind have an up to date statistical flow of information concerning the whole field of consumer credit. Many of the economic shifts that have taken place in Canada have been due to the very pronounced change in the pattern of spending of Canadian consumers. After all, when there is a shift in the method of spending by a group who consume $27 billion worth of goods and services, there is a profound effect upon the economy of the country as a whole.

I do not want to labour this point because I think an examination of the record and the information already available will make it very clear that there is an urgent need for something to be done in this field. I hope if the minister does not feel this is strictly within the terms of reference of his department he will at least pass it on to whoever in government should give it consideration.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I merely want to summarize the proposals we have suggested. 1. That a new department of consumer affairs be created with a full time minister to look after the affairs of the consumers of Canada as a whole, because at the present time there is nobody to speak for them.

2. A bill of rights should be adopted for the consumers to set out and guarantee to them those things I raised earlier in my speech.

3. We suggest the introduction of the necessary legislation to deal with credit, unfair packaging, distasteful advertising, and all the other abuses to which the consuming public is being subjected at the present time.

4. We suggest such a department should be operated in co-operation with provincial agencies which now exist in order to be sure that the ultimate amount of consumer protection will be made available.

5. We want to urge that a really serious examination be made of this problem by the government rather than just the active consideration to which reference has been made on orders of the day. We urge that a serious attempt be made to give representation to this tremendous section of Canada, which at the present time is unrepresented, but whose problems affect the lives of every Canadian.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I have been inspired to make a few comments during our consideration of the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce because of certain things that have taken place recently, one being the statement made by the minister.

First of all I should like to thank the minister and congratulate him for his statement to this house last week, in which he included a list of the achievements of the Conservative administration which preceded his. He was very courteous in pointing out in his opening sentence that Canada is now in the fourth year of advance and is moving strongly ahead. Thank heaven most of us can subtract and look back to the spring of 1961, when this advance received tremendous impetus by the budget of that year.

Even though all the things the Conservative administration did are not listed in those opening remarks, when one goes through his speech and picks off all the items he did mention, including the so-called power policy, national oil policy, the balancing of the merchandise account trade balance, and general economic improvement, I think the minister should be congratulated for bringing these to public attention, and for noting that the efforts made by the previous government to carry out a policy of expansion to meet our world commitments on balance of payments was the right course to follow.

I do not intend in my remarks to discuss the obvious schizophrenia of the present government. The Minister of Trade and Commerce talks in one language while the Minister of Finance talks in another language, which is restrictive. If one looks at the statements of the Minister of Finance which are included in the royal commission report—particularly the preliminary report, and repeated in a more general fashion in the final report—the minister's statements made in his paper read to the Kingston conference of 1960, and the statements made in the minister's book "Troubled Canada"—which I call Mein Kampf; then if one looks at the recent actions of the Minister of Finance, he will see a government under the control of policies leading toward restriction. This is the wrong policy for Canada.

[Mr. Scott.]

The Minister of Trade and Commerce speaks in an entirely different language. He speaks of multilateral trade. That is a sound policy and the only course that Canada should follow if we are to consider our national interests.

I think on this occasion I should put forward those proposals which I believe are of interest to the Department of Trade and Commerce and to the whole country. In my opinion the world is at the crossroads of decision so far as trade is concerned. Ever since the time of the industrial revolution trade has developed tremendously among those nations which can be classified as industrial. They have learned the hard way that they have to work together, and in working together there have been tremendous achievements.

But a new factor has now entered the picture. This new factor is that there are a tremendous number of new countries which are not industrialized to any great extent and whose people cry out for a better standard of living. This is the quandary in which Canada finds itself. We have such tremendous volumes of energy and resources, and we know that all the fingers of the world are pointing at us and wondering which course we will take.

There are two main paths that the nations seem to be considering. One is the traditional path whereby industrial nations gather together in various groupings, primarily GATT. They look at the world from their vantage point of rich living and progress. They are aware of the new nations on the outside, and they condescend to look at the problems of the newly developing nations and wonder how they can let some of their products into this rich men's club without seriously lowering the standard of living within the magic circle. This is the one path. Each one of the people sent by Canada to the hard and heavy negotiations in Geneva concerning new agreements under GATT is sent there with instructions that he must get the best possible deal for his country and make it as difficult as possible for anybody else to get into our markets.

An hon. Member: Get more and give less.

Mr. Hamilton: To sell at any cost is the philosophy with which they are sent there. This is the direction that ministers, not only under the present government, give them. It is a traditional policy of all the western industrial nations.

I suggest that the other path should be looked at. This other path is a strange, new one. It is based on an attitude of mind just the reverse of what I have described. Canada's decisions in the next few years will be very important not only to us but to all those countries of the world that are looking for some breach in the wall that the people of the industrial nations are trying to build around themselves.

Before I embark upon a description of the other path and the course of action we can take if we are genuinely interested in this path, let me review recent trade tendencies in a very general and incomplete way. Generally speaking the western world has given lip service to multilateral trade, but in practice it has tended to group itself into regional groupings. We have the regional groupings of E.C.M., of EFTA, of South America and most recently of Africa. We have the Kennedy round of negotiations concerning GATT which in effect is an acceptance of the regional concept. This is one tendency, and I am afraid this regional tendency still stands in high favour in the minds of many of the economists in our western industrial nations who write articles to advise politicians.

On the other hand we still have those in the western nations who are putting up a fight for the multilateral principle, and in all fairness I think Canada under all governments has been consistent in advocating this principle even though a few years ago we heard in the house from the then opposition side great claims that we should enter into these regional blocs, that we should join these rich men's clubs and bar the door to the poor at our gates. Fortunately this phase did not last long, because so far as the general philosophy in Canada is concerned the multilateral side seems to be winning out.

Having given this general and incomplete history I should like to suggest now that the basis of the new path that could be considered is an attitude of mind. The attitude of mind is that there are two billion people in the world who at the present time do not play much of a role in world trade, certainly far less than 20 per cent, and this vast number of people who enjoy such a small percentage of world trade want a better living standard. They know they can only achieve a better living standard by trading with the rich industrial nations. They do not want to have to come to our door at GATT and plead for crumbs.

Canada, on the other hand, is not so rigidly bound by the fears of the past that crush the minds and spirits of leaders in western Europe. We still have a spark or two left in us that will pioneer a new course. But I say first of all that the attitude should be that the needs and wants of these people must be paramount, not our own. Let me give an example. In 1943 men of high principle enunciated the principle of a world food bank. It was not until 1961 that we got the world food bank program on its feet, and it is in action today. What caused that sudden reversal of the field in 1961? It was the declaration by those representing Canada at the world conference in Rome that we put the needs of these people first, that our thought was not just to get rid of surplus wheat or surplus something else but that what these people wanted they should have a right to. The practical way in which we did this, of course, was to offer to put cash into the fund, and we agreed that Canadian money could be used to buy food anywhere in the world. This won the support, not opposition, of the newly developing nations.

I could go on and talk about this at great length, but over and over again as I go through Hansard for the last year and a half I find the opposite attitude on the part of the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. I think many of us who tried so hard to sell Canadian wheat must have been shocked at the answer of the minister just yesterday to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia. With regard to the failure of crops in Europe the minister said, as found on page 8837 of Hansard:

> —I am satisfied that if these reports are correct—and I hope they are from the point of view of Canadian wheat prospects—we shall get our full share of the business that is going.

This is my point, Mr. Chairman. If you are going to be a good salesman of wheat, if you are going to be a person who helps these countries get on their feet, you will only succeed if your attitude is right; namely that you want to help them because in helping them you will always help yourself. This is the key to the path that in my opinion will lead to the bringing of all these people into the trade picture in the world of today.

What are some of these trading techniques? Some are old and some are new. Some may be proven no good, but at least we should take a look at them. From the questions I have asked in the last year and a half the minister knows that I am tremendously interested in international commodity agreements. Generally speaking there are two classes of international commodity agreements. The first class comprises those between the traditional traders of the world, hard headed and experienced people who can look after themselves. They establish a minimum and a maximum and trade within those two limits.

But there is a new type of international commodity agreement yet to be developed and which must be developed if we are going to break the barrier between the newly developing nations and the industrialized nations. These newly developing countries need to accept the fact that we in the rich countries of the world recognize and want them to join, not to take away their shirts and their livelihood from them by grinding them down to the lowest possible prices, but by deliberately going out to raise and double their prices.

Most of these countries are producers of staple products. These are all they have got to sell and we could double their basic income, and it would not mean very much to us at the retail level. In that way we could give them a chance to buy the things they need from us. This is the way you can move forward; but you have to have the attitude.

We can remember the debates and questions we had last year on an international sugar agreement. I went through the record again this morning and I should like to give one quotation which shows a classic example of the attitude that exists in Canada, and in particular in the minister's mind. Everyone knows why there is not a sugar agreement today, because of the dispute between the United States and Cuba, but this is what the minister said in one of his answers:

> I am of the opinion that it would be unwise at the moment to enter into long term agreements with commonwealth suppliers or any other suppliers.

And further on he said:

> —until the market has settled down before we commit ourselves to any long term contract which would oblige Canadian consumers to pay higher prices in the long run.

Mr. Sharp: Would the hon. member give the date and the page of reference?

Mr. Hamilton: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. This was the answer to one of several questions, and was recorded in Hansard of April 27 last, at page 2643.

On another occasion in answer to a question, the minister indicated we should wait until the prices were lower. This is my point, Mr. Chairman. It is in our interests to get the sugar prices to the producers raised, and without holding me to precise percentage points I would point out that the average wholesale price of sugar over the last 30 years has not been much higher than 2½ cents per pound to the producer. If we gave them 5 cents as a floor, then we could ask for a maximum of 8 cents a pound. We could save ourselves the high prices which we paid last year for sugar, and the producers would be guaranteed a fair basic income.

This theory should apply to all staple products—not just foods, but to products such as cotton, tin and rubber. My point is that international commodity agreements must be pushed by Canada, first of all not on our products because we are doing all right particularly with our big markets like wheat. We have no intention of forgetting the other products, but first of all our attack should be on commodity agreements for newly developing countries. We should deliberately say to them that we are prepared to pay a higher price, and let Mrs. Plumptre write all the briefs she likes.

We are concerned with raising the living levels of people all over the world, and the Canadian people will gladly pay 2½ cents or 3 cents a pound more for sugar to make sure these countries have decent living standards. In return, all we ask is protection against these great fluctuations in price. I heard the hon. member for Danforth suggest that about 90 per cent of our people are consumers, and I say 90 per cent of our people will join us in that type of program, not because it helps us financially or because we will be able to sell more products to these other nations, but we will have a better feeling and can look ourselves in the face with greater confidence than we can with this present attitude.

My second point is that with the great proportion of the earth which is now organized into developing countries with new governments, most of them are going to be forced by necessity to have state trading operations. Therefore if we can suggest some way by which these state trading countries can jump across the barrier to our private enterprise countries it would be a great help to them. At the present time only a few of the state trading nations are doing a good job of selling in western industrialized countries. Some have learned all the vagaries of our trade patterns, but most of them need help desperately.

There is in existence an example of a type of agency that would help these newly developing countries, which are just barely learning to govern their own affairs, and which have not the time, money or know-how to get out and develop a selling organization with 10,000 agents throughout the world. We have 10,000 people wanting to buy from them, but they have no single person with whom they can deal. I suggest we use the precedent of the great international trading companies which operate so successfully in the grain field, as well as the experience of our own Canadian grain companies. We should ask these companies to expand into other things that can be graded, shipped and stored, thus helping state trading nations which do not have the necessary mechanism. They would help them not only with their 10,000 agents, but these companies, with the great electronic computer brains they have available, can collect all the information necessary and know instantaneously what is happening with the smallest single sale.

This is not a matter of just dreaming. I have been in contact with the international companies dealing in grain and they are interested in this proposal. It is necessary, however, to persuade the state trading nations to get a grading system the world can accept, and to get their products into a form in which they can be stored and shipped, because these are the methods of modern, electronic sales.

The third suggestion I want to make is that we in Canada, and other industrialized nations, are going to be forced by the facts of necessity to give up our pride, and form purchasing boards which can go to individual nations that have a single selling agency and deal directly with it. On some types of products this will not be necessary, but on other types of products I can see no possibility of operating, except through purchasing boards. I do not want to take the time in these short remarks to outline the problems of that type of program, but it has to be considered.

My fourth suggestion is that more and more companies are going to have to use the combines amendment we passed in 1960 to allow companies to combine for export purposes. This is something we already have, but I suggest it in a slightly different connotation, so that any number of companies can form any number of combines. I take for example newsprint. We know the difficulty a state trading country has in dealing with us when it wants X number of tons of newsprint, because Canadian exports of newsprint are tied up with the United States or some other country. If our newsprint companies could take advantage of existing legislation, which was passed by the previous administration, and went into a combine, it would not be hard for them to get long term agreements, with the help of the minister and his department.

My fifth suggestion is also new. It is very clear that to maintain the rapid movement of goods between these new countries, and between them and the industrial countries, we are going to need some form of world trading bank. For many years ahead I am sure much of the trade will have to be on short term, medium term—and in view of the announcements of the last few months—long term credits. It will facilitate things a great deal if we can have a bank to handle that paper and move it around more rapidly so as to complete the deals more quickly and conveniently.

My sixth suggestion is a major one. I have just about five minutes left to deal with it, and so I can only touch on it, although I intended to emphasize it. It is now very clear that governments are feeling their way toward new concepts of bargaining. We have had this exemplified in the question of automobile parts between the United States and Canada, and more recently we hear rumours of some type of deal being talked about in relation to automobiles as a whole—and why not? Surely the experience of the last 10 or 12 years in tariff negotiations has shown there is not too much promise of change there; but if two countries can see some good in making a deal on a certain group of products, like iron and steel, why should they not make some sort of deal?

One of the odd things is that these deals sometimes come about without too much government interference. We have precedents for this, of course. Everyone remembers that Mr. R. B. Bennett negotiated a trade agreement with the United States between 1932 and 1935, an agreement which Mr. Mackenzie King signed two or three weeks after he came to power. It related to machinery made in the two countries, but originally automobiles were included. Even then it was recognized that the two economies were inter-related and that it was irrational, for example, for General Motors to have factories in production on each side of the border. This is not a new concept. Today we are still moving to realize it in a piecemeal way. I suggest that the best brains in Canada should be directed toward examining the techniques of setting up deals between countries based on growth rates. This is not a new idea, either. The O.E.C.D. accepted this principle in 1961 when it adopted 5 per cent as being the minimum growth rate. The former government met with officials of the Kennedy administration in 1961 and this question was discussed informally at that time. The Americans were not ready to proceed, then. It was not until 1963 that we had our answer publicly in the form of a statement by the secretary of the interior, Mr. Udall. He made a statement in the fall of that year that the United States were willing to discuss with Canada a general policy of pooling resources. But no answer came from the present government. I can only conclude that either this government did not understand the significance of what Mr. Udall was proposing, or that they were so set on keeping this pattern of the past—so set on following a path leading in the wrong direction, that they could not understand that a new administration in the United States was trying to interest what was then a new administration in Canada in a new concept of growth based on the principle—and this is the reason behind the suggestion as far as Canada is concerned—that if you have a comparative advantage it is a good deal to go in and offer that advantage in any bargaining session.

We know that because of the energy and natural resources available to us we can manufacture automobiles and many steel products cheaper than it can be done in the United States. We have all the basic ingredients of success in this field. Why does not United States capital come in to build the plants? The reason is obvious: They never know what their own government is likely to do when they try to send their products back into the United States. The Americans know they are likely to run out of iron by 1975 or 1980, not taking into account the new finds of ore in Alaska. They would like access to our stable supplies of iron. We could supply them part of our iron for the next 30 or 40 years and guarantee them a suitable deal. We, in return, want a faster growth rate in processing than we have at present. At the beginning, progress is slow but over the years the percentage climbs and we can visualize in 20, 30 or 40 years, equality with our neighbour. Why should there not be that equality? We have the energy and we have the resources. The capital will certainly move around, provided we get rid of the present Minister of Finance. Given equality in taxes and the movement of money we could hold our own with any country in the world; we could move into the world pattern with lower costs and a better chance of selling. If any hon. member doubts this, let him read the Paley report in the United States of 1952, and the latest report entitled "Resources for America's Future" dated in April, 1963.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

I have to agree with the minister that we must go all out and negotiate in GATT—the biggest bargaining table over pennies the world has ever seen. But to me, coming from an agricultural background, it is like putting your best hired hand to milking a dried out cow: You must put him on it because it is very difficult to get milk out of her. But look around and you can see miles of green pastures full of heifers newly freshened. That is where the milk is. Let us get cracking and go where the milk is.

I could go on to deal with a lot of other related matters but I think I have made my point.

Mr. Herridge: I followed the remarks of the previous speaker with a great deal of interest. I was much taken by his down to earth approach. The hon. member is one whom I consider as being a countryman with a lot of common sense in his attitude. He demonstrated this when he was a minister in the former government. However, I must be very careful before saying any more in that direction.

I do want to say I appreciate the courtesy shown by the Minister of Trade and Commerce when dealing with questions I have brought to his attention. I recognize his ability and keenness—and when an old socialist says that of a man who is, ultimately, a free enterpriser, he is going a long way. But I give credit where it is due from my point of view, and I recognize also the good work the officials of the department have been doing both in Canada and abroad.

From correspondence I have received and from what I know, I think everything possible should be done to upgrade the importance of our trade commissioners overseas in their dealings with countries abroad and with private interests in those countries. I think that throughout the years there has been a tendency in some quarters to look upon trade commissioners in the same way as my mother looked upon shopkeepers, that is, to feel they were not as important as were some other people. I do think everything should be done to upgrade the importance of our trade commissioners, in view of the great value of their work to the Canadian economy.

Before proceeding to make a few other remarks on the subject of trade I wish to say that I support wholeheartedly the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Danforth, particularly with regard to the need for a department of consumers. I trust the minister will give those suggestions serious consideration because I know that coming from a member of this group they were made on a strictly non-partisan basis in the best interests of all concerned.

I was particularly interested in his reference to the necessity for "truth in packaging" legislation. We were told that such legislation is in effect in the United States and I think it is greatly to be desired. Only two or three days ago a clock came into my hands. It had been sold or given away in return for coupons by the I.G.A. stores in Ottawa. This clock came enclosed in a carton about eight inches by 15 inches and in large letters across the side of the carton the words "Made in Canada" appear. The letters are at least an inch high. But if you take the clock out of the carton and look closely, in letters you almost have to use a microscope to read, on the bottom of the clock, appear the words "made in the United States". I think this is thoroughly dishonest packaging, and I believe there should be some legislation to protect the Canadian consumer against this type of deceit. This instance was brought to my attention by a consumer in Ottawa who was most indignant, because at the time of the transaction he thought he was getting a clock made in Canada.

I wish to make a few observations about our trade balance with Great Britain and the prospect of improving it from the point of view of the British as well as ourselves. We all realize the situation which exists with regard to our trade deficit, our deficit balance in dealings with the United States. The reverse is the case with regard to our balance of trade with the United Kingdom. I have always been of the opinion that we could do more in this respect, not in a large scale way but particularly with reference to the products and services which smaller organizations have to sell.

Because of my interest in this aspect I did inquire into what had been the result of a venture made by a relatively small company, compared with the large corporations we have in this country, which had come to Canada after being interested by some of our officials years ago. I am referring particularly to Gestetner (Canada) Ltd. I believe there is a possibility of interesting larger numbers of this type of British firm to locate in Canada. The activities of this company have been of great benefit to the Canadian economy since their arrival. I want to bring to the minister's attention that this company came to Canada, after the possibilities of the market were directed to their attention by some of our people, in November, 1924. They formed a Canadian subsidiary of the English company and opened a small store, I understand, in Toronto. Then they began plans for selling in the eastern Canadian market, and later throughout the whole of Canada. They have expanded until at the present time they have 19 branches operating in Canada and a staff of over 500 people. These employees are concerned with direct sales and service amounting in Canada alone to over $3\frac{1}{3}$ million.

All these Gestetners are imported from Great Britain; they are sold in Canada and they are serviced in Canada. This company has continually expanded because it sells an excellent product. But the point is, Mr. Chairman, that all the profits of this company have been plowed back in reinvestment in Canada, which I think is the sort of thing that assists the Canadian economy. I know that in terms of the very large companies dealing with our natural resources, and so on, this is not a large company; but I do think there is an opportunity to interest more of these companies in Great Britain to establish similar branches in Canada in order to assist the British people with the marketing of their goods and to lessen the gap, shall I say, between our sales to Great Britain and our purchases from Great Britain.

The company has had excellent relationships with its employees; it has an excellent pension plan, and so on. Its policy is to sell first class products and provide first class service, to plow all the profits back into expansion in this country and the improvement of the firm's operations. As the result of this policy, this company which started in 1924 is worth over 200 times what it was at that time.

I give this one illustration, Mr. Chairman, because I was interested in seeing how this type of company developed in Canada and what possibilities there were for the development of similar companies. I do urge the minister and his officials to give some consideration to cultivating particularly what I consider to be a fertile field in this direction, because the British manufacturers produce some very excellent products, in many respects similar to those produced by the company I have mentioned, namely Gestetner (Canada) Ltd.

[Translation]

Mr. Lessard (Lake St. John): I have some very brief comments to make in connection with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and I especially want to raise a point mentioned yesterday, or Tuesday more precisely, by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Prittie) with respect to sanctions some American groups would like to see imposed on the Canadian aluminum industry so that it would not be as competitive on their markets as it is now.

I raise this point because I consider that the aluminum industry needs, just as any other sector of industry, a reasonable measure of assistance from the Canadian government. The day before yesterday, when this question was raised, the minister answered rather briefly and said that the government had made representations to the American authorities on this matter. He did not use exactly these words, but when asked the following question:

> Has the government made representations to the government of the United States regarding proposed changes in tariff duties on certain classes of aluminum products imported into Canada?

He answered:

> Yes, Mr. Speaker.

I feel, consequently, that this government is aware of the problem which we face at the present time and has made recommendations in this respect. The minister must be aware of the importance it has for the Canadian economy particularly in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and British Columbia where those aluminum plants are located. In the Saguenay area particularly, if there were some kind of embargo or an increase in tariff on aluminum products exported to the United States, it would be a harsh blow for the economy of my area, since for all practical purposes the Saguenay area relies almost exclusively on the aluminum and pulp and paper industries to keep up its economy.

I believe our minister of commerce gets through a lot of work, but when he speaks later, I should like him to tell us what he has done to prevent the Americans from carrying out this threat against the aluminum industry of Canada.

He will have to take into consideration that this Canadian company is probably our largest international company, and I believe that we are justified in being proud of it since it has subsidiaries in almost every part of the world. It acts as a very good ambassador for Canada abroad, through the exchanges of its Canadian personnel and that of its subsidiaries all over the world.

I believe it does a very good job, which promotes better understanding between the various countries and automatically helps to restore the economy of some countries. I have in mind the facts I personally witnessed while working for Alcan, where numerous engineers from underdeveloped countries were also working to complete their technical know-how and to go back later to their own countries in order to operate Alcan plants there. I think it is the duty of the minister, and mine also, to raise this point.

Should that come about, it would deal a heavy blow to the Canadian economy; to our trade balance with the United States, since 60 per cent of Alcan's sales of semi-fabricated aluminum products go to the United States, representing about $1 million annually. Surely the minister sees the danger and I hope he will do everything he can to make necessary representations in this regard.

Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Hamilton) dealt a moment ago with the problem of the automobile industry. I would like to go one step further and discuss the problem facing the Canadian automobile industry and arising out of the control of that industry by American parent companies.

Last year this government through the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) introduced a program to increase the percentage of parts made in Canada and going into the manufacture of automobiles. But, in my opinion, we have before us a glaring example of the urgent need to rapidly increase the percentage of parts going into the manufacture of automobiles sold in Canada. What we need in Canada is automobile parts which are 100 per cent made in Canada.

There is a strike going on at the plants of General Motors in the United States and we find that Canadian subsidiaries of that company in Oshawa are also affected. As a matter of fact, it is reported in the press today that more than 5,000 Canadian workers are now idle because of a shortage of parts on the assembly lines. I think that is conclusive evidence of the growing need for the Canadian automobile industry to become 100 per cent Canadian and, therefore, independent from the United States industry.

In the past some Canadian industries were denied the right to export their products to other countries because they had to yield to the policy dictated to them by the American parent company. I think the Americans are quite wrong in maintaining such a situation in the automobile industry, because to my mind they should realize that the Canadian market is now large enough to justify 100 per cent Canadian production and the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce who are in close contact with their American opposite numbers should strive to make them accept the Canadian point of view and realize that such a situation, to a certain extent, is the cause of some of the prevailing grievances against the Americans.

While the United States is a very powerful neighbour that we respect they must also respect our country's economy and in allowing such a situation to prevail in Canada, I think they are doing a disservice, not only to their own country, but also to Canada. If the Americans wish to maintain in Canada manufacturing plants under their control, they will have to allow them to export to the United States without cost. Indeed, I trust that the agreement the Canadian government is hoping to sign with the American government in order to remove tariff barriers on Canadian exports to the United States will be a success and, as far as I am concerned, I would support the complete removal of such tariff barriers between Canada and the United States.

I admit that some industries will perhaps be affected, but on the other hand, I am aware of the fact that this would help the establishment of many other industries which would be able to expand and be more competitive on the American market.

Mr. Chairman, there is also another matter I wanted to discuss. I have in mind the publicity that the Department of Trade and Commerce is supposed to give to Canadian products.

We all know that the Department of Trade and Commerce is very much interested in the sale of wheat. Of course, it is important for the department to do so, because wheat is a most important product. It is interesting to note that we can ship this product abroad and have Canadians take advantage of the operation, but on the other hand there are other sectors of Canadian industry which need help. I wonder if the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce strive as hard to find markets for farm produce other than wheat.

For instance, we have the problem with respect to cheese production. That industry is now faced with a rather difficult problem, especially in eastern Canada.

For many years farm production in eastern Canada was looked upon as limited to dairy products used in the manufacture of powdered milk and cheese.

In my opinion, it is a mistake to a certain extent, to force our farmers to change their type of production, ostensibly because there is no longer any market for the kind of dairy production in which they were engaged in the past.

As a matter of fact, there is a great deal of evidence in support of the contention that the demand for dairy products will be increasing, like that for all other products, for that matter and I believe that we must promote the dairy industry so as to provide for the needs which will increase proportionately.

In my opinion the Department of Industry should strive to find and secure a market for Canadian cheese in various countries. I know that England is one of our good customers as far as Canadian cheese is concerned, but when we look into the possibility of producing this commodity we cannot but conclude that we have still a long way to go.

A great deal could be done to stabilize the farm industry in eastern Canada, if a market could be found for cheese and for other dairy products.

It is a well known fact that Canada produces a high quality cheese, and I am of the opinion that the officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce should do the promotional work required. In a word, they should be the salesmen needed to find the markets required for this product.

Mr. Chairman, there is another point I would like to deal with. It has been discussed often, but for a while it seemed to have been overlooked. The problem with which this industry is faced is a very difficult one, inasmuch as this industry was established in Canada many years ago.

Several of our Canadian spinning-mills forgot or neglected over the years, to modernize and now they find it difficult to compete with the production of other countries, particularly of Japan.

The textile industry employs a great number of workers, and the federal government should grant it very special attention.

I know that the minister must take into account existing international agreements and that he must avoid protecting any individual mill, because that might inspire the leaders of the countries to which we export to enforce certain restrictions.

But considering that the textile industry employs many workers, I think that it is an industry which especially deserves the minister's attention and when he or his officials go to Japan, for instance, to discuss with their Japanese colleagues, the desirability of increasing Japanese exports in Canada, I think that they should bear in mind the serious implications which could result from any increase of Japanese exports in Canada, so far as textiles are concerned.

There are two major factors, in my opinion, which should be taken into consideration with regard to the identification of imported products. There is certainly a deficiency in that respect. If the Canadian people could more easily ascertain the origin of the products, I think that with a proper educational campaign, they could be convinced to buy Canadian products instead of imported ones. In brief, if the trade mark or the identification of the imported product were clearly shown, I think it would greatly encourage Canadians to buy more goods made in Canada, as they would realize that they are thus helping to provide employment for their fellow countrymen.

Such are the comments I wanted to make and the points I wished to bring to the minister's attention in this connection.

I trust that when the minister takes the floor a little later on he will give me an answer to the various aspects peculiar to the aluminum industry that I have brought to his attention.

[Text]

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, in rising to take part in the debate on the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I think it only fitting to refer to some of the remarks made by the member for Qu'Appelle, the former minister of agriculture, who set out six points in reference to trade in this country which should be taken very seriously by the minister.

Perhaps I do not need to say this, because it has been said on many occasions, but Canada is always in the unique position of being a country with surpluses, whereas most countries of the world are countries with shortages. Our problems are always related to surpluses, whether we are dealing with grain, petroleum or coal. At the present time, as well as in the past, we have difficulty competing in so far as our surpluses are concerned, and we must compete because without trade Canada would fail. I should like to direct my remarks particularly in respect of two industries in Alberta, which I am sure the minister has considered. I refer to the coal and petroleum industries.

I do not wish to spend much time talking about the coal industry in Alberta, because I have spoken in this regard on several occasions in the House of Commons, but I do wish to point out several things. It is a well known fact that the production of coal in Alberta and throughout Canada is declining because of competition with the natural gas and other petroleum products industries. Canada has one eighth of the entire coal supplies of the world and there was a time in the history of this country when people in the coal industry felt we were exporting too much coal because we were likely to run short. I might say this is the same attitude now taken by a great many people in respect of the natural gas industry. I wonder what those people would say today about their attitude toward coal exports. On one other occasion I said that we in Canada went to bed with our coal, and if we continue our present attitude we may well have to go to bed with some of the natural gas in this country.

For many years in Alberta I have advocated the export of not only coal but of natural gas. The only substantial market left in the world, as far as we are concerned, for the sale of our coal, is the Japanese market, and it is interesting to note that the only way we can maintain our position in the sale of coal to that market is by paying a subvention on the per ton shipment of coal. It must seem strange to individuals engaged in the coal industry that we have to use taxpayers' money to help this minor resource compete. There are two sides to that story. We must always remember that by paying a subvention we not only help this industry compete in world markets but also provide employment for miners.

The matter of coal subventions has been before parliament on several occasions and is the subject of a number of orders in council. Perhaps I may be allowed to review these for a moment. On December 5, 1939 the subvention on coal for sale to Japan was $1 per ton. In 1949 the subvention was $1 per ton. The subvention remained at $1 per ton until 1957 when, on July 22, it was increased to $2.25 per ton. On April 9, 1958 by order in council the subvention was increased to $4 per ton. In 1959 it was increased to $4.50 per ton. On April 2, 1962 the subvention was reduced to $3.50 per ton, and on October 25, 1962 it was further reduced to $3.15 per ton. One can readily see that subventions are necessary in respect of this industry, not only to assist it to compete, but to provide employment for miners. An increase in trade is naturally followed by an increase in employment, but I am sure hon. members from the maritimes would agree with me that even during boom periods in the rest of Canada there is somewhat of a depression there and in other coal producing areas, because it is a seasonal industry.

We have been able to increase our coal exports to somewhere between 700,000 and 800,000 tons. Last year I think the export of coal increased to 845,000 tons while at the same time the subvention was lowered.

Mr. W. C. Whittaker, the president of the coal operators association of western Canada, suggested that the industry would benefit from a reduction in transportation costs. We have talked in this house a great deal about rail abandonment. I suggest that we must work through the Department of Transport, in conjunction with other departments, to organize our transportation facilities in such a way that transportation costs can be reduced. Mr. Whittaker made a speech last month at Lake Louise, Alberta, which was reported in the Calgary Herald, and I should like to refer briefly to that speech. He was referring, as I said earlier, to the reduction of transportation costs, and I am sure everyone will agree that if such a reduction was followed by a reduction in subventions on coal, it would be to the advantage of the coal operators of Canada and the taxpayers as a whole. In such event perhaps the coal industry in Canada would be able to compete with the Australian coal industry, which is one of the largest suppliers of coal to Japan. Mr. Whittaker said at Lake Louise that unless the present rate of $6 per ton cost for railroad transportation and ship loading was reduced to about $4.50, coal exports could well pass out of the picture in Canada.

I should like to congratulate the minister upon his fair handling of subventions on coal. Everyone has paid him a compliment today about his opening remarks, and I should also like to be in that positive position. The export of coal from Canmore and the Crowsnest pass may well range this year from 900,000 to 1,000,000 tons. That increase in exports would create an increase in employment in those areas. Mr. Whittaker suggests that we must cut transportation costs from $6 per ton to $4.50 per ton. I remember when we not only exported more coal but used more coal for home consumption, and at that time the coal was being transported on mixed cargo trains. With our streamlined transportation industry of today coal is moved in trains strictly limited to the transportation of coal. I am sure the transportation industry would be delighted by an increase in the production in coal transportation. Serious consideration should be given to some method of cutting costs of transportation so as to help the Canadian coal industry compete for the Japanese market, which would naturally be followed by an increase in the amount of coal transported by those railway companies.

When I was in Japan in 1958, with an industrial firm rather than in connection with my duties as a member of parliament, I was talking with one of the major steel manufacturers of that country who told me that the difference of 10 cents to 20 cents in the cost of coal per ton would have a serious effect on their decision as to where they would buy a particular kind of coking coal. Ten or 20 cents does not seem to be a great deal of money, but when exchanged for Japanese currency in Japan it is indeed something to be considered.

In this regard Australia has been able to outdo us in competing for the market and that is the reason we have had to keep the subvention as high as it has been. It was the Conservative government that established the subvention. The minister has admitted that many of these programs were initiated by the Conservatives and have been carried on by the present administration. When we established the subvention we opened up a market for this coal. They now know in Japan that we have good hard, bituminous coal mined in the mountains. Our quality and kind of coal can compete with any other kind of coal in the world. Therefore when we open up a market we can then cut down the subvention and cut down the cost to the taxpayer. So this does prove that this method is the way to open up avenues to get trade. Maybe this is what the hon. member for Qu'Appelle meant when he was dealing with those countries where they do not have as high a standard of living, and suggested that we should open up avenues of trade so that in future they will be able to compete with the more wealthy nations.

So the first recommendation is that we have to take a hard look at costs. The coal operators themselves cannot do anything about transportation costs. They can do something about the costs of mining. I might say to the minister, and I do not say this in too critical a way, that when I first went to the Canmore area in the foothills of the Rocky mountains, and right in the Rocky mountains, unemployment was rampant everywhere. Up to that time this coal had been used by the railways, but with automation they changed to petroleum and all these miners were put out of work and the coal operators were placed in an almost bankrupt position. When you think that in one coal area of Alberta there were 20 mines at one time, I believe, and today there are only two left you can see the importance of this matter.

Once again, with the scientific developments that are taking place and the by-product commodities that may be made out of coal we never know when coal will become more important. It is well within the imagination, and I said this eight or nine years ago I believe, that some day coal will be processed at the minehead, piped like natural gas across the country and will compete with natural gas. Nylon stockings and many other things can be made out of coal and I say the coal industry is a long way from dead. During the period of transformation this government, because it is their responsibility just as it was our responsibility when we were in office, has to keep these mines operating. We assumed the responsibility of keeping them alive and, if Mr. Whittaker is right, unless we can cut the transportation costs it is impossible to compete even with the subsidy as it is today.

An hon. Member: And loading costs.

Mr. Woolliams: That is true, off the docks. As I pointed out, one of the great steel producers of Japan said that a difference of 10 or 15 cents a ton decides where they will buy this product. The minister may run into something I have encountered when he goes to Alberta. He will find that our Social Credit friends will stand on the platform—I see they have looked up immediately—and they will blame—I cannot use the word in the house I should like to use—all governments because we import coal into Canada. I got the latest figures today from the coal board, and in 1963-64 we imported 13,880,000 tons of coal. When the Conservatives came into office Canada was importing some 20 million tons of coal. I think that is correct because I have made speeches on that point before.

Because of the policies implemented in the maritimes and, of course—I want to be fair in this regard—because of the competition of natural gas in the large urban centres of eastern Canada we have been able to cut down our coal imports. But there is one great fiction always uttered in western Canada and you have to explode it at least once a year before it gets away on you. The Social Crediters will stand on the platform, especially in the soft coal areas where people are out of work, and blame everybody but themselves. The former minister of labour came to speak in my riding and he said that the worst thing he had ever seen was the living conditions in the East Coulee, Rosedale and Nacmine areas around Drumheller. He said he had never seen worse poverty than in this soft coal mining area.

These Social Crediters send speakers down there and they say that Canada is importing coal and that is the reason the miners are out of work. This is a fiction. The coal we bring into Canada is hard bituminous coal and the coal that is mined in the Drumheller valley is sub-bituminous, soft coal which is not suitable to be used for the same purpose for which the imported coal is used. The coal mined at Canmore and the coal mined in Nova Scotia are similar in energy and quality. This kind of fiction probably wins votes at the right time, but it causes a lot of headaches which people have to try to iron out afterwards. I believe this myth has now been exploded but I have heard it on many platforms. That particular coal is domestic coal and is not the kind of coal I am talking about.

I want to complete my remarks in that regard. We in Alberta are interested in the export of coal to Japan. We are interested in the export of coal from the Canmore and Crowsnest areas. A subvention was necessary to open that market, and to be able to keep it we must cut transportation and loading costs wherever we can. I would ask the minister to give this matter serious thought. If he really desires, and I believe he does, to carry out the important program in this regard that was started by the Conservative government, this is one thing that must be looked into if the program is going to survive.

I want to say something about another industry which is in competition with coal. I suppose one might say it is very difficult to talk about both industries at the same time when they are in competition with one another, but we have to be realists. They are in competition, and I must say that in many ways the natural gas industry has been able to undercut the costs of the coal industry, and that is one of the reasons for the problems of the coal industry.

I am glad to see that the minister does not belong to that school of thought—I know he does not—that used to prevail in Alberta, the Prowse school of thought under which the provincial Liberals at that time opposed the export of any natural gas because they were frightened there would not be enough for use in the foreseeable future, or enough today. The Conservatives set up the national energy board, and I want to say something about that.

If I may review the situation first, up to 1957, I believe, very little natural gas was exported. One of the promises in the 1957 election which I heard the Leader of the Opposition make was that when elected the Conservatives would set up a national energy board. That promise was kept. It was a good promise and a good program. It is interesting to note that in 1959 we exported to the United States $16.5 million worth of natural gas. In 1960 it increased to $22.9 million, in 1961 to 40.6 million, in 1962 to $87.5 million, and in 1963 it almost reached the $100 million mark, or $93.8 million. The departmental officials have projected the increase. I know I am not breaking any confidence because they are always available to give expert advice if you seek it. I have had the best of co-operation from the experts in these departments. The officials hope that it will increase by another 9 per cent.

What does all this mean? With the imbalance of trade between the United States and Canada, and still worse the imbalance of dollars between our two countries, this dramatic step in exporting gas has helped bring about a balance of payments. The Department of Trade and Commerce alone cannot solve the problem, but with proper government policy, and working in conjunction with the Minister of Finance, every means of encouragement should be given to those people who form companies to build pipe lines to export natural gas, from Alberta, Saskatchewan, British Columbia or whatever other area produces it.

The Borden commission was set up by the previous government, and from it and the reports emanating from the department, and from the Canada Year Book we have learned we have enough guaranteed natural gas in Canada for energy uses, not only for industry but also for domestic use during the next 30 years. If we continue to export it and if the Canadian consumer market increases, then of course we will get more exploration. At present exploration is taking place in the Northwest Territories where there have been some large findings, and now that the C.C.F. government has been defeated in Saskatchewan some natural gas may come to light that has been kind of tapped off in secret from the public.

Mr. Knowles: Five o'clock.

Mr. Woolliams: I knew that would bring some life to the hon. member. Previously when I was dealing with certain benefits in income tax concerning pipe lines I said these benefits should be extended to other pipe lines. I believe there is still enough private enterprise spirit left in western Canada that if people could only get income tax benefits they would form new pipe line companies and invest Canadian money in exploration for natural gas and petroleum products, when there is a demand for them.

Mr. Knowles: Five o'clock.

Mr. Woolliams: Aren't you interested in energy?

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friend seems to have lots of it, but is it not five o'clock?

The Chairman: Since it has been called five o'clock it is my duty to leave the chair in order that the house may proceed to the consideration of private members' business.

Progress reported.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there a suggestion that the house should suspend the hour for private members' business?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely private bills, notices of motions (papers), and public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

BELL TELEPHONE COMPANY OF CANADA

The house resumed from Thursday, October 1, consideration in committee of Bill No. S-27, respecting The Bell Telephone Company of Canada—Mr. Brown—Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Number of directors.

The Chairman: When the committee last adjourned we were considering clause 1 of the bill with an amendment thereto proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming. Is the committee ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, we are discussing Bill No. S-27, an act respecting The Bell Telephone Company of Canada and the amendment submitted by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) to the effect that if five new directors were added to the Bell Telephone Company, three would be appointed by the federal government.

I consider the amendment to be very sensible. Seventeen would be appointed by the shareholders and three by the government.

Some members may ask why should the government intervene? Needless to say it is not a matter of nationalizing the Bell Telephone Company, for in that case I would object for several reasons. First of all, I must say that the Bell Telephone Company is giving good service to the Canadian citizens at the present time. Anybody who wishes to have a phone can get it and in no time at all. The rates are not too high, except perhaps in the case of long distance calls. Moreover, I see two great benefits deriving from the fact that the Bell Telephone Company is a private enterprise. First, its services are tax-free, as far as the people are concerned. We are accustomed to the deficits, often substantial ones, shown by the majority of the crown companies and which are at the expense of the taxpayers. I suggest then that to have a nation-wide telephone service, available to everybody, and not requesting subsidies from the government to finance their deficit at the end of the year, is something of a tremendous value to Canadians.

The second advantage, and not the least, is that at the end of the year, not only does the company not request subsidies, but it pays taxes which fill the federal treasury and enables the government to earmark more money for social security, hospitalization insurance, family allowances and old age pensions. Naturally, we should be even more pleased if we knew this money was not being spent as interest on the debt; but in any event, I have mentioned two great advantages which make it clear why the Bell Telephone Company of Canada should not be nationalized, or handed over to the state. We have seen many cases where, as soon as a company is nationalized, deficits begin to accumulate; red tape and bureaucracy take over, and we are strongly against it.

But if three members were then appointed by the government, the majority of the directors could still continue to administer the company in a normal way, that is, to make profits. We have no objections to that because, any Canadian citizen who has money available for investment, like some members of this house probably have, may invest it in companies such as the Bell Telephone Company or a pulp and paper mill company and thus assist in developing the country.

Canadian citizens should be able to invest money in their national companies and help to develop their country. If there are profits at the end of the year, the shareholders will draw dividends, and this will prompt other Canadian citizens to make investments in other similar Canadian companies. Every time Canadian citizens invest in Canadian companies, it is a good thing, because such companies foster the prosperity of the nation.

Therefore, there would still be seven directors to see to it that the Bell Telephone Company operates according to set standards, the three directors appointed by the government being there to see about protecting public interest. What is the public interest in a company such as the Bell Telephone? It may be thought of in terms of rates. The three government appointed directors would look after the public interest, and would make sure that telephone customers can get the best service possible with the least possible expense.

Would three directors appointed by the government have enough influence on the whole group of shareholders to enable them to look after the public interest in that field? At the present time there are 15 who are businessmen, directors, men of action. Hereafter, there would be five more, including two appointed by the shareholders and three by the government.

I am wondering if the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters) would not have been better advised to raise that percentage, requesting that five out of 20 directors, or a quarter, be appointed by other people than the shareholders?

For instance, three of those directors could be appointed by the federal government, another one by the 10 Canadian provinces after reaching an agreement, or two might be appointed by the federal government and two by the ten provinces and a fifth one by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities since the municipalities form another public body; there are municipalities throughout Canada and they avail themselves of the Bell Telephone Company services.

If we increase by five the number of directors of that company, it seems to me that instead of suggesting action or a compromise as was done by the hon. member for Timiskaming, it would be more appropriate to suggest a good solution, by saying: These five new directors will be appointed on the following basis: two by the federal government, two by the ten provincial governments, after reaching an agreement, and one by the Canadian Federation of Mayors and Municipalities.

In that case 25 per cent of the members of the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company would represent various public bodies. It would not amount to nationalization exactly but it might satisfy those who want better representation of public interest in a company of national importance, a company that has no competitors and, in fact, operates more or less as a monopoly.

In this type of company public interest would be more satisfactorily safeguarded if five rather than three members were appointed by the public bodies. Five out of 20 is equal to 25 per cent of the board of directors, whereas three out of 20 only amounts to 15 per cent.

So, instead of having three new directors appointed by the federal government, two would be appointed by the federal government, two by the provincial governments and one by the municipalities as a whole.

There would be then representatives from public organizations, at all levels, within a national company such as the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. This company is doing business throughout Canada on a non-competitive basis. The individual Canadian citizen, be he a member of parliament, a prime minister, an alderman or anyone else, has no choice between two companies. If there is only one set of telephone cables passing in front of your home or your office, you have to use them. In fact, there is no competition.

It is a good thing that some of the decisions taken by the directors of such a company be influenced by members of public organizations, but not entirely so, not even by a majority, for it has been proven that whenever a majority of businessmen are appointed directors of a company, we can be sure that the company is better managed than by government officials or bureaucrats.

That is why I intend to move an amendment to the amendment of the hon. member for Timiskaming, to the effect that not three directors be appointed by the federal government but that five directors be appointed by various public agencies, namely, two by the federal government, two by the provincial governments and one by the union of municipalities. It is merely a matter of substituting the figure five to the figure three.

I think I pointed out that it was a good thing that the businessmen who at present manage the Bell Telephone Company of Canada continue to do so and hold a majority of the votes in the company. However, on the other hand, they would be assisted by 25 per cent of the directors who would represent the public and see to it that the interests of every Canadian be better safeguarded whenever a decision is taken.

Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a reasonable suggestion.

If the telephone company finds that 15 directors are not enough and wishes to increase their number, it means that the company has greatly expanded and is doing so much business that 15 directors will not suffice. We are therefore in agreement, since the company itself realizes that 15 directors are not enough to supervise its operations.

But the five directors are added to the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company, these five new directors will have to bring something new, something which does not exist at the present time within the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

It is true that there are businessmen, but representatives of the public interests are missing.

Working for a profit is not everything—it is the purpose of any business firm, of any concern—there ought to be some directors to see to it that the public interest is looked after. I am not saying that it is the case at the present time; maybe it is. But the public interest would still be better taken care of if five directors out of 20, or 25 per cent of the company's directors were appointed in a more specific manner in order to look after the public interest, two at the federal level as I suggested, two at the provincial level, and one at the municipal level.

Moreover, it would be possible to change this formula again. This is merely a suggestion. The school boards might also like to have a representative or a director on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company. In that case it might be possible to introduce a further subamendment in order to include a sixth director who would represent the various school boards in Canada. In this way all public bodies in the country would be represented. We would then be sure that the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada would better cover our citizens as a whole.

At the present time the board of directors of the company only represents the shareholders' interests. This is necessary, I admit, and we recognize that the majority of the directors must represent the shareholders. But we would also like to see all our public bodies represented in a company of this kind so that all points of view can be expressed within the board of directors.

If 20 directors are not enough, we are ready to increase the number beyond that figure so that everyone will be represented.

There is nothing—and I am sure that hon. members will agree on this point—there is nothing either to prevent labour unions also from the privilege of appointing a director to the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. Let us keep in mind that there are more than five million workers in Canada, five million wage-earners, most of whom are telephone users, and whenever they use the telephone they have no choice but to subscribe to the company whose cables run in front of their homes. Yet, when policy decisions are to be made, those people have no say in the matter.

Therefore, it would seem to me normal that the workers themselves be entitled to choose a representative on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company.

Therefore, before my time is up I would like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) the following:

that the figure "five" be substituted to the figure "three" in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Thus, five members only of the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada will be appointed by public bodies. If this is not sufficient, more can be added, so that the federal and provincial governments, municipalities, school boards and labour unions be represented on the board.

The farmers should not be forgotten either, because, unfortunately, they have no say in the matter. And they are possibly the ones who suffer most from certain attitudes taken by the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

It is obvious that farm houses are more distant from one another than city houses, and that is why not all hamlets or farms in Canada have telephones. Now if farmers were represented on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, they would be in a position, they would be in a better position to suggest to the company that telephone service be provided, not only in towns, but also on farms across the country. I think that would be of benefit to a large segment of our population, that is the farmers, just as it would be a good thing to have a representative of the labour unions.

Let us not forget businessmen. If we go into a business office or a commercial establishment and look at its telephone account at the end of a month, we find that quite a few long distance calls have been made, and that they run into quite a bit of money.

If the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada were to include a representative of every social class, those representatives might be in a position to suggest to the management various improvements, especially in the matter of long-distance charges.

The Bell Telephone Company of Canada would benefit in many ways if all classes of citizens in Canada were represented on its board of directors.

Even then, Mr. Chairman, I am overlooking some. If some unemployed worker were appointed director, perhaps might such a person, sitting on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, suggest that, during periods of unemployment, the unemployed should not be requested to pay their telephone bills. The unemployed need the telephone as much as anyone else. In cases of emergency, to call the hospital, the police or the fire department, they need the telephone service as much as any other class of society.

If there were an unemployed person on the board of directors of that company to suggest that an individual who is out of work should not have to pay his telephone bill, that again would be beneficial to society. It would be another benefit among all those which the Canadian people are getting from a company such as the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

I may have overlooked other benefits, but I begin to realize that for the Bell Telephone 20 directors would not be enough—

The Chairman: Order. The hon. member for Lafontaine would like to direct a question to the hon. member.

Mr. Grégoire: Very well.

Mr. Lachance: The hon. member—

The Chairman: Order. Before the hon. member puts his question, I must inform the hon. member for Lapointe that his time has now expired. Therefore no question can be put to him without the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I have the unanimous consent of the house.

The Chairman: I am sorry, but the hon. member did not get unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me I have heard "yeas" to the effect that I had unanimous consent.

The Chairman: Perhaps, but the Chair heard objections to unanimous consent.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, there was no objection on the part of the Liberals.

The Chairman: Order. It is proposed by the hon. member for Lapointe that the word "five" in the amendment be substituted for the word "three".

Is the committee ready for the question?

[Text]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to say that I do not think it really matters whether it is three out of 20 or five out of 20 in so far as the difference between those two numbers is concerned. The principal point of having some representative of the general public on the board of directors is well worth while supporting.

The Chairman: Is the committee ready for the question?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) to repeat his remarks, which I did not hear very well since my earphone was not properly adjusted? May I ask him to repeat his remarks, which seemed to the point?

[Text]

Mr. Howard: I merely said, Mr. Chairman, that in essence it does not really matter whether it is three out of 20, or five out of 20, or four out of 20, or some other number or percentage around that figure. The principal point that we should concern ourselves with, which initially was raised by my colleague from Timiskaming and which we have been dealing with for many, many years as a political party, is that the general public should somehow or other have some say in the internal operations of a public service utility such as Bell Telephone.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, may I say that I believe that in committee of the whole I am entitled to speak again on this subject and to qualify my idea. I shall then explain further my opinion, for the benefit of the member for Skeena.

I agree with the hon. member for Skeena that it is not necessarily the figure three or the figure five that counts. What matters is the principle that there be also representatives of public bodies.

In my opinion—and I believe the hon. member for Skeena shares such views—there are many public bodies which would benefit from some representation within the Bell Telephone Company of Canada: the decisions taken might be improved and the interests of the various levels of society better protected.

I suggested five directors out of a total of 20, but perhaps I should have suggested even more, for I would also like someone to represent the federal government on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada. I just gave that figure as an example because the provinces and municipalities should also have a say at board meetings. In other words, the three levels of government should each have a representative. In addition, I should like the labour unions to have a representative and, as I said a moment ago, the farmers should also have a voice; they may be the class of people where one finds the highest proportion of citizens who are deprived of telephone service on account of the fact that farms are too far from one another.

I further stated that a director should speak for the unemployed since such a person could suggest that an unemployed subscriber should be exempted from paying his telephone bill during the time he is out of work.

Then, it requires more than the three directors mentioned by the hon. member for Timiskaming in his amendment. But I stated clearly that I want the majority of directors to be representatives of the shareholders of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, because they must administer the savings of those people. It must not become a state-controlled corporation, but remain a company managed by a majority of directors representing the shareholders.

However, it would be helpful to have, in addition, representatives of all public bodies so that they could bring forward their views, as well as those of all classes of Canadian society.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, if I may be allowed to finish my comments, I would draw attention to the fact that, when I was listing the various social groups that could be represented within the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, I mentioned five directors appointed by public bodies but I unfortunately forgot to mention those who would be appointed by various social groups which should also be represented on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company.

If the amendment and subamendment are adopted, it would then be probably appropriate to ask that the number of directors of the Bell Telephone Company be increased not from 15 to 20, but from 15 to 25, as an increase from 15 to 20 would allow for representation of the public bodies, and that of 20 to 25 would allow for representation of the various social classes of Canada.

This is very important, and I should like to point out that, when all the social classes in Canada shall have representatives on the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, every Canadian citizen will be proud of it.

Mr. Boulanger: Parish priests, bishops, the whole clergy.

[Text]

Mr. Brown: Mr. Chairman, I submit that the hon. member is not in order. He is not confining his remarks either to the amendment moved or to his own amendment.

Mr. Howard: On the contrary, Mr. Chairman. If that is to be considered a serious point of order may I point out that I have been listening attentively to the hon. member for Lapointe and he is precisely and exactly dealing with the number of directors to be appointed by the governor in council namely five, and he is explaining in what manner they should be appointed and whom they should represent.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Chairman, I believe the hon. member for Lapointe is quite in order when he deals with the subamendment and the amendment calling for more directors to look after the operations of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

To me the hon. member for Lapointe is not making a mistake, he is not off the track; on the contrary, he is quite right in suggesting that the number of directors be increased to 25, 30 and even 35 according to need, so that all public organizations may be represented in a public telephone company.

[Text]

The Chairman: Order. A point of order has been raised by the hon. member for Brantford. I feel that the remarks of the hon. member for Lapointe are relevant to the amendment and to the subamendment and I would invite him to continue his remarks.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I thank you, and just to show the benefits that would result from such an amendment, I think the number of directors should be increased to 25 instead of 20 and that the five new directors be appointed by the social classes. A worker would be proud to see on a telephone pole the picture of his union representative who would be a member of the board of directors of the company.

Then all labour in general would endorse the decisions taken by the Bell Telephone Company, since there would be labour representatives on the company's board of directors.

Mr. Chairman, there is another important point. If a representative of the farming community were appointed to the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, taking into consideration the number of telephone poles planted on farm lands, farmers would be quite proud to see a picture of their representative on those telephone poles. That would be an asset for the Bell Telephone Company.

At first sight this may seem odd, but it must be admitted that then all sections of our society would be represented within the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

The Bell Telephone Company is a large firm which serves our entire population, and that is exactly the reason why, from Vancouver to Halifax, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, all classes of our society must be represented on the board of directors.

Mr. Chairman, I think the member for Mercier has a question to ask. If he rises, I will be glad to answer it, but if he remains seated, I will not hear the question.

Mr. Caouette: The number of telephone poles would have to be increased.

Mr. Grégoire: If the member for Mercier has a question to ask, I will be pleased to answer it.

Mr. Chairman, Bill S-27 reads as follows:

An act respecting the Bell Telephone Company of Canada.

Under this bill, we are asking:

That it be enacted as hereinafter set forth and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:

Mr. Chairman, this shows that, to have their charter amended, the directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada have to call on the members of the House of Commons. They are asking us to amend section 8 of chapter 67 of the statutes of 1880.

Since they are asking us it is a pleasure today, to offer some suggestions which we think are constructive and proper and also beneficial for the Bell Telephone Company of Canada itself.

Mr. Chairman, I agreed that the number of members of the board of directors be increased to 20. I regret that it is only 20 because I would like to see the number raised to 25, to allow for the representation of ten public bodies.

I see that the hon. member for Timiskaming is indicating that he will introduce an amendment to raise that number to 25 instead of 20. Then we shall support him, at least for the first 20 directors. When they have five instead of three, five to represent public bodies, then we can make a new attempt.

Mr. Regan: You will never get a line.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) wishes to ask me a question. If he will stand up, I shall be pleased to give him an answer, but if he remains seated, he is out of order because standing order No. 5 requires that any hon. member wishing to speak must rise in his place and take off his hat—

The Chairman: May I suggest to the hon. members that they be somewhat more serious, and I would ask the hon. member to limit his remarks to the amendment and the subamendment now before us.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I am convinced that when the five million workers read the proposal to represent the working class in the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, they will not look upon it as a matter of levity, nor will the farmers, the municipalities and the provincial governments. If the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) wants to ask me a question—

[Text]

Mr. Regan: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question? In view of the fact that the company would be able to pay better wages and offer better working conditions, and I am sure they could do so if all accounts were paid, would the hon. member agree that one of the new directors should be appointed as a collector to collect all outstanding debts?

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, later I shall move an amendment for the purpose of adding another director who would present to the board the suggestions of all citizens whose payment of telephone bills is overdue and who find it difficult to pay their telephone bills. People who cannot pay their telephone bills far outnumber those who can pay them easily. Therefore, if there is a director appointed to bring forward the views of those whose telephone bills are outstanding it will perhaps be easier to get them to pay.

I now continue the amendment of the clause so that it will read as follows: that the business of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada be managed by a board of directors of not less than five members and not more than 20 members, as may be determined by a resolution of the shareholders.

Then the shareholders have the right to decide who the five, 15 or 20 directors are going to be. We are asked to increase the number. Why limit the number to 20 when a good suggestion has just been made to add to them? The number can be increased to 25. We suggest to them 10 representatives of the social classes and public bodies.

I ask that the subamendment we moved be seriously considered by the managers, the directors and the shareholders of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada so that this company will no longer represent solely certain private interests but that, while the latter may include the majority of represented, it will become a company representing the whole of Canada, all Canadians, of whatever race, religion, language, province or social status. Then this company will be dearer to the hearts of Canadians.

[Text]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, I have not before now participated in the debate or study of this particular bill, but in view of the number of cabinet ministers now in attendance, and the attendance of the hon. member for Kootenay East, it is becoming obvious that this bill is about to be transferred on the order paper to a government order. Perhaps the increased interest on the part of the members of the cabinet is because they may have to make some of the new appointments to the board of directors of this company. Undoubtedly they want to listen to the various proposals that are being made in order to be in a position to select the best possible persons for these positions.

In view of the principles referred to by the hon. member for Timiskaming, which were supported by the hon. member who has just taken his seat, I am beginning to wonder whether I should welcome him to the ranks of the socialists, or whether this is just a passing interest. It is obvious that he is thinking in terms of public interest, though his thoughts are much more accurate than his arithmetic. He proposed that five members, or 25 per cent of the members of the board should be appointed by the government. I have totalled up the number of members he wants appointed, and I have now arrived at a total of 12. He suggests that two members be appointed from the federal government, two from the provincial governments, and one from the union of British Columbia municipalities, making a total of five so far. He wants one member appointed from the unemployed. I do not disagree with him in that regard, but I have always felt that an individual appointed to a board of directors of a company was appointed on the basis of his being virtually unemployed. The hon. member wanted another member appointed on behalf of unions, and I think that is an excellent idea. Such a principle has been advocated in many parts of the world and here in Canada for some time. I think there should be an invasion into management control by the workers of industries in order that they may see how their immediate benefits and relationships are being handled. He suggested another member should be appointed on behalf of the company subscribers, farmers, housewives and many others who are vitally interested in the operation of this public service or utility.

Mr. Grégoire: Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak to a question of privilege. The hon. member for Skeena has suggested that I am becoming a socialist. I should like to point out that this is a Social Credit proposition, and perhaps he is becoming a Creditiste.

Mr. Aiken: You had better apologize to each other.

Mr. Baldwin: You deserve each other.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Chairman, the interesting thing about that question of privilege is that the member for Lapointe was smiling when he raised it, which would indicate that he is not really serious about my becoming enamoured of the philosophy espoused by his leader.

There is no doubt that members of parliament are concerned with making sure that the public interest is served, and that the public is assured that this company has its best interests in mind. I think the public should be provided with some mechanism by which it can take part in making policy decisions. I am sure the sponsor of this bill is vitally concerned with the public's interest. Perhaps I should remind the members of this committee that the principles contained in the proposal we are now discussing were originally initiated by members of this party, which has always had the public's interest at heart. I am sure the Bell Telephone Company officials are concerned about public interest and want to make sure that the public is served in the best possible manner.

Perhaps this is an appropriate time for the sponsor of this bill to communicate to the officials of the Bell Telephone Company, if he has not done so already, that there is a growing concern, as far away as Halifax, about the operation of the Bell Telephone Company. He should perhaps concern himself with some method by which the general public could have representation on this board of directors. He may be well advised to communicate the fact that there is growing interest in parliament in respect of the operations of the Bell Telephone, and he may well ask those officials what they intend to do in this regard. Perhaps the sponsor of the bill should allow it to stand while the Bell Telephone Company officials consider the proposals which have been made, and perhaps meet with members of parliament who are interested in this matter in an attempt to find some compromise or arithmetical solution to the obvious differences.

It is easy for the member for Lapointe to say 25 per cent and that may be a good figure. It is equally easy for some other hon. member to say that he does not think it should be 25 per cent, that a more proper division would be 30 per cent or 26 per cent, or six members, or some other ratio of members of the board of directors selected by the governor in council and appointed to represent the public interest, compared with those appointed by the company under the normal rules of corporation activity.

In this discussion with the Bell Telephone Company we might reach an agreeable figure. After all, in something of this nature I do not think anybody wants to say to Bell Telephone or any other public utility: This is what we think is a proper ratio, 25 per cent appointed by the governor in council and 75 per cent selected at the annual meetings of the company in the way it is normally done. I do not even think we should say arbitrarily, as was suggested by the hon. member for Timiskaming initially, that three out of the 20 should be appointed by the governor in council. What percentage that would be I could not say. It is around 15 per cent. This is just as arbitrary a figure as the 25 per cent suggested by the hon. member for Lapointe.

I think a far more reasoned and reasonable approach would be to communicate with the Bell Telephone Company through the sponsor of the bill and indicate our wishes to them so that we can arrange to sit down and talk about the matter in an informal way. Of course, whatever figure we arrive at, it also will be arbitrary. Unless we had a board of directors numbering 1,000 I do not think we could possibly have representation for all sections of the economy and all groups of subscribers. But some balance should be sought and there should be acceptance of the idea that if one person is appointed by the union of B.C. municipalities, for the sake of argument, it will be generally understood this is fair enough representation of that particular group of people. If we agree that the people working for the company should have some representation, it may also be possible that one such person will be sufficient to represent that block of people. And so on down the line.

Mr. Grégoire: May I ask the hon. member a question?

[Translation]

Mr. Howard: But certainly.

Mr. Grégoire: Under those conditions, would you agree that if labour unions could appoint a representative to the board of directors of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada to protect the interest of workers, the salary of that representative should be paid by the unions as a whole rather than out of the funds of the Bell Telephone Company of Canada, so that the union representative would be entirely free from any links in order to represent adequately the unions on the board of directors of the company.

[Text]

Mr. Howard: My friend from Lapointe is obviously a crystal ball gazer because I was about to come to something akin to that point, although not particularly that point. I was going to say that in the normal relationships between companies such as the Bell Telephone Company and governments such as the Liberals it would be very simple for the Bell Telephone Company to say that they would accept the sort of amendment now before the house. They could say: We will accept three or five. We have the other 15 in our pocket in any event and we have the Liberal government in our pocket so we will just go to them and ask them to handpick these three or five people, and then we will have the whole 20.

I was about to proceed to that line of argument and the hon. member for Lapointe assisted me in reaching it. With regard to so-called advisory boards established under the aegis of government and whose members have been appointed by the governor in council, we have found in the past that even though they may be suggested by outside groups such as unions there is not the degree of independence of thought there should be because the individual is not paid by the people he represents. I think it would make for a better connection between the representative and the people he is representing if he were unfettered financially so far as any connection with the Bell Telephone Company is concerned. He would have a much more independent attitude of mind. In that sense the hon. member for Lapointe and I have reached a meeting of minds and there is no disagreement whatever.

There might be some difficulty though with regard to the appointment of the person who was unemployed, as suggested by the hon. member for Lapointe, unless that hon. member would undertake to pay his salary. But there would be this problem, and it is a question that is unanswerable at the moment. If it were considered advisable to appoint a person who was unemployed in the normal sense that we use the word, and we wanted to ensure that he had some sort of income or salary from his position on the board of directors, we would have to work this out. The hon. member for Lapointe could say "do it this way" and some other member could say "do it that way." This is another reason why I suggest that what we need is an indication from the sponsor of the bill that he will not seek further progress for the bill until such time as we can sit down and iron out this question in an informal meeting with the Bell Telephone Company. Did my friend have another question?

Mr. Grégoire: Yes, concerning the unemployed representative on the board of directors. Maybe his salary might be paid out of the unemployment insurance fund. Then he would not be dependant on the government but would be responsible to the unemployed because he was being paid out of their money.

Mr. Howard: There may not be any left in the fund to pay him. I understand the hon. member for Danforth had a question.

Mr. Scott: Not of the member for Skeena. I should like to see a vote at this time—

An hon. Member: Then sit down.

Mr. Scott: —but before we do that I should like to ask the sponsor if he has taken up this proposal with the directors and what has been their reaction to the suggestion that some of these new directors be appointed by the government?

Mr. Brown: I might remind the hon. member that I have given him the answer to this question on September 10 and on October 1—

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Progress reported.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTION TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to provisional standing order 39A, to inform the house that the following question will be raised at ten o'clock this evening:

The hon. member for Halifax, public service, equalization of pay for prevailing rates employees.

The house will now resume the business interrupted at five o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

1. Departmental administration including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $5,180,500.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, when we recessed I was speaking about the report of natural gas, and I would like to conclude that phase of my remarks by saying that at present there are two applications before the provincial bodies which will likely come before the national energy board. One is an application for trans-Canada allotment in the Alberta southern system, and in my remarks before the evening recess I said the Borden commission, the reports of the petroleum industry itself, and the Canada Year Book all have indicated we have sufficient natural gas and proven reserves to enable us to export natural gas from Canada which would help us with our imbalance of trade with the United States, and our imbalance of dollars.

Everything possible should be done to encourage companies that are in the pipe line business, and to provide assistance for them in the tax structure so that we can help the flow of Canadian dollars into our own industry. I question, and I am sure the minister would question also, whether there is a single company in Canada today owning crude petroleum supplies, or natural gas or any of its by-products that is not probably 70 per cent controlled by foreign capital, irrespective of what the Minister of Finance may have said in the past. In fact Canadian Oil, B.A. and some of those other companies that were true Canadian companies have recently passed into the hands of foreign control; but if a little more encouragement were provided in the tax structure for Canadian companies, then Canadians with savings would be prompted to put their savings into investments in Canadian companies and syndicates.

The national oil policy is one which was devised by the Conservative government. The eastern market in Canada gets its oil supplies from Venezuela and other countries, but we know that the oil producing companies in those countries are financed with United States money, so naturally the Americans are interested in that supply of oil coming into what we call the Montreal market. Naturally we have to work out details with the United States on such markets, and it was during the term of office of the Conservative government that a very good deal was worked out on a three year basis. I want to drive that point home, because today the authorities are working such negotiations out on a year to year basis.

Everybody who has experience in the oil industry knows that after the Suez crisis was over the demand for Canadian crude oil, particularly crude oil from western Canada, fell off, and it was necessary to hold talks and conferences with the United States on the problem; and it was by getting into the United States western market that we were able to improve the market for Canadian crude oil. For example, as I said earlier this afternoon, in 1960 we were able to export about 113,000 barrels of crude per day, and because of our national oil policy and the deal which we worked out with the United States, in 1963 we were able to export into the United States market 248,000 barrels per day.

I would ask the minister to remember that when this deal was made by the then minister of trade and commerce, Hon. George Hees, the petroleum industry was very happy with it. This industry appreciates the problems in reference to the imports of crude into the eastern market. It appreciates the problem that if there were quotas put on the eastern market it might increase the cost here and, moreover, might cause trouble in those countries from which the oil is coming. It might cause the kind of trouble and create the kind of philosophy which neither Canada nor the United States wants.

In this regard the United States worked out a compromise involving its western market on a three year basis. We said we would try to increase our exports to 250,000 barrels of crude a day and hoped to raise it to a level of 800,000 barrels a day. I think the minister can take some pride in the fact that in 1963 we almost hit that target by producing 786,000 barrels per day for home and export consumption. However, I am told by petroleum men in Calgary that now, instead of a three year target they have only a one year target, and this has led to a new development in Montreal where a new refinery extension has been built for B.A. Oil.

The reason for this is that with this one year target, or one year deal with the United States, they feel the market might fall off, and so they have built an extension to their refinery in order to refine an extra 25,000 barrels of foreign crude a day. There is anxiety among people in the oil and petroleum industry in western Canada about this one year deal, and I urge that our efforts should be bent, as they were when the national oil policy was announced, to having a three or five year plan. By so doing we will not have the kind of development which will continue to encourage imports into this country, thus creating greater imblance of trade and imbalance of dollars between Canada and the United States. When we talk about currency in this country let us face the fact that if you go overseas, whether you buy pounds sterling or dollars you pay for them in United States dollars. They control the markets. We listened to the suggestions made today by my hon. friend from Qu'Appelle. If we are to be a mature country we should set up the proper institutions internationally so that we would be dealing in Canadian dollars as well as in United States dollars. Then we could talk. Then we could trade and then we could sell in world markets. The oil industry is prospering in Canada today, due to the national oil policy implemented by the former government. I know the present minister is going along with that policy. I will go further. I will congratulate him and the officials of his department on going ahead with it. As a result of that national policy we were able in 1963 to produce 786,000 barrels of crude per day compared with 462,000 barrels in 1958. When I say "produce" I mean production in the sense that consumers at home and in the export market are using that amount, and this spells dollars for Canada. I say that the oil industry is one of the most important industries in Canada today, along with agriculture, and that its prosperity or otherwise affects the whole of our economy.

We heard today an enlightened speech by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. I went along with him in his six points. He was enthused. I am sure the minister was really interested. But it seems to me that when we are discussing the building up of trade with countries having a lower standard of living than our own we should begin to take a hard look at our relations with China. We have made wheat deals with China and we have made oil deals. There may be other deals in store. If we are going to trade with a country of 600 million people the Department of External Affairs should take a look at the situation because if we deal with these people by selling them goods we may have to deal with them otherwise. It seems to me that as the parties change places in this house, officials of the department continue to advise and curb the ministers to whom they are responsible. I can speak freely because I am in opposition. I believe it is time that Canada, in spite of what the United States may do, should recognize China as a country. Remember, there are six or seven hundred million human beings there and they cannot be ignored. We are a country of 19 million people and we are sitting on surplus resources. We have reserves of wheat, natural gas, petroleum, iron ore; we have a surplus of everything. Can we continue to hold these resources for 19 million people unless, first of all, we begin recognizing the countries we must deal with and, in the second place, we begin to change the archaic and out of date rules which govern immigration into this country? You cannot have one without the other. If there is to be peace in the world we have to show ourselves as businessmen of good will.

Mr. Sharp: May I ask the hon. member to clarify a point? When he spoke about agreeing with his hon. friend from Qu'Appelle did he mean we should increase our imports of oil from Venezuela to carry out the suggestion he made?

An hon. Member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: Somebody laughed, and the man who laughed would not know grease if he saw it. The minister has asked an intelligent question and a proper question and I want to answer it. I appreciate the problem thoroughly. I said we must negotiate and work out deals. I am confident that the industry in western Canada is happy with the deal the Conservatives put over when they developed a national oil and petroleum policy. I would say that if we were self-sustaining and if we were not so dependant on the economy of the United States we could probably take a different attitude. But one has to be a cold realist, a cold businessman. What is the best policy for the petroleum industry? The best policy is to work out a deal. I hope this government, when an interparliamentary group is set up to work with our counterparts in the United States, will not make unnecessary changes in the personnel. What happens is that just as the members get briefed and become knowledgeable, the composition of the delegation is changed because somebody needs a trip. This is a very serious business and I believe that once these delegations have been set up their composition should be changed as little as possible so that we can continue to work out in the future such deals as we now have in the national petroleum policy.

Mr. Greene: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Woolliams: I only have a few minutes left. I was glad to answer the question raised by the minister but I know the kind of question I would be asked by the hon. member for Renfrew South—and I do not mean to be disrespectful; I know he has a well oiled machine when it comes to leadership.

An hon. Member: Squeaky.

Mr. Woolliams: I want to repeat the point I was making. If we intend to trade with communist China and with countries behind the iron curtain, we must remember that it is no longer 1924 or 1934 or 1944. It is later than you think. Maybe Churchill was right. Sir Winston Churchill said—and I hope I can get his words right—that if the iron curtain were lifted and the millions of good-hearted human beings on either side could have free intercourse one with another, then the 14 men who control the millions of good-hearted human beings behind the iron curtain would be undermined and peace and security would be ours. I think this is true in the field of economics.

The Chairman: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Greene: He has not said anything, anyway.

Mr. Davis: The hon. member for Bow River said he could speak freely because he was in the opposition. I also intend to speak freely tonight. What I say does not involve the government in any way; nor it is necessarily in line with government policy.

I want to talk about energy and more particularly about our trade in energy. I should like first, however, to congratulate the minister. The last time he brought his estimates forward we congratulated him because he was a new minister. This time we are all congratulating him on the tremendous performance of his department. Certainly he has shown great qualities in leadership with respect to our very successful trade drive.

One of the best tests of what is happening to our economy is our balance of payments. Three years ago our expenditures abroad were far in excess of our earnings and we had a balance of payments deficit of roughly $1.5 billion. It has now been reduced to half a billion. This improvement is one measure of the government's accomplishments in the field of foreign trade. It is of interest to all of us, not only in respect to trade, but in respect to foreign ownership in Canadian enterprises.

In the energy field there has been a remarkable improvement. At the end of world war II we were importing two thirds of our fuel. The bulk of it came from the United States, but some oil came from Venezuela. Today we are approaching a balance. We are, roughly, 70 per cent self-sufficent in respect to oil. We are more than self-sufficient with respect to hydro power and natural gas. We are still importing some coal. But, over-all we are 90 per cent self-sufficient in respect to energy. The progress made in this field is one of the reasons why the affairs of this nation are in much better shape today than they were a few years ago.

Our changing pattern of trade reflects Canada's changing patterns of fuel consumption, in particular the tremendous increase in the importance of oil. Now it accounts for 60 per cent of our consumption of energy, having risen from 20 per cent. We are using more oil than anything else. Oil and gas together supply roughly three quarters of our energy requirements. Wood has almost disappeared as a source of energy and the importance of coal has declined not only in relative but also in absolute terms.

All over the world we are witnessing this progressive shift from what we thought to be the more durable forms of energy to the more exhaustible forms such as oil and natural gas. This shift is a matter of great concern to many people. Today oil is on the crest of the wave, so to speak. It accounts for 40 per cent of all world trade at the present time. Ten billion dollars worth of oil moves between nations annually on this globe of ours, but this increasing volume of oil is being recovered in the context of increasing reserves. In the world today, if not a single additional exploratory well were drilled, there is still 40 years of supply at the current rates of consumption. On this continent, where oil has been in extensive use for over a century, there are still about 12 to 15 years supply. This 12 to 15 year figure frightens some people, and yet if one goes back over the past century he finds that there has been a 10 or 15 years supply proven out and available at any one point of time. The reason this has happened is that the oil industry has found it necessary to have something which you might call a working inventory in the order of 10 to 15 years supply on hand. It does not pay the industry to find too much oil, and consequently the industry keeps a limited amount of proven oil ahead of itself. It has been drilling deeper and using new techniques, and the proven oil reserves have mounted roughly in line with the immense increase in consumption on this continent.

Going overseas, mankind has found even greater quantities of this energy. In the world today there is at least as much natural gas, physically speaking at least, as there is oil; yet the consumption of natural gas lags behind that of oil by a considerable margin. In many parts of the world natural gas is hardly used at all. Even in Canada it is largely a post-war phenomenon. So if oil were to show some signs of exhaustion, natural gas is coming along behind it. Again, behind natural gas and oil are these tremendous quantities of bituminous sands, oil shales and the like. For example, we have in northern Alberta alone more oil in the form of tar sands than has been found in the entire world in conventional oil pools. So we have a larger oil inventory in the form of tar sands than we have oil and gas in the conventional sense.

Then of course we have coal. We have coal in vast amounts, hence the prospect that the alarmist sees only a decade or two away, that of making synthetic oils and gases from coal, could utilize the pipe lines through which oil and gas now move to market. This possibility has been there for a long time. In the 1860's in the United States when oil was beginning to be used extensively for lighting lamps, greasing wheels, and so on, there was concern amongst the conservationists of that day who were saying there was only 10 to 15 years of proven oil left in the ground. They said, "What will we do?" The chemists of that day said, "We can turn to synthetic oils and gases made from coal". That was 100 years ago. Technology was on the horizon then, and it is on the horizon now. Its promise may still be 50 years away. So we may not want alternative forms of energy, including the production of synthetic oil and gas from coal, for a long time to come.

We have hydro power. In the world perhaps 5 per cent of the hydro resources are developed. On this continent only about 40 per cent have been harnessed. In Canada an even smaller percentage has so far been utilized, and in a province like British Columbia only 10 per cent has been put to work. In other words, there are immense quantities of hydroelectric power available and it will become increasingly available as water is developed for other uses and as its multipurpose applications make power in effect a by-product of water for industrial purposes, agricultural, human consumption, and so on. Behind all this we have nuclear energy. We have tremendous amounts of uranium, thorium, and resources of that kind.

The concern about energy, in other words, has evaporated over the last 20 years. It is no longer a matter of whether mankind will run out of energy; it is now a matter of which is the cheapest of a number of alternative sources. We are tending to concentrate today on the more exhaustible forms of energy like oil and gas, but we know we can turn to the tar sands, the oil shales, to coal and eventually to the nuclear sources of energy. It is merely a matter of cost. And today costs are coming down; we know they are not out of reach. Hence we are likely to see some important applications of nuclear energy within the next decade or two.

So supply is not really a problem. This has a very important implication, if true. It means that a country like Canada that has abundant sources of energy can trade with some confidence; that it does not have to worry about keeping all its forms of energy at home.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question? During the last two or three years has the hon. member always been in favour of exporting all types of energy from Canada, particularly in the case of natural gas and electrical energy—I am thinking particularly of the Columbia river—from Canada to the United States? Has the hon. member always taken that position?

Mr. Davis: Yes, I have always felt that we could export energy, with proper safeguards. We can export energy if we do not export it at prices lower than Canadians have to pay. We should not export our lowest priced energy to neighbouring areas of consumption. But I would say that we should be prepared to trade, as long as there is an advantage in financial terms of that trade.

Another test of the availability of energy is its price; that is, the price of energy compared with other things. The delivered price has been tending to fall not only in Canada but, generally speaking, throughout the world. Therefore, when the price test is applied, I suggest that energy is becoming more abundant. Delivered costs are coming down even more rapidly than the cost at the source of the energy, because the means of transportation have been very much improved, the oil pipe line is very much more efficient than the gas pipe line—it is three or four times more efficient than the gas pipe line—and the gas pipe line is several times more efficient than moving coal by rail.

Coal can only be moved a few hundred miles in comparison with oil, which can be moved thousands of miles. In other words, oil can move much further from its source to its market: it can move halfway around the world. Natural gas can move across a continent and still be competitive; but coal can move only a few hundred miles and be competitive. It should really be consumed at its point of origin.

These are among the facts of life that the long term forecasts reveal, and long term planning in the freest or most indicative sense indicates this is the most sensible way of managing the energy resources of a region or a nation. Basically we are seeing a lowering of the ceiling on the price of energy because of these improved means of transportation, increased availabilities and more efficient utilization. The average thermal power plant 50 years ago was only 15 per cent efficient; today it is 30 per cent efficient. Recent discoveries are suggesting efficiencies of better than 50 per cent. So much more of the energy delivered to a given point is being utilized. The diesel engine is more efficient than the old steam engine. Today we are not wasting energy and we have an increasing supply. We have greater competition, falling transportation costs and much greater efficiencies of utilization. Energy is being put effectively to work to a much greater extent and much more effectively than ever before.

This leads on to another conclusion. This conclusion is that the area, or the region or the country that is able to put energy to work most effectively is the one that is likely to prosper most in economic terms. This test can be applied in the United States. For example, you find that the states of the U.S. which have the highest per capita energy consumption by and large are the ones with the highest per capita incomes. They are the most industrialized states.

In Canada, the province which puts the most amount of energy to work per capita tends to be the one with the highest per capita income. Throughout the world it almost always follows that where energy is consumed in quantity there is the greatest prosperity. This leads one to the inevitable conclusion that it is to consume which is important, and to consume efficiently, and not necessarily to produce. Canada can do both. In most forms of energy we can not only be a producer but a consumer as well. The implications for trade are obvious. We can export with more confidence as long as we export intelligently; but we should also be importing in areas where importation means lower costs than if we were self-sufficient in respect to that particular form of energy.

This applies perhaps most graphically in respect to oil. Forty per cent of the oil used in Canada is refined in the maritimes or the Montreal area. Our western Canadian crude oil does not come as far east as Montreal; it fills out British Columbia, the prairies, southern Ontario and even the Ottawa valley, but not Montreal. It is cheaper for 40 per cent of our users in Canada to use Venezuelan or Middle Eastern oil imported into the maritimes or the Montreal area and refined there rather than bring Canadian oil all the way across Canada.

To resolve our balance of payments problem under those circumstances and to resolve it efficiently, we should basically be exporting more oil down the west coast and into the U.S. middle west; exporting it in at least as great amount as we import it from other countries into eastern Canada. This pattern will lend to the lowest cost and encourage the greatest consumption and will, I suggest, be the most rational pattern for a spread out country like Canada to follow with respect to the utilization of energy.

There are certain industries which use energy intensively. Aluminum is one example and the electro-chemical and metallurgical industries are others. We have these industries in some numbers in Canada and they are among the best equipped and most efficient in the world. They are our bread and butter industries—the resource producing industries which help pay our taxes, build roads and schools and help pay for better services generally across the nation. We should where possible encourage research in respect to the establishment of more of these energy intensive industries.

One in which I have been interested for several years is an industry which would process uranium. It is the largest single user of electricity in the United States, for example. It can upgrade uranium into a variety of forms. We do not have an industry like that in Canada but we might have one one day. For the time being we might ship our uranium to the United States, or even to the United Kingdom where a small plant exists, and have it upgraded; but as I say perhaps we will be able to do this in Canada in the 1970's or 1980's. That is the type of industry we should be sponsoring in this country.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit another question. As I understood his argument, if we had to sell our surplus energy to the United States cheaper than what the consumers of Canada have to pay for it, we should not sell it at that price. The hon. member said it must be a competitive price. In other words, if we had a surplus we must not sell it to our foreign friends at a cheaper price than the price our own consumers pay.

Mr. Davis: In neighbouring areas of Canada and the United States—assuming Canada is the source of the energy—the price should be lower to Canadian consumers than to the consumers in a neighbouring area in the United States. Given those circumstances I would be in favour of a continuing exportation of that form of energy. The national energy board will make sure that the reserves in Canada are sufficient to look after our foreseeable requirements. This provision would also safeguard long term Canadian requirements. These would be among the stipulations which I believe can be met and are being met in respect of the export of oil, gas and power from Canada at the present time. We will have more of this trade and I suggest that this would be to our advantage and that we should not be apprehensive about it.

I want now to go on to the governmental approach—I do not mean only this government but I include all future governments as well—to energy development. It should not be unalterably opposed to export. That is one conclusion. Another is that it should be interested in focusing more of its research activity, export trade promotion, and so on, on energy intensive industries so that we make greater use of energy at home. Also I believe it should be looking across the whole spectrum of energy commodities and carefully trying to bring them on the same footing one with another. I suggest that in the long run it would be healthiest if there were no subsidies at all in respect to the various forms of energy. One form of energy subsidized more than another, for example, is not an altogether healthy situation.

We are spending more than $60 million a year at the present time on nuclear energy. That is more than $3 per person per year. I do not imagine that we will go on subsidizing the creation of a new energy industry like that forever. That is a lot of money. We are not spending anything like that on the development of oil or gas, or even on facilities for the production and transmission of electricity. We are favouring one form of energy to that extent. At the other end of the spectrum, we are subsidizing some of our uneconomic coal producing areas. These areas should be oriented more to consumption at the pit head, and so on. We should progressively work our way out of having to move coal over vast distances, because coal does not move over great distances naturally in competition with oil and gas. Roughly $18 million a year, or $1 per person per year, is being spent in this country on subsidizing an industry which could over the years readjust to a more competitive position and be in healthier circumstances.

What sort of agency do we need in government to work this out? I should have thought that a national energy board should be an energy board and should take a comprehensive approach to energy. It should not merely be concerned with interprovincial and international movements of oil and gas and the export of power, but also with developing a long term policy with respect to coal. Coal, as hon. members know, is presently administered by the coal board, which falls to a certain extent under the jurisdiction of the minister of mines. In the long term I think it would be better for coal administration to go to the national energy board and be within the orbit, as it would be today at least, of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I also think that atomic energy, this new industry which is coming along, should also be within the purview of the national energy board and that atomic energy should be taken, at least in respect to our long term programs, out of the Department of Industry and included along with the other responsibilities of the national energy board. In the United Kingdom there is a ministry of fuel and power. On the continent of Europe today there is a treaty in effect between the six nations of the European common market. They are developing a common policy with respect to all forms of energy. They are trying to put them all on the same footing eventually. The coal mining industry there is in even more serious straits, at least locally, than it is in Canada, but there are attempts to rationalize the whole energy picture and to take an over-all long term approach to the problem in individual nations and in the common market areas. I think that Canada would do well at least to organize its governmental approach to energy in a similar way.

There is only one other aspect I should like to discuss this evening and that has to do with what I might call rigidities which are creeping into the energy field. Increasingly, these forms of energy require vast investments of money for plants and equipment. A pipe line, once it is laid, cannot easily be altered or moved to another location. An oil refinery, once it is built, will continue to be located in a specific area. A large atomic energy installation, which is many more times expensive than a conventional coal or gas burning plant, is similiarly difficult to change, modify and, certainly, to move.

Consequently, you have long term contracts developing. One cannot chop and change. We do not have spot sales of products. We cannot have the same retail situation such as existed 50 or 100 years ago in respect of fuel wood, or even in respect of coal. These things involve long term investments, and do so increasingly.

We have, paralleling these long term investment situations, long term export commitments, so that contractually and financially we have an institutionalization of things. Long term planning is certainly called for, and individual firms involved in this economic activity have to plan over a long period of time. Consequently government, if it is to think in step with these industries, has to be looking a long way ahead, not just for five or ten years, but over a period of time at least as long as the lifetime of the investment, many of which run for 20, 30 or over 50 years ahead. Some pipe lines will last as long as 50 years and some power dams will last for as long as 100 years.

These investments are being made as though we know what is going to happen 10, 25 and even more years ahead, and our plans should be made in similar terms. When I say "plans", I mean our thinking, our forecasting and the whole process of decision making in this context. The thinking of private individuals and government should be in step with each other in this way.

I should like to emphasize the need for voluntary programs. I think our oil policy, a policy which has evolved over the last three or four years, has been remarkably successful. The Gordon commission studied energy, and the Borden commission studied energy even more intensively. Both commissions recommended the establishment of a national energy board. Following the establishment of a national energy board the previous government followed through effectively with other recommendations of the Borden commission. We had an oil policy which established targets in respect of exports and the movement of Canadian oil to the east and penetrating into the United States.

These targets were not set up arbitrarily by the government, but in close consultation with industry. Indeed they largely resulted from forecasts made by industry. The industry forecast that it might move oil as far east as the Ottawa valley, in respect of its eastward movement of crude oil, and remain competitive, and that it might also sell oil to the Detroit, Minneapolis and Seattle areas. These forecasts were brought into reality. The government said: These targets can be realized; you agree that they are possible, so get on with it. The small amount of oil being imported at Sarnia, for example, dried up. Oil is no longer being imported west of Montreal. We are now exporting oil into the United States. Consequently we had a set of targets which have largely been achieved.

By 1967 perhaps we will be producing, as a result of these voluntary programs, as much as one million barrels of oil a day. That will mean this will be a billion dollar industry. The oil industry in Canada will be a billion dollar industry by 1967. That is a projection which the industry has largely made. Whether these industrial management decisions were made entirely within this country or not, it was recognized that these targets could be realized, and the government of the day decided that these things must be achieved in order to set our balance of payments right. They have come into being in order to set our financial house in order.

These things are being achieved and this is the type of voluntary program which I think can produce the lowest cost of energy consistent with an improved balance of payments and greater self-sufficiency. In other words, as some people refer to it, we have national programming. I do not think it could be properly called an indicative program because the government did not really initiate them. Rather, the industry made the forecasts and the government chose those which would yield the best over-all results.

In any event, we have experienced a program of development which not only put industry in a favourable competitive position, but lowered prices. I think this is the type of national planning that many people in this country want to see extended in respect of energy and other industries in this country. We have witnessed declining prices for energy in this country. We still pay slightly more for energy than do the people of the United States, and their price level has tended to remain about constant. I think we can move into a position of competitive advantage generally in respect to energy within the next few years.

We have always had an advantage in respect to power, mainly because public power entities do not pay income tax and have the advantage of lower interest rates. We are coming into an increasingly competitive position in respect to oil and gas, even with the United States, and this augurs well for the future. We will have more investment in energy in this development, and this favourable trend will be due in part to a rational program of development in which companies and associations participate, and in which the government is fully informed. This is the type of development which I believe and understand the minister favours, and I am certain it will pay dividends as years go by.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit one more question. He refers to competition. Is not one of our big difficulties in Canada in respect of the sale of oil a result of the fact that Venezuelan oil costs approximately 10 cents per barrel of crude at the wellhead, whereas it costs $1 per barrel of crude at the wellhead in Alberta? The hon. member has been referring to transportation costs. Even if you have to ship crude from Venezuela it can still be delivered in Canada cheaper than it can be produced at the wellhead in Alberta. Is that not one of the main problems?

Mr. Davis: I understand that Venezuelan oil, as a result of a much lower wellhead price, plus transportation costs to Montreal, is cheaper in Montreal than western Canadian crude oil. That is why, under present circumstances, it is better for us to rely on imported oil. However, one can envisage a situation where we cannot obtain our crude in this fashion because some countries are following discriminatory practices, in which case we might find it to our advantage to bring Canadian oil to the Montreal refineries. To do so would be, in my view, an act of desperation, and would only happen under extreme circumstances—that is as a result of other countries not following liberal trade policies. I think we should follow liberal trade policies.

The Chairman: Order, please. The hon. gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Nugent: Mr. Chairman, the topic with which I intend to deal this evening may not be regarded as completely new in this chamber. I will be discussing the Northern Transportation Company and government policy with respect to crown corporations. I should like to make it clear to this committee that I am not indulging in a crusade against the activities of crown corporations, but since we are considering item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, for which the minister is responsible, I should like this evening to obtain some answers from the minister about this government's policy as it relates to the question of crown corporations, vis-à-vis private enterprise.

On February 3 and February 4 I spoke for some time in this house placing certain facts on the record which I thought were relevant to the present competition on the Mackenzie river between Northern Transportation Company, which is a crown corporation, and the Yellowknife Transportation Company, which is a privately owned company.

I should like to begin my remarks by referring to the competition which exists between them. I think that is a good starting point. Northern Transportation, and in fact most of these crown corporations, date their start or certainly their importance from the days of C. D. Howe, who had a genius for setting up big crown corporations to get a job done quickly. I certainly have no argument with the purpose for which Northern Transportation was set up and for which the minister says they are still continuing to render service to a part of the country that needs that type of service. The question in my mind and which I should like to bring to the attention of the house is: Is it present government policy that a crown corporation should do this when private capital is ready, willing and able to do it? How far should a crown corporation be allowed to go in competing with private enterprise, when both are in the same field competing for the same business?

I have put this on record before but I should like to quote again a sentence or two from a speech by C. D. Howe in 1946. As found on page 2176 of Hansard for June 4 of that year, he said:

> ...it has never created a company that is in competition with private business in any way, shape or manner. If private business was able to carry out the war objective, private business was given that opportunity. The government has created crown companies only to undertake work that private industry was not willing to undertake.

That was the policy of the government at the time the crown corporation was set up. I am sure that most of the parties in the house who believe in private enterprise, and I have heard all parties except the N.D.P. campaign on that basis, feel that this is the ideal situation, that the real justification for crown companies is where private enterprise is unwilling, because of the financial risks or difficulties, or is unable because of those same difficulties to carry out a service that is essential to the country or to a part of it, perhaps to help open up a new area. But I think most of us feel that, if the original justification or excuse for setting up the crown corporation has disappeared, the day must come when the crown should vacate and leave the field to private business.

[Mr. Nugent.]

In this regard I have asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce on several occasions for a statement on government policy at the present time in relation to private enterprise versus government enterprise. I got an answer from the minister on October 9, 1963 to a question I had asked much earlier. I suggest to the house that the answer the minister gave was far from being a clear and concise statement on the part of the government as to how far the crown corporation should go in competing. In fairness to the minister I will read two paragraphs at least of what he said. My question to the minister had been based on how far Northern Transportation was going to be allowed to go in competing in the Arctic against Arctic Shipping and on the Mackenzie against Yellowknife Transportation, and what the role of the crown corporation was. I quote from the minister's answer as found on page 3369 of Hansard:

> It is the government's intention that Northern Transportation Company Limited shall continue to function as a common carrier in the Mackenzie basin and along the Arctic coast, and in so doing help to provide these areas with an efficient and dependable transportation service. In performing this function the company will, as it has done in the past, operate as a normal business corporation.

I should like to pause for a moment and repeat those words, "operate as a normal business corporation". In the past I have put on the record many instances and many ways in which this crown corporation is not operating as a normal business corporation, in that it takes unfair advantage through having avenues and advantages open to it that private corporations do not have. I will refer to this point again later. I continue the minister's explanation of the policy:

> It will, for instance, continue to replace and improve its equipment when, from the viewpoint of service and economy, such action is justified, and will provide additional equipment if the volume of traffic or the development of the area indicates that such equipment is needed.

I would ask the committee to pay attention to those words regarding volume of traffic. In the last paragraph of his statement dealing with the relationship of this crown company to private enterprise the minister said:

> Private enterprise is also providing service and will probably continue to do so. It seems to me that under existing circumstances both Northern Transportation and the private companies operating in the north are needed to provide a dependable and efficient transportation system.

That was the minister's statement of policy, such as it was, in 1963. I put a question on the order paper in July of 1964 to make sure I had not missed anything the minister might have said that would be more definitive as to the policy of the government, as well as to see if there had been any change. In answer to my question No. 1,588 the Minister of Trade and Commerce replied that there had been no change in government policy since his statement of October 9, 1963. If the minister has made a statement of policy in the meantime and I have missed it I apologize. However, I have been watching most closely and I do not believe I have missed anything. I do not think the question of what the government's exact policy is has been cleared up yet.

I should like to review the present position. Northern Transportation Company is a crown corporation operating as a common carrier, with tugs and barges on the Mackenzie river section of the highway to the sea. It is also a common carrier operating on the Athabasca sector in our northland and it also operates in the Arctic. On the Mackenzie section Northern Transportation Company has as competition Yellowknife Transportation Company, a private carrier, and in the Arctic it has as competition Arctic Shipping Limited, another private carrier.

It has not been the purpose of my speeches on this matter in the house to malign Northern Transportation Company or to complain of the way in which those public servants are carrying out their duties. It is a well known fact not only throughout the north but in Edmonton that Northern Transportation Company does provide a very good and reliable service to the people of the north. I have said before and I say now that I have no quarrel with the dedicated public servants working for that company who do their best, as we would hope all public servants would do, to make the company grow, to make it more efficient and to please the customers, while at the same time taking a great deal of pride in the service they render to the people of the north. That, Mr. Chairman, is exactly the course that must be followed by private enterprise companies.

My quarrel is with the policy being pursued by the government. I have pointed out in the house many ways in which the crown corporation does not compete "as a normal business corporation", to use the minister's words. The minister has said:

> Private enterprise is also providing service and will probably continue to do so. It seems to me that under existing circumstances both Northern Transportation and the private companies...are needed—

Right now the government has out for tender—and I am not sure whether it has received bids and let the contract—the building of a new boat to operate in Arctic waters. I am sure the minister must understand by now, certainly I have told him enough times, that this new boat which is to operate in Arctic waters will almost surely ring the death knell on private competition in the Arctic.

I should point out to the committee that Northern Transportation Company, this crown agency, has taken over from the Hudson's Bay Company the operations it used to undertake. It took out the Banks Land, the boat the Hudson's Bay Company had; but contrary to what was said in the house as to the purposes of that takeover, the crown corporation has not been content just to provide the service the Hudson's Bay Company was operating. In fact there has been an expansion of the service provided, and this new ship will make it possible for Northern Transportation to more than hold its own against private competition, and in fact drive out private competition from within the Arctic.

The minister owes the committee a new definition of government policy. Certainly he cannot be heard to say there is room for both when the crown corporation is deliberately pursuing a policy which is bound to have the effect, perhaps next year, of putting out of business one of its competitors in the transportation field in the north.

Next, in connection with this last statement, and I say this "last" even though it is over a year old, when the minister says, "compete as a normal business corporation" he must have his tongue in his cheek. I would like him to explain how he can call competing as a normal business corporation the effect which this will have on Yellowknife Transportation, and particularly the effect of the surplus equipment which the crown corporation has been allowed to get licensed on the Mackenzie river.

For many years it was necessary for a common carrier in that area to go to the board of transport commissioners if it wanted to put as much as one extra barge on the Mackenzie. Yellowknife Transportation had to prove that public convenience and necessity required the expansion of its fleet; in other words, that there was the volume of business that in order to handle the transportation requirements in the area an extra barge was needed. It had to do this for every single barge, and for several years Northern Transportation had to do the same thing. I might add that Northern Transportation operating in the Athabaska sector had to do the same thing for that sector.

In the Athabaska sector Northern Transportation had no competition, and one year when there was a tremendous upsurge in the demand for transportation facilities it built a tremendous number of barges and put on some new tugs, but a couple of years later these were found more than necessary to meet the limited demands in that sector. I have requested the documents, and I could not find in the record a real application on behalf of Northern Transportation to have this system of licensing changed, so that its licences would not be for one sector or the other, but all licences issued would be automatically for both sectors.

What this meant was that Northern Transportation, a crown agency, in one fell swoop, so to speak, had all its barges in the Athabaska sector, whether surplus or not, suddenly made available to it in the Mackenzie sector in competition with Yellowknife Transportation, and was allowed to move and did move a considerable part of its fleet into that area.

It should not be necessary to remind members of the committee that a crown corporation does not have to justify its expenditures to its shareholders. It does not have the necessity of returning a dividend on its investment. Further, this particular crown corporation has the advantage of having the D.E.W. line supply and Eldorado business to give it a sufficient volume that it always has what the private company does not—a solid background of business to help to meet ordinary operating costs. I wish the minister could explain to the committee how he can pretend that this crown agency is operating as a normal business corporation when it is allowed such an advantage as that.

Next I suggest members of the committee look at some of the answers to questions I put on the order paper concerning the amount of equipment Northern Transportation has, how much it uses and the amount of freight it carries. According to the calculations I make by answers given me by the minister, Northern Transportation Company had a great many barges last year that it did not even bother to use at all. I believe it has 19 extra barges that it never had a single bit of use for during the year, and that figure does not include those it leased to Yellowknife Transportation Company.

[Mr. Nugent.]

This is the crown corporation which is now building a new boat in Vancouver. This is the crown corporation which did not itself come up with the idea of building this new boat in order to give better service. Three years previously the private company tried to bring in an L.S.M. It was a surplus vessel, but under our maritime regulations it was found too old, and could not, with due regard to our shipbuilding industry, be allowed to be brought into the country. But that did not stop Northern Transportation Company from buying it.

I believe the initial cost price was $119,000. It bought the L.S.M. and brought it into Vancouver at a time when it knew the maritime regulations did not permit the use of it. I accuse the head of the Northern Transportation Company of hoping that he would be able to get a special order in council passed so that his company would be able to move above the law and do what the private company could not do.

This boat sat there a long time, and I do not mind telling the committee that I watched very closely what Northern Transportation was doing. This crown agency, now finding it cannot use this boat, is building a new hull. It states it is going to take the propulsion machinery out of the old boat, whatever parts of it are good, and put them in the new hull at something less than what it would cost to build a completely new boat to provide the sort of service in the Arctic that the company thinks would be most efficient.

Considering the amount of money the crown agency has already tied up in surplus barges, I wonder how the minister can justify calling this method of doing business as the way a normal business corporation would operate. I am sure there is not a member of the committee who believes in private enterprise who does not doubt fundamentally whether he wants to see the government going this far, at least in policy. Do we really want to see the government go so far as to say that there is a place for competition between a crown agency and private enterprise when private enterprise is ready, willing and able to do the job? I am certain that those of us who pay lip service to private enterprise have many a doubt about that.

I know that even the members of the New Democratic party, who perhaps would have no difficulty with that first statement, are likely to object strenuously to a proposition that, in an area of the country where business undertakings are risky in the extreme and where it is a very tough and continuing task to get private companies interested in opening up the country, these companies should have to face the fact that not only will they be in competition with a crown agency but that this crown agency will have many advantages open to it and will continue to take advantage of every natural advantage which it has. This is borne out by the situation here, where it is obvious, from the way the government let out the contract, that it is the open intention of the government that its agency should drive out private shipping from the Arctic, leaving competition only on the Mackenzie, knowing that if they are the only transport agency in the region it will make it very difficult for Yellowknife to continue transportation even on the Mackenzie; because if the destination is in the Arctic the crown agency will be the only one which can say "We can carry right through".

I mentioned some of the other tactics which have been used and how closely this situation has to be watched. Take the ordering of houses for Eskimos, for instance. They were made deliverable at Waterways, Alberta, where only the crown corporation operates, so they would be put on crown corporation barges. Why they should be delivered at that midway point is a mystery to everyone except Northern Transportation. If delivered at Edmonton they could go by road to Hay River or by rail to Waterways, and in that case both Yellowknife and Northern Transportation would have a fair chance. I say there was some persuasion on the part of the crown agency which influenced the department of northern affairs to provide for delivery at Waterways in order that Northern Transportation might not be able to compete.

Figures can be produced to show what all this has meant in terms of practical service to the people in the Mackenzie and Athabaska sectors. The record shows that while competition between Yellowknife Transportation and Northern Transportation has existed, the unit cost of shipping has gone down. Over the last seven years shipping costs have gone down by more than 50 per cent. But in that same period, when the crown agency was the only one operating in the Athabaska sector there has been no change in the rates. I suggest this is some ground for suspecting that a little healthy competition for the crown agency is a good thing.

There is another factor which the minister should take into account when considering the policy to be followed in respect of this crown company. Where a crown company has as many natural advantages; where it has, as I say, the complete D.E.W. line hauling; where it has a monopoly in one sector; it is difficult for any government auditor to look at the affairs of the corporation and estimate its real efficiency. It is not so bad in the Mackenzie sector. I am not sure how close an accounting is kept, but in order to get business in that sector they have to be efficient. But what standard or guide does the government have as to business efficiency in other places? Whether you believe in private enterprise or not, if you have people in a crown corporation doing business in this way you must be concerned with their efficiency. How much is this costing the taxpayer? What gauge can be used to determine the efficiency of the operation?

I do not wish to review the whole history of the operation of these companies but I am bound to tell the committee that I think the time has come when the government should make a new statement of policy. The last clear policy statement was that made by Mr. C. D. Howe away back in 1946. The present minister must tell us what the government intends for the future. I think he would be less than honest if he did not say that of course he believes crown agencies should compete with private enterprise, even though there is private capital ready and able to do the job. Perhaps, however, he will go as far as to say it is not fair for a crown corporation to have this extra advantage. If he does, then he owes us an explanation why this crown corporation is permitted to operate in the way it does. He should inform this committee how far the exploitation of Northern Transportation is to be allowed to go. Next year, it is Arctic Shipping which will be squeezed out. How long will it be before Yellowknife Transportation will be squeezed out?

The situation is so serious now that no private shipper will want to get into the north. No one in his right mind will invest money in a transportation system which has to face competition in the manner in which the government is running this transportation system in the north. Maybe many people in this committee feel there is so little in the north that it is not worth striving for. But I think the government has said they want to expand and attract private investment. I hope the minister will have some encouraging words and be able to tell us that there is at least some hope.

[Translation]

Mr. Rondeau: Mr. Chairman, tonight we have before us the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce and before going into details, I should like to take a look at the expenditures for the year 1965 in order to ascertain, in terms of expenditures, the importance of that department in our present administration.

In looking at the figures at the beginning of this book and comparing the figures for the Department of Trade and Commerce with those of other departments to see where this department ranks, we find that it ranks 14th as regards the expenditures of the federal government. This is a very important department because it is somehow the general administration of trading in Canada.

But if we look at the amount of money granted or that we are called upon to put at the disposal of this department, we see that although this department is very important, in fact, there are too many departments which I think have less importance for our national economy but which on the other hand get a very large share of the budget.

When I consider the estimates of the Department of Agriculture, which is also very important, I see it comes before the Department of Trade and Commerce. There I admit that agriculture must be as important as our trade since it gets a vote of $140 million.

Now, if I consider the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, I see that we are asked for a vote of $83,037,540. And if we compare those estimates with the estimates of the C.B.C., which amount to $88 million, we see that the Department of Trade and Commerce gets $5 million less than the C.B.C.

It seems to me that it does not make sense that our federal Minister of Trade and Commerce should have at his disposal only $83 million to meet the needs and obligations of such an important department. Yet, the C.B.C. has at its disposal $5 million more than the Department of Trade and Commerce. I think this does not make sense.

If you take a further look you find that the Department of External Affairs comes before the Department of Trade and Commerce. The Department of External Affairs is an important one. But, in my opinion, from the Canadian dollar point of view, it should come after the Department of Trade and Commerce.

We also have another department which I believe is far less important than that of trade and commerce; I refer to the Department of National Defence, which altogether costs the Canadian government or the Canadian taxpayers the sum of $1,525 million.

This is much more important, as far as government expenditures are concerned, than the amount which might be available to our Minister of Trade and Commerce.

I should not like to review the expenditures of all the departments but if, with respect to expenditures, we compare figures, we find that the Minister of Trade and Commerce ranks 14th. However, I think that, in Canada, trade must be placed on an equal footing with agriculture; it is a very important department.

It is silly that, in our government, some departments of lesser importance should take precedence over that of trade and commerce.

When we take a closer look at the trade and commerce estimates for which we are asked to vote $83,037,540, we note the following: general administration, $5,180,500; trade commissioner service, $6,500,000; exhibitions branch, $2,190,700; universal exhibition of 1967, $970,000; travel bureau, $4,907,300; administration of standards branch, $3,372,100; dominion bureau of statistics, $13,195,800. We notice also that there is a special vote of $46,700,000 for wheat.

This means that out of $83,000,000, an amount of $46,700,000 was allocated exclusively to wheat, or more precisely as a form of indirect assistance to the farmers of western Canada.

Now, if I add, in this same book, the number of federal civil servants directly associated—I do not say indirectly, but directly—with the Department of Trade and Commerce, I see that it employs 4,500 people.

I find it ridiculous to expect so much from our Department of Trade and Commerce and give it such a small budget.

It is a good thing to make suggestions to the department and also to voice certain criticisms; but when one realizes that the minister has so little to accomplish so many things, one cannot be surprised that his achievements should be limited.

I want to call the minister's attention to the fact that at present there is a large production of raw materials in Canada—I mean in industry—and I suggest to him that he should co-operate with his colleague the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) to try and find means to help the provinces in establishing heavy industries in Canada.

I shall give only two examples of the abundance of our raw materials. We have steel in Quebec and there is some also in the other provinces; and yet, we have practically nowhere in Canada a steel plant to process our steel or our unfinished metal on the spot in order to turn it into a finished product.

The province of Quebec is very rich as far as steel is concerned—especially the northwestern area of the province—and it would be desirable to see a heavy steel industry settle there in order to be able to turn our unfinished production into a finished product. By the same token, we could reduce our trade deficit because, at present, our raw materials are exported to the United States to be processed and sent back to us with the consequence that the Americans take all the profits and get all the employment opportunities.

Considering that Canada has a population of over 19 million and large quantities of raw materials, it is time more than ever for the Department of Trade and Commerce to consider giving some assistance to the provinces and to co-operate with the provincial ministers of trade and industry so that we may do our own processing and keep both our raw materials and those profits we surrender to foreigners when they do the processing.

Each year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) racks his brains to find some way of reducing the balance of our international payments, the deficit balance of our national budget, and yet each year we allow almost a million dollars in profit, it was approximately $900,000,000 last year, to pass over to the United States. I do not say that all this profit was earned by the United States alone by opening up our raw materials, but this anomaly has been one of the causes of our deficit balance.

I would like to draw the attention of the minister of commerce to the fact that we are not short of anything in Canada. We have a population of 19 million. We have raw materials and crude products; yet we have men, unemployed people, engineers who would be able to establish a heavy industry for the processing of steel, asbestos and other products.

Thus we know that asbestos extracted in Asbestos and Thetford Mines is exported as raw material to the United States which is selling it back to us as a processed product. We could set up heavy industry plants in Canada, where Canadian ore could be processed and this would in turn encourage other secondary industries to produce ancillary products.

Before concluding, I should like to point out to the minister a number of anomalies in our import trade. Canada is buying from other countries machinery, implements and various products that she does not have or does not produce or that we ask other people to produce. Furthermore, in the province of Quebec, we are buying heavy machinery, equipment. And the people who are selling us this machinery or equipment do not take the trouble to supply us with instruction handbooks written in French. They are glad to come over and sell us their machinery, in the province of Quebec, and to take our money; therefore, it seems to me that it would be rather easy for the Department of Trade and Commerce to call this fact to the attention of manufacturers of farm machinery, so that they may give satisfaction to our French Canadians who need these machines, but find it difficult to operate them, because their handbooks are not written in our language. There are those who do not understand English. Yet, in the province of Quebec, machinery or equipment is bought which comes from England and the United States.

In fact, the case of one of our municipalities comes to my mind. It bought some machinery from the United States and it had some difficulty to use it because there was no French handbook.

I call the attention of the minister to those facts so that he will insist that these manufacturers supply us with French handbooks which will enable us to put those machines or that equipment to good use.

Mr. Marcoux: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words, express a few ideas concerning the Department of Trade and Commerce.

I wish, first of all, to congratulate the minister on what has been achieved through his officials and the existing agencies, thanks to his own work and devotion to the cause of Canada.

Still, in spite of his own efforts and those of the loyal and dedicated officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, the minister might change direction, change his attitude or even his philosophy.

Everyone knows that Canada has to compete with various countries. This competition is a good thing, even a necessary thing, as the minister said; if we want Canada to export, we must accept imports. That is quite normal.

On the other hand, respecting imports, we think about imports from Japan, and particularly textile products.

In my riding a textile industry suffered from Japanese competition. However, we must admit that the Japanese are industrious, intelligent and hard-working people and that they decided to resolve their problems themselves—that is their economic development—and that is why they produced goods which can compete on the Canadian market, in the United States and almost everywhere in the world. I do not think that they should be penalized because they took this initiative in order to improve the economy of their country. I rather think that the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury) should find some means of favouring Canadian industries in the case of identical competitive products.

Having said that, I just want to point out that during my recent trip to Taiwan the existence of a joint company was drawn to my attention; the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson) and I witnessed the laying of the corner stone of a building which will be occupied by a Sino-Canadian dairy at Tamsui. That joint company was set up by means of Canadian and Formosan capital. The Canadian capital was supplied by the Granby Farm Co-Operative Corporation exporting powdered milk. With this combined capital, powdered milk has been produced, put on the market and distributed in that country as well as in neighbouring countries.

I also heard about a similar experiment tried out by a Beauce company, the Vachon company. It has recently established a sugar refinery in Haiti which will employ a large number of people. I think the funds are furnished by Canadians and Haitians.

I believe this is a very good way for Canada to enter the international field and to promote not only the sale of its products but also our trade in general, for let us not forget that, even though we now have a trade and commerce department, until recent years Canada was rather dependant on work done by other countries who needed our raw materials to manufacture their finished products, or had to buy some of our grains and subsequently came and asked us whether we could not give preference to some of their goods. I believe the department should change its policy altogether, hire some people and train them as commercial travellers.

One of my friends who worked in Latin America as representative of a firm told me that trade representatives of some countries were travelling salesmen. As far as the promotion of a group of products is concerned, they were not satisfied with marketing them but that they sold those products to the benefit of private or joint companies.

I do not think that we have here a travelling salesman policy. I fail to see how Canada with such a small population can otherwise hope to grab a good part of the world market. Indeed, being part of America, Canadians enjoy a very high standard of living and earn high salaries; therefore, as far as competition is concerned, we can only succeed in getting a foothold on a market by offering a high quality product or a product that other companies are not in a position to make.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up too much of the time of this committee, but I want to point out that in the field of textile industries, Japan particularly has made enormous progress in manufacturing those products and, indirectly, this country is prejudicial in some instances to the textile industries of Canada. In my opinion, when we want to bring about some balance between our exports and imports, in a word, if we want to set some quotas in this field, we must show a very keen interest respecting this commodity, textiles.

Mr. Chairman, before I conclude my remarks, I want to say a few words about a man who is indirectly attached to the Department of Trade and Commerce, and who clearly shows how officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce should work in the country. I wish to refer to Mr. Pierre Dupuy, commissioner general for the world fair.

Mr. Dupuy has decided to sell the world fair to the various countries we wish to attract here. He did not wait for the leaders of those countries to come to enquire about the possibility of setting up a pavilion; he decided, regardless of the cost, to travel around the world several times; he is not through, for he is about to resume his travels around the globe. He decided to sell the idea of the 1967 world fair to as many countries as possible. He was successful and I think that he will also succeed in increasing the official number of participating countries. That is, in my opinion, the only way for Canada, and especially for the Department of Trade and Commerce, to really sell Canadian products. We have to take them abroad, to the countries we want to do business with. We must prove to them, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that Canadian products are the best on the market.

Mr. Chairman, it is on this note with this thought in mind, since it is getting late, that I wish to conclude my remarks.

Mr. Ricard: Mr. Chairman, as we turn to the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, I wish to make a few remarks about the textile industry which, as everyone knows, ranks among the oldest established industries in Canada and provides work for a great many Canadians, especially in the province of Quebec.

It is an industry which suffered neglect at the hands of previous Liberal administrations, and since I represent a constituency where many workers have jobs in textile plants, I cannot refrain from calling the minister's attention to the fact that he should not yield to the temptation of lending too attentive an ear to those who surround him, especially his cabinet colleagues.

I said just now that the textile industry suffered neglect under the previous Liberal regimes, and I want to remind the minister that, between 1951 and 1956, the number of textile workers in Canada has dropped from 98,000 to 91,000.

In Quebec and Ontario, there were about 745 textile plants located in approximately 218 localities. In 1953, the annual production reached $240 million and investments by the textile industry totalled $700 million. In the province of Quebec, 354 mills provided employment for the workers.

In 1954, 47,000 Canadians, most of them French speaking, worked in such mills. It was in the mid-thirties that that industry was neglected.

During the two decades before 1957, the tariffs protecting that industry were constantly lowered and that is why I say that the previous Liberal governments neglected that most important sector of our economy.

I will provide some even more convincing evidence of the Liberal attitude with regard to the textile industry by suggesting to the minister that he again read through the speech his leader made in 1958 as shown in Hansard, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) stated, more or less, that it was somewhat superfluous to give too much protection to that industry since it was not considered a native industry.

His colleague, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pickersgill), stated quite clearly that we were only wasting our time in attempting to save the industry.

As can be seen on page 3465 of the August 13, 1958 Hansard, the present Minister of Transport said the following:

I consider that to increase the tariff on wool against the British is a very bad thing in itself. I will say something more about that, though I cannot add much to what was said so admirably by the Leader of the Opposition on that point (the present Prime Minister). But I say this is just part of the policy, this is just the prelude to an increase in the most favoured nation rate against a country which is an essential market for our primary producers.

Later on, he added the following:

It is rather difficult to think of any industry that is much less indigenous.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, is how the present Minister of Transport pointed out that special attention to the textile industry was not something worth while.

Therefore, it is not surprising to find that during the years 1950-1954, 70 companies engaged in the textile industry which was providing employment for 21,000 Canadians, had to shut down.

I do not need to say any more to convince you of what I am stating, Mr. Chairman, since even in the town of Cornwall in your riding, several textile industries have had to shut down and lay off employees who, certainly, have come to you on many occasions to tell their story.

My purpose, therefore, is to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to give very special consideration to one of the oldest and essential industries in our nation's economy.

The minister knows, as well as I do, that during the last world war, especially, the textile industry played a most important, even indispensable, part in supplying our fighting forces.

As all other industries, the textile industry has to get modernized in order to face the automation problems which followed the last world war. Tremendous amounts of money have been invested to cope with the requirements of progress and to have at least a chance to compete with foreign products on the foreign markets, more particularly with those coming from underdeveloped countries where wage levels are well below those of the men working in this industry.

Not only have Canadians invested their money in that industry, they have also put in a great deal of know-how, in order that this industry, which is essential to the nation, may continue.

That sector of Canadian industry is worried and alarmed because of the competition from Japan, more particularly, as well as from Italy and some other countries.

We should not, in order to sell certain of our products, such as wheat, overlook the interests and the position of our citizens who have long been heavy taxpayers in this country.

During the last few minutes at my disposal I should like to ask the hon. minister to give all his attention to this industry. I should also like to draw his attention to the fact that a large number of industrialists are desirous of benefiting to a larger extent from the advice of the officials of his department, with a view to getting a foothold on foreign markets.

Recently I received a letter from a prosperous company from the city of St. Hyacinthe, the Rogar Company, which is interested in the manufacture of pharmaceutical products and would like to get help in finding possible foreign markets. This company got in touch with certain officials of the Department of Trade and Commerce, but the reply it obtained was absolutely discouraging. I have, in this connection, a letter which was addressed to the minister.

I am confident that the minister will pay all possible attention to this question because he wishes to increase to the greatest extent our trade with foreign countries. Like myself and all my colleagues in this house, he knows that if we increase production in this country, we will also increase the number of workers and the number of income taxpayers.

I will end my remarks by saying a few words respecting the world fair.

I am glad that the minister decided to grant his support to a project which was proposed by the previous government. He realized that many new jobs would be created by the fair and that a relative prosperity would ensue for many of our compatriots who thus would obtain steady employment for a fairly long period.

I should like to ask the minister to be our spokesman within the cabinet in asking his colleagues to look ahead, as of now, to the impact of the world fair. While it will provide jobs for many Canadians, it is obvious that once the fair is over, a serious problem will surely follow and any undue delay in taking steps to meet it would be prejudicial to Canadian workers.

Therefore, I think it is time, right now, to show the same degree of foresight as did the previous government. This government should show as much foresight as its predecessor to forestall any such problem after 1967, and see to it that the prosperity produced by the legislation passed by the Conservative government during the years 1957 to 1962, will not lead to failure. The administration that was called upon to manage the business of the nation in 1962 must show as much foresight as did the administration at that time.

Mr. Chairman, may I point out that it is ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, acting house leaders come and go. I wonder who will answer tonight and let us know what the business is for tomorrow.

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention to follow the order as announced by the Minister of Justice last evening. I shall continue with my estimates. If they are completed they will be followed by the balance of the estimates for which the Minister of Industry is responsible, namely the remainder of the Department of Defence Production and the votes for atomic energy and the national research council. If these are completed we will then turn to the estimates of forestry and public works.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved:

EQUALIZATION OF PAY FOR PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, the system of prevailing rates for government employees known as prevailing rate employees, which exists in defence establishments and some other government branches across the country, was brought into being by order in council P.C. 3271 on December 31, 1934, a long while ago, and I suggest that it is as hopelessly out of date as would be the minimum wages that were set out in that order in council in 1934, which provided a minimum hourly wage of 30 cents for men and 20 cents for women.

Originally the government applied this so-called fair wage clause to employees who were taking part in construction and such work, and therefore it was largely tradesmen who were involved. Over the years the government has not applied to its other employees this idea of paying one level of wages in one part of the country and another level elsewhere in the country, both for the same work.

For instance, with the railways we have the same wage rate across the country; with the civil service we have the same wage rate across the country; with the military services we have the same wage rate across the country, and with Air Canada we have the same wage rate across the country; and in this era of assistance to slow growth areas I think it is obvious that the railways, civil service and military policy of paying, in slow growth areas, the same rate as they pay in other areas has helped build up those areas. This prevailing rate policy does exactly the opposite, and has the opposite effect to minimum wage legislation.

Only the passive acceptance sometimes accorded to situations of relative antiquity has prevented earlier, massive opposition to a policy which allows Canadians to be paid different amounts of wages for doing the same work for the same government in different parts of the country. It is outdated and must go.

Over the years a number of different formulae have been applied to fix the wage rate for a trade in a particular area. Whatever is done to end this insidious system, interim pay increases should be granted meanwhile to those who are overdue for such treatment, such as the prevailing rate employees at H.M.C.S. Dockyard in Halifax. The application of prevailing rates has worked to their disadvantage. Tradesmen employed by the government in H.M.C.S. Dockyard at Halifax receive a much lower hourly rate when the formulae is applied than men working in the same trade in Vancouver, and of course as a consequence their yearly wage is considerably lower, despite the fact that residents of the Halifax area are expected to pay the same level of taxes. There is nothing but inequity in such a system and it is the very opposite of assistance for an area of slow growth.

I have been informed that the situation is being examined at present, but we want Halifax tradesmen employed by the government to receive a nationally established rate of pay, and it is not just the question of changing the formula. Anything less than a national rate of pay, the same as that provided by the railways and the military, is insufficient and inadequate.

I do not expect to receive any final answer tonight. My purpose in raising this matter is to ask that the fullest consideration be given to it. If the condition still exists when collective bargaining is brought into force for government employees—something I hope will occur in the near future—I trust this situation will be rectified at that time, because I am confident that the representations of these employees will cause that system to be done away with at an early date. We have been told that the prevailing rate employees, as well as civil servants, are to receive collective bargaining, and therefore I hope the final solution in this regard is not too distant.

I urge the government in its wisdom to see fit in the meantime to recognize how much of a contradiction this system, of prevailing rate employees receiving different wages in different parts of the country, is to its other policies. It is a situation that must end, and I hope it will end soon.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): The question has been put by the hon. member in such a way as to imply by the words he uses that the policy regarding prevailing rates which has been in effect for many years involves some kind of discrimination and unfair treatment against the employee groups who are paid under these arrangements. I think the hon. member could get a good deal of argument on this point, not least from many of the prevailing rate employees themselves.

The policy decision to pay certain classes of employees on the basis of so-called prevailing or local rates has been enshrined in federal legislation for the non-governmental segments of the economy coming under federal jurisdiction ever since 1935, when the first federal fair wages legislation was passed. It would be rather inconsistent for the federal parliament to impose on private industry within its jurisdiction the requirement that it pay wages in accordance with prevailing or local rates; and then to turn around and refuse to follow that policy itself.

The federal Department of Labour is the agency of government responsible for administering the prevailing rates provisions of the fair wages legislation, and for ascertaining in each local area the going rates for different kinds of employment which are binding on employers coming within the federal government's jurisdiction, including employees engaged on federal government contracts. The federal government naturally considers that in those same areas it is bound, by policy if not by law, to pay its employees in the same trades and crafts on the same basis and at the same rates as its laws impose on private industry. To depart from such a policy by paying lower rates than those prevailing in the local area would be unthinkable, and I am sure the hon. member is not advocating that. At the same time, to pay higher rates than those prevailing in the local community would have serious repercussions on the position of private industry in the same area and on its ability, especially in certain parts of Canada, to compete with the larger, more powerful enterprises which are largely located in central Canada.

I have said enough, I hope, to indicate the reasons for the policy which successive governments have followed for years, and which, as far as I am aware, the leaders of the respective staff associations understand and accept as fair and reasonable in the circumstances. I am not suggesting when I say this that they necessarily agree in all cases that the rates themselves are fair—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. minister, his time having expired.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.10 p.m.

APPENDIX

REFERENCES TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION ON WATER LEVELS AND WATER POLLUTION

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Canada

Ottawa, October 7, 1964.

Mr. D. G. Chance, Secretary,
International Joint Commission,
75 Albert street,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Chance,

In order to determine whether measures within the great lakes basin can be taken in the public interest to regulate further the levels of the great lakes or any of them and their connecting waters so as to reduce the extremes of stage which have been experienced, and for the beneficial effects in these waters described hereunder the governments of Canada and the United States have agreed to refer the matter to the international joint commission for investigation and report pursuant to article IX of the boundary water treaty of 1909.

It is desired that the commission study the various factors which affect the fluctuations of these water levels and determine whether in its judgment action would be practicable and in the public interest from the points of view of both governments for the purposes of bringing about a more beneficial range of stage for, and improvement in:

(a) domestic water supply and sanitation,
(b) navigation,
(c) water for power and industry,
(d) flood control,
(e) agriculture,
(f) fish and wildlife,
(g) recreation, and
(h) other beneficial public purposes.

In the event that the commission should find that changes in existing works or that other measures would be practicable and in the public interest in light of the foregoing purposes, it should indicate how the various interests on either side of the boundary would be benefited or adversely affected thereby. The commission should estimate the cost of such changes in existing works or of such other measures and the cost of any remedial works that might be found to be necessary and make an appraisal of the value to the two countries, jointly and separately, of such measures. For the purpose of assisting the commission in its investigations and otherwise in the performance of its duties under this reference the two governments will upon request make available to the commission the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of their governmental agencies and such information and technical data as may have been acquired or as may be acquired by them during the course of the investigation.

The two governments have agreed that when the commission's report is received they will consider whether any examination of further measures which might alleviate the problem should be carried out, including extending the scope of the present reference.

The commission is requested to submit its report to the two governments as soon as may be practicable.

Yours sincerely,

Paul Martin.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, Canada

Ottawa, October 7, 1964.

Mr. D. G. Chance, Secretary,
International Joint Commission,
75 Albert street,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Chance,

I have the honour to inform you that the governments of the United States and Canada have been informed that the waters of lake Erie, lake Ontario and the international section of the St. Lawrence river are being polluted by sewage and industrial waste discharged into these waters. Having in mind the provision of article IV of the boundary waters treaty signed January 11, 1909, that boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other side, the two governments have agreed upon a joint reference of the matter to the international joint commission, pursuant to the provisions of article IX of said treaty. The commission is requested to inquire into and to report to the two governments upon the following questions:

(1) Are the waters of lake Erie, lake Ontario, and the international section of the St. Lawrence river being polluted on either side of the boundary to an extent which is causing or is likely to cause injury to health or property on the other side of the boundary?

(2) If the foregoing question is answered in the affirmative, to what extent, by what causes, and in what localities is such pollution taking place?

(3) If the commission should find that pollution of the character just referred to is taking place, what remedial measures would, in its judgment, be most practicable from the economic, sanitary and other points of view and what would be the probable cost thereof?

In the conduct of its investigation and otherwise in the performance of its duties under this reference, the commission may utilize the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of the technical agencies of Canada and the United States and will so far as possible make use of information and technical data heretofore acquired or which may become available during the course of the investigation.

The two governments are also agreed on the desirability of extending this reference to other boundary waters of the great lakes basin at an appropriate time. The commission is requested to advise the governments when, in its opinion, such action is desirable.

The commission should submit its report and recommendations to the two governments as soon as practicable.

Yours sincerely,
Paul Martin.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, October 9, 1964

The house met at 11 a.m.

PROCEDURE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN THIRTEENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

Mr. Knowles (acting for the special committee on procedure and organization):

That the thirteenth report of the special committee on procedure and organization, presented to the house on October 7, 1964, be now concurred in.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, if the house does not agree with this suggestion I have no objection, but I wonder whether we could go ahead with the orders of the day and return to this motion immediately thereafter. There may be some discussion on this matter, and I would think it would be more in order if we finished the orders of the day and then returned to this motion. I am not trying to hold it up in any way; the questions would be concluded and then we could return to this matter.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I can speak only for myself, but I would say that as far as I am concerned I have no objection, provided it is understood now, without unanimous consent being required later, that we would revert to motions after orders of the day had been concluded. Of course, it is up to the house.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think we might accommodate the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I may say to the Prime Minister that there is no motion or anything of that kind to intervene. This is simply in order to expedite discussion.

Mr. Pearson: I have no objection to proceeding with orders of the day first.

Mr. Speaker: Do I understand that I should call motions and then go immediately to orders of the day, and revert to motions later?

Mr. Knowles: Yes, Mr. Speaker, on the understanding that when we revert to motions we will deal with both the thirteenth and fourteenth reports.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

STUDY OF PROVINCIAL ALLOCATIONS OF FEDERAL REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in connection with an article appearing in today's issue of Le Devoir. I would ask him whether the government has in its possession a study of the distribution of federal administration expenditures in the ten provinces and whether this document is, according to the report by Jean-Pierre Fournier, one of major importance in connection with Canada's economy and also the position of the province of Quebec.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Acting Minister of Finance to answer this question.

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Finance has been conducting a study of the allocation of federal revenues and expenditures among the ten provinces. This study is intended to provide material for answering questions on the subject asked by hon. members some months ago and referred to in the house the other day. Work has been going on in the department for months in anticipation of questions of this nature.

This subject was discussed at some length in the house on August 7 during the debate on the fiscal revision bill when the Minister of Finance indicated the nature of the work in progress and some of the difficulties being encountered. This study is only now being completed in the Department of Finance. The results are to be incorporated in replies to the questions asked hon. members; it has not yet been transmitted to the minister.

It will be evident that the assertions in the story in Le Devoir are untrue. The Minister of Finance was not given these completed figures three months ago, they have not been referred to the cabinet, and they have not been concealed.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Villeneuve.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, my question was already asked by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition.

My question was about the famous report which the government supposedly received more than three months ago.

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the Acting Minister of Finance to clarify the answer he gave the house a moment ago in connection with the study of the distribution of federal revenues.

Can he tell us whether or not the Minister of Finance has received a preliminary outline of the report to be submitted by his officials? If yes, can he say whether the minister has ordered a revision?

[Text]

Mr. Sharp: Mr. Speaker, the question is extremely complicated, and perhaps it would assist the house if I mentioned, for example, that one has to distribute sales tax collected at factories throughout all parts of the country. It would not be fair to say that all the sales tax collected at the factory in province A was paid by the consumers in province A; nor, for the same reason, would customs duties collected, for example, in the port of Montreal be properly attributed as revenues attributable to the province of Quebec, because those customs duties of course are paid by all Canadian consumers of those goods which pass through the port of Montreal. This is the nature of the problem; it is extremely complicated. The Minister of Finance has not seen any figures that have taken into account this redistribution of revenues collected at particular points.

Mr. Martineau: My question was directed to learning whether a preliminary report had been submitted to the minister.

Mr. Sharp: No preliminary report has been submitted which takes into account the factors that I have mentioned.

Mr. Martineau: Was any preliminary report whatsoever submitted?

Mr. Sharp: I do not understand the nature of the question, Mr. Speaker. Of course, you can look at public records and find out how much customs duty is collected at various ports. That information is available to the Minister of Finance. He has never seen any distribution of revenues amongst the ten provinces, as requested in the question asked in this house.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Lotbinière.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, it is the second time that you have called my name. The question I wanted to put is the same as that put by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker).

[Later:]

Mr. Maurice Côté (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister.

Could he tell the house whether the government will have enough courage to publish those studies made on the distribution of the federal government's expenditures in the ten provinces, even if those figures were to show that the province of Quebec was the least favoured of all the provinces?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: If the hon. member had listened and understood the answers given to this question he would have realized that this work is being done to secure information in reply to questions asked in the house and will automatically, of course, be made public.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question.

I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether he would agree to including two finance officials of the Quebec government among the officials of the federal government who are conducting this study, so as to eliminate the suspicions on the part of Quebeckers as to the objectiveness of certain federal officials?

[Text]

Mr. Pearson: Questions of this kind are answered on the responsibility of the government and with the advice and expert assistance of federal, not provincial, officials.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

CONSIDERATION OF ROYAL COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS BY DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister, in view of the submissions which have been made to the respective provinces by the various colleges of physicians and surgeons, particularly the more recent submission to the government of Quebec, suggesting a health insurance plan which would have the effect of dividing Canada into haves and have nots, whether he will give the house the assurance that when the federal government meets with the provinces it intends to place before them a proposal which would adhere to the basic recommendations of the Hall commission, particularly the recommendation that health services under such a plan should be available to all Canadians irrespective of financial ability to pay and without any means test.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Well, Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows the recommendations of the Hall commission are being examined at the present time. The examination is concerned with a very important as well as a very complicated matter, and the Hall commission have made a very important series of recommendations. The examination will also be associated with consultation with the provinces in this matter. There is certainly no intention on the part of the government, in any action which I hope will be taken and put before the house, of making the kind of discrimination to which my hon. friend refers.

ONTARIO—INCREASE IN RATES UNDER PRIVATE HEALTH PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Dean Howe (Hamilton South): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is the minister aware of a motion passed unanimously by the Niagara Falls city council, protesting the increase in the P.S.I. insurance rates and urging the federal government to establish a national medical care plan, and, if so, what has been her reply to them?

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

EDUCATION

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING STANDARDS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister.

During a televised interview the high commissioner for Canada in London, Hon. Mr. Chevrier, stated yesterday in London that it was difficult for his daughter to be admitted to a British university because the teaching standards in Canada are much lower than those in Great Britain.

Could the right hon. Prime Minister tell us whether he approves that a Canadian diplomat abroad should thus belittle his country, and could he find out if it might not be the daughter of Hon. Mr. Chevrier who is not qualified to meet university requirements in Great Britain?

[Text]

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have a great many things to occupy my attention these days, but I will make inquiries as to whether in fact the high commissioner ever made such a statement.

NATURAL RESOURCES

MAGAZINE ARTICLE ALLEGING PLUNDERING BY U.S. SPORTSMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to a fellow conservationist, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. My question is based on an article which appeared in Maclean's magazine on October 17, which was called to my attention by people who are interested in this subject. This article tells how wealthy United States sportsmen, ranging from generals to politicians, are plundering our last frontier. Would the minister inform the house what action he has taken to deal with this latest and graphic example of the plundering of Canadian natural resources by our United States neighbours?

Mr. Speaker: Would the hon. member put his question on the order paper.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I should like to give notice of my intention to deal with this question at the appropriate ten o'clock adjournment hour.

INCOME TAX

PROPOSED CHANGE IN METHOD OF REMITTANCE BY EMPLOYERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Revenue. Is it the intention of the minister to make it compulsory for employers to remit weekly income taxes collected at the source on a weekly basis rather than on the present monthly basis, due and payable on the 15th of the following month?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member's question arises out of remarks I made recently in Montreal. At the present time the taxation division is studying the possibility of allowing employers to deposit the monthly remittances of taxes collected from employees in their local chartered banks to the credit of the federal government. At the time when employers in Canada make up their payrolls and deduct taxes from their employees, that money at that point is the property of the government of Canada. It is hoped that within a period of time after the practice to which I have referred has been put into operation, ultimately employers will enjoy the convenience of being able to deposit these collected taxes in their local chartered banks the same day they make up their payrolls. These taxes will be deposited to the credit of the government of Canada. It will be some time before this can be accomplished.

Mr. Hales: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister saying in his present statement that the taxes must be remitted weekly rather than monthly? Does he realize the great inconvenience which will be caused to small businessmen if this practice is instituted?

Mr. Benson: Mr. Speaker, I did not say that. What I did say was that we are presently moving away from the practice of having monthly remittances made directly to the taxation division and toward a method of allowing the employers to deposit these taxes in their local chartered banks. I stated in my speech at Montreal that the ultimate step would be that the employers would deposit these taxes in their local banks at the same time as they write out their payroll cheques. The taxes collected belong to the government of Canada at the time they are collected. Under the present system there is some $100 million which remains in the hands of employers for a period of a month, and that money really belongs to the federal government.

Mr. Hales: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure from the minister's remarks that they will be made weekly. Am I correct in that assumption?

[Mr. Hales.]

Mr. Benson: No. It will depend on the payroll period, which may not be weekly. I should also like to point out to the hon. member that such a step is quite some distance away, because it will take us a good deal of time to get a system working whereby they can deposit monthly.

INDUSTRY

REPORTED STATEMENT RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF AUTOMOBILE INDUSTRIES

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Hon. Paul Martineau (Pontiac-Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Industry?

Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether there is any truth in the report from Paris to the effect that an agreement between the Canadian government and the Peugeot and Renault companies is nearly concluded and that a press release will be issued next week?

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, I believe that question was asked yesterday and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) answered that a statement would be made in the near future.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO INCREASED SOAP PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is based on a news item appearing in this morning's Montreal Gazette regarding an increase in soap prices that is now being passed on to the retail trade. I notice in this report that the reason given for this increase by the companies concerned is an increase in the price of raw materials. As a very large proportion of these raw materials are derived from the developing countries of Africa and we have continuing reports of a decline in such prices, and complaints in this regard were again voiced by African delegates at the interparliamentary union conference in Copenhagen, is the minister prepared to investigate the situation and also investigate what appears to be considered evidence of a combination for price fixing among these large corporations?

Hon. Mitchell Sharp (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this is a question that relates to many departments. I can assure the hon. member that I shall make inquiries and I will have suitable inquiries made elsewhere in the government as well.

TRANSPORTATION

QUEBEC—PROPOSED REDUCTION IN C.P.R. TRAIN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Transport but, in his absence, I shall put it to the acting minister.

Could the minister ask the board of transport commissioners to intervene without delay with the C.P.R. and have the company reconsider its decision to cut to three trains per week its service between Montreal and Mont Laurier and to operate fewer trains between Ottawa and Montreal, on the north shore of the Ottawa river, that is on the Quebec side? Such a change will be highly prejudicial to workers, students and business people in general.

Second, could the minister not convince the government that it would be better to give a grant to the C.P.R., if necessary, so as not to imperil any further the economy of my riding which is already considered as a designated area?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

[Translation]

Mr. Girouard: Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice that I intend to discuss this matter at ten o'clock, at the next opportunity.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO TERRITORIAL PARTICIPATION IN CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he is in a position to answer the question I put to him on October 1, which was whether he would allow the governments of the Yukon and Northwest Territories to participate as observers in the forthcoming federal-provincial conference on Indian affairs.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to answer the question asked by the hon. member and to inform the house that my colleague, the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Laing) and myself have decided to invite both commissioners of the Yukon and of the Northwest Territories, to attend that conference on Indians as observers. Also, some high officials of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources who have responsibility over education in both those territories will be invited to attend that conference.

[Text]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister not agree that it would be equally appropriate to invite as observers some of the native Indian people themselves who have a vital interest in this question?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, as I have already stated, that federal-provincial conference is at the level of ministers and officials of both governments. Its object is to discuss a program which will then be systematically submitted to all the Indians in the country.

I think this procedure is the best way to bring a solution to the problem, which is to co-ordinate policy. There should be an initial conference at government level and, then, discussions of various formulas with different Indian groups in order to have their suggestions concerning those programs.

[Text]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is the minister taking any steps to solicit the views and ideas of the Indian people on a national scale, inasmuch as their views should be placed before the participants in the conference at the time of their discussions?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: We thought it better first to hold a conference at the government level before inviting the comments of the Indians on those policies, because we want to be able to submit to the Indians a co-ordinated program implying participation, for various reasons, of the various administrative levels of the country.

We feel that the Indians will be more satisfied with a program which will have been discussed first from the administrative and financial viewpoints at the level of the various governments.

[Text]

Mr. Howard: May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has consulted with his colleague the Minister of National Health and Welfare to ascertain whether she has changed her mind about the fact that the Indians should be consulted prior to any of these discussions and prior to any decisions being made.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Before the minister answers that, may I ask a supplementary question. At the same time would he consider also the fact that while it is hoped the ministerial meeting to discuss Indian affairs will arrive at some conclusions, rather than presenting these conclusions to the Indians would it not be advisable to have Indian representatives present in order that they may be consulted at the time the decisions are being made?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, decisions will not be arrived at by that conference. At that meeting the federal and provincial governments will discuss the problems which might be raised by the extension of provincial services in the various provinces.

It is thought that a more systematic and efficient discussion might take place after the conference, if discussions were held during that conference they would involve both the relations of the governments with the Indians and those of the federal government with the provincial governments. It is felt that the interests of the Indians will be better served in this way.

This program in regard to the Indians includes no decisions whatsoever, but merely suggestions, and we shall be happy to make all the necessary changes in the program after we receive the recommendations and suggestions from the Indians.

[Text]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the minister whether there has been any request from any Indian organization or band anywhere in this country to have the jurisdiction of the federal government over Indians sublet, transferred or assigned to the provinces. This is a very serious step and one that places the Indians in a position of subservience before the Indians have ever made any request for this. It looks like a very high handed practice.

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say this. A distinction must necessarily be made between the provincial services which were extended in the field of education under the administration of the Leader of the Opposition as well as by other governments.

A distinction must be made between the availability of certain provincial services to the Indians and the transfer of jurisdiction.

As I said, it is not a matter of transferring federal jurisdiction to the provinces, and I know that all or most Indians in this country are opposed to the federal government's powers being transferred to any provincial government whatsoever. On the other hand, I am well aware that all our Indians are only too glad when they are given the same advantages as other provincial citizens where social security and education are concerned.

As for the way in which provincial services can be made available to Indians, we shall be glad to discuss the matter with the Indians so as to hear their opinions and their suggestions regarding these programs.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Then the minister has said that the Indians would be very satisfied to have certain jurisdiction—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Not jurisdiction but the administration—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I should like to get the distinction, because if I cannot get it I feel sure the Indians are not likely to get it.

Mr. McIlraith: I am not too sure.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know what the interruption was from the President of the Privy Council.

Mr. McIlraith: I said I am not too sure of that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister says the Indians as a whole are desirous of having the advantage of the social services in the provinces. When did consultation with the Indians take place which leads him to make such a statement, which in my opinion has no justification?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, all the officials of the Indian affairs branch are constantly in touch with the Indian chiefs and the chairmen of the Indian councils, and the department has been aware for years of those needs, so much so that in the case of the province of Ontario, certain agreements have been reached with the provincial authorities in order to allow Indian children to attend Ontario schools. In fact, this trend has prevailed in Canada for many years.

But instead of reaching special agreements, what the government wants to do now is to establish an over-all program for the country, precisely so that what has been done for years in some provinces may be achieved within over-all programs, which will be to the greatest advantage of the Indians themselves.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: Is this general plan designed to provide an opportunity whereby the Eskimo problem in Labrador will be easily solved? Is this what is behind this plan?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, contrary to the suggestion just made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, this conference will deal exclusively with Indian affairs.

[Text]

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Eskimo is an Indian today.

Mr. Howard: I wonder if I might direct a question to the acting house leader, further to the questions which have just been asked. I should like to ask whether in view of what, to me, appear to be contradictory or vague statements made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on this subject he does not think it would be advisable to recall the estimates of the Indian affairs branch either immediately or at an early date, so we might have an opportunity to ascertain exactly what is in the mind of the government with regard to this matter.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): I will be glad to take the suggestion made by the hon. member under consideration, but I would point out to him that his remarks or comments are undoubtedly due to the fact that questions on the orders of the day are going beyond what the rules provide.

An hon. Member: Judge McIlraith.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): In his replies to certain of the questions which have been asked the minister said decisions are made without consultation with the chiefs of the Indian councils. Is he prepared to tell us that the chief of the Blackfoot reserve, the chief of the Sarcees and the chief of the Gleichen reserve are satisfied with the consultation they are getting?

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me we have had an extended discussion on this matter. Surely that is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Nielsen: One brief supplementary. Is the minister telling the house that the final solution to the Eskimo problem in Quebec will not be discussed at this conference?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I said the Department of Citizenship and Immigration had only jurisdiction over the Indians, according to the definition of the Indian Act, and that the conference would deal only with the problems of the Indians.

If, at that conference, any province, Newfoundland for instance, is interested in certain questions relating to Eskimos, arrangements could be made with the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. But the conference will only deal with problems concerning Indians who come under the Indian affairs division of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

[Text]

Mr. Nielsen: May I direct a question to the minister of northern affairs, and ask him whether he will be attending that conference.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): If the question of Eskimos in Ungava is being discussed I certainly anticipate I will be there. I do not think it has been pointed out that while the determination of the Supreme Court of Canada was that Eskimos are a tribe of Indians, Eskimos and their administration are expressly excluded from the powers of the Indian Act. The discussions which are to take place are in relation to the Indian Act.

Mr. Douglas: May I ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether a copy of the agenda for the projected conference will be made public prior to the conference so that members of the house may have an opportunity to see it? Second, are we to take it from his remarks that the minister's concept of the Indian consensus on this whole question of federal-provincial services has been obtained from the reports he gets from the Indian agents rather than as a result of direct consultation with the Indians themselves?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: No, Mr. Speaker, what I said is that the Indians' needs regarding provincial services are referred to us by the various agents who are in contact with those who wish to obtain increases in allowances, unemployment benefits, welfare benefits, etc., or who wish to attend such or such provincial school.

Still, in so far as the over-all program is concerned, as I have mentioned the matter will be submitted to the Indians for their suggestions. No decision will be taken by the government before those consultations have been held and the Indians themselves have made their suggestions, for as I have already said they are the ones who are most interested in any program concerning them.

[Text]

Mr. Douglas: What about the agenda for the conference?

[Translation]

Mr. Tremblay: Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to send to the hon. members a copy of the agenda which lists the problems to be discussed.

[Text]

[Later:]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. In view of the serious constitutional problems involved with respect to the obvious intention of the government regarding the transfer of responsibility for and jurisdiction over the Indian people of Canada—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Would the hon. member state his question quickly and not make extraneous remarks.

Mr. Nielsen: In view of this obvious intention of the government, will the Prime Minister consider, under enabling legislation to that effect, referring the whole question of the right of the executive to transfer jurisdiction to the Supreme Court of Canada, as the government is entitled to do under enabling legislation?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker; I think we should proceed with the conference as planned.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

APPLICATION OF MINIMUM WAGES AND HOURS LEGISLATION TO EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): I have a question for the Minister of Labour. Has the minister received a protest that employees of small post offices are not included under the terms of Bill C-126 relating to minimum wages and hours in federal undertakings?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Aiken: Is consideration being given to rectifying this glaring error in the bill?

Mr. MacEachen: It will be possible on second reading of the bill to clarify the relationship of the provisions of that bill to the class of employee mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Aiken: Do I understand, then, that some consideration is being given to the inclusion of these employees?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is extending the debate beyond all limits.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SPEECH BY JUSTICE MINISTER RESPECTING TREATMENT OF OFFENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Justice, but in his absence perhaps I may direct it to the Prime Minister. In view of the strong views of the Minister of Justice concerning the treatment of offenders in Canada, as indicated in a speech made last night, is the government now going to take a strong hand in the prevention of the phasing out of certain minimum security institutions?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to discuss this matter with the minister and perhaps he will reply next week.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NEWSPAPER REPORT CONCERNING MEETINGS OF HOUSE LEADERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the acting house leader. I would ask the acting house leader whether he has seen the article in this morning's Globe and Mail by Mr. George Bain, giving an inaccurate report of a confidential meeting of the house leaders held in the minister's office. I know how fair minded the minister is and I would ask him, if he has seen the article, if he will state to the house that it is inaccurate, and in particular the sentence which says that at that meeting "there was no objection".

Is the minister prepared to state that when he suggested a change for the estimates of the Department of Justice from Thursday to Wednesday, I said that I had no authority to speak for my party without consultation, and that if a change was to be made it must be made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs himself, who had earlier suggested that Thursday would be the day rather than Wednesday?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret to have to advise the house that due to other heavy demands on my time this morning I have not seen the Globe and Mail today. I have not talked to Mr. George Bain for some considerable time; I do not know how many days ago, but many days ago, and certainly not this week.

I know nothing about the story. I regarded the meetings that took place as confidential. I regret very much that the house leader for the official opposition has seen fit to disclose what he regards as part of the discussion that took place in a confidential meeting. For my part, if he is going to attempt to disclose parts of those meetings I am going to have something to say, too, and disclose them all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McIlraith: I regret very much the house leader for the official opposition attempting to disclose—

Mr. Laing: Nibble.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, or nibble away at what I regard as a confidential meeting. I propose for my part to retain that confidentiality, and I am not going to say more on the subject at this time.

Mr. Churchill: I rise, then, on a question of privilege—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: —and I withdraw my remark about the minister being fair minded.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: My question of privilege is this; that a confidential meeting held in his office has been disclosed to the press, and the report is inaccurate. I think this is a matter that should be taken up by the house. I regret that I did not see the article until I entered the chamber this morning; otherwise I would have prepared a suitable motion.

Mr. McIlraith: I have not seen it yet.

Mr. Churchill: I reserve the right to raise this matter again, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Byrne: Don't be so thin skinned.

Mr. Churchill: I am not thin skinned at all. I do not object to these reports, but I would prefer that they be accurate rather than inaccurate. This is casting a slur on the Progressive Conservative party and is a deliberate slur on me by the author of this article, without any consultation with me whatsoever. I would like to know who disclosed the confidential character of the meetings in the minister's office. As I say, Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to raise this matter again.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I hope the hon. member is not suggesting that I disclosed this information. I know nothing about the article. I am in that position; and if the hon. member has his problems, that is up to him.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Churchill: I made no suggestion that the minister had made this disclosure, but I draw his attention to the fact that a confidential meeting in his office has been disclosed to the press and that it is an inaccurate disclosure. I thought the minister would at least state the facts as they are, so the record would be clear; but he has neglected to do so. I think it is a disgrace on the part of the minister not to straighten the matter out.

Mr. Speaker: With the unanimous consent of the house, I suggest that we now revert to motions.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF VISIT TO OTTAWA BY THE QUEEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to delay the proceedings and I would be very glad to have the house revert to motions, but I am waiting for an answer to a question I asked on October 7 with regard to the broadcast of Her Majesty's arrival in Ottawa on Sunday. The Secretary of State was to give a reply, and I see he is here now. I would ask him what the C.B.C. said with reference to the article to the effect that the C.B.C. was downgrading the Queen's activities, in one particular by not broadcasting her arrival in Ottawa on Sunday next.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, if I am not mistaken I said to the right hon. gentleman that I would convey his views to the C.B.C. I am now informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation that in planning coverage of the events in connection with Her Majesty's visit to Ottawa it was decided to give live television coverage to the war memorial ceremony on Monday morning and the departure from Uplands on Tuesday morning. The C.B.C. has already covered fully the two arrivals in Prince Edward Island with all their colour and ceremony, and will also cover the arrival and other events in Quebec city.

As to the arrival of the royal party in Ottawa on Sunday evening, this will take place after dark with minimum ceremonial display. Consequently this event will be covered for the national audience by the C.B.C. news service for French and English networks that evening.

[Translation]

Mr. Auguste Choquette (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Secretary of State.

The C.B.C. covered the arrival of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II; could the minister tell the house whether any favourable comments have been received in regard to that coverage?

Mr. Lamontagne: No, Mr. Speaker, I, personally have received neither favourable nor unfavourable reports.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION ON POLLUTION OF RED RIVER

Hon. C. M. Drury (Minister of Industry): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs I wish to inform the house that the governments of Canada and the United States of America have agreed to place jointly before the international joint commission a reference on pollution in waters crossing the international boundary in the Red river.

In view of the interest which the house has taken in this matter it may be the wish of the house that this reference, which is in the form of a letter from the Secretary of State for External Affairs to the secretary of the international joint commission, should be printed as an annex to Hansard. This reference and the two references which I brought before the house yesterday I will now table.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's note: For text of letter referred to above see appendix.]

PROCEDURE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN THIRTEENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that the thirteenth report of the special committee on procedure, presented to the house on Wednesday, October 7, be now concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege and honour to move concurrence in the thirteenth report of the special committee on procedure and organization, and to do so on behalf of the committee. I trust hon. members have read this report, which was made part of Votes and Proceedings for Wednesday, October 7, but I think it would be desirable that a brief summary of what we are now proposing be given to the house and thus placed on Hansard at this time.

May I say at the outset that as with previous proposals which this committee has recommended to the house, we are suggesting that the ones we are now proposing be adopted for the remainder of the present session, unless otherwise ordered by the house.

We are making at this point, Mr. Speaker, proposals with respect to three phases of our procedure, and I shall now deal with them one at a time. In the first place we are proposing changes in standing order 26 (3). Standing order 26, as all hon. members know, is the one under which it is possible from time to time to seek to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance. So far as this standing order is concerned we are not proposing anything new, if one has in mind our present practices. However, there are two aspects of our present practice with respect to standing order 26 which it might be said are not completely clear. What we are trying to do in this proposal is to tidy up standing order 26; we are trying to make these two points crystal clear.

The first point has to do with the right of members from the floor to speak to the question of debate before Your Honour rules whether there is such urgency. We propose that the right, which has now been accepted more or less in practice, be written into the rule itself. The sentence we propose to accomplish this is:

If Mr. Speaker questions the urgency of debate with respect to the proposed matter, he may invite members to speak on the question of such urgency.

The other point about standing order 26 concerning which there might be said to be some ambiguity is whether there is the right of appeal against Mr. Speaker's ruling in those cases where he rules that a motion is not of sufficient urgency to be allowed debate under the standing order. This matter has been debated a number of times and votes of the house have been taken. Those votes, as Your Honour and the previous Speaker know, have gone both ways. The majority of the votes and the more recent ones have been to the effect that there should not be an appeal. So we would write into the standing order words to the effect that, provided Mr. Speaker has listened to argument from the floor, any ruling that he then makes is not subject to appeal, and the sentence we propose to put into standing order 26, section (3) reads as follows:

Any ruling made by Mr. Speaker after listening to argument on the question of urgency shall not be subject to appeal, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 12 (1).

Those then, Mr. Speaker, are the two matters concerned with standing order 26. As I say, we are tidying it up. We are writing into the rule what we have accepted in practice; and it is the general view of the committee, and I think the general view of members, that it would be a good idea to have this matter made definite. That is what we propose in the first of these three suggestions we now make.

I come now to the second of the proposals that Your Honour's committee presents to the house at this time, and it has to do with the resolution preceding what is called a money bill. As hon. members know, there has been discussion for a long time about the debate on a resolution preceding a money bill. Before 1955 there were two stages of debate prior to a money bill itself being presented; there was debate on the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair to go into committee of the whole on the resolution; then there was debate in committee of the whole on the resolution itself. In 1955 we amended the rule to eliminate the debate with Mr. Speaker in the chair, but we continued the debate in committee of the whole.

There has been an expression of opinion, which has been widely supported, that we might consider doing away with that stage of debate altogether. As a matter of fact there has been wide support for that abolition on the floor of this House of Commons. However, Mr. Speaker, there are procedural arguments for retaining at least a limited debate on a resolution preceding a money bill, and there is at least an element of doubt as to whether, under the constitution, we have the right to abolish the reference of such a resolution to a committee. I might say that very learned experts on parliamentary and constitutional procedures have said that doubt could be set aside, but if the doubt is there at all it seems to us that we should not fly in the face of it.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, we are not recommending the abolition of the debate on a resolution preceding a money bill. We are in fact recommending that it be retained, but that the debate on such a resolution in the committee of the whole be limited to not more than one sitting day. We define a sitting day in our proposed standing order in what I think are explicit terms. We make it clear that if such a resolution preceding a money bill is the first item called under government orders on a Monday, Tuesday, Thursday or Friday, and if it continues to the end of any one of those days, that is a full sitting day, and at that point that debate is terminated. However, in order to make it possible for such an order to be called at some other time—as the second or third item on one of those days, or on a Wednesday—we provide that under any other circumstances than the first one I indicated, five hours of debate in committee of the whole on a resolution preceding a money bill shall be considered to be the equivalent of one sitting day.

Once we provide for a limit of that kind on a debate, obviously the question arises as to what happens if one, two or more people, who have unlimited time, take up a good portion of the day, and is that fair? We recommend that when we are in committee of the whole on a resolution preceding a money bill, notwithstanding the provisions of other orders, all speakers shall be limited to 20 minutes. We make no change in the right to speak more than once, in other words no change in the right to ask questions and give answers, but we do limit each speaker to 20 minutes at any one time.

It will be seen that we are trying to get this debate back to its original character, namely an occasion when there can be inquiries and short statements about the financial provisions of the measure itself. Your committee, sir, is strongly in support of this proposition and believes it is a good one for the house to try out. Therefore we present it to the house in the name of Your Honour's committee at this time, and we hope it will commend itself to the house generally.

Sir, I come now to the third and last of the proposals contained in this thirteenth report, and this has to do with the consideration of clause 1 of bills when we are in the committee of the whole. There is a general feeling, certainly shared by the members of Your Honour's committee, that our opportunities for general debate are more numerous than they need be. We have the opportunity of a general debate on a resolution preceding a money bill. We have the opportunity of a general debate on second reading. Then immediately we get into committee of the whole it is possible to have another general debate on clause 1. Every bill also has somewhere—in clause 3 or 4, or perhaps in more than one—what might be called its main operative clause, and under that main operative clause it is possible to have wide general debate. We think that some of the length of time we spend, and some of the repetition in which we indulge, may be due to this arrangement. In most cases clause 1 of a bill provides only a short title. I might say that it is the practice in the parliament of the United Kingdom to have that short title at the end of the bill rather than as its first clause. We think, therefore, without changing the structure of bills at all, that there is a very simple answer to this situation.

We now have standing order No. 78 (1), which states that the title and the preamble are not considered until the rest of the clauses of the bill have been considered. We suggest that the same thing should apply to clause 1 of a bill, and that when we get into committee of the whole to consider a bill, clause 1 should not at that point be called if it contains only a short title. Of course if it is clause 1 of an amending bill and contains substance, or something other than the short title, then this standing order will not apply. However, if clause 1 contains only a short title we suggest the committee move immediately to clause 2 and on through the clauses of the bill, and when all the other clauses have been dealt with, that clause 1 then be called.

May I point out, Mr. Speaker, that we are not eliminating the possibility of general debate in the committee of the whole, because there is in every bill a main operative clause. As I say, it is usually clause 3 or clause 4, in respect of which general discussion is possible. We are not even eliminating the possibility of general discussion on clause 1, because we are providing that it be called after the other clauses have been disposed of. But we believe that if at that point the bill has been thoroughly discussed, and possible amendments have been dealt with, the chances that members will want to discuss clause 1 at length are a bit on the slim side. We think, therefore, that technical though this change may seem—switching the discussion on clause 1 from the beginning to the end—it would have a time saving and useful effect.

Mr. Speaker, if the house will consider these last two proposals together—the second and third proposals of this report, limiting the debate on resolutions preceding money bills to one day, and transferring the consideration of clause 1 of bills to the end of the consideration by the committee of the whole—I think it will realize that we are making suggestions that do not in any way curtail or limit freedom of speech, and do not in any way interfere with the right of the fullest possible examination of measures that are brought before it, but that on the other hand they provide for sharper and crisper debate. We believe these proposals, which are being made in this house in the name of the special committee on procedure and organization, are good and worth-while proposals. We dare to believe that having tried them out the house will want to continue them in future sessions. At this moment we recommend that they be tried out from the time this report is adopted, as I trust it will be, until the end of the present session.

Therefore, on behalf of Your Honour's committee on procedure and organization, I commend this thirteenth report to the House of Commons for its endorsation.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has outlined, in more detail than I shall attempt, the reasons behind the presentation of this report of Your Honour's committee to the house for its approval.

I should like to make one or two brief observations and a general comment. In respect of the question of appeal, it has been my view for some time, I think shared by other hon. members, that the whole question of appeals from Your Honour's rulings must receive consideration. There are many anomalies, not the least of which is the fact that basically the chairman of a standing committee has considerably more authority that Your Honour in that, as precedent now stands, there is no appeal from his ruling, nor can an appeal from his ruling be brought into the house for further consideration. This is one aspect which I think in due course will lead to a full report on this whole question.

However, in taking this step I assume we are conducting what might be termed a form of clinical research, because in presenting these amendments to the house for the duration of this session, the extent of which is now unknown, we will have an opportunity to see how they develop and work out in practice.

On the question of the discussion on the first clause in committee, there is no doubt in my mind that here there has been unnecessary and repetitious debate. I think this is a situation which might well be cured by the proposed amendment, and that even the most hardened offender in respect of the rule against repetition will be inclined to let the opportunity pass when he is confronted with the chance to repeat what he has already said after going through the clause by clause discussion in committee. If, on the other hand, something develops during the course of the clause by clause discussion which justifies him in making a further contribution, he has that opportunity.

The third item which did give us some concern was the question of the resolution stage on matters involving the expenditure of money, where a recommendation is made by the government to the house. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has said, there is a constitutional aspect which is of interest. There is, of course, another aspect which caused a great deal of concern and on which there was a considerable amount of discussion. In limiting the debate to one day we felt compelled, in spite of other standing orders of the house, to limit each member to 20 minutes. This trespasses, of course, on the traditional rights of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. As I say, this matter did give us concern and evoked discussion and argument. I think I can safely say it was as a result of compromise that our recommendation was brought forward in this way. My view, Mr. Speaker, is that in due course I should like to see the complete abolition of the resolution stage, but there is grave doubt in that regard because of the possible constitutional cloud entailed in section 54 of the British North America Act.

There is also another aspect which hon. members will have in mind, namely that it is at the resolution stage that members have the opportunity to put forward alternatives to legislation which has not yet been presented. Once legislation has been introduced and comes up for second reading there are strong limitations on the opportunity of a member to make his views known as to possible alternatives. It would be my hope that at such time as we are able to agree to abolish the resolution stage we might also consider widening the powers of individual members to bring forward amendments, so they will not be bound and trammelled as they are today by the existing rules. It is quite notorious that the opportunity of a member in committee or elsewhere to bring forward substantive amendments is definitely limited, and the resolution stage on financial measures has provided some extension of that opportunity.

Finally, by way of general comment let me say that I am one of those who believe that the standing orders as they now are, with the addition of the precedents and decisions laid down over the years by Your Honour and your distinguished predecessors, are in sum total adequate to cover almost any contingency which may arise in the house. But that does not mean that from time to time members who feel they have a just cause to put forward do not override the rules. I am not inciting members to do this, but this is a situation which does develop because of the nature of the house, because of the type of men and women who are members of the house, and because of the issues which come before the house from time to time.

It has happened in the past that the rules have not always been adhered to, and it will happen again. I think it would be a sorry day for the house and the country if that did not happen, if we had a situation where a session would start and finish without someone, in pursuance of what he felt was a worthy and most desirable objective, going to lengths which the Chair might feel were in excess of the standing orders.

Having said that, it does not mean that we should not, in an effort to ensure that our procedures will be regular and that traffic will flow smoothly and adequately, make provision in minor ways for bridges, overpasses and stop lights so the traffic can be regulated and made to flow smoothly. In that sense, subject to what I have said, these are the types of amendments that the committee has offered to the house today.

Miss Pauline Jewett (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, as a member of the committee on procedure I take pleasure in joining with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Peace River in asking for concurrence of the house in these reports. I endorse the remarks that have already been made about them, and I hope and expect that all members of the house will do likewise.

Indeed, since one of the reasons for the recommendations is to remove some of the extraordinary repetition in debate that goes on in this chamber, I shall not violate the spirit of these recommendations by engaging now in any repetition of the excellent remarks that have already been made by the two hon. members I have just mentioned.

I would simply say that in my opinion these steps are very modest ones. Perhaps as a newcomer to the house one is more impatient to make somewhat sharper and more drastic reforms in the procedures of the house. These are modest steps but they are extremely important ones and will, I hope, lead to further reports in other areas in which there is an equal need for reform.

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal briefly with one of the concepts in the report, namely that there should not be an appeal from Your Honour's decision. May I say first that in essence I agree with this contention. However, without any disrespect to yourself and knowing that you will not take offence at what I am about to say, I would point out that the degree to which members accept the idea that there should not be appeals from your rulings will be influenced by the person who holds the office Your Honour now holds, and the circumstances under which he holds it.

For argument's sake, as long as we have a Speaker who at least at some time during his term of office engages in partisan activities—I refer now to elections—we are likely to have less than the desirable degree of respect for what is supposed to be the non-partisan approach of the person who holds that office.

I think there would be greater acceptance of the principle of no appeals from Your Honour's rulings if Your Honour held the position permanently. If we had a situation in Canada, and I hope we will reach this stage, where the position of Speaker was a permanent one and the Speaker was not forced to engage in partisan activities at election time in order at least to be returned as a member of parliament, if not to hold the office of Speaker again, it would be much easier for us to accept the idea of no appeals from Your Honour's rulings.

We have advocated the concept that every constituency should be represented by a member who is able to speak on behalf of his constituents in the House of Commons and engage in the debates that take place. This is a privilege Your Honour does not now have. To this end we have suggested that members of parliament should elect the person to fill the position of Speaker and for that purpose we should declare the House of Commons to be a constituency so that Your Honour would in effect be our member of parliament. No constituency of Canada would thereby be deprived of a vocal member representing it by virtue of his attaining the office of Speaker. If we could get to this stage I think there would be a great desire on the part of members to accept the idea that Mr. Speaker's rulings should not be subject to appeal, regardless of the circumstances under which those rulings were issued.

It is fortunate, I think, that the proposed changes are to apply for a temporary period of time; that this is really to be a sort of testing period to see how the rules work in practice and whether the practice meets the theoretical concept the proposers had in the first instance. It has long been our contention that the debate at the resolution stage preceding money bills is rather superfluous. In effect we have had two second reading debates, one of them occurring at a time when we do not know the contents of the bill itself, except as they may be referred to in the resolution under consideration. In essence I endorse this idea that the debate at the resolution stage preceding money bills really creates a situation where superfluous debate can take place.

I would rather have seen the committee tackle this with a bit more firmness and attempt to eliminate debate at the resolution stage, rather than just confine it to one day and also restrict each speaker to 20 minutes. What I think is likely to occur is that we will push the backbencher farther into the background during this debate at the resolution stage. It will, in effect, become a sort of leaders' day, even though there is a 20 minute time limit on speeches. Those who are leaders or who are in the forefront of their parties will have a greater opportunity to engage in this debate, and the backbencher will have a lesser opportunity than exists now to engage in the debate at that stage. As I have said, I would rather have seen the elimination of debate at this stage than to approach the matter in this way. The confinement of the debate will have a tendency to give less and less respect to the ideas and desires of the backbencher.

I have some reservations, too, about the effectiveness of the third proposal, that is consideration of clause 1 at the end of the bill. Even though this may not have been in accordance with the rules, even though the hope might not have been realized because of the exigencies of political activity in the house, we had looked upon the consideration of clause 1 of the bill as a time when, because we were in committee and it was possible to ask specific questions of the minister and get replies from him without closing the debate, we would have the opportunity to get some indication in a detailed way about the effect of the provisions of the bill which it is not possible to do during second reading. As you know, the second reading debate is more formalized, and when the minister speaks the second time he closes the debate and that is the end of consideration of the bill at that stage. Clause 1 did appear to provide an opportunity, especially for members of the opposition, to get more detailed information about the effect of the bill than was possible at second reading. This enables the opposition to make up their minds about the principle of the bill and its subsequent clauses, even though it might not be possible to refer in detail to any of the subsequent clauses.

I have some reservations, therefore, about the effect of the third proposal. However, my attitude about it is not put forward in a way that would lead to opposition to the proposal before us.

As I have said, these proposals are to be applied on an interim basis. There will be a testing period for these rules in the days ahead, just as there has been in the past in respect of changes in the rules. If these proposals, or some of them, become permanent we may be able to develop a set of rules that will permit the orderly dispatch of public business and allow parliament to proceed in a more efficient way than has been the case in the past.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I only want to say a few words about this and to give general support to the recommendations of the committee. I urge concurrence in the motion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

So far as the first proposal is concerned, that of tightening up the provisions of standing order No. 26, I think the present provisions make it almost a violation of the rules for Your Honour to ask for advice from members as to whether there is urgency of debate. I think it would be helpful to the Speaker at any time to invite some comments from various corners of the house before a decision is reached as to whether there is urgency of debate at the time. I believe, without being disrespectful at all, sir, it is quite impossible for Your Honour to be fully aware of current events in the country to the extent that you can independently, without some consideration, be called upon to make what may be called a snap judgment as to whether there is urgency of debate with regard to the matter raised. I believe it is a good thing to write into the standing order a formal provision enabling you to invite comment on the urgency of debate.

Then, of course, I agree that once you have made a decision there should not be any appeal from that decision. After all, after you had invited members to advise you on the urgency of debate in connection with the matter there certainly would have been some expression of opinion from members, and I feel we should have sufficient confidence in the Speaker to accept his decision after he has heard the advice of the members of the house.

The second proposal, namely restricting to some extent the debate that takes place on the resolution preceding a money bill, has been the subject of consideration for some time. I do not have the quotations in front of me, and even if I did I would not like to read all of them, but I think it is fair to say there have been expressions from spokesmen for all parties in this house that something should be done to restrict this particular debate. I go back to those opinions that were expressed when the committee on procedure and organization was set up. In the first place, I believe you will find the opinion expressed by all parties that something should be done to either eliminate the debate on the resolution preceding a bill, or at least to tighten it up. I think the step taken here is probably the wisest one in the circumstances, because to do away entirely with the resolution stage proceedings in relation to money bills would raise constitutional problems involving the royal prerogative.

As far as proposal No. 3 is concerned, may I point out that we have witnessed in this house, during the last few months particularly, the development of what amounts to a further full scale debate on the first clause of a bill after it has been introduced in committee. This proposal would simply transfer discussion on the first clause to the end of the debate in committee, and then only if it contained the short title and nothing else. I therefore think there will probably be a disposition on the part of the house to pass this clause more quickly than in the past, since there would have been full discussion on all the other clauses of the bill before the discussion on the short title was reached.

In closing I should like to say that we in this party feel we should support these proposals on a trial basis. It is clearly stated in the recommendations that they be adopted on a trial basis for the remainder of this session, and that other arrangements can be made if they prove too restrictive or if further amendments can be brought in to enable the business of this house to be conducted more efficiently. We in this party are ready to support the suggestions for the balance of this session.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I fail to see the purpose or the necessity of extending the debate on the thirteenth report of the special committee on procedure and organization, presented today.

We, in this corner of the house, believe that any step to improve the Canadian parliamentary system, while respecting the rights and prerogatives of each member of parliament, should meet with the approval of the whole house.

Those are the few comments I wished to make. We are prepared to support any measure to improve parliamentary procedure.

[Text]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I wish to say at once, as I have said on a number of occasions, that anything which can be done to improve the procedure of parliament without restricting the essential freedom and the traditional rights of parliament deserves support.

If you will allow me, sir—and I say this with diffidence with yourself in the chair—what has been done under your leadership has been the most unusual and effective action which has taken place during the quarter of a century, almost, that I have been a member of this house. You have convened a committee which has worked effectively, dispassionately and objectively. Too often he who occupies your ancient and honourable chair does not, in the nature of things, receive from members as a whole that expression of commendation which you have so richly earned. I want to say that I believe the committee has worked together in a way which does honour to its membership.

Parliament is subject to a great deal of criticism; it has been in recent years and months. But parliament, if its full function is understood, is carrying out the great responsibility which rests upon it. Indeed, it is the only institution which preserves and maintains freedom and which above everything else, assures that the humblest person in our land shall not be denied justice. We have had examples in the last few days of matters brought before the house concerning humble individuals. This is one of the major functions of parliament.

The hon. member for Skeena suggested that he would like to see established, or so I gathered from his remarks, a practice whereby a Speaker would become the member for a constituency to be designated for that purpose, and would not be subject to election as are other members of the house. That suggestion has been made in the past. It fails to give due emphasis to the fact that if such an arrangement were made the occupant of the Speaker's chair would not be the first commoner. The essence of being the first commoner is that among members who have been elected on a similar basis, whoever is chosen to be Speaker is, by tradition, the first commoner.

I have listened to the various arguments which have been advanced today respecting the recommendations, and I intend to refer briefly to three of these recommendations. First there is the proposal that Your Honour's ruling should not be subject to appeal on the question of whether the house should be adjourned to discuss a matter of urgent public importance. I think all of us are agreed that such a rule would simply implement the general practice, and that it is deserving of complete support.

As to the second proposal, I speak now not as one who occupies the position of Leader of the Opposition but as one who has been prime minister when I say I feel the house should give further consideration to the limitation of all members to 20 minutes under standing order 61A. The two officers of the house, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, by reason of ancient right and modern application have certain duties and responsibilities. It is not that it will affect me; I am not speaking personally now, for I seldom speak at the resolution stage. But I think consideration might well be given to assuring the continuation of that principle, recognizing that the holders of those two positions have certain special responsibilities, and that the section in question might be amended, if the house is agreeable, so as not to apply to those for whom the rules have made provision for unlimited discussion.

With regard to the third recommendation, may I say I think it will be somewhat difficult to operate. I want to see this in operation. There will be no general discussion on clause 1. Hon. members would deal with the bill clause by clause yet, at the end, they would engage in a general discussion. However, it is something that is experimental and as such I give it my support, particularly in order to ascertain how it will work out. I have heard it argued in the past that this is a course that should be taken, and I welcome any changes that can be brought about without in any way undermining the traditional position of parliament. It is of that position that I am going to speak for a few minutes.

Everywhere there is criticism of parliament; it is becoming the general thing to do. The institution is subject to examination; our constitution is being carefully submitted to the searchlight of public discussion. The criticisms, as I summarize them, are these. Why does not parliament do more? Why does parliament only talk? Well, Mr. Speaker, parliament is a place where talk is necessary, and where talk preserved our freedom in two world wars. It is a place where talk brought about many of the changes that have been implemented following the general acceptance in the nation of views originally expressed in parliament, heterodox views which ultimately became the accepted.

The other day I looked back over the years and read how parliament was viewed in other generations. Some people feel they have really found out something, that parliament should be complained about and criticized. Certainly parliament's activities should be examined carefully, but it is well to remember that there is really nothing new in the criticism. Someone has said that parliament pours out in characteristic words the characteristic heart of the nation. That is my concept of parliament. To carry it out, fair opportunities for discussion and decision must be provided. Criticism, however, which has no regard to the purpose, the history and the rights of parliament can be ill timed, if not dangerous.

I said a moment ago that I had read something of the criticisms of parliament in the past, and with the leave of the house I might place one or two quotations on the record. Samuel Pepys, on August 4, 1661 recorded that one of his acquaintances had told him:

> How basely things have been carried on in parliament by the young men that did labour to oppose all things that were moved by serious men. That they are the most profane swearing fellows that ever he heard in his life, which makes him think they will spoil all—

Charles Dickens, who sat in the press gallery in his day and generation for, I think, several years summed up his views of parliament in these words:

> The great dust heap of Westminster . . . laughing, coughing, oh'ing, groaning, a conglomeration of noise and confusion to be met within no other place in existence, not excepting Smithfield on a market day or a cockpit in all its glory.

I could quote Hazlitt and various political pundits. Robert Louis Stevenson summed it up in these words:

> We all know what parliament is, and we are ashamed of it.

Another said:

> Talk of mobs! See how few who have distinguished themselves in the House of Commons have ever done anything else.

Well, that is history; but it is living history today. What are the functions of the House of Commons? In order to criticize one must know what the functions are. The most important function is to control the finance of a country; to assure that money shall not be expended that has not been voted; that a full examination be made of all expenditures. The second is the expressive function; the expression of the minds of the people on all matters that come before parliament. The third is the informing function; and the fourth is to legislate.

In that order all political observers have placed the functions of parliament. You often hear parliament criticized for not governing. That is not the function or the duty or the responsibility of parliament. The responsibility is to deal with those matters that the crown's executive brings before parliament, over and above, of course, the right of private members to introduce any measure that they deem fit. I mention this because it is so often said, "Why does not parliament get down to governing the nation?" That is not part of our duty. Ivor Jennings, the great authority, has said:

> The function of parliament is not to govern but to criticize. Its criticism, too, is directed not so much toward the fundamental modification of government policy as to the education of public opinion.

Sir, you will never have an effective parliament by having a type of slot machine to turn out legislation. The quantity of legislation passed is not a measure of the effectiveness of parliament. Indeed, it was Gladstone himself who used these words in this regard, speaking to the House of Commons:

> Your business is not to govern the country, but it is, if you see fit, to call to account those who govern it.

As I said a moment ago, there is widespread criticism largely based on the misconception that parliament does the nation's business and therefore anything that appears to take up time delays the business of parliament. As those of us who practice the art know, the business of the country is carried on not by parliament but by the administrative machinery of the government whether parliament is sitting or not. But parliament's responsibility and job is to give careful consideration to policy and the measures proposed to implement such policy. This it does by time-consuming efforts and processes. It scrutinizes; it questions; it explains; it criticizes. In other words, it talks.

Some say that parliament is not business-like, that it should be run on the lines of a business. Again such a concept assigns to parliament a role it does not have, the administration of the country's business. What parliament must do, however, is to oversee and compel by criticism effective and efficient practices in the departments. If it were not for the fact that parliament talks, many of the legislative enactments brought before the House of Commons would lead to endless amendments as weaknesses were discovered. We must always, in the limitation of debate in parliament, recognize this fact; that any new policy or legislation should not receive a less gruelling testing than any piece of machinery or manufactured material receives before it is prepared and readied for sale. If it were not for parliament making a long and complete examination, disastrous measures, the weaknesses of which would not otherwise be exposed, would be passed if there was too great a limitation on discussion.

Let me also say, Mr. Speaker, in speaking of parliament, that I often see parliament criticized because its debates are too prolix; there is bitterness, and strong arguments are advanced along this line of thought. Those who make that criticism do not know parliament. They should read the debates in the British House of Commons. Let me recall one example, where Aneurin Bevan followed upon Winston Churchill, as he then was, and said "I wish, Mr. Speaker, immediately to puncture this bladder of falsehood by the poniard of truth". They are words almost Churchillian in their import and power. Immediately someone wanted to have Mr. Bevan called to order, but he said "I was quoting". As Your Honour knows, if an hon. member makes a quotation and applies it to anyone, no withdrawal can be demanded. For the next week or so there was a great deal of discussion in the letter press of the United Kingdom as to who was the author of these powerful words. Some said it was Shakespeare; although they could not find the exact quotation they knew it was there. Others said it was Beaumont and Fletcher. Others claimed it was some other Elizabethan dramatist. Finally, two weeks later, when no withdrawal could be asked on a question of privilege, when he was making a further speech Bevan was asked whom he was quoting and he replied "I was quoting myself." That is the parliament of the United Kingdom. As you said the other day, Mr. Speaker, let us not be thin-skinned, and that is so. Maintaining decorum does not mean the restriction of strong and definite language. Yet one of the criticisms of parliament has been that arguments have been too strong, too direct. I would ask those who hold that view to read the debates of 1920 and 1921, 1925 and 1926 and 1932 and 1933. By comparison this parliament is represented by featherdusting members. I am not asking hon. members to go back to the days of Macdonald and Laurier and Borden, but I do say that much of the criticism of parliament, to the effect that when arguments are advanced members are wrangling, does not pay tribute to the critic for his knowledge of parliament, its antecedents or indeed its recent past.

I am glad to see that this committee brought forth these recommendations unanimously. I believe that recommendations can only be effective if they are made unanimously; indeed, they ought not be brought in by your committee, sir, without unanimity.

To do otherwise would be to defeat the very object we have in mind, which is by agreement to bring about those changes which are necessary to meet changing conditions without in any way diminishing the mandate of parliament and its traditional power. The setting up of a Speaker's permanent committee on procedure with the continuation of its deliberations from year to year would, I am sure, receive general support from all members.

There is one other matter in connection with parliament. No matter what we do on the floor of parliament here the press of our country has a tremendous responsibility to make available to the people the fullest and most unbiased of information. We have been blessed throughout the years with a very good press gallery. However, what I say is this, that we will never have strong, free institutions without the presentation by the fourth estate of the fullest information on parliament. I know, as do all of us, that what is unusual, spectacular, weird or unorthodox is always newsworthy. Although I have said this before, I should like to see other newspapers across the country following the example of one or two which are already providing each day a summary of what has taken place. I am not speaking for myself now, sir, but for the backbench member who works hard, prepares a speech, gives a great deal of study to what he has presented, and finds that he is not even mentioned as having been an also ran.

I do not suggest that full summaries should be given, but the kind of reference that the London Times makes from day to day has a tremendous influence upon the quality of debate and also provides incentives to members in the preparation of their speeches.

Mr. Grégoire: It is one o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Indeed, the media of public information, press, radio and television, whatever the rules may be, have a most important part to play in making parliament more effective. Free institutions cannot survive without a full presentation of factual information regarding the activities of parliament.

We are all working together to make parliament strong and effective. The Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition have a particular responsibility, as do members.

Mr. Grégoire: It is one o'clock.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, as well as all hon. members, have particular responsibilities. In addition, the press has an almost equal responsibility to assure that parliament, that instrument of freedom, shall be stronger and more effective.

The changes that are recommended today represent steps forward. As I said at the beginning of my remarks, much has been done by committees under your leadership, Mr. Speaker. I know it is a difficult and unrewarding position, being a member of a committee that operates behind closed doors, and for that reason all of us owe a debt of gratitude to the members of this committee who have worked so well to bring about the recommendations now before the house.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words about the report of the committee, which I am happy to support, and to make a comment along the lines of the very interesting observations made this morning by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) in discussing this report. He pointed out, and I think we are all very conscious of this, that the recommendations of this report deal with the procedures of parliament at a time when our parliamentary institutions are under a great deal of examination and much criticism. As the right hon. gentleman reminded us, it is, however, useful to keep contemporary criticism in perspective. Parliamentary institutions from the very beginning of parliament have always been subjected to the criticism of those who are impatient, quite often understandably impatient, to get things done even at times at the expense of careful consideration and discussion.

We often read, Mr. Speaker, about the apparent indifference of members of the House of Commons to the proceedings of the house as evidenced by their lack of attendance, and on that point I realize that at the moment I am not speaking to what might be called a large and enthusiastic audience.

Mr. Knowles: Those who are interested are here.

Mr. Pearson: But those who make this criticism do not always make allowances for the other things that members of parliament have to do, and do not always realize that there has always been this kind of criticism of parliament and parliamentarians. The classic story in this regard, of course, is the passing by the British parliament almost 100 years ago of the British North America Act, the act that founded our confederation, which was passed in a practically empty House of Commons at Westminster after a short and perfunctory debate, we are told that once the British North America Act was disposed of the county members especially trooped in and filled the house because the next item of business was a dog tax bill.

It is not very long ago that I read in the newspaper a very important speech indeed on foreign affairs by the chairman of the senate foreign relations committee in Washington. It was one of the most significant speeches in recent times but it was delivered to a senate consisting of three senators. So the audience perhaps does not always determine the importance of the observations that are made. I hope not.

We were also reminded by the Leader of the Opposition this morning that our manners in the House of Commons are criticized whereas in reality we are models of decorum compared with what used to go on in the house 50, 75 and 100 years ago. Indeed the right hon. gentleman this morning referred to us, including himself, as featherdusters in debate. Perhaps I am, but he is not.

An hon. Member: You are not either.

Mr. Pearson: It is true, of course, that we are under examination and criticism. All institutions, especially all popular institutions based on discussion, are under criticism today. That criticism and examination are the more significant and the more noticeable because of the development of media of communication that did not exist 50 years ago and which can bring our defects, even more than our virtues, to the attention of a very large audience within a few minutes of the delivery of our speeches. Indeed, sometimes they can do it before we have even made the speeches. This has had some bearing on the position of parliament and parliamentary institutions.

I should like to echo what the right hon. gentleman said this morning about the importance not only of responsible speech and action in the house but the importance of responsible reporting of what is said and done here. I say that, not in criticism at all but in recognition of the importance of those who serve the public so well by reporting what goes on in parliament. It must be very tempting indeed to report our deliberations in terms of the more exciting phases of those deliberations, and excitement can always be created by conflict.

Conflict is, of course, its own publicity agent. Sometimes the careful, thoughtful, quiet speech with constructive proposals does not get the same amount of attention. However, while it is useful and I think well to keep things in perspective, I do not myself get as much comfort perhaps as I should out of comparisons. In the old days, and the old days do not mean more than 25 or 50 years ago, it did not matter as much as it does now whether or not we were inefficient in our procedures. The day when we could secure immunity from the consequences of our own inefficiency, in the light of the importance of what we are doing, has gone.

It was not very long ago when the government of the day was perplexed, not with the problem of getting things done but with the problem of finding enough things to do to keep parliament going for three months. In that kind of situation it did not matter very much if debate on a bill went on from Monday until Friday or the next Friday because the government was often hunting for something to take its place. Those days have gone by and whatever may have been the case in the past we cannot any longer afford the luxury of inefficiency of any kind in the conduct of our proceedings. Nor can we any longer assume that in the case of parliamentarians repetition means reputation. I hope whatever we do, and this hope was expressed in eloquent terms this morning by the right hon. gentleman, to change our rules and our proceedings—and I am glad we are making progress in that regard—there will always be preserved as the very foundation of our parliamentary institutions the right of full and free discussion. I think it goes without saying that that principle would be subscribed to by every member of the house. Perhaps we would not have the same unanimity with regard to the application of the principle to a particular case as to what constitutes full discussion.

The right of discussion is of importance but of equal importance is the right of decision after a full and free discussion. The abuse of the right of decision can be equally damaging to parliamentary institutions as the abuse of the right of discussion. We have to reconcile these two things. This is a problem which is much more complicated and difficult now than it has been in the past.

The setting up of this committee under your chairmanship, Mr. Speaker, to look into our procedure was I think one of the most constructive things that has been done by parliament for many years. I have been very proud, as the leader of the government, to be associated with the initiation of this work. I should like to pay my tribute to you, Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the committee and echo the other tributes that have been paid to you by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition; also to the members who have worked so well and so effectively on the committee and its subcommittees. The appointment of the committee and the work that has been done by the committee and its subcommittees —and perhaps I could make a special reference to the hon. member who is chairman of a subcommittee whose report we are considering—is a reflection of the desire of members to speed up and make more effective our parliamentary deliberations.

I agree, Mr. Speaker, that this is the right way to proceed in reforming, reinvigorating and strengthening our parliamentary procedures, that is, by a decision of an all party committee and by a decision which, whenever possible, is unanimous. This is the right way to proceed. However, although it is the right way to proceed, I hope we will not lose sight of the fact it is important that progress be made and that the committees be not unduly handicapped or delayed by the necessity, on every single occasion, of reaching a unanimous decision. It may well be that when the committee and subcommittee—this could have been their experience already—approach some vitally important aspect of this question there may be difficulty in getting unanimity. I hope that the desire for unanimity will not prevent progress.

I support and approve of the recommendations in this report. I could have wished, and I suppose members of the committee could have wished, that some of the recommendations could have gone farther. The fact that they did not go farther is not, I believe, an indication that the committee will not continue its work and bring in even more important recommendations in the future. I believe myself, and I have been saying this in the house when in opposition and in government, that the most important change we could make now, and I hope it will be made before long by a unanimous report of the committee, is the introduction of a procedure by which time could be allocated on all the proposals that are introduced in this house for discussion and decision. The beginning of this process of time allocation is to be found I believe in the recommendations before us today. I hope this will be only the beginning. So far as we are concerned on the government side, we support the allocation of time by agreement on legislative proposals so that we will know, in the government and in the opposition, in an approximate way at least when parliament is beginning how much time will be required for the legislation which is on the order paper. The committee report does not go so far as that, Mr. Speaker, but it does make some very useful proposals.

In dealing with the resolution stage, as has been pointed out by previous speakers, while not doing away with that stage, the proceedings are limited in time. I am one of those who thought perhaps we could do away completely with the resolution stage of money bills. It is a hangover, if I may use that expression, from the long distant past, going back to Stuart times when the resolution stage of money bills was the protection of the commons against the crown. We do not have to worry about that now. While the resolution stage is retained, it is certainly limited and it is vastly improved by the recommendations made. It is suggested that the time allowed for consideration of the resolution stage be now reduced to one sitting day, deemed to be a total of five hours. I think, Mr. Speaker, this is all to the good. It does represent an agreement on time allocation in certain circumstances.

The second portion of this recommendation restricts all speakers at the resolution stage to 20 minutes or less. The Leader of the Opposition made some observations on this recommendation this morning which I confess I found rather impressive. He pointed out that this would put the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition in exactly the same position as any other member of the house with regard to time limitation. There are, I believe, four or five standing orders which do except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition from the time limitation applied to other members of the house. It is not easy to talk about this when one is personally affected by them, but these exceptions are based, I think, on a sound principle, namely that the leader of a government in introducing legislation is in a special position of responsibility and may require, and usually does require, more time than a private member for the purpose of explaining the bill to the House of Commons on behalf of the government. And I think the Leader of the Opposition, occupying another position recognized by the house itself, should be given the same privilege when replying to the Prime Minister. I think a case could be made for maintaining this extension even in respect of a debate on the resolution stage which is limited to one day.

There has been no motion made on this matter and it would not, I believe, be in order to move an amendment even if that were desirable, and I do not intend to do so any more than did the Leader of the Opposition. I certainly would not wish to take any step which would result in the reference back to the committee of this report —a report with which I am in agreement. I should like, however, to make the point that these recommendations apply for the present session of parliament only, and I suggest that when the committee meets after they have been in effect, should the house adopt them, its members should look again at this particular subclause of the recommendations to see whether the considerations advanced by the Leader of the Opposition and myself do not warrant further consideration of this matter.

I think it is a very useful change indeed to put to the end the debate on the first clause of a bill in the committee stage, rather than have it at the beginning of the proceedings. I hope this will work out satisfactorily and I believe it will, for reasons which were mentioned in the discussion this morning.

I am in hearty agreement with the proposal that your decision, Mr. Speaker, with regard to motions to adjourn the house should be final and not debatable. The proposal in this respect reads:

> Any ruling made by Mr. Speaker after listening to arguments on the question of urgency shall not be subject to appeal.

I am not a legal expert, or indeed a lawyer of any kind, but I assume, Mr. Speaker, this does not mean that any ruling made by you in the absence of argument would be appealable. As the recommendation stands it says that any ruling made by Your Honour after listening to argument would not be appealable. I presume the same recommendation would apply, namely that there should be no appeal, whether there was argument advanced or not. It would not be very sensible if it were otherwise.

Mr. Knowles: Would the Prime Minister permit a question so as to make clear what was in the minds of those of us who drafted these recommendations? Would the Prime Minister read the previous sentence? If he will put the two together I think he will see what we have in mind is this—as long as a Speaker consents to hear any arguments which members may wish to raise, then any ruling he makes shall not be subject to appeal. I think it was probably felt that if a Speaker—not the one we have now, but some other one—were to refuse to listen to argument, then perhaps his decision should be appealable.

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Pearson: I welcome the hon. gentleman's explanation. The second sentence now reads:

> If Mr. Speaker questions the urgency of debate with respect to the proposed matter he may invite members to speak on the question of such urgency. Any ruling made by the Speaker after listening to argument on the question of urgency shall not be subject to appeal.

All I wish to establish—if it needs to be established—is that if Mr. Speaker does invite argument and no argument is forthcoming, there should similarly be no right of appeal against his ruling.

That is all I have to say with regard to the report. I congratulate those responsible for it and I pay tribute to the work which has led to it. I wish the committee well in its further consideration of these matters. I wish to repeat that this is undoubtedly the best way in which to change our procedures in the interests of the efficient dispatch of business. If it can be done by agreement in an all party committee, that is the way it should be done, and I hope the committee will be so successful in its progress in the future that no other action will be required in bringing our parliament and parliamentary procedures into line with the realities of our problems and of our times.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): It is not my intention to detain the house at any length but I hope hon. members will permit me to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, and the members of your committee on this report and on the other reports which are now before us.

I think these reports fully vindicate the action which was taken by the house in setting up this committee. I agree with the statement which has just been made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) that this is the most desirable procedure to adopt in changing our parliamentary procedure when it needs to be changed. I do not mean by this that all changes must wait on complete unanimity. There may be occasions when changes will have to be made in the procedures of the house without waiting for every last party and every last member in the house to be in complete agreement. But if it is possible to get unanimity in making changes, then that is the most desirable course to follow. I imagine all members of the house feel pleased, as I do, that the reports now before us have the concurrence of all the members of these respective committees.

It is the essence of a parliamentary system that we never get changes exactly as we want them if we wish to get a consensus from all parts of the house. But I would imagine that these changes which are proposed in this thirteenth report—and I speak for the party with which I am associated—constitute a very substantial improvement. The first proposal with reference to the change in standing order 26 is identical with the eighth proposal which I made a short time ago when putting forward ten proposals for a parliamentary reform program. I think it has two great advantages; it will set out clearly the right of a member to outline the urgency of debate, as well as clearly establishing the practice we have been following in saying there is no right of appeal against a Speaker's ruling on this question.

With reference to the resolution stage of so-called money bills, we in this party would prefer to eliminate it altogether. I know that in most of the provincial legislatures this stage has in fact been eliminated. They have met the problem of reference to the crown by having a provision attached to the first reading of money bills; before first reading is called the minister concerned simply reads a statement signed by the representative of the crown to the effect that the bill has been submitted to His Honour the Lieutenant Governor who recommends it for the consideration of the legislature. In this way the reference to the crown is continued. This practice also prevents a private member introducing a money bill because, of course, he cannot obtain the necessary written statement. It seems to me there should be no constitutional difficulty about eliminating the resolution stage as a prelude to money bills. But the proposal which is made here goes a very long way. At least it is a substantial improvement and I think ought to be given a fair trial.

Both the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) have made reference to the 20 minute limitation. Normally I would agree that both these officers of the house ought to have extra time.

I think, however, there are some arguments for not doing so in this case. The first is that if the debate is going to be limited to the reduced sitting hours on a Wednesday or Friday, or limited to a day on Monday, Tuesday or Thursday, if the two leaders of the house have unlimited time, between them they could take up three fifths of the time. This has been known to happen—not in the case of the present incumbents necessarily, but it has been known to happen in days gone by when we had three hour and four hour speeches. Therefore I think there has to be some limitation.

But I think the second reason is more important. The primary function of the resolution stage, if we are to have one, is for short statements on the principle and particularly to ask questions; because that is why the resolution is in committee stage, rather than going through second reading, which was eliminated by the house in 1955. It seems to me that for short statements and questions and answers the 20 minute rule is sufficient. The committee will of course watch the effect this has as we proceed with it, but I would hope they will recommend maintaining it unless some very good reasons come to the fore as to why it should not be continued.

The third recommendation with reference to the debate on the first clause of a bill in committee of the whole is I think an eminently sensible proposal. I sat for some years in a provincial legislature where for many, many years—in fact, for several decades—the short title of the bill was always the last clause called. It was found that by the time members had gone through all the clauses in the bill many of the questions which they might have asked on clause 1 had already been answered, and this procedure reduced the debate very considerably. I think this is a wise proposal which has been made by the committee and is certainly worthy of a trial run by the house.

I want to say just a word or two about the general idea of parliamentary reform. Both the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) have said quite properly that parliament is under some criticism. I think we will deceive ourselves if we keep saying that this criticism is because the public is ill informed or because people today live in a complex age and are in too much of a hurry. If parliament is under criticism we ought to ask ourselves whether a good deal of this criticism is not fully justified. The Leader of the Opposition said that one criticism is that parliament only talks. I think, more realistically, the criticism is that members of parliament too often talk just for the sake of talking. I think people expect us to talk, but I believe they feel there is little value in constant repetition day after day when members are repeating what was said the day before and are repeating it again at subsequent stages of the passage of the legislation.

The objection is not to the fact that parliament is a place for debate so much as the feeling on the part of the general public that tedious repetition is out of place in a parliament where the business of the country is of paramount importance. The task which faces Your Honour's committee, and ultimately the house, is to try to find that fine balance between complete freedom of expression for all the elected representatives and at the same time have due regard for the efficient dispatch of business so as to provide adequate time for the examination of estimates and expenditures, which is one of the functions of parliament.

It was said this morning that the amount of legislation passed is not the criterion of parliament. That may be true; but what is the criterion of parliament? It is a reflection on the efficiency of parliament if some legislation takes a long time to pass through the house because of unnecessary and tedious repetition and at the same time other legislation of equal or greater importance is left to the dying days of the session and is either not passed at all or is rushed through with little consideration. We have all had the experience in days gone by of hundreds of millions of dollars of estimates being rushed through the house in the dying days of the session. This has never been an example of good business procedure to give to the people of Canada. That is why we in this party have long felt—and we hope the committee will consider this— that we should follow the example of the parliament at Westminster of establishing an annual timetable and plan the work of parliament, so that we do not dawdle for weeks or even months on some matters which may be of importance, and neglect other matters which are of equal importance.

We hope the committee will look into the role of committees of the house. We hope they will study the question of private members' bills. It is a frustrating experience for private members to prepare bills and find it is impossible to obtain a decision of the house and they are simply talked out. We hope Your Honour's committee will look at the question of the allocation of time for debate. We think this would do a great deal to speed up the business and to distribute time as between different pieces of legislation and different functions of the house.

I must say in closing, Mr. Speaker, that in the final analysis I am sure we all recognize that no matter what the rules and the procedures of the house may be, the efficient conduct of business in parliament depends upon self-discipline on the part of members, co-operation among all the parties in the house, and mutual confidence and trust as between the leaders and the members of the different parties. This is something of course that cannot be written into the rules; it can only be generated by the good will of the members themselves. Mr. Speaker, I want to give my support and the support of this party to the work of the committee and offer them our congratulations. We trust that the support and the favourable comments they have received today will encourage them to carry on their work with continued success.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, first of all I wish to congratulate you on the work you have to a great extent been responsible for, as far as appointing the committee and the work they have carried on in the meantime. I believe it is most commendable that it has been possible for the members of the committee to come together as they have and make the many suggestions which have come before us, including those contained in this thirteenth report, thus enabling us to progress constructively toward improving the operations of this House of Commons.

I do not intend at this time to go into any lengthy debate on the merits of this report or the recommendations it has made simply because I believe that each one of the leaders and spokesmen for procedural reform in each of the parties have made their opinions very clear to the house. To go over these at this time I think would be unnecessary. It will suffice to say that I am very happy to give the support both of this party and of myself to this thirteenth report and the reforms it proposes.

I listened with interest to the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) speaking this morning to this report, to which he gave his own support. I agree with the criticism he had to make, that it would be well if he, as the leader of the official opposition, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) were not limited to the 20 minutes which are proposed in the report for each member's participation in debate. I think it is traditional that both of these honoured gentlemen have the privilege of speaking at length on each topic as it comes along and as they see fit. I think it would be well in giving our unanimous support to this committee, that support could also be given to this recommendation without having to refer it back to the committee for further study.

I also hope that the eleventh report will come quickly before the house and that the opportunity be given to approve it. I think it is very important that the committee work of parliament and of this House of Commons be facilitated, and I believe that is what this report is aiming to do. Certainly it is directed at the more effective working of the house, recognizing that it is essential to have a greater degree of participation by the backbenchers in the work of the house. Therefore I trust that very soon the eleventh report will be brought forward.

In relation to parliamentary reform I agree that it is not the duty of this House of Commons just to talk, any more than it is the responsibility of this House of Commons to govern the country. However I believe it is the responsibility of this House of Commons to facilitate its work so that it will permit and give opportunity to the government to govern the country in the most effective way possible. Therefore the role of the opposition is one that is constructive, aimed not only at assisting the government with its responsibility of governing the country but making sure that this is done in the most effective and efficient manner. While we cherish the basic, fundamental privilege which is afforded to this house, namely the opportunity for the representatives of the people to make known their wishes, it is also our responsibility to make sure that the administration of the country goes forward in the very best way. Therefore the reforms that the committee has been dealing with in its different subcommittees, and the various reports that are brought in are important, perhaps even more important to us than they appear to be when presented individually, because it is in the over-all picture that they represent something which has long been overdue in this house.

In regard to parliamentary reform I would just say that as we have all had the opportunity to talk on this subject before I do not think this is the time for further discussion. However, there are a few points which I believe the committee must bear in mind and about which we must all be concerned until recommendations are made in relation to them. Certainly the time allocation to debate is one matter which is fundamental, because I do not think we are justified in spending as long as we have on some debates in this house, in view of other more important matters on which we should be spending our time.

Likewise I think it is very important that we should be working out some timetable or schedule for the operation of the sessions of the House of Commons. At this particular time everyone is chagrined, though we may not have thus expressed ourselves publicly, by the fact that there has been no opportunity for a recess. I think every hon. member of the house would appreciate the opportunity even now to have a week or two off. I think it is essential to have a recess. It would be well not only for the cabinet ministers with their responsibilities of administration, but also for the government itself in defining over-all policy. Certainly it is important for each one of us in the opposition and on the backbenches to get a little closer to reality by coming into more intimate contact with our constituents. One of the greatest weaknesses of this session is the fact that we can be so far removed from our constituents that we sometimes lose all sense of reality and responsibility. It is also important to the staff of the house. It is not reasonable that we should continue for ten or 11 months in the year without a break. Probably the only thing we are able to boast about now is the fact that we are part of the longest continuous sitting of this house in the history of the nation. I do not think that is very much to boast about. There is no reason why this should be. It seems to me it would be a very simple matter to come to some sort of agreement. We all recognize that the work of parliament has become something which involves more or less a round-the-year job. It is a continuous occupation, but in our confusion let us at least keep it orderly with some program in mind, so that the government can plan its work, so that we as members can plan our work, and all play a more effective part in that work.

I also agree that it is important that steps be taken to place private members' bills in the position they should be. It is not good enough to carry on as we are now. Certainly there is little incentive to bring the best out of the members of the house as far as private bills are concerned. Therefore I would hope that this matter can be attended to during this session by the committee.

In addition to our responsibility to just talk, there is also the responsibility to make sure that we approve the expenditures of the government in perhaps a little more effective and efficient way than hitherto. We are now approaching the end of the tenth month of the year and we still have not approved the estimates. It seems to me it is not good enough just to be approving estimates after the money has been spent. If we are to do our work as we should, approval should be given long before all of the money has been spent.

These are just a few of the matters yet to be attended to, Mr. Speaker. In the meantime we in this party are happy to give our support to this report and to assure the committee that we are grateful for what has been done. We look forward to its final report which will complete the responsibilities which have been assigned to its members. I would also just say that for full effectiveness it would be well for us all to accept the recommendation made by the leader of the official opposition concerning this one minor detail, which is important to the responsibilities that both he and the Prime Minister carry in a very special way.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to this thirteenth report of the special committee on procedure and organization I might say at the outset that in my remarks this afternoon I am not speaking just for myself but expressing the view of my party in respect of a particular matter contained in the report.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition and others in congratulating you and the members of your committee for the very excellent job that has been done. You have been much like an engineer guiding and giving wisdom to the members of that committee, enabling them to select the proper tools with which this parliament may do a thorough and efficient job.

It is always amazing to me to hear some hon. members criticize others for the quantity and quality of discussion that takes place during our consideration of various items placed before us. I suggest if one looks at the index of Hansard he will find that those members who criticize have spoken as often as any other member and perhaps have made less contribution. Perhaps members such as myself, and others, are the last to criticize hon. members for taking part in debates. Sometimes I think we should take the two-by-fours out of our own eyes before we take the splinters out of the eyes of other hon. members.

[Mr. Thompson.]

Mr. Speaker, I have been asked by my party to speak in regard to a specific problem which I think is obvious, as the present proposals stand. Before doing so I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister, (Mr. Pearson) who unfortunately is not present at this time because of pressing business, for his concurrence in the suggestion made by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) to limit the time allowed a prime minister, a member of the government, or the leader of the opposition in debating a resolution. In this regard I have been asked to move an amendment, and intend to do so before I resume my seat. It is an amendment which I believe will receive unanimous consent of this house, and will be passed quickly.

Mr. Grégoire: Agreed.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to become involved in any contentious discussion, but when we hear the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) agreeing so quickly, we know there is some comfort in the House of Commons, and that the hon. member has seen the light for the first time since his election.

The amendment I eventually intend to propose is related to part 2 of the committee's report dealing with debates in the committee of the whole house on resolutions preceding bills involving the expenditure of public money. Paragraph 2 of the proposed new standing order 61A reads:

> Notwithstanding the provisions of any other standing order, no member shall speak for more than 20 minutes during the time when a resolution preceding a bill involving the expenditure of public money is under consideration in the committee of the whole house.

It has always been accepted that, by our rules, extra time will be given to the prime minister, a minister of the government, or a government member to explain a measure carefully to the House of Commons. Extra time has always been given to the leader of the official opposition and the leaders of other parties during the debate on resolutions. I feel the proposed new paragraph of this standing order will curtail the prime minister, ministers of the government, the leader of the opposition, leaders of other parties, or government members explaining resolutions.

As the Leader of the Opposition pointed out, it is not the function of the House of Commons to govern, but rather it is the function of the executive or administration to govern. In other words, the government governs, whereas the House of Commons approves or disapproves of policy or legislation, and scrutinizes very carefully the proposed expenditures which are made from time to time.

As has been suggested by the leader of the official opposition, the leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Thompson) and the Prime Minister, I think extra time should be granted to the prime minister, ministers of the government or government members to explain resolutions presented to the house, particularly when they relate to the expenditure of public money. I always think the leader of the official opposition and the leaders of other opposition parties should be given extra time to reply in respect of those resolutions. To do otherwise I think would unnecessarily curtail the debate.

Mr. Speaker, standing order No. 31 reads:

> When Mr. Speaker is in the chair, no member, except the prime minister and the leader of the opposition, or a minister moving a government order and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, or a member making a motion of "no confidence" in the government and a minister replying thereto, shall speak for more than 40 minutes at a time in any debate.

You will note there that an exception is made in respect of the prime minister, the leader of the opposition and ministers moving motions. I suggest that exception should be extended and applied in reference to paragraph 2 of the new proposed standing order 61A.

There have been times when the business of this parliament has been delayed, and perhaps on occasion these delays have been caused by the official opposition, whether it be Liberal or Conservative. I am sure the members of the splinter parties will not mind my stating that I was in this house when there was only one splinter party consisting of eight members. It is hardly necessary for me to point out that we now have five parties in this House of Commons. In spite of the fact that the leader of the New Democratic party states that his party represents two million voters, the more parties we have in the House of Commons the more delays we experience. It might well be that the New Democratic party would not represent even one million voters if the public was made aware of that fact.

Unless we are willing to get into the position in which France found itself, I think some improvements have to be made in the rules. Some consideration must be given to a reform of our debates in parliament. When the parliamentary system was first devised we only had a two party system.

Mr. Fisher: That is nonsense.

Mr. Woolliams: The hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) suggests that my statement is nonsense. I do not wish to become involved in an argument with that hon. member, who so quickly agrees with everything said by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I should like to refer to certain statements made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre in an address he delivered to the Empire club of Canada, at the Royal York hotel, Toronto, Ontario, on March 21, 1957. That hon. member was referring to the role of the opposition in parliament, and he did not refer to that role as nonsense. He was speaking very seriously to one of the more important clubs in Canada, and said:

> It might interest you to know that the term "His (or Her) Majesty's Opposition" has been in use longer than the title "Prime Minister". If you go through the Hansard records of the first years of Canada's parliament you won't find Sir John A. Macdonald referred to as Prime Minister, but rather as First Minister. Indeed at the beginning you will find him referred to as Minister of Justice, since he held that portfolio as well as being the Queen's First Minister. On the other hand, right from the start you will find reference to "the honourable gentleman who leads the opposition".

I believe that hon. member has some experience in this regard, and I suggest without reservation that he spoke on that occasion in respect of the function in parliament of the official opposition with some authority and weight. He said that the leader of the official opposition is a part of government and was recognized even before we recognized the high and exalted position of prime minister of Canada. If that is what the member said on that occasion, I can hardly believe that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) would say what he has said now. I have always respected him. I read his articles and I listen to his speeches and I would say that when he makes a speech he is well prepared, but surely he spoke hastily when he said "nonsense" because I am quite confident—

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the hon. member would let me help him out?

Mr. Woolliams: I do not have much time and I should like to finish.

Mr. Fisher: I would not care to interrupt, but I apologize for saying "nonsense".

Procedure Committee

Mr. Woolliams: I will finish my remarks and then answer any questions. My time is somewhat limited and I do not want to delay proceedings at this stage. I want to refer to another portion of the address by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

> The title "prime minister" has found its way into some of our federal legislation, but it is interesting to note that even today those rather important statutes, important to the individuals concerned at any rate, which provide for the salaries paid to the leaders of the government and the opposition designate the one as the Queen's first minister but the other as leader of the opposition.

First of all, the point I am making is that the leader of the official opposition is a part of the government, and I repeat that as the parliamentary system got under way and matured through crystallizing traditions and customs, it really matured around a two party system. I am not saying that we should have only a two party system because I believe in democracy and at the present time the Canadian people are prepared to elect five parties. We do not know what they will do in the future. I know that these remarks will receive a sensitive reaction. We are just as sensitive when we are criticized and the government is just as sensitive when it is criticized. However, I would think it is only fair to parliament and the Canadian people to point out that if there were eight parties in the house instead of five as we have now there would be more delay. Therefore I am happy to see that the rules have been streamlined in that regard.

Let us see what the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) has had to say about the role of the opposition. On January 27, 1959, he spoke at a luncheon meeting of the Canadian club of Ottawa and in his speech he quoted from very good authorities. At that time he was leader of the opposition and he quoted with approval a statement made by the then prime minister, now Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker). I said that the leader of the official opposition speaks for the official opposition. He or someone designated by him or his party speaks for the official opposition and they have a very important function in the government of Canada. The present Prime Minister quoted with approval what the then prime minister had said on one occasion, and I would point out that similar words were used by another leader of our party, Arthur Meighen, to whom the present Prime Minister has referred with complete approval. This is the quotation the present Prime Minister used in his speech:

> "If parliament is to be preserved as a living institution, His Majesty's loyal opposition must fearlessly perform its functions. When it properly discharges them the preservation of our freedom is assured. The reading of history proves that freedom always dies when criticism ends. It upholds and maintains the rights of minorities against majorities. It must be vigilant against oppression and unjust invasions by the cabinet of the rights of the people. It should supervise all expenditures and prevent over expenditure by exposing to the light of public opinion wasteful expenditures or worse. It finds fault; it suggests amendments; it asks questions and elicits information; it arouses, educates and molds public opinion by voice and vote. It must scrutinize every action by the government."

In doing so it prevents the short cuts through democratic procedures that governments like to take. The present Prime Minister pointed out in a real punch line the all important function of the official opposition when he said that the absence of a strong opposition means a one party state, and a one party state means an all powerful cabinet. I would point out that there are 96 members of the official opposition and I think anyone will agree that at times it is a pretty strong opposition. Let us see who else the Prime Minister quoted with approval in his address to the Canadian club. He referred to what the late Right Hon. R. B. Bennett had said when speaking in the house on March 23, 1932:

> "Oppositions are essential and necessary in the development of a democratic state. They serve a great and useful purpose. To the extent that criticism is frank and thorough, to that extent they do a great service to the country."

Then the Prime Minister referred to Benjamin Disraeli and with some sense of humour apologized to his audience for quoting from Conservative sources but said he had done so because he had found that on this matter these sources were good. He quoted these words of Disraeli:

> No government can be long secure without a formidable opposition.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say:

> I must confess, however, that it is not my conception of the role of the opposition to be formidable so that the government can be secure.

Then he quoted these words of Edmund Burke:

> He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves and sharpens our skill. Our antagonist is our helper.

The point I want to make is that the official opposition has a very important role when it comes to government. Let us see what that role really is. Let us summarize it. First of all, it has been said earlier today by the Leader of the Opposition and others that its role is to scrutinize expenditures, to approve or disapprove government policy, to approve or disapprove legislation and to do so with care because if it is not scrutinized carefully it will be subject to many amendments. Because of the training of the people in the official opposition they should always be in a position at any time to be able to take over the government. I think anyone will agree with that. That would seem to be a function of the official opposition.

I want to go further. I want to say that I was impressed with what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had to say in his speech. I do not want to delay the house but I would ask every member to read what that hon. member said on March 21, 1957. His address can be found in the library, bound in a red book. I have a photostatic copy of it. Hon. members should read it, and it is not nonsense as the hon. member for Port Arthur has said.

The official opposition has an important function because they must be more responsible that any other opposition party. The statements made by the official opposition must be made with a greater sense of responsibility because tomorrow they may move over to the other side of the house. They are in the position to do so.

You will recall the first parliament of 1962, Mr. Speaker, when the Liberals were even stronger in numbers in opposition than we are now. It was only a short time until they took office as the government. This is what has happened throughout the course of history since confederation.

The function of the official opposition has been made clear by distinguished writers and parliamentarians, but members of the official opposition must always remember their responsibility in any statements they make. If they offer criticisms or make suggestions they must be in a position to implement their suggestions and to change the things they have criticized when they take over the government. If they fail to do that then they are not equipped with the responsibility to govern.

I want to repeat that I had hoped to hear the leaders say they would approve an amendment or suggestion that the time allotted to a prime minister or other government member presenting a resolution of this kind should be unlimited, just as in other cases, and the same courtesy should be extended to a leader of the official opposition. If the New Democratic party approves that, if the leader of the Social Credit party approves that and if through the Prime Minister the government and the Liberal members approve it, it seems to me we could simplify the procedure today. If we are all unanimous in that regard this slight change can be made and then the report can be approved expeditiously. But one can never be sure and, as I said at the beginning, I have taken the responsibility for my party of making this suggestion because it was approved by the party.

I should like therefore to present this amendment. If in the course of presenting the amendment everybody approves of it, then it can be incorporated in the report and it would not be necessary to send the report back to the committee. I believe the suggestions that have been made for the changes in the rules, other than this slight amendment I have, are good and will expedite the business of this house and will add dignity to it.

I too congratulate the members of the committee. I was a member of the committee for a short time and I congratulate the members of the committee on the job they have done. I know how much work must have gone into this report. I want to congratulate you, too, Mr. Speaker.

I wish to move now, seconded by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler):

> That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "be" and substituting therefor: "not now concurred in, but be referred back to the special committee on procedure and organization with instructions to amend subsection (2) of the proposed standing order 61A as referred to in paragraph 5 of the said report by striking out all the words following the word "member" in line 2 of the said subsection (2) and substituting the following:
> "except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition or a minister moving a resolution preceding a bill involving the expenditure of public money and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister shall speak for more than 20 minutes during the time when such a resolution is under consideration in the committee of the whole house."

Briefly, it extends a privilege to the Prime Minister, the Leader of the Opposition, or someone speaking on behalf of a party. I now have copies of my amendment in both French and English.

Mr. Speaker: If I may be permitted to point out to the mover of this proposed amendment, does he realize that the second paragraph contains the words "except the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition or a minister moving a resolution"? If a minister were to move a resolution, then the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition would be limited to 20 minutes. Is that his real intent?

Mr. Woolliams: I say this to the Chair: this was drafted by several other members as well—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Woolliams: There is nothing to laugh about. I said I was speaking for the Conservative party. This is a representation on behalf of the party. Our position on the amendment is that it gives the Prime Minister more than that time and gives the Leader of the Opposition more than that time, or a minister speaking on behalf of the government.

Mr. Speaker: Well, if I could politely suggest to the hon. member, I would say he should add, "except the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition and/or a minister—" This might cover the situation.

Mr. Woolliams: May I bow to your correction? Perhaps we need you on our drafting committee.

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (President of the Privy Council): I want to address myself very briefly to the amendment and particularly to the procedural difficulty, as I see it, that flows from the moving of this amendment. I share the views about the work of the committee expressed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) as well as others who have preceded me today. I do not intend to repeat those remarks. I must say that I am delighted with what I regard as a break-through on the part of the committee in getting worthwhile amendments to the rules before the house for consideration and temporary trial. In that connection I point out that we are now in the 166th day of the sittings of this session and the committee report in which concurrence has now been moved recommends that we try these changes until the end of this session.

The difficulty with the amendment, as I see it, is this: It undoubtedly deals with something that was omitted from the committee's report, a point on which the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister both expressed reservations. I was interested to note that their remarks, if I heard them correctly, concerned the right of extra time for the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister because of the special obligations or duties they have to this house.

[Mr. Speaker.]

The motion as moved is in somewhat wider language in that it gives that same extended period for speaking to any minister moving a resolution. In any event, I do not wish to argue the merits of the point in detail now. The point obviously has some substance in it. We are in this situation; the committee has done some rather excellent work. I think all the speakers who have preceded me have spoken well of the work done by the committee. The committee has brought in a report and these amended rules would be in effect to the end of this session. The amendment would send this report back to the committee with an instruction of this house when the house has not, as is obvious from the discussion, given the amount of detailed study that should be given the proposed amendment. I suggest a better course—because there is no way of amending a proposed amendment to a standing order being enacted by way of moving concurrence in a committee report even with unanimous consent, as was suggested by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams). The house can only give unanimous consent for itself and cannot give unanimous consent on behalf of the committee. It is just not possible for the course suggested by the hon. member for Bow River to be followed. I ask the hon. member to consider withdrawing his amendment and adopting the motion for concurrence in this report which all speakers so far have favoured rather clearly. Then, we could leave it to the members of the committee, who are here in the house, to consider right away the remarks made by the Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister and the mover of the motion, and they can bring forth whatever further reports they think appropriate.

In this way, when that new motion for concurrence comes up for decision in this house we will not be in a position where this whole day's debate will have been wasted and the whole subject can be debated again. We will have concurred in the report today as recommended by the committee and I think it will be reasonable to expect that the committee—though, of course, I cannot speak for the committee and I do not presume to do so—would consider the matter and in due course bring us something further on this point. I expect too, that its considerations would be limited to this point only, so the debate which would later take place would be restricted in its scope.

In the light of these remarks I wonder whether the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) would consider taking another course. Feeling as I do about the work of the committee I am unwilling to repudiate its work, in effect, by sending the whole report back. At the same time I fully appreciate the remarks which were made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) on this particular point and I am in accord with them. This is a dilemma in which, I suspect, many members of the house find themselves. I hope the hon. member will consider what I have said and see fit to withdraw his amendment and permit concurrence in the report of the committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I shall speak very briefly on this and in doing so I shall make an appeal to the hon. member for Bow River which I dare to believe he may heed.

I think all of us share the view which has just been expressed; none of us would like to see this day's debate on the committee's report fail to produce an immediate result. I think we all know that if the report is referred back it would cost a great deal of time, and so on. Without saying whether or not I agree with what has been requested, namely lifting the time limit on speeches by the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, may I indicate that the committee did consider this matter and that the recommendation which has been brought in was reached after full consideration.

Nevertheless, in view of the discussion which has taken place so far, I am prepared to give the hon. member for Bow River and the entire house my undertaking as chairman of the subcommittee that if the proposed amendment is withdrawn and if this report is adopted as it now stands I will place on the agenda for our next meeting this whole question and I will ask the members of the subcommittee to study it again. If the members of our subcommittee feel, after listening to today's debate and after considering the matter further, that a recommendation should be made to the house for an adjustment in this order we would, of course, bring forward such a recommendation. On this basis, and in order that we may make some progress by accepting this report—a report which seems to have met with approval from all parts of the house, with this exception—I hope the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) may be willing to withdraw their amendment.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): I think some unwarranted fears have been expressed both by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

In addition to what the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition had to say about the need for removing the 20 minute limitation contained in the report of the committee on speeches by these two officers of the house, a further suggestion has been made for broadening this provision to include other ministers who may be submitting legislation. Surely it will be essential for a minister introducing such complex legislation as, for instance, the insurance legislation, to be given more than 20 minutes in which to explain such measures to the house so that all hon. members might have a sound appreciation of what the executive is attempting to do. The trouble about the suggestion made by the President of the Privy Council and by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, despite the latter's assurance that as subcommittee chairman he will place this question on the agenda of the committee, is that, as he himself said, he cannot tell us what action the members of the committee will take. However, if the house were to adopt the amendment and send it back to the committee in the precise terms of the instructions it contains, it is my understanding of the procedure that the committee would then have no other course but to conform to those instructions and alter its report accordingly. If this is a correct appreciation of the situation, then a decision by this house of the amendment would preclude any discussion—

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether he does not agree that in view of all the fine tributes which have been paid to the committee it would not be a good idea to let the committee consider this matter without being bound, as it would be, by the passing of this amendment? It seems to me that this would be the better way of proceeding. As I said, I do not know what the committee will decide or recommend, but I am at least in a position to give the assurance that the subcommittee will consider the matter.

Mr. Nielsen: That is the difficulty about the whole proposal. There is no doubt that the committee has done some wonderful and worth-while work. But the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre cannot give us an assurance as chairman of the subcommittee that the other two parties, or, indeed, his own party—

Mr. Knowles: Or perhaps your party.

Mr. Nielsen: Or my party, although there has been a clear indication from the Leader of the Opposition today that there is agreement with the first part of the amendment before the house in any event.

That is the difficulty I see attached to the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. That kind of assurance cannot be given. I know the committee would act in the best of good faith but we might be presented with the same report again, whereas were we to vote on the amendment now the committee would have precise instructions and there would be no delay whatsoever.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a further question? Is he aware of the fact that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River provides for even more unlimited speeches in committee of the whole on the resolution than is now the case under standing order 59 (3)? Is he not aware that this is one of the reasons why I feel that the committee should have freedom to look into this matter in the light of all the circumstances? It is for this reason that I think it would be the part of better sense if the committee could examine this matter freely, rather than that the house should pass an instruction of this kind. I hope that rather than have a vote on this instruction the hon. member for Bow River and the hon. member for Grey Bruce would be willing to act in the way I have suggested.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: I would, gladly, but it is the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) who has the floor.

Mr. Nielsen: I did not mind the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre interjecting a little speech into my remarks. I realize the distinction he has pointed out. However, there has been a practice which I have discerned even during the short time I have been a member. Notwithstanding the absence of any permissive rule to that effect in the standing orders, the practice has grown up by common consent in the house of allowing ministers in committee and in other situations to go beyond the time to which they are limited by the rules.

Mr. Knowles: Why not leave it that way for the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition?

Mr. Nielsen: In answer to that question, Mr. Speaker, I ask why bring in the second recommendation of the committee at all? Here is the whole point. This practice grew up, I believe in Mr. Mackenzie King's time, of allowing the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition more than the time permitted by the rules. This practice has now grown to a point where we all agree, and obviously the committee agrees, that it has become a serious problem and does eat up the time of the house.

It seems to me that if the house sent a definite instruction back to the committee this particular problem would be resolved. It also seems to me that members opposite speaking through the Prime Minister, and members of the official opposition speaking through the Leader of the Opposition, are in agreement on this score.

Mr. Grégoire: Question.

Mr. Nielsen: I realize the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) wants to catch the five o'clock train, but he should sit here and listen to matters that are important.

Mr. Grégoire: No; the six o'clock plane.

An hon. Member: He is a plutocrat.

Mr. Nielsen: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) has suggested that perhaps some alteration should be made to the rules with respect to this practice that has grown up. I say to the hon. member that since the whole report is being referred back to the committee there is nothing to prevent the committee considering the very matter he raised and adding a fourth proposal to bring back to the house. It is entirely open to the committee if they want to consider further amendments along the line the hon. member suggested, and instead of limiting it to three recommendations they could bring in a fourth.

Judging, too, from the near unanimity expressed in the house with respect to the adoption by the house of the first and third paragraphs of the report, it seems that the fears of the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) and any other fears that have been expressed or may be expressed on the subject, are unfounded since we all appear to be in agreement on the first and third paragraphs. I think it would be anticipating difficulties which will not arise if we anticipate that the first and third paragraphs of the report will be reconsidered when the house receives a report back from the committee after this amendment is passed.

For these reasons, sir, I do not think any time is lost and I believe the feeling of the house as a whole will be expressed more adequately if the specific instruction is sent back to the committee with regard to the specific amendment to the second paragraph of the report. Should the committee desire to make further amendments along the lines suggested by the chairman of the subcommittee, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, they can always add a fourth or even a fifth or more recommendations to the report when it comes back.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Winkler: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If there is no possibility of agreement, I respectfully suggest that we could ask whether the house is ready for the question.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Before that is done, Mr. Speaker, as one who seconded the original motion may I make the observation that one could not listen to what was said by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the other party leaders without emphasizing the point which I first raised as to whether or not we were infringing upon certain traditional rights.

I have this reservation about the amendment. I believe there should be adequate protection for the members of this house to present, at the time resolutions of this kind are passed, alternatives to the suggestions contained in the phrasing of the resolution. This is the only opportunity, as I pointed out before, for hon. members to do this. By the time we get into second reading it is usually a little too late, in many respects. Consequently, if we are bound and limited by the amendment as it now stands we would be prevented from doing what I think we should do. I believe we should give consideration, on the occasions when extended time is allowed, as has been the practice in the past, to extending the period that we are now limiting to one day by sufficient additional hours to provide for members of the house who are not in the category of those who are included in the motion of the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) to make their representations, and thus not have a situation where we might have two hour or three hour speeches, which would leave 1½ hours for members of the house, who would then not have what I consider they should have, namely an adequate opportunity on these resolutions, so long as we are going to have the resolutions, to make their representations.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the amendment that is before the house at the moment I would like to make a few brief observations before any action is taken in this regard. It seems to me that in the course of discussion today—because one could hardly say it was hard and fast debate; it was one of the better types of discussion we have in this house—there was general acceptance in regard to the entire report, with the exception of the point outlined in the amendment.

Mr. Grégoire: Question.

Mr. Winkler: I think the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) will have an opportunity to make a speech if he desires, and not these periodic interruptions that sound like a beep.

Mr. Woolliams: He wants to catch the Friday train; that is his trouble.

Mr. Winkler: It seems to me that has been made quite apparent this afternoon. As was pointed out in possibly a different way, one of the reasons we have this difficulty is the proliferation of parties in the house. It seems to me that the recommendations before the house are valid and I believe everyone has agreed that they will assist in expediting any measure that is before the house. There is also another point that has been overlooked in the general terms of the debate. It is simply this. Although we are trying to overcome this one particular hurdle there are other matters which also need consideration, such as the allocation of speakers on any particular measure that is before the house. I find it very peculiar that the official opposition, here recognized as such, with 96 or 97 members, is treated on a one speaker per party basis, as was the case earlier in this very debate. I believe this particular aspect of debate in the house is also unfair.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, before I resume my seat let me say that I believe the house is ready to accept the terms of the amendment, and I hope this will be the case; because if the house now determines that this amendment is acceptable, and this particular matter is sent back to the committee with distinct and definite instructions, this is the only change that need be made by the committee. Subsequently, when it is reintroduced in the house, this report will then be accepted, without the possibility of having any one member cause the disruption that can exist if it is accepted as it is.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few words to say. It seems to me that although we have had an assurance from the chairman of the subcommittee that this problem will be reopened when that committee meets, there can be no assurance that it will be dealt with; there can be no assurance that it will be brought back to the house. I do not question the integrity of the hon. member, but a subcommittee cannot give an assurance to the house that the matter will be dealt with as the house desires or that the matter will ever come back to the house.

It now appears that the house has expressed an opinion with regard to the report of the committee, and with deference to the committee I suggest the house is a superior body. There are quite a number of members in the house who are just as much interested in alterations to the rules as the members of the committee. The committee has been praised all day for the work it has been doing and is doing, and I add my praise to the work of the committee. However, I do suggest in this instance there would be more praise for the committee if it would accept immediately the suggestion now being made by the house as a whole. As the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Winkler) has pointed out, there need be no great delay. If this matter goes back to the committee and the committee meets next Tuesday or Wednesday and immediately reports back to the house, I see no reason for further debate on the matter if the instructions of the house have been incorporated in its report. So that this day's debate will not be lost at all and there will be no cause for worry in that respect.

I had hoped the committee would have found it possible to abolish on a trial basis the resolution preceding money bills, but various reasons which may be raised in objection to that have been pointed out. That being the case the committee has suggested a one day debate. I think they went a little too far in doing that by restricting the long acknowledged rights of the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition, the minister who introduces the money resolution and the first person to reply to it. That is the reason why our amendment has been brought forward. Other than that we are approving of the work of the committee.

I would make this plea to the committee. A plea has been made to the mover and seconder of the motion, but I would make the plea to the committee that it accept the proposed instructions from the House of Commons, reassembles, gets on with the job —it could meeet this afternoon if it wishes— and bring the report back at our first meeting next week, when I am sure the house would approve it without further debate.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question. How can the committee accept a direction from the House of Commons which the House of Commons has not yet given to it?

Mr. Churchill: We are in the process of giving that instruction now.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, a few words only to underline the inconsistency of those who clamour for the improvement of the Canadian parliamentary procedure and the elimination, when possible, of useless debates.

The committee, which is representative of all the parties in this house, suggests that the debate on the resolution preceding a money bill be limited to five hours. Everybody admits that one day's debate, at the resolution stage, is sufficient, for since we do not have the bill then, we do not know how it will be drafted.

Besides, when the bill is introduced, we still have an opportunity, at the second reading stage, to discuss the principle of the bill; moreover, when section 1 of the bill is called we are allowed by the rules and procedures to debate the purpose of the bill. At that time the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) may both speak for as many minutes or as many hours as they see fit.

Mr. Speaker, the members of the committee were congratulated for having submitted to the house a report so well documented, so well prepared and so consistent. But an amendment is being moved to the effect that the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition might speak as long as they wish, which means that if the Leader of the Opposition speaks for two hours and a half and the head of the government does the same, this totals five hours and there is no time left for the other members who wish to participate in the debate. Hon. members would no longer be able to discuss the object of the resolution, since the debate would be limited to five hours.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely feel the amendment should be re-examined by the committee either next week or the week after. In my opinion, the proposal made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) is reasonable and acceptable.

If we did not take part in the discussion before this, it is because we wanted to allow passage of the motion to shorten useless debate in the house. That is the attitude of our party and I will not delay the house any further now.

[Text]

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I may have been mistaken about the manner in which the committee was going to operate and consider the rules of the house, but it was my understanding that the committee would have as its objective unanimity before presenting any proposed rule changes to the house. Again I may be mistaken in this, but I understood that following upon that unanimity these matters would be discussed at meetings of the various parties, the thought being that there would be unanimous acceptance of the matters proposd by the committee in order that we would not get into arguments which had a partisan base concerning proposed rule changes, which should be developed free from partisan differences. I may have been naive and mistaken about that course of action. Obviously I was, because I understood the member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) to say that he was speaking today for his party in proposing this alteration or amendment.

Mr. Woolliams: That is correct.

Mr. Howard: He now substantiates that. If such is the case, then the previous conception of attempting to find unanimity within the rules committee before any decisions are made is worthless and has just been scuttled by the announcement of the Conservative party. Not that I myself object to that course of action, but I think it is most deceitful to have people under the impression that they are working toward unanimity only to find they are stabbed in the back after they come into the house to present a particular proposal.

An hon. Member: What have you been smoking?

Mr. Howard: My hon. friend asks me what I have been smoking. I am a friend of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mather) and do not smoke. I am laying a few facts on the table.

Now, if that is the case it means that we have to look with suspicion in the future at all proposals which emanate from the rules committee, and its value has virtually been destroyed. I am referring to its value in attempting to find in a non-partisan manner rules designed to speed the business of parliament, if that is our goal and objective.

Mr. Woolliams: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Howard: No, I would not at the moment. If my hon. friend from Bow River will wait until the conclusion of my remarks I will then be happy to accept one. As I said, I do not particularly object to the course of action being followed, as long as we understand what is being done and so that we will not be led down the garden path.

I spoke on the motion for the adoption of the report and indicated that I wished that the committee had come forward with a proposal eliminating debate at the resolution stage, because of the redundancy and duplication which occurs on second reading. The committee felt that the course they presented today was the better one to follow. I indicated at that time that the effect of the committee's proposal to have one day's debate with a 20 minute time limit per speaker would be to push the backbenchers even further back, depriving them of the right to take part in the debate at the resolution stage. I suggested that the proposal we now had before us would guarantee that result.

We all know from past experience that there is a tendency on the part of ministers, and those who reply immediately following ministers, to consume a great amount of time in explanation. If the amendment now before us passes, the predictable result will be an increased consumption of time by ministers introducing resolutions and members replying thereto. I think those members will then take up the great bulk of time available and thereby drive the backbenchers even further into the background. For that reason I am opposed to this amendment. I am opposed to the idea of consolidating even more authority, time and control, and placing it into the hands of a few members in this house. Over the years we have developed parliament to the point where the cabinet or government, for a variety of reasons, virtually controls the operations of the House of Commons, and I think we would be merely adding to that authority and control by agreeing to this amendment.

Members of the Conservative party, in order to substantiate their view, have suggested that the greater the number of parties in the House of Commons the longer will be the debates, and that the greater the number of parties there are the more time will be consumed.

Mr. Woolliams: That is correct.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member suggests that principle is correct. If one followed that argument to its logical conclusion we would have to assume that the fewer the number of parties in the House of Commons, the less time would be consumed in debate. Perhaps to have the most efficient parliament possible we should have only one party and operate along the lines of a dictatorship.

Mr. Woolliams: Obviously that is not what I said.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Bow River had an opportunity to speak, and I would ask that he allow me that same opportunity, without interruption.

Mr. Woolliams: Please quote me accurately.

Mr. Howard: I was not quoting you at all, my friend. I would not dare quote you.

Mr. Woolliams: You could not.

Mr. Howard: In fact, I am very happy to remain aloof, and refrain from quoting the hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Woolliams: You must, because you cannot quote me.

Mr. Howard: It is bad enough that we have to listen to the hon. member for Bow River without having to quote him as well.

Mr. Rhéaume: Please try to get along, fellows.

Mr. Howard: The hon. member suggested that the more parties there are in the House of Commons, the more debate there will be. On the other hand, I presume the fewer parties there are the less debate we will have. Perhaps we should have a one-party system concentrating all the authority in the leader of that party.

Certainly it is true that the more parties there are in the House of Commons the greater is the desire for members to express their points of view, but I suggest that in itself is the essence of democracy.

Mr. Woolliams: Why amend the rules at all, then?

Mr. Howard: The hon. member for Bow River should not have been so enamoured with the gas debate we had yesterday. Perhaps if he had not been he would now allow me to complete my remarks without interruption.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the expression of diverse points of view is the best method of reaching agreement, and surely represents the essence of democratic parliament. The beauty of the type of parliament we have today is to be found in the diverse opinions expressed by the various members.

We do have rules which we must follow, but we must try to amend those rules in such a way as to make sure that we carry on the business of parliament in the most efficient and expeditious way possible, without altering the rights of individual members to express their ideas and arguments in respect of proposals advanced by government or others. If we accept the amendment now before us we will be running counter to that principle and curtailing the right of hon. members to take part in debates. The Tories obviously want to curtail the time available for debate and then monopolize that time.

My original position was, and still is, that we should seek to eliminate the discussion or debate at the resolution stage because it is superfluous. The committee did not think that to be desirable and proposed this alternate plan which would give an opportunity to the members in the house, who wanted to do so, to express their opinions at the resolution stage, but to a limited degree. The amendment now before us would in fact curtail freedom of expression and go against the concept of democracy which envisages the expression of opinions and debate, followed by agreement and the passing of laws.

I think when we vote on the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Bow River we should consider its effect and completely turn it down. We should remember that the result of his amendment will be a curtailment of the freedom of speech and an abandonment of the principles of democracy.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr Speaker, there is general agreement that the entire report of the committee should be adopted, with the exception of that part referring to paragraph 2 of the proposed standing order 61-A. It would be wrong for us to refer the whole report back to the committee for reconsideration. There seems o be general agreement that a leader of the pposition and a prime minister should be llowed more than the suggested 20 minutes t the resolution stage. I should like to point ut that whenever a complex piece of legisation is introduced in this house the time imit is never imposed on the person introucing it, or anyone immediately replying, o long as their remarks are pertinent to the ubject matter of the resolution.

So far as I am concerned, I am perfectly villing to rely upon the house to give unanihous consent on every occasion when it is ecessary for the prime minister, the leader f the opposition, or any member in reply, o speak longer than the 20 minutes. Thereore, I think we should not accept this amendent, but rather adopt or concur in the eport as it has been presented. We already ave an undertaking from the subcommittee hairman that he will give this matter further onsideration, and by defeating the amendent we could at least make some progress oday.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I want to take only a moment o comment on a couple of things I have bserved during the course of this debate. have listened very attentively to what has een going on this afternoon. I was cheered nitially at least by the spirit of congeniality hat seemed to exist earlier in the day. I see o reason for the house to get into a bad emper, and in the process of turning on ach other destroy a report which with minor mendments we would all like to see accepted.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) stated the position this morning. Subsequently the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) spoke and I understood him to say hat he agreed that the exception with regard o the Prime Minister, other ministers and he Leader of the Opposition would receive upport not only from him as an individual nember of the house, but would be supported because it was a change that he as Prime Minister and leader of the Liberal arty in the house would like to see made. Subsequently the Prime Minister left the hamber.

When the amendment was put before the ouse by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) at that point rose n his place and stated, according to my nderstanding, that it was not acceptable to the government. So this leaves a person like myself who had no intention of participating in the debate and who understood that we had a sort of general agreement—

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit a question? I am sure he would not wish to misrepresent me. Would he agree with me that the amendment goes much farther than the suggestion made by the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister, and raises other problems?

Mr. Rhéaume: I agree that is true. I also agree that if the report in its present form is adopted it will fall far short of what the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition agreed would be acceptable to them. In any event, I have no intention other than to comment briefly in answer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I would say to him that if the report is adopted as presented it will be a much more difficult task to amend it subsequently. This is the history of all measures that are adopted. It is harder to change them, once they have been accepted than it is to make revisions in them at the time they are before the house.

Before the question is put I should like someone from the government side and speaking for the government to explain to me how they can square the statement of the Prime Minister that he felt this change for himself and the Leader of the Opposition at any rate was necessary and desirable with the position as expressed by the President of the Privy Council. I would make a passing reference to the remarks of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) who said it is obvious that the Conservatives are trying to squelch the minor parties in this house. As a backbencher spokesman for the Conservative party I would say to him that surely no one in his right mind would pursue the logic he expects us to follow to the point of absurdity, and say that there should only be one party. I hope he is not trying to make the argument that proliferation of parties in the house is not causing delay and has not in fact caused most of the delay. I can think of the obvious example—

An hon. Member: That is a problem for the electors.

Mr. Rhéaume: —which is on motions—

An hon. Member: Who caused the delay on the flag?

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that you will recognize anyone who wishes to speak if he will stand up on his feet so he can be identified. I was prepared to do that and I hope other hon. members will. No one in his right mind is advocating a dictatorship, albeit at times when pressed beyond the limit by the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire) some of us wish that a dictatorship could be implemented. The fact is that we as a party are not trying to stamp out splinter groups. I agree with my hon. friends that this is something for the electorate to decide, and I intend to bend considerable of my energies to trying to convince the electorate that stamping out splinter parties would be a desirable and acceptable thing.

An hon. Member: We did it in British Columbia.

Mr. Grégoire: We will get rid of you next time.

Mr. Rhéaume: Hon. members to my extreme left are most anxious to have this report accepted now so that we can go on with the next one which will recognize St. John the Baptist day as a holiday.

An hon. Member: Cheap stuff.

Mr. Grégoire: Now we know.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether you would call for order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Perhaps we can proceed with the discussion on the amendment as quickly as possible.

Mr. Rhéaume: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that before the question is put I should like someone on the government side to explain, if he can, how they can square the position taken by the Prime Minister this afternoon with the subsequent statement by the President of the Privy Council that the amendment would not be acceptable.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question. Is he not intelligent enough to understand that the positions taken were identical?

Mr. Lambert: No, they were not.

Mr. Rhéaume: In answer to the question Mr. Speaker, I think I am intelligent enough to do this, but since I appear to the minister to be obtuse I invite him to explain to me, if he can, why he finds the amendment proposed unacceptable when the Prime Minister himself, presumably still the leader of that party, said it would be acceptable to the government to have the Prime Minister and the leader of the official opposition given extra time.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, Mr. Speaker. If I have the permission of the house I will make that explanation right now because apparently the hon. member did not understand my remarks or the Prime Minister's. The Prime Minister was very clear in putting it on record that he trusted the committee, that he had confidence in the committee and that he was appreciative of the good work it had done and the break-through it had made. He also stated there was something in the point that the Leader of the Opposition had raised. He indicated that he expected the house would pass the motion for concurrence and try out the proposed amendments to the rules from now, the 166th day of this session, until the end of the session. He went on to say that if the committee in the meantime had not brought in some form of amendment along the lines of the suggestion of the Leader of the Opposition and the Prime Minister the house would be perfectly free to make a specific amendment when the motion for adopting this rule on a permanent basis came before it. That is precisely the position I took, after having added what I thought was an explanation of the procedural difficulty and the objections to the form in which the hon. member for Bow River had presented his amendment to the house. Indeed I invite any hon. member who will, to read the amendment and note the objections to its form, even if he is completely in accord with every detail of what the hon. member for Bow River suggests.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. K. H. More (Regina City): Mr. Speaker, time is running out and it is not my purpose to delay the vote on this report. I do not intend to enter into any extraneous arguments. I just want to say in passing that the argument of the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) seemed rather strange to me because I do not know whether he was proposing that reports of committees be adopted without debate, which seemed to be the intent of the remarks he made. Certainly I do not think anybody expected that, although the committee might agree unanimously on its report to the house, the house should not have the opportunity to make observations on it and return it if they saw fit.

The amendment, as I understand it, restricts the action the committee can take to the point that the committee would not be permitted, at the same time, to alter the report in other respects. My understanding of the situation is that the backbenchers particularly are concerned that if the amendment carries, and the report were returned with this instruction to the committee, it could mean that three or four hours of the time allotted for the debate would be taken by the leaders, or someone replying. It seems to me, therefore, that if this is the real concern and the instructions are too rigid, I should like to propose a subamendment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. More: I am proposing this subamendment, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Southam)—

An hon. Member: A referendum.

Mr. More: Do you want delay of this type, or do you want to use your head a little bit? I am serious in the proposals I make. I am not entering into extraneous matters because I want to complete this debate.

I move that the following paragraph be added:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in standing order 61A (1) should the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition or a minister moving a resolution preceding a bill involving the expenditure of public money and the member speaking in reply immediately after such minister, shall speak for more than 20 minutes, during the time when such resolution is under consideration in the committee of the whole house, then the time allowed for debate shall be extended by the additional time over 20 minutes that they shall speak.

In other words, if they spoke for 60 minutes or so there would be an hour and 20 minutes additional time permitted for the debate.

Mr. Grégoire: Carried.

Mr. Speaker: In the short time at my disposal, I have considered the subamendment and I must say that it does not seem to conform to the amendment. I really have difficulty in reading the two together so, in my opinion, the subamendment is not in order.

Some hon. Members: Question, question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment to the main motion. All those in favour of the amendment will please say, yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say, nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. Alexis Caron (Hull): I regret, Mr. Speaker, but I have something to say on the main motion before it is put.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to let this go by without making a few remarks because everything which was said simply proves that I was right in believing that the committee lacked courage and will power when this was set up. In fact, paragraph 4 says:

> There is, however, some doubt whether the abolition of the reference of such resolutions thereto would be valid.

Therefore, there is a doubt in this matter. There is no certainty. It is doubtful whether the Queen may reply in the affirmative or in the negative in the case of a money bill.

We all know that the Queen, in a constitutional kingdom like Canada, reigns but does not govern, and I believe that the committee could have decided by itself to remove such a resolution altogether.

Those who object to it can always go to court and attempt to prove that we have no right to act in this manner. But no, doubts persist, there is constant fear about what might happen. This, precisely, proves that I am right. This resolution, and consequently the amendment which has just been defeated, would not have been justified had the motion disappeared, for neither the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), nor the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) asked to speak longer than the other members.

Consequently, let the committee decide once and for all to eradicate completely the resolution stage which is an obsolete English custom which has no place in Canada. I should like to see it disappear entirely from our statutes, and those who object to this can always institute proceedings.

I think the committee could go even further and do away with the vote of nonconfidence here just as they have done in the United States. The committee could also see to it that general elections are held on a set date, as we might again have a minority government.

These changes could improve our procedure, for it would be a good thing if the government could govern the country.

I am suggesting these changes to the committee in order to improve the situation. The committee was set up to help us and not to hinder us, as in the past, for instance, a change was made which allowed us half an hour on Wednesdays but in exchange we had to give up half an hour on Mondays, Tuesdays and Thursdays. In other words we had to give up an hour and a half in exchange for half an hour.

These are some suggestions I would ask the committee to reconsider so that a decision may be made as soon as possible.

[Text]

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Since there appeared to be unanimity on the first portion of the amendment that has been defeated, and since it seemed to be the desire of the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker), that the time be at least extended in so far as those two gentlemen were concerned, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Churchill):

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after "be" and substituting therefor. "not now concurred in, but be referred back to the special committee on procedure and organization with instruction to amend subsection (2) of the proposed standing order 61A as referred to in paragraph 5 of the said report by striking out all the words following the word "member" in line two of the said subsection 2 and substituting the following:

"except the Prime Minister and Leader of the Opposition moving a resolution preceding a bill involving expenditure of public money shall speak for more than 20 minutes."

The rest of the wording is exactly the same, except the reference to the minister and the member replying has been deleted.

Mr. Speaker: In the very short period of time I have had to look at this amendment and take some advice, in my opinion the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Yukon is repetitious and out of order.

An hon. Member: Question.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): I cannot support any one of these recommendations in the resolution before the house. I should like to commend the committee for the work it has done, but there are principles involved here which I think this house should not lightly overlook. The first section recommends that the Speaker be given authority to rule on motions under rule 26 without the right of appeal. I feel that in this case members of the house are giving up control of the house and I believe members of the house should at all times retain control in parliament.

Section two deals with time limits on debate. It is true it refers only to the resolution stage in the case of money bills, but there is a principle involved here, too, and if we adopt this proposal we are limiting ourselves to five hours of debate, 20 minutes for each speaker. This means that only 15 speakers can take part, three from each party in the house. How would those speakers be chosen? I suggest that if the supporters of this amendment had to take their turn with all 265 members of the house they would not be in such a hurry to bring in this amendment. It is an amendment which would restrict the so-called backbenchers from taking part in debates and I am one who believes that we should not depart from the principle that every member of this house is equal in authority with every other member, and entitled to all the rights and privileges to which any other member is entitled. Therefore I think the provisions of section two of these recommendations are contrary to the principles which should be maintained in this house.

Under section three it is suggested that the title and preamble of any money bill, any resolution or bill, be deferred to the end of the discussion. How can the details of a bill be intelligently discussed if no discussion is permitted on the principle of the bill? I say that the principle of the bill which is called with the title or preamble should be discussed first.

Mr. McIlraith: Would the hon. member permit a question? Does he not realize that it is only proper to discuss the principle of a bill on second reading, and not on clause 1 in the committee stage?

Mr. Thomas: I am still of the same opinion but I do not wish to hold up the house unduly, since time is passing. I just wished to explain why I am opposed to all three sections of these recommendations.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

An hon. Member: It is almost five o'clock.

Mr. Knowles: All right, let it go.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the motion carry?

Some hon. Members: On division.

Motion (Mr. Knowles) agreed to.

CONCURRENCE IN FOURTEENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved that the fourteenth report of the special committee on procedure and organization, presented to the house on October 7, 1964, be now concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am sure all hon. members know what is in this fourteenth report. It proposes that from now on, instead of its being difficult for the house not to sit on holidays, it would become automatic that on the nine holidays listed in this report the house would not sit. Those holidays are—

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Knowles: —New Year's day, Good Friday, the day fixed for the celebration of the birthday of the sovereign, St. John the Baptist day, Dominion day, Labour day, Thanksgiving day, Remembrance day and Christmas day.

Motion (Mr. Knowles) agreed to.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely public bills and private bills.

Mr. Howard: I should like to rise on a point of order before you proceed any further, Mr. Speaker. I wonder whether during all the noise which went on while the motion we have just dealt with was being passed, Your Honour heard me say "on division"?

Mr. Speaker: We shall have to correct the records, then, and say it was passed on division.

CRIMINAL CODE

CONFLICT OF INTEREST—MUTUAL TRUST ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-56 to amend the Criminal Code (the Judas-Tree amendment).

He said: This is a minor bill which I introduced on an earlier occasion. There has been a debate in the house on it. I do not consider it as being of extreme importance and I do not intend to bring it up again at any future parliamentary session. It is obvious that it has not struck sparks among the Liberals and the Conservatives to whom I thought it might appeal. Basically it is a bill designed to appeal to people in the major parties who have been among the "ins" and the "outs" and to give them an opportunity to protect their appointees to various government boards and agencies against dismissal without some kind of notice being given so as to enable those appointees to seek other employment.

I am very pleased to see in the house people like the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) who lately was working in a campaign within another framework, because I know he will be able to bring to the house in this debate the opinions of someone who in framing up the whole party program in a campaign realizes how important it is that one not only knows people but also gets help from people who may expect to receive some kind of position or some kind of reward after a party has achieved power.

Mr. Byrne: Only the C.C.F. would do that.

Mr. Fisher: I know that the hon. gentleman and some of his friends realize this is a practical or pragmatic kind of politics. I was trying to recognize that it exists in introducing this bill. As I said on a previous occasion, I have introduced it for this reason. What triggered my introducing the bill was the summary refusal to reappoint a man who had been a Conservative appointment to the Canadian pension board. I believe very strongly that a minister and an executive should have the right to make these appointments. I know that just the other day the question was raised of the appointments to the board of directors of the C.N.R. A great many of these appointments were made by the previous Conservative government. Some of these appointments were terminated, and I have heard that some of the directors were rather hurt that their service had come to an end. This happens to be a part time kind of chore. I do not know what the basis of judgment should be with regard to whether they have done a good or a poor job. I do know there are some perquisites in connection with being a director of the C.N.R. which probably make the job attractive to people. I also imagine there are members of the Liberal government who would like to get their friends appointed to such a prestigious position.

Again, Mr. Speaker, this bill does not deal with that matter; it is not any complaint about that. It tries to give the opportunity of a fair warning when a government changes so that a person who has an appointment or a tenure for a definite period of years will know before the end of his tenure whether the government intends to reappoint him or not, so he can go about making arrangements for other work.

I think we were all intrigued a few weeks ago at the news that the head of the board of broadcast governors, Dr. Stewart, had written to the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) a personal letter indicating that he would not be willing to consider reappointment next year when his term of office came to an end. I do not know the reasons for Dr. Stewart feeling this way; I am sure he expressed them to the Prime Minister. But obviously here is someone who has the kind of appointment I am talking about and who is moving well ahead of time to anticipate any dropping. I am sure his colleague who is a permanent member of the board, Mr. Carlyle Allison, must have grave doubts as to whether a Liberal administration would wish to appoint him when his tenure of office ends, as it is due to end. I quite agree that the Dr. Stewart case indicates that, given time, knowing that he now faces a Liberal administration and is likely to face a Liberal administration unless we get an election much sooner than I expect, one can take a step in anticipation—

Mr. Greene: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fisher: I am always glad to have a point of order raised.

Mr. Greene: I wonder whether the hon. member is in any way speaking with any relevancy in respect of Bill No. C-56. Is he on the wrong page, on the wrong chapter, and playing a record that he meant to play last year? This bill is concerned with conflict of interest. With respect, Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is on the wrong wavelength. I suggest that he is on the wavelength of the King's evil, rather than the Judas tree. That is the problem with having such a literary mind; one can never be sure exactly which wavelength one is on.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I never appreciated a point of order more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fisher: I only regret that it had to be the hon. member for Renfrew South, who is back after all his labours, who raised the point of order; who was bright enough and quick enough to seize this point before you did, Mr. Speaker, or before I did. Of course, the primary responsibility should be mine. The hon. member is quite correct, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether I could get agreement to move on to the other bill.

Mr. Douglas: It is a shame to waste a speech.

Mr. Robichaud: Headlines in the Telegram tomorrow.

Mr. Fisher: I do not know whether I should ask the permission of the house to move on to the other bill; I do not suppose I could get it—but, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move on to the bill concerned with the King's evil.

Mr. Douglas: You are in the right church, but the wrong pew.

Mr. Deachman: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fisher: My colleague says I am in the right church, but the wrong pew.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I understand the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra (Mr. Deachman) is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Deachman: Mr. Speaker, I think we can help the hon. member out of his dilemma. I distinctly heard Bill No. C-56 called and I had opened Bill No. C-56 and had it before me. I think that if the house unanimously recognized that all those words which the hon. member has already said in some way have some relevancy to Bill No. C-56, the hon. member could then continue.

Mr. Fisher: I do not think that is a great deal of assistance, Mr. Speaker, although I appreciate the try. Bill No. C-56 has not been presented to the house before. The reason for bringing it in really relates to representations I have received from certain people who are interested in the mutual fund and the investment fund business. These people made the point to me that there is a practice that is more than a tendency for mutual funds to take advice from firms that in a sense are captive to their own, and to take this advice, instead of at a negotiated fee, at a percentage of the volume of business handled. As a consequence, if it is a quarter of 1 per cent, it sometimes has gone as high as 1½ per cent, and then the amount of money that is made by the investment firm is extremely high.

Given a well managed fund and a good return, I do not suppose any investor is going to complain about this. But the representations brought to my attention were by people who pointed out the identity, if you want, between the senior officers of the investment firms and the senior officers of the investment analysis and advisory people. It is rather obvious, particularly if you have read the book "The Grim Truth About Mutual Funds" by Ralph Lee Smith, that this practice has caused serious concern in the securities and exchange commission of the United States. This identity of interest is a means of giving an extra reward and profit in the operations to officers of mutual funds organizations. The effect of this amendment to the Criminal Code is contained in the bill as follows:

> —when his undertaking so entered into or continued may or does conflict in interest with an obligation of whatever nature by him owed in whatever capacity to any other person—

And so on. That means that if you have an investment analysis organization which is a subsidiary or, in effect, a captive in control of a fund or trust company, the compensation or benefits entered into by the people who are advising the organization are under a very definite control by the Criminal Code. The explanatory notes state:

> The principle of this bill has been applied to, and presently binds, members of this house and the Senate—by each house in its orders and rules and by parliament as a law of Canada.

That is inserted to emphasize the fact this principle does apply.

On this particular question of advice which brings financial gain, I realize how difficult and complex a problem one gets into when you look at all the various kinds of organizations which in a sense are advisory and at the same time may be considered captive. One of the reasons I felt an amendment to the Criminal Code would be worth while—and obviously it is not possible to come at this through any securities and exchange regulation—is that it would be there as something which could be invoked and brought up when something of this kind became a very evident scandal, rather than something which would be in application all the time where there are these kind of financial relationships.

I know it would be difficult in the case of certain lawyers and legal firms. For example, I can think of several in my own area to which this would apply. There is nothing wrong in what they are doing, but in effect several lawyers are partners in construction firms which do a fair amount of building and construction work. This is a sideline for them in a separate company. At the same time they are the legal advisers to the firm. I had not any intention in introducing this particular amendment to create any difficulties in an organization of that kind; I was thinking more specifically of the kind of public company operating in the trust and investment field whereby, as a means of providing an extra profit or some extra kudos to some of the senior executives, this advisory agency is set up and is given a percentage of all that which is invested by the major company, which would ensure a very tidy income which, in terms of the amount of time and skill put into it, just does not really seem justified. In essence it is a fictitious value which is created by this type of advice. I do not know how widespread is this practice in Canada but I do know from two different mutual organizations to whose representatives I have talked that the situation does exist in Canada.

There is very little more I want to say about this bill other than that I should like to see some interest in this question of mutual funds and investment funds, the way they receive advice and that advice is paid for. I happen to have some kind of certificate—I do not know that it actually represents shares—which I got a few years ago from a mutual fund in connection with a plan which sends your children to university. I have no complaint of the purchase which I made or the whole framework of the operation, but I do feel that if a particular company has an expanding order of business, as this one has, and if their investment advisers are dealing essentially with the same market, no matter how much money the firm has to invest it does not seem to me that a straight percentage of income from that amount of investment and investment growth is really fair. It seems to me that this is sloughing off some of the profits which should go to the actual investors in the fund.

Despite the humour and embarrassment of the situation, Mr. Speaker, I regret that in a sense I have belittled my own bill as a result of the rather over-glamorous or over-gimmicky name attached to the title of "the King's evil". This shows how much confusion at least one member of parliament can get into and I apologize to the house and to my colleagues for the mistake I made. I also express my appreciation to the "boy from the valley", if I may put it that way, for drawing this mistake to the attention of myself and the house.

Mr. D. G. Hahn (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I felt sorry for the embarrassment caused the hon. member who, in his confusion at the beginning of the hour, started speaking on another bill. I think the speech he started on would have been better than the one we heard, and having heard bits of both I am not sure which would have been more relevant to the bill under discussion. I am afraid that the hon. member's sense of confusion relates not only to today, when he is discussing the bill, but also possibly went right back to the very day he introduced the bill. I have read this bill, and although I do not know what a "Judas-tree" amendment is, I think I do know what a conflict of interest is. I am afraid the provisions of the bill, if the bill were enacted, might in fact trap and ensnare the hon. member himself. Therefore I suggest to the hon. member that he give serious thought to looking at the bill under the cold, clear light of logic and possibly withdrawing it, because I think all of us would be very sorry indeed if he were to be enmeshed and entrapped in his own legislation.

This bill states that everyone is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years—which is a long time—who enters into a contract, agreement or relationship whereby he undertakes to sell or to furnish advertising, publicity or other service, information or data when his undertaking so entered into or continued may or does conflict in interest with an obligation of whatever nature by him owed in whatever capacity to any other person.

I suggest that the hon. member be very careful that this does not apply to himself. He, like the rest of us here, is a member of parliament. He is remunerated and is obliged to serve his constituents and his country by his presence in the House of Commons, on committees and in his constituency. He is also obliged to use his time, and whatever talents he may possess, in order to study and cogitate in respect of legislation and other matters which would further the ends of this country and his constituency.

In addition to those obligations the hon. member has undertaken a few others. He writes a newspaper column. He is our poor man's Dorothy Kilgallen. I am informed he also has a television program, but fortunately so far I have not seen it.

Mr. Douglas: How do you know you are fortunate if you have not seen it?

Mr. Hahn: I am very fortunate in not having seen it.

Mr. Douglas: How do you know, if you have not seen it? Perhaps you have missed something.

Mr. Hahn: I have conversed with others who have seen it and who have appeared on it. These activities take up the member's time—time, as I understand it, that he and the rest of us are obliged to spend on parliamentary duties. This raises certain questions which I think the hon. member should consider.

Mr. Fisher: I wonder whether the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Hahn: I do not think I should—

Mr. Fisher: All right, that is fine. I just wanted to ask one question. The hon. member must realize that the line he is taking I do not find unwelcome, but I should like to point out to him that he is giving me an opportunity to open up a real Pandora's box in connection with a great many of his own colleagues.

Mr. Hahn: I think the line I am taking is one I deduced from the bill.

Mr. Fisher: If you deduced that from this bill, that's fine.

Mr. Hahn: We all must speak about those things which are apparent to us when we study specific legislation.

I was suggesting that there are some questions which perhaps the hon. member should consider before insisting that this bill be passed. In addition to the hon. member's other activities, how much time does he spend collecting and writing this gossip, innuendo and behind the curtains tittle-tattle which is printed in the newspaper? Does this activity of collecting, assembling and writing this material really serve the country and his constituents? Is he acting in the best interests of his constituents and his party when he has to cross a picket line in order to publish his column?

Mr. Fisher: That is not true.

Mr. Hahn: Is it possible that even in this house, sitting behind his desk, he is thinking about writing this column when he should be doing what the rest of us do under similar circumstances—that is, read the daily newspapers? Does he stay in parliament to hold his job as a columnist, or does he hold the job as columnist to maintain his seat in parliament?

Mr. Speaker, I think those are interesting questions that should be considered, and there are several others which come to mind. How often is he able to visit his constituents, and do these other activities hinder him in that regard? Those are questions that should be considered, because these activities do conflict with his interest as a member of the House of Commons. I think the hon. member must search out carefully the answers to those questions before asking that this bill be proceeded with, and I think that he must satisfy himself hat if the bill does pass he will not be trapped n his own net. I am afraid if it were to pass, he provisions of the bill would remove the ion. member from our presence for a period, s outlined in the bill, of as long as ten ears. I am sure that if that were to happen ome of us may or may not miss his column, ome of us may or may not miss the television how, but most of us would miss his presence n this chamber and the warmth that sometimes rises on a cold winter's day from his vords.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in the interests of he hon. member and in the interests of the est of us, I hope that he will reconsider and vithdraw the bill.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, have listened with a great deal of interest o the explanation of the hon. member n introducing his bill. I know on many occasions he has made presentations to this ouse which have been very convincing and ave carried a great deal of logic. It is unortunate today that the bill now under conideration is not one of his better efforts. I ave a great deal of difficulty understanding he bill, although I can understand the conlict of interest.

The drafting of this particular bill has aised questions in my mind. If I may, at this ime, I should like to divide my comments nto two sections. First, I should like to disuss in general the principles of private memers' bills, using this one as an illustration f what a member hopes to achieve by introlucing such a bill. Second, I should like to omment on some of the broader implicaions of what I consider to be the imperfect rafting of this bill, and the reasons I peronally do not think it should be enacted in ts present form, or sent to a committee in ts present form.

Earlier this day we received a presentaion from the leader of the hon. member's arty, reiterating the point he had previously nade in another place, to the effect that as art of a reform of this institution we should ermit every private members' bill to come o a vote. That was one of the principles put orward in a general statement some two veeks ago, and which was distributed outide this chamber. I was fortunate enough to eceive a copy of it, and I must say it conained a great deal of material which was rovocative, interesting and constructive.

I should like to discuss this principle, that very private members' bill come to a vote, n relation to the draft now before us, and n relation particularly to the explanatory notes which are presented to this house. People say this House of Commons can be a very dull place, but I cannot help but remember the debate that took place in this chamber yesterday. The House of Commons has devised its own form of amusement in the Bell Telephone hour, in which it has indulged for something like five months. It is in the form of a private members' bill, in this case sponsored by a member on this side of the house. There has been no indication that this private members' bill will ever be permitted to come to a vote. Hon. members of the party to which the sponsor of this bill belongs, and I want to make it clear that I am not referring to him in this regard, have moved amendments to that bill and have generally prolonged the debate. On one occasion I referred to that bill being talked out by spokesmen of that party and I was met with the ingenious explanation of the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) that somehow, when members of that party are talking at six o'clock, they are not really talking out the bill.

The truth is that observations in regard to a bill are right and proper in this chamber, and should it happen that the time allotted for the consideration of a bill expires, there is no reason why the bill, just because it is a private members' bill should be voted on or disposed of. That is not a necessary reform of this institution, and there is certainly some hypocrisy on the part of the members of that hon. member's party in this respect.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would acknowledge that the Bell Telephone bill, or pipe lines bills that have been talked out during the private members' hour, are not public bills? I think that is a distinction he should keep in mind. According to the rules of this house, it is not possible repeatedly to talk out a private member's public bill, because such a bill comes up once and then drops to the bottom of the order paper.

Mr. Francis: Mr. Speaker, if the suggested amendment to the procedures of this house is that certain types of private members' bills should be voted on while other types should be talked out, I suggest that the explanation which has been placed before this house has not made that kind of distinction. I was most interested to learn the principle by which we can distinguish those bills which it would be right and proper to talk out or to be making observations on at the end of the hour and those in regard to which it would not be considered proper.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, maybe I could ask the hon. member a question. Is there not a distinction between a private corporation such as the Bell Telephone Company or West Coast Transmission having a bill put through the house by a private member because of certain requirements they wish, and the ideas of members of parliament relating to public matters and represented by the long list of public bills found on the order paper?

Mr. Francis: I find this question very interesting. I thought I was being attentive to the debate but I did not hear that distinction being made. But if this is the principle by which the hon. member feels a distinction should be made, then perhaps certain classes of private members' bills relating to the incorporation of companies or membership on boards of directors should be considered at greater length in committee prior to being brought into the house. I do not know, but at least this has not been spelled out before. As I understood the presentation placed before us today I thought there was a blanket suggestion that somehow we could improve the operation of the house by voting on all of these bills. I had not heard the distinction which the hon. member has now endeavoured to make being offered by spokesmen for his party.

I said also in beginning my remarks that I did not find the nature of the bill such as one would normally expect in legislation which is offered for the serious purpose of enactment. May I refer to the explanatory notes where I find the following:

> For the Janusary of Mammon who has everything—

This is interesting language although I admit it is not the usual legal style. I must confess I have a great deal of difficulty understanding what a "Janusary" is. It is not a janizary, the former mercenary soldiers of the Ottoman empire, with whom I first confused it. Apparently it is a literary allusion of a rather profound and obscure nature. The explanatory note continues:

> —for the con-man confiscador of the Bay street boardroom—

The alliteration is interesting, but again I do not feel that alliteration should be the prime consideration of legal draftsmanship. I find that the whole tone and temper of the explanation given to us is pretentious and I wonder whether a person who has drafted an explanation in these terms really expects this kind of private members' bill to be enacted with this type of explanatory note. I know it is good journalism to, shall we say, be a little more provocative in style, but I do not think it is good legislative practice even in drafting explanatory notes.

I want to speak on the nature of the bill itself. Again, I am not trained in the law; I am simply a person who tries to read and understand the English language, and I have difficulty understanding this bill. Clause 1 reads in part as follows:

> Every one who, for compensation or benefit of any kind whatsoever, enters into or continues a party to any contract, agreement, or relationship, whereby he undertakes, in whatever capacity, to sell or furnish to any person any investment, managerial, financial, legal, engineering, purchasing, marketing, auditing, statistical, advertising, publicity, tax, research, or other service, information, or data, when his undertaking so entered into or continued may or does conflict in interest with an obligation of whatever nature—

This is a very sweeping indictment. Conflict is of the nature of things in our society. This is certainly so in our political life. The problem, Mr. Speaker, is not the existence of conflict. I think that the problem with which the hon. member is attempting to cope is the situation in which there is a lack of full and complete knowledge on the part of everyone concerned of the nature of the conflict, where there is inadequate disclosure of the situation in which a person may put himself, having more than one obligation which is not apparent to the parties with whom that particular person is dealing, where there is a situation in which ties that may exist are not public knowledge or not knowledge or information within the possession of the affected parties. I think that is the kind of situation where the injury lies.

In my own life, for example, I have engaged a solicitor to act for me in the purchase of a house. I knew at the time that this same solicitor had also searched the title for the vendor, had done the initial work on the property and was familiar with the title. The individual was well known to me. He is a man in whose competence I have to this day absolutely unquestioning faith and to whom I would trust my own personal possessions and reputation without any question whatsoever. That man was in a position of conflict as I understand the drafting of this clause, and he would be subject to a criminal penalty. If I have improperly understood the clause I should like some hon. member to tell me in what respect I have misunderstood it.

It seems to me that the hon. member has cast much too broad a net for the purpose he has in mind. Legislation should be specific. Legislation should deal with specific evils in a very specific way. An attempt to do too much, to use language that is too inclusive, to prescribe penalties in situations where they would not be enforced, does not result in the kind of legislation that according to my understanding of the law should be enacted in this house.

I come back to my initial point. What is the purpose of a private members' bill? I think the hon. member has a most laudable purpose. He wants to call attention to certain situations where conflict exists, where there is harm done, and I think the best way in which the house can deal with this problem is to debate it at some considerable length. I would be very much surprised if the time of one hour would be sufficient to permit a subject as broad and as important as this to be disposed of by the house.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion we have seldom seen in this house a bill such as Bill No. C-56, and I am convinced that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) does not talk the same way to his electors in order to be elected, because he would confuse them more than he would enlighten them under such circumstances. In fact, we do not know exactly where he is heading for.

I listened carefully to the remarks made by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hahn) on this bill, and I believe he inferred that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) did not serve the best interests of his electors because he was writing a column in a newspaper or appeared on a local television program in Ottawa, on station CJOH-TV, which perhaps covers all of Canada.

In this respect, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if several Liberal members should not be blamed for maintaining a law office, a business or practicing another profession, apart from being members of parliament.

The hon. member for Port Arthur is certainly entitled to write in the newspapers and to emcee a television program. He even invited me to appear on his program once, and although we may not share the same political views I must admit my fellow member's television program is objective. He endeavours to inform the public by making use of every political faction in the country and allowing them to express their opinions very freely.

In my opinion the hon. member for Broadview was getting onto very slippery ground for his party and for the entire body of representatives because every single one of us can engage in business activities even though we are members of this house. In fact I myself am a merchant in addition to being the member for my constituency. I am not ashamed to admit it loud and clearly. I do not think it is quite fair that a stone should be cast at the hon. member for Port Arthur in this connection.

In his bill the hon. member for Port Arthur tells us about Mammon, Bay street, Janus, of people who try to suggest economic panaceas, universal remedies.

I wonder if the hon. member did not really intend to remind us of what he has read in the Bible by attempting to compare it with what goes on in the financial world.

It is a fact that there are parasites in the world of finance, people who extort money from the public through all sorts of fraudulent ways and means.

For instance, not too long ago there were mine promoters in northern Ontario; indeed, we had some too in northwestern Quebec. Those people, who were not truly mine promoters, stole large amounts of money from average citizens and workers who had some savings.

When fantastic ore deposits were discovered in the Timmins area recently, swindlers rushed to areas located 40 and 50 miles away from Timmins, and formed mining companies with respect to properties which had absolutely nothing in common with the site on which the ore was found. Federal charters as well as provincial charters were the object of speculation. In any case, people were swindled out of their funds. This is plain robbery, no less, of the small investor.

Such practices have taken place and still take place in our country in many fields, not only in the sale of mining stock. I have just referred to a recent instance, but thousands upon thousands of small investors are losing their savings in this way. Among them are workers, miners, labourers, or farmers who sold their cattle and their property in order to buy stock in such mining companies on the strength of some tip they claim to have got about this or that mining stock. They had been told that in a matter of months, they would get three or five times the money they had put in.

Today these people are grievously concerned; they are in a sad predicament. Why? Precisely on account of those sharpers paid by stock market operators to extort the workers' money.

In this respect, the bill introduced by the hon. member is justifiable. His explanations of it are not quite clear and my constituents will understand nothing about it, neither will 80 per cent of the hon. members for that matter.

I quote from his bill:

> The Criminal Code is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 325 thereof, the following section:
> 325A. Every one who, for compensation or benefit of any kind whatsoever, enters into or continues a party to any contract, agreement, or relationship, whereby he undertakes, in whatever capacity, to sell or furnish to any person any investment, managerial, financial, legal, engineering, purchasing, marketing, auditing, statistical, advertising, publicity, tax, research, or other service, information, or data, when his undertaking so entered into or continued may or does conflict in interest with an obligation of whatever nature by him owed in whatever capacity to any other person is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for ten years.

Can anyone imagine that this will be readily understandable to the man in the street?

It seems to me that the earnest hon. member for Port Arthur—whom I know to be a responsible man—could have introduced a bill couched in clearer language which would have included all those financial sharpers operating all over the country, the con men and tipsters of "good things" in the way of securities or mining stock, and the rest of it.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, and real estate too.

Mr. Caouette: Yes, real estate too, as pointed out by the hon. member for Roberval.

In any case all those professional swindlers—and there are countless numbers of them in Canada—who try their luck and who, so we are told, are none the less, as I stated in my opening remarks, parasites, leeches, living on the blood and sweat of small investors. They lead a life of idleness, with only one purpose in mind, hornswoggling the public.

As I said earlier we have seen instances of them in the field of finance. In my own riding we have had the case of an non-existent mine, and yet hordes of salesmen covered the province of Quebec selling stock in that fictitious bonanza. And do you know, Mr. Speaker, that stock which originally was selling at 10 cents a share later went up to 77 cents without any development work being done for the simple reason that there was no such mine. And yet shares were being marketed; there was stock-jobbing going on in those mining stocks and on the stock exchange.

Now, who had a say in the value of those shares? A handful of men at the head of that mining company. So it was that close to a million and a half dollars were extorted from farmers, settlers, miners, small wage earners, and nobody was punished under either provincial or federal legislation.

The same thing happened in the Timmins area. It is still being done. No provincial or federal government ever steps in to put a stop to those financial intrigues designed to take unfair advantage of plain folk.

Now a bill designed to bring to light the defrauders or ferret out swindlers and cheats should be adopted by this house so as to put an end to this shameful exploitation of the small wage earners in this country.

[Text]

Mr. Grant Deachman (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, I have read the explanatory notes of this little bill with a great deal of interest, as has my colleague who spoke just a few minutes ago. It is a little classic of allusion and alliteration with such phrases as "Janusary of Mammon" and "pink pep pills". There is nothing really wrong with this little composition that a sharp editorial pencil could not cure. I am sure any member of the press gallery would help any hon. member of this house who showed such a pathetic eagerness to achieve a literate style. In fact, if I know my hon. friend's stuff at all, I doubt very much that he wrote this because this is not the kind of thing which appears regularly in the press under his byline. I think it is part of the flourishing nineteenth century style of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron). I doubt very much indeed that my hon. friend had ever seen this bill before he came into the house. Surely he would not put into the record stuff like "Janusary of Mammon", "Bay street boardroom", and so on. He would be wiped from the editorial pages across the continent if he produced stuff like this. It just is not part of modern day journalism.

I think what probably has happened here is that the shemozzle we witnessed earlier this afternoon goes back even further and that the little bill we have before us is not the one which the hon. member intended to present at all, but that somehow or other the name of Mr. Cameron had been exchanged on the bill for the name of Mr. Fisher and he was reluctantly dragged into the chamber from some other place where he was writing his column, picked up a book, read from any old page, got off to a poor start, was corrected by the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. Greene) and then proceeded to deal with a bill he had never seen before. I must say, though, that in the face of all these troubles the hon. gentleman certainly put up a brilliant performance and I know we would wish to commend him for it.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): I wish to direct the attention of the house to one or two aspects of this bill and I think I can do so in less than two or three minutes.

If it is the intention of the hon. member by this proposal to amend the Criminal Code to strike against certain specific ills, then to that extent, to the extent of his explanation, I have sympathy with his motives though not necessarily with the methods he is attempting to use. An examination of the wording used in this bill indicates, as one hon. member has already said, that far too wide a loop is being cast compared with the result which it is intended to achieve.

I think we must understand the distinction between the civil and the criminal law. Most actions which are the subject of prohibition by the Criminal Code can be the subject of civil proceedings. From time to time under common law where there has been a conflict of interest reflected in a breach of trust by one acting in a fiduciary capacity there has been, and is, a right of action in civil law. But when we come to take from the civil law certain acts and brand them as being so evil in their nature that they should be characterized as criminal offences liable to the penalties of criminal as well as of civil law, I think we must be precise and accurate in our definitions. We must recall that a crown prosecutor called upon to seek a conviction under a section of the Crimial Code has the onus of proving his case beyond any reasonable doubt, and I think it would be most difficult for a crown prosecutor faced with the necessity of asking a jury to return a verdict of guilty to succeed, having regard to the wording which is now used in this measure.

The complexity of the world today makes for so many forms of inter-relationship between people, social, moral and legal that the wording used by the hon. member would, I fear, place a great burden upon the law officers of the crown if it were allowed to become part of the criminal law.

Mr. J. J. Greene (Renfrew South): First I should like to say that the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) certainly does have one distinction. I think he has established it for himself by this bill. He is undoubtedly the only member of parliament—his claim to fame may be slight—who may be recorded in the annals of parliament for one thing, namely as being the only man ever to introduce two bills in the same private members' hour. It may be a small claim to fame—

Mr. Fisher: It would have been only one, but for you.

Mr. Greene: It matters little to us on this side of the house whether the hon. member hangs himself on the Judas tree or whether he does away with himself by an overdose of the King's evil. Whichever it is, we would be quite satisfied. I was disturbed by the admonitions of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Hahn), that if this bill were passed the hon. member for Port Arthur would have to give up one or other of his vocations. I, personally, enjoy reading his column. There have been some very prominent people mentioned in that column. I had the unfortunate experience of using his column as part of my election literature in a recent ill-fated campaign in which I participated, and I was assured by my supporters that the use of the hon. member's column was the very thing which finished once and for all my chances of success in that campaign, and I never read it thereafter. Nevertheless, I personally miss his column. The unfortunate thing would be that if the hon. member were to lose his seat I know he would never gain a place in the press gallery, from his standing with that honourable body of gentlemen, and we would therefore be obliged to do without his column. So I sincerely hope this bill will not pass and that the hon. member will be able to continue bringing a little ray of sunshine into many lives in many places.

I would add one or two words with regard to the general tenor of the bill. I agree with the hon. member for Carleton, that its provisions are too sweeping having regard to the ends which are sought. To this extent it is typical of socialist solutions. With one fell swoop they would cure all the ills of the world. Here they are trying to cure a broad area of ills by one paragraph in one bill. I do agree that in this day and time there is a great need for the protection of the individual citizen in many areas against those in corporate positions of power whether in government or in business. There is talk of legislation to protect consumers. If members wish to talk about an individual citizen in this area as a consumer, it might be good terminology. I think we have done a very bad job of protecting the individual against big corporations, be they business or government. I think the securities legislation which was referred to by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette) is a good example of our failure to protect the individual against the organized corporate entities which are to be found in our society. I think that in the United States of America, since the anti-trust laws of Teddy Roosevelt they have done a much better job in this area than we have. Even though we have fallen foul of unhappy constitutional interpretations which make action difficult at the federal level, it is my hope that the general thought behind the hon. member's bill, namely that the public generally should be protected from abuse by corporate bodies so that the private enterprise system may operate fairly, is a commendable one and that what the hon. member is trying to achieve, though in a most ineffective way, if I may say so—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. The private members' hour has now expired.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Would the acting leader of the house tell us the business for next week?

Mr. McIlraith: I can give the business for Tuesday. I am sorry I cannot go beyond that at the moment. Before doing so I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that the motion standing on the order paper providing for an adjournment on Monday now becomes redundant and will not appear on the order paper next week. I do not believe I need consent to withdraw it; I can do so by giving notice to the clerk. In any event, I give the house such notice.

On Tuesday the first item of business will be item 49 on today's order paper, second reading of an act to amend the Crop Insurance Act. The next will be item 7, the resolution on the measure to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. The third item of business will be item 39 seeking approval of convention No. 111 concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation which was adopted by the international labour conference on June 25, 1958. The fourth item of business will be item 77 on today's order paper, which is second reading of Bill No. C-126, an act respecting hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacations and holidays with pay in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Batten): Order. It being after six o'clock, and pursuant to standing order 2, section 4 adopted this day, this house stands adjourned until 2.30 o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday next.

It being three minutes after six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

REFERENCE TO INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION ON RED RIVER POLLUTION

October 1, 1964.

Dear Mr. Chance,

I have the honour to advise you that the governments of the United States and Canada have been informed that the waters crossing the international boundary in the Red river are polluted by sewage and industrial wastes. Having in mind the provisions of article IV of the boundary waters treaty signed January 11, 1909, that boundary waters and waters flowing across the boundary shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other side, the two governments have agreed upon a joint reference of the matter to the international joint commission, pursuant to the provisions of article IX of said treaty. The commission requested to inquire into and report to the two governments upon the following questions:

(1) Are the waters referred to in the preceding paragraph being polluted on either side of the international boundary to an extent which is causing, or likely to cause, injury to health or property on the other side of the boundary?

(2) If the foregoing question is answered in the affirmative, to what extent, by what causes, and in what localities is such pollution taking place?

(3) If the commission should find that pollution of the character just referred to is taking place, what remedial measures would, in its judgment, be most practicable from the economic, sanitary and other points of view and what would be the probable cost thereof?

For the purpose of assisting the commission in making the investigation and recommendations provided for in this reference, the two governments will, upon request, make available to the commission the services of engineers and other specially qualified personnel of their governmental agencies, and such information and technical data as may have been acquired by such agencies or as may be acquired by them during the course of the investigation.

It would be appreciated if the commission would submit its report and recommendations to the two governments as soon as practicable.

Yours sincerely,

Paul Martin

Mr. D. G. Chance, Secretary,
Canadian Section,
International Joint Commission,
303 Fuller Building,
75 Albert Street,
Ottawa.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, October 13, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PROCEDURE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN ELEVENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the order: Motions:

Mr. Olson (acting for the special committee on procedure and organization):

That the eleventh report of the special committee on procedure and organization, presented to the house on October 7, 1964, be now concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether this motion could stand, due to a very reasonable request that has been made. Some hon. members are not ready to debate this report, the concurrence of which has been moved, but hope they will be in a position to take it under consideration on Thursday.

Motion stands.

TOBACCO

PROVISION FOR INSPECTION AND STANDARDS OF QUALITY

Mr. E. F. Whelan (Essex South) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-130, respecting the inspection of tobacco and tobacco products entering into international and interprovincial trade (tobacco inspection act).

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to provide standards of quality for tobacco and tobacco products in the export-import and interprovincial tobacco industry in order to protect the financial interest of the tobacco farmers and the physical health of the consumers. This bill is similar in principle, substance and form to the Meat Inspection Act.

I believe we all realize that for a great many people of the nation the habit of smoking will continue for a long time to come. I believe it is the duty of parliament to make sure that tobacco products used for human consumption, whether manufactured here in Canada or in some other nation, should be made as safe as possible, and should have some form of government inspection. We know at one time tobacco stems were not used in manufactured tobacco, but in some instances today this is not the case and they are being used to the extent of several million pounds, creating a large tobacco surplus and marketing problem.

This bill gives similar powers to the Minister of Agriculture as does the Meat Inspection Act, in respect of labelling the product so as to identify the ingredients and additives which may be in the manufactured tobacco product. This bill also allows standards to be made from time to time, as prescribed by regulation of the governor in council.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HALES—STATEMENT BY AGRICULTURE MINISTER RESPECTING TURKEY IMPORTS

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to raise a question of privilege concerning the Minister of Agriculture and hon. members of this house. On September 10, in answer to a question posed by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, the minister stated, as recorded at page 7826 of Hansard:

In the last two weeks there have been no importations of turkeys from the United States—

On October 7 a question was posed by the hon. member for Huron, and a supplementary question by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, which the minister said he would take as notice. On the following day, October 8, the minister said in part:

During the week ending September 5, 185,892 pounds; week ending September 12, 135,500 pounds; week ending September 19, 83,752 pounds and the week ending September 26, 45,112 pounds, making a total for the month of September of 450,256 pounds, bringing the total imports to that date to 8,214,159 pounds.

The point is that on September 10 we were told that there were no importations in the two weeks covering August 29 to September 5 and September 5 to September 10; then we were later advised there were importations in the poundages I have just quoted. So I think the house was misinformed in this respect. In the same statement the minister also said, as found on page 8870 of Hansard, with reference to the turkey producers and his request for suggestions from them:

As yet I have received no reply.

I have here price information release No. 231 of the Ontario turkey association which contains this statement:

It was agreed the industry still considers import controls are what we need, but short of achieving this the O.T.A. fully endorses the C.T.F.'s efforts to have the government step the live tariff up another 2 cents, to 4 cents per pound, as recommended by the Manitoba association with C.T.F. approval. This request crossed a letter from Mr. Hays a week ago Monday.

That was September 21.

In this, the minister asked for specific data on our tariff position, which the Manitoba brief gave concisely. The next move is up to Mr. Hays.

I know the minister did not want to misrepresent the facts nor did he wish to mislead the house, but I think the record should be kept straight.

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as you and all hon. members will recall, there was a great deal of turkey talk in the house.

I would not want to mislead hon. members of the house in so far as the turkey situation is concerned. Until I check Hansard I am not admitting that I said there were no importations of turkeys whatsoever in those two weeks although I am not saying I did not say so. But it seems to me that on every occasion I said that imports of turkeys had practically dried up with the exception of one plant where they were still coming in.

I have written three letters to the turkey federation. The letter to which the hon. member for Wellington South has referred was one from the Ontario turkey federation. I have received correspondence from the British Columbia turkey people and the Alberta turkey people, and I have asked them all to get together and send me a resolution from the turkey federation of Canada with the support of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and possibly also the farm unions, because this would give me something to consider and take to the proper authorities in order that we might resolve the problem.

I must repeat with regard to the turkey situation in Canada that there is tariff protection of 5 cents a pound, along with 1½ cents a pound because of the discounted dollar and something in connection with freight rates, adding up to a total of about 7 cents a pound. In view of the fact this is about 20 per cent more protection than most of our meat products receive it seems to me that in considering any change we must look at the situation very carefully.

UNITED NATIONS

RUSSIA—REFUSAL TO SHARE COST OF PEACE KEEPING OPERATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Has Canada been made aware of the fact that the United States is taking the stand that the U.S.S.R. and other defaulting members of the United Nations must make good their assessments as a condition to the right to vote at the next general assembly of the United Nations? If so, does Canada intend to follow a similar course in this regard? Now that the stand of the United States has been made unequivocally plain, I think the house should be made aware of Canada's stand.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I need not remind the right hon. gentleman, of course, that the stand Canada takes in these matters is not necessarily the stand that is taken by any other country. The foreign policy of Canada has always been determined by the government of this country, and that is the way it will continue to be.

The position made known by the government of the United States through Mr. Stevenson was stated in a committee of which Canada is one of the 21 members. The interpretation that Canada places on the default of certain countries, including the Soviet union, with regard to peace keeping financial obligations, is that under article 19 of the charter of the United Nations, a country that is deficient in payment to an amount greater than its assessed contribution for the two previous years renders itself automatically liable to loss of vote.

This is the position as Canada understands it and as the Canadian representative stated it to be in the working group of 21. I hope, however, that this problem will be resolved without invoking the automatic application of this clause. I hope the Soviet union, and any other country that owes money to the United Nations, will find it possible to make payment and thus not render operative this particular provision of the charter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: In order to bring about the realization of that hope, is Canada going to support the postponement of the opening of the United Nations for a month or two so the secretary general may be able to continue his negotiations to the end that the default of the U.S.S.R., and other nations may be met?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): There has been no formal proposal that the opening of the assembly be postponed beyond November 10. There are some pressing matters which, in the judgment of the government, make it desirable that the meeting take place on the tenth.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): I wish to direct a question to the hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs.

I did not quite understand the explanations given by the hon. minister a while ago concerning the reasons advanced by Russia for not fulfilling its commitments toward the UN.

Did Russia state the reasons why it will not fulfil or why it refuses to fulfil its commitments toward the United Nations, where it has a right of veto, although nothing has been paid by Russia for several months.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, the U.S.S.R. has given some reasons which, in the opinion of the government, are not acceptable. When the estimates of my department come before the house I shall be in a position to discuss more fully the reasons why we do not accept the position taken by the Soviet union.

IMMIGRATION

HAL BANKS—PURPORTED PUBLICATION OF DEPARTMENTAL DOCUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Mr. Speaker, arising from the publication in the Toronto Star of what seemed to be facsimiles of documents from his departmental files in relation to the Hal Banks case. I should like to ask the minister what co-operation was given to the Toronto Star in obtaining this material, and if none was given can he give us the explanation, according to his officials, of how these private papers from departmental files were obtained by that newspaper and published?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member put his question on the order paper; then, the officials of my department will be able to give it the necessary attention and provide the required information.

[Text]

Mr. Fisher: I appreciate the minister's attempt to have this question placed on the order paper, but it is current and it is very lively. Certainly I put it to you, Mr. Speaker, that Hal Banks has been considered a matter of urgency, and if at the present time the minister has been co-operating in leaking information that is not available to us as members of the house—

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a statement, not a question.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that the letter was published in the Toronto Star, I wonder if the Prime Minister would reconsider his position and have an inquiry into the whole sordid mess.

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Speaker, I would like to debate this question at ten o'clock.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): As a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, in view of the publication of this letter in the Toronto Star will the minister table the letter and other relevant correspondence?

Mr. Tremblay: No, Mr. Speaker.

WATER RESOURCES

SPEECH BY U.S. OFFICIAL TO ALASKA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. It is of national significance, and the circumstances are of great importance to many Canadians. Has the minister's attention been directed to the report of a speech made by Mr. Gus Norwood, executive secretary of the United States northwestern public power association, to the Alaska chamber of commerce? If so, would the minister inform the house of his reaction to these proposals and projections and their effect on the future development of Canadian water resources?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of this question, and may I suggest it is an excellent question for the order paper.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I would like the opportunity to discuss this further at ten o'clock.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

PROTEST RESPECTING PLAY ON PROGRAM "FESTIVAL"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. P. V. Noble (Grey North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct this question to the Secretary of State. Is the government going to tolerate plays like the one that appeared on the C.B.C. television program "Festival" last Wednesday, October 7, which to say the least was revolting?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I did not see this program, but I would like to remind the hon. member that it has always been understood that the government has nothing to do and should not interfere with the programming of the C.B.C. or of the private broadcasters.

Mr. Noble: As a supplementary question, to whom would the people of this country report and ask for some guidance as to who would take care of such programs?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure the management of the C.B.C. will take note of the views of the hon. member.

PUBLIC SERVICE

APPLICATION OF STANDARDS LEGISLATION TO PREVAILING RATES EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Can the minister indicate whether changes in fair standards legislation being considered by his department will include changes affecting the so-called prevailing rate employees?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the proposals embodied in the Canada labour code will have effect both on the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act and upon the prevailing rate policy of the government. When it is possible to have second reading of this bill I shall indicate the matters under consideration with respect to both these other two matters.

[Mr. Herridge.]

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Lessard (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Secretary of State.

In view of the interest shown in the work and research done by the Economic Council of Canada, could the minister tell the house and the people of Canada whether we can soon expect a report from that body?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Economic Council of Canada will submit its annual report as required by law. Indeed, I shall be most happy to report to the house myself in that connection when my estimates are taken up.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT OF FEDERAL POSITION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address my question to the right hon. Prime Minister. As Premier Lesage has already announced, before the forthcoming federal-provincial meetings, the basic minimums acceptable to the province of Quebec, will the Prime Minister, on behalf of the federal government, announce before or during the forthcoming meetings with the provinces an outline of the federal government's position in the face of these minimum demands from the province of Quebec?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure to what my hon. friend is referring when he talks about minimum demands, but I do know it is not wise to give your case publicity on the eve of an important negotiation.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. At any of these meetings with the provinces will there be any definite proposals emanating from the federal government relating to the immediate improvement of permanent consultative machinery between Ottawa and the provinces?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, as my hon. friend knows, this matter has been considered at previous meetings in the course of the last year. It has been felt by most of the provinces that the present machinery is satisfactory, and that the institution of the federal committee in question dealing with federal-provincial relations has been working well and no further changes are necessary at this time.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

SUPREME COURT DECISION RESPECTING HUNTING AND FISHING RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the right hon. Prime Minister a question relating to the one which was posed to him on Wednesday last by the hon. member for Northwest Territories relating to the hunting, fishing and trapping rights of the Indian people and the royal proclamation in relation thereto. The Prime Minister indicated on Thursday, I believe it was, that he would be able to answer that question on Friday or Monday at the latest. Not having had a chance yesterday, I wonder whether he could answer it today.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think this question deals with the conviction of a man named Michael Sikyea, an Indian, for shooting a wild duck. It was a very interesting case; on one occasion in the case it was suggested the duck was probably not wild. I think the Prime Minister stated the other day in reply to this question that the judgment of the court will have to be reviewed, and that is the stand we take at the present time.

There is a wish on the part of the wildlife authorities to limit the destruction of game birds because of the efficiency of modern firearms. At the same time there is the law in respect of the rights of Indians under treaty. We are aware of these things, and until the judgment is studied I do not think we would care to make a further statement about the matter.

Mr. Howard: If I may suggest, Mr. Speaker, I think the minister is perhaps in error with regard to the purport of the question. It did not have to do with the shooting of a wild or any other kind of duck, but to a decision of Chief Justice McRuer of Ontario on May 30, 1963, upholding the royal proclamation of King George III. I inquired about this matter on May 31 and asked the Prime Minister then whether he would communicate the results of that court decision to all government agencies, provincial governments and the like, so that in their dealings with the native Indian people they could have their full interests at heart. The question of the hon. member for Northwest Territories was whether the Prime Minister had indicated to the various government departments and provincial governments the effect of that court decision, which he promised to do on May 31. That was also my question. What has the Prime Minister done to put into effect that which he promised he would do on May 31 of last year?

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I want to say that in our view there is a demarcation between game control under the migratory birds act and other wildlife on the ground. The law in relation to the treaty that we have with the United States in respect of migratory birds places that particular section of game in a different position than wildlife on the ground.

Mr. Howard: Why don't you answer the question?

PENITENTIARIES

PROPOSED LOCATION OF NEW WOMEN'S PRISON

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Justice. In view of the interest in and the representations now being made in respect of the federal prison for women now located at Kingston, has the government reached any decision as yet with regard to whether it should remain where it is or should be moved to another location?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to bring this matter to the minister's attention when he returns.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

JURISDICTION RESPECTING OFFSHORE MINERAL RIGHTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources and concerns a statement which appeared in a Canadian Press dispatch of last week. I think in order to refresh the minister's mind I will read part of what he said, which appears in the dispatch in quotation marks:

"If we can't come to an agreement next week, the federal government plans to go to the Supreme Court of Canada to ask for a decision".

The minister was referring at that time to the jurisdiction in respect of offshore mineral rights. My question is this. What are the plans of the federal government vis-à-vis the provinces on the question of mineral rights in these offshore mineral areas?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, we have had some discussions with the province of British Columbia, and it was agreed with their minister of mines that he would make a recommendation to his cabinet that a reference be taken to the Supreme Court of Canada for a decision. We on our part undertook to suggest a similar move to our cabinet. Now I believe the provinces have asked that the matter of offshore mineral rights be discussed at the conference beginning on Wednesday, and that will be done.

Mr. Hamilton: This is what concerns me, Mr. Speaker. The statement here is "If we can't come to an agreement". My question is, if the policy of the government is to take this matter to the supreme court, that is one thing. If they talk of agreement, they must have some concessions to offer in order to reach agreement. What are those concessions?

Mr. Laing: I would not like to say I was misquoted, but I did not say "If we can't come to an agreement".

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF ROADS TO RESOURCES PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Robert C. Coates (Cumberland): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of northern affairs. Have negotiations been initiated by his department with provincial governments related to the roads to resources program which will result in an extension of that program, which is rapidly drawing to a conclusion in many of the provinces?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): No, Mr. Speaker; but we have been in touch with the provinces asking them to review their position and advise us of their assessment of the program, and to tell us when it will be completed in their respective provinces.

Mr. Coates: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is any consideration being given to reinitiating this program for a further period of time?

Mr. Laing: Not in this form, Mr. Speaker.

NATIONAL PARKS

NOVA SCOTIA—TRANSFER OF LAND FOR SECOND PARK

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Inasmuch as preparation of the new national park in western Nova Scotia appears to be behind schedule, can the minister indicate whether the province of Nova Scotia has transferred the land involved to the federal government so that construction can be started? If not, can the minister say what is delaying the government of Nova Scotia in this matter?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to debate the matter at ten o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister in regard to the business of the house for this week. Could he assure the house that the undertaking given by the Minister of Justice with regard to a resumption of the debate on the minister's estimates will be carried out this Wednesday, as indicated by the Minister of Justice last Wednesday?

Right Hon. L. B. Pearson (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, irrespective of whether or not there was a formal undertaking with regard to this matter, I should point out that tomorrow the Minister of Justice will be attending a provincial conference on constitutional matters, and it will not be possible for him to be in the house.

Mr. Nielsen: He knew that.

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): May I ask a supplementary question. Would the Prime Minister, then, advise the house when the estimates of the Department of Justice will be brought before the house, if that undertaking cannot be kept?

Mr. Pearson: It will be announced in due course, Mr. Speaker.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUGGESTED MEETING WITH JUDGES RESPECTING TREATMENT OF OFFENDERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice I should like to direct a question to his parliamentary secretary. Is the Minister of Justice considering convening a meeting of judges similar to the meeting of probation officers which he addressed, at which he would outline to the judges his ideas on the need for shorter sentences and more probation?

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

POSSIBLE ACTION RESPECTING ONTARIO SUPREME COURT JUDGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice—in his absence perhaps his parliamentary secretary can take the question as notice—whether the federal government is considering taking any action under the Judges Act with respect to Mr. Justice Landreville.

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to accept the hon. gentleman's suggestion and bring this question to the attention of the minister.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS RESPECTING REORGANIZATION OF MILITIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can he please advise the house whether the second portion of the Suttie report on the militia has been considered, whether a decision has been reached, and when does he anticipate making an announcement with regard to this matter?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, consideration of this matter has been taking place for some time, and I would hope that announcements could be made within a few days.

Mr. Churchill: Inside the house or outside?

Mr. Hellyer: Anywhere you like.

AIR TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO NEGOTIATIONS BETWEEN AIR CANADA AND C.P.A.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address my question to the Acting Minister of Transport and ask him whether the government is in a position now to report on the negotiations that have been carried on between Air Canada and Canadian Pacific Air Lines relative to international and domestic route sharing?

Mr. Speaker: I really do not see any pressing urgency for an immediate reply. Perhaps this is a question for the order paper.

Mr. Rhéaume: Then may I discuss this at ten o'clock.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF INQUIRY INTO T.C.A. CRASH

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport. In view of my understanding that a release was given the press advising that a public hearing would be held in respect to the tragic Trans-Canada Air Lines crash near Montreal, can the Acting Minister of Transport give this house the details of the setting up of this inquiry?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to take this question as notice and to bring in an answer later.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED CONSERVATION MEASURES FOR NORTH ATLANTIC AREA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. In view of the reported statement by Dr. Herbert Graham, director of the United States bureau of commercial fisheries, that regulation of the size of fish nets for international trawlers will not serve as an adequate conservation measure in preserving north Atlantic stocks of fish, will the minister inform the house of the nature of any proposals which may be advanced for limiting our fishing efforts off our offshore banks when the northeast Atlantic fisheries committee next meets in Halifax?

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, this whole matter is being reviewed by the international convention of the north Atlantic fisheries, whose responsibility it is to recommend regulations applicable in that particular area.

Mr. Crouse: A supplementary question. Has any thought been given to proposing the adoption of closed seasons or quotas in certain periods of the year in some of the known heavy spawning areas, such as Georges bank, Browns bank and Sable island?

Mr. Robichaud: Not to my knowledge.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

TIME LIMIT FOR ACCEPTANCE OF PROJECTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State; I think he is the proper minister in this particular regard. Because the concluding date for the acceptance of centennial projects is rapidly drawing nigh—I believe it is November 9 but I am not certain of that—can the minister say whether there will be any extention of this time limit?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should like to remind the hon. gentleman that that date has been fixed by the Ontario government.

TRANSPORTATION

NOVA SCOTIA—REPORTED INTENTION TO REDUCE SERVICE BETWEEN HALIFAX AND YARMOUTH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport concerning a very important and urgent matter. Will the minister make immediate representations to the board of transport commissioners against the proposed reduction in dayliner service on the Dominion and Atlantic Railway between Yarmouth and Halifax in view of growing public protest, including the protests of Acadia University students?

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member put this on the order paper.

[Mr. Crouse.]

CROP INSURANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING REINSURANCE PROGRAM

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-129, to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I go into a detailed explanation of the government's reasons for bringing in these amendments to the crop insurance program I would like to make a few general comments about the purposes of this program. I would like to point out, for example, that this is part of the government's whole economic policy, a policy intended to strengthen the whole economy of Canada by strengthening its individual segments.

While this particular program applies directly to our agricultural economy, we believe that because of the importance of agriculture to our whole economy this will have the broader effect of adding further stability to the economy of the country as a whole. In other words, this is a program that will benefit the people in our cities indirectly, while giving direct help to our farmers. We believe that with the protection afforded by this legislation the provinces will be able to expand their crop insurance programs as quickly as they feel it is warranted. We hope this will encourage every province to participate eventually, because of the obvious advantage, in a Canada-wide program. By spreading the risks in any one year over wide areas and a variety of crops, good crops in one section of the country will offset the effect on the federal reinsurance fund of poor crops in other areas.

As I have already indicated, while the main purpose is to provide protection for our farmers, wide crop insurance coverage will provide a new economic buffer against the effects of wide variations in farm income on the economy of the country as a whole. Crop failure in one section of Canada has its initial economic impact in the immediate area of the crop failure. But we all know that a chain reaction sets in as well, a chain reaction that eventually spreads through the whole economy by reducing purchasing power and often affecting employment in other industries. It should be obvious that anything that can be done to level out the great variations in farm income, variations which are due to natural causes beyond human control, will have a beneficial effect on all parts of our economy.

I should like to point out another aspect of this program which we believe is of as much importance to the taxpayers in our cities as to our farmers. In fact, since there are so many more taxpayers in our cities these days than there are in the country, maybe this aspect of the program is of even greater importance to our city people than to our farmers.

I am referring to the fact that this is not a subsidy program. Like the farm credit programs which this government has either expanded or initiated at this session, this program is designed to give our farmers the kind of essential help they need while at the same time costing our taxpayers virtually nothing in the long run. This government is not afraid to provide subsidies where they are needed, but we believe that wherever assistance required by our people can be provided on a self sustaining basis this is the approach that should be taken. We believe that the role of government should be as an instrument through which our people cooperate to help each other improve their living standards, and we believe the program envisaged by this legislation supports that kind of government role.

As early as 1959, even before the first crop insurance agreement was signed, there were clear indications that the provinces were not satisfied with the original federal role in this program. The minister of agriculture for Manitoba, Hon. George Hutton, indicated that without some provision for federal reinsurance of provincial risks he could not see how his province could make crop insurance available to a large percentage of insurable farmers. Other provinces also indicated that despite the provision in the existing legislation for emergency federal loans they could not risk the tremendous impact which a disaster year might have on their over-all fiscal positions. Their big worry was that large loans from the federal government to cover crop insurance indemnities to farmers in a disaster year would have a bad effect on their borrowing powers for all other government purposes. They also pointed out that in times of widespread crop failure provincial revenues for all purposes were sharply reduced, making it that much harder to contend with the demands of heavy crop insurance payments.

From the beginning the provinces operating crop insurance programs have been careful to limit the amount of insurance sold in any year, either by applying their programs to limited areas or by placing a ceiling on the total liability to be accepted, so that in the event of heavy losses they would not be financially embarrassed. Crop insurance rates have been calculated on a basis considered actuarially sound, not only by provincial officials but by my department and the department of insurance.

I should also point out that these amendments will mean no change in premiums now paid by the farmers. The existing premium rate was set on a sound insurance basis; therefore the present premiums will provide provincial insurance funds with the capital necessary to pay reinsurance premiums to the federal government.

The provincial reinsurance premiums paid to the federal government will, over the long pull, equal what the federal government pays the provinces to help pay crop insurance indemnities in high loss years. Under the proposed amendments, provincial involvement in any year will be limited to about 25 per cent of the total amount of insurance in force in any year. As an example, suppose a province sells $10 million worth of insurance, and that premiums, including the federal contribution, are 10 per cent of the total liability, or $1 million. While federal reinsurance rates have not as yet been established, let us consider the rate in this case to be 2½ per cent of the total liability, or $250,000. The province pays the federal government a $250,000 premium for reinsurance coverage, leaving $750,000 in the provincial fund for the payments of indemnities.

Now let us suppose the worst possible thing happens; a complete failure occurs on all insured farms and $10 million has to be paid to the farmers. The province would pay out the $175,000 left in the provincial insurance fund first and assume responsibility for the deductible 2½ per cent of the total liability, or $250,000. This would leave $9 million in indemnities still to be paid, of which the federal government would pay 75 per cent, or $6,750,000, and the province 25 per cent, or $2,250,000. The total provincial involvement would be the 2½ per cent deductible of $250,000, plus $2,250,000 paid in indemnities or a total of $2,500,000 or 25 per cent of the face value of all policies of insurance.

This is the maximum possible involvement of the province, assuming that every insured farmer has a complete crop failure. However, even in the prairie provinces where, because of peculiar and extreme climatic conditions, a great variation of year to year yields is experienced, there has only been one year, 1937, when provincial average yields fell below 30 per cent of long term average yields. As insurance coverage is limited to 60 per cent of long term average yields, it can be reasonably assumed that indemnities will never exceed one half of the total liabilities, and provincial involvement never more than 12½ per cent of such liabilities.

The legislation permits provinces to protect themselves even further, if they want to. The legislation provides that a province may, if it so desires, reinsure its remaining 25 per cent involvement with agencies other than the federal government, and that these additional reinsurance premiums, provided they are approved by the federal government, may be paid from provincial crop insurance funds; that is, from premiums paid to the province by the insured farmers.

As I said earlier, we intend this in the long run to be a self supporting program, but to be honest it is hard to say at this early stage just what it might cost the federal government in any given year. However, as I have indicated, the federal reinsurance premiums will be most carefully calculated on a sound insurance basis. The legislation provides that the reinsurance premiums may be adjusted upward or downward if experience indicates such action to be necessary, and the premiums will be designed to equal, over a period of years, the amount of payments made to any province under a reinsurance agreement.

All our expectations in this, of course, as in all other agricultural programs, depend very greatly on the weather. Obviously if we have a lot of crop failures early in the scheme federal payments will exceed federal income from premiums. But if enough provinces enter the scheme and the weather is kind during the first few years, income from premiums will exceed insurance payments.

For an example we can consider what could happen in Manitoba if the crop experience of the last 35 years were to be repeated in the next 35 years. If disaster years like those experienced in the 1930's came early in the program, a $25 million insurance program in Manitoba could cost the federal government $400,000 a year in carrying charges for the interest free advances which would have to be made to the crop reinsurance fund from consolidated federal revenues. On the other hand, if the good crop experience of the 1940's in Manitoba should be repeated before disaster years like those of the 1930's, then the federal government would gain more than $100,000 a year in interest on credit balances in the reinsurance fund. And if the entire weather and crop experience of Manitoba over the past 35 years were to be reversed in the next 35 years, the federal government would have a revenue of $350,000 a year from these credit balances. I think this example should show how hard it is to estimate the probable cost of this program in its early stages, but let me repeat that over the long haul we expect it to be self supporting.

Aside from requests for reinsurance, there has been very little provincial criticism of the present act. The question of the level of coverage provided by the Crop Insurance Act is not before us today because these amendments have no reference to that aspect of the program. However, there have been some suggestions that the 60 per cent coverage provided by the act is not high enough for certain crops. In this connection I should explain that the policy governing the amount of coverage provided is that we want to guarantee production costs only, and no attempt is to be made to cover the profit portion of crop returns by crop insurance.

We are quite prepared to consider any concrete proposals from the provinces for higher coverage of certain crops, provided of course that such proposals are in line with this policy. I should point out that the federal government has no authority to initiate any crop insurance program in any province. The right to help our farmers in this way is the privilege of the provinces. But we are confident that with these amendments the federal reinsurance program will be in a position to fit into any crop insurance program any province cares to develop for its farmers.

If experience should prove this assumption wrong, or if a need to raise the level of coverage should develop in the future, I will be prepared to recommend to this house whatever further amendments are necessary.

During the resolution stage of this debate certain hon. members argued that these amendments are a threat to the P.F.A.A. They saw this threat in the provision that grain growers, whose lands are insured under this program, may be entitled to a rebate of their P.F.A.A. deductions. I reject these arguments as completely unfounded. In the first place, if they were true of these amendments then they would also be true of the original act passed in 1959 with the support of all members of this house.

The provision exempting farmers who insure their crops from the P.F.A.A. levy was included in the original Crop Insurance Act, and the provisions in these amendments are only intended to give that exemption a more rational application. Section 9 of the Crop Insurance Act, passed in 1959, provides that the cultivated land of a farmer is not eligible for P.F.A.A. payments if the crops on any part of his land are insured. It also provides that the initial payment made when he delivers his grain to the elevator should be exempt from the 1 per cent P.F.A.A. levy. However, apparently because the previous government was unable to solve the administrative problems involved, the original legislation did not exempt any interim payments or the final payment from the Canadian wheat board from the P.F.A.A. levy. We believe we have now worked out those problems of administration, and that is why we now propose to extend the exemptions as we believe they should have been extended in the first place.

Farmers who insured their crops in Manitoba and Saskatchewan have been provided at the beginning of each crop year with cards issued by the crop insurance agencies. When presented to elevator agents, at the time of delivery of their grain, these cards exempted them from payment of the P.F.A.A. levy on the initial payment received at the elevator. These exemption cards were good only for the current crop year, and if a farmer dropped out of a crop insurance in any subsequent year he again became eligible for P.F.A.A. benefits and subject to the levy.

When the Crop Insurance Act was before the house in 1959 the then minister of agriculture, the hon. member for Calgary North, is reported at page 5231 of Hansard of June 29, 1959 as having said:

> The hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River also asked why the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be ruled out. If a man has his crop insured under this scheme he will be getting a considerable return if he loses his crop and therefore he does not need P.F.A.A. payments. Hon. members must bear in mind that P.F.A.A payments are a form of drought relief. This has been extended to loss of crops from other causes but it is not an insurance scheme. It is essentially a relief scheme.

He went on:

> If a farmer receives payment under the crop insurance scheme to which the dominion government has made a very considerable contribution there seems to be no good reason why he should also receive a form of relief under P.F.A.A. to which the federal government also makes a substantial contribution.

That is what the minister said in 1959 when piloting the act through the house, and certainly there was no indication then that he was trying to do away with P.F.A.A.

However, Mr. Speaker, the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan have contended that we should exempt insured farmers from payment of the levy on interim and final payments as well as on the initial payments. They told us they found it difficult to sell insurance to some farmers because insured farmers still pay the levy on part of their returns from grain but could not benefit from P.F.A.A. in the event of crop loss. Under section 4 of this bill we are meeting the request of the provinces by providing that insured farmers will receive a rebate of any levy paid from time to time by way of deductions from interim and final payments.

In all fairness to the previous government, I think the minister had in mind exempting all the insured farmers' grain payments from the levy. In fact at one stage of the debate on the original bill he said:

> At the same time, the farmer who comes in under the crop insurance scheme will not be required to pay the 1 per cent levy for Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments. In other words, he will neither pay into the prairie farm assistance fund nor will he be eligible to take money out.

However, I understand some difficulties were experienced because the P.F.A.A. levy on interim and final payments made by the wheat board is deducted from the net total amount of the pool before arriving at the price per bushel to be paid to farmers, and is not calculated individually for each farmer as is the case when the initial payment is made at the elevator. For this reason wheat board officials indicated it would be difficult to make adjustments for insured farmers when they were attempting to issue thousands of cheques with the least possible delay. As a result the original act when presented to the house only provided for exemption from the levy on initial payments.

We propose now to rebate to insured farmers at the end of each crop year the total amount of any levy which it is calculated was paid by each insured farmer on amounts received from time to time through the crop year from the wheat board. We propose that the wheat board, with the farmers' consent, will advise us at the end of each crop year of the total amount paid to each insured farmer. We will then calculate the amount of levy paid and refund this to the farmers concerned. The Prairie Farm Assistance Act at present only permits payment of awards to farmers to be made from the prairie farm emergency fund. This amendment will permit the rebates to insured farmers also to be made from the fund.

I want to make it quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that any province establishing an area in which crop insurance is to be sold does not mean that all farmers in the area are denied P.F.A.A. Only insured farmers will be out of P.F.A.A. The others will still continue to pay the levy and be eligible for P.F.A.A. benefits as they have been in the past.

I would further point out that crop insurance will in no way affect the method of determining the eligibility of an area for P.F.A.A. payments. Even in an area where some farmers are insured, if P.F.A.A. payments are to be made to other farmers in that area the crop yields of the insured farmers will continue to be included in the calculation on which the P.F.A.A. payments are made. Yields from all farms, those insured as well as those not insured, will determine the average yield for the area just as is done at present under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act.

We believe this program will give our farmers a choice they have every right to enjoy. The farmers themselves can decide under which program they want to operate, the P.F.A.A. or crop insurance.

Mr. W. H. Jorgenson (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, having looked at the amendment to the Crop Insurance Act proposed by the minister I should like to say it meets the minimum requirement asked for by the province of Manitoba in particular, to afford some degree of protection against the possibility of substantial crop losses in any one given year. The success of the measure, of course, will depend largely on the type of agreement that will be entered into between the federal government and the provincial government in question. Since the actual amounts involved are not contained in the provisions of the bill, other than in broad outline, we will have to wait and see what type of agreement will be arrived at before we can determine the full effect of the proposed amendment.

However, this is not to say that we are not in favour of the amendment now before us. As I said at the resolution stage preceding the bill, I am looking forward to its implementation; because in my own province of Manitoba, where crop insurance has been in effect for several years, we have gained sufficient experience in the implementation of the crop insurance program to convince us that the program will and can be successful in insuring farmers against crop losses in any given year.

I am happy to see that Hon. George Hutton, who is largely responsible for the introduction of this measure in the province of Manitoba, is sitting in the gallery this afternoon, and I am sure he must be very happy that this bill is before the house. In the test areas that have been set up the province of Manitoba has been successful in covering about 35 per cent of the crops, and with the passage of this amendment the province will now be able to proceed further and within a period of two or three years should have the entire province covered, resulting in a total liability of something like $40 million. This is a considerable amount of money that is involved, and hon. members will appreciate the need for some assurance that in the event of a total crop loss the burden of responsibility will not fall entirely on the shoulders of the provincial government.

However, in saying that I feel quite certain we can take an attitude of optimism in predicting crop yields on the prairies in particular in the next number of years. As I said at the resolution stage, I feel that using P.F.A.A. records of crop yields in the past 35 years does not provide a useful guide. It is a very pessimistic approach to the crop yields that we can anticipate in the future because of the many advances that have been made in crop production techniques through the use of herbicides, pesticides, fertilizers and so on. It seems to me that in considering the application of this particular amendment we can take into consideration these factors which have affected crop yields.

I am glad to see that the minister is prepared to continue to look at the crop insurance program with a view to introducing further amendments if they are necessary in the light of experience gained. In the province of Manitoba a considerable amount of experience has been gained in the implementation of crop insurance. The Manitoba government has proceeded apace with the training of inspectors, field staff and administrative officers. I think one can appreciate the difficulty that is involved and the amount of time that is consumed in attempting to develop the type of organization that can effectively administer and carry out a crop insurance program. For example, I would mention the calculation of loss and the payment of indemnities. The suggested program did meet the requirements of the majority of the farmers within a province in the past.

During the debate on the resolution I was distressed to hear some of the comments made by members of the Social Credit party and the New Democratic party intimating that the crop insurance program has not proven successful. I want to assure them that in the province of Manitoba the program has proven successful. When you take into consideration the administrative responsibilities, the task that is involved in training people to carry out a program, I think it is a credit to the province that they have been able to develop a program to the stage it is today.

There was some suggestion that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be amended so it could cover farmers on an individual basis. I hesitate to suggest that this could possibly have been done because, as the minister has pointed out, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act was based on the principle of relief. It is difficult if not impossible to change a program that has as its basis the concept of relief, into one that is an actuarially sound group insurance program such as this is. This legislation is available also—and I should like to point this out to the members of the Social Credit party who have been complaining about this particular piece of legislation being applicable only to the western provinces—to any province within Canada that is willing to take advantage of it. I see no reason in the world why the farmers in those province which are not now covered by crop insurance cannot make representations to their governments to have this measure made applicable to their provinces so they may receive the benefits therefrom.

There was some suggestion also that the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should not be discontinued. I am sure most farmers will realize that under this measure it is not being discontinued. As a matter of fact they have the best of two worlds. They are able to insure themselves under the crop insurance program and, at the same time, if they do not choose to become involved in the crop insurance scheme they are able to take advantage of what little assistance is available to them under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act. It is interesting to note that in some of the better crop areas in Manitoba the amount of money paid into the Prairie Farm Assistance Act by some farmers would cover a crop insurance program, and the benefits to be derived thereunder would be much greater. Instead of the $800 that is available under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act there would be a greatly increased amount available under the crop insurance program.

As the minister indicated, the intention under this legislation is to provide for reinsurance so the provinces will not bear the brunt of responsibility for this program in the event of a severe crop loss. This responsibility will be shared by the federal government. On this basis we support the legislation and look for its early passage.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): I was not really sure what the attitude of the New Democratic party was, and perhaps this is true of members of the Social Credit party, until the hon. member for Provencher told us. This may or may not be the attitude of the New Democratic party, but I would advise the minister to be very careful of his assessment of the information supplied him by the establishment, because he will never have a better spokesman for the establishment than the hon. member who has just spoken. Perhaps this is something the minister should keep in mind.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is not going to apply to a great section of agriculture. It is discriminatory, like some other legislation, in that it will apply mainly to the large producers of a specific product. I believe the former government knew this, and I think the present government knows that this is a restriction in connection with this legislation. It will be applicable to a very small segment of agriculture. I should like to ask the minister, when he replies, to tell me the number of farmers to whom this crop insurance program applies now, and how much money will be represented by this provision relating to 75 per cent reinsurance.

I had an opportunity of meeting with a number of farmers and the minister of agriculture for Ontario in my own area last fall when we discussed the problem of crop insurance in northern Ontario. After the pros and cons had been discussed, it was interesting to note that it was felt impossible to apply crop insurance to the area because the farmers grew four or five different crops. If you are unsuccessful with your hay crop you will likely get a bumper grain crop. If you insure the potato crop the potatoes will probably turn out very well but you will lose some of your other root crops. It is very difficult, under those conditions to apply this type of legislation; and these conditions exist in most agricultural areas in Ontario.

Surely the minister was aware of this problem. He must have known that less than 10,000 farmers in Canada are insured under the federal crop insurance program, and that this crop insurance program was a failure. He must have known that there were many complaints by the provinces that changes should be made in the enabling legislation which has to be passed by the federal government. It is true that jurisdiction in connection with most of our resources, including agriculture, falls within the provincial field. The fact that only the prairie provinces and Prince Edward Island were able to take advantage of it means, of course, that Quebec and Ontario, which have a large agricultural potential, were not able to insure under this type of act. This measure was not designed to meet the needs of these people.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is not going to do anything to correct that situation. It is not going to provide the machinery by which Quebec and Ontario will be able to take advantage of a federal crop insurance program. The establishment should be able to tell the minister this. They should be able to point out some of the things that are wrong with this measure. I think it is actually unfair that we should be passing legislation which we know is limited in its application to a small segment of the economy we are trying to assist.

I know there have been many who have said the Prairie Farm Assistance Act should be broadened to take care of this problem. Since I do not come from western Canada, I can see no reason why this was not done under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act on an individual farm basis. I am not saying that I have any knowledge of it, but I imagine many western farmers would be able to suggest how this could have been done under P.F.A.A. If it had been, the cost would have been greatly reduced, particularly in the field of administration.

There is nothing wrong, Mr. Speaker, in having a reinsurance program which applies to 75 per cent of the annual amount received from farmers subscribing to the insurance program. The difficulty lies in the fact that there are very few farmers who will be able to take advantage of it. I do not believe that we should have legislation as discriminatory as this on the statute books; and to allow the government a reinsurance program which has not been needed, which does not appear to be needed at present, and will only be needed if there is a disaster—and many hon. members have said this is not likely—is discriminating against all other farmers making this type of payment.

If this is the kind of solution the minister devises to bolster up an act which was not good in the first place, then I suggest he do some more serious thinking and have his officials decide what was wrong with the experiment we tried. The former minister who introduced the act was of the opinion that it was experimental and that changes would be required in it. He said it was something which had not been tried previously and until it had been in operation for some time it would be difficult to decide what amendments were necessary.

Farmers are going to laugh at the Department of Agriculture when it gives this type of assistance. In northern Ontario, when this meeting was held by the provincial government to decide what the farmers wanted, without exception the farmers said this legislation was of absolutely no value to them because the premiums of any commodity would be much higher than they could afford to pay. They said "We don't oppose this type of legislation. We are quite happy to have it provided for other parts of Ontario which might get some advantage from it." They said "We do not want to hold up a crop insurance program, but under the plan outlined by the federal government we will not be able to take advantage of it." I share those sentiments.

All hon. members were of opinion that if the crop insurance scheme which was instituted several years ago had to cope with a crop disaster of such size that the fund would be depleted, the federal government would make a grant of money in order to see the program was not destroyed. I suggest there is a great deal of window dressing in the bill we are discussing today. It is discriminatory. It will apply to very few farmers, and I may say I am shocked at the number of discriminatory plans this government has produced, plans that apply to very few farmers but which seemingly represent the answer of the government to the agricultural problems of the nation from coast to coast.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, from the explanations which have been given to us by the minister respecting this reinsurance scheme it becomes all the more obvious that it is simply a measure to try to encourage provincial governments to expand their crop insurance schemes. During the course of the debate on the resolution stage many hon. members said that there seems to be a gap in the evolving of a crop insurance scheme that would be workable and acceptable to farmers all over Canada. As has been pointed out, only three provinces have experimented with crop insurance schemes, and this on a very limited scale.

I shall not repeat the debate we already had, because one or two further explanations which the minister gave this afternoon have set our minds at ease in some respects. He has said that this legislation, particularly that part of it which deals with the P.F.A.A. levy, will not in any way spur the withdrawal of P.F.A.A. from certain areas where it is now applicable. We understand, of course, that it does not provide for reimbursement of the levy to those farmers who are on insured land, particularly with respect to subsequent payments for grain. We realize the 1 per cent levy has already been exempted from their interim payments, and further than that I do not believe there is much more can be said at this time.

I hope all members of the house realize that until a workable program is evolved, based on the experiences the provinces have had, we will not reach the stage of having a comprehensive crop insurance scheme for farmers all over Canada. We shall need more experience from the expansion of the pilot projects already in effect. Even though only three provinces have made crop insurance available to some of their farmers on a limited scale, all the provinces have had the opportunity to set up pilot projects, with assistance from the federal government. I am not critical of the provinces for being timid or reluctant to go ahead with wide ranging schemes, because the risks, and the amount of money involved to meet those risks, would be beyond their resources in certain disaster years.

This bill will encourage the provinces to expand their schemes to some extent, and I hope with the experience gained in doing so it will not be too long before we have a comprehensive crop insurance scheme that will satisfy farmers all over the country.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to make a few comments on Bill No. C-129, which has just been brought before us.

I see that the purpose of the bill is to authorize the establishment of a crop reinsurance plan whereby those provinces operating a crop insurance plan may, if they so desire, reinsure part of their risks.

I merely want to point out to the house that if that reinsurance applies mostly to those few provinces already taking part in the crop insurance scheme, then I do not think the bill is worth much, if anything, to the province of Quebec, for its minister of agriculture himself did not see fit to take part in the previous crop reinsurance plan, probably because the conditions set by the central government did not suit him. As regards the purpose the central government had in mind, and the same thing applies to several joint programs, it did not consult the provinces sufficiently or did not even consult them at all, since I find that only three of them availed themselves of this crop insurance.

In my opinion, it would have been advisable for this government to present a crop reinsurance plan more consistent with the needs of the whole province—if it is so intent in establishing joint plans—since it was asked to do away with this particular plan among several others. If we had wanted to keep on taking part in joint plans, it would have been necessary to request a report from every province to know at least the opinion of every provincial department of agriculture, in order to have uniformity of implementation, and therefore all the provinces would have probably been interested in these programs.

Looking at the report on joint programs for 1962, I wonder why the province of Quebec has never been interested in the crop insurance program.

I have gone through the list of products insured under this bill and I see that many Quebec products, such as maple sugar and other specific products have been left out. That is probably the reason why Quebec does not seem interested. This scheme has probably been thought out by people from the west who may be fine administrators but who always think of their own interests first.

As I said a moment ago, if the provinces had been consulted, perhaps Quebec would have suggested amendments which would have made the former crop insurance program more interesting for the province.

It is often said that the province of Quebec does not get its fair share. Once again, it can be seen in this bill, because if we figure out the benefits, we come out to zero because it is the same report as in 1962.

I think that at this stage of the discussion of this bill, we should look for some formula which would be acceptable to the province of Quebec while protecting the situation of the other provinces and even improving it. But the needs of agriculture in Quebec should not be overlooked. Our farmers could get assistance when all kinds of disasters hit the province of Quebec. Once their sowing is done, the farmers confide in divine Providence, but they still have to put up with the poor weather conditions without any protection from provincial or federal government bodies.

We are more or less interested in Bill C-129. In its present form it would certainly be of no interest to the department of agriculture of the province of Quebec because it is said in black and white that this bill is of particular benefit to the provinces where the old crop insurance plan is in force.

Honestly, I wonder why the government asks us to discuss such a bill when they know very well that only three provinces received any benefit from this crop insurance scheme. As regards claims made by the province of Quebec when disaster strikes its crops, I think our province would have more regard for the federal government if it had an opportunity to put forward opinions and to propose conditions of participation in those schemes.

I should like to suggest to the present Minister of Agriculture that he should reconsider his bill, with a view to asking each province to submit a report on the possibilities of adopting a national program, if a type of national crop insurance is really to be established to protect the crops of all farmers. In my opinion, the Minister of Agriculture stands to lose nothing by asking the various departments of agriculture to submit a report, so that we, in parliament, may draw up an over-all program, instead of setting up a project which interests only a small number of provinces.

[Text]

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, the discussion on these amendments so far has really not been on them to any extent but on the merits or otherwise of the Crop Insurance Act to which these amendments apply. I think all of us interested in agriculture have been disappointed that greater advantage has not been taken of the Crop Insurance Act than has been the case. We have had complaints from two of the members who have spoken that there are only three provinces which have taken advantage of the act. It was understood at the time, and the minister has again pointed this out this afternoon, that any system of crop insurance must of necessity be run by the province because it comes within provincial jurisdiction. This federal Crop Insurance Act was put on the statute books for the specific purpose of encouraging the provinces, and providing help to any province that wished to do so, to set up a crop insurance act.

[Mr. Gauthier.]

There had been for many years a demand on the part of farmers all over Canada for some type of crop insurance, and none of the provinces had been prepared to meet that need because of the possible large losses involved. Therefore we thought the only way it was possible to get a crop insurance scheme instituted in each of the provinces was to provide some form of federal assistance by which the federal government would provide part of the cost of such a scheme, and would provide the framework of a scheme into which the provinces could fit any individual scheme which would apply in their own province. This was done because it was realized—quite contrary to what the last speaker has just said—that the agricultural conditions in the different provinces of Canada differed very widely indeed, and that a crop insurance scheme which would be satisfactory in Alberta, for example, would not be satisfactory in Quebec, and vice versa.

Therefore the scheme was drawn up very carefully so that it would be possible for each province to draw up a scheme of their own which would fit into the general provisions of the federal crop insurance scheme. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, statements along the line that have been made, that this crop insurance legislation is discriminatory, that it will only apply in certain provinces, that it will only apply to large farmers and not to small farmers, are not in accordance with the fact. The crop insurance scheme can be made to apply, if any particular province wants to do so, to any crop which is grown in that province, and the size of a man's farm is not the determining factor. It was hoped, as a matter of fact, when the scheme was introduced that a good many of the farmers in Quebec and Ontario growing specialty crops of various sorts—potatoes, apples, wheat, and so on—would come in under this scheme or that the provinces would set up schemes which would make it possible for them to participate.

I think there are two reasons in particular why the scheme has not been adopted more widely than it has. One is the fact that any new scheme takes a considerable amount of time to get into operation, for people to become accustomed to and willing to participate in. Particularly is this the case as far as agricultural plans of one kind and another are concerned. The second is that in all the provinces there was a considerable amount of fear that the provincial revenues might be very seriously and adversely affected if a widespread crop insurance scheme were put into operation and a very disastrous crop year occurred in the first two, three, four or five years. The scheme was drawn up in a way which would make it actuarially sound over a long period of years, say 30 years, and I think everyone who has examined it is agreed that the scheme would carry itself. However, the provinces were naturally afraid that if they put it into operation and they had a bad year right off the bat they would incur large losses which would make their whole provincial financing difficult. The reinsurance provisions which are before us at the present time are designed to remove that fear in large measure, and I hope that the passage of this legislation will induce some of the provinces which have not gone into a crop insurance scheme so far to do so, and will encourage others who have to expand their operations considerably.

There is only one point I am wondering about in connection with the reinsurance provisions and that is the amount to which this legislation will increase the premiums which farmers will be required to pay. I have not yet heard anything which has made clear what that will be. There is no doubt that there will be some increased cost to the farmer in order to cover reinsurance on the part of the provincial government with the dominion government; I think the minister said there would be a premium of 2½ per cent. However, I hope as I say that the increased cost involved will be very small, because undoubtedly just as with all insurance one of the reasons people hesitate to insure is frequently the cost involved. A large number of people in farming operations find this is true as far as hail insurance is concerned. Most of the farmers in areas subjected to hail have carried it for many years, but in areas not subjected fairly regularly to hail a large proportion of the farmers do not carry hail insurance, but take the gamble. The higher premium is of course a temptation to do that, and that is one of the ways these amendments might work against themselves if it means the cost will be increased to any appreciable extent.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see these reinsurance amendments provided and I trust they will produce the result it is hoped —a larger crop insurance coverage for farmers across Canada generally.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

On clause 1—Agreements.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, my remarks on clause 1 will be brief and to the point. I think the minister should be congratulated and I hope that he will carry the congratulations of the official opposition to his officials for the drafting of this legislation. It is understandable and it is clear. There is no necessity for us to ask that it go to committee and I think the experience of the officials concerned in this particular instance is well demonstrated in the bill.

The second point I wish to make is that so far as the general principle of crop insurance and these amendments are concerned, I regret very much that the previous administration was not able to complete its plans and bring this legislation before the parliament of 1962-63; but I am glad to say we welcome the legislation. I would add my words to those of the hon. member for Calgary North and the minister in saying that this is good legislation. It is designed to help the farmer who wants to put his farming operations on a business basis. Naturally, in the early years few farmers would want to use it; but as more and more become aware of its advantages more and more farmers will use it.

I think these amendments may make it possible in western Canada and the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan in particular, for something between 50 to 70 per cent of the farmers to embark on this type of operation in the handling of their farming business. I hope the province of Alberta will realize there is some merit in this legislation and give the farmers there the opportunity of saying yes or no to it. It is not the job of the provincial government to decide what is good for the farmer individually. This legislation is aimed at the individual, and if the provincial government give the farmers the opportunity to use it it is up to the farmer as an individual to decide whether or not it is to his advantage to use it.

I hope that other provinces, including British Columbia with its fruits and small vegetables, will consider arranging plans to make this act help the farmers there who wish to take advantage of it; and I hope that the provinces of Ontario and Quebec may look even harder at their specialized and diversified farmers to see whether they too cannot find some protection under this act. In the maritime provinces, the province of Prince Edward Island is now using the legislation, and has shown aggressiveness in using it to help stabilize the incomes of their farmers; I think the farmers in the potato industry recognize this now.

Therefore I would complete my remarks by saying that we have been over the legislation; we think it is well drafted; and outside of a few questions I think we can take the clauses of the bill fairly rapidly. I know they are hard to understand at first reading but after the explanation of the minister they make sense, and I thank the minister for his clear explanation on second reading, which has made it much easier for us in examining the bill at the committee stage.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have just a couple of questions to ask the minister. The first one arises from the remarks made by the hon. member for Roberval in which he criticized the bill in so far as it did not provide for the other provinces. The explanatory notes to the bill read as follows:

> The purpose of this bill is to authorize the establishment of a crop reinsurance plan whereby those provinces operating a crop insurance plan may, if they so desire, reinsure part of their risks under such plan.

My first question, Mr. Chairman, is this: In view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Roberval, would the minister inform the committee whether this bill covers any province which later establishes a crop insurance plan? My second question is: Can he give the committee any information as to the number of farmers who have crop insurance in each province which is now operating a crop insurance plan?

Mr. Hays: Mr. Chairman, Nova Scotia has enabling legislation. Prince Edward Island is using the act; also Manitoba and Saskatchewan; and I believe Alberta has just recently passed enabling legislation. There are some 8,600 farmers in Canada who have taken advantage of this legislation and the total value of crops insured amounted to $18 million. So far as other provinces are concerned, earlier this year a conference was held with representatives of the provinces, including Quebec, to discuss all aspects of crop insurance, and in particular any changes which might be made to improve the federal role in this program. No concrete crop insurance proposals have been received from the province of Quebec. The representatives attending that meeting indicated that the province is studying the development of a program which would meet the particular needs of the farmers in Quebec. We will be pleased, of course, to give immediate consideration to any provincial proposals placed before us. Perhaps that answers the question raised by the hon. member for Roberval.

[Mr. Hamilton.]

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I thank the minister for his answer. Do I understand correctly from that answer, that if you reach agreement with any province in respect of crop insurance plans it will be covered by this act?

Mr. Hays: That is so. We have discussed this with the officials of all the provincial departments of agriculture in Canada, who had rough drafts of what we are now proposing. We invited their interest and suggestions in so far as drafting this legislation was concerned.

I do not think I would be saying something out of school if I indicated that the minister of agriculture for the province of Manitoba is here this afternoon and has sent me a note saying that it was a pleasure to be here during my speech on this bill. He pointed out that crop insurance is the cornerstone of Manitoba agricultural policy, and that he would have to wait until his experts had studied this bill. He felt, however, that we had given to Manitoba exactly what they were asking for.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, I should like to clarify one point before concurring in the complimentary remarks made by the hon. member for Roberval. As I understand the amendment to the act in respect of reinsurance, there will be a premium paid by the province. What will the rate be in this regard, and will it be subject to negotiations with each province?

Mr. Hays: I did not quite understand the first part of the hon. member's question. Would you repeat it please?

Mr. Mandziuk: What will be the premium payable by the provinces in respect of this reinsurance scheme?

Mr. Hays: It will be difficult to determine just exactly what the rate will be. I suppose over the long haul only experience will indicate the proper amount. In the statement I made during the second reading stage I used a figure of 2½ per cent as an example, but I suppose it will be something less than that.

Mr. Mandziuk: Was the figure of 2½ per cent arrived at by negotiation?

Mr. Hays: No, I just used that figure as an example.

Mr. Mandziuk: In other words, the rate could vary upwards or downwards from 2½ per cent?

Mr. Hays: That is right.

Mr. Mandziuk: The success of this arrangement then is dependant upon agreements being reached between the province and the government, is that right?

Mr. Hays: That is correct. I could go back over that part of my statement, if you wish.

Mr. Mandziuk: That will not be necessary, Mr. Chairman. I remember the statement made by the minister. I presume the rate would have to be set at the beginning of each crop year, and that it could not be set during or after harvest at a time when the amount of losses or claims would be known, is that right? Or are you going to follow some other method of setting the rate?

Mr. Hays: It is very difficult to indicate exactly what the cost will be. I am unable to give the hon. member an accurate answer in that regard. I must say that the rate will be set as a result of experience. At this time I do not know exactly what the amount will be, although I used the 2½ per cent figure in my example.

Mr. Hamilton: Mr. Chairman, I think it is customary, during our consideration of a bill clause by clause, for the minister to have his officials in front of him in order that they may give the technical information required to answer the type of question that is being asked. Those officials should be asked to come down.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could put this to the minister. As I understand the situation, there is not going to be a standard agreement, but an agreement with each province which decides to come under the scheme, is that right? The agreements may be basically the same, but they will vary by reason of the conditions which prevail in each province, as a result of the different types of agricultural activity engaged in by the provinces. The agreements will be tailored to fit the requirements of the different provinces, is that correct?

Mr. Hays: That is correct. The agreements will of course have to be determined on an actuarial basis.

Mr. Baldwin: I assume the premiums are subject to change, so the agreements may well be changed year by year on an actuarial basis, computed on the actual experience year by year. There will be trials and errors and the premiums may be changed from one year to the next, am I correct in that assumption?

Mr. Hays: The premiums would have to be established on an actuarial basis, so what you have said does follow.

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, why was the figure of 2½ per cent contained in the bill if there was no intention of actually using that figure?

Mr. Hays: To which clause are you referring?

Mr. Hamilton: The figure is referred to in 4B (1) (c).

The Chairman: Order. I should like to remind hon. members of the fact that we are now considering clause 1. Perhaps the point raised by the hon. member for Provencher might be raised when we are considering clause 2.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays) has had the opportunity, since last February, to get in touch with the provincial authorities regarding the amendment to the Crop Insurance Act, is he now in a position to tell us how many provinces, apart from those which are already subscribing to it, will take part in the federal program a year from now? Has the minister had any indications and can he supply us with information on the matter?

Mr. Chairman, hon. members are aware of the fact that the Crop Insurance Act will have to be proclaimed by the provincial authorities, and that the federal government is providing the provinces with the possibility of setting up their own crop insurance plans under the proposed amendment. But what we would like to know, so that we can tell our farmers, is whether the minister is now in a position to tell us how many provinces are likely to be taking part in the crop insurance program within a year.

[Text]

Mr. Hays: It would be very difficult for me to say at this point, although some indication has been given in respect of three, and two have passed enabling legislation. The hon. member for Calgary North pointed out that fact, and we are quite prepared to consider any suggestion the provinces make in so far as this legislation is concerned. Your question is rather difficult to answer. We hope that more of them will participate.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: So, Mr. Chairman, we may say that before long at least five Canadian provinces will participate in that crop insurance program.

Have the other provinces, however, Quebec included—and I am told that Quebec does not intend to participate immediately, even if the proposed amendment is carried—asked for other amendments or requested from the Minister of Agriculture or from the federal government additional assistance so as to be able to participate in that program, or have they preferred to maintain the status quo and do nothing in that connection?

[Text]

Mr. Hays: So far as Quebec is concerned, their representative at the meeting indicated that the province is studying the development of a program. I dealt with the second question in speaking on second reading. The only question that was raised was the 60 per cent level of assistance, which I dealt with at some length in the remarks I made on second reading.

[Translation]

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Chairman, can the minister tell us if the province of Quebec, which is now considering the possibility of establishing its own crop insurance program, intends to participate in the federal-provincial program or if it prefers to receive a fiscal compensation and establish its own scheme?

[Text]

Mr. Hays: I could not answer that.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 2—Crop reinsurance fund.

Mr. Jorgenson: Mr. Chairman, would the minister now be prepared to answer the question I posed to him on clause 1 with respect to the reason why the 2½ per cent figure was inserted in the bill, if it is not actually to be followed?

Mr. Hays: The 2½ per cent figure to which the hon. member refers is the liability to the province, but it has nothing to do with the premium cost.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the question of this scheme being founded on sound actuarial tables. In view of the great diversity of conditions that exist across Canada from one province to another, and even within short distances within provinces, and the great diversification of crops with circumstances varying from one crop to another, is there any research work being done by the department in order, as the result of the research and the experience gained, to establish finally a crop insurance scheme on what are considered sound actuarial tables?

Mr. Hays: I think I can definitely say yes to that. The economics division is studying the matter and we are working with the provinces. We hope to be able to improve the program from time to time and we are anxiously awaiting their findings in so far as this matter is concerned.

Mr. Mandziuk: Mr. Chairman, now that the minister has his officials before him I feel I should come back to my original question. Is it not good business practice to set the rate that we in Ottawa are going to charge each province for reinsurance? Each province, and I am thinking particularly of Manitoba, sets its rate annually in advance. The farm test areas in the scheme are given that figure. Of course it is on a voluntary basis. Does it not seem reasonable to the minister that the province likewise should know it has to pay a certain percentage of the total premiums or total coverage? I agree with the hon. member for Provencher who said it might vary from year to year, but I think that good business practice would require that it be established in the spring. We would naturally like to have that information because the provincial governments would like to have it in order to see how much protection they are going to get under the reinsurance scheme. Has the minister any comment?

Mr. Hays: My officials tell me that it will be worked out on an actuarially sound basis, and that it will be worked out with the officials of the provinces. They will determine how much insurance is going to be sold and on this basis the premium will be indicated before the particular crop year begins.

Mr. Mandziuk: The rate we are going to charge the provinces will be set in advance?

Mr. Hays: Yes.

Mr. Mandziuk: Will this rate be based on the volume of insurance coverage for which the province subscribes, or will it be set on the basis of the premiums that the province collects? The volume of insurance might be $4 or $5 million and the premiums collected would be considerably smaller. I should like to know on which basis the rate will be set.

Mr. Hays: It would be based on the same principle on which their rates are based.

Mr. Mandziuk: On the volume.

Mr. Hays: However they do it.

Mr. Mandziuk: It is on the volume.

Mr. Hays: Then this is the way they would do it.

Mr. Olson: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me it is reasonably satisfactory for the minister to say they are going to set the rates on a basis that will be actuarially sound, but to do this of course they will first of all have to have some experience to find out what the rate will be. In the initial stages there must be a rate that they anticipate charging the provinces. Perhaps the minister could clear up this matter by giving us some indication of what they intend to charge when the scheme gets under way.

Mr. Hays: I should like very much to be able to give the figure but the figure has not yet been arrived at.

Mr. Baldwin: I should like to pose a question to the minister based on figures which might be taken out of the new section 4B. Let us take the case of any one province where the total liability for which the province may be responsible to all farmers or all groups of farmers under the scheme in force in that province might be $10 million. I think the minister took that figure by way of example. Consequently, under subsection 1(c) of section 4B the amount to be deducted would be $250,000. To proceed, if the actual losses sustained in that province for that year were of the order of $1 million you would then take the $250,000 under paragraph (c) and add to it the premiums received by the province from the farmers, which for purposes of this illustration we can take as being $100,000. Then you add to that the reserve for the payment of indemnities. I am going to ask the minister when he replies to indicate if he has had any discussion in this regard with the provinces and to suggest what the contemplated reserve figure is, but let us assume for purposes of my illustration that it is $50,000. You will take the $250,000, the $100,000 and the $50,000, which makes a total of $400,000, and deduct this sum from the loss of $1 million, which leaves a net of $600,000. Under the scheme of insurance in effect the federal government would then repay to the province 75 per cent of $600,000. Is that hypothetical case correct?

Mr. Hays: That is correct.

Mr. Baldwin: So in effect I suppose the 2½ per cent is a rough figure arrived at as a sort of premium between the province and the federal government. It acts as a premium to that extent between the two governments.

Mr. Hays: I do not know just how to explain it, but it would be comparable to the deductible provision in an automobile policy.

The Chairman: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. Forbes: Before you proceed I should like to ask a supplementary question on the same subject. Let us assume that the farmer is paying $1.25 per acre for crop insurance to the province of Manitoba, on which the federal government contributes 20 per cent and half the administration charges. What percentage of that premium is the federal government going to charge for reinsurance? That is the question.

Mr. Hays: We do not know the answer. I am not sure I understand your question.

Mr. Forbes: I am using the actual figures that have been submitted from my own area in Manitoba. If the cost of crop insurance were $1.25 per acre, and you already contribute 20 per cent of that as well as paying half of the administrative costs, what the farmer wants to know is, that he is paying the province $1.25 per acre and what percentage of that is the federal government getting for reinsurance? I think this is important, if we are going to sell crop insurance to the farmers across the country. They want to know what it will cost provincially and federally.

Mr. Hays: Our officials say their best estimate would be probably 25 per cent.

Mr. Forbes: I would say that I feel your officials should be able to estimate the cost because crop insurance has been in effect in Manitoba for four years. It covers 35 per cent of the farmers. Based on that experience, you should be able to tell what it is going to cost and be able to spell it out in the agreement with the provinces, so people will know where they are.

Mr. Hays: It will be.

Mr. Hamilton: Did I understand the minister correctly that the officials estimate the cost of reinsurance will be 25 per cent to the individual farmer? This is the inference I took out of the answer.

Mr. Hays: Not more, no; there will be no increase in cost at all.

Mr. Mandziuk: Does that mean there is no increase in the premiums paid by the farmers?

Mr. Hays: That is right.

Mr. Mandziuk: This reinsurance is a protection of the funds of the province. It is intended that the rates the farmers will pay will be the same. It is the same as the hail insurance companies because they always reinsure their risks for their own protection but that does not affect the original cost of the insurance. Is that correct, sir?

Mr. Hays: That is correct.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 3.

Mr. Hamilton: In view of the answer we just received I want to get a clarification because I feel there may be some misunderstanding, particularly in view of the question asked by the hon. member for Dauphin. The hon. member for Dauphin asked what the farmer would have to pay by way of increase and the answer was 25 per cent. We all know this would really slap down the whole concept of crop insurance.

Mr. Mandziuk: It would kill it.

Mr. Hamilton: The hon. member for Marquette says that it would kill it. I am simply pointing out that the second answer given by the minister was there would be no increased cost to the farmer because the province of Manitoba plans to pay it. Is that correct?

Mr. Hays: Out of the premium fund, with no change in the premium rates.

Mr. Hamilton: This puts us into the soup again. Either the province is going to pay it direct and not charge it to the fund, or the province is going to charge this reinsurance payment to the fund. I am speaking now to clause 3. If you look at clause 3, paragraph (C), you will find that you can now use these premium rates for reinsurance of the liability. The province is permitted to take the cost of this reinsurance out of the fund. I am concerned about not letting any unfortunate impression go from this committee. The minister says the individual farmer will pay no more. This means, then, that the province has plans to pay this premium because it is the provincial credit you are trying to protect. If the province takes advantage of this paragraph (C), then it will cost the farmer more, but certainly not 25 per cent. This is the point I was trying to get cleared up.

Mr. Forbes: My understanding is that out of the premiums the farmers pay to the province, the province would in turn contribute 25 per cent of the premium to the federal government for reinsurance.

Mr. Hays: That is correct.

MERCHANT SEAMEN COMPENSATION ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING COMPENSATION ON INJURY OR DEATH

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act

(a) to reduce the length of time a seaman must be disabled before compensation is payable to him;

(b) to increase the maximum amount payable as burial expenses for a seaman who dies from an injury;

(c) to provide that the compensation payable for or to dependant children of a seaman who dies from an injury may, with the approval of the merchant seamen compensation board, be paid to each such child under the age of 21 years who is attending school;

(d) to increase the minimum rate of compensation required to be paid to an injured seaman for temporary or permanent total disability; and

(e) to provide for the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of additional compensation to the widows and dependant children of seamen who died prior to 1st June, 1957 from injuries; and to make certain other amendments for the better administration of the act.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act was first passed by parliament in 1946. Its purpose was to provide compensation to seamen who were not entitled to coverage under provincial workmen's compensation acts or under the federal Government Employees Compensation Act. This act has been amended on two occasions since that time, in 1952 and 1957. The purpose of these former amendments was to bring the level of benefits under the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act in line with the level of benefits available under the workmen's compensation acts, particularly in the maritime provinces. At the present time it is found desirable also to amend the act for the purpose of bringing the present benefits in line with those contained in the benefit provisions of legislation in the maritime provinces. This is the first purpose of these amendments.

The second is to apply retroactively the present provisions of the act to widows of deceased seamen and their dependants and, in a number of cases, to orphans who were in receipt of benefits established under the amendments made prior to 1957. What we are seeking to do, as will be noted in the resolution, under this particular aspect is to provide for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of additional compensation to widows and dependant children of seamen who died from injuries prior to June 1, 1957.

It might illustrate that particular aspect of this resolution to indicate that there are 16 widows at present in receipt of pensions of $45 to $50 a month, established under old awards, when at the same time the provisions of the present act provide for pensions of $75 a month. Our purpose is to bring these old awards in line with the present provisions. This will affect 16 widows, principally located in the Atlantic provinces.

There are also involved 20 dependants of these particular widows, currently in receipt of $15 a month. On behalf of each of these dependants the retroactive provision would bring this to $25 a month. There are 20 dependants and there are also five orphans, and the purpose is to apply a similar provision to them.

We intend to pay for these retroactive payments out of the consolidated revenue fund because there is no special fund available under the administration of the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act, and we do this in accord with the practice of the provinces which, when retroactive payments are sought, pay them out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Possibly I should provide a little more detail with respect to raising the level of benefits to the comparable levels prevailing in the provinces. In order that certain benefits payable under the act may compare more favourably with current rates and trends in workmen's compensation provisions, we propose that the following changes be made:

(a) That the allowance of $25 per month for a child be extended to age 21 from age 18, if attending school.

(b) That the allowance of $35 per month for an orphan child be extended to age 21 from age 18, if attending school. These two provisions are to bring our benefits in line with those prevailing in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island.

(c) That the allowance for funeral expenses be increased from $200 to $300.

(d) That the maximum amount of earnings to be used for the purposes of computing compensation be raised from $4,500 to $5,000 per year so that the amount of compensation for total temporary disability or for total permanent disability be increased from $15 to $25 per week, except where earnings have been less than this amount.

(e) That the waiting period be reduced from four days to three days for the purpose of paying compensation to disabled seamen.

In essence, Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is twofold; to raise the level of benefits under the present act and bring them in line with the trends and standards in the Atlantic provinces, which was a stated principle when the act was first introduced, second, to apply the present provisions to old awards to widows and dependants in receipt of benefits less than the present awards, and finally, to pay these retroactive payments out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Was any consideration given to bringing the levels of these payments up to the levels paid in the other maritime province of Canada, the province of British Columbia? I notice the minister has confined it entirely to the Atlantic provinces. Is there some discrepancy between what is paid in B.C. and what is paid in the other maritime provinces?

Mr. Baldwin: Maybe the province of British Columbia is going to extend to the Atlantic very shortly.

Mr. MacEachen: The number of claims arising on behalf of seamen from B.C. is very small under this particular act, and that is so because the compensation act in B.C. applies to seamen from that province. Because of the very limited number of claims the practice has been to relate the benefits to the benefits applicable in the provinces from which the bulk of the claims arises.

Mr. Hales: Mr. Chairman, we in the official opposition appreciate the minister's concise and informative explanation on resolution stage of these amendments to the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act. As he has stated, this is simply a matter of bringing the act into line with the present conditions, and of raising the benefits paid to seamen, particularly in the maritime provinces of the dominion.

In keeping with our policy in the official opposition of not holding up the proceedings of the house on resolution stage we are quite prepared to move on at this particular juncture.

Mr. Peters: I would like to join with the hon. member for Wellington South in congratulating the minister for introducing these amendments, but I believe it would have been to the advantage of seamen if the west coast had been taken into consideration when the rates were being calculated. However, I am sure this would cause the other maritime provinces to put some strain on the minister, if there were equalizing of the two areas.

This is the type of legislation which the province of Ontario has needed for many years, but which it has not seen fit to introduce, in order to bring compensation rates up to date for dependants of deceased employees. In certain cases the rate of benefit was originally calculated when wages were not high and this has resulted in discrepancies between the payments made to two benefactors suffering the same type of accident, solely because of the time factor. From my own experience I know of a person in Ontario receiving total disability pension of only $80 a month, while a fellow workman engaged in the same type of employment, and suffering an accident at a later date, receives $240 to $250 a month for exactly the same injury.

The fact that the minister has introduced this legislation is a good thing because we believe it will extend the principle of equalizing the amounts paid to those who are injured in similar circumstances. It is also good to note that this measure increases funeral benefits and raises children's allowances, the latter because children stay at school longer nowadays.

The minister is to be congratulated on introducing these amendments because this gives labour across the country an opportunity of saying to provincial governments that the federal government, which has some jurisdiction in this field, has produced more progressive legislation than they have. I would like to ask him whether this will result in the re-evaluation of pensions previously granted to disabled seamen?

There must be a calculable amount of money to provide a minimum standard for a seaman with 100 per cent disability, and this will change as we increase the amount we allow as permissible income. Will this result in a re-evaluation of previous pensions, and will this also be paid from the general treasury? I believe it should, and I would like to know if the idea is being carried to the extent of re-evaluation of pensions in terms of present day costs of living.

Mr. MacEachen: One principal effect of these amendments is to adjust upwards the pensions received by widows, their dependants and orphans, in a number of cases—five cases, to be exact. No provision had been made in the previous amendment to scale upwards, in accord with an improved level of benefits, the awards granted previously. So really the upward revaluation in this case with respect to these categories is to bring them in line with other provisions.

Second, of course, we have not changed the actual rates of current benefits under the present act, but are proposing to make various improvements; for example, an increase of $100 in the payment to be made for funeral expenses on behalf of a deceased seaman.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, could I ask the minister whether it is his intention to revalue awards; because I think he will agree that when you see fit to revalue the amount paid to a widow or to the children, and lengthen the period of time a child may attend school with compensation, you have really taken a forward look in the whole pension structure and have brought up to date certain sections of it.

Does the minister contemplate revaluing, in the near future, past claims? I do not know how many people this applies to in terms of seamen, because I am not familiar with the number that would be involved; but I am thinking of the case where a man, for example, may have lost a leg when he was earning $100 a month, and receives perhaps a $25 pension. If he were working now and his wages amounted to $200, the pension benefit would today be $50, obviously. I think if we are bringing up to date some of these benefits, the minister should be prepared to say that he hopes to consider, if not now, then later, the revaluation of the whole pension structure; because I believe the need is very great for those living on pension today. This has been done in the case of the Minister of Veterans Affairs; there has been an adjustment in this regard. I wonder whether the minister is contemplating doing this in the very near future as far as the workmen's compensation act is concerned.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the basic principle underlying this act is that the benefits should in general conform to those prevailing in the workmen's compensation laws in the maritime provinces, because we are really picking up the individuals who are not normally covered by the provincial compensation acts. I stated to the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands that there had been a limited number of claims. I find that the correct expression would be that there have been virtually no claims from British Columbia. Whether these statements are synonymous or not, I do not know; but certainly we have not been obliged to take into account the level of benefits prevailing in British Columbia because there have been virtually no claims from that province. I am advised that there are no disabled seamen now in receipt of pensions, and for this reason no adjustment would be necessary in this regard.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I rise at this time only to express support for the resolution that is now before the committee. I believe it is gratifying to have a measure come along every once in a while with regard to which it appears there will be unanimity of opinion and support. I am sure it is because of the nature of this particular resolution that it is gaining that support today. The minister referred to the fact that it is just a limited number who will be affected by this particular legislation, but I am sure we all realize that although there may be just a limited number, yet it is of vital importance to that limited number that they receive benefits sufficient to enable them to live in decency and in a measure of comfort. I believe it is a good thing to relate all these pensions to the cost of living index, because naturally when there is an increase in the cost of living the amount a person may be receiving is decreased in value in relation to its purchasing power. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I rise only to support this resolution that is now before us.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to congratulate the minister on behalf of our group for having increased or readjusted the amount of the pension as proposed, which is the object of the resolution now under consideration.

He pointed out to us that he used provincial standards as a basis, but there is one item about which I wonder if he really considered the standards of each province, and that is the one about funeral expenses.

The minister feels that the increase of $100 is monstrous, but I think that it is very little, unless the provinces concerned have extremely low standards with regard to funeral expenses, for we in Quebec have a $500 standard to defray the actual burial expenses.

Considering the cost of burial and the expenses incurred following the death of a seaman, it is obvious that the sum of $300 is not enough.

I am not familiar with costs in the other provinces, but if the minister reconsidered the question, he would understand that an amount of $500 would be quite reasonable in Quebec.

As far as that clause is concerned, I do not see why a veteran would not benefit from the same advantages. As for the other provisions, I suppose the minister felt the amount in question is proportionate to the cost of living in the other provinces.

I do not intend to speak too long about this resolution. I merely wished to draw the attention of the house to the cost of burial, because I know something about that.

On the whole, we are quite satisfied with the proposed adjustment and I am sure that those concerned will appreciate the change.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. MacEachen thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. C-131, to amend the Merchant Seamen Compensation Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ADOPTION OF INTERNATIONAL CONVENTION RESPECTING DISCRIMINATION

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour) moved:

That it is expedient that the houses of parliament do approve of convention No. 111 concerning discrimination in respect of employment and occupation, which was adopted by the international labour conference on the 25th of June 1958, and that this house do approve the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am happy to be able to recommend to the house that it approve this important international labour convention. Following its approval by parliament we propose to proceed to ratify the convention immediately thereafter.

This convention was adopted by the international labour conference in 1958 and since then it has been ratified by 45 member countries. The convention seeks to promote efforts throughout the world to remove discrimination in employment and occupation based on grounds of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction or social origin, and to promote equality of opportunity. When a member country ratifies this convention it assumes an obligation to declare and pursue a national policy designed to promote, by methods appropriate to national conditions and practice, equality of opportunity and treatment in respect to employment and occupation with a view to eliminating any discrimination in respect thereof. In ratifying the convention a member country must also report to the I.L.O. regularly on the manner in which the policy is being observed.

The subject matter of this convention is partly within federal and partly within provincial jurisdiction. The obligation imposed by this convention, however, unlike some other I.L.O. conventions, rests essentially on the federal government. An I.L.O. committee of experts which has reviewed this convention states that it is possible for the federal authorities in federal states to give effect to this convention by, and I quote, "declaring a national policy and by pursuing it through methods appropriate to existing constitutional practice; for example, by taking direct legislative or other action in areas which are within the competence of the federal authorities, and by exercising their influence in other areas through educational measures, co-operation between employers and workers organizations, and other appropriate agencies as envisaged by the convention."

Clearly an anti-discrimination policy has been and is being pursued in Canada at the national level. It is implemented through a number of federal statutes. The Canada Fair Employment Practices Act has the expressed purpose of preventing discrimination in employment in the industries under federal jurisdiction, and the fair wages order in council sets forth a similar policy as regards work on federal government contracts. The Female Employees Equal Pay Act applicable to industries under federal jurisdiction prohibits differences in rates of pay based solely on the sex of the employee. The principle of non-discrimination in the placement operations of the national employment service is set out in the Unemployment Insurance Act. The federal-provincial agreements under both the Technical and Vocational Training Assistance Act and the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act contain clauses providing that assistance will be available without discrimination because of the racial origin or religious views of the person seeking such service. The Civil Service Act specifically expresses a non-discrimination policy in public employment in that the provisions authorizing the civil service commission to prescribe qualifications states that in so doing it shall not discriminate against any person by reason of race, national origin, colour or religion. The Department of Labour undertakes educational measures aimed against discrimination in employment with the advice and co-operation of employers, workers and other organizations.

So much for the position at the federal level. To ascertain the position within the provinces the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) wrote to each provincial premier to ask for confirmation that the province is pursuing by methods considered appropriate within the province a policy of promotion of equality of opportunity and treatment in respect to employment and occupation within the spirit of the convention. Hon. members will be pleased to learn that the response to the Prime Minister's communication to the provincial premiers was positive. We have received confirmation from all the provinces that they are pursuing policies to promote equality of opportunity and treatment in respect of employment and occupation.

Having received this assurance hon. members will, I am sure, agree that the time is now ripe for Canada to support this international effort to remove all forms of discrimination in the field of employment. Ratification of this convention has been recommended by a number of voluntary organizations interested in human rights. In particular the Canadian Labour Congress has made a substantial contribution toward the objectives of this convention and I want to express appreciation for this.

I am pleased to be able to remind the house, Mr. Speaker, that Canadian employer, worker and government representatives all played a significant part in framing the text of the discrimination convention at the 1958 I.L.O. conference. The text was developed by a conference committee, the chairman of which was Mr. Arthur H. Brown, then deputy minister of labour for Canada. The committee was tripartite, and the leader of the workers' group and vice chairman of the committee was Mr. Kalmen Kaplansky, director of international affairs for the Canadian Labour Congress. Mr. Kaplansky was thus the principal spokesman for labour in the I.L.O. member countries on this subject. In the previous year, 1957, when the conference committee gave first discussion to the proposed convention, Mr. Kaplansky was also vice chairman of the committee for the workers' group, and the employers' vice chairman was Mr. Allan Campbell, vice president in charge of industrial relations of Canadian Westinghouse, the Canadian employer delegate at the 1957 conference. Thus Canadian representatives were spokesmen for the workers and employers of the world in framing the convention against discrimination in employment and occupation. Canadians having been so active in the drafting of this international instrument, I am glad the time has come for us to take the steps leading to its ratification.

At last year's I.L.O. conference, Mr. Speaker, I am informed that one of the reports described the progress being made within I.L.O. member countries, in accordance with the provisions of the convention, to eliminate the evil of discrimination in employment. The conference approached the subject in an atmosphere of some considerable tension, since the newly-independent African states had chosen this particular session as the occasion to demonstrate vigorously their disapproval of the racial policy practised by the South African government. The report contained a significant and sobering statement to the effect that no member country is entirely free of the evil of discrimination in employment.

The struggle against discrimination, then, must be a continuing one. The legislation which has been enacted in Canada must be seen as part of this continuing struggle, and not as evidence that the struggle has been finally won. As part of this continuing struggle the government of Canada, using every media at its disposal, has conducted a continually expanding program of educational publicity, to assist in removing the attitudes of mind that give rise to acts of discrimination.

Ratification of this convention does not constitute a declaration that we in Canada are entirely free of the evil of discrimination in employment, but it is an affirmation that the policy of Canada, at the federal level and and at the provincial level, is directed against discrimination in employment. Ratification of the convention will act as a spur to greater efforts to eliminate any discrimination which exists within Canada, and it will demonstrate our support of the international campaign to achieve this same objective in other parts of the world.

I hope, and I am confident, Mr. Speaker, that this resolution will have the unanimous support of the house.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed that the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) and the government have been successful in obtaining the approval of the provinces to ratify this convention passed by the I.L.O. in June of 1958, and that they have voiced their opinions against discrimination in employment and occupation which may occur from time to time in the federal field of jurisdiction.

I too wish to join the Minister of Labour in commending the human rights committee of the Canadian Labour Congress who worked diligently, and its very effective members who, on many occasions, having had discriminations in this field brought to their attention, have referred them to the government. In Canada, as the Minister of Labour has pointed out, we have very few cases under federal jurisdiction where discrimination is practised in employment. During my term of office I experienced only two or three cases of this kind in approximately six years. However, in each case we certainly brought to the attention of the employers the fact that here in Canada we will not tolerate any discrimination in this area whatsoever.

It is to be noted that we have a peculiar situation in Canada in that we have provincial jurisdictions. Consequently we have to obtain provincial approval in respect of any of these conventions passed by the I.L.O. There may be criticisms that we have not approved as many of these conventions as we should have over the past years, but because of the peculiar circumstances here, because of provincial jurisdiction, and because many of these conventions which are put forward do not apply in practice in Canada, we have not approved as many as perhaps some people feel we should have.

A great many more countries which participate in the I.L.O. should adopt some of these conventions, which apply in practice to their countries; however, they have failed to do so. When one looks over the schedule of what has been done in the past he will note that some of these things which have been condemned by the I.L.O. are being practised in many countries. It is significant to me that many of the countries where the practice of discrimination, as condemned by the I.L.O. convention, is to be found, have failed to adopt the principles recommended by the conventions. I am sure that all of us in Canada who do not wish to tolerate any discrimination in this area at all will be glad to support this resolution and give it our blessing.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we too should like to join with the present Minister of Labour (Mr. (MacEachen), and the former minister of labour, in expressing our pleasure that the house is being given the opportunity to approve the ratification of the convention of the I.L.O. against discrimination in employment and occupation. I am sure we are all aware of how important in the world today is the issue of discrimination, and particularly discrimination on the ground of race. I am sure we are all aware that the chances of holding our world together might well depend on the capacity of mankind to eliminate all of the practices of discrimination that have been so black on the pages of human history. We were delighted that the I.L.O. conferences of 1957 and 1958 approved of the convention now before us, and we are pleased that a recommendation for its ratification is now being made to parliament.

In a way that is partly personal I should like to express my pleasure at the tribute paid by the present Minister of Labour and the former minister of labour to those of the Canadian Labour Congress who worked very hard for the adoption of this convention at the international labour organization conferences in 1957 and 1958. I am delighted that the Minister of Labour made special mention of the name of Mr. Kalmen Kaplansky, who was the leader of the workers' group that dealt with this matter in 1957 and again in 1958 and who, along with Mr. Arthur Brown and others, played a very active part in promoting this convention and piloting it through the various stages at the two conferences. We mention these two conferences of 1957 and 1958 because, as most hon. members are aware, an I.L.O. convention does not come into effect until it has been approved at two of the conferences of that international body.

Behind the efforts of the representatives of the Canadian Labour Congress at the I.L.O. conferences of 1957 and 1958 lie a number of years of very diligent work in this field. As the present and former ministers, and other hon. members of the house who have relations with labour will know, both the congresses which in 1956 united to form the Canadian Labour Congress, formed human rights committees a number of years ago. These committees worked very hard to get legislation in the provinces and at the federal level which would outlaw discrimination. They also worked very hard to have steps taken which would lead to the passing of conventions and recommendations by the I.L.O.

Since names are being mentioned, I think it might be appropriate for me to remind hon. members that Mr. Claude Jodoin, who is now president of the Canadian Labour Congress, some years before he attained the high position in the labour movement he has now attained, was the first chairman of the human rights committee set up by the former trades and labour congress of Canada. Frank Hall is another individual whose name has been very closely linked to human rights efforts over the years. There are many others who were members of the former congresses and who have made very outstanding contributions since the Canadian Labour Congress was brought into being in 1956.

It was quite significant therefore that Mr. Kaplansky, who had played a very important part in these committees and in co-ordinating the work of the committees of the two former congresses, should have found himself in the position of being the chairman of the workers section of the tripartite committee at Geneva in 1957 and 1958. As a matter of fact, even since the convention was brought into being I believe a small committee has been appointed by the governing body of the I.L.O. to see to it that the practical results that could flow from this convention are achieved, and Mr. Kaplansky, who is the Canadian workers' member of the governing body of the I.L.O., is a member of the special committee that is working on this matter. So I hope the house does not mind my taking these few minutes to spell out in some greater detail what the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) and the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) have both already done, namely to pay tribute to the part played by leading labour spokesmen in Canada to achieve this convention with which we are concerned at the present time.

I join with the Minister of Labour also in expressing pleasure that when this convention came up for approval at Geneva in 1957 and in 1958 it had the support of all three sections representing Canada at those conferences, namely workers, employers and government. It is a bit strange, of course, that it has taken quite this long, from 1958 to 1964, to reach the point where we are being given the chance to approve of this convention in parliament. I know that the same story has been given with respect to it that is so often given, namely that it is because of our federal situation. Yet, Mr. Speaker, it is true that the International Labour Organization takes into account the fact that there are states with federal forms of government such as ours, and I submit that our record in Canada is one that could be improved.

If my information is correct I believe this will be the 21st of the I.L.O. conventions that Canada will have ratified and I believe that there are over 100 I.L.O. conventions which Canada has not yet ratified. We have been a member of the I.L.O. since it was established in 1919. We have paid tribute across the years to the significant role the I.L.O. has played in raising living standards around the world and in doing something to improve the dignity of those who work. We think that Canada could have done a lot better in all those years than ratifying only 21 conventions of that organization while leaving over 100 that have not yet been ratified. So we hope that the action we are taking today will not be so isolated, as indeed these occasions have been. Here we are 45 years since the I.L.O. was set up, and we are ratifying today only the 21st of the conventions passed by that extremely important international body.

May I conclude by repeating in a sentence or two what I said in my opening remarks. In this whole question of discrimination we are dealing with one of the most important problems facing our world today. If we are going to do something effective about this problem we must not only pass resolutions, pass conventions and put things on paper but we must have the legislation, we must have the means of enforcement and we must diligently set out to see to it that so far as Canada is concerned, and so far as any lead we can give to the world is concerned, there must not be discrimination in employment or in occupation or in any other area or aspect of human life. We are terribly aware of the problems in this field that are experienced in some other countries but we are not a people who can throw any stones. We still have quite a piece to go to make it quite clear that in no respect in this country, in terms of race, religion, sex or any other differences, is there discrimination. We welcome, Mr. Speaker, the opportunity that is being given to parliament to endorse ratification of this convention and we hope we will take other steps to demonstrate the significance of what we are doing today.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I referred to the fact it was rather encouraging to find that some measures brought before the house were receiving unanimous support and agreement. It is rather significant that this is the second one in succession and it appears that the house is of one mind regarding the measure now before us.

I want to assure the minister that we support fully the resolution now before the house. I believe that discrimination against people in any segment of our society because of these various factors that have been mentioned is to be deplored. It is a denial of the principle of the dignity of the human personality and a repudiation of that which is highest and best in human life and experience.

Reference has been made to the fact that we have looked with disfavour upon discriminatory practices in other nations but we must be sure that these same practices, though perhaps to a lesser degree, are not countenanced in our own nation. I have noted this statement in the international labour conference resolution:

> Considering that the declaration of Philadelphia affirms that all human beings, irrespective of race, creed or sex, have the right to pursue both their material well-being and their spiritual development in conditions of freedom and dignity, of economic security and equal opportunity—

I do not believe anyone in this chamber would disagree with that pronouncement. I should also like to join in commending those who have worked so diligently to promote the principle of non-discrimination and the abolition of discrimination in various spheres. It is our sincere hope that the convention will achieve universal acceptance.

I believe we must go farther than just passing resolutions or legislation. I believe it is important to promote understanding and good will among all peoples of the world, including those of our own nation, and if we fail to promote that attitude of mind and heart which recognizes the equality of mankind we are not going to achieve our objectives merely by passing resolutions. It was heartening to hear the minister state that there has been a unanimous response from the provinces assuring him that everything is being done to promote this type of measure and to ensure that no discrimination exists so far as it is possible to eliminate it. So, Mr. Speaker, we give full support to the resolution now before us.

Motion agreed to.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MEASURE RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, MINIMUM WAGES, ETC.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-126, respecting hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacations and holidays with pay in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-126 is an act respecting hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacations and holidays with pay in federal works, undertakings and businesses. The two preceding items of legislation in the labour field that were proposed to the house were received with enthusiasm and unanimity by members. I am sure I speak with a certain amount of certainty in saying that the principle underlying this bill will be received with similar enthusiasm and unanimity by members. The second reading of this bill is a notable occasion in the history of labour in Canada. It is a notable event in the history of the labour department and in the evolution of labour legislation in Canada. In so far as the federal government is concerned, it breaks new ground because for the first time the federal parliament is being asked to enact standards in several important fields hitherto unoccupied—at least, it is being asked with assurance of success.

Mr. Knowles: Is the minister saying this is the first time parliament has been asked to do this?

Mr. MacEachen: With assurance of success that the request will be accepted, parliament is being asked to take steps in this important field. The enactment of this bill therefore will fill a conspicuous gap in the field of labour standards in Canada.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that provinces in the past, in their jurisdictions, have established standards in the field of wages and hours which course has not been followed by the federal parliament. This measure establishes a record. It breaks new ground in that sense. I think in a second sense it breaks new ground also because it brings together within one bill at least four major areas of work standards, hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacations and holidays with pay. This bill brings all these together in a single enactment. I know of no enactment, certainly on this continent or elsewhere, that is so comprehensive in its coverage as this particular bill.

May I say that the short title of the bill is the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. The conception of this bill, in its short title, will enable the house on future occasions in taking action in other fields of labour to use this main title. For example, if future modifications or amendments are desired to the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, the amended act might be entitled the Canada labour (relations) code. Likewise, if at some future time action is taken in the field of safety, the caption might be the Canada labour (safety in employment) code. It would be possible therefore to bring together in a single labour code all the enactments by the parliament of Canada affecting the rights and obligations of the Canadian labour force under federal jurisdiction.

The first reading of this bill, Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to report to the house, was received with approval both by the Canadian Labour Congress and the confederation of national trade unions. I had the privilege earlier in the year of addressing the national convention of the Canadian Labour Congress. At that time I told the members of the congress that it was the intention of the government at this session to introduce legislation in this field. This announcement, of course, was received warmly by members of the congress in convention. Later, I had a similar privilege of attending a convention in Quebec city of the confederation of national trade unions and the announcement made in the same vein was received at that convention in a similar spirit of enthusiasm. It is pleasant to know now that both congresses have approved the principle of this particular bill.

The objective, of course, of Bill No. C-126 now before the House of Commons for second reading is the establishment of minimum labour conditions for employees in undertakings within the legislative authority of parliament. The bill, incidentally, and more than incidentally, expressly implements the undertaking given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) in the city of Hamilton on March 25, 1963, outlining the labour policy of the present government. As a matter of fact, a comparison between the labour policy of the Liberal party as set out by the Prime Minister, with the present bill and the important consequences following from this bill, will indicate that what we are hoping to do goes considerably beyond the policy announcement made by the Prime Minister in Hamilton in March of 1963. It fulfils also the promise I made in the house on my estimates, notably to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to bring in a comprehensive labour standards bill at this session. Judging by the interest that has been shown both in and outside of the house, and by private members' bills which have been debated on numerous occasions on this same subject matter, I think the house will welcome the introduction of this bill.

If at this time, Mr. Speaker, I fail to point out the regularity with which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has espoused this cause and the numerous occasions on which he has introduced private bills, I am sure that omission will be pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when he rises to speak on second reading of this particular bill. I know his interest has been shared by members of this house and his private bills, in this session and past sessions, have been debated vigorously and supported generously on the understanding that the government itself would be introducing a measure along these lines.

The fact that the intention of the government to proceed with this bill has been known for some time made it possible for me, as minister, and the officials of the Department of Labour to discuss the general effects of the legislation with some of those who will be affected by it and with representatives from labour and management groups. We have taken advantage of these meetings to discuss the general objectives of this legislation, and this consultation and discussion have enabled us to take account of some of the concerns expressed by making the provisions flexible enough to take care of unusual situations without affecting the essential standards or excuding any classes of employee.

There have also been discussions with the provinces. At a conference of labour ministers last March we discussed the proposed legislation in general terms. There was, I believe, general agreement on the need for progressive labour standards in Canada as a whole, and recognition of the gap that existed because of the lack of federal legislation. An examination of the statement issued at the end of this conference, bearing the approval of the provincial ministers, will justify that there was at this conference general agreement on the need for progressive labour standards, the acknowledgement of the existence of a gap in the federal field.

The problems of the setting of minimum standards are somewhat different in the provincial field jurisdiction, and we have to recognize it is the responsibility of each government to determine what standard it can put into effect. Excellent co-operation has existed for many years between provincial and federal departments of labour in Canada, and we will avail ourselves of it for useful consultation on the implementation of both federal and provincial legislation in the labour standards field. It is a fundamental principle of the proposed legislation, not just as a matter of convenience, that the bill combines provisions dealing with four basic labour conditions as well as related matters. This has been done so that all employees within our jurisdiction will be ensured, as a matter of right, of as high a standard in these basic labour conditions as is within present reach.

The standards we proposed for the code are a minimum wage rate of $1.25 an hour, a standard eight hour day and 40-hour week, overtime hours paid at time and a half and limited to eight a week, seven general holidays with pay, and two weeks annual vacations with pay. As hon. members will have observed, the proposed labour code will cover employment on or in connection with any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada. The coverage is the same as in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act. Hon. members will recall and realize that this includes mainly the transportation and communications industry, banking, uranium mining, grain elevators and certain work carried on by federal corporations.

The bill does not apply directly to employees of government departments or of departmental corporations. However, when parliament adopts this legislation covering national industries under federal jurisdiction, which I trust will be soon, the government will adopt as a matter of policy similar standards for its own employees, so that while the employees of government departments or employees of departmental corporations are not directly included within this act, the government will apply these standards to these employees.

In many cases of course working conditions of federal civil servants and prevailing rate employees are more favourable than the standards set forth in this bill, but where they fall short, my colleague the President of the Privy Council (Mr. McIlraith) will indicate in due course the action that will be taken.

In the case of work on government contracts, changes will be proposed in the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act later in the session, in order that those covered by this legislation will also be brought into conformity with the hours of work and minimum wage standards of the Canada labour code. So in effect, flowing from the enactment of this particular bill applicable to employees within federal jurisdiction, there will come consequential improvements applying these standards to government employees, and consequential amendments to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

At present we have under consideration the amendments to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act that will appropriately, and can appropriately, reflect the standards embodied in the Canada labour code. In my judgment it is a very significant step to apply these standards to the kind of contracts that are governed by the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, and indeed to classes of contracts that are not presently covered by the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, and I think in this respect that the proposals I am putting forward go beyond possible earlier expectations as to what might be contained in this proposed legislation.

In the first part of the bill standards relating to hours of work are established. The number of working hours is not to exceed eight hours a day and 40 hours a week, and where overtime of an additional eight hours a week is permitted, time and one half the regular rate is to be paid. Work in excess of 48 hours in a week is to be allowed only under permit, where the applicant has established the existence of special circumstances sufficient to justify working additional hours.

The officials of the department have accumulated considerable experience in the extending of permits in certain instances in the operation of the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act, and we believe that this can be a workable system under the Canada labour code.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to standing order 39A, to inform the house that the following questions are to be raised at ten o'clock this evening: first, the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) national parks—meeting with council respecting motel construction at Banff; second,

[Mr. MacEachen.]

[Translation]

The hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Girouard), transportation, Quebec—proposed reduction in C.P.R. train service; third, the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge)—natural resources—magazine article alleging plundering by U.S. sportsmen.

[Text]

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MEASURE RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, MINIMUM WAGES, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) for the second reading of Bill No. C-126, respecting hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacations and holidays with pay in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, before the dinner recess I was referring to the provisions of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code with respect to hours of work. In the first part of the bill, standards relating to hours of work are established. Although the great majority of employees under federal jurisdiction are on a 40-hour or shorter work week, there are still a number of instances where longer or even excessive hours are worked in establishments that are subject to federal regulations. It is generally recognized that excessive hours worked over long periods of time do not contribute to industrial efficiency, are injurious to health and can be an important factor contributing to industrial accidents.

Technological advances and gains in productivity have already brought substantial benefits to most workers in the form of shorter hours as well as in other ways, and will no doubt produce more and more leisure time in the future. We must seek means of absorbing this leisure by providing for a more equitable sharing of it. The enactment of the 40-hour standard is thus intended not only to benefit those employees under federal jurisdiction who still work long hours, but also to help spread employment among the work force.

Without knowing the full extent to which overtime is worked in federal industries, the reasons for it, and its distribution throughout the year, we have not considered it practical at this time to propose limiting overtime hours more drastically but overtime work will be kept under scrutiny and we have made provision for reducing the number of overtime hours permitted by regulation. Such regulations could apply to the whole or part of any industry.

A recent I.L.O. instrument on hours of work, recommendation No. 116 concerning reduction of hours of work, adopted at the 1962 international labour conference, was tabled in this house by the former minister of labour, the hon. member for Ontario, (Mr. Starr), on January 22, 1963. At that time he stated that study was being given in the department to the instrument, with a view to action. The basic provision of this recommendation, the implementation, by gradual steps if necessary, of a 40-hour standard work week, retaining the 48-hour maximum limit set by an earlier convention which Canada had previously ratified, is essentially being implemented by this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I now turn to the second part of the bill, namely minimum wages. It has I think been accepted by all advocates of a minimum standard for wages in federal industries that the only practical approach is to fix a minimum hourly rate by statute, and that is what this bill provides. We propose an hourly rate of $1.25 applicable throughout the country. The minimum rate applies to men and women of the age of 17 and over. The charges or deductions that may be made for board, lodging, uniforms, tools or equipment may be prescribed by regulation. This provision is necessary to see that the effect of the minimum wage is not evaded.

A special provision is also included to cover the employment of young people under 17 years of age. In this case the appropriate wage rate for the occupation is to be determined by regulation. There are fewer and fewer jobs that can absorb young people with limited training and there is general agreement that it is now more desirable than at any time in the past that young people should remain in school to become as well prepared as possible for the more complex and technical world of work they will later be entering. Continuing studies are needed to determine what is and what is not suitable employment in these industries for those young people who for one reason or another do leave school at 15 or 16, and to fix an appropriate minimum wage rate and other conditions of employment.

In order to ensure that the requirement to pay the $1.25 minimum rate does not stand in the way of bona fide training programs in industry, which should be encouraged, an employer who is providing a suitable training program for employees may be exempted from paying the minimum rate to them during the training period. I believe that members of this house will consider that the $1.25 hourly rate is a reasonable rate at the present time. We have to bear in mind that if, in an effort to raise workers' incomes, too high a minimum rate is fixed, it may defeat its purpose by making costs so high that employment opportunities for the workers it is intended to help may be curtailed as a consequence. I suggest that we should try to achieve a sound balance at our present stage of development, and to the best of our knowledge we have done so in the proposed rate.

Part III establishes two weeks as the minimum annual vacation with pay. It incorporates most of the provisions of the Annual Vacations Act passed in 1958, and repeals that act. The essential change is that the period of continuous employment necessary to qualify for the two-week vacation has been shortened to one year. This minimum standard will not impose an excessive burden upon federal industries at this time since the practice of giving two weeks for the first year of employment is now accepted in many cases. An important impact will probably be with respect to employees who do not complete a years' employment, who will now receive 4 per cent of their wages upon termination instead of 2 per cent. The provision requiring continuous employment for 30 days in order to qualify for vacation pay on termination of employment has been retained.

The fourth part of the bill sets out the general rule that an employee is entitled to a holiday with pay on at least seven general holidays in a year. He is to receive his regular pay for these days. If a general holiday falls on a day that is a non-working day for the employee—that is, a Saturday or Sunday when the establishment is closed—or on a week day that is a scheduled day off for him, he is to have another day off in lieu of the holiday. The principle of the bill in this part is to ensure seven days off with pay. It does not prohibit work on a holiday. Many of the employees to whom the act will apply are employed in continuous operations and normally have to work on some of the general holidays. Such an employee may be granted an alternative day off with pay, which may be a day added to his annual vacation or granted at another time convenient to him and the employer. In other than continuous operations, where the establishment will normally be closed, if an employee is required to work on a holiday he is to be paid at a rate at least equal to one and one half times his regular rate of wages for the time worked on the holiday, in addition to his regular pay for the day.

The seven general holidays named in the bill are those which are most commonly observed as paid holidays in the federal industries. To take account of local custom in the observance of holidays, the bill provides that an alternative holiday may be substituted in any industrial establishment for any of the specified days. An employee is not entitled to holiday pay for a general holiday that occurs in his first 30 days of employment with an employer.

For most workers in Canada, particularly workers governed by collective agreement, paid public holidays are now a customary part of conditions of work. However, there is great variation in the number of holidays granted per year, the conditions surrounding the right to pay for the holiday, and the remuneration paid for work on a holiday. This code will standardize conditions regarding paid general holidays in the federal industries to the extent of guaranteeing seven days with pay. It leaves to collective bargaining the question of additional days as the circumstances may warrant.

The legislation will place a positive obligation upon the Minister of Labour to see that there is compliance with the provisions of the act and it will be necessary to have a system of inspection to see that the standards laid down by the act are observed. The furnishing of pay statements to employees is generally accepted good practice and will be required of employers under the act. A number of questions are anticipated in the administration of the legislation which will require consultation with the parties affected. Provision is therefore made for the setting up of ad hoc advisory committees to advise the minister on any matter relating to the administration of the act. There is also a provision permitting an inquiry to be made concerning employment in any industrial establishment, and a person appointed to undertake such an investigation will have the powers of a commissioner under the Inquiries Act.

Parts I to IV will come into effect January 1, 1965. This is to allow the Department of Labour to make the necessary arrangements for administration and to allow the employers who will need to change some of their practices time to work out the changes in an orderly way. Special transitional provisions, it will be noted, are included at the end of the bill to allow a longer period of adjustment to the prescribed hours standard and the minimum wage, where it can be shown that compliance with these requirements would prejudice the interests of the employees or would be seriously detrimental to the operation of the undertaking. In each case a deferment may be permitted up to July 1, 1966. The opportunity for a deferment of the application of the minimum wage rate is limited to those businesses that are organized and operated in one local area. The purpose of this provision is to help lessen any hardship where the rates of employees would have to be adjusted.

Problems may arise in reducing hours of work in those operations which are now working substantially longer hours than 40 in a week at regular rates of pay. The principal problem that will be met here, of course, is a possible rapid reduction in weekly take home pay if the standard work week were applied immediately. For that reason this particular transitional provision is put into the bill. This particular deferment aspect is not confined to industries operating on a local basis but is applied to industries in general.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I should like to draw to the attention of members the relatively simple and straightforward nature of this bill. An effort has been made to avoid unnecessary complexity in administration and to minimize inconvenience. The provisions permitting the averaging of hours over a longer period than a week, permitting another general holiday to be substituted for one of those listed, and the recognition of the special circumstances of continuous operations in regard to holidays, and indeed the provision whereby the application of part I dealing with hours of work, or section 11, part II, dealing with minimum wages, may be deferred during a period of adjustment—all these make not only for flexibility and simplicity but are also designed to keep any disturbance to existing operations to a minimum, taking into account the major social objectives that are embodied in the Canada labour code.

Hon. Michael Starr (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the second reading of Bill No. C-126 I want to say to the minister that I rather like this what I might call one package deal legislation, which combines four aspects of jurisdiction in the federal labour field. When the minister said that these pieces of legislation which are embodied in the bill were breaking new ground I am sure that he did not mean they broke new ground entirely, because we have had on our statute books legislation dealing with hours of work and fair wages. This legislation provided that fair wages must be paid both on construction and on manufacturing contracts. Maximum hours on construction contracts were to be eight hours per day with a 44-hour week, and hours of work on manufacturing contracts were to be those current with comparable work in the area. Therefore, as far as hours of work are concerned it is not correct to say that this legislation is entirely new, but it does present a modification in that the bill provides a 40-hour week with the possibility of an additional eight hours upon application to the minister, and payable at the rate of time and a half. So in fact that is a modification of what we now have on the statute books.

We have had in this area many problems, particularly in the construction field, and I was wondering whether the minister should not have thought of making a division between some of the industries and making some things applicable to certain of the industries under federal jurisdiction with an entirely different set of rules for an industry not comparable to others vis-à-vis its work operations. For example, the construction industry is at all times uncertain as to the number of hours to be worked, depending on the season of the year, whereas other industries under federal jurisdiction are fairly stable in this regard. In this connection I wonder whether the minister considered applying a 35-hour week to certain industries which could operate under it. As we all know, in the United States there is now a trend toward collective bargaining so as to obtain a 35-hour week and thereby create more employment. This is a means that is supported by many people in their endeavour to reduce unemployment in this country.

In the area of annual vacations, legislation has been on the statute books since October 1, 1958. The proposal contained in this bill represents a modification. The legislation now provides for a one-week vacation after the first year of employment, or 2 per cent of gross wages, and two weeks after the second year, or 4 per cent of gross wages. This bill proposes that an employee will receive two weeks annual vacation with pay after the first year of employment, or 4 per cent of gross wages. I am wondering whether this proposal has been included to satisfy the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, I remember very well when I introduced this legislation for the first time, fought strongly for the proposition that two weeks be provided after the first year of employment.

The holidays with pay provision in this proposal provides for seven days. I should like to bring to the attention of the minister that the committee on rules and procedure in its recommendations presented last week suggested that members of parliament should be entitled to nine days, and that was done without any collective bargaining whatsoever. I think that was done for another purpose. However, this is a basis upon which collective bargaining can take place. The bill itself provides for seven statutory holidays.

We now come to the other provision in the bill which is entirely new to the federal field of jurisdiction, and I refer to minimum wages in Canada. This bill provides for $1.25 per hour as a minimum wage. Even now organized labour is asking for a minimum wage of $1.50 per hour. I am very happy to note that this minimum wage is to apply to the young people, 17 years and over. However, I am wondering whether it should not have been applicable to those young people entering the labour force at 16 years of age and over, because it is compulsory that children attend school until age 16, and many of them leave at that age to go to work. Consequently we have many young people entering the labour force who are not covered by this act. A great many of them must make overtures to the minister in order to obtain a fair wage.

The release for June of this year by the dominion bureau of statistics reporting on the labour force, indicates conclusively that young people, particularly those leaving school between the ages of 14 and 19 years, untrained and not having skills and trades required by industry, increased in number as compared with last year. Perhaps the minister would look at this situation to ascertain whether it would be practical to have these young people entering the labour force covered by this legislation when they reach the age of 16 years. It would also be interesting to know how many of them are employed within the federal field of jurisdiction and receive wages below $1.25 per hour. The minister did not indicate how many employees in this field would be affected by this minimum wage proposal.

As a result of what I have heard I am sure that the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) received a great deal of opposition from his colleagues in the cabinet, but that his perseverance overrode the objections of those individuals who felt this was not good legislation. This is good legislation which I think will do a great deal for the economy of this country.

I was rather surprised that the minister in his opening statement on second reading said that federal employees would not be covered immediately by this legislation. I hope I am correct in that statement.

Mr. MacEachen: They are not covered because they are covered by other acts such as the Civil Service Act, and prevailing rates regulation. Such changes would require special legislation. It would not be proper to make those changes by a bill such as the one now before us.

Mr. Starr: There is no necessity for including those employees if they are now receiving a minimum of $1.25 per hour under the Civil Service Act.

I think this legislation is timely for several reasons, and I refer particularly to the minimum wage portion of the bill. I feel this will constitute a major addition to the existing pattern of progressive national labour standards, and I have in mind fair employment practices, equal pay for equal work, annual vacations, fair wages and hours of labour. The federal government in setting desirable goals or objectives in this regard can and does give leadership and guidance to the provinces, thereby tending toward higher and more uniform standards.

The area of federal jurisdiction in the field of minimum wages represents a gap in so far as regulation of minimum wages in this country is concerned. Though the provinces have minimum wage laws they vary widely in rates and coverages. I might point out that Canada is one of the few advanced industrial nations in this world which does not have national minimum wage legislation.

I do not know how accurate I will be, but I intend to list some minimum wage legislation that now exists in different provinces. If I misstate the facts in this regard I stand to be corrected. I understand in Newfoundland the minimum wage covering the general order for male employees is 50 cents an hour, and the general order for female employees is 35 cents an hour. In Nova Scotia the general order for female employees is $21.60 per week in cities and towns with over 8,000 people, $19.20 per week in incorporated towns with a population of under 8,000 and $14.40 per week in the rest of the province. In New Brunswick the general order for female employees is 50 cents per hour. In Quebec the general order for male and female employees is 70 cents per hour in metropolitan Montreal, and 64 cents per hour in the rest of the province.

In Ontario just recently the minimum wage regulations were modified so that in some areas the minimum wage is $1 per hour while in other areas the minimum wage is $1.25 per hour. In Manitoba the general order for male and female employees is 66 cents per hour in urban areas and 61 cents per hour in rural areas. In Saskatchewan the general order for male and female employees is $32 a week based on a 40-hour week. In Alberta the general order for male and female employees in cities and towns with a population of over 5,000 is $34 per week, and in the rest of the province $30 per week.

In British Columbia the minimum rates are set on an industrial basis and there are 38 orders, most of which in fact set the same rate for both men and women. The manufacturing order sets a rate of 75 cents per hour for males and 60 cents per hour for females. In the mercantile, hotel and catering area the minimum rate is 65 cents per hour for both men and women. The rates in other orders range from $2 an hour, for qualified tradesmen in the construction industry, to 40 cents an hour for female employees in the fish processing industry.

We can readily see that this legislation will set a pattern or standard, and that provincial governments will be pressured in many ways to bring the present rates now on the statute books close to or equal to the federal standard that is being set in Bill C-126.

There is also a growing interest in the subject of minimum wages in Canada. Over the years that I have been in the house I have noticed that statements by members of the house have revealed support for a national minimum wage. This has also been urged by many groups, particularly labour groups, and over the years many members of the House of Commons have sponsored minimum wage proposals which have been discussed during private members' hours.

I feel that the greatest interest in this subject was created by what was done in the United States when a federal minimum wage was introduced in two stages. The first stage was $1.15 an hour which came into effect on September 3, 1961, and this was followed by an increase to $1.25 an hour on September 3, 1963. This had very extensive publicity not only in the United States but in Canada and I think it did more than anything else to focus attention on the situation in Canada. I do not think there is anything to suggest that the widespread support of the federal minimum wage principle which was evident in the United States would not be forthcoming here in Canada also, especially on the part of the general working population.

Although some thousands of workers will receive wage increases directly or indirectly as a result of Bill No. C-126, which has as a consequence the establishing of a national minimum wage, I think there should be little adverse effect on the functioning of the economy generally or on most of the industries involved. I am sure that no serious employment dislocation will follow, nor would I anticipate that there would be price increases directly attributable to the minimum wage. On the contrary, I think that the resultant increase in purchasing power would stimulate production in other sectors of the country.

I might point out that it is noteworthy that almost all of the employment that will be affected in Canada is to be found in service and other domestic industries so that the effect of a minimum wage in those industries should not have any direct bearing upon Canada's international trade. I feel that this legislation is consistent with the present fair wages policy which applies to certain government contracts. In addition, as has been mentioned earlier with regard to another part of the bill, it will enable fuller implementation by Canada to I.L.O. convention No. 26 which has been ratified by Canada and which deals with the establishment of minimum wage setting machinery.

In some places in Canada the wage rates now being paid by the affected industries are below what are required by the law of the province in which they are located, and the continuation of this condition is becoming increasingly difficult to justify. This proposed minimum wage will admittedly add substantial amounts to the payroll costs of some industries, particularly banks, railways and telephone companies, but this should be kept in perspective. It would be interesting to know whether the minister has any figures on the cost that may be involved in those affected industries and services under federal jurisdiction.

Although this legislation covers a very small percentage of the labour force, I feel that its beneficial effects will be recognized by a markedly larger group and its ramifications in the future may be considerable if, as is to be expected, the provinces over a period of time bring their standards more into conformity with what this legislation will provide. The minister said in his remarks that the provinces were consulted and I remember when the ministers of labour were here in Ottawa. I am sure the minister made his intentions known to them, and if they agreed to this proposed legislation they certainly must have had in mind the consequences that would flow so far as they were concerned; and certainly they must have thought at the time they agreed to this legislation that in time they would have to bring their own legislation up to what the federal government is placing on the statute books.

From the human and more broadly social point of view the benefits of this legislation are very clear. Economically the country will gain in both the short and the long run. We welcome this legislation which comprises two new measures and the modification of two pieces of legislation now on the statute books, and I am sure it will be of benefit to the working force of our country. It will set standards up to which the provinces will try to bring their own legislation. I want to repeat again that I like this package deal respecting labour legislation which has been introduced in the house in Bill No. C-126.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have before us a bill to be known as the Canada labour standards code. It is a good piece of legislation and we heartily welcome its introduction. I know that on occasion it has happened that an opposition member has pleaded with the government to bring in certain legislation, and then when the government at long last brings it in the opposition member rises and says that the government did not do it the right way. I do not wish to start off in that vein. Rather I wish at the start to say that we are pleased that this important piece of legislation is at long last before parliament.

There are several things about the legislation that are particularly good to which I should like to refer briefly. In the first place I agree with the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) and with the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) that it is good to have the various elements of a labour code wrapped up in one package. I was pleased to hear the Minister of Labour say when he made his speech on second reading that it was possible that the other aspects of labour legislation might, after some amending of other bits of legislation has been effected, be put into a companion piece to be known as the Canada labour relations code. I think that if we could get all of the legislation respecting labour into one or two acts to be known as the Canada labour code, that would be a very good step for us to take.

My second observation in commendation of this legislation is that I am glad it deals with the four or five main elements which we have been asking the government to include in a federal labour code. We are talking about four or five elements, depending upon whether or not we regard hours per day and days per week as one element or two. I have asked for five things to be in a labour code and they have been: maximum number of hours per day, maximum number of days per week, a minimum wage, statutory holidays with pay and annual vacations with pay. The minister in his bill has combined the first two of those elements into one, so he talks about four elements when I talk about five. However, at least we are talking about all the major elements that had been either lacking or inadequately covered in legislation previously on the statute books.

When I say, Mr. Speaker, that we have waited a long time for this legislation, there was the fear that it might be a disappointment, that some elements would be left out. I am prepared to say, however, that most of the elements for which we had hoped are in it. There was one that was promised by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) when he spoke on February 20 of this year which is not in it. I will come to that in a few minutes.

The third word of commendation I should like to offer concerning this piece of legislation relates to the fact that it does fix certain minimum standards right in the legislation itself. As the member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) has pointed out, the tendency, particularly with regard to minimum wages, in provincial legislation is to leave the minimum wage rate to be determined by order in council or by regulation. The result of its being left that way is to have different rates in different parts of a province and various other anomalies. I congratulate the minister—I congratulate him all the more if he had the battle with his colleagues to which the hon. member for Ontario referred in getting these minimum standards—on getting the various minimums actually written into the legislation itself. This goes not only for the amount determined as a minimum wage but it also goes for the determination of holidays with pay each year, to the number of statutory holidays allowed per year, the hours of work per week, and so on. I shall have something to say later about those standards in quantitative terms. But it is a forward step to have these things actually covered in the legislation as passed by parliament.

The fourth observation I want to make about this legislation, which I regard as good, is that it does seem to me to have the appearance—and I do not see anything wrong with the appearance—of giving a lead to the provinces in this field. Some of us have had the feeling, in recent months at any rate, that things have been going the other way in this country, that the federal government has been dragging its feet and allowing the provinces to determine things. Some of us have the feeling that there is a place for a strong voice at the centre, and even though this legislation will apply, legally and specifically, only to employees who come under federal labour jurisdiction, nevertheless it does give a lead to the provinces. The very fact that we have federal minimum labour standards will, I am sure, be good for labour right across Canada, including those workers who come under federal jurisdiction and those who come under provincial jurisdiction.

There are in fact, Mr. Speaker, other things that one might say about this legislation that are good, but I think I have established that I meant what I said a while ago when I indicated I do not want to be the kind of opposition member who is disappointed because the government has done what he has been asking it to do. Even so, I am sure the minister would not think I was really myself if I did not at least draw attention to the fact we have waited quite a while for this measure. I enjoyed the way in which the minister said this was an implementation, and even more so, of what the present Prime Minister promised in a speech he made in 1963. Well, 1963 is only last year. I cannot help thinking of the position the Liberal party took two years before the present minister was born; so some of us have been waiting a long while for this implementation by the Liberal party of its promise to bring in a national labour code, and of its promise in 1919 to implement in Canada the things that were called for by the international labour organization of which Canada became a member in that opening year of 1919.

Across the years many voices have been raised in parliament and throughout the country for this kind of legislation. In another speech this afternoon I had occasion to pay tribute to those who had contributed in another field. I should like to pay tribute, as I have done on occasions in the past, even after all these years, to my distinguished predecessor and former member for Winnipeg North Centre, the late J. S. Woodsworth. He was a member of this house from 1921 to 1942. Mr. Woodsworth had many interests and he worked for the good of all the people of Canada. One of the things he fought hard for during the years he was here was the implementation of labour legislation, a national labour code. He came to this house shortly after the 1919 convention of the Liberal party. He was an idealist, a man who believed in people. He assumed that what the Liberals had promised in 1919 was somethink to ask for in 1922 and 1923. He did ask for it. It is the efforts of men like J. S. Woodsworth, the efforts of men in the trade unions and others across the years, that have finally resulted in our getting this piece of legislation that is before us. As the minister pointed out, both of the main labour centres in Canada, the Canadian Labour Congress and the confederation of national trade unions, have indicated their approval of this legislation, in principle at any rate. As we all know, it does represent, in principle, the kind of thing that labour has been seeking. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, we heartily welcome this legislation.

Now, let me comment briefly on the actual provisions to which the minister has made reference. I hope I might be pardoned if I make the kind of comment it would be expected I would make. First of all, provision has been made for a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour. I do not detract by one iota from my pleasure that the actual rate has been put in the legislation and that we are not left waiting for a decision by order in council so far as this matter is concerned. But the minister himself pointed out, as did the hon. member for Ontario, that the labour movement is now asking for a higher figure as a minimum wage rate. It is quite true that it was only at its convention this year that the Canadian Labour Congress changed its official position from $1.25 per hour to $1.50 per hour. But the fact is that the labour movement in this country has felt for some time that, conditions being what they are, $1.50 should be the minimum wage rate to be incorporated in this legislation. Therefore, though we welcome the fact that this is getting started, and while it is true that I am ready to commend the government for what it is doing, I am not going to stand up and say, "Let now thy servant depart in peace," because we have not really seen everything yet.

There are those of course who complain about minimum wage rates and argue that if they are too high they will work against the interests of the workers and the public generally, that prices will be increased, and that all sorts of dire consequences will result. All I can say is that this has always been the story. When legislation was first introduced into the parliament of the United Kingdom to try to put a stop to the practice of exploiting young boys as chimney-sweeps, it was said that that legislation would ruin the economy of England and would be to the detriment of the boys themselves. Perhaps it is a far cry from that to what we are doing now, but social legislation for the good of the workers has always had to meet this kind of argument. However, when we get social legislation that improves the conditions of the workers of the country, it improves the economy of the country and the well-being of all the people.

That part of the bill which deals with hours of work per day and the maximum number of hours per week, like the other provisions in the bill, is good, but there are one or two things to which I would like to direct the minister's attention. We are not satisfied with the amount that he has set as an overtime rate of pay, namely time and a half for the period of overtime worked, and we do not think he has yet grappled with the problem of excessive overtime work.

I did note in the minister's remarks that it is the intention of the department to study this matter as it goes along, but I suggest to him that if he is going to achieve real progress in shortening the work week for our workers—and this becomes more and more necessary as we move into more automation, more cybernetics, and more intelectronics, all of these things which will take work away from us completely—he will have to take into account that as these things come about the 40-hour week is going to seem a long period of time in the kind of economy we now have. This aspect of the minister's bill will have to be reviewed. I shall have something else to say in relation to that, but I will come back to it later.

I now move on the question of annual vacations with pay. I welcome the fact that the minister has accepted the principle of one of my bills, a principle which the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) could have accepted away back in 1958, in that he has made the two weeks vacation with pay applicable after one year. This is good. In my view it was wrong in the first place to make workers wait for two years before getting it. We are glad to see this improvement; but again this afternoon the minister reminded us that he was a guest of the Canadian Labour Congress at its conference in Montreal last April, and he was present when the congress presented its last brief. The minister knows the position of the trade union movement. Surely he knows it urges that, just as in other areas of life, other areas of endeavour, people in many instances do get a longer vacation than two weeks, we think this should apply also to industrial workers. The Canadian Labour Congress in April this year passed a resolution urging that at the end of three years employment the annual vacation should be three weeks, and there were other requests for even longer vacations following lengthier periods of employment. But perhaps this is enough for the minister to aim at now. I beleve that, having given us a bill that provides two weeks vacation at the end of one year, he should go one further step and provide three weeks vacation after three years employment.

The statutory number of holidays provided in this bill is seven, and the minister indicated that the holidays are named in the bill. I believe the bill calls them "general holidays" instead of statutory holidays, but the minister went on to indicate that it is possible to substitute other holidays for some of these seven. That is a good provision, taking into account regional and provincial practices, but I would like to suggest that the number of holdays stipulated should be nine rather than seven. I do not base that claim, as did the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr), on what we did in this house last week. After all, this house did not declare any days to be national holidays. We just made a decision that the house would not sit on certain days; but I would remind the minister that in the Civil Service Act there are nine statutory holidays provided for all civil servants. These are the seven that are in this bill, plus two others, Easter Monday and Remembrance day. I am sorry the minister has not included these two in his bill. I do not wish to make any distinction between them, but if I were making one I would say I am particularly sorry that Remembrance day is not included as a holiday in this bill.

So, Mr. Speaker, I think it will be quite clear that even to one who is pleased to see this bill, after waiting for it for a lifetime, there are some things in it which could be improved, and I hope we get some of these improvements while the bill is going through the house. We shall have the committee stage next, and there are quite a few clauses in the bill. That stage may take a little time, but I hope not too long. At least, Mr. Speaker, we will not lose any time on clause 1, and I hope as we get to the other clauses we can make improvements with respect to some of the matters I have mentioned.

I now invite the minister's attention to two or three things, apart from my references until now to specific enactments in the legislation, which I think he should look at. This afternoon he made reference to the question of safety, and said that maybe some day arrangements for the safety of workers could be included in the federal labour code. May I remind him that "some day" ought to be right now. As a matter of fact on February 20 of this year, as recorded at page 57 of Hansard, speaking in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) referred to this labour code as one of the most important measures the government was going to bring before parliament this session, and in the course of describing what it was going to do he said:

> Now we will be proposing at this session a minimum wage, maximum working hours, standards for holidays and for occupational safety.

There were other references to that, both this year and last year, and I thought that was a pretty clear promise from the Prime Minister. Now we get this bill from the minister and all of the things that the Prime Minister promised on February 20 are there, except the one regarding occupational safety. I think the minister should get his helpers upstairs to work on this and incorporate it in this legislation, unless he can make the commitment that it will be introduced in some other piece of legislation this session. In line with the minister's own statement that he hoped to have this all in one package, I ask why not have it now?

If memory serves me correctly, in 1962-63 the last government prepared a piece of legislation affecting safety, so the people in the department must have this material; and if they have not got it I refer them again to the Canadian Labour Congress which can produce it for them. As I say, I hope safety provisions will be incorporated in this piece of legislation.

Another shortcoming in the bill is that it does not extend its provisions to the Yukon and Northwest Territories. I notice that my hon. friend from the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) was over talking to the minister, and maybe he was talking about this. I know both he and the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume) are interested in this legislation, and I cannot see why these areas, which are so distinctly federal, should be excluded. If there were any possibility that they were to become provinces the week after next, or if there were any danger Premier Bennett was going to take them over and make them part of British Columbia, I suppose we would have to leave them aside for a while; but the likelihood is that they will continue to be territories coming under federal jurisdiction and, that being the case, I suggest that whatever labour standards we set up as a federal parliament should apply to the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

Another comment that I wish to make has to do with something to which the minister alluded, but I am afraid that is all he gave us, just an allusion—or maybe it was an illusion, if I may play on the word.

Mr. MacEachen: It was not a delusion.

Mr. Knowles: The minister says it was not a delusion. We will have to wait and see. In his speech he did face up to the fact that a sudden application of a maximum number of hours per week could have the effect of causing many workers to suffer a reduction in take-home pay. If people who are now working 46, 48, 50, 52 or 54 hours a week—and there are such—can suddenly work only 40 hours a week at the same hourly rate they will, of course, have a considerable reduction in take-home pay.

The minister said this was one of the reasons for permitting some employers to delay the implementation of this maximum hours per week section of the bill. I understand that, but I think he has to go further than just allowing time for that kind of thing; I think he has to find a way whereby, with the reduction of the number of hours these people work—especially those who are anywhere down toward the $1.25 rate—there will not be any reduction in take-home pay. I am fully aware of the problems involved in this. I can see the minister suggesting that this should be the subject of collective bargaining, and so on. But we need not go over that argument; we know the whole problem of how much has to be done by legislation and how much has to be done by collective bargaining. I suggest that when the minister is bringing in legislation for which the labour movement has been asking for half a century or more, he must see to it that the result is that it will not be seriously damaging to some people. This is one thing that some people who do come under federal labour jurisdiction are worried about.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as something for the minister to think about pretty seriously I mention the word enforcement. He mentioned it in his speech; he said this has been taken into account and that there must be in the legislation and in any regulations passed under this act all that is necessary by way of inspection to make sure that the terms of this legislation are carried out. The minister expressed some pleasure in the relative simplicity of the bill, and we like to see legislation that is not too complex. But having in mind the amount of examination and inspection that has to go on in the provinces in connection with this kind of legislation, having in mind the problems that are involved in enforcement, I am not too sanguine that the enforcement provisions contained in this legislation are sufficient. I am prepared to give the minister time on this, but I think he must make up his mind that, having won the battle this far, having brought before parliament a piece of legislation that implements something his party promised two years before he was born, having won the battle in the cabinet, having got the provincial governments to agree that this is a good idea, he must go all the way and make sure that this legislation is going to be enforced.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, speaking on behalf of those of us who sit in this part of the house, and speaking if I may on behalf of the trade union movement, with which I am happy to be associated, I want to say that we do regard this as a good piece of legislation; we regard it as an important day in Canada's history that this legislation is being introduced—but there is room for improvement in it. The specific things I have suggested should be carefully examined before this legislation is finally dealt with and put through the house. I hope that serious attention will be paid to the improvements I have suggested when we are dealing with the bill in committee and I hope that as a result, when we get to third reading this good bill will be an even better piece of labour legislation.

Labour Conditions

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to say a few words in relation to Bill No. C-126, which is a bill that working people across the country have looked forward to for a long time, in that it will standardize Canada's labour code. It is not my intention to speak at length this evening, except to give my own statement of commendation to the minister, make a few remarks about the legislation and draw his attention to one or two points that go even beyond the scope of this piece of legislation. My own view is that this is a workmanlike, well drafted piece of legislation and that it will do a great deal to develop acceptable standards of employment across our country. No one can legitimately disagree with the objective of this legislation. Certainly it is desirable, it is essential, and we are grateful that it is before us.

Looking briefly at its different parts we find that it deals with four basic items of standardization. The first one relates to hours of work. I think this is commendable, and the way it endeavours to cover the entire field is likewise good, in that it sets out maximum hours of work as well. I note that in clause 7 of part I it specifically states that one day a week shall be reserved as a day of rest, and that in so far as possible that day shall be Sunday. This is good. Turning to part III, which is the section dealing with annual vacations with pay, this is likewise a very substantial and commendable part of the legislation.

In part IV the bill deals with general holidays. I would agree with the hon. member who has just spoken, that in view of the fact there are nine statutory holidays there can hardly be reason why only seven should be mentioned in this bill. I would hope that nine would be included, because I believe that certainly the workingman is entitled to those holidays as much as the rest of the public. In part V the bill deals with regulations and the administration of this measure, and in some detail goes into the specific aspects of this phase of the bill. This section of the bill is as necessary as any other part, because unless it is possible to enforce these regulations and make them effective, the bill will not really accomplish very much.

I do not intend to go into the details of this last section tonight, because we can do that a little later in the debate. I do wish to make a few remarks to the minister in relation to the second part of the bill that relates to a minimum hourly wage. I think that basically, to set a minimum hourly wage is essential. I think it is good that this legislation comes to grips with this problem and states what that minimum wage should be. But it does raise a very serious question of policy that is involved in the matter of a basic, over-all, maximum wage which is set out in this legislation to be $1.25 an hour. Everyone knows that, particularly as a result of higher rentals and higher living costs in the urban areas, the cost of living to the worker is much higher in the urban areas than it is in some of the rural areas. This is true not only in rural centres but in provinces which are basically rural and do not have the industrial economy associated with the larger urban centres.

Basic wage rates, then, should be geared to accommodate this problem. In other words, with living costs higher in certain areas of the country than in other areas, we are endeavouring through a set minimum wage to establish a minimum living standard and are going to find ourselves in trouble in those areas where living costs are so much higher than they are in others. Therefore, if a person happens to be a resident in an area where the basic standard of living costs many more dollars than a worker living in another area actually what is happening is that we are doing nothing to set a minimum living standard, rather than just a minimum wage.

Mr. Woolliams: Do you think this will force every province to adopt that?

Mr. Thompson: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Woolliams) refers to the different provinces and the problems which will result in those provinces through the establishment of such a wage. Again I think it has been clearly stated that it is hoped this legislation will set a standard and will be an incentive for all provinces, and not only provincial governments but municipal and local governments as well—not to mention industry—to bring their standards of pay up to something comparable and equivalent to this. Perhaps in this regard we will be working a hardship on these other governments, nevertheless I agree that in defining a standard you are setting an example for them, and certainly establishing a precedent which is nothing more than what is desired. However, I come back briefly to the fact that what is going to happen as a result of this situation I have just mentioned is that we are going further to drive our population to the urban centres, and I am not sure that this is going to meet the overall intention of this legislation. If a basic minimum wage is to be established it should also guarantee a minimum living standard.

I realize, Mr. Speaker, that there is a great deal of difficulty involved in how this can be done. Perhaps it would mean the zoning of the country into areas which would set a norm for cost of living. But certainly let us not be so optimistic as to think that just because we pass a piece of legislation here which sets a minimum wage at $1.25 an hour we have solved the problem of raising our living standard so that everyone can enjoy or be assured of that basic living standard. As I said before, $1.25 might be a very realistic basic wage in urban centres like Montreal and Toronto. It would be quite unrealistic in other areas—in the rural parts of Quebec for example, or in the maritimes. Perhaps in these areas $1 an hour would provide as satisfactory a basic minimum living standard as $1.50 would provide in urban centres such as the two largest cities in Canada. However, I understand that the government, and rightly so, wishes the code to set an example for all parts of the country, and to this end we can but give our agreement to it. But I suggest it will fail in this objective if the standards it sets are not practical ones, which is why I refer to this question of a basic living standard.

On another more general note, Mr. Speaker, I suggest a word of caution to the minister in relation to what we can hope to achieve, if such minimum wage standards are not practical, in the way of putting into the hands of workers enough dollars earned as a result of their own labours to maintain for themselves a reasonable living standard. I suggest there are three factors in our over-all economy which are required in the process of the production of wealth and fair reward. I am thinking specifically of land, capital and labour. One hundred and fifty years ago the economic situation of labour was such that it received only a very small share of the rewards from this process, and as a result the working man lived at a bare sustenance level. Gradually people began to realize that labour was in a monopoly position and that unless the owners of capital and land treated labour in a more equitable fashion they would be powerless to make any profit for themselves. So developed the trade union movement, which has done a great deal in the intervening years to raise standards of pay and improve working conditions for the working man.

Through the weapon of the strike, and through the power which labour holds in collective bargaining we find that labour has secured for itself a much more favourable position than it had not so very many years ago. But, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that labour today faces a problem which is far more serious and of much greater magnitude than ever before, a problem which makes even the gains it has made during these years entirely inadequate for the problem it is going to face in the future and which it is actually facing in many respects today.

We are now coming to the time when investment in the shape of labour saving machines is reaching such a high developed form of monopoly bargaining that labour is being jeopardized. Through the development of the machine and the automation which comes along with it we find labour is rapidly being displaced, and with its displacement the money with which labour used to earn its living is no longer available to it. Supposing we were able to enforce a $1.25 basic wage rate across Canada; or for that matter, supposing it was raised to $2.50 per hour: In the long run what is going to happen is that the worker who is not worth that much on the open market is going to be dispensed with and replaced by a machine. That is the real problem which labour faces today. This is going to aggravate the problem of the unemployable, unskilled labourer. When we are talking of basic minimum wage standards of $1.25, we are really talking about that type of labour. Already as a result of that situation this problem to which I have referred is before us to a large extent. There is a real limit on how much good a compulsory raise in basic pay can achieve for any worker, and I believe we are approaching this limit at this time. Indeed we may already have passed it.

I suggest to the minister and his departmental officials, who I know are very concerned indeed about this problem, that the question of an adequate basic wage for the less skilled citizens of this country cannot simply be solved through legislation by means of a minimum wage standard of this type. Although we expect this legislation to pass the house and become law, and while we approve of the objectives it sets and the standards it lays out before us, on the other hand we must look beyond to the problem which is much greater than that. What must be ensured is that every citizen of this country in addition to his wages receives a fair share of the unearned income which is derived from the control of land, credit or capital as a result of the productive processes of the Canadian economy. What I am asking for is of course what we have been talking about in our party for a long time, and that is simply a policy that will obtain a fair market return for every citizen's share in the wealth of our country, whether it be in respect of the natural resources of our country, or in the development of the means of processing these resources. I believe that our working people recognize this fact. I believe our friends in the New Democratic party recognize this.

The traditional means of improving the lot of the working man through the pressure of the trade union movement and minimum wage legislation, of the kind about which we are talking, are reaching the extent of their usefulness. We must therefore look in a new direction to accomplish the revolutionary new world cybernation, because even automation does not adequately today express the progress that is being made and with which we are living at the present time.

I suggest, as I have just briefly indicated, the economic direction in which hope actually lies for the working man, which will bring to him a share of those earnings and profits that are derived from the land and capital, and the direction that must be followed so that in addition to the wages that he receives he will be able to receive that income which is necessary to give him a respectable standard of living.

There is no reason why this problem cannot be solved, but many of our newspapers and economists in Canada seem always anxious to criticize any answer to this problem. They infer that this is a problem which we cannot solve, so we should be willing to let it pass by until we are in the position of being forced to do something about it. Certainly with the tremendous wealth we have in our country, and with our past record of ingenuity and enterprise, the standard of living we can make available for every citizen in Canada is something greater than we at the present time, or that this minimum wage legislation, will provide.

Mr. Speaker, I would just like to say to the minister that I hope he will give the leadership necessary to this house, as he carries out the responsibilities of the minister of labour, so that we may work toward something which is beyond this legislation, accepting the fact that this is good in so far as it goes, but recognizing the fact that we must do something far greater than this if we are going to give a guarantee of a basic living standard to every working man in this country.

[Mr. Thompson.]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) introduced this legislation members of the opposition have been heaping praises on him. Up to now the minister has not been criticized, but I think that in spite of the fact that he is highly regarded by all members he certainly deserves such praise. I hope that, in the present case, they will not be short-lived.

Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-126 deals with several points designed to improve labour legislation in Canada and more especially with hours of work, minimum wage, annual vacations and holidays with pay in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

Personally, I feel that the legislation introduced by the Minister of Labour certainly augurs well for the future. That it is a good start. If legislation of this type is improved every year before long Canadian workers will enjoy better working conditions.

As to the 40-hour week for the workers, it seems to me that we have been hearing about it for years; as a matter of fact such talk must go back 35 or 40 years. In addition, over the past ten years already mention has even been made of the 36 or 32 hour week.

The minister proposes a minimum hourly wage of $1.25. A moment ago the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to a $1.50 hourly wage.

It must be considered, however, that 40 working hours a week, at $1.25 per hour, only adds up to $50 per week.

But $50 a week, taking into consideration the present standard of living in Canada, certainly is not very much.

Besides, if the father of a family who worked for ten or 12 years becomes unemployed he will receive an unemployment insurance benefit amounting to about $36 a week. And if he can find a part-time job, he is entitled to earn another $18, which is half the amount of the benefit he receives.

This means that by working part-time he may earn $18 a week for 20 working hours; if he already receives a benefit of $36, he will then get $54 a week, and this to work how long? About 20 hours, at an average of $2.50 an hour, while under this legislation with the 40-hour work week, at $1.25 an hour, a worker earns less money than an unemployed person might make. Not that I think the income of the unemployed is too high. Far from it, for everyone agrees that they do not get enough.

A minimum wage of $1.25 an hour is at least something; previously, there wasn't even a minimum salary. It was suggested that the minimum hourly wage should be $1.50, which would amount to $60 a week for a 40-hour week. I am convinced that at the present time, considering the cost of living, taxes, and all that is offered for purchase to the public, everyone agrees that a minimum hourly wage of $1.50 should be our aim in the immediate future.

Mr. Speaker, there is a question I should like to ask the Minister of Labour. Having read, at the beginning, to whom this bill applies, I should like the minister, if he has an opportunity to reply, to tell us whether the bill will also apply to people employed in winter works projects in the various municipalities. Such projects concern the federal government, inasmuch as it pays 50 per cent and, in many cases, 60 per cent of the salaries involved. Moreover, those projects are not meant for the benefit of one or two provinces alone but of Canada as a whole, since they are carried out all across the country.

Will such minimum wages and minimum 40 hours also apply to workers employed under the winter works program? The fact is that in many municipalities we have seen workers in such projects earning but a dollar or $1.05 an hour and who often were not working 40 hours.

Another point which I wish to raise, Mr. Speaker, is that a number of regulations quite often come under such legislation. This legislation must be enacted, but it would also be advisable, while taking care that it is strictly enforced, to see that a new bureaucratic system is not laid on employers throughout the country. It seems to me that it would be possible to have this legislation fully enforced without increasing the administrative costs of employers, such as reports or forms to be completed, inspections, etc.

Consequently, the legislation should be enforced without increasing government red tape which already bears heavily on the employer. On the other hand, Mr. Speaker, there is another point which is not mentioned in this bill and which I would like to discuss this evening, because lately we have witnessed several glaring infringements upon labour union freedom.

The purpose of Bill C-126 is to help workers engaged in certain fields, especially those directly connected with federal industries or related federal industries.

In my opinion it would be most important to include in the act a provision under which the government would see to it that crown companies or industries doing business with the government do not act in collusion to curtail the freedom of labour unions.

Take, for instance, the Canadian National Railways. There is in that company an international union which interferes with labour union freedom of a large number of its members. Members of the C.N.R. employees union are under the yoke of the regulations of their own union. When certain members of the union want to leave to join another labour union—as in the case of Montreal stevedores who wanted to quit the international stevedores union to join, as a group, the national labour federation—then the international union, in view of the contract entered into with the crown company—a company, therefore, coming under the government—has the right to suspend its employees. It is not the employer but the union that is doing it. Although labour unions put up a long fight to preserve labour union freedom stating that the workers had the right to join the union of their choice, today the unions themselves are imposing on their own members the very thing against which they have fought. It is not common to every labour union, but only to some of them, especially those directly connected with federal government industries, that is labour unions to which Bill C-126 applies.

This interference by labour union leaders with labour union freedom or with the freedom of an important group of workers does not occur in other industries at the present time but only in labour unions of crown companies, such as the C.N.R. in the province of Quebec.

I have already pointed out to the house and to the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines that the great majority of members of the international union of railway workers were anxious to leave that union in order to join the federation of national trade unions. But when the leaders of the international union realize that workers try to change their membership, even within the same union, then with the approval of the employers, that is, the crown company and the government, they have the right to suspend those union members who are no longer allowed to work for such and such crown company or government agency.

It is surprising that this only happens in government controlled companies or companies which deal directly with crown companies or the government, such as the C.N.R.

In my opinion the incidents which occurred recently in Montreal and those which repeat themselves every year at the C.N.R. should incite the Minister of Labour to include in Bill No. C-126 a provision concerning the freedom of an employee to select the union of his choice, whether he works for the federal government or a crown corporation such as the C.N.R.

It has been suggested that Bill No. C-126 should apply to longshoremen and employees of steamship lines, railways, canals, telegraph or any other transportation companies.

In the province of Quebec longshoremen are faced with a problem at present. Nearly all of them would like to change their union affiliation, but they would risk losing their jobs if they did so. This is taking place within companies which transact business directly with the federal government.

I believe that questions respecting this matter were asked of the minister in this house. He must have received a submission or a request for the protection of labourers or employees working for the government or for crown corporations.

It would be appropriate to include in Bill No. C-126 a section whereby union protection for government employees and workers, would be guaranteed, while leaving everyone free to choose his own union or organization. This is the basic claim of workers and labour unions and organizations in Canada and throughout the world. Today, if unions or union leaders working for the government or for the crown corporations act in this manner, with the blessing of the government we may foresee the day, not far distant, when those leaders of international unions will do the same in private enterprise. Then we will see the renewal of the same labour struggles that have occurred in the past. Labour had won its freedom to unionize with great difficulty. I think that before all else within federal undertakings we ought to leave to these workers the things they fought for during so many years, namely: the right to join the union of their choice and to enjoy union freedom.

I am talking more especially about the dockers and the Canadian National Railways employees in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that it would be rather easy for the minister to include a new clause concerning this matter.

It is all very well to deal with hours of work, minimum wages and what have you, but no mention is made of the protection of the worker employed by the government and of the freedom he ought to enjoy concerning labour union matters. This should be considered at the same time to eliminate what is happening now, and I refer to encroachments upon the rights of workers.

I should also like to refer to another point which might be of interest. We are dealing with nothing more than an embryo of a labour code in this Bill No. C-126 and, whether we like it or not, this is not a complete or comprehensive labour code as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out a while ago. It is but an embryo, the mere consolidation of certain points of the labour code, when what we should have is more complete labour legislation.

Another point could be included also in this embryo of a labour code. It would be the protection of crown corporations or government employees against decisions taken by some high officials.

It seems to me that the government worker, or the one employed by a crown corporation or an organization that deals with the government, who is not satisfied with a decision taken by certain high officials, should have the right of appeal to some organization, independent from the crown corporation or the department that employs him.

In this connection I would like to give an example. There are several such cases, at least within crown corporations or departments mentioned in Bill No. C-126.

I would like to quote the case of an individual who worked for the C.N.R. for a long time, some 30 years. Eleven years before his retirement he was appointed foreman, but three months before drawing his pension he was demoted and his pension reduced accordingly. Then, as he was not satisfied, he could only appeal to the officials of his company. That is precisely what happened in the case of a C.N.R. employee, a man from Jonquière who held a position of foreman or something like that for 11 years; three months before he reached the age of 65 at which time he was to retire, he was demoted to a less important position. Naturally his pension was reduced accordingly even though he had held a higher position for 11 years.

Such an employee can only appeal to his superiors, the very people who ruled against him in the first place. He cannot appeal to some independent body outside the crown corporation for which he works. In a case like that, the officials who took the original decision are not very likely to reconsider their ruling. The higher echelon of the administration is not interested in matters pertaining to lower employees and they let intermediate officials rule on the case. Consequently, the hapless C.N.R. employee can only appeal to those who have already decided against him. His rights are infringed upon and he does not even have the consolation of saying that his case has been judged by an independent or impartial body.

Under the circumstances, would the minister consider the possibility of including in his draft labour code a provision setting up a body which would be independent of all government departments and crown corporations and to which an employee could appeal if he is not satisfied with a decision taken by his employer? In addition, he could appeal to that organization without incurring substantial or excessive costs which, in many cases, prevent him from lodging such an appeal.

Therefore, it seems to me that a provision designed to set up an independent organization could be added to Bill No. C-126, so as to improve it while providing a further guarantee to federal civil servants and crown corporation employees. This would not entail any exceptional expenditures, but would contribute to provide workers and employees coming under Bill No. C-126 with an additional guarantee in this draft labour code.

There is another point I should like to deal with for a few minutes. Those mainly concerned are people employed by the federal government, crown corporations and agencies dealing with the federal government. This means that in those fields, at least in the majority of those fields—because there are some who are not in the three classes I have mentioned—the great majority of the employees affected by this bill are labourers or employees working directly or indirectly for the government since they work for a crown corporation. Then it is the federal government itself which has direct or indirect authority over those employees. This is what one may call the civil service. The state or the government might give some protection to this official; the protection to use the language of his own choice.

We often see this abnormal situation in some places like my riding of Lapointe, Jonquière, for instance, where there is a C.N.R. warehouse or a maintenance plant—now it does not happen so often as before, one must admit that there is an improvement, at least in Jonquière, and the labourers of Jonquière and the C.N.R. employees in that centre told me that there was much inprovement —but in other cities of the province of Quebec, and even also in several other places, there is not enough respect for the language of the labourer, so that if he wants to write to a high official to make certain recommendations or apply for a job which is vacant an employee of a higher grade left or retired, he has to do it on an English form and must write in English to his superior. Inevitably, this employee, working in an almost exclusively French Canadian environment, quite often in a repair factory, did not have the opportunity or the advantage of learning to speak English to the extent he would have wished. Therefore, it is all the more difficult for him to apply for a superior position where the knowledge of a language other than his own is necessary. For him, this is a considerable handicap.

My third suggestion to the minister—and it would not be difficult to include it in the bill—is that a clause should be added to this labour code to the effect that any government employee or any employee of a crown corporation could use the language he knows best in his relations with his superiors. I would like the minister to listen to this suggestion, because in my opinion he would find it important.

It seems, Mr. Speaker, that all too often when one makes suggestions to the minister during the discussion on the motion for second reading, other members sit beside him and attempt to speak to him or engage in a conversation with him. I do not know whether it is to claim benefits for their own constituencies, but, in any event, they are perhaps disturbing the minister, and it would do him a service to ask others to cease representations to the minister for political favours, so that he may listen to the suggestions we have to make to him.

The minister admitted a moment ago that it was difficult to combine the 40-hour week with the $1.25 minimum wage; maybe so, but in my opinion it would be timely to add a clause at the beginning of the labour code, in which it would be mentioned that an employee of a crown corporation or of the federal government, in his relations with his supervisors, would be entitled to speak to him in the language that is best known to him.

It seems to me that it would then be rendering them justice; it would be substituting or replacing something which exists at the present time and which is outdated, and should not exist, by something concrete.

All officials require that employees write to them in English rather than in the language with which the employee is more familiar. To let civil servants or crown corporation employees use one or the other of the official languages would be a protection and a guarantee of their rights and privileges, that is to be able to express themselves in the language which they know best.

I commend the minister for introducing this bill today. I am sending him a dozen roses and a bouquet of flowers, and I will send him another dozen roses and another bouquet of flowers if he wants to take into consideration the remarks we have just made in this connection, that is to try and protect the freedom of labour unions in crown corporations and in the various government departments and to set up an agency entirely free from crown corporations, or any department, to which a federal civil servant could appeal if he is not satisfied with a decision taken by a crown corporation or a department official. Employees will then be assured of impartiality and be protected against any linguistic discrimination which may exist.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-126 will require improvements and the same as Rome, which was not built in one day, the labour code will not be perfect in the space of one week.

If the Minister of Labour shows as much good will as he displayed in introducing Bill No. C-126, there is every reason to believe and to hope that before long Canada will have better labour legislation.

[Text]

Mr. G. C. Munro (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, I too would like to compliment the Minister of Labour and the government for introducing this legislation. I, like many of my colleagues on this side of the house, regard it as one of the principal features of the labour program that was drafted and put forward to the Canadian people by the Liberal party prior to the 1962-63 campaigns. So, to that degree when I see a government proposal coming before the house, a proposal on all fours with the principal features of its labour platform in two elections, it cannot help but afford considerable satisfaction.

I could not help but note that when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was speaking he referred to a time as far back as 1919 when dealing with various aspects of this measure. I hope the hon. member will forgive me when I ask him to realize that I am not so preoccupied with the past, but am more vitally concerned to see the proposals we advanced prior to the last two election campaigns being implemented in legislation. I am thoroughly satisfied that this is being done. In fact I was almost overcome by that hon. member's complimentary remarks, in many spots throughout his speech, in reference to this government. I noticed how mellow he was with respect to certain features of the bill; I am unaccustomed to hear him speak in this fashion. In fact I hope next time he comes down to Hamilton East he will talk in the same vein there.

[Mr. Grégoire.]

Mr. Knowles: Perhaps the hon. member would read the whole of my speech in Hamilton East.

Mr. Munro: As has been stated, this bill packages into one, five main elements that have been talked about for a long time. It provides for a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour, for a 40 hour week, for a limit of eight hours per day, for annual vacations of two weeks with pay and for seven statutory holidays. The annual vacation of two weeks is to be after one year's employment, and it also provides for overtime of eight hours on a 40-hour week. In fact it includes much of the suggested legislation put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others, and certainly embodies completely the points that were proposed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) when he spoke in Hamilton just prior to the 1963 election.

One of the fine things we can hope for from this legislation is that it will cause pressure to be exerted on provincial legislatures to adopt similar legislation which will in effect cover the whole labour force. One of the things which contributed to the interest taken by so many members of all parties in minimum wage legislation and other minimum standards was the well known scandal in the Toronto area, which occurred in the construction trades. After the investigation which was held with respect to it, everyone was convinced that many thousands of employees were being exploited to a most considerable degree. One of the principal recommendations of the inquiring commission was that a minimum labour standard of minimum wage be adopted by the provincial government, and if this present legislation contributes to introducing this type of measure across the board we shall see the end of that kind of exploitation.

In my own city of Hamilton it is not uncommon to find construction workers, in many cases working for non-union contractors, making far less than $1.25 an hour. This legislation will help all such areas where wages are less than $1.25 an hour. We sometimes forget there are many people in urban areas who do not get $1.25 an hour, and I hope this legislation will provide a stimulus to provincial legislatures to adopt similar measures.

Mr. Nielsen: Filibuster.

Mr. Munro: It is interesting to hear the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) call "filibuster". I have never heard an hon. member take up more time of the house on trivialities than he. One thing which has not been emphasized is the fact that this legislation provides minimum standards. Nobody on this side of the house pretends these standards should be the set standards, and that people should not get better standards. These are minimum standards and should be regarded as such.

Recently the United States has talked much about the question of poverty, and it seems to me that the discussion of poverty is just getting under way in Canada. One principal speech was made on it by the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) some months ago.

Mr. Nielsen: You have talked it out.

Mr. Munro: May I call it ten o'clock?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I inquire from the acting house leader what the business will be for the balance of the week?

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue with the second reading stage of the Canada Labour (Standards) Code. When that is completed we will take the committee stage, and if the house is agreeable, third reading. Then we will proceed with the balance of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, then the balance of the estimates of the Minister of Industry, namely the remainder of the Department of Defence Production and the votes for atomic energy and the national research council. Then we will take the balance of the estimates of the Department of Labour and start a new department, the Department of Veterans Affairs.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL PARKS—BANFF—MEETING WITH COUNCIL RESPECTING MOTEL CONSTRUCTION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I intend to make tonight on the late show are in relation to a question which I asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources with reference to our national parks, as recorded at page 8872 of Hansard for Thursday last, as follows:

> I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources concerning Banff. I will put my question in two parts. Is the minister prepared now to meet the elected council of Banff; and second, is he not well aware that one of our land developers of Alberta, namely Mayor Hawrelak, is the man behind the syndicate building this particular motel in that area which is zoned against this kind of development?

I have only seven minutes to deal with this question and that makes it difficult, but first I would like to refer to page 8021 of Hansard for Tuesday, September 15, where the minister was recorded as answering a question by the former minister of northern affairs, in reference to this very matter. He said this:

> Mr. Speaker, I will first of all disappoint the hon. member by telling him that I have no intention of resigning.

The Banff council, which is a democratic organization, elected by the people of Banff, have asked for the resignation of the minister on the grounds, first of all that he will not answer their letters, and second that he will not listen to any of the decisions they make. I would like to hear from the minister in that regard. He may have another side of the picture now, but this is exactly what his answer was:

> This is an advisory body. In the past we have thought that in these unorganized areas within our parks such bodies were good things.

Then he said:

> After the decision taken last evening—

Of course, that was asking for his resignation:

> —I am going to be more cautious about the advice—

And I do not blame him:

> —I accept from that particular body.
> Two of the reasons given for the action were that we were running contrary to the Oberlander report, and were running contrary to recommendations of the land use code. On checking into the matter I find that in the allocation of this particular property for a motel we are following the Oberlander report completely, and in addition we are following the advice of the body involved in respect of the zoning plans. So I cannot understand how they can be so ill-informed, that I shall be very careful about taking any advice from them in the future.

As I understand the minister's position, he has now agreed to meet this democratic organization; but he does not want to meet those people who made that suggestion—he will only meet part of the body. This is a ridiculous position to be in. I say to the minister that if he is going to meet this elected body, whether he likes them or not he should meet with them because they are an elected body in Banff. What is the problem? I mentioned the point about our great land developer and the syndicate. I refer to Mayor Hawrelak, mayor of Edmonton. There is no doubt about it, that because of relatives of his who are behind this particular man, he is behind the promotion in question.

What are they doing? They are agreeing, contrary to the recommendations of the interim development board and contrary to the advisory council, to build a motel in one of the best residential sections of Banff. I say this is contrary to the spirit of the National Parks Act, which is really to preserve the parks in their natural and national beauty. I put this to the minister first of all; I ask him to check tonight—and I am most serious about this—order in council No. 1,149 of 1956. I see the minister making a note of this. He will find this order in council most interesting. It zoned this area for residential purposes, or as a dual residential area, and is against the building of a motel or hotel in this area. This is one of the most beautiful spots in Banff national park; second, it is in the best residential area of those people who are serving the tourists. I say that the development in question is against the law and I would ask the minister to check into this question very carefully.

Mr. Nielsen: Wasn't Hawrelak going to be a cabinet minister?

Mr. Woolliams: He was, but Mr. Justice Porter, who has great vision and is one of the better members of the judiciary, unseated him in another capacity. But I do not want to be sidetracked. The minister, in approving this development, is in breach of the spirit of the National Parks Act and the Oberlander report. I ask the minister to look at pages 48 to 52 of the Oberlander report. He says that in fact this is not against the Oberlander report. First of all I would point out that it is against an order in council, and if there is a zoning bylaw contained in an order in council passed by the former Liberal government, I do not know how the minister can usurp that law.

I say that although there is a chart showing this area as a parking area and possibly a motel area, it is because there is a motel behind the area and it is not really zoned for motels. Page 48 of the Oberlander report recommends that this area be kept in its present state, in its beautiful residential state, but particularly in its beautiful state. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I say there is something behind this plan. I would not make this charge against the minister because I am not that kind of fellow, but the advisory council did suggest there is something bad in this connection, that something smells in the state of Denmark, or there is some patronage. I am not saying this to the minister, but I am saying that there is so much area in the townsite of Banff and so much area in the whole of the national park, which is as big as the province of Prince Edward Island, that they could build this motel in a place other than that approved by the minister, which is contrary to the recommendations of the interim development board. On the board are two of the top officials, Mr. Strong and Mr. Dempster. When you have had a submission from a democratic organization and from the people of Banff which is contrary to the law then there is something wrong.

I am not going to discuss tonight the elected body in Banff. They are a body which demanded your resignation, sir, because they said this was patronage and that there was a pay-off. I do not know about that but I do say, let us be reasonable. They are tearing down an old building in that particular spot now. Let us leave it in its natural state. There are lots of other areas in the townsite of Banff. Why can there not be a trade or a compromise where even this great land developer of ours can build? The last time he made half a million dollars out of a similar project.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member's time has expired.

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I think the question addressed to me by the hon. member is divided into two parts. The first is: Am I now prepared to meet the advisory committee? Under date October 9 I wrote them and I do not think I could do better than read at this time a portion of this letter:

> In my opinion the improvement to the Bow View Lodge site was entirely necessary to add to the range of accommodation available in the Banff townsite.
> Until this episode I have valued the advice of the Banff advisory council and my good relationship with its members. In national park development the advice of those whose income is derived from the parks is naturally to be valued. It is also necessary to take the advice of those who seek the enjoyment of the national parks as visitors and as part of the Canadian public. The balancing of these interests is never an easy task and it is made more difficult where conclusion drawing appears to be based on suspicion and supposition.
> It is a matter of the deepest regret to me that statements have been attributed to certain members of the council charging me or my officials with decisions motivated for reasons of patronage, or I believe the word used was "pay off". Such statements are absolutely untrue and beneath contempt. If the members of council have any doubt then I invite them to take the necessary legal proceedings to have the matter determined. In the alternative I request council to repudiate such allegations and any members of council responsible for them.
> I have always been willing to speak to or meet with the Banff advisory council or any of the members when meetings could reasonably be arranged. On Monday, October 5, you were approached by an official of my department in Banff with the advice that I would be prepared to meet the Banff advisory council during the afternoon of Saturday, October 24, in Calgary, at which day I would be visiting that city. I am advised that in reply you stated that the council would not be in a position to decide until October 19 whether it would meet with me. If this attitude of yourself is not correctly reported, then I would be obliged to have your statement.
> I am still prepared to see the members of the Banff advisory council in Calgary on the afternoon of October 24 but so far as I am concerned it will be the last meeting which I hold with the present or any future Banff advisory council until I have received their decision on my request from council concerning its collective responsibility for the statements alleging political patronage and "pay off" which I have mentioned.
> I trust that my position is now clear and I look forward to having your response in due course.

Mr. Woolliams: Would you answer the question, please?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Laing: Let me deal with the second question. The hon. member has suggested that Mayor Hawrelak of Edmonton is a participant in this project. I have no knowledge whether he is or is not. I would suggest to the hon. member that were he inquisitive enough he would probably have had a better opportunity than I to know. This lease was purchased in the days when he was supporting a government which sat on the treasury benches over here.

Mr. Woolliams: Has it not been assigned since? Let us be fair about it.

Mr. Laing: I know nothing of an assignment at all.

Mr. Woolliams: Then do not make statements like that if you do not know.

Mr. Laing: In respect of Mayor Hawrelak I would say this.

Mr. Woolliams: He will be in the cabinet soon, I know.

Mr. Laing: Mr. Speaker, I should like a little extra time in view of the interruptions.

I want to tell my hon. friend this. If an application were made to us for a building in Banff the determination would not be made by us depending on whether Mr. Hawrelak were an applicant or not. I was approached by Mr. Hawrelak last year, in association with a number of other gentlemen, in connection with a project in Banff which we turned down, and that is all I know about him in Banff. Whether he is associated with this project or not I do not know. I am not interested in the general attempt of my hon. friend to use the tar brush around the edges. Projects put before us will be dealt with on their merits and will have no relationship to the individuals who make application.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The minister's time has expired.

TRANSPORTATION—QUEBEC—PROPOSED REDUCTION IN C.P.R. TRAIN SERVICE

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Girouard (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for keeping you late tonight, but I believe that this matter is worthwhile.

On Friday last I asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I had a question for the Minister of Transport but, in his absence, I shall put it to the acting minister.
> Could the minister ask the board of transport commissioners to intervene without delay with the C.P.R. and have the company reconsider its decision to cut to three trains per week its service between Montreal and Mont Laurier and to operate fewer trains between Ottawa and Montreal, on the north shore of the Ottawa river, that is on the Quebec side?
> Such a change will be highly prejudicial to workers, students and business people in general.
> Second, could the minister not convince the government that it would be better to give a grant to the C.P.R., if necessary, so as not to imperil any further the economy of my riding which is already considered as a designated area?

Mr. Speaker asked that this question be put on the order paper.

Without criticizing the Speaker's decision, I must point out that if any question ever was urgent, this one is. Indeed, the C.P.R. intends to put its new service into effect within a fortnight.

If topics such as these do not seem as dramatic as international matters, the fact remains that we, members of parliament, were elected in a given riding, by certain electors and that we are the only political voice in parliament when such problems are raised which are of deep concern to the people.

There is no need of a one hour discussion to make the house aware of the facts.

In the case of the Ottawa-Montreal line, the C.P.R. had two round trips on the Quebec shore.

Hundreds of workers used to take those trains to their work and back. Hundreds of students used that transportation to travel either to the capital city or to the metropolis. Hundreds of businessmen and travellers also used those facilities.

I might add that the area which is most affected, the one extending from Buckingham to Lachute, is an area where, because of the magnificent lakes and forests, the tourist industry is highly developed.

But it so happens that the C.P.R. has just cut the number of its trains by half. Why? For reasons of economy, of course, despite all the evidence to the contrary.

The situation is even worse in Mont Laurier where the C.P.R. has cut down its trains from Montreal to three a week.

Mont Laurier, Mr. Chairman, is a tourist's paradise.

What kind of a policy is this which allows a private company, enjoying privileges almost equal to those of a crown corporation, to operate a system as long as it is a good paying proposition and to discontinue its services the moment it cannot make enough profits?

After all, the C.P.R. operates a public service, and the board of transport commissioners must immediately try to prevent a hopeless situation.

As I pointed out last Friday, half of my constituency is a designated area.

It is useless to speak about an economic recovery when the government knowingly allows the economy to deteriorate.

I have received letters, telegrams, telephone calls and resolutions from municipal councils. I know that my colleagues from Terrebonne (Mr. Cadieux) and from Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes (Mr. Drouin) have also received some. I know that the Minister of Transport is aware of those things. Then, what is the government waiting for to act quickly before it is too late?

I am calling for immediate action on behalf of my constituents and those of neighbouring ridings.

[Text]

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company notified the board of transport commissioners on September 21, 1964, of their intention to discontinue certain passenger train services effective October 25, 1964. Notices to this effect were posted in all railway stations served by the trains affected. The changes involve a reduction in the existing service between Ottawa and Montreal via the north shore and between Montreal and Mont Laurier. The changes do not involve the complete abandonment of passenger train service on either of the runs and consequently the railway company is under no obligation to secure the approval of the board of transport commissioners before making adjustments.

Because of the volume and substance of objections filed with the board with respect to the Ottawa-Montreal service, the railway company was directed by the board on October 9 to continue the existing service, pending a hearing to determine whether the operation of such trains should be continued or be allowed to be discontinued.

Up to the present time only one complaint has reached the board with respect to the Montreal-Mont Laurier service. The C.P.R. is being requested to file a submission by way of answer to this complaint and in the meantime no action has been taken to interfere with the proposed reduction of passenger train service on this latter run.

I might add that the representations made by the hon. member who has just spoken have also been drawn to the board's attention. Following investigation of complaints arising from the changes, the board has authority to ask the railway company concerned to continue the service or, if the service has been discontinued, to restore the service if such action is considered necessary in the public interest.

NATURAL RESOURCES—MAGAZINE ARTICLE ALLEGING PLUNDERING BY U.S. SPORTSMEN

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources the following question:

> Would the minister inform the house what action he has taken to deal with this latest and graphic example of the plundering of Canadian natural resources by our United States neighbours?

My question was based on an article that appeared in Maclean's magazine of October 17, which was brought to my attention by two or three people who are very interested in this subject, and as a person who has been a practising conservationist for over 50 years I said I would bring the matter to the attention of the minister. This article is rather disturbing. It is entitled: "How Wealthy Sportsmen Are Plundering Our Last Frontier". It goes on to say:

> Right now, Tree river is the hottest spot in North America for the spare no expense angler. It's also the most fiercely abused. As such, it's a shameful symbol of what we're allowing to happen to our fastest growing Arctic industry.

The article is very interesting indeed and I wish to quote a paragraph or two which particularly concerned the people who brought this matter to my attention. On page 40 of the magazine I read the following:

> Last June, Donald Snowden, then chief of northern affairs' industrial division, tried to rescue sport fishing in the territories from its own success. He called meetings in Edmonton, among camp operators, bush pilots and fisheries experts, to discuss conservation.

The article also contains these words:

> How soon will time run out for the char in the Tree river? The fisheries research board said last spring that, the way things were going up till then, there would be no more char in the Tree by the end of next summer. And an anonymous northern affairs official reported to his superiors that unless some order and some restraint were introduced to sport fishing throughout the territories, "We can expect a peak of frantic, competitive development passing from area to area and from lake to lake and from river to river with little left in its wake except abandoned buildings and campsites."

There are other paragraphs in this article in a similar vein. In any event, after reading it through very carefully, Mr. Speaker, I am of the opinion that this is a question that should receive the serious consideration of the minister. I ask him these two particular questions: I presume that as a result of my questions on Friday he has read the article and made some inquiries. My questions are, first, is this article substantially correct in its outline of the situation to which I have referred? If so, what action is the minister taking to protect our valuable fish resources in the north?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I have a copy of the article here. As my hon. friend has said, it starts on page 19 and goes over to page 38. I want to remind him that this is a fish story. As is the case with most fish stories, a certain amount of exaggeration is traditional and even permissible. Since we are endeavouring to develop the tourist business in the Northwest Territories, I am not too sad about it. The article relates to one small area, the Tree river which is a river flowing into the Great Bear lake, an area of about 11,000 square miles. Due to the means of transport by which fishermen can go in, the fishing camps are concentrated. One of the camps sustains 55 anglers at a time, so there is a tendency to fish out that particular area.

Dealing with the Tree area, I want to assure the hon. member that this was brought to my attention last January when I was in the United States. I picked up a very beautiful piece of literature showing a number of United States citizens holding up large fish they had obtained from Great Slave lake. Across the bottom of it was written, "We guarantee you 300 pounds of fish a day." I took this matter up with my officers at once. I am assured by them that most of the things that are written here are now past tense, because the operators themselves are fully conscious of what this would mean to them in the end. They have gotten together. In addition, the R.C.M.P. have decided to reduce the take of char out of the Tree river down to two tons for their dogs. They have been taking more than this. I can assure the hon. member, therefore, we are aware of the situation.

The control of the fishery is in the hands of the fisheries department. The R.C.M.P. and our wardens, in these very remote areas are in control of the management of the resources. The article relates to one or two very localized areas. We think and hope there are many fishing areas on Great Bear lake and we look toward a tremendous increase in tourism in that area. I can assure my hon. friend that the article is a little bit overdone, but from our point of view probably designed to attract a large number of visitors next year. A number of Canadians of course are going in. This is expensive fishing. I believe it costs $760 or $900 round trip from Edmonton, with seven days of fishing. We are trying to develop this. The operators themselves of course realize that if this is going to be a permanent industry, the fish must be sustained. I can assure him our officers, the R.C.M.P. and the operators themselves are all conscious of the situation, and very largely the matters related in the article are in the past tense and are under control.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.26 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 14, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. DIEFENBAKER—PROPOSED ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY FOLLOWING ROYAL VISIT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege affecting the rights and prerogatives of parliament. It has to do with the visit, which concluded yesterday, of Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II to her Canadian realm.

As hon. members know, as Queen of Canada she is an integral part of parliament. Misinterpretations have arisen as the result of untoward events which took place during the course of that visit. Some of these events have produced a strong reaction among her Canadian subjects as a whole. Furthermore, the image of Canada in the commonwealth and abroad could be seriously impaired unless this house and the other place were to speak out with the authority of parliament.

I believe that the time has come for the parliamentary representatives to speak for Canada and the Canadian people. The only way in which the views of Canadians can be expressed is through parliament. Instead of approaching this matter in an acrimonious manner I raise it as the leader of Her Majesty's loyal opposition, and I hope to have the support of the house for the suggestion I am about to make.

The Prime Minister is absent today on official duties. If that were not so I would ask that the suggestion I am about to make be brought before the house today. However, that being impossible, as it would constitute a discourtesy to him, which I am not desirous of bringing about, I suggest that tomorrow the Prime Minister have placed before both houses of parliament an humble address to convey to Her Majesty, the Queen of Canada, the appreciation of the Canadian people for her visit, and to assure her of the deep loyalty, affection, love and devotion of all Canadians to her and the throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank my right hon. friend for noting the fact that the Prime Minister is engaged in the closing session of the conference with the provinces and on that account is not able to be in his seat today. My right hon. friend may be assured at once, notwithstanding the necessary absence of the Prime Minister, that it would be his strongest wish that both houses of parliament take the particular suggestion made as yet another way of indicating, what is clearly an established fact, the loyalty of this parliament and this nation to Her Majesty the Queen.

On October 13 Her Majesty the Queen sent the following message to His Excellency the Governor General:

> Please convey my warm thanks and those of my husband to the Prime Minister, government and people of Canada for the kind and loyal welcome which they have given us.
> We are both very glad to have been able to be with you at the time when you are commemorating the first meetings of the Fathers of Confederation and I send you my deep and sincere congratulations on all that has been achieved since those days, together with my heartfelt prayers and good wishes for the continued happiness and prosperity of all who dwell in this great country.
> In thanking M^me^ Vanier and yourself for your gracious hospitality in the capital I would ask you also to express our sincere appreciation to all those whose skill and care contributed to the admirable arrangements which were made for all parts of our program.
> Elizabeth R.

The Governor General replied to Her Majesty in these terms:

> On behalf of the Canadian people, I wish to express warmest thanks for Your Majesty's gracious message which has been conveyed to the Prime Minister, the government and the people of Canada. It is deeply appreciated by all.
> The presence of Your Majesty and of His Royal Highness amongst us has strengthened our admiration and affection for, and pride in, our sovereign.
> The kind words concerning my wife and me and all those associated with the arrangements for Your Majesty's stay are greatly prized.
> Georges P. Vanier

The Prime Minister thought it desirable, in addition to these memorable messages, to send one to Right Hon. Sir Michael Adeane, G.C.V.O., K.C.B., private secretary to the Queen, London, England, on October 13, 1964, in these terms:

> I would be grateful if you would convey this message to Her Majesty the Queen. "As Your Majesty returns to Britain I send you the affectionate thanks of the Canadian government for your gracious visit. May God bless Your Majesty, your husband and your children."

Sincerely
Lester B. Pearson
Prime Minister of Canada

Her Majesty the Queen graciously replied in these terms:

Buckingham Palace,
London.

The Prime Minister,
Ottawa.

I was delighted to receive your kind message. Please convey my heartfelt thanks to your colleagues in the Canadian government for their loyal good wishes.

Elizabeth R.

In putting these telegrams on our records, Mr. Speaker, I am sure I echo what all of us in parliament feel, and what Canadians generally feel, when I say with sincerity, pride and conviction "God Save the Queen".

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. D. M. Fisher (Port Arthur): It is unclear, Mr. Speaker, from the very dignified response given by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whether the government is going to take up the humble address suggested by the Leader of the Opposition. However, I should like to express, for our party, our willingness to support such an address, and also to express our appreciation for the sentiments that were read to us as expressed by the Prime Minister and other representatives of this country.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I just wish to support the proposal that has been made by the Leader of the Opposition, and to express our gratitude to the Governor General and the Prime Minister for the messages that have already been sent and for the gracious words that have been received from Her Majesty the Queen.

I believe it would be very appropriate for this house to express our appreciation for the presence of our Queen over this past week. Unfortunately it seems as if there is a certain element in Canada that would use her visit to further divide our country, and to question at this time the advisability of whether she should have come here. I think all of us in this house appreciate in a particular way what she has done as our Queen, in being in our midst, and the tremendous influence for good that her presence has been; the wise words she has spoken and the very gracious and humane attitude she has maintained toward our citizens.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

It would support the general feeling, I believe, of the Canadian people and certainly fulfil our responsibilities in this house if, in addition to those messages that have been sent, a direct message were sent to Her Majesty from this house. Therefore I commend the Leader of the Opposition for having brought forward this suggestion at this time. We give him our complete support in it and urge the government to take the action suggested.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, Her Majesty the Queen of Canada came to visit us. We saw her, of course, and she has left.

I trust that despite a certain amount of nervous tension in Quebec she will have appreciated the splendid receptions given in her honour.

As I am from Quebec I should like to draw attention to the logical comments she made before the legislature of our province, and I quote:

The dialogue remains open and it will tend to unite men of goodwill. True patriotism does not exclude understanding the patriotism of others.

This means that our French Canadian or Quebec patriotism must not blind us to the point where we no longer recognize the rights and the reasons of each and everyone.

Her Majesty being the guest of the Quebec government, no one had the right to insult her, even under the guise of separatism. The freedom or licence demanded by some of our fellow citizens would surely be the last things they would grant to others if the were in power. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is the Quebec government which holds power in our province. If the people are not satisfied with it they will change it without resorting to anarchy, blackmail, threats or bloody revolution.

The visits of Her Majesty to Canada never shamed any Canadian. On the contrary, when I heard her speak to all Canadians in perfect French, on Saturday morning, I felt sure she was a great comfort to most French Canadians in Quebec.

The night before last Their Excellencies the Governor General and Mrs. Vanier were hosts at a dinner which I attended since I had been invited. Thanks to the graciousness of Mrs. Vanier, I had the chance to speak with Her Majesty in French. That convinced me that our Queen was right when she stated in Quebec city, last Saturday:

A dynamic state must not be afraid of revising its political philosophy. There is nothing surprising about the fact that a protocol set up a century ago no longer meets all the problems of today.

Mr. Speaker, who would dare hold the Queen responsible for the inertia of many Canadians of various origins? Her Majesty is, for us, the symbol of a way of life which enabled us to grow by our own means and according to our own wishes. There is much to be done and we are free to act. It is neither the empire nor royalty which prevent the Canadian people from achieving security with freedom for each and every one of our fellow citizens. Let us not hold others responsible for what we have had neither the courage nor the decency to do. Let us assume our responsibilities, and, above all else, let us find the necessary solutions to the problems which arise everywhere. If it be true that unity is strength, it is time for us to achieve it in mutual respect.

And we French Canadians of the province of Quebec have undeniable right, but in addition to those rights which we claim, we also have duties to fulfil toward ourselves and toward others. It is not in anarchy that we will succeed, but in mutual trust and understanding.

Those were, Mr. Speaker, the few ideas I wanted to express at the close of a royal visit which, I believe, will serve to let reason enter in circles where everything seems so confused.

I give my unqualified support to the suggestion made by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he said that the incidents which occurred in certain places must never be allowed to happen again anywhere in Canada, our country which we should all love as much as we can.

[Text]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, after these various declarations I simply want to state that a resolution of the kind proposed to which we can all readily extend our strongest support, will be prepared. I think it should be proposed by the Prime Minister, supported of course by the Leader of the Opposition and the house. A resolution in these terms, expressing our loyalty and our gratitude to Her Majesty the Queen, will be the first order of business tomorrow.

MR. HAYS—CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENTS RESPECTING TURKEY IMPORTS

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I wish to raise a question of personal privilege. Yesterday the hon. member for Wellington South suggested that I had misled the house in certain statements I made about the turkey situation. I replied at the time that I had no intention of misleading the house about any situation, and I would like to repeat that today. But since on reviewing the statements the hon. member referred to there does seem to be some grounds for misunderstanding, I should like to place on record the complete situation so that perhaps this matter can be cleared up to everyone's satisfaction.

On September 10, in reply to a question by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale, I stated as recorded on page 7826 of Hansard:

> In the last two weeks there have been no importations of turkeys from the United States.

This was based on the information available to me on that day. But as hon. members may realize by now, the turkey picture can change pretty fast, and I now find that later information indicated the original information was partly in error. My department publishes a weekly poultry market report. This report is issued every Friday and contains information up to the Saturday of the previous week. Since September 10 was a Thursday, the information on imports available at that time covered the weeks ending August 29 and August 22.

For these two weeks there were no imports of eviscerated turkeys. Up to that time it had not been the practice to report live turkey imports, because until the first of this year essentially the only live turkeys coming into Canada were poults to be raised by our own producers. But at about that time officials of my department were reviewing customs import records and it was determined that in fact during the week ending August 22, 12,474 pounds of live turkeys, on an eviscerated weight basis, had come into Canada. In the same way it was determined that a total of 22,800 pounds of live turkeys were imported for the week ending August 29.

Thus my statement of September 10, while true as far as eviscerated turkeys were concerned and as far as the information available to me that day was concerned, was in error in respect to imports of live birds. I apologize to the house for this error which, as I have pointed out, arose from the fact that my department's system of recording turkey imports was being revised.

In the interests of precision I should like to refer briefly to one other statement I made on the turkey question. Yesterday, speaking from memory, I said I had written three letters to the Canadian turkey federation. I now find that two of these, one dated September 23 and the other October 2, were to the secretary manager of the federation. The third, dated October 9, was to the federation president.

In a telegram and two letters I have now received from Canadian turkey federation representatives a question was raised as to the current level of protection on live turkeys in relation to protection on the eviscerated product. This question is now under consideration by the government in the light of Canada's vital interest in maintaining as unhampered access as possible to existing and potential markets beyond our borders, and in the light of our obligations under the GATT. When a decision has been reached it will be announced later in the usual way.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Eric A. Winkler (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question I should like to direct to the Minister of Agriculture in regard to the statement he made on motions. I should like to ask the minister whether he has received a letter from the Canadian turkey federation dated October 8, 1964 and, if so, would he table it?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): I will be glad to look into this, Mr. Speaker.

QUESTIONS

MARINE INDUSTRIES LTD.—GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS

Question No. 1,810—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Is Marine Industries Limited being retained by the federal government to purchase vessels for the government outside of Canada and, if so, what are the names and addresses of the individuals comprising the board of directors of Marine Industries Limited, Sorel, Quebec?
2. What is the total amount of contracts awarded this firm by the federal government in the fiscal year 1963-64 and to date for the fiscal year 1964-65?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. No.

2. In so far as the Department of Transport is concerned: (a) fiscal year 1963-64, $1,665,-381.32; (b) fiscal year 1964-65, from April 1, 1964 to August 31, 1964, $14,360,050.82.

In so far as the Department of Public Works is concerned:

While there have been no contracts for purchase of vessels the following contracts for dredging have been awarded to Marine Industries Ltd.

1963-64 dredging, Nicolet River, P.Q., $10,-672.74, completed; 1963-64 dredging, Sorel, P.Q., $22,374.24, completed, 1964-65 dredging, Ste Angele de Laval, P.Q., $27,320.

In so far as the Department of Defence Production is concerned:

The total amount of contracts awarded by the Department of Defence Production was $610,726.49 in 1963-64 and $2,341 in the 1964-65 fiscal year to date.

CONTENTS OF BOX IN R.C.M.P. CAR

Question No. 1,827—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Did three men using a green sedan owned by the R.C.M.P. bearing licence number 722-41-2, carry a metal container into 50 Walton street, Toronto on June 23, 1964 and, if so, what was contained in the box?
2. Were the contents of the box for the purpose of recording or listening to telephone conversations?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): With reference to part 1 of question 1,827, I would like to state that in answer to question 1,494, item 2, asked by Mr. Orlikow on July 13, Mr. Macdonald, my parliamentary assistant, answered on August 26 last and stated that the duties of the R.C.M.P. on the date of June 23 to which he refers, were of a confidential nature and which is not in the public interest to disclose, and my answer to the present question must be the same as the one referred to above.

In answer to the second part of question 1,827 by Mr. Orlikow, the three men did not carry any equipment designed or intended for recording or listening to telephone conversations.

STUDY OF EFFECTS OF INDUSTRIAL NOISE

Question No. 1,841—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. Is the government conducting or supporting research into the effects on humans of industrial noise and, if so, at which institutions and under whose direction is such research being conducted?
2. What is the specific object of each study presently under way?
3. What is the annual cost to the government of such research?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): 1. Under the national health grants program the Department of National Health and Welfare is providing approximately $10,500 this year in support of research into perceptive deafness at the hard of hearing and vestibular clinic, St. Michael's hospital, Toronto, under the direction of Dr. J. A. Sullivan.

2. To study the cures of perceptive deafness and various testing methods.

3. See answer 1 above.

DO NOT SHIP LIST—CARMEL DEGUIRE

Question No. 1,859—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions acknowledged the presence of the name of Mr. Carmel Deguire on the do not ship list filed with the Norris commission (exhibit O-269).

2. Did the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions approve of the recommendation of the maritime appeals board that Mr. Deguire's application for reinstatement in the S.I.U. be rejected on the grounds that there was no record with the board of trustees that Mr. Deguire was a member of the S.I.U. and was not on the do not ship list to the knowledge of the S.I.U. and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1. The board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions acknowledges the presence of the name Camille Deguire on exhibit O-269 filed with the Norris commission, which exhibit bears date of 28 day of August, 1950. This may be the same person referred to as Carmel Deguire.

2. No. The board of trustees does not in any way approve or disapprove of the rulings of the maritime appeals board, which is an independent arbitral tribunal, and it would therefore be improper for the board of trustees to interfere. Upon inquiring, the board of trustees was advised by the maritime appeals board that no person named Deguire had applied to have his case heard before the maritime appeals board.

DO NOT SHIP LIST—KEN LEWIS

Question No. 1,860—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Has the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions acknowledged the presence of the name of Ken Lewis on the do not ship list filed with the Norris commission (exhibit O-269).

2. Did the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions approve of the recommendation of the maritime appeals board that Mr. Lewis' application for reinstatement in the S.I.U. be rejected on the grounds that there was no record with the board of trustees that Mr. Lewis was a member of the S.I.U. and was not on the do not ship list to the knowledge of the S.I.U. and, if so, for what reasons?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1. The board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions acknowledges the presence of the name Ken Lewis on exhibit O-269 filed with the Norris commission, which exhibit bears date the 28th day of August, 1950.

2. No. The board of trustees does not in any way approve or disapprove of the rulings of the maritime appeals board, which is an independent arbitral tribunal, and it would therefore be improper for the board of trustees to interfere. Upon inquiring, the board of trustees was advised by the maritime appeals board that no person named Ken Lewis had applied to have his case heard by the maritime appeals board.

EVIDENCE OF MEMBERSHIP IN S.I.U.

Question No. 1,861—Mr. Orlikow:

1. Does the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions consider the do not ship list filed with the Norris commission and attested to as correct by Mr. Hal Banks sufficient evidence of membership of persons mentioned therein in the S.I.U.?

2. Has the board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions accepted the report of the maritime appeals board which appeared in the August 14, 1964 issue of the Canadian Sailor which rejects the appeals of Max Anderson, Armand Clermont and John McNeill on the grounds that they could not produce evidence of former membership in the S.I.U. and, if so, for what reason?

3. Which officer or officers of the S.I.U. rule on past membership in the S.I.U. of Canada?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): 1. The board of trustees does not advise the maritime appeals board on questions of evidence, but the board of trustees is of the opinion that the presence of a specific name on a list described as a do not ship list would probably not by itself be sufficient evidence of past membership in the S.I.U. However, each case must depend on its own facts.

2. The board of trustees of the maritime transportation unions neithers accepts nor rejects reports of the maritime appeals board, has no jurisdiction to do so, and has not done so in the cases cited.

3. This is a matter of internal management within the union, subject to appeal to the maritime appeals board and the courts.

MAIL SERVICE, R.R. NO. 2, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 1,865—Mr. Coates:

Have complaints been received from the patrons of R.R. No. 2, Amherst, N.S., and R.R. No. 1, Tidnish, N.S., with regard to the delays that will be occasioned with outgoing mail as a result of the change in the starting point of R.R. No. 2, Amherst, and, if so, how many?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): A petition bearing 102 names has been received protesting against a change in Amherst rural route No. 2. There is no record of any complaints from the patrons of Tidnish post office or Tidnish rural route No. 1. However, Tidnish is served as a way office on Amherst R.R. No. 2.

In recent years with the increasing traffic density, the Post Office Department has followed the policy of having rural routes commence from and finish at the distributing post office and having the rural mail boxes erected on the right-hand side of the road according to the courier's line of travel. This policy permits the courier to collect the outgoing mail at the same time as he delivers the incoming mail. It eliminates the necessity of crossing the highway in the path of traffic to reach mail boxes on the other side of the road. It permits the courier to deposit any mail that could not be delivered, such as parcels, registers and C.O.D. items, at the post office on the completion of his trip.

Where routes start at the outer end, the courier has to stop at the boxes on the inward trip to collect mail and again on the outward trip to deliver mail. In order to collect mail on his way to the post office, he has to cross traffic to the opposite side of the road. On completion of his trip at the outer end, he is responsible for the safekeeping of any undelivered mail at his residence.

Amherst R.R. No. 2 is one that has operated with the outer end as the starting point. Steps therefore were taken to advertise this mail service with the distributing post office as the starting point in order to reduce traffic hazards and gain the operational advantages mentioned above. This is the policy for all routes which do not start from the post office. According to the studies that have been made, a change in the starting point on Amherst R.R. No. 2 will have very little effect on mail originating on the rural route for delivery elsewhere in the country.

*COMMUNICATIONS SUPPORTING FLAG PLEBISCITE OR RED ENSIGN

Question No. 1,875—Mr. Coates:

What is the total number of names attached to letters, telegrams and other types of communications received by all departments of government, including the Prime Minister's office, urging the calling of a national plebiscite on the flag question, or the retention of the Canadian red ensign as Canada's national flag?

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): The answer to this question is 176,543.

SURVEILLANCE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,890—Mr. Orlikow:

1. When did the Post Office Department reach the decision to establish peepholes through which postal employees could be observed while working?

2. When did the Post Office Department reach the decision to establish peepholes through which postal employees could be observed while in washrooms?

3. What were the reasons for these decisions?

4. Were the postal employees' organizations consulted before the decision to implement these policies were decided upon and, if so, did the employees' organizations approve.

5. Were any alternative methods considered by the department to this method of observing employees and, if so, what were these methods and why were they rejected?

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General):

1. Original records are no longer available but buildings constructed prior to 1900 had observation galleries installed in them.

2. Original records are no longer available but observation of washrooms was provided whenever architecturally practicable. One building constructed more than 40 years ago and still in use provides observation of men's washrooms.

3. To enable post office investigators to place responsibility for theft or depredation of items of mail.

4. It is not known what employee associations, if any, were in existence at the time observation galleries were first introduced, or if they were in existence whether they were consulted and, if consulted, whether they approved. In recent years, however, the department has exchanged views with the national postal employee associations and they have indicated the acceptance of the use of the observation facilities for investigational purposes in the case of theft or other depredations of mail.

5. Yes. One installation of closed circuit television still in use.

RESEARCH INTO ALCOHOLISM DEATHS

Question No. 1,912—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

Is the government conducting or supporting research into the causes of the steady increase in the rate of deaths from alcoholism?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Federal support is available from the Department of National Health and Welfare to the provinces under the terms of the national health grants for research into the causes of alcoholism.

To this date in 1964-65, one project dealing with research on alcoholism has received approval in an amount of $10,180.

PENITENTIARY LAND PURCHASE, ST. PIE DE BAGOT

Question No. 1,915—Mr. Rondeau:

1. What amount was paid for the purchase of the land which was to be used for the construction of a penitentiary at St. Pie de Bagot?

2. What are the dimensions of the land?

3. What is the amount of its municipal assessment?

4. What was the amount of municipal taxes paid on the land before it was purchased?

5. What was the amount of the professional fees paid in connection with the purchase of the land?
6. To whom were the fees paid?
7. What does the government intend to do with the land?
8. For what reasons was the project abandoned?

[Translation]

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State of Canada): 1. $83,000.

2. 2,277.46 feet frontage on Grand St. François to a depth of 5,718.79 feet.

3. $16,100.

4. For the year 1962 the amount of $346.15 was paid.

5. Professional fees paid in connection with the purchase of this land amount to:

(a) Survey	$1,650.00
(b) Appraisal	1,161.10
(c) Legal	716.00
(d) Soil Test Borings	1,920.00
	$5,447.10

6. The professional fees were paid to: (a) G. Girard, Q.L.S.; (b) J. H. Sullivan, S.I.R., C.R.E. (Veterans Land Act); (c) André Dumont, Notary; (d) Warnock-Hersey, Engineers.

7. The government intends to use this land for the construction of a penal institution of medium security when such an institution is required in the province of Quebec.

8. The project of constructing a medium security institution at St. Pie de Bagot was placed in abeyance as a result of the incident at the St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary in June 1962. This disturbance indicated the need for a new maximum security institution for which the site at St. Pie de Bagot was not considered as suitable.

INCOME TAX PAID BY PERSONS OVER 70

Question No. 1,919—Mr. Winkler:

1. How many Canadians 70 years of age and over paid income tax in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1963?
2. What was the total amount of money paid in income tax by the people in this age category in the same year?
3. How many people in this category received a return on the tax paid in the same year?
4. What is the percentage of the money received in tax from Canadians in this category to the total amount of money paid in old age security to all Canadians over age 70?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): Records are not maintained on the basis of fiscal years, therefore figures cannot be provided for the year ending March 31, 1963. The statistics used in answering this question represent those pertaining to 1963 income tax returns filed up to the present time.

1. Filers age 70 or over 147,116.

2. Total tax paid by above, $79,078,467.66.

3. Number of above receiving refunds, 27,894.

4. 10.7 per cent.

STUDY OF HIGHWAY COST RESPONSIBILITIES

Question No. 1,930—Mr. Mather:

1. Has the government received from representatives of the mayors and municipalities of Canada a request for a joint federal-provincial-municipal study of highway cost responsibilities as these affect urban areas?
2. Is the government agreeable to such a project?

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. No such request has been received. However, the submission presented to the government on September 14, 1964, by representatives of the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities contained a section on urban transportation. This section, together with the other recommendations included in the federation's submission, are now being studied by the government.

2. Answered by No. 1.

PESTICIDES USED IN FRUIT GROWING

Question No. 1,952—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. What pesticides, herbicides, or other agricultural chemicals are being used in connection with fruit-growing in the Niagara peninsula?
2. Is the government conducting or supporting research into the persistence of these chemicals on the fruit, or in orchard soil and, if so, at which institutions, and under whose direction is such research being conducted?
3. What is the annual cost to the government of such research?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): 1. All the pesticides listed hereunder are registered for use on pests occurring on crops in the Niagara peninsula. However, all these chemicals may not be in general use:

(a) Insecticides and acaricides: azinphos-methyl (Guthion), carbaryl (Sevin), chlorbenzide (Mitox, DDD (TDE), DDT, demeton (Systox), diazinon, dieldrin, dimethoate (Cygon, Rogor), dinoseb (DN-289), DNOC (Elgetol, dormant oil, endosulfan (Thiodan), ethion, Genite, Kelthane, lead arsenate, malathion, methoxychlor, Morestan, ovex, parathion, mevinphos, (Phosdrin), nicotine sulphate, phosphamidon, rotenone, summer oil, tetradifon (Tedion), TEPP and carbophenothion (Trithion).

Questions

(b) Fungicides: Bordeaux mixture, captan, cycloheximide (Acti-dione, dichlone (Phygon XL), dinocap (Karathane), dodine (Cyprex), ferbam, fixed copper, folpet (Phaltan, glyodin (Crag), lime sulphur, mercury, sulphur, thiram and zineb.

(c) Herbicides: Amine Dinitro, amitrole (aminotriazole), ammonium sulphamate (Ammate-x), CIPC, dalapon, Disul-sodium (Sesone), diuron (Karmax), liquid cyanamid, paraquat (Gramoxone), silvex, simazine and 2,4-D amine.

2 and 3. Yes. Research on the persistence of insecticides, fungicides and herbicides in soils and plants, including fruit, is being conducted at a number of the department's research branch establishments across Canada. (See answer to question No. 1,801). The results of a number of these projects undertaken at these locations are applicable to problems found in the production of fruit in the Niagara peninsula area. The work is carried out at establishments located at Kentville, N.S., Fredericton, N.B., Ottawa, Ontario, Chatham, Ontario, London, Ontario and Summerland, B.C. under the general direction of the director general, research branch, and under the immediate direction of the officers in charge at these locations at an estimated annual direct cost of $236,000.

Planning of a new research laboratory to be located at Vineland is under way and research will be conducted into the problems referred to, as they relate to areas across Canada, and to the Niagara peninsula specifically.

*GREAT LAKES BROADCASTING CO.

Question No. 1,955—Mr. Rynard:

1. Who are the officers and directors of the Great Lakes Broadcasting Company?
2. In shares, what is the capitalization of the company?
3. Is majority control held by the said officers and directors?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. Messrs. C. L. Chambers, D. G. Campbell, D. G. Hildebrand and D. F. Hunter.

2. Authorized capital of company is $100.

3. The Department of Transport has always treated as confidential the information concerning shareholders.

ALLOCATION OF MONEYS, ATLANTIC DEVELOPMENT BOARD

Question No. 1,956—Mr. Coates:

1. How much of the moneys allocated to the Atlantic development board have been committed by that board to date?

[Mr. Hays.]

2. Of the money committed, how much has been made available to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): I am advised by the Atlantic development board as follows:

1. The amount of moneys committed by the board from the Atlantic development fund is $71,565,000, of which $20,000,000 has been earmarked by the board to assist the province of Nova Scotia in industrial development.

2. The amount allocated to Nova Scotia is $23,565,000 of which $20,000,000 has been earmarked by the board to assist the province in industrial development.

The amount allocated to New Brunswick is $23,125,000.

The amount allocated to Prince Edward Island is $1,875,000.

The amount allocated to Newfoundland is $23,000,000.

ESCAPES OF INMATES, STONY MOUNTAIN PENITENTIARY

Question No. 1,957—Mr. Slogan:

1. How many inmates in Stony Mountain penitentiary have escaped from the institution in the past year?
2. Is the Department of Justice strengthening precautions against inmates escaping?

Mr. D. S. Macdonald (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): 1. Four.

2. The security measures to prevent escapes are commensurate with the security needs of the inmates detained there and vary with each type of penal institution.

Such measures are continually under review to improve security and, at the same time, to provide conditions favourable to the development of the rehabilitation potential of each inmate.

USE OF LASER BEAM IN RADAR SYSTEM

Question No. 1,991—Mr. Mather:

Is consideration being given by Air Canada to developing a radar system with a pulsating laser beam to detect air turbulence in a clear sky?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The management of Trans-Canada Air Lines advise as follows: Air Canada is keeping a close watch on all industry wide research and development projects which are under way with regard to clear air turbulence, its source and surrounding conditions. The laser beam is just one of the many avenues of research in this field.

SUGGESTED REDUCTION IN RAIL SERVICE, SAINT JOHN-MONCTON, N.B.

Question No. 1,995—Mr. Bell:

1. Has a proposal or suggestion to stop the railiner between Saint John and Moncton at Coldbrook, N.B. been considered by the Canadian National Railways and, if so, what was the decision?
2. What was the basis for such a decision?
3. Did the company take into consideration that there is a large housing area of over two thousand people located around Coldbrook?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows: 1, 2 and 3. No proposal or suggestion to stop railiner at Coldbrook has been received or considered.

CONSTRUCTION OF WHARF FACILITIES, ESKASONI INDIAN RESERVE

Question No. 1,998—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Is any consideration being given to the construction of wharf facilities at the Eskasoni Indian reserve to expedite the shipment of pulpwood from that area?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): During the last 20 years, only two cargoes of pulpwood have been shipped from the Eskasoni reserve. However, the present pulpwood operation is being reviewed to determine whether or not wharf facilities are required.

C.N.R. FREIGHT TO NEWFOUNDLAND THROUGH MULGRAVE, N.S.

Question No. 1,999—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

Since November 1, 1963, until the present date, what has been the total tonnage of freight shipped by the Canadian National Railway to Newfoundland through the port of Mulgrave, N.S.?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): The management of the Canadian National Railways advise as follows: 33,368 tons.

EXTENSION OF WATER FACILITIES, ESKASONI INDIAN RESERVE

Question No. 2,000—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

What provisions are being made for further extension of the domestic water facilities at the Eskasoni Indian reserve and for the installation of hydrants for fire protection?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Since April 1, 1964, a total of $3,500 has been provided to extend water facilities to various Indian houses on the Eskasoni reserve. The department also plans to purchase materials later this year to further improve the water services to reserve residents.

Plans to install fire hydrants on the reserve are well advanced and it is hoped that the work can be commenced in the near future.

FEDERAL AID TO MOUNT HOPE AIRPORT

Question No. 2,002—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. Have federal funds been made available for the development of Mount Hope airport in Hamilton and, if so, on what date were they made available?
2. How much has been given and for what specific purpose or purposes?

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): 1 and 2. No action has as yet been taken on this matter pending decision from the city of Hamilton as to whether they are prepared to assume responsibility for the continued operation of the airport.

J.B. RUDNYCKYI—VISIT TO SWITZERLAND AND ITALY

Question No. 2,003—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Is Mr. J. B. Rudnyckyi a member of the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism and, if so (a) what was the purpose of his visit to Switzerland and northern Italy this summer (b) was the visit sponsored by the bilingualism and biculturalism commission (c) did he submit a report on bilingual and bicultural matters in Europe (d) was he assigned to bilingual and bicultural research in Europe following the return to question No. 1,464 brought down in the house on July 9, 1964?
2. How many researchers, other than Dr. Jacques Brazeau and Mr. Rudnyckyi, are now engaged in research in Europe on behalf of the bilingualism and biculturalism commission and, (a) what are their terms of reference and remuneration (b) what are their names?

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): 1. Mr. J. B. Rudnyckyi is a commissioner appointed to the royal commission on bilingualism and biculturalism. (a) Professional business related to his academic interests; (b) no; (c) yes; (d) no.

2. None other than Dr. Jacques Brazeau as reported in the return to question No. 1,464.

SALE OF LAND TO TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT, NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.

Question No. 2,004—Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. What were the amounts offered by the Department of Transport or the C.N.R. for parcels of land required for new port and railway facilities at North Sydney?
2. What were the names and addresses of parties to whom such offers were made?
3. What was the final agreed price in each of the above instances and to whom were the cheques made payable?

Questions

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Minister of Transport): 1, 2 and 3. There have been negotiations for acquisition of the following properties for purposes of terminal requirements at North Sydney: (a) R. T. Sainthill and Son Limited (represented by Mr. James G. Hackett, barrister and solicitor, North Sydney). (b) Mr. George E. Haggett, North Sydney. (c) Mr. J. O. Dolmont (represented by Messrs. Gunn and Gunn, 103 Charlotte st., North Sydney); (d) Mr. G. J. Brennan (represented by Messrs. Gunn and Gunn, 103 Charlotte st., North Sydney); (e) National Sea Products Limited, P.O. Box 2130, Halifax (R. G. Smith, vice president and general manager).

As negotiations are still being carried on in connection with some of the transactions it is not considered advisable to give financial details at the present time.

ALTERATION IN RURAL MAIL ROUTE, AMHERST, N.S.

Question No. 2,009—Mr. Coates:

1. Has the Post Office Department altered its general policy of having rural routes start and finish at a post office and, if so (a) when was it altered (b) for what reason was it altered?

2. Was a material alteration effected in R.R. No. 2 Amherst, Nova Scotia after tenders were received and, if so, has consideration been given to the calling of new tenders for this service to enable others who might have submitted a tender to now do so in view of the material alteration in the original tender call?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): 1. No. It is still the policy to have rural routes start and finish at the distributing post office.

2. No material alteration was effected in Amherst rural route No. 2 after tenders were received. The new contractor starts and finishes the service at the Amherst post office.

CENTRIFUGAL PUMPS FOR FARM USE

Question No. 2,012—Mr. Dinsdale:

1. Are centrifugal or gear pumps, for the watering of livestock on farms, classified under the agricultural implement schedule for tariff purposes?

2. Are centrifugal or gear pumps, for incorporation into sprinkler irrigation systems, used on the farm for farm purposes classified under the agricultural implement schedule for tariff purposes?

3. If the answer to question 1 is no, and the answer to question 2 is yes, what is the difference between centrifugal and gear pumps used for agricultural watering purposes and the same pumps used for agricultural sprinkling systems?

4. Are engines and motors incorporated into or attached to centrifugal or gear pumps, for livestock watering purposes on farms, classified as agricultural machines for tariff purposes?

5. Are engines and motors incorporated into or attached to centrifugal or gear pumps, for sprinkler irrigation systems on farms, classified as agricultural machines for tariff purposes?

6. Are engines and motors incorporated into or attached to pumpjacks, for livestock watering purposes on farms, classified as agricultural machines for tariff purposes?

7. What is the difference, in principle, between the agricultural functions of (a) pumpjacks (b) centrifugal or gear pumps?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue): 1. No.

2. Yes.

3. Item 409f of the agricultural implement schedule of the Customs Tariff contains a provision for "sprinkler irrigation systems; ... for use on the farm for farm purposes only; ... parts of all the foregoing". Pumps for incorporation into such systems are dealt with as parts of the systems. Centrifugal and gear pumps are general purpose pumps and the agricultural implement schedule does not contain a provision to cover centrifugal and gear pumps when used for other agricultural watering purposes.

4. No.

5. Engines and motors incorporated into or attached to centrifugal or gear pumps, for sprinkler irrigation systems, are classified under item 409q of the agricultural implement schedule. The item makes specific provision for auxiliary internal combustion engines and electric motors incorporated in or attached to, or to be incorporated in or attached to, agricultural implements or agricultural machinery.

6. Engines and motors incorporated into or attached to pumpjacks are admissible under item 409q as outlined in 5.

7. Pumpjacks are designed to convert hand operated pumps to power operated pumps and are regarded as agricultural machines in their own right, being primarily for farm use. Centrifugal and gear type water pumps are general purpose pumps.

*SOCIAL INSURANCE REGISTRATIONS

Question No. 2,016—Mr. Rhéaume:

1. How many Canadians are now in possession of social insurance numbers?

2. Of the above, how many were voluntary registrations?

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): 1. 5,855,121 as at the close of business October 1, 1964.

2. No separate statistics are maintained of those who are required to register under the provisions of the Unemployment Insurance Act and those who are not covered by the act. However, a great many people who are not covered by the Unemployment Insurance Act have made voluntary applications and been assigned a social insurance number.

GRADE XII STUDENTS, NORTHWEST TERRITORIES

Question No. 2,019—Mr. Rhéaume:

1. How many students were enrolled in grade XII in the Northwest Territories during the 1963-64 school term?

2. How many of these students wrote final examinations at the completion of the school term?

3. What department or agency set these examinations and where and by what agency were they marked?

4. What were the results in terms of (a) failures (b) passing grades (c) eligibility for subsequent university enrollment?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): 1. Seventy two students were registered in some or all subjects in grade XII during the 1963-64 school term.

2. Seventy two students wrote a total of 280 examination papers in 1964.

3. The Alberta department of education set the grade XII departmental examination. They were marked in Edmonton, Alberta, by officials of the department of education of Alberta on the same basis as papers written by grade XII students in that province.

4. (a) Results of all papers written show failures on 85 papers. (b) Results of all papers written show passes on 195 papers. (c) Four students completed full university entrance standing in the academic year 1963-64.

PROPOSED ACTION WHERE RETIREMENT INCOME EXCEEDS SALARY EARNED

Question No. 2,022—Mr. Coates:

As a guide to other employers, what action does the government plan to take respecting members of the public service superannuation plan whose benefits from that plan, from old age security, and from the Canada pension plan may exceed 100 per cent of their salaries at retirement?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): The policy to be proposed by the government to parliament in respect of the adjustment of the Public Service Superannuation Act to take into account the Canada pension plan will be announced in due course.

INVESTMENT OF FUNDS UNDER PENSION PLAN

Question No. 2,023—Mr. Coates:

1. What steps will be taken to ensure that funds accumulated under the Canada pension plan will be invested to secure the best return, consistent with security, for the contributors?

2. What provisions are made in the event of a default by a province or municipality in repayment of funds loaned to it?

3. Will these funds be subject to supervision by the federal government?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): As indicated in the letter from the Prime Minister to provincial premiers which was printed in the appendix to Hansard on April 20, 1964, and in the white paper which was tabled by the Minister of National Health and Welfare on August 10, 1964, the funds arising from the pension plan are to be made available for the use of the provinces and the provincial governments would be required to undertake to pay interest to the pension fund at a rate of interest at least equal to the rate on long term federal securities.

Apart from this general statement, this question relates to a matter of government policy on which an announcement will be made by the government at the appropriate time.

WINTER WORKS PROGRAM, CHAMPNEUF MUNICIPALITY, QUE.

Question No. 2,025—Mr. Laprise:

Has the municipality of Champneuf, in Chapleau county, indicated its intention of taking advantage of the municipal winter works program during the fiscal year 1964-65 and, if so, what project or projects are anticipated, and what will be the federal, provincial and municipal share of the works?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Not to the knowledge of the Department of Labour.

TOTAL LABOUR FORCE, INCOME TAXPAYERS, ETC.

Question No. 2,027—Mr. Latulippe:

1. What is the total labour force engaged in production in Canada?

2. How many persons paid income tax during the last taxation year?

3. How many mothers work at home without remuneration?

4. How many persons in Canada, including children and students, are considered as dependents and receive no income?

5. What is the total population of Canada?

[Translation]

Question No. 2,028—Mr. Latulippe:

1. How many private citizens and companies paid income tax in (a) 1942 (b) 1952 and (c) 1962?

2. What was the total amount of income tax paid by private citizens and companies in (a) 1942 (b) 1952 and (c) 1962?

3. How many taxpayers have paid income tax in the province of Ontario and in the province of Quebec in (a) 1942 (b) 1952 and (c) 1962 and what was the total amount for each province?

Hon. E. J. Benson (Minister of National Revenue):

1 and 2.

	Individuals			Corporations
	No. of taxpayers	Tax assessed ($millions)		No. of taxpayers	Tax declared ($millions)
(a) 1942	1,781,244	335.7		not available
(b) 1952	3,125,100	1,071.8		35,228	1,238.9
(c) 1962	4,681,227	2,021.8	(1961)	72,290	1,323.0
3. Province of Ontario:
(a) 1942	808,937	157.1		not available
(b) 1952	1,364,260	497.8		11,235	593.8

Note: 1962 figures are not yet available for corporations and therefore 1961 figures are given as the latest year available. All figures are based on the annual analysis of income tax returns. Tax figures for 1952 and 1962 include old age security tax, and for 1962 include provincial income tax for those provinces which have agreements with the federal government under the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act.

*TRANSFER OF MARINE AGENCY, PARRY SOUND, ONT.

Question No. 2,034—Mr. Aiken:

1. Has the government any plans for transferring the headquarters of the Parry Sound marine agency from the town of Parry Sound to another location?

2. Is the government making plans for the establishment of a Department of Transport marine base at Sault Ste. Marie, Ontario and, if so (a) for what purpose (b) will any of the duties now carried out at Parry Sound be transferred to Sault Ste. Marie?

Mr. Jean-Charles Cantin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): 1. No.

2. Yes. To carry out increasing responsibilities, the marine services branch of the department has found it necessary to proceed with plans for the establishment of various additional facilities in the great lakes area, including new marine support bases, one of which will be located at Sault Ste. Marie. This, in turn, will require the evolution of a regional concept of organization and management, in line with the concepts of delegation recommended by the Glassco royal commission. While this could lead, in due course, to some readjustments in functions between the various marine bases, to take care of the existence of new facilities, and the increased amount of work to be carried out, detailed plans in this regard have not yet been developed. As indicated, the Parry Sound marine agency is to be retained.

W.M. LEE, OFFICE OF DEFENCE MINISTER

Question No. 2,040—Mr. Madill:

1. Is W. M. Lee in the office of the Minister of National Defence, a civil servant and, if not (a) what is his status (b) what are his duties (c) what is his salary?

2. Was Mr. Lee in the village of Beeton, Ontario, on or about September 24, 1964, on official business and, if so, what was his business?

3. Was any part of his travelling expenses to and from Beeton paid by the government of Canada?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): 1. No. (a) Appointed by order in council; (b) assistant to Minister of National Defence; (c) $14,000 per annum.

2. Yes. To address a dinner meeting at the invitation of the Rotary club of Beeton, Ontario.

3. Yes.

INCLUSION OF SEACOAST IN SECOND NATIONAL PARK, N.S.

Question No. 2,041—Mr. Crouse:

Has the government given any consideration to including a section of seacoast, either in Lunenburg or Queens counties, to the present boundaries of the second national park to be established in the Kejimkujik area of Queens county and, if so, what amount of money has been set aside for this additional land, and how many acres will be added to the original park area?

Hon. Arthur Laing (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): This matter is being considered at the present time by the the government and the province of Nova Scotia. The responsibility for the provision of land for a national park rests with the province concerned. No funds can be set aside for development until an agreement is concluded.

STUDENT LOANS

Question No. 2,050—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. As of September 30, 1964, how many students, in each province and territory, have been granted Canada student loans?
2. In each province and territory, what is the total of loans now granted?

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. This information is not yet available.

2. This information is not yet available.

CIGARETTE SMOKING AND CANCER

Question No. 2,051—Mr. Mather:

1. Is there statistical evidence linking cigarette smoking and lung cancer?
2. How many deaths from lung cancer have occurred in Canada during 1962, 1963, and the first six months of 1964?
3. Is consideration being given to (a) regulating cigarette advertising in the interests of public health, or (b) encouraging cigarette companies to do so?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): 1. Yes. Relevant information is given in "Smoking and Health Reference Book (Canada)" produced by the Department of National Health and Welfare this year. This reference book contains extracts from authoritative reports on the evidence and copies of reports on the Canadian study.

2. 1962, 3,034; 1963, 3,246; 1964, not available.

3. (a) The advisability of regulating cigarette advertising in the interests of public health has received study within the Department of National Health and Welfare and is still under consideration; (b) The Canadian tobacco manufacturers are aware of the department's study and interest in this matter.

C.B.C. CIRCULAR RESPECTING TELEVISION REBROADCASTING

Question No. 2,052—Mr. Howard:

1. On or about July 22, 1964, did the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation mail a circular entitled "Supplementary service for t.v. network rebroadcasters" to the editor, Fort Nelson News, Fort Nelson, B.C., by "special delivery"?
2. Was the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation aware that there is no t.v. reception either at Fort Nelson or within miles thereof and that there is no "special delivery" service at Fort Nelson?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): I am informed by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as follows:

[Mr. Laing.]

1. Yes. Through a clerical error the mailing address plate of the Fort Nelson News was inadvertently substituted for the Nelson Daily News. The C.B.C. has a television rebroadcasting station at Nelson, B.C., and the supplementary service program listings are supplied weekly by special delivery mail to the Nelson Newspaper.

2. Yes.

*ALLEGED STRIKEBREAKERS IN TORONTO

Question No. 2,054—Mr. Knowles:

1. Does the Department of Citizenship and Immigration have knowledge of the presence in Toronto of any of the following persons and, if so, which ones Chuck Gordon, Gene Kuhn, C. E. Benjamin, Richard Mahoney, Mrs. Richard Mahoney, Ralph Cherry, Charlie Moore, Ralph Sanders, Bill McDougall, Roger Melton, Gene Bell and one Hawkins?
2. Does the Department of Citizenship and Immigration have knowledge as to whether any of the above-named persons are working for any of the daily newspapers in Toronto and, if so, which ones, and in what capacity?
3. (a) Where did each of the above named persons come from (b) has the department any knowledge of the experience each of them has had in strikebreaking activities (c) is their presence in Canada as strikebreakers in line with government policy?

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): 1. The department is aware of the presence in Toronto of the following individuals mentioned in this question: Chuck Gordon, Gene Kuhn, L. E. Benjamin, Ralph Sanders, Roger Melton and Gene Bell. The department has no knowledge of the presence in Toronto of Richard Mahoney, Mrs. Richard Mahoney, Ralph Cherry, Charlie Moore, Bill McDougall or one Hawkins.

2. Chuck Gordon and Gene Kuhn are employed by the Toronto Globe and Mail as linotype machinists. L. E. Benjamin is also employed by the Globe and Mail as an assistant superintendent. Ralph Sanders, Roger Melton and Gene Bell are employed as printers by the Toronto Telegram.

3. (a) The six persons mentioned in part 2 came from the United States. (b) and (c) These questions assume a truth which has not been established.

MAIL TENDER, R.R. 2, WHYCOCOMAGH, N.S.

Question No. 2,056—Mr. Muir Cape Breton North and Victoria):

1. Who was the successful tenderer for R.R. No. 2 Whycocomagh, Nova Scotia?
2. How many tenders were received and what were the names, addresses and amounts of each tender?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): 1. Allan L. MacKinnon.

2. Three tenders received: Allan L. MacKinnon, Whycocomagh, $3,432; Charles B. McLaughlin, R.R. No. 2, Whycocomagh, $3,800; Gordon M. MacDonald, Whycocomagh, $4,500.

EFFECT OF PESTICIDES ON WILDLIFE—ROLE OF AGRICULTURE DEPARTMENT IN STUDY

Question No. 2,060—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

What will be the role of the Department of Agriculture in the forthcoming study by the Canadian wildlife service into the effects of pesticides on wildlife?

Hon. Harry W. Hays (Minister of Agriculture): The Department of Agriculture has no explicit role in the study by the Canadian wildlife service into the effects of pesticides on wildlife. However, the department will keep in close touch with these studies through participation in the work of the interdepartmental committee on pesticides and is prepared to co-operate in any useful way.

EFFECT OF PESTICIDES ON WILDLIFE—ROLE OF NATIONAL HEALTH AND WELFARE DEPARTMENT IN STUDY

Question No. 2,061—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

What will be the role of the Department of National Health and Welfare in the forthcoming study by the Canadian wildlife service into the effects of pesticides on wildlife?

Hon. Judy V. LaMarsh (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The co-ordination of federal government work on pesticides is in the hands of the interdepartmental committee on pesticides set up by the government and reporting to the Minister of Agriculture. It is presumed the matter will be discussed in that committee.

FEDERAL PARTICIPATION IN LAKE SUPERIOR EXPLOSIONS

Question No. 2,062—Mr. Howe (Hamilton South):

1. What is the role of the Canadian government in the series of explosions in lake Superior?
2. What is the cost to the government of these experiments?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): 1. Dominion observatory seismologists are participating with the U.S. government in the planning, have recorded seismic data at field stations in Canada and are actively engaged in the interpretation of results.

2. Cost to the Canadian government involved only field expenses of seismic crews: approximately $3,000 in 1963 and $2,000 in 1964.

APPOINTMENT OF COMMISSIONERS UNDER INQUIRIES ACT

Question No. 2,064—Mr. McIntosh:

Are commissioners under part I of the Inquiries Act ever appointed except by order in council?

Mr. Jack Davis (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): In any case involving an inquiry under part I of the Inquiries Act where the inquiry is not regulated by any special law, as referred to in section 3 of the said act, an order in council is made authorizing the issue of a commission appointing the commissioner(s).

GOLD RESERVE, INTERNATIONAL MONETARY FUND

Question No. 2,067—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. What is the percentage of the gold reserve deposited in the international monetary fund as a guarantee for the paper money or for the bank transfers made by the central banks of the countries that belong and contribute to the international monetary fund?
2. Is this gold deposited in the vaults of the international monetary fund or are gold certificates used instead of real gold?
3. During the past ten years, did Canada have to make certain international payments in gold in connection with its commercial trading?

[Translation]

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1. Each member of the international monetary fund pays a subscription to the fund, 25 per cent of which is in gold and 75 per cent in the currency of the country. These subscriptions make up a pool of resources which is available to be drawn on by member countries experiencing temporary balance of payments difficulties. The international monetary fund does not issue its own paper and no part of the gold subscription to the fund serves as a guarantee for the paper money or for the bank transfers made by the central banks of the member countries.

2. The gold resources of the international monetary fund are in the form of gold bars and are held for the account of the I.M.F. in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, the Bank of England, the Banque de France, and the Reserve Bank of India.

3. No.

CO-OPERATIVE CHARTERED BANK, QUEBEC

Question No. 2,086—Mr. Côté (Chicoutimi):

1. Does the government intend to amend the Bank Act in order to permit the establishment of a co-operative chartered bank with capital advanced by the caisses populaires of the province of Quebec and other similar organizations, if not, will consideration be given to such question?

2. Has the government given consideration to the introduction of legislation which would enable caisses populaires of Quebec, while respecting the basic principles underlying their operation, to obtain, if they so desired, a co-operative bank charter implying all the privileges granted the commercial chartered banks and, if not, will consideration be given to such question?

[Translation]

Mr. L. T. Pennell (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): 1 and 2. These are matters of government policy which will be announced if and when legislation is introduced in the house.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

HARBOURS AND RIVERS EXPENDITURES, B.C.

Question No. 1,664—Mr. Barnett:

What, for each of the fiscal years commencing with 1920-21, are expenditures made by the harbours and rivers engineering branch of the Department of Public Works on the seacoast of British Columbia, compiled so as to show (a) the total (b) Vancouver harbour (c) Fraser river-New Westminster harbour (d) Victoria harbour (e) the remainder of the coast subdivided so as to show totals for (i) steamer wharves and floats including dredging and breakwater costs ancillary thereto, and (ii) fishermen's harbours including wharves, floats, dredging and breakwaters ancillary thereto?

Return tabled.

SURVEILLANCE OF POSTAL EMPLOYEES

Question No. 1,939—Mr. Orlikow:

1. In how many post office buildings have peepholes been built through which employees can be observed?

2. In which post office buildings have peepholes been built?

3. What instructions are given to those assigned by the Post Office Department to observe postal employees through these peepholes?

4. Have any postal employees been charged with theft as a result of observation through the peepholes and, if so, how many, when, and where?

5. Have postal employees been checked up for such matters as smoking or taking too long for coffee breaks as a result of being observed through the peepholes in post offices?

6. Is information obtained by observers at post office peepholes used in making decisions as to prospective promotion for postal employees?

Return tabled.

[Mr. Pennell.]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. J. B. Stewart (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, motion No. 168 is acceptable to the government, provided that the usual reservation concerning the agreement of the provinces is understood.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion subject to the reservation as expressed by the parliamentary secretary?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PROVINCIAL APPLICATION FORMS FOR STUDENT LOANS

Motion No. 168—Mr. Cantelon:

That an order of the house do issue for a copy of the application form used in each of the provinces in the disbursement of the moneys under the student loans plan.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF CASES OF GREEK SEAMEN

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Some time ago I asked him to investigate the department's attitude toward appeals against deportation by a number of Greek seamen in Toronto. Is the minister in a position to make a report? Is he able to say that the alleged order that severe measures were to be taken against these seamen, who had jumped ship and who have now become established in Canadian life, will not be applied to them and that they will have an opportunity if otherwise qualified, to become landed immigrants in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, following the question put to me by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition some time ago, I asked the department to prepare a report on all instructions which might have been given to each of our counsel now engaged in deportation proceedings that could now be before the court. I have not yet received the report. I hope to get it soon so I can answer the question.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF ECONOMIC PRIORITIES—PARLIAMENTARY REPRESENTATION OF UNITING PROVINCES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have one question for the Acting Prime Minister. Could he tell the house whether the question of priorities among the needs of the country in the fields of education, health and welfare are to be discussed during the current conference with the provincial premiers, as has been so often advocated by Premier Roblin of Manitoba?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be appropriate that the report on the conference be given by those who are on the Canadian delegation, and they will be in a position to make their report to the house tomorrow.

Mr. Lambert: A supplementary question. Might I suggest to the Acting Prime Minister that he put that under the item of "any other business".

Mr. Thomas M. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A supplementary question to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the further discussions at the conference regarding the union of at least two of the Atlantic provinces, will the government give the assurance that so far as federal responsibility is concerned the minimum constitutional safeguards of House of Commons and Senate representation will be made available to any united provinces as is now the case with individual provinces? I ask for this assurance because evidently British Columbia wishes to minimize the effect on the senatorial floor of the maritime provinces. I would ask the minister to take this question as notice.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will take it as notice. It is regrettable that the question is put just as the conference is about to conclude, but there will be a report made tomorrow.

[Later:]

Mr. Bell: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a supplementary question in respect of the dominion-provincial conference. I think the minister used the word "regrettable". May I ask him what he meant by "regrettable"? Is it regrettable that the maritime provinces want this senatorial guarantee?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No. It is regrettable that my hon. friend did not pose the question at a time when it might have had greater application. I do not know whether this matter has been dealt with, but I am sure the matters affecting the constitution have been fully considered. If my hon. friend had wanted to make his point clear, it seems to me the time for him to pose the question was before the conference had terminated.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

CONSIDERATION OF ESTABLISHMENT OF PERMANENT SECRETARIAT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. In view of the fact that there will be a commonwealth conference next month in Britain which senior officials of each commonwealth country will attend for the purpose of discussing the formation of a commonwealth secretariat, and in view of the fact that Canada's attitude in the past has been against institutionalizing the commonwealth in any way, can the minister tell us who will be the Canadian delegate to this conference and what will be Canada's official attitude with regard to the setting up of a secretariat?

Hon. Paul Martin (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary to indicate all the Canadian personnel at the conference but, as is publicly known, Mr. Arnold Smith of the Department of External Affairs, who played a very active part in the discussions at the recent prime ministers' conference as one of the officials, will be in charge of the Canadian delegation. It would be inappropriate until their deliberations have finished for me to go beyond this.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): A supplementary question. Can I ask the minister whether he does not consider it important that at a conference of this nature a cabinet minister should represent Canada?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, the conference is a conference of officials. There has already been one discussion among officials representing commonwealth countries following the prime ministers' meeting, and this is another. Any final conclusion in matters of this sort, of course, can only be taken by representatives of the governments.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CONTINUATION OF OLDER WORKERS INCENTIVE PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour.

Can he inform the house whether the government is granting at present or intends to grant this year a $75 a month allowance to industries that will take on unemployed aged 45 and over? Are such amounts being paid at the present time and, if not, when does the minister believe that measure is to be applied?

[Text]

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, since this is a matter of policy with respect to the future of the older workers program, I cannot properly deal with it on orders of the day.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Labour.

Is the government now paying $75 to certain industries employing people 45 years of age and over who were unemployed?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO FRENCH EDITION OF GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE DIRECTORY

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State.

Can he explain to the house why the telephone book issued by the federal government which we used to receive simultaneously in both languages, was published last year for the year 1964, in English only in the month of June, and why we have not received as yet the French version of that telephone book from the federal government?

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I shall inquire into the matter and report thereon to the hon. member for Lapointe.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CONSIDERATION OF PURCHASE OF BUFFALO AIRCRAFT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Defence. Can the minister tell the house whether his department is considering the purchase of up to 25 Buffalo aircraft from the de Havilland Corporation; and will he tell the house who the ubiquitous spokesman is who is always giving the reports to the press?

Hon. Paul Hellyer (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I can only say that the initial stages of the Buffalo program have now been nearly completed, and I refer to the development of the aircraft on a co-operative basis by the United States army, the Department of Defence Production and the de Havilland company. A number of aircraft have been flown and are being given tests of evaluation.

It is only normal at this stage that the Department of National Defence would consider whether there is any requirement for these aircraft in respect of the roles that our forces will be asked to carry out in the future. No decision has yet been taken.

In respect of the latter part of the question, I am just as curious as my hon. friend.

[Later:]

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of the statements in the press about the allegations, claims, possibilities or probabilities with regard to changes in the national defence policy, regarding airplane purchases, could I ask the minister whether, if no decision has been made as yet, he will consider discussing this matter with the house and the defence committee before a decision is reached?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, the requirements are set out in the white paper in general terms. I am not sure whether the committee had an opportunity to discuss these matters at their previous sittings, but I would think the department has to accept its responsibility for the administration of the policy which has been laid down by the government and accepted by the committee in making selections which it can recommend to the House of Commons.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Is it then the position of the minister that a decision of his department is in fact a fait accompli, and cannot be considered by the defence committee?

Mr. Hellyer: Mr. Speaker, I would not put it exactly that way, but in respect of the selection of individual items of equipment this is clearly an administrative responsibility of the department which cannot be delegated to a parliamentary committee; because under the constitution the minister has a responsibility to make recommendations to the government, and the government has a responsibility to make recommendations to parliament. When decisions are taken they are referred to the House of Commons in the form of requests for appropriations for the purchase of those particular equipment items. The decision is then subject to discussion in respect of the merits of the items as related to the merits of other available items. This is a very good system which provides ample opportunity for discussion by hon. members who are directly concerned.

INQUIRY AS TO DISBANDMENT OF SOUTH SASKATCHEWAN REGIMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. R. Southam (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Could the minister say whether he has had representations from interested bodies in the province of Saskatchewan requesting the retention of the South Saskatchewan regiment; and have he or his officials come to a conclusion as to the future status of this famous regiment?

Mr. Speaker: It does seem to me this is a proper question for the order paper.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

USE OF MAILS FOR DISSEMINATION OF RACIAL DISCRIMINATION LITERATURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. E. Walker (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General. Is the Post Office Department contemplating any action against the national states rights party in connection with the recent and current distribution of racist hate literature in the Toronto area?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for having given me notice of this question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

In recent months, as most members of the house well know, my attention has been drawn to the hate literature issued by certain organizations in the United States which was being distributed through Canadian mails. After examination of some of the material, I determined that it was scurrilous to such a degree that I issued interim prohibitory orders under section 7 of the Post Office Act against two organizations. One was issued in July against the national white Americans party, post office box 2013, Atlanta, Georgia. The second prohibitory order was issued on September 29 against the national states rights party, post office box 783, Birmingham, Alabama.

Both the individuals and the organizations concerned were informed that they had a right to request a board of review. There was no request in the case of the national white Americans party for a board of review and the order became final. However, I am sure every hon. member will recall a 19 year old youth, named Stanley, who was involved in the earlier stages of this matter and who was connected at the time with the national white Americans party. I did receive over the week end a communication from this same youth, Stanley, now approximately 20 years of age, asking for a board of review on behalf of the national states rights party. That would indicate that these two groups are obviously the same people.

They have requested a board of review under section 7 of the act. That request will be granted. They will be given an opportunity to put forward their case, and the Post Office Department and others concerned will be given the opportunity of questioning them as to their objectives and what is behind their activities.

Mr. A. D. Hales (Wellington South): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Postmaster General. Where are these boards of review held, and are they open to the public?

Mr. Nicholson: The boards of review are held here in Ottawa, although we have not had any in respect of hate literature. The people concerned did not act in time in respect of the first prohibitory order. There have been two boards of review held in respect of other matters with public hearings here in Ottawa. I cannot answer the hon. gentleman as to whether they are open to the public, but I will inquire and let him know.

Inquiries of the Ministry

ROYAL VISIT

LACK OF TRANSPORTATION FOR PREMIERS TO ATTEND DEPARTURE CEREMONIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stuart A. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Secretary of State, asking him why official transportation was not provided for the provincial premiers who wished to attend the departure ceremonies at Uplands airport on Tuesday morning, and why in one or two instances when it was requested this courtesy was refused.

Hon. Maurice Lamontagne (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I wish this question to be put on the order paper.

Mr. Fleming (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Do you want them out of town first?

AGRICULTURE

STATEMENT BY FORESTRY MINISTER RESPECTING ASSISTANCE TO EASTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Minister of Forestry?

It follows from the statement made last night by the minister on television to the effect that the federal government will soon announce a comprehensive program designed to improve the standard of living of eastern farmers.

Could the minister tell us when this program will be announced and whether it will take into account the suggestions made by members of the opposition to establish a national dairy control board and a minimum price of $3.50 per hundredweight for industrial milk?

Hon. Maurice Sauvé (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I believe that the first part of the question asked by the hon. member deals with a comment made by the announcer and not with a statement I made.

Indeed, yesterday I addressed the co-operative milling trade of the province of Quebec, which had gathered under the auspices of the federated co-operative. I spoke before those representatives of the agricultural sector and I stressed the necessity for co-operation between the provincial governments and the federal government so as to improve living conditions in rural centres and particularly in the agricultural field.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

I raised many problems, but I did not announce any policy, and if my hon. friend would only read the text of my speech—

Mr. Vincent: Mr. Speaker, may I ask an additional question?

Does this mean that the present government has no legislative program to announce within a few days, a few weeks or a few months, to raise the standard of living of farmers in the eastern provinces?

Mr. Sauvé: My remarks had nothing to do with the legislative program of the government.

TRANSPORTATION

QUEBEC—PROPOSED REDUCTION IN C.P.R. TRAIN SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

[Translation]

Mr. Henri Latulippe (Compton-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will put it to his representative.

Is the minister aware that the Canadian Pacific intends to reduce by 50 per cent its schedules in various regions of the province of Quebec and, among others, cancel the run known as 202 and 203 between Lac Megantic and Montreal which is most useful to Megantic citizens?

Is the minister not aware that such an arbitrary decision cannot be taken without consulting the parties concerned, that is the people involved? Could the minister intervene to prevent or delay the implementation of that decision before October 25, 1964?

[Text]

Mr. Speaker: This is a question for the order paper.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COURT OF CLAIMS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he will be in a position to introduce the legislation concerning the Indian claims commission at an early date, in view of the uncertain position in which the Indian people of Canada find themselves with regard to their treaty rights.

[Translation]

Hon. René Tremblay (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as I have already mentioned in this house, the large number of recommendations received from the Indians regarding amendments to this bill are under consideration and I hope we may shortly be in a position to submit to the house the bill as amended.

AIR CANADA

INQUIRY AS TO COMPLETE ADOPTION OF NEW SYMBOL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Léon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that Her Majesty the Queen flew back to England in a newly marked Air Canada plane, can he tell the house when all the other planes of T.C.A.—

Some hon. Members: Air Canada.

Mr. Balcer: —will be marked as they should be as well as all stationery, tickets and other necessary gadgets?

Hon. G. J. McIlraith (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to provide that information.

LABOUR RELATIONS

MARITIME UNION TRUSTEES—APPEARANCE BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Has he been in communication with the board of maritime trustees lately, and can he indicate to the house the approximate time when the board will be appearing before the industrial relations committee?

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have been in communication with the chairman of the board within the past week. At present the government has under consideration the appropriate reference to the industrial relations committee that might make it possible for that committee to meet with the chairman of the board.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. With reference to the minister's statement respecting the preparation of a satisfactory reference to the committee, will he give consideration to the terms of reference being made broad enough for the committee to invite other witnesses who may wish to appear before it to give any interesting evidence?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to consider that suggestion.

HOUSING

VANCOUVER—POSSIBLE EVICTIONS FROM VETERANS HOUSING PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General in his capacity as the minister who reports for Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In view of the fact that under the policy of the government time is now running out for many veterans in the Fraserview project, has the minister given further consideration to the possibility of delaying any evictions to enable the veterans committee of the House of Commons to make a thorough investigation of the matter and report to the house?

Hon. J. R. Nicholson (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I believe I have answered a similar question within the last week. Out of roughly 1,150 houses, satisfactory arrangements have been made either by sale or lease for well over 1,100. There are approximately 50 people left. They can be dealt with on an individual basis, and if necessary I am prepared to do so on that basis. I see no reason for further delay in view of the long delay that has already taken place.

Mr. Winch: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I am not going to challenge the minister's figures, although I might be in a position to do so. Will the minister agree that there will be no evictions until each individual has had the opportunity of discussing the matter with his officials?

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I gave such an assurance a week ago, and encouraged any one who had representations to make to come forward and make them. I said they could be dealt with either by the officials of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation or that these people could deal directly with me if they preferred to do so. I said I would do so at the request of an individual tenant or at the request of a member of the house or any other friend or amicus who wished to intervene.

Mr. Winch: A further supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Because this project is in the city of Vancouver and the matter is of major importance, would the minister be prepared to meet with these people in Vancouver as a group, and not individually, at his early convenience? Will the minister answer that question?

Mr. Nicholson: I think these cases will have to be dealt with now on an individual basis. I would be prepared to meet with them individually rather than as a group.

Mr. Winch: May I ask why you will not meet them collectively?

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MEASURE RESPECTING HOURS OF WORK, MINIMUM WAGES, ETC.

The house resumed, from Tuesday, October 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. MacEachen for the second reading of Bill No. C-126, respecting hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacations and holidays with pay in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

Mr. J. C. Munro (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes prior to the house rising last night I had been speaking about the new Canada labour standards code introduced by the minister yesterday. The essence of my introductory remarks at that time was by way of complimenting the government and the minister for bringing forward this type of progressive legislation which is badly needed. I referred also by way of introduction to the main elements of the bill. Provision is made for a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour, to limit the number of working hours per day to eight and the number of working days per week to five, the total number of hours in a working week to 40. Provision is made also for overtime pay over that number of hours per week to the total of eight. Seven statutory holidays have been provided, and if work is performed on those days provision is made for overtime pay. The only remaining feature of the bill with respect to standards is the provision with respect to two weeks vacation for each year of employment with pay, or in lieu thereof 4 per cent of his wages if he has not worked for a total of one year.

These standards are generally in line with all the presentations that have been made to this government, and are in line with our commitments. I think that in the discussion that ensued yesterday with regard to this bill, the two general features of the bill could have been dealt with in greater detail. The two general features, as I see them, are the elements relating to the minimal nature of the standards and the scope of the bill in its application to the number of people under federal jurisdiction, and the constitutional jurisdiction that has been assumed by this legislation. There were several references yesterday by hon. members to this measure as setting a standard. I feel it would be more accurate to say that the bill sets a minimum standard in relation to the five elements I mentioned earlier. In this way it is designed to be example setting legislation for other jurisdictions in our country.

The second, and what I consider to be the more novel, general feature of this bill is the number of people in Canada under federal jurisdiction to whom it applies in the labour field. As we all know, under the British North America Act our legislative scope in this area is severely limited. When we look at other labour legislation dealing with standards —and I am not talking now about legislation dealing with labour relations—we see that the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act applies essentially to employees who work for a contractor who has a federal contract and the federal government is of course, one of the principal contracting parties to that arrangement. This act does not affect directly federal employees of crown corporations or employees of the federal government, nor employees in industries, private or otherwise, falling under federal jurisdiction so it is quite limited in its scope. The only other type of legislation that I believe is noteworthy in the federal area which deals with standards is the Annual Vacations Act, and I understand that it affects only federal employees directly. However, I believe that particular measure does not have the scope of this particular bill, because the bill we have before us applies to national industries whether they be privately owned or otherwise, falling under federal jurisdiction as outlined in clause 3, the application clause of the bill. The industries, businesses or firms affected, generally fall under the headings to which the minister referred yesterday, namely transport, communications, banking, uranium mining, grain elevators and certain works carried on by federal government corporations. I believe, by way of example, reference could be made to Polymer, the Canadian National, C.B.C., the national film board and so on. When we look at this bill and understand the application of the section applies to private industries within federal jurisdiction, we can see that the scope of this measure is as wide indeed as the federal government can really hope to design it in the labour standards field, and at the same time remain within the jurisdiction allocated to it under our constitution. I believe it is particularly commendable that the bill relates to this wide area so far as the number of employees affected is concerned.

I have made inquiries over a period of time as to how many employees would be affected by this legislation, as well as other private members bills dealing with the same area. The number of employees to whom this legislation refers run anywhere from 400,000 to 500,000. Of that total number, the closest estimate I have been able to obtain of the number of people who will directly benefit from the legislation, is 50,000. In other words, these are people who are working under conditions which are below the level set out in this bill. I think we can say that this legislation, as example setting legislation in the federal field, does at the same time embrace quite a number of people who are going to benefit substantially from it. It is a good exercise indeed to multiply some of these figures. If the measure affects roughly 400,000 to 500,000 people who come within the jurisdiction claimed by the bill, and you multiply that by 3.9, which is the average family according to the last census, we can see that the measure will affect a great number of Canadians. Certainly if you say that roughly 50,000 people are going to benefit directly and substantially by the implementation of this legislation, and you multiply that figure by 3.9, then I think one is justified in saying that the bill is commendable for the really tangible assistance it is going to provide for many people now working within federal jurisdiction.

Another aspect of the legislation in connection with jurisdiction, I think, is the constitutional jurisdiction claimed by the legislation. From a reading of clause 3 of the bill we can see that it includes all those areas that fall within federal jurisdiction, so I do not believe it could be wider in scope. There are certain main words which I feel should be emphasized in connection with the application clause for this measure. They are:

> This act applies to and in respect of employees who are employed upon or in connection with the operation of any work, undertaking or business that is within the legislative authority of the parliament of Canada excluding any work, undertaking or business of a local or private nature in the Yukon territory or Northwest Territories—

Then, the clause gives a list of undertakings included, but without restricting the generality of the foregoing statement. I do not believe I have seen any federal legislation which has claimed any wider jurisdiction in relation to the labour field. I think it is particularly commendable on that score. I would hope that this measure takes into account an element put forward in the private bill of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Bill No. C-36, in clause 2 of which "employer" was defined as > —any person, firm or corporation employing one or more employees and includes every agent, manager, representative, contractor, subcontractor or principal and every other person who either—

And the definition continues in considerable more detail. The words I am interested in are "contractor" and "subcontractor", and I would hope that clause 3 of the minister's bill will take into account many employees working under contract or, if you like, under subcontract. I hope the minister and his department will arrange to enforce this legislation with respect to all such contractors and subcontractors.

One excellent case, commonly known as the stevedoring case, which went to the supreme court in 1955, dealt with this matter. It involved a section in the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, which claimed just about equivalent jurisdiction as does this bill, although in that particular case the legislation did not in the true sense deal with labour standards but rather with procedures in labour relations.

In that case the application of a particular section of the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act came before the supreme court, and the question involved certain employees of the Eastern Canadian Stevedoring Company in Toronto. The court held that the act applied to the company's employees in Toronto, employment of stevedores being an essential part of navigation or shipping, which are specific items covered in this bill. I believe that type of decision certainly would embrace contractors and subcontractors whose work can be regarded as an essential part of any work or operation that falls within federal jurisdiction.

We all know that at various times this business of contracting and subcontracting has been used as a device to defeat government labour legislation, but I hope the wording in this bill is such that it will limit that type of activity to an absolute minimum.

Another matter connected with this bill that should be emphasized, and to which I referred last night, is the tangible effects it will have in areas which its jurisdiction does not cover. One of these, which has been mentioned by many members including myself, is the pressure it will bring on the provinces to pass a similar type of legislation which will cover all employees across Canada. Related in a sense to that effect is the consideration that the legislation will also go some of the way toward combating poverty in Canada.

Last evening I said there had been a great deal of talk in the United States on the question of poverty. A considerable amount of legislative action has been taken in the U.S. to combat poverty, and I think much legislative action has also been taken in this country to deal with it. However, I do not believe there has been enough discussion in this parliament on the extent of poverty, and it would be useful if all hon. members were fully aware that it is a serious problem in the country. Hon. members should know how many people are affected, and should be aware that many authorities claim that minimum standards legislation, and particularly minimum wage legislation, are tools to combat poverty.

In this connection I refer to a speech made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) to the trade union summer school at St. Francis Xavier University on June 24 last, in which he disclosed some very interesting figures. In that speech he dealt with one set of figures which I think are alarming. He said:

> But when we go even deeper into the figures—

He was referring to the figures derived from the last census in 1961.

> —we find that among 3,600,000 non-farm families in Canada almost 850,000 have cash incomes of less than $3,000 a year. That's more than one out of every five families.

If you multiply that number of families who have cash incomes of less than $3,000 a year by 3.9, which is the average sized Canadian family, we can see there are well over 3 million Canadians subsisting on something less than $3,000 a year, and in many cases substantially less than that. This could certainly be regarded as poverty.

Another interesting quotation from the minister's speech which I think should be brought to the attention of the house is this:

> We will do the federal part in raising minimum wages without destroying job opportunities.

No matter where one looks he finds there is always this advocacy that minimum standards legislation he passed in any purposeful campaign to deal with poverty. Again I say I hope this legislation will be an incentive to provincial legislatures to pass similar measures that will deal with the alarming number of Canadians living at or below subsistence levels.

Further figures are also given in the recent ninth volume of Canadian Labour a Canadian Labour Congress monthly publication. They point to the necessity for this type of legislation being passed by parliament, and to the necessity for other legislation designed to curb poverty. In its publication, Canadian Labour, the congress pointed out that according to the last census 30 per cent of Canadian wage earners do not earn enough to pay income tax, and they estimate that 30 per cent represents 2 million workers. It further pointed out that 55 per cent of those who do pay income tax earn less than $4,000 a year, and 34 per cent earn less than $3,000 a year. It further estimated that the number of those paying income tax but earning less than $3,000 a year totalled 1½ million workers. If that 1½ million is added to the 2 million who do not pay income tax at all, it gives a figure of about 3½ million people.

These figures are at some variance with the figures I quoted earlier from the minister's speech, but they do emphasize the alarming number of Canadians living at or below subsistence levels, and they stress the necessity for this type of legislation. If we multiply this figure of 3½ million by 3.9, which as I say is the average size family, we get some idea of the possible number of Canadians existing on extremely low incomes. Everybody can interpret these figures in different ways and some people come to more alarming conclusions than others, but no matter how one looks at them the conclusion reached is certainly alarming. Other Canadians who have undertaken considerable research into this question have verified as much.

Mr. Lambert: Would the hon. member permit a question? I wonder whether in his compilation of figures he has taken into account the incidence of double employment. Has he taken into account how many of those employed at the lower levels of wages, especially, actually occupy two jobs?

Mr. Munro: I can only answer the hon. gentleman by saying that these figures come from the dominion bureau of statistics and were accumulated during the last census in 1961. Many questions were asked when that census was taken with respect to incomes earned. I would think Canadian employees holding two jobs would have made the position clear.

For these reasons I think legislation of the type before us is particularly helpful. I think the present bill falls within the general design of the legislation which was brought forward by the previous government and the legislation which this house has adopted during the past year. I hope this labour standards legislation will be regarded as another phase of governmental attack on poverty. I hope that all the programs which have been initiated by the previous government together with those which have been put into effect over the last year will be co-ordinated so as to combat poverty more effectively. If this is done I think we can regard the measure before us as being truly a step forward.

In this connection I should like to read into the record one excerpt from the minister's speech—the speech to which I referred on January 24, 1964. It is as follows:

> It may be that to break the vicious circle in which they—the poor—find themselves we shall have to launch a frontal assault on the problem not only by a measure of integration of our present federal programs with these problems in mind but also by working more closely together with the provinces.

This is the pattern which has been followed in the United States.

There is another aspect of this legislation with which I should like to deal. It has to do with the political justifications of the standards set out in this bill. In this connection I would refer hon. members to the last memorandum presented by the Canadian Labour Congress to the government of Canada—a memorandum dated December 11, 1963. This is what the congress had to say with reference to labour standards:

> We have on previous occasions advocated a minimum wage act providing for $1.25 an hour and an hours of work act establishing 40 hours a week as a maximum, and amendments to the Vacations With Pay Act.

Then the brief goes on to deal with other matters. I think it can be said that the legislation before us is on all fours with that particular recommendation, one which came from the principal labour organization of this country. For this reason I believe the standards set out in the present bill will commend themselves to hon. members. I would point out, too, that the provisions in this bill measure up to the standards advocated in various private members' bills which have already been discussed in this house or which, though before us, have not yet been discussed because an opportunity has not arisen. I refer principally to the bill sponsored by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). His Bill No. C-36 recommends in essence the same standards as are contained here, except that the statutory holidays for which he asks amount to eight compared with the seven set out in the bill before us. The hon. member is requesting a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour as of February 20, 1964. There is further justification for the standards embodied in this legislation on the basis of the commitments of this party during two election campaigns. These commitments have been included in the Liberal party leaflets. We gave firm pledges that these standards would be incorporated in legislation and brought before parliament, and the standards contained in this bill are in line with the commitments this party made to the Canadian people prior to the elections of 1962 and 1963.

Mr. Knowles: And in 1919.

Mr. Munro: That is going too far back for me.

I think the situation today certainly justifies the passing of this legislation, taking it in the context of the amount of discussion there has been on the question of poverty in this country and the revelations with regard to it.

Mr. Knowles: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Munro: Yes.

Mr. Knowles: In view of his reference to the minimum standards set in the present bill and his statement that they are similar to those for which such bodies as the Canadian Labour Congress have asked, can the hon. member tell us whether he is aware that at its convention in April this year the Canadian Labour Congress altered its previous request to the government and asked that the minimum wage standard be raised to $1.50 an hour and that there should be nine statutory holidays?

Mr. Munro: Yes, I am aware that such a resolution was passed by the C.L.C. at its last annual meeting. But I limited my own remarks to the recommendation of the congress as embodied in its last submission to the government. I believe these submissions are made every year—

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member said last night he wanted to be up to date, that he did not want to talk about the past.

Mr. Munro: I am only going back to December 11, 1963, yet the hon. member is complaining. He should understand, then, how I feel when he goes back to 1919.

Mr. Knowles: I know how you feel.

Mr. Munro: I think it can properly be said that the standards contained in this bill come within the area of those which have been advocated by many organizations during the last few months. I assume that the submission of the Canadian Labour Congress as to the $1.50 an hour will shortly be incorporated in some formal submission, probably as part of the next memorandum.

I would remind you, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was most complimentary with respect to action taken by the government to establish $1.25 an hour as the minimum wage and I take it, therefore, that neither he nor the congress are too critical of the standards set by this legislation. In this regard I think the C.L.C. did issue a statement indicating support of the provisions of this bill only a few weeks ago. However, it did refer to the fact that the amount requested was recently increased from $1.25 to $1.50. I might also point out that unless I am badly misinformed the last private bill which dealt with this matter was the hon. member's own bill of February 20, 1964; I do not believe he has submitted a further private bill to provide for this increase. I might add that this bill was dated February 20, 1964, so I am only going back a few months—not to 1919.

Mr. Knowles: In view of the hon. member's desire to be up to date, does he not recall that during the debate on the bill he mentioned I pointed out that the C.L.C. had since recommended a minimum wage of $1.50 and that I suggested that when the bill got into committee the alteration should be made accordingly? All I want from the hon. member is that he should be up to date.

Mr. Munro: I am only surprised the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has not found time to put in the hopper a bill advocating this $1.50.

Mr. Knowles: Are you challenging me?

Mr. Munro: Not necessarily. I think it can be said for all these reasons that this legislation commends itself as far as the standards are concerned. It is also in conformity with this party's own political commitments made at the time, which were in essence I believe the same as those of the New Democratic party prior to the last two general elections, namely $1.25 minimum wage. For that reason there can be little question of the standards involved.

As I said earlier, and as I say again in conclusion, I hope this legislation will fall within the general design or area of governmental legislation which has been passed and is anticipated in the future. If this is regarded as a further step in an over-all program, and if we carry forward now and combine the various government agencies to fight unemployment and lift the income of the lowest income groups in the country—and this can best be done by combining all the government agencies—I say again that this would go a long way. I think the bill is also in keeping with the general design of the government in matters affecting training of the unemployed or making grants to industry for training people already employed in industry.

I say this because education, as has been emphasized, is a very important part of coping with poverty. I think it is in keeping with the governmental program regarding re-employment of—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired.

Mr. Knowles: He is used to talking these bills out.

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two very brief observations to make with respect to this bill. I am not going to hold up the house in what I have to say more than a few minutes. As hon. members know I am always brief and to the point when I speak on matters of this nature. However, I cannot help observing that I listened for about ten minutes to the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) drawing this gloomy picture of poverty in Canada, a habit hon. members opposite acquired while on this side of the house, and yet I reflect on what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) had to say a week ago about Canadians never having had it so good. It seems to me that these two statements do not tie together very well. I was speaking to a chap the other day who said that he had not had a job since the Liberals came to power. He said to me that the Minister of Finance had said in the House of Commons that we had never had it so good in Canada, that the economy is really rolling; and yet this fellow has not had a job since the Liberals came into office. He said: "Yes the Minister of Finance is right; I have never had an easier or nicer time in all my life. I had been employed all my life until two years ago, but have been unemployed for the last two years. Yes, the Minister of Finance is right".

Mr. Gray: Would the hon. member permit a question. Is the person to whom he is referring a defeated Tory candidate?

Mr. Nielsen: No; as a matter of fact he is a Liberal living in Ontario. However I want to direct a serious observation to the minister with respect to the application of this act.

The minister will have noted—I did raise this question with him privately—that the Yukon and Northwest Territories are specifically singled out as exceptions to the application of this act. I cannot for the life of me think of any reason for this. Like the provinces the Yukon—and I can speak knowledgeably of the Yukon in this specific instance—has an act, the Yukon Act, under section 16 of which the legislative council of the Yukon has exclusive jurisdiction over the same class of subject matter as do the provinces. Labour is one of them, it being a matter of a local or private nature. I am wondering why these two territories have been singled out as exceptions. I hope the minister will reply before we get into committee because it may be that an error has been made and that an amendment will be necessary to eliminate the exceptions which have been made of the two territories.

The labour provisions ordinance governs working conditions and hours of work in the Yukon territory. That ordinance was passed pursuant to the exclusive legislative jurisdictional authority which has been placed in the Yukon legislative council by the federal Yukon Act. I believe the situation is the same in the Northwest Territories, but my colleague from the Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume) will be able to enlarge upon that.

May I say to the minister that clause 3 is one more indication why it becomes essential for federal-provincial conferences, where such matters are discussed, to include members who are familiar with the affairs in each of these territories to act at least as observers so that they can be asked questions first hand. My colleague from the Northwest Territories has on several occasions, as I have myself, advocated that when these conferences are held there should be representation on them, either by way of observers or otherwise, from the two territories. This sort of thing would be remedied if that first hand advice could be sought.

I imagine that when the minister speaks later on he will be giving the house some explanation as to how he expects this legislation to tie in with existing legislation in the provinces and the territories. Under the labour provisions ordinance in the Yukon, for instance, the minimum work week is 44 hours, except in the case of miners, who are required to work 48 hours a week.

I believe this legislation is desirable. We have been waiting a long time for this type of thing. It can do nothing but benefit the workers in my riding, and I am sure the workers right throughout Canada. The quicker the legislation is on the statute books, the better we will all be for it. With the request to the minister, then, that in closing the debate he answer the specific question I put to him with regard to clause 3, so that if there is need for an amendment I might discuss it with him perhaps privately and be helpful in suggesting a method of procedure, I have no further comments to make.

Mr. G. C. Lachance (Lafontaine): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to join with the hon. members for Ontario (Mr. Starr), Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), Hamilton (Mr. Munro), Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and others, to congratulate the Minister of Labour for the courage and tenacity he has shown in preparing and presenting the piece of legislating dealing with hours of work, minimum wages, paid annual leave and holidays for federal projects, enterprises and businesses, in brief, a Canadian code of working standards which has long been awaited.

Mr. Speaker, a nation which has the courage to adopt progressive labour legislation shows that it is mature and this constitutes an excellent example for many other countries in the world.

I have no trouble reconciling my remarks today with respect to the legislation under consideration with the personal views I expressed on March 6 and June 12 last, when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced bills dealing with related questions.

I cannot let this opportunity go by without saying that I have no difficulty at all in doing so because, last October 7, the press gallery correspondent of a certain Montreal newspaper, Montréal-Matin, wrote that I would have trouble reconciling my present attitude with my statements of March 6 and June 12, 1964.

It is an article entitled:

A Liberal member talks too much.

In that article we read the following:

He opposed measures which are advocated at the present time by his party.

Mr. Speaker, if a member speaks too much in this house, I wonder if a parliamentary correspondent does not write too much.

I also wonder why this parliamentary correspondent, who can obtain all copies of Hansard and of speeches delivered in this house, waited until the month of October to write his article and say that on March 6 and June 12, 1964, the member for Lafontaine stated this and that.

The first time, that is on March 6, 1964, the house was considering a bill providing for two weeks vacation after one year of employment. On June 12, 1964, the bill provided for a minimum wage rate of $1.25 per hour.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder how the press gallery correspondent could come to such conclusions, especially if he took the trouble to read what I had said. I suppose he did not have enough time, because he could easily have realized that I supported the labour standards mentioned in the legislation now before us. It may be that he is preparing his campaign for the next election. I suppose it is his privilege, but I do not think the people of Lafontaine riding or the rest of the country could fall for such publicity.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would not have raised the matter if it were not for the fact that, in the past, I had the opportunity to deal with the labour class, with the leaders of labour movements. I must admit that I had not read the article referred to because I very seldom read that newspaper. However, several people got in touch with me to ask how the hon. member for Lafontaine could be against the labour standards proposed in this legislation.

I immediately made a point of checking with the heads of that paper and I have in my mind the article entitled: "A Liberal member talks too much".

I have absolutely no hesitation in saying that I see no difficulty in reconciling th remarks I made on March 6 and June 12 with those I wish to make now concerning the legislation introduced by the Minister of Labour.

[Mr. Lachance.]

However, here is what that article said:

Wages—same support, on June 12, 1964, to a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour but with the following reservations: "If the minimum of $1.25 is extended to all regions, there would be reasons to believe that there will be more benefits for industries located away from larger cities.

Mr. Speaker, the press gallery correspondent certainly did not check page 4278 of Hansard for June 12, 1964, because he did not say so in his report. But if one refers to my remarks, one can read this:

Far be it from me to be against a minimum rate of $1.25 but we must face the facts, and those are problems which must be discussed and examined thoroughly before setting up legislation for that purpose.

One can certainly not say that I am against the setting up of a minimum wage.

And a little farther I said:

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre introduced a bill suggesting a minimum wage of $1.25 an hour. In a year or two, it might have to be increased to $1.50.

If the press gallery correspondent for the newspaper Montréal-Matin did not refer in his report dated October 7 to the paragraphs I just quoted, I insist on reminding him of the speech I made on June 12, 1964 and on asking him to add the two paragraphs I read to the report he published on Wednesday, October 7.

The press gallery correspondent was once active in politics, and perhaps he is preparing his next election campaign. That is why I wanted to clear up those points.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that the people in Lafontaine county and those of labour circles did not believe that report, because according to another important and popular newspaper in Montreal, the report may have seemed biased, for it does not speak the whole truth.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to see this bill before us today. I hope that it will have an early implementation and that it is the forerunner of other labour standards. In my opinion, it is a shy attempt, but often a shy beginning leads to a better ending.

I think that other labour standards will be considered by parliament, and I shall have, no doubt, the opportunity to discuss the matter further in committee of the whole.

[Text]

Mr. Mather: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am wondering whether there is a quorum in the house at the present time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Yes, I believe there is a quorum in the house.

Mr. Gene Rhéaume (Northwest Territories): Mr. Speaker, I should just like to take a moment or two to echo the dismay of my colleague, the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) in relation to the bill before us which specifically excludes the Northwest Territories and the Yukon territories from its provisions. I rise not only because these areas are excluded, but because it seems to me to be a sad state of affairs when, in the introduction of legislation of this kind, the minister does not even refer, in passing, to those two northern areas of our country, which for some reason or another known only to the minister were not included. I am not quarrelling with the minister, but it does raise this question in my mind. Why in the world would the minister not want the legislation to apply to those two areas of the country where more than in any other areas of Canada there are federal operations and large numbers of undertakings being carried out by the federal government?

I do not want to rub it in, but when the minister was having his conference with the provincial labour ministers early this year I raised the question with him. As can be found on page 134 of Hansard I asked him if it would be possible to have representatives of the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory sit in on these meetings and the minister promised me at the time that he would look into the matter. I know he was very busy but he said he would look into it and give the house an answer. For some reason or other the conference was suddenly upon us and he either could not or did not make a decision to allow spokesmen from these two territories to participate in the discussions. It makes me ask this question: Who in the world was it that gave the minister his advice? Was the advice, such as it was, checked against the opinion of residents of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories? Was any contact made by the minister with the councils of the Yukon and Northwest Territories to find out if there was any way in which the legislation could be changed or revised to aid and abet those of us who live in the north, in our efforts to get suitable labour legislation? I know for a fact that the minister never discussed any of the provisions with me and I am certain he never let the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) know what his intentions were.

On many occasions in the house I have pointed out to the minister the need for a careful study of the whole question of labour legislation in our northerly areas. I have also raised many other problems with him that I felt his departmental officials should be investigating. If he had deigned to take my advice or had even looked into my suggestions he would have found that useful research needs to be done. In his comments last night the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) noted this shortcoming. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, between the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) protecting my rivers in the north from exploitation and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre protecting my people, there is not a half decent cause left for me to champion.

Mr. Herridge: We know you are a worthwhile fellow to support.

Mr. Rhéaume: I would hope the minister would not only give us an explanation on this occasion, but would keep the matter in the back of his head.

Mr. Knowles: Get it to the front of his head.

Mr. Rhéaume: Well, there is lots of room in the minister's head. At any rate, I would hope that this kind of oversight does not occur again. As a member of this house it is a continual source of dismay to me that every time a piece of legislation comes before the house or an announcement is made there is no mention of the northerly areas. I am not too thin-skinned, but I feel the time has come when those who sit on the treasury benches are going to have to remember that there is a large piece of Canada that does not readily fall into the sphere of federal-provincial relations. They have got to consider these matters, and I can guarantee that on every occasion from now on that members of the treasury benches fail to refer to these two territories they can be sure that the hon. member for Yukon and myself will be up on our feet bugging the treasury benches until we get some recognition.

Mr. Nielsen: They are already bugged.

Mr. Rhéaume: I am convinced that somewhere in the federal bureaucracy there is a minor and evil bureaucrat whose sole job it is to go through proposed pieces of legislation to make sure that all good programs such as unemployment insurance, ARDA and so on contain within their provisions no reference to Indians, minority groups and the Yukon and Northwest Territories.

I was fascinated by the statement of the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) that there is a recognition today that millions of Canadians are not affluent and, indeed, that millions are in poverty. I suspect that the government has picked up this technique from our friends south of the border, where a massive campaign is being based on unexcelled prosperity on the one hand and on a war on poverty on the other hand. In any event, I am happy there is a realization that some parts of our country are having a pretty tough time and that this kind of legislation is needed.

I believe I have made the point that those of us who live in the northerly areas are tired of being excluded from the provisions of good programs. It should not be up to me to do it but at some point I can see the member from the Northwest Territories rising in his place during the committee stage to move an amendment that the title of the bill be changed to "southern Canada labour standards code". We are going to have to consider this sort of thing if no reference is made to the territories.

When the minister rises to close the debate I hope he will explain his thinking whereby the two northerly territories are excluded. Furthermore, I hope he will indicate whether or not he is prepared to put forward some kind of suitable amendment when this good legislation is being considered in committee, because I believe there should be some way of working out a mutually acceptable amendment to include the two northerly areas of our country.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to get into this debate and speak on this measure because I do not believe any legislation has come before the house that is of greater general interest to my constituents than the bill now before us. It deals with hours of work, with vacations with pay, with minimum wages, the sort of things that concern people that I for one was sent here to represent. Therefore, although I perhaps have nothing very original to add to what has been said already, I want to enter the debate.

I do not want to detract from the chorus of congratulations in which the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) has been basking since he introduced this bill. I think it is good legislation and I join with other members in all corners of the house in welcoming it. I do not disagree with the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) who pointed out that with certain exceptions which have already been noted the legislation goes as far as the constitutional structure of this country permits at the present time. We have already heard about the exceptions, of course, in respect of the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories and I will not repeat what has been said on that matter.

I notice that for some reason which is not clear to me—perhaps we can discuss it in detail later—members of professions will not get the benefit of this legislation. As I am a member of a profession may I say that if I were employed by a federal agency I would very much like to be included in the legislation. I should like to ask the minister why members of professions are excluded.

Mr. Byrne: You will have to resign as a member if you want to come down to these hours.

Mr. Knowles: I think lawyers ought to get $1.25 an hour too.

Mr. Brewin: In the case of members of professions, it really was not the wage rate that concerned me so much, but rather vacations with pay which seem to be strangely lacking for some of us in this part of the world at any rate.

Having said that I welcome this legislation, Mr. Speaker, I think it only proper to point out that this is not a national labour code in that it only covers—I am not blaming the minister or the government for this—approximately half a million employees at the present time. It is true that they are in important industries under federal jurisdiction. However there are over five million people gainfully employed in Canada, and the result of this is that the present legislation deals with only one tenth of all those gainfully employed in Canada.

I realize, and I want to deal with this for a moment, that the reason for this is that our constitutional structure brings the question of minimum standards for labour largely within the field of provincial jurisdiction. I want to urge the government, and the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen) in particular, not to be satisfied with the maintenance of this situation, not to be satisfied with saying that we in the federal field are setting an example which we hope will be followed by others. In my view, Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely essential that in Canada we establish certain minimum standards of labour legislation across Canada as a whole. Of course there are fields which are properly within the provincial sphere, and there always will be in Canada.

The last time any careful survey was made, so far as I know, of the respective fields of labour legislation by anyone looking at the total picture of jurisdiction was at the time of the Sirois report which, as hon. members will know, was made shortly before the last war. The problem of course was temporarily removed by reason of what happened during the last war, and the fact that federal jurisdiction was expanded. However, we are back again in a situation where we do not have reasonably uniform standards. I point out what was said by Professor Grauer in a brochure he prepared on labour legislation for the Sirois commission. He said:

> First, there is a marked lack of uniformity in legislation as between the provinces.

He then went on to deal, and I shall not quote him in detail, with the failure to implement international conventions. This was mentioned in the house a day or two ago. Then he dealt with the fact there is no adequate technique worked out for co-operation in bringing about more uniform standards of labour legislation. Then, Mr. Speaker, he went on to say this:

> The lack of uniformity of labour legislation as between provinces has serious implications for internal policy. In the first place, it has to some extent encouraged competitive bidding between provinces for industries at the expense of labour standards. Where industries with poor standards have been encouraged, sore spots in labour relations and social conditions have been created. Once established, these sore spots are very difficult to get rid of.

The hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) spoke about poverty in this country, and it is in these sore spots to which he referred.

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Finance says there are none.

Mr. Brewin: I do not happen to agree with him. This article goes on to say:

> In addition, as long as competitive bidding for industry is allowed by labour legislation, there will be bad feeling among workers and bad feeling between provinces. In the second place, lack of uniformity in labour legislation is in itself a condition that prevents adequate and more uniform standards being set.

It creates difficulties in the way of enforcement and leaves the way open for undesirable economic and financial results, because they encourage or allow industries with poor standards. Now, in order to deal with this problem, Professor Grauer referred to various remedies, one of which I do not think we would accept now. I refer to his suggestion to turn over to the dominion parliament jurisdiction in the whole field. Another method he suggested was concurrent powers, with the dominion being granted the right to implement international conventions and so set minimum standards while the provinces retained residual powers with a right to enact higher standards. The third one he suggested was to leave the jurisdiction as at present and work out some mechanism for consultation and action in setting standards.

His recommendations were adopted by the full commission, which ended this chapter of its report dealing with labour legislation as follows:

> In order to protect the principle of freedom of trade between provinces and to facilitate the handling of relief for employables by the dominion, the dominion parliament should have jurisdiction to establish basic minimum wages and maximum hours of labour, and to fix the age of employment, leaving to any province jurisdiction to raise minimum wages, lower hours of labour, or raise the age of employment if it so desires. But, as noted previously, the powers of parliament should be precisely defined in order to protect the autonomy of the provinces.

The minister may well say that this is a matter to be taken up perhaps with his colleague the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau) when constitutional issues are being discussed. However, I suggest we will not have satisfactory conditions within Canada as a whole until we accept the principle that, at least in basic industries in which employers and trade unions are national in scope, these standards shall be national in scope as well. Whether this can be done by delegation from the provinces to the federal government, whether by constitutional amendment, whether by closer working together of the provinces, it seems to me that is urgently needed.

Just a few days ago the Ottawa Journal produced a list of the existing provincial minimum wage rates. They make talk of a uniform standard of living in Canada rather ridiculous. In British Columbia the rate is $1 per hour. Of course in each of these cases there are certain exceptions. In Alberta, it is $34 per week for centres of 5,000 population or over and $30 per week for centres under 5,000 population. In Saskatchewan it is $36.50 per week for ten cities. In Manitoba, it is 75 cents an hour in the cities and 70 cents an hour elsewhere. Ontario started with $1 per hour in industrial areas and is moving toward making that general. In the Montreal area of Quebec it is 70 cents an hour and elsewhere 64 cents an hour. The notation for Prince Edward Island is $1 per hour for men, and then there is a note which I do not understand, "less 80 cents in the food processing plants". If this is correct it would give food processing plants a very low minimum. The rate for women laundry workers only is 55 cents an hour. In Nova Scotia it is $21.60 per week in major centres. I understand there are hearings at the present time with a view to establishing a new rate. In New Brunswick, the rate is 60 cents per hour.

These minimum rates present a hodge-podge picture across Canada which, as I say, in the long run creates depressed areas. This creates the situation mentioned by Professor Grauer of competition between industries in the various provinces. I hope that while we have now or we will soon have a Canada labour standards code, the minister and the government, and this parliament as a whole, will try to see to it that we do really expand the field where uniform standards can be established across Canada. This would not prevent provincial autonomy in connection with improving standards; it would not take away responsibility for safety precautions; it would not take administrative responsibility away from the provinces, but it would establish certain basic standards which I suggest would help to deal with the pockets of poverty to which the hon. member for Hamilton East referred a few minutes ago.

I do not want to repeat what has been said by other hon. members. However, there is one feature of this legislation I wish to mention, and that is the question of vacations with pay for people who have been employed for a considerable period. This is something to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred.

The bill falls short of the standard proposed by the Canadian Labour Congress, and in my view falls short of a reasonable standard. Why shouldn't employees who have been employed for a considerable period—I do not intend to stipulate a period but I would like to see it a short period—receive three weeks vacation with pay in this day and age of automation? I know as a professional man that I started getting three weeks vacation with pay after one year in the office in which I worked, and I cannot understand why those who spent a long period in industry—after 30, 20, or ten years of steady employment—should have their vacations cut short.

It has always been demonstrated that reasonably long vacations produce better workers and add to the productivity of industry. In this age of automation, when experts talk about the fact that they will have to pay us for not working, it seems ridiculous that we should be laying down a standard for Canada that does not recognize a minimum of at least three weeks vacation with pay for those who have been in steady employment in industry.

Many of the other things I would like to say can be said more appropriately at committee stage. There are various details we intend to discuss, but one matter I would like to mention now is the question of the regulations, because the success of so much of this bill will depend on the regulations. Much will depend on the exemptions which may be granted by the regulations, or upon the deferments that may be granted by them, and I urge the minister to make the details of the regulations available to the house as soon as possible. I know there are provisions for some of the regulations to appear in the Canada Gazette, but any hon. member who has tried to find things from the Canada Gazette knows how inadequate a means of publicity it is.

Under clause 51 there is provision that upon the submission "of any person" the minister may defer or exclude the application of part I of the bill, dealing with hours of work, etc. I am not suggesting this is not entirely necessary, but I am wondering why it would not be possible to ensure, by some specific provision, that before this is done adequate notice be given to the employees who might be affected, or to their unions, so that they too can attend and make submissions. Presumably in the first instance "any person" would be an employer, and I think it would be unfortunate if under clause 51, and also under clause 52, submissions were made by one party without the other parties involved being notified. In that respect I think the bill could be improved.

In summary, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say once more that we welcome this legislation, in our opinion long delayed but welcome none the less. There are specific improvements we would like to see made to it, and we urge that the measure be regarded merely as a start. In this age of automation any standards we adopt today will be inadequate shortly hereafter. We should be constantly pressing forward to improve our standards in this field of labour legislation, and by doing so we would benefit not only those directly affected but also the community as a whole.

No one benefits from depressed conditions in industry, whether directly involved in industry or not. A community that has enough sense in this age of automation to shorten hours, to provide adequate vacations, to provide adequate minimum wages and does so will go forward, and any other sort of community will not.

Mr. H. E. Gray (Essex South): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have the opportunity to rise and say a few brief words in support of this legislation creating a Canada labour standards code. When I say this I know I reflect the views of a great many members on this side of the house, some who entered it in 1962 and others who entered it in 1963, because this proposal formed an important part of the program on which we sought election in those two years.

I think it could also be pointed out that some of the happenings of a more sensational nature in this house have tended to obscure the fact, to a quite significant degree, many of the other important measures in that program have already been presented to parliament and put into effect. One example is the area development agency and another is the government's tax incentive program. Now we have the Canada labour standards code presented and this has been done, so far as I and the other Liberal members to whom I have referred are concerned, not because of any prodding by hon. members on the other side of the house but because of our own belief in and feeling of conviction with respect to the need for this type of legislation.

Though reference was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) to 1919—it must be some type of mystic number for the N.D.P.—in this respect his was a voice of and from the past. The fact is that members of the Liberal party who entered the house in 1962 and 1963 made pledges during those elections, pledges which were part of the program on which we campaigned. It is a source of gratification to us that this legislation has been presented to parliament less than two years since the government took office, and within less than three years of the pledges which members such as I made when seeking election to the house. I suggest it is only realistic to look at this matter in the context of today's world of economics and labour relations.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre yesterday thanked the government on behalf of the organized labour movement, but it has occurred to me that when one considers the number of union members not affiliated with the N.D.P., and the fact that many Liberal members from urban areas could not possibly have been elected without the support of men and women who are members of unions, many of which are indeed formally affiliated with the N.D.P., one must conclude that the hon. member extended himself a bit too far in expressing thanks on behalf of the entire labour movement and everyone in it. I say this with the greatest respect to the hon. member, and with respect for his contributions to the fields in which he has worked.

This bill, covering approximately half a million workers in private industry under federal jurisdiction, will undoubtedly serve as an example to the provinces of what similar standards under their jurisdiction should be, and the present situation in Ontario shows how this type of example—or pressure if you like—is needed. Yesterday the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) suggested that the regulations of the Ontario provincial government were recently modified, so that in some areas the minimum wage is $1 per hour while in other areas it is $1.25 per hour. In fairness to him I mention that he said that if he was not accurate he wished to be corrected. It is my understanding that a rate of $1.25 per hour applies only in Ottawa, Hamilton, Toronto zones, and formerly in some other industrial areas. For other workers, different rates have been set which are to increase at various intervals until $1 an hour will be the rate for both male and female workers by the end of 1965. In addition there are special rates provided for certain industries; the highest of them is $1.25 for construction industry workers.

Surely the province of Ontario has reached a point at which a minimum wage of $1.25 can be set now without any dislocation being caused.

It is unfortunate that the government of Ontario has adopted a regional approach to the minimum wage question but has not as yet adopted a regional approach when it comes to providing tax incentives to encourage industry to establish itself in areas which were or are areas of slow growth. If it is correct that the level of the economy in certain parts of Ontario will not support a minimum wage of $1.25—and this I cannot accept—I would think the province has an obligation to its people to co-operate fully with the federal government in its efforts to help slow growth regions catch up with the rest of the country.

I believe the establishment of this minimum wage will in itself increase purchasing power and thereby provide an outlet, and improve the market for goods and services throughout this country. I should like to refer in this context to an article which appeared recently in the Financial Times. Mr.

W. G. Brayley, president of Johnson and Johnson, Ltd., is reported as having welcomed Bill C-126. In fact, he said, with regard to it: "It will help the economy by putting more disposal income in peoples' pockets".

When it comes to the setting of national standards, this is an area in which the federal government really, in my view, needs to do a great deal more than in the past. There is a continuing and growing need for a level of government to which people in this country can turn with respect to their needs and interests as Canadians, not just as citizens of Ontario, or of British Columbia, for example. Having regard to the relative smallness of our population and our open economy, and we must conduct our affairs in a way which will permit us to survive as a country in a world of common markets and free trade areas, and without decreasing and in fact with improvements in our standard of living. This means the existence of a national government capable of maintaining a strong internal market for our goods and services without it being hampered by provincial barriers—a government capable of co-ordinating the economy so as to provide the same basic standards and opportunities for all Canadians.

There are a number of ways in which the federal government can achieve these goals. One is by taking the lead in areas which are clearly within its jurisdiction and setting an example for the rest of the country to follow, as has been done in the case of the present bill. Another is the achievement of desired results through constant co-operation and consultation with the provinces. This is a course we certainly must follow. Nevertheless we cannot put aside the possibility of restructuring government activities even though this might mean the granting of more, rather than less responsibility to the federal government in certain areas of activity, whatever may be the case in others. We shall be obliged to recognize the changes which are taking place in the organization of industry and the counterveiling changes in the organization of the labour movement itself. We must ask ourselves whether matters involving an entire industry operating on a nation-wide basis or even those of a large company with a number of plants spread across the various provinces can be effectively dealt with in the public interest within the restrictions of ten provincial boundaries. The same considerations apply to adjustment to technological change and adjustments to changes in trade patterns. The European countries we have to face in competition for markets have in at least one instance an economy-wide agreement between labour and management. In other instances they have industry-wide agreements, all of this obviously based on a system of government supervision of similar breadth.

There is no question that our economic growth to date justifies the minimum standards imposed by this legislation, standards which, I suggest, with the continued development of our economy, are just a beginning. I am pleased therefore to support this initiative of our federal government to give an example which will help create basic standards and opportunities for all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Caouette (Villeneuve): Mr. Speaker, Bill No. C-126 concerns hours of work, minimum wages, annual vacations and holidays with pay in federal works, undertakings and businesses.

Evidently, it concerns the labourers employed by the federal government. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Gray) stated that 500,000 employees or more would be affected directly or indirectly by this legislative measure and that the whole nation, in his opinion, would benefit from it. As Bill No. C-126 will constitute an increase in purchasing power, it will stimulate the economy of our country. Mention has been made of hours of work, and some hon. members have suggested 40-hour, 36-hour and even 32-hour weeks; some have suggested a minimum hourly rate of $1.25, while the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) suggested $1.50 per hour.

After all those suggestions, a fact still remains: it was mentioned a while ago by a member of the New Democratic party, I believe, that automation, is bound to play, even in the federal administration, a predominant role, the importance of which will be ever increasing, and this means that some of the 500,000 federal employees will eventually be replaced by machines.

Whether they be I.B.M.s or new inventions, it is none the less true that those employees will be replaced by machines. That is the problem which we will have to face. This exists at present in private industry and does not concern the federal or provincial governments, but strikes break out in that field to protest against automation or the substitution of machines for men.

In my opinion, the time has come for the federal government to face the problem which at present exists in Canada and which becomes more serious every day, that is, man against the machine. It must be clearly established whether the use of the machine must punish men or whether the machine must serve them.

These two different approaches to the problem are altogether different.

If the machine has been invented to punish men, let us continue to procrastinate as we are now doing. If the machine must serve men, let us consider the problem from that angle.

The government is suggesting a minimum wage of $1.25 per hour. I would say to the Minister of Labour that he should guarantee, not only a minimum wage, but a minimum income to all Canadian workers, to all Canadians without exception, so that they may have enough purchasing power to buy the products made by the machines.

We have two solutions before us: On the one hand, socialism, which would like men to serve the machine; on the other hand, private enterprise or social credit, if you prefer, would like the machine to serve men. There is a world of difference between the two.

The first system, we see in operation some periods of the year, for instance, during the winter works period. The Minister of Labour is perfectly aware of what I mean. In wintertime we pay for winter works and, in my area, the federal government has set 60 per cent of manpower as its contribution and the provincial government pays 40 per cent; municipalities and unorganized parishes do not have to pay for that much.

In wintertime when the weather is extremely cold we put machines away and force men to work in temperatures of 40 or 50 degrees below zero. Why? For employment under the winter works act.

Then, we see machines, steam shovels left idle in warehouses. Mechanical arms are at rest while human arms must work to earn what the government agrees to pay.

Mr. Speaker, we are told that automation must be put at the service of mankind. Is that what we do during the wintertime?

The Minister of Labour would be logical in introducing this bill if he said to us: "We will purchase the products of those machines and let the people of Canada enjoy them."

Why punish men with machines? Why tolerate unemployment because men have been replaced by machines? Why not say that we will make it possible for men to benefit from the work done by machines?

It seems to me that would be more social, more humane and more Christian than to set the machines aside and keep men working in wintertime regardless of time or place.

Mr. Speaker, the establishment of minimum wages will not matter much if men are replaced by machines.

What does the minister suggest to help the men and women who are thus replaced at work?

The government is aware that at present in federal services, certain equipment is not being used so as to prevent the lay-off of employees with 15 or 20 years of service, of experienced civil servants in government employ for 20 or 25 years. Since it is not the intention to replace them by modern equipment, this is another refusal to make man benefit from scientific progress.

The human being is considered to be like a beast of burden instead of a superior being who must be subjected all those inventions and automatic equipment available today.

Whether minimum wages be of $1.25 instead of $1.50 matters little to those who do not earn any wages. It matters little, as was pointed out yesterday by my colleague from Lapointe (Mr. Grégoire), to a man who now works 48 hours a week at $1 per hour, if he works 40 hours at $1.25, since he will earn the same salary. That will not improve his living conditions. So, if I were minister of labour, after the minimum wages I would have added a minimum income for each Canadian. Any person living in Canada is entitled to his share of the national wealth. In my opinion, it is time we passed legislation aimed at respecting the existence of each and every individual person living in Canada.

We also talk of annual leave, of legal holidays in federal works, undertakings or businesses, and here I refer to paragraph (f) in clause 2 of Bill No. C-126, which reads:

"general holiday" means New Year's day, Good Friday, Victoria day, Dominion day, Labour day, Thanksgiving day and Christmas day and includes any day substituted for any such holiday pursuant to section 28.

For what reason did the Minister of Labour not include in that paragraph what we adopted on division, almost unanimously last Friday night, according to the 14th report of the committee on procedure and organization:

2.(4) Notwithstanding the provisions of section 1 of this standing order, and unless otherwise ordered, the house shall not sit on any of the following days: New Year's day, Good Friday, the day fixed for the celebration of the birthday of the sovereign, St. John the Baptist day, Dominion day, Labour day, Thanksgiving day, Remembrance day, Christmas day.

Remembrance day and St. John the Baptist day were left out in subparagraph (f) of clause 2 of Bill No. C-126.

Why does not the Minister of Labour give the federal employees exactly the same legal holidays as those we voted for the House of Commons? Parliamentary employees will get them. Why should not all federal employees get them, since that proposal was passed by the house last week?

Mr. Speaker, I will not speak any longer on the bill at this stage. We will have another opportunity to do so at the committee stage.

However, I will say this: We hope Social Credit will establish a labour policy which will enable workers to feel, at last, that they are citizens in the economic context of their country. We should respect the human person and realize he is an important individual.

Let us put science, progress, machinery, automation, in short, all new inventions, at the service of each and every Canadian citizen. I believe we would then be rendering service not only to the worker but also to labour unions and to the Canadian people generally, because the purchasing power would be increased considerably. This purchasing power should not be unduly increased without taking the country's economy and production into account, but it should be based on what Canada can produce by means of all this science which is at our service and which should benefit the whole of the Canadian people.

I am convinced that every Canadian would then enjoy economic security and his individual liberty would also be assured and respected.

Mr. Steven Otto (York East): Mr. Speaker, the minister has received many accolades from all corners of the house regarding this bill. Everyone is welcoming the bill and is happy with it. May I say I also am happy with it, subject to what I will have to say in a little while. But more than anything else I do want to say that the page boys are very happy with the bill, and I hope that when the minister spoke about the young people under 17 and said his department was so anxious to make sure that young people carried on with their education he was thinking of the page boy who brought him his glass of water. Between yourself, Mr. Speaker, and the minister I hope we are finally going to bring in some decent regulations for these boys so that they will not have to work 11½ to 12 hours a day.

Mr. Orlikow: They are not covered by the bill either.

Mr. Otto: Well, I hope they will be. Bill No. C-126 is a nice neat little bill.

I was particularly interested in the minister's description of this measure as being legislation which will break new ground. I hope that he will not create the impression in the minds of the people across this country that this measure represents the reform promised by the Liberal party. I think the minister was much more accurate in his conclusion that this legislation was in accord with accepted practice, because I think in reality that is what it is.

I was pleased to note that the minister said new legislation will be forthcoming which will in fact be complementary to this measure, and truly legislation of reform. I am sure that following the presentation of that complementary legislation we will be in a position to assert that this party is truly a party of reform and that we are facing the issues which beset labour. I have no doubt that this bill does fulfil the promise made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson), but I disagree with the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) when he suggests that this measure will also fulfil the promises made by the Liberal party. There is a far greater promise to be met in respect of the reform promised by this party. That promise as it relates to the Department of Labour has not as yet been fulfilled, and will remain outstanding until that time when the minister introduces what he has referred to as complementary legislation in connection with labour standards.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? I should be very interested to hear the hon. member outline the details in connection with this complementary legislation and reform in this field which should be carried out.

Mr. Otto: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the hon. member that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) indicated the direction in which this reform might move. The hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin) indicated that automation was creating a problem that keeps many people across this nation awake at nights wondering what is going to happen. I am sure most of us will agree with him in that regard. None of the members in that corner of this house, or in any other corner, have put forward any solutions to this problem. I am sure that when the minister presents his complementary legislation it will consist of sensible reform measures, and will provide an answer to this great problem.

Mr. Speaker, I hope when the minister presents this complementary legislation he will tackle one other thing I believe should be included in any labour standards. As the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray) has said, there are many things to be done. I should like to see a solution found in respect of labour strikes. Surely it will be recognized that even after 100 years the procedure for bargaining, particularly in respect of strikes, has not changed, much to the detriment of the nation. Uncounted millions have been lost both in production and in wages as a result of labour strikes. Surely the time has arrived when we should adopt or recommend new procedures for bargaining and settling disputes that arise. If we hope to assist in solving the disputes of nations, surely we should be able to find some solution to labour disputes so as to avoid this tremendous loss in production and wages.

When the minister brings forward this complementary legislation I am sure he will show himself to be a young, vigorous reformer, and his party to be truly a party of reform. In the meantime this measure is welcomed by all, and particularly by the page boys for whom I speak.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I think it was Abraham Lincoln who said on one occasion, "God protect me from my friends because I can look after my enemies myself." That thought occurred to me as I listened to the remarks of the members of the Liberal party who extolled the virtues of this bill and of the Minister of Labour (Mr. MacEachen).

The hon. member for York East (Mr. Otto) suggested that this minister might have a solution to the problem created by automation. That problem has confounded the experts of the industrialized countries of the world. That hon. member suggests there is an answer or solution to the problems created by strikes. I suggest that if there is an answer which is acceptable to both labour and management in a democratic society, neither the minister nor any other person interested in this field has found it. The hon. member talks about losses as a result of strikes, but forgets to indicate that we are losing more man hours of production in one week, even today during this period of relatively full employment, than we ever lost in the past several years as a result of all the strikes which have taken place in Canada. I do not think the contribution made by the hon. member for York East has really helped us in this debate.

Mr. Speaker, I was surprised by the defensive attitude taken by the hon. member for Essex West (Mr. Gray) and the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro). One would think that in their view it would be better if Mackenzie King had never lived. One would think from their remarks that it was a terrible thing that Mackenzie King assumed the leadership of the Liberal party in 1919 and pledged that party to work toward a national labour code which would include a minimum wage, holidays with pay, statutory holidays and those other things dealt with in the bill now before us.

When hon. members in this part of the house refer to the history of 1919 and the Liberal party program of that day we are not being critical, but is regrettable that it has taken the Liberal party 45 years to fulfil the promise made by a Liberal convention at that time. I should like to point out to the hon. member for Essex West that the Liberal party was in power in this country during 34 of those 45 years, so that legislation of this kind could have been placed before the house during that period. Perhaps I should also remind the hon. member that the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Martin) has been a member of this house since 1935 and served under that former prime minister and leader of the Liberal party, Mr. Mackenzie King, and that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) was brought into public office by that same gentleman.

I do not think the hon. member should confuse this house and becloud the record by suggesting that the Minister of Labour is only responsible for the promises made by his party in 1962 and 1963. That hon. minister is a member of the Liberal party and entitled to accept all the credit for the things it has done, belated as they may be, but he must also accept the responsibility for this party's history of procrastination and delay over a period of 45 years.

We in this party greet the introduction of this legislation with enthusiasm and intend to support it, but it seems to us there are some very important and fundamental questions to be answered by the minister, in respect of legislation and administration, if this bill is to be effective. We must ask some very searching questions. If there is one thing which is certain it is that no legislation has been more difficult for provincial governments to administer and enforce than the minimum wage laws of the various provinces. It seems obvious to me that the federal government is going to have the same kind of problem.

I am sorry that the estimates of the Department of Labour have been passed because I am convinced it will be impossible for the department to enforce this proposed legislation. I am convinced it will be impossible for the present staff of the Department of Labour to check employers who come under the jurisdiction of the federal government sufficiently well so that the people who are guaranteed the standards set forth in this legislation will receive the things to which they are entitled. I say that because I am satisfied from what I know of the Department of Labour that they simply do not have the required number of people on the staff to be able to make individual investigations of companies that come under federal jurisdiction to ensure that the employees who should be getting the rates of pay and other benefits provided in the bill will receive them. I hope the minister will be able to tell members of the house and the general public very soon what steps the department intends to take to make sure the provisions of the legislation will be enforced by the federal Department of Labour.

This is not a criticism of the department. I am sure many members of the house saw the news report that appeared in one of the Ottawa papers quite recently in which it was stated that a check made by the Ontario department of labour a short period of time after their new minimum wage law came into effect had resulted in the department being able to secure adjustments in pay amounting to $20,000 or $30,000 for people who were covered by the new provisions of the Ontario act but were not being paid the new rates. I cite this simply as an illustration of the kind of problem that I think the Department of Labour will have to face in administering the act, and I certainly hope they will make sure that the legislation is lived up to by employers who come under the jurisdiction of the federal Department of Labour.

I should like to join with other members of the house in all groups who have deplored the fact that the Yukon and Northwest Territories are excluded from the provisions of the bill. I should like to remind hon. members that in the Yukon and Northwest Territories a substantial number of the people living there are of Indian ethnic origin. I have figures taken from the 1961 census which show that of the 14,500 people in the Yukon, 2,000 are Indians and of the 23,000 people in the Northwest Territories almost 5,000 are Indians.

The whole record in Canada of the treatment of the Indian people has been such that consistently the Indians have earned less than other people in Canada. I have some figures with me which were prepared by the dominion bureau of statistics on the basis of the 1961 census and I think they illustrate the problem very graphically. For the year ended June 1, 1961 the average annual earnings of all Canadian workers, on wages or salaries, was $3,192 while the average earnings of all Indians who worked were $1,661 or just over half.

Here we have a bill which places a floor of $1.25 an hour on wages for all people who come under federal jurisdiction. It seems to me that if the government is serious in wanting to raise the standards of Canadian citizens particularly of the original people of Canada, the Indians and the Eskimos, it really makes no sense at all to exclude the Yukon and the Northwest Territories from the provisions of this legislation. In a report prepared for the province of Manitoba on Manitoba's economic future it was estimated that the per capita earned income of Indians in northern Manitoba was only $155 a year. I am certain that if the same kind of study were made of the economic position of the Indian and Eskimo population of the Yukon and Northwest Territories we would find that the annual earned income of these people would be no higher than the Indians of northern Manitoba to whom I have referred.

Mr. Nielsen: Much lower.

Mr. Rhéaume: Lower.

Mr. Orlikow: The members from the Yukon and Northwest Territories say it is lower. That makes the case even more depressing and tragic. Before we come to the clause by clause study of the bill I would urge the minister to give serious consideration to agreeing to an amendment or, better still, to bringing in an amendment which will include the Yukon and Northwest Territories. It may be there are reasons for exclusion which seem valid. It may be that the government feels that in the not too distant future these areas will be provinces. They may feel that these are matters which should be dealt with by the territorial councils. There may be other reasons of which I am not aware; but whatever the reasons or excuses may be I do not believe they are valid.

I do not think the government should exclude from the provisions of the bill now before us a group of people who are under the jurisdiction of the federal government. I think the federal government has a responsibility and duty to cover these people.

Mr. Nielsen: All Canadians.

Mr. Orlikow: And all Canadians but, of course, that raises the question of the divided jurisdiction in the field of labour between the federal and provincial governments. I do not want to discuss now what can be done about this over the long term but I do suggest to the government that they should not shirk their responsibility and duty in respect of the people of the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

There is one more point which I think we need to have explained. While the bill covers all employees who come under federal jurisdiction, certain clauses give the minister the right to grant exemptions and to set lower rates. In addition the bill provides for lower rates to be permitted under the regulations, which I presume will be drafted after the bill is passed. It seems to me we should have some indication from the minister of the kind of exemptions he might consider granting. I would hope there would be as few exemptions as possible; in fact, I would hope there would be none. But it does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, that there are now a large number of employees covered by federal legislation who will be in a difficult situation in the period of transition.

I am thinking, for example, of certain railway employees. The sleeping, dining and parlour car employees of the railways, under the collective agreement under which they work for the railway companies, are working a basic 208 hours per month for a monthly salary. This agreement was signed after negotiations between their union and the railway companies. Now, Mr. Speaker, the wage of a railway porter, for example, is $334.08 per month for a 208 hour month. This works out at $1.61 per hour, which is substantially more than the minimum wage set by this bill.

However, Mr. Speaker, since this bill only provides for a 40 hour week with overtime pay on time and a half basis for 8 hours more per week, this means that unless the railways are given exemption from this provision for these employees, their monthly working hours would have to be reduced by 34. If their pay were reduced by that number of hours at $1.61 per hour it would mean a reduction in pay of $54 per month. If this measure is applied to these employees, and I think it should apply to all employees, it seems to me it should contain a provision to the effect that there should be no reduction in the take home pay of any workers as a result of the implementation of this bill. In the case which I have used as an illustration, the annual rate of pay for these people works out to just over $4,000. If the hours worked are reduced to the maximum of 48 per week as provided for by the bill, their take home pay would be reduced to $3,350 a year. This is a rather substantial reduction for any person to suffer. However it seems to me that this question ought to be considered by the minister before we complete the clause by clause consideration of the bill.

I join with all members of this house, I think, who have welcomed the introduction of this bill. Those of us who have had experience in labour matters know that no matter how good the provisions of a bill may look on paper, they are not of much use unless the enforcement of them is taken seriously by the government. Unless this measure is policed, and unless the employees concerned are informed publicly of the rights which they have, the measure will not be of much value. It seems to me that before we complete our study of this bill we ought to hear from the minister in some considerable detail as to how his department intends to administer it, how it intends to enforce the provisions of the bill which, in principle, have been greeted favourably by the members of the house.

Mr. Cantelon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It is a question of privilege which concerns many thousands of veterans of the two wars who risked their lives for this country and, in particular, it is a question of privilege that relates to the thousands who paid the supreme sacrifice. It is disgraceful that in the holidays provided by clause 2, paragraph (f), Remembrance day is not listed. The veterans must consider earnestly—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order; I am wondering if the hon. member does not feel that his point of privilege, since it refers specifically to a clause in the bill, should be brought up when we are considering the individual clauses of the bill. As the hon. member well knows, on second reading we can only consider the principle of the bill and we cannot discuss the separate clauses. I suggest to the hon. member that the point he seeks to make at this time might be more properly made when we are in committee.

Mr. Cantelon: I know that, sir, but I was hoping that the clause could be changed before we get to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now, he will close the debate.

Hon. A. J. MacEachen (Minister of Labour): I should like to thank hon. members who have taken part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, and who have been so generous in their acceptance of the principle of a national Canadian labour standards code. I have listened with great interest to the contributions made by all hon. members and I thank them for the way in which they have dealt with the bill on second reading and for the many thoughtful suggestions that have been put forward.

The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), has referred to the role of the late Mackenzie King in the development of the labour policy of the Liberal party. No more apt reference could be made, particularly on a bill of this kind, than the reference made to Mr. Mackenzie King because of the impetus he gave to the development of a fair wage policy in Canada. This resulted from his examination of the garment industry in Toronto. It was because he became disturbed by the disgraceful conditions that prevailed there that subsequently, through the co-operation of his friend, Mr. Mulock, there was inserted in later government contracts a fair wage clause. Hon. members can make this point at a later time, perhaps when we are amending the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

It might be of interest for hon. members to review, as I have attempted to do, the development and application of this fair wage policy to government contracts. In a sense the application, with the exception of the construction industry, has not gone very far beyond the principles that were applied by Mr. King in his early days as deputy minister of labour. I am not, therefore, defensive about Mr. King and his development of labour policy because I think this bill we are considering is, if not a close, at least a clear historical link to the development of the Canadian labour department.

Mr. Knowles: His ghost has been bothering you.

Mr. MacEachen: No, there had been no danger in that respect.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

As I indicated, I should like to deal with a number of points that were made by hon. members during the debate on second reading.

It is the intention of the government to proceed with a bill in the field of occupational safety, or safety in employment. I have learned the lesson connected with indicating deadlines for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), so I intend to resist the temptation of establishing a deadline for the safety in employment legislation, but it is now being drafted and will be proceeded with as soon as possible.

Mr. Knowles: Will that be at this session?

Mr. MacEachen: The application of standards arising from this particular bill will be incorporated, so far as certain categories of federal contracts are concerned, in amendments to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act. While hon. members have drawn attention to the substantial impact this bill will have on the classes of employment directly affected, in my judgment the application of certain of these standards to federal government contracts will also be very considerable in certain parts of the country and that, of course, will become clear if we have an opportunity this session, as I hope we might, to deal with the amendments to the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act.

I can understand the concern of the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Rhéaume) and other hon. members, that labour standards be applied to these two territories. It is not a fact, as has been stated, that this bill is inapplicable to employment in the Yukon and Northwest Territories. This bill will apply to all the federal businesses that are listed operating in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon, such as railways, and all the classes that are listed in clause 3.

Mr. Nielsen: Why are they singled out then?

Mr. MacEachen: This bill will apply to all the federal businesses and undertakings operating in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. What is excluded are those businesses or activities that are normally under provincial jurisdiction. These are all that are excluded from the operation of this bill.

Mr. Nielsen: Would the minister permit me to suggest to him that perhaps he does not appreciate the fact that the territorial administration of the Yukon is on all fours with provincial administration, so that there would appear to be no reason for excluding the Yukon, and I believe also the Northwest Territories, any more than there would be to exclude any of the ten provinces?

Mr. MacEachen: Except that if this exception were not made in this way it could have the effect of overriding the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act. For example, I understand the Yukon Act empowers the commissioner in council to make ordinances in relation to property and civil rights in the territory, and in relation to practically all matters of a local and private nature in the territory. The federal parliament, as I understand it, by not including this exception would override the authority of the commissions or territorial councils in the administration of matters that were assigned to these bodies by the parliament of Canada; so that we are, by this exclusion, respecting the authority that has been assigned to these councils.

Mr. Orlikow: Can the minister tell members of the house whether the territorial councils have passed minimum wage laws, similar to the provincial minimum wage laws, which give some protection to those nine tenths of the working people in those territories who will not be covered by this legislation?

Mr. MacEachen: Is the question, have they?

Mr. Orlikow: Yes.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, there have been labour ordinances passed by the Northwest Territories and by the Yukon, and I might be able to indicate in committee the exact nature of these ordinances. But the point is that we are leaving to the commissions the jurisdiction that is normally exercised by the provinces, and that we are exercising the full jurisdiction in these territories that we are exercising in the provinces.

Mr. Nielsen: Just briefly, as it is approaching six o'clock, and so that members could discuss it this evening before the bill reaches committee stage, I want to suggest to the minister that there is no fundamental difference between the powers vested in the legislative council in the Yukon—the commissioner in council—and those which are vested in the provincial legislatures under section 91 of the British North America Act, and so I can see no real reason for the exception to be made.

Mr. MacEachen: I am not arguing that particular point. As I understand it, if we did not make this particular exception—and I would be delighted to check this further—we could automatically override the authority that has been conferred under the Yukon Act and the Northwest Territories Act. Since 1953 the federal government has made this exception. In 1954 the Female Employees Equal Pay Act made this exception. The Annual Vacations Act, introduced by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Starr) had this exception, and the safety in employment bill, which the hon. member for Ontario moved two years ago, also had this exception. This is recognition of the principle that the territorial councils are gradually assuming more and more responsibility for local matters in the territories, and it seems advisable that they should handle the problems of regulating labour conditions in local businesses.

It has been a consistent policy of both governments to maintain this exclusion. It is also a practical question that I think hon. members would want to consider, whether the standards that have been incorporated in this bill are appropriate standards for local operations in the territories? We, in the preparation of this bill, with this exclusion in mind, have given no real, intensive examination to the situation that would develop in service establishments in the territories, for example restaurants, service stations and small stores, if these standards were applied. It is for that reason we felt it ought to be left to the ordinances, especially since the councils have already been moving in the direction of regulating local labour conditions.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and later the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Thompson), discussed the question of general holidays, and certainly their feelings was that the seven general holidays with pay might not be a sufficient standard. There are several points of principle I would like to deal with, inasmuch as this was raised as a matter of principle on the second reading of the bill. I am sure hon. members appreciate that this bill is intended to provide minimum standards which we expect to enforce, and we have to be assured that the standards we set are reasonable and will have common or general acceptance. In this bill we are not aiming to set the pace for collective bargaining, nor should we. However, we hope to ensure for unorganized employees, or those whose bargaining position is weak, the fruits of progress which others are enjoying and which have been obtained through collective bargaining.

In the light of this principle, seven holidays seems to be the appropriate standard. According to our estimates, 10 per cent of the employees to whom the code will directly apply are not now getting as many as seven paid holidays, while some of the 10 per cent are not getting any. One factor which has been of persuasive importance to me is this: In the railway industry where there have been strong unions for many years, the non-operating employees, the largest group, have through collective bargaining established seven paid holidays, we are meeting this standard. If we were to adopt the standard of eight holidays, for example, we would be adopting a standard which has been obtained by only 54 per cent of the employees within the scope of the legislation. So we would be legislating for a group of employees amounting to almost half those who come within our jurisdiction, and this in our judgment would be beyond the proper limit for a bill which proposes minimum standards.

Mr. Knowles: Before the minister leaves that point, would he comment, if he sees some way to do so, upon the fact that under the Civil Service Act nine statutory holidays are provided? In other words, this is the number of holidays all civil servants get. Does there not seem to be a considerable gap between nine holidays and the seven specified in this bill?

Mr. MacEachen: There is a gap, of course. What we are doing in this legislation is this: We are obliging private employers to observe certain minimum standards. We expect to enforce this bill and make it obligatory. In so doing we have to take into account the results of collective bargaining and the impact this measure will have generally on the labour force under our jurisdiction. In these circumstances it seems to me that the proposal for seven statutory holidays is reasonable. To go to eight would be to legislate for a large part of the labour force. The hon. member should bear in mind that we are legislating here for minimum standards.

I realize there is some significance in the fact that nine statutory holidays are provided for government employees under the Civil Service Act. However, hon. members may wish to consider whether what the government as an employer decides to do is always an appropriate standard to apply to private employers in the economy.

The question of the actual holidays specified here has been raised by hon. members. The ones included in the bill are I think the accepted holidays, although there is a provision that other holidays may be substituted. For example Dominion day and Victoria day are each established as legal holidays by other statutes; the names are established by other statutes. So we have to observe these days.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and the hon. member for Winnipeg North dealt with the important question of reconciling the provisions as to hours of work with the take home pay of employees. As I pointed out in my opening statement, the application of the 40-hour week provision in circumstances where excessive hours have been worked would result in a drastic reduction in take home pay. We have wrestled with this problem. That is why in this particular bill we have made provision for a transitional period of 18 months so that in the introduction of standards its effect can be taken into account. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said he would not want the result to be seriously damaging. We have reached the conclusion that, given the time factor, 18 months after January 1, 1965; given the bargaining opportunities which will be available, and given the reluctance of employers—and I think they will be reluctant—to reduce take home pay, the result over that period will not be seriously damaging. Having said this I return to what I said in my opening statement, namely that excessive hours of work can be bad for health. They certainly lead to industrial accidents and to inefficiency and maybe it is better for workers to have additional leisure in certain circumstances and more time for rest. Certainly, having looked at some of the statistics which are available on the class of workers likely to be affected most, I conclude there is no doubt they are working too many hours a week.

Mr. Knowles: Would the minister permit a further question?

An hon. Member: Filibuster.

Mr. Knowles: I admit that I ask it in view of the fact that he has had some experience in setting a deadline. Does he feel it is sufficient merely to set a deadline? What happens if within the 18 months period the necessary adjustments have not been made to ensure that certain employees do not suffer reductions in take home pay?

Mr. Churchill: Agreed.

Mr. MacEachen: The alternative of course is to provide that at the end of the period the take home pay shall not be dropped, despite the reduction in hours.

Mr. Knowles: I do not see it in the bill.

Mr. MacEachen: No, because it is not there. That is the alternative, and it does involve, first of all, almost insuperable administrative difficulties. In the second place it involves legislative increases in the hourly rates beyond the minimum—

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. MacEachen: —and the introduction of a new principle.

Motion agreed to and bill read the second time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: May I ask the acting leader of the house whether we shall continue with legislation tomorrow or carry on with the estimates as already outlined?

Mr. MacNaught: Tomorrow we will take the second reading and the committee stage and, if the house is agreeable, the third reading stage of Bill No. C-123 to amend certain acts administered in the Department of Insurance.

Mr. McIlraith: That is to go to committee.

Mr. MacNaught: I beg your pardon; after second reading it will go to committee.

Then we shall take up consideration of the balance of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce and the votes referring to Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation under the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General. At the conclusion of these remnants we will consider the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Churchill: May I ask whether concurrence in the eleventh report of the procedure committee will be asked for tomorrow or on Friday?

Mr. MacNaught: I understand that the hon. member who is charged with that report proposes to move its adoption tomorrow.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, October 15, 1964

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

CONSIDERATION OF PROPOSED ADDRESS TO HER MAJESTY

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the house may I state that after consultation with the Prime Minister and the leaders of all the other parties it has been agreed that the motion expressing loyalty and gratitude to Her Majesty the Queen will be proposed when we meet tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

LIBRARY OF PARLIAMENT

REPORT OF JOINT COMMITTEE ON CERTAIN PAY REVISIONS

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to lay before the house a report from the committee of both houses on the library of parliament with respect to certain revisions of the rates of pay of employees of the library of parliament.

CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

ANNOUNCEMENT OF AGREEMENT ON METHOD OF AMENDMENT

[Translation]

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to inform the house of an agreement which will be a landmark in the constitutional evolution of Canada. After years of stalemate, the federal and provincial governments agreed yesterday afternoon, on a definite text conferring on Canadians themselves the unlimited and exclusive power to amend the British North America Act.

As the representative of the federal government in the discussions which preceded the final agreement, I want to pay tribute to my provincial colleagues—attorneys general and other ministers—for their broadmindedness and their patriotism. These statesmen's arduous labour helped the government to define a formula ensuring the dignity of Canada and the freedom of each of its governments.

[Text]

The text of the amending formula announced yesterday by the Prime Minister and premiers is the fruit of arduous and statesmanlike labour by all Canadian governments, both federal and provincial. It was imposed on no one, but forged from the free consent of men who recognize themselves as Canadians first. As chairman of the preparatory conference of attorneys general I was proud that my colleagues adopted unanimously the following resolution, moved by Nova Scotia and seconded by Manitoba:

> That the report made by the chairman at the end of the conference this morning, together with the consolidated formula submitted by the federal delegation bearing date October 8, 1964, as amended in accordance with the report of the drafting committee dated October 13, 1964, and adopted this morning, be submitted to the conference of Prime Minister and premiers as the report of this conference of attorneys general.

By accepting our draft with like unanimity the Prime Minister and premiers swept away the anachronism that has for too long clouded our status as a fully independent country. Once again they proved that our federation rests upon a deep and abiding unity.

I am pleased to assure hon. members that the government of Canada intends to place the new amending formula on the order paper at the earliest convenient moment. After the Canadian parliament has adopted the formula in a joint address, and after each province has formally approved it as well, the parliament at Westminster will be asked to enact the formula as part of the constitution of Canada. I am sure that Canadian as well as British parliamentarians will be relieved to consider that this will be the last time such action will be required. As of that moment, Canada's constitution will indeed be wholly and truly Canadian.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, first may I say that Canadians as a whole will be glad to learn that their constitution will hereafter be in the custody and control of Canadians rather than being subject to what was described by the minister as the anachronism that has existed since confederation. We in this party endeavoured to bring about agreement. A formula was advanced by the then minister of justice, Hon. Davie Fulton, on behalf of the government of that day and it was all but accepted, though there were some reservations on the part of Quebec and greater reservations on the part of Saskatchewan which in those days had a C.C.F. government.

Once before I said there would be entire agreement with the objective which the conference had in mind. I have had the opportunity of looking over the draft, and I am not going to make any extended observations at this time. When the matter comes before the house there will be discussion regarding certain sections, but in no way would I want to leave the implication that we, who advanced the process of agreement and the achievement of a formula so far, are now in any way holding back. At the same time changes have been made. There are changes in section 91 and section 92 which will require careful and considered examination between now and the time the resolution or address is brought before parliament.

The minister did not say so, but I take it that should the address be accepted it will go to the parliament at Westminster in order to bring about the repatriation of the constitution. This is a rhetorical question at the moment, but I ask whether thereafter it will not be necessary that the constitution as a whole, in so far as it is embodied in the British North America Act, be brought before this parliament.

Dealing with one or two sections, and I shall refer to them briefly, the communiqué that was issued yesterday contained the following sentence on page 2:

> To provide for greater flexibility in the constitution, legislative powers may be delegated between the federal and provincial authorities under conditions specified in the formula.

I simply ask the question at this time, what will be the effect of the removal of section 91(1) and section 92(1)? Section 91(1) provides for amendments to the constitution in matters exclusively federal, with exceptions relating to language and the calling of parliament. Section 92(1) provides for amendments to the constitution of the provinces by the provincial legislatures. Thus these sections relate to amending powers of both the federal parliament and the provincial legislatures in matters within their legislative competence, and these have been excised.

Then there is another section that must be very carefully examined. That is the one authorizing Canada to make laws dealing with matters coming under subsections 6, 10, 13 and 16 of section 92, subject to the consent of each individual province. Those particular subsections deal with penitentiaries and local works and undertakings other than those under federal jurisdiction. They also deal with property and civil rights within a province, and generally all matters of a local and private nature within a province.

Under the draft the federal parliament will be permitted to legislate in certain enumerated fields hitherto exclusively under provincial jurisdiction, subject to the restrictions of consent by four provinces and the like; and incidentally the consent given may be subsequently revoked.

Then I am disappointed by the fact that no provision has been made for the incorporation of the bill of rights as an immediate amendment by agreement; because when the hon. gentlemen now sitting opposite were over here they used to press so strongly for a bill of rights which would be part of a constitutional amendment. At that time we could not bring it about because several of the provinces would not agree; but now that the excellent spirit of agreement to which reference has been made by the minister has been achieved, it strikes me as passing strange that a matter of such importance as the inclusion of a bill of rights could not have secured the necessary degree of agreement to have been incorporated among the changes.

Now I come to subsection 3 of the new section 94(A) which says that the legislature of a province may make laws in that province in relation to any matter coming within the legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada. The restrictions set out are consent by parliament to the enactment by the provinces; enactment of a similar statute by the legislatures of at least three other provinces, with consent subject to being revoked at any time by either the federal government or the provinces as the case may be. This is something which will require very careful examination since provision is made for the right of provinces, within the limitations and within the limited scope of the provisos, to legislate in matters which are exclusively within the federal power. In effect, four provinces are empowered to legislate by agreement within the federal field on any matter provided that a parliamentary majority is secured. I ask this question. Is this not exactly what I raised in the house, by way of questions, and which was denied on September 4 as reported at page 7655 of Hansard; and on September 3, as will be found on pages 7605 and 7606? I do not intend to read all these questions at this point—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The applause from over there indicates that the susceptibilities of hon. gentlemen opposite are being touched by what I am bringing before them. I asked a question then regarding statements made by Hon. Ross Thatcher, premier of the province of Saskatchewan, in which he dealt with these very matters, and the danger involved. I asked whether there was any suggestion that any of the provinces would have the authority to legislate in certain recognized federal fields such as immigration and the like, or would have any veto power over monetary or tariff policy. The Prime Minister replied "The answer to the last part of the question is no."

Well, I can understand the provinces agreeing to this. But, I ask, what is the effect likely to be on the federal authority? It opens up to provincial legislation, on the request of four provinces and with the approval of a federal parliamentary majority, such fields as immigration, monetary policy, tariffs, trade policy and matters affecting the native population of Canada, among others. Naturally the provinces would agree to such a proposal, but has there been that careful examination by the federal government, before consent was given, to the effects of abdicating, as it were, authority over these fields in order to achieve agreement? As I say, I do not intend to go further today than to question this particular formula regarding matters exclusively within the federal authority; for if my reading be correct there will be many who will ask whether the price being paid by the federal authority is not a very high one, for the acceptance of the repatriation of the constitution to Canada.

At the moment I go no further than to place before the house the implications inherent in giving to four provinces, provided there is a parliamentary majority in the Senate and the House of Commons, the right to legislate on matters which are exclusively within the federal authority, which one can believe is a course fraught with danger to the unity of our country in the years ahead.

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I regret that we in this party are not able to join in the mood of self congratulation which has surrounded the announcement of the agreement between the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister on a formula for repatriation or amendment within Canada of the Canadian constitution. In our opinion this occasion should not be one of national rejoicing but rather one of national mourning.

It would be much pleasanter if we could join in the congratulatory chorus; but even if the role of the prophetess Cassandra of ancient Homeric myth is not a popular one, we feel obliged to state the truth to this house as we see it. And the truth as we see it is that the agreed formula and the draft act which accompanies it will be a monumental error. If I may borrow the expression used by Professor Bora Laskin, an acknowledged constitutional expert, the adoption of this formula would be an unmitigated constitutional disaster.

No one denies the desirability of working out a formula for constitutional amendment which would enable the constitution of Canada to be amended within Canada. We in this party have frequently urged that this course be followed. But it would be immature for Canadians to allow this legitimate national aspiration to obscure the fact that what we are going to be asked to do is to exchange the easy yoke of a relic of colonialism for the self imposed bondage of a constitutional straitjacket.

The Fulon-Favreau formula, as it must now be known, is a formula for constitutional futility and absolute rigidity. The form of the communiqué issued and of the draft act itself which was attached to this communiqué obscure this reality; because the announcement states that as a general rule amendments may be made to the constitution by the parliament of Canada, acting with the concurrence of the legislatures of at least two thirds of the provinces representing at least 50 per cent of the population.

If this statement were true it would of course represent a reasonable degree of flexibility. Unfortunately it is not true. The exceptions, so called, to this general rule are infinitely more important than the general rule itself; in fact it is very hard to imagine anything that would fall within the general rule. The exceptions specifically mentioned in this act include any change in the constitution affecting any provision of the constitution of Canada relating to the powers of the legislature of a province to make laws, and state that such amendments cannot be made unless concurred in by the legislatures of all the provinces. This exception, so-called, covers the distribution of powers between the provincial legislatures and the federal parliament set out in sections 91 and 92 of the British North America Act.

This, as any person with any knowledge in this field knows, represents the very core of our constitutional system, and the formula in effect hands an absolute veto to every individual province in respect of amendments to that constitutional core. Even the United Nations, which has been plagued by the veto, gives that power of veto only to the great powers. We propose by this formula to hand it to every individual province no matter how small.

It is not only the substance of the proposed amending formula but the way it has been arrived at which calls for the strongest comment. This formula has been presented to the Canadian people as the result of a closed conference between the Minister of Justice and the attorneys general. We say that this hole in the corner procedure is totally unsatisfactory. For one thing, this parliament is being practically bypassed. It is true that we were allowed one day to debate this matter, but on that one day the Minister of Justice carefully refrained from stating what the attitude of the government was, or from seeking to justify the restrictive formula which is apparently proposed by the government.

In that debate the hon. member for Royal, speaking for the official opposition, and I, speaking for my own party, both suggested the importance, which has been mentioned today by the right hon. Leader of the Opposition, of linking an amending formula with the entrenchment of basic individual rights, creating a constitutional bill of rights. Our suggestions made in this parliament appear to be totally ignored in favour of this closed conference.

It seems to me that the government of Canada is not being carried on by the elected representatives of the people in parliament, but rather by the presentation to parliament of faits accomplis, arrived at in closed conferences. One must wonder who are the advisers who advised the government in this disastrous course. Do they include any known experts in the constitutional field in Canada or elsewhere? We are not told that. Have they or have they not warned the government of the danger of the inflexibility of the method of amendment which is now suggested?

According to a press statement the prime minister of Quebec, referring to the dangers of rigidity, used the expression that the formula "freezes" the constitutional rights of the provinces. Looking at the matter from the point of view perhaps now prevalent in the province of Quebec, a point of view which is concerned almost exclusively with expanding and protecting provincial rights, there may be something to be said for welcoming this freezing of the constitution. No one, least of all the party which I represent and for which I speak here, denies the importance of freezing, or entrenching as it is sometimes called, the basic rights of language, religion and education. But to freeze the general distribution of powers as they affect the whole broad field of social progress and labour legislation, marketing legislation and other economic matters, may well be disastrous to Canada's future.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say here that we in this party will fight this formula as vigourously as we can. We urge that before it is too late Canadians as a whole give careful and detailed study to what is involved in this proposed formula, and we urge Canadians to let the government know before it is too late that they are not in favour, under the guise of protecting Canadian national pride, of the fixing of constitutional fetters on Canada's future greatness as a nation.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I do not make my remarks at this time as a constitutional authority or from a background of legal training, but as a Canadian. I believe they will express the general feeling of many Canadians on the outside who are concerned and interested in this country moving forward as a nation.

I am reminded of events that took place 100 years ago which led up to the confederation of this country, when the provinces of that time met together and drafted the British North America Act which has been our constitution since 1867. Again at the present time the provinces, now twice as many in number, have come together and worked out an agreement with the federal government which will make it possible to bring the British North America Act to Canada as our constitution.

I have a great deal of respect for our provincial governments, and I believe the record of practically every province is outstanding. The attorneys general of these provinces have spent long hours in discussion of the agreement which has now been arrived at. As well, the premiers of the ten provinces have likewise given much thought and consideration to this agreement, and we owe a great debt of gratitude and appreciation for what they have done.

In saying this I stress my confidence in the governments of the provinces as they have now laid down the necessary pattern of things so that we can truly have a Canadian constitution. I also believe congratulations are in order for the Minister of Justice. I believe that a good share of the credit should go to him for bringing about this meeting of minds. There should be an expression of appreciation extended as well to the deputy minister and other officials of the department, who are capable men and who have spent long hours working this out.

We as the nation's House of Commons should be a little more considerate of the men who are the attorneys general of these provinces and who have been able to come together with a tremendous amount of determination to work out an acceptable formula and agreement. I believe this is the attitude that most Canadians from coast to coast have today toward these men. There is no doubt their decision may not be the ideal, but I do believe that what has happened is all that could possibly have been hoped for at this time, and that the agreement has been reached in unanimity.

As I quickly looked over the communiqué and the announcement I found that three elements have been involved. One is the repatriation of the constitution, or the bringing to Canada of the British North America Act so that it can be our constitution. Second, there has been a spelling out of the amending formula. Since 1950 when this was first brought out in formal discussions this has been one of the stumbling blocks which has prevented agreement from being reached. Third, there has been provision for the delegation of power from federal to provincial governments and from the provinces to the federal government.

For the stability of a constitution it is imperative that there be some rigidity to the amending formula. The agreement reached regarding the delegation of powers provides for this, so that local needs can be met as far as the provinces are concerned without requiring or making constitutional change. I believe the agreement that has brought the formula to a basis where there must be four provinces in accord is one that gives us the assurance that there will be stability in this arrangement. I agree that we must study it very carefully, but on the other hand I believe that credit must be given where credit is due.

I am convinced that the past few days will go down as a landmark in the history of this nation, and I would hope will mark the beginning of a new era of unity and progress in which we will move forward. Many amendments may have to be made to the constitution other than those which have been agreed upon now, but with the bringing back to Canada of our constitution they can be done within the realm of our own autonomy and our own authority. Therefore I believe these days perhaps mark the beginning of a new era as we move forward in our ship of state, with consideration being given to the provincial governments and everything else that goes to make up confederation. Even though the ship may travel through stormy seas I believe we will be moving forward in the best interests of the nation and the progressive development of our Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately I have not yet had time to analyse and study the release issued after the meeting between the provincial attorneys general and the Minister of Justice. I was unaware also that the Minister of Justice was to make a statement today in this regard.

However, there is at least one remarkable thing about this. From now on Canada will at least be able to amend its own constitution and, most important, we hope that the constitution will be amended in quite a radical way so that our country will adapt itself to the modern world.

Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth II stated in Quebec city that what could be normal 100 years ago should perhaps be amended or changed today.

There is no doubt for us that the constitution should be amended. Some radical changes must be made to meet the requirements of our modern times, the progress and development of Canada as well as the atmosphere prevailing in 1964 in our country.

I note that in the case of problems concerning a single province, any desirable amendment will be made after agreement between the federal government and the government of that province. We hope that in the case of the province of Quebec amendments will be made, while the other nine provinces will be left free to establish other relations with the federal government if they want to.

In my opinion, if the Canadian constitution allowed relations between Ottawa and Quebec to be different from those between Ottawa and the nine other provinces, such latitude or broadness of mind would lead to what everyone has been seeking for a long time, but has been unable to achieve, namely national understanding.

But if everything is to be put in the same mould, then understanding is no longer possible. Still, we note, on reading the press release, that amendments could be made with regard to this or that province only on agreement between the province concerned and the federal government. That could be done by means of amendments to the constitution or delegation of powers.

As a matter of fact, this is, in a way, what I like about the new formula. Thereby, each province will be given enough leeway to legislate as it sees fit in certain fields, perhaps to exercise more authority than that granted to it by the present constitution. The formula will also allow those provinces which so desire to exercise less authority and to fall back on centralization to a greater extent in keeping with their ideology of centralization in the federal government. That might produce two different ways of life in Canada, but not necessarily. At any rate, having two kinds of administration would achieve the goal being pursued, national understanding.

It is now possible to amend our constitution. I wonder, however, about one thing. I have read only a few press reports mentioning that in order to amend the constitution in certain fields, the approval of five provinces or 50 per cent of the population will be required. But let us suppose that the ten provinces propose an amendment to the constitution which is refused by the federal government. The ten provinces represent undoubtedly 100 per cent of the population, but the federal government can also claim to represent 100 per cent of the population. Would the federal government automatically have the right to veto?

Is the formula clear and specific enough to indicate, in the event of agreement among the ten provinces and disagreement on the part of the federal government, who would prevail over whom? Is it the ten provinces or the federal government, in view of the fact that both represent 100 per cent of the population and are not of the same opinion on one point?

In my opinion, the amending formula should be well defined in this respect, because it seems to me that when ten provinces agree to amend a point of the constitution, their authority should carry the same weight as that of the federal government.

At any rate, without knowing all the details of the agreement entered into by the attorneys general and the Minister of Justice, I believe that we can be happy that, in future, when we want to amend the constitution, the members elected by the population will turn their attention to it and not a parliament 2,000 miles away which does not understand all our problems and does not represent the Canadian people.

The very fact that we are able to amend our constitution ourselves makes us that much more responsible before parliament and the people than we were before.

I should like to suggest an amendment to the effect that the title "British North America Act" become simply "The Canadian Constitution", so that, at long last, it can become a Canadian fact.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question with reference to the announcement made this afternoon by the Minister of Justice regarding the repatriation of the constitution. The minister stated that an address would be placed before both houses of parliament for transmission to the parliament at Westminster. Is it the intention of the government thereafter to have the British North America Act brought before the parliament of Canada to be passed as a statute, or what is the general plan the government has in mind in this regard?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, of course parliament must first approve the address to the United Kingdom parliament. As far as I am concerned, I am authorized to state what immediate steps will be taken by the government in so far as placing the resolution to that effect before both houses of parliament. As to further matters or further dealings in respect of the constitution, this will be a matter of government policy, as the right hon. gentleman will understand, and will be announced once it has been decided by the government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact that is not government policy at all. Does the minister then say there has been no decision made yet as to the course the government will take following an address passed by the parliament of Canada, transmitted to Westminster and there accepted? Has the government made no decision as to the further course to be taken in this regard?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, of course this is one of the matters to which consideration is being given, but a final decision has not yet been taken.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. In view of the fact that this question was raised by some of us before the recent conferences were held, may I ask the minister whether this aspect of the matter was discussed at any of those recent conferences between the federal government and the provincial governments?

Mr. Favreau: No, Mr. Speaker. One of the reasons the government has under consideration the question which has just been raised is precisely because it has been raised in this parliament, particularly by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. There was no formal discussion in this respect at the conferences.

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Justice, Mr. Speaker. Would he consider sending this matter to a parliamentary committee in order that hon. members might have an opportunity of hearing expert opinion on this very important matter of the constitutional amending formula which is being proposed?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, I will accept that question as notice, and as a suggestion which I will make it a duty to consider with my colleagues.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice a supplementary question. He has said they have had no discussion and have arrived at no decision as to how we are going to proceed to adopt a constitution for Canada. I should like to ask him whether there is any way of adopting a constitution for Canada, other than by bringing it to this parliament and having it accepted by this and the other house?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, of course Canada already has a constitution. Whether subsequent to full repatriation, primarily of the right to amend the constitution, there will be placed before this parliament a bill to give formal sanction to the B.N.A. Act as the Canadian constitution, is a very interesting and important matter to consider. That was not part of the agenda of the federal-provincial conferences, because the exclusive matter for discussion on that agenda was the devising of and arriving at a formula which in future, once it has been enacted as the last law in this connection by the United Kingdom parliament, will allow this parliament in future to amend the Canadian constitution. That is the reason the subject to which the hon. member has referred was not on the agenda of the conference of attorneys general.

Mr. Olson: I have another supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the minister then explain where this constitution is going to be domiciled if it is not brought to this parliament after the United Kingdom parliament has passed an act releasing it?

Mr. Favreau: Mr. Speaker, we are getting into a discussion on constitutional law. The principal factor in domiciling a constitution is the ability of the parliament of Canada to dispose of or amend in any way its own constitution. The title of the draft act suggested both by the previous government and by this government is "An act to amend in Canada the constitution of Canada."

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

ANNOUNCEMENT OF ESTABLISHMENT OF TAX STRUCTURE COMMITTEE

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to announce another major achievement of the federal-provincial conference that concluded this morning. Unanimous approval was given to the establishment of a tax structure committee and to the terms of reference under which it will function. Agreement was also reached on the nature of the studies the committee will undertake and on the manner in which it will conduct its work.

The purpose of the tax structure committee, as its terms of reference reveal, is to conduct a complete and fundamental re-examination of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements. This is an undertaking of major significance in the history of federal-provincial relations. Not since the Rowell-Sirois commission has such a thoroughgoing analysis been undertaken. It is our hope and expectation, and in this we are joined by the provincial governments, that the committee will find better ways of effecting a balance between the requirements and the resources of Canada's 11 governments. It will also be the committee's task to ensure that the fiscal partnership which results can be used effectively in the achievement of Canada's economic goals, namely the full employment of our people and the full use of their rich resources.

Hon. members will welcome, I am sure, this major step in federal-provincial fiscal relations. For the first time the federal government and the provinces will together study the fiscal problems of the 11 governments, will together assemble the facts necessary to illuminate these problems, and will together develop fiscal arrangements which meet the needs of Canada. This approach to federal-provincial arrangements met with the unanimous and wholehearted support of all governments.

After this portion of the work of the conference was over, the Prime Minister reported briefly what was agreed in the following terms:

I. The committee is directed by the federal-provincial conference to study and to report upon the following matters, its report to be submitted to the conference early in 1966:

1. Trends to be expected during 1967-72 in public expenditures by the federal government, the provinces and the municipalities, taking into account the broad priorities likely to be accorded by governments to expenditures on major programs that will compete for available funds;

2. The problems involved in financing these expenditures and their relationship to the economic circumstances to be expected, the probable levels of costs of public services and facilities, and the prospective levels of government debt;

3. The general policy to be followed in respect of shared cost programs during the period 1967-72;

4. The tax fields that should be used exclusively by the federal government and by the provinces and municipalities, and the fields in which joint occupancy is desirable;

5. The arrangements to be made in respect of jointly occupied tax fields;

6. The relation of equalization grants to the fiscal requirements and fiscal capacities of the provinces, and the best equalization arrangements for the period 1967-72;

7. Future intergovernmental liaison on fiscal and economic matters;

8. Other related matters.

II. The committee agreed upon the nature of the studies that should be undertaken to facilitate its work. These will be put in hand as quickly as possible.

III. The committee agreed that the continuing committee of officials on fiscal and economic matters, originally established by the federal-provincial conference of 1956, should be assigned responsibility for general direction of the studies to be undertaken and the working out of the assumptions and methods to be used in those studies requiring a common basis of approach. Mr. A.W. Johnson was selected to co-ordinate and expedite this work, as well as to be secretary of the tax structure committee itself.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): Mr. Speaker, the minister has just made an interesting statement with regard to this tax structure committee which is going to be responsible for a long range study of some of our pressing taxation problems. I believe we are going to have quite a few studies in the next little while, but I am not sure whether we will have enough students to absorb them. We have the reference the minister has just made to this tax structure committee. We have the Minister of Justice referring to the report of the constitutional conference and the fact that there may be substantial changes in the constitutional relationship between the provinces and the federal government. Then, of course, almost in the background we have the Carter commission which was set up some two or three years ago, and which I hope will be reporting within the next few months. Certainly there will be a high degree of elasticity in our tax structure in the immediate future, and a great deal of midnight oil will be burned before all the problems are finally settled.

[Mr. Gordon.]

I think it is a very good thing that we have this approach made today. Certainly the impact on fiscal arrangements of the ten provinces and the dominion occupying parallel fields and in some cases occupying the same fields, with power to borrow and power to tax, could create almost a financial jungle in this country. It is necessary to have studies made. It is necessary to evaluate. I trust the evaluation of conflicting claims which are being made upon provincial governments and the dominion will be evaluated.

There is no point in discussing this matter further at the moment. This is a long term matter, the results of which will not be before us for many months—I think the minister said about 1967—and by that time we will have had ample opportunity to study all the implications contained therein.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am sure no one could object to the purposes of the committee's work. One might perhaps regret that it was not established earlier. Its establishment now does raise some questions in one's mind as to the future of some of the shared cost programs. It makes one wonder what is going to happen to the much touted Canada pension plan, what is going to happen in the interval to the possibility of advancing a program of medical care, and what is indeed going to happen—whatever life may be left in it—to the Canada Development Corporation.

I wonder if we are to take it from this announcement today that the establishment of this committee at this time postpones until at least 1967 any advance along these lines. It seems difficult to understand how any advance could be made while the government is waiting for the results of this study. It would be interesting to hear from the minister as to whether the Canada pension plan, any steps that may have been taken toward the development of medical care plan, or any other shared cost program will be now held in abeyance until this committee makes its report.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the statement by the Minister of Finance, and read press reports this morning containing much of the press release that was given yesterday by the Prime Minister. To say the least, I am not impressed with the progress that has been made. It seems to me if you carefully analysed the press release and the statement made by the Minister of Finance, about all you could find would be some general agreement on the terms of reference to this tax structure committee. After you have said that, you have said it all. We have noted that over the past few months the Minister of Finance and every other minister of the crown has ducked answers to inquiries relating to the fiscal relationship between the federal government and the provinces by saying that all these matters will be referred to the tax structure committee, which will come forward with a comprehensive plan to reallocate the distribution of taxation between the two levels of government.

There was one bright spot in the press report that came out, and that was that the federal government had agreed to take into consideration the matter of priorities. This is something that several of the provinces, led I think by Manitoba, have been advocating for some time. It seems to me that when we have a government capable of turning out one piece of legislation after another requiring enormous expenditures on a piecemeal basis, it certainly leaves the budgets of some provinces and the federal government confused.

I hope this committee does not break down into a series of studies taking into consideration all the so-called pressure plays, the temporary expedients, but will in fact address itself to finding an acceptable formula for the rearranging of tax distribution under the agreements, and that those arrangements will be based on the jurisdictional responsibility of the two levels of government. We hope that when a formula has been reached the federal government will be disposed to confine its legislation to the areas where it has constitutional authority. We note that there have been many pieces of legislation passed by the federal government that do in fact require expenditures by the provinces, and many of those have been passed without the consent of the provinces. In fact, Mr. Speaker, sometimes these pieces of legislation involving increased expenditures have been passed after the budgets of the provinces were passed, thus upsetting their whole budget arrangements.

We also know that the announcement does not preclude changes being made between now and 1967. We hope this is not an indication that the federal government intends to yield to a lot more of these pressure plays to such an extent that it will determine in advance how much additional money it is prepared to give each province, and then construct a formula to meet the predetermined figures. We have seen this happen too many times during recent months and years, and it causes frustration to a number of the provinces.

We cannot go into the details now. The Minister of Finance is well aware of some of the objections we raised during the past few months to some of the charges that have been arbitrarily laid on the provinces. We are not particularly impressed with the statement he has just made, because it does not seem to indicate any set direction in which we are proceeding.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance has just announced the creation of a committee composed of representatives of the federal government and of the provincial governments to study the tax structure of the taxation system in Canada.

In my opinion, it would be preferable to create a committee for the purpose of studying the means of decreasing taxes in Canada. Our taxation system is defective because taxes are too high. Discuss this matter with any Canadian citizen, any company director, any businessman, any ratepayer, and they will recommend that the first step to be taken is to lower the taxes, because they are too high.

I hope that the Minister of Finance will tell us before long that such a committee has been set up, that it will examine this matter and recommend means to decrease taxes and help Canadian citizens to retain more money in their pockets.

At this time—and the committee will find that out if the Minister of Finance does not know it yet—for every dollar earned by the Canadian citizen the various levels of government, federal, provincial, municipal and school boards levy 47 cents as taxes. Out of all earnings, 47 per cent goes to governments as taxes. Indeed, the amount of figuring on the Canadian citizens' cheque stub is larger than on the cheque itslef and, before long the Canadian worker would rather get the amount appearing on his cheque stub than what is left on the cheque itself.

The minister also announced that the committee will try to ascertain priority requirements where they are, and that an attempt will be made to leave the main tax fields to meet priority requirements.

It will be recalled that during the hostilities the federal government said that war was the priority requirement and it invaded almost all tax fields. While the priority requirements have changed, the government has not yet withdrawn. Today those requirements are felt in the fields of education, health, roads and public works. All those fields come under provincial jurisdiction, but the federal government has not yet given back those tax fields in order to enable the provinces to face their priority needs.

The minister also told us that the committee will study the problem of the financing of public expenditures. Why must public expenditures be financed exclusively on the people's taxes?

Could the Minister of Finance not recommend to the committee to find other means to finance public expenditures or public works instead of digging constantly into the pockets of the Canadian people?

When England feared a devaluation of its pound sterling another method was found to prevent it and even to revaluate the pound sterling. What was the action taken? They called on the Bank of Canada which, at that time, was authorized to lend money to England at an unknown interest rate, in order to prevent a devaluation of the pound sterling. England was not forced to levy new taxes. Why not do the same in Canada when it would mean greater wealth for the country.

If we want to make our country richer through public works, health insurance plans, old age pensions or family allowances, let us seek other means apart from taxes to finance public expenditures.

England found one. It comes and dips into the funds of the Bank of Canada, or, at least, the Bank of Canada is authorized to lend it money, almost interest free, to enable it to restore itself. Why not do the same for Canadian citizens?

This is a recommendation that the committee, the setting up of which is proposed today, should take into serious consideration. This committee should not be limited to considering taxes alone, because we know that they are too high; it should be commissioned to find ways of financing public expenditures without raising taxes, and by using the Bank of Canada instead.

The Minister of Finance also announced that this committee would study the tendencies of public debt levels in the federal, provincial or other fields.

If this committee studies the tendencies of debt levels, it could also be requested to study the harmful aspect of public debts. This harmful aspect is easily recognized when one sees that the biggest problem for the finance minister in Canada at the present time, is the interest he pays on the debt of Canada, which amounted to $1 billion 81 million in 1964. If he did not have to pay this interest on the debt the problem he is now facing would not exist.

The same thing can be said for provincial and municipal governments.

The minister also states that the purpose of the committee will be to study joint programs.

Mr. Speaker, may I also express my viewpoint on joint programs. Those programs practically set up two different authorities to manage the same thing. Consequently, too many people are in charge of directing a plan. And when there are too many people to cook the soup, the soup is spoiled.

Those joint programs have been popular for some time in Canada, with two different authorities which endeavour to direct the same thing, and give contradictory orders. In the long run it is found that the joint program does not serve its purpose.

I want to make a suggestion to the committee: let us eliminate those joint programs and give the authority to manage a program of that type to only one level of government.

Mr. Speaker, this committee is now too restricted in its activities. It does not receive enough instructions; it is not sufficiently requested to think about a program other than the taxation system and to try and make the Canadian economy operate. It is too restricted to the taxation field and to the effects of taxes in some fields, while it should instead be asked to make a general review of the Canadian economy.

The Minister of Finance states with a big smile that everything is fine in the economy of this country. A labour organization in Ontario mentioned recently that there were four million poverty-stricken people in Canada. Well, the Canadian economy is not as good as that. The Minister of Finance should set up a committee which, besides analysing our taxation system, would attend to decreasing taxes and give Canadian citizens a more prosperous economy.

[Later:]

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance regarding the tax structure committee which he announced on motions. I would ask the minister two very brief questions. First, can he give us some idea of the make-up of the committee at the ministerial level and the technical level; and second, can he assure the house that the economic goals which he outlined in the terms of reference are economic goals which the federal government intends to pursue, and will see to it that it does not allow itself to be deprived of the necessary powers to maintain the counter-cyclical techniques which are necessary to attain those goals?

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there will be three members from the provincial government on this committee and one member—and if requested, one alternate—from each of the provincial governments. The federal representatives will be—

Mr. Douglas: Mr. Speaker, the minister said there will be three members from the provincial government. Did he not mean from the federal government?

Mr. Gordon: Yes, three from the federal government. The three federal ministers will be the Minister of Justice (Mr. Favreau), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Benson) and myself, as chairman. The premiers of Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and British Columbia plan to serve on the committee. With regard to the other provinces, I think the decision so far is that they will be represented by their ministers of finance or provincial treasurers.

With regard to the second part of my hon. friend's question, I would like to assure him and all hon. members that the federal government, under this administration, intends to remain strong, independent and competent to take whatever actions to influence the economy as may be called for from time to time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

FINANCE

TARIFF CONCESSIONS TO PERMIT MANUFACTURE OF FOREIGN AUTOMOBILES IN QUEBEC

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): On behalf of my colleague the Minister of Industry I wish to announce to the house certain temporary tariff arrangements which have been extended by order in council to the General Investment Corporation of Quebec in order to permit that company to begin the production of Renault and Peugeot automobiles in Canada.

The General Investment Corporation of Quebec is a private company, wholly owned by Canadians, which was created by the government of Quebec last year to stimulate and promote the formation and development of industrial undertakings in that province. It has entered into agreements with the French companies, Régie Nationale des Usines Renault and Société Anonyme des Automobiles Peugeot for the manufacture of their automobiles in Canada. Under the agreements the General Investment Corporation will build and equip a factory of its own to assemble and finish these vehicles.

This undertaking is unique in that a Canadian owned company will make automobiles under licence for a foreign motor vehicle producer. From the outset components will be purchased from Canadian parts makers; other parts will be imported from French companies. There will be a progressive reduction in the proportion of imported parts used as Canadian sources are developed. The finished automobiles will be sold to the Canadian subsidiaries of the French companies for distribution in Canada and for export.

Initial plans provide for annual production of 8,000 automobiles requiring a work force of 250 people.

The output of the company, when added to that of Volvo in Dartmouth, Nova Scotia, will give Canada a substantial production of European type automobiles. There has been a continuing demand for this type of vehicle by Canadian consumers, who will now be able to choose between several Canadian made products.

These transitional arrangements in respect to customs duties are comparable to those provided Volvo of Canada Ltd., taking into account the relative values added in Canada in the production of these vehicles. As in the case of Volvo, the special arrangements are for five years and there is a progressive reduction in the tariff concessions over this period.

I should like to table, at this time, the order in council giving effect to the temporary tariff arrangement extended to the General Investment Corporation of Quebec.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): I am sure the house is interested in the announcement which has just been made by the Minister of Finance. It is good to know that other European car manufacturers, through an agency established here, are developing their cars in this country.

As the minister has suggested, Volvo blazed a trail in this regard some two or three years ago. I think a very happy procedure was adopted at that time, and I am glad it is being followed now. We will see the order in council in due course and note what concessions or arrangements have been made. There were some which we made in connection with Volvo, and I understand approximately the same is being done now in connection with these companies. As I say, we shall study the order in council.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): In keeping with the other short statements on motions, all I should like to say is "Hear, hear".

[Translation]

Mr. Guy Marcoux (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, we must be grateful to the French industrial interests for being interested in our country to such a point that they agreed to build here automobile production plants and to give the General Investment Corporation a licence to carry out that project.

It must also be noted that concessions made by the federal government in terms of taxation surely facilitated the decision reached by the Renault and Peugeot firms.

We hope that the establishment of a foreign industry will result in a proper competition among Canadians. There should be no fear of unfair competition, because the impact of that new establishment will particularly be a large reduction of unemployment in Canada.

In view of the fact that the Quebec metropolitan bureau for commerce and industry was the first to promote such a project, it is to be hoped that the chosen site will be near Quebec, at Lévis, as recently suggested by Mr. Armand Viau, the general director of the bureau.

In short, Mr. Speaker, the announcement just made by the minister is welcome and even though we must deplore the fact that Canadians do not seem prepared to invest enough capital to be the sole owners of automobile plants, we must commend the General Investment Corporation which took the initiative of making necessary arrangements with the French companies to have one more industry established in Canada in the best interest of Canadians.

Mr. Lucien Plourde (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, we, in this corner of the house, are pleased to hear that Peugeot and Renault automobile plants will locate in the province of Quebec.

The establishment of those new industries in the province of Quebec will reduce unemployment, especially in the Quebec area, as the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. Marcoux) mentioned a moment ago.

Those industries should definitely come to the Quebec area because my own riding, a labour riding, is greatly affected by unemployment. And this would greatly alleviate unemployment there.

Mr. Gilles Grégoire (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance who a moment ago made a statement on behalf of the Minister of Industry (Mr. Drury).

Is he in a position to tell the house today where exactly the Renault-Peugeot plants, referred to in this statement, will be located?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, it will be in the Montreal area; I think in Terrebonne but I am not sure of this. The Minister of Industry is having a press conference now in Montreal on this subject, and I have no further details to announce.

[Translation]

Mr. Grégoire: Could the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry exert pressure for the plants to locate in designated areas affected by unemployment and for granting them, besides special tariffs, special favours to locate in designated areas?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: I can assure my hon. friend that this was urged by the Minister of Industry and was discussed over quite a considerable period of time, and discussed very seriously. In the end it became quite clear that if we wanted this plant in Canada, if we wanted to attract this industry to Canada, it would be necessary for us to allow the promoters of the enterprise to build the plant in the area which they thought was of the greatest economic advantage to the enterprise.

[Later:]

[Translation]

Mr. Clément Vincent (Nicolet-Yamaska): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance?

Could the minister tell us if the establishment of the Peugeot and Renault plants in the Terrebonne region, which follows that of General Motors in Sainte Thérèse, can make us hope that a steel complex will be set up soon in the province of Quebec?

[Text]

Mr. Gordon: Mr. Speaker, in the first place I am not exactly sure where the Renault-Peugeot works are going to be built, except that they will be in the Montreal area. If it was my good fortune to come from that area I would certainly hope that a great steel complex would be built there one of these days.

PROCEDURE

MOTION FOR CONCURRENCE IN ELEVENTH REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the order:

That the eleventh report of the special committee on procedure and organization presented to the house on October 7, 1964, be now concurred in.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): I would ask that this motion stand. I hope we can go ahead with it on Monday.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that a communication has been received, as follows:

15 October 1964

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Robert Taschereau, P.C., Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 15th October, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
A. G. Cherrier
Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

RUSSIA—REPORTED CHANGES IN LEADERSHIP OF COMMUNIST PARTY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct one or two questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs regarding the reported resignation of Chairman Khrushchev and the succession of Alexei Kosygin, a deputy premier, as acting premier, and Leonid Brezhnev as head of the communist party, he having previously been chairman of the praesidium. Is the minister in the position to give the house any idea whether the accession of these two men signifies any disagreement between them and Chairman Khrushchev over the question of coexistence and, particularly, whether in view of their rather close relationship over the years with Mao and communist China their achievement of power does, in the opinion of the Department of External Affairs, cause any fear for international security and peace?

Hon. Paul Martin (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Over the past 24 hours there has been private speculation, and, since this morning there has been considerable public speculation, concerning changes in the direction of the government of the Soviet union. These rumours have been given substance by the failure to publish today the U.S.S.R. government newspaper Izvestia. I am advised that it is possible there might be a publication of this newspaper by the end of the day. This is a pattern that has been observed in the case of other important changes in the government of that country.

We are led to believe that official announcements of changes at the top level in the government of the Soviet union will be made tonight or tomorrow morning. However, as of 3.30 this afternoon I cannot say that there is any official announcement that I could rely on at this moment which would confirm these speculations. In any event, I would ask my right hon. friend not to press me for views as to what these changes might mean if in fact they have taken place.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the great international importance of this news, would the Secretary of State for External Affairs keep the house fully informed on any information he gets from our ambassador in Moscow with respect to the truth of these reports?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, this matter is of considerable importance to this parliament, to the people of the country and to the world, and I certainly will keep the house informed. I have just received a further bulletin, which confirms that there is no official information as yet.

Inquiries of the Ministry

MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

INQUIRY AS TO LOCATION OF PROPOSED NEW OBSERVATORY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. I am sure we were all interested in the fact that it was indicated to Her Majesty the Queen when she was here that there would be a giant telescope and observatory constructed in western Canada which is to be called the Queen Elizabeth II observatory. Could the minister tell us where this observatory will be located; or if that information is not available, when he could give us some word in regard to it?

Hon. W. M. Benidickson (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Red Deer for his question. I agree with him that this announcement was received by Her Majesty, and I think the country at large, with great pleasure. But I would point out that it is a recent announcement. Before the announcement was made there had been some investigation as to site, but those investigations have not been completed. The officials of my department are considering possible sites, knowing the necessity for making a decision at an early time. I think perhaps within three or four weeks we will be able to tell my hon. friend what selection has been made. Certainly it will be made on a technical basis, so that this will be one of the most important telescopic sites in the world.

AGRICULTURE

TURKEYS—REIMPOSITION OF QUOTAS ON IMPORTS FROM U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Reynold Rapp (Humboldt-Melfort-Tisdale): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture, and in his absence I should like to direct it to his parliamentary secretary. My question involves an urgent matter. Would the minister consider raising the import tariff on live turkeys coming into Canada from the United States, or impose import quotas so as to give adequate protection to turkey raisers who will otherwise be put out of business?

Mr. B. S. Beer (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have in my possession a telegram received by the minister from the Canadian turkey federation. It suggests that they may request a meeting with the minister, and the minister has replied that he would be delighted to meet with them at any time.

FISHERIES

NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING ESTABLISHMENT OF STRAIGHT BASE LINES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. It has been some time since we discussed his estimates, and I should like to ask him whether in the interval any progress has been made in negotiations which will enable him to indicate to the house when he expects some straight base lines to be established which will untangle our fishing zones from the sinuosities of the coast line.

Hon. H. J. Robichaud (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, as I previously stated in the house, the second phase of negotiations is under way. In recent weeks we have had discussions with a number of countries, yesterday with Norway and the week before with Denmark. These negotiations are not completed and I will not be in a position to give any further details to the house until they are completed.

IMMIGRATION

TORONTO—STATUS OF PERSONS CONCERNED WITH NEWSPAPER STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Hubert Badanai (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on October 7 the hon. member for Danforth asked the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration whether he had completed an investigation into the I.T.U. situation in Toronto, particularly with reference to people from outside Canada who were working for the newspapers, and if he had completed his investigation was he in a position to give the house a report.

On behalf of the minister I wish to say that the persons involved number 12, of whom five have been admitted as landed immigrants. Of the remainder, six have been permitted to enter Canada without status and one is an applicant still in the United States pending a decision in his case.

Of the five admitted, one is of managerial status and does not come within the context of the strike situation. The other four were to meet all the requirements for persons seeking to become landed immigrants, and they were consequently granted such status on the basis that they qualify under our legislation. Nevertheless, had the immigration officials responsible for the admission of these four applicants recognized the sensitive nature of the situation existing between the union and the newspapers in Toronto, and that it might be interpreted that these persons were not bona fide immigrants capable of meeting all our legal requirements, as our officials were convinced they did, then their admission might have been delayed in order to get direction from the immigration branch headquarters at Ottawa. The fact is they have now been landed and the law makes no provision to reverse that action in cases such as this.

As for the remaining seven persons, six are in Canada without status. We shall look further into their cases and shall take cognizance of the extremely sensitive situation in respect of the newspaper strike. The minister proposes to consult further with his colleague the Minister of Labour, and decide as quickly as possible whether they will allow these persons to remain in Canada or see that they leave. The seventh person in this group, the applicant in the United States, will not be admitted.

It should be pointed out that the persons to whom I refer today, who have already met our immigration requirements for landed status or might possibly do so, are entirely different in character from the group regarding whom the minister reported to the house on August 28. That group consisted wholly of non-immigrants who could readily be excluded from Canada.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Will the parliamentary secretary ask his minister, when he discusses this matter with the Minister of Labour and any other colleagues, to have regard to the assurance the Prime Minister gave some months ago that strikebreakers would not be permitted to come into Canada to exacerbate the situation in Toronto? In view of the information that has been given today and in view of the information that was given yesterday, as found on page 9036 of Hansard in response to a starred question of mine, will regard be had to announced government policy in connection with this matter?

Mr. Badanai: I shall bring this question to the attention of the minister.

Mr. Reid Scott (Danforth): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us anything about the work being done by the six individuals who have been permitted in without status? It seems to me they have been here quite a while and this matter should have been investigated. Is there any information as to what they are doing and for whom they are working?

Mr. Badanai: Mr. Speaker, the matter of any further information with regard to this question will be brought to the attention of the minister and he will be able to report.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PURPORTED REPRODUCTION OF SECURITY INSTRUCTIONS ON ROYAL VISIT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice and is based on the edition of Le Soleil for last Tuesday, October 13, in which is printed textually on the front page what purports to be a translation of a confidential order to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police signed by Superintendent J. A. A. Thivierge and giving instructions to all sections, "C" division, regarding measures to be taken to provide security for Her Majesty the Queen during her recent visit. Can the minister explain how this confidential document came into the possession of or was made available to the press, and will he cause an investigation to be made as to when it was so made available and under what circumstances?

Hon. Guy Favreau (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say I have not read Le Soleil of last Tuesday. However, since the hon. member has brought the matter to my attention I shall of course inquire.

Mr. Churchill: Why did your officials not bring it to your attention?

FINANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACTS ADMINISTERED IN INSURANCE DEPARTMENT

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. C-123, to amend certain acts administered in the Department of Insurance.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill, an act to amend certain acts administered in the Department of Insurance, proposes amendments to four acts, namely the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. As I explained in the statement made on September 22 prior to the first reading of the bill, the bill has two principal purposes. One is to expand the investment powers of federally incorporated insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies, and the other is to enact a measure designed to retain in Canada ownership and control of those federally incorporated life insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies that still remain in Canadian hands.

At the conclusion of this debate I intend to move that the bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce. Opportunity will thus be provided for examining into the details of the bill to the extent that the members of the committee see fit. In these remarks I shall, therefore, not attempt to go into great detail but will deal rather with the main points involved.

Some of the changes in the investment powers were forecast in my budget speech earlier this year. These would expand the powers of insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies to invest in common shares and would broaden the range of shares eligible for investment.

Insurance companies are now limited to a maximum investment in common shares of 15 per cent of their total assets; the bill would raise this limit to 25 per cent. At present common shares are eligible investments if they have a seven year dividend record of a prescribed amount. The amendments would reduce the seven year requirement to five years and, in addition, would make common shares eligible investments if the issuing corporation has an earnings record over a period of five years that would have permitted it to pay a dividend at the prescribed rate whether the dividend was in fact paid or not.

This new earnings test is of particular significance for shares of wholly owned Canadian subsidiaries of foreign corporations. If the parent corporation decides, as I hope many will, to make some of the shares of the Canadian subsidiaries available for investment by Canadians, this test will make the shares eligible investments for insurance companies if the subsidiary has an adequate earnings record regardless of whether it has been paying dividends to the parent company or not. Hon. members will appreciate, of course, that this would qualify the shares of Union Carbide of Canada for such investment.

In addition to these specific changes in the eligibility requirements for common shares, companies would be given additional freedom to invest in assets of their choice regardless of the specific eligibility provisions in the act. At present this freedom is limited to a total investment of 5 per cent of the company's assets. This limit would be raised to 7 per cent. This additional freedom would also enable companies to invest in a broader range of common shares should they wish to do so.

To remove another possible deterrent to investment in common shares, the rules for valuing common shares, and also other assets not now permitted to be valued on an amortized basis, would be changed in such a way as to permit a life insurance company to absorb the impact of a drop in market values over a period of three years, rather than requiring the company to absorb the full impact in the year in which the drop occurs. This plan would ensure that the values used for annual statement purposes bear some close relation to current market values, but at the same time would relieve companies from the pressures that might otherwise be placed upon them by sharp fluctuations in the security markets.

It is not the intention of the government to force insurance companies or other financial institutions to invest their funds in common shares or in any other specific type of investment. The principle is recognized that the management of these companies must be free to exercise their own judgment within the established investment rules in the best interests of their policyholders and shareholders. It is hoped, however, that by removing some of the restrictions that now apply with respect to investment in common shares, companies will be encouraged to use the pools of investment funds available to them to increase the degree of Canadian ownership in Canadian enterprises.

Although, as indicated, the broadening of investment powers relating to common shares was the primary interest of the government in putting forward these amendments to investment powers, the life insurance industry has made certain requests for other amendments to expand these powers. It is believed to be in the Canadian public interest to expand the investment powers of insurance companies wherever this can safely be done, so that the management can have as much discretion as is reasonably possible in promoting the best interests of policyholders and shareholders of the companies concerned. Therefore, where it was felt that the safety of policyholders would not be endangered by the requested changes, it was considered appropriate to accede to those requests.

This has led to a proposal to increase the limit relating to mortgage loans to permit companies to lend up to 75 per cent of the value of the real estate rather than only up to 66⅔ per cent as at present, and to extend the investment powers relating to investment in real estate. With respect to mortgages, the limit for many years was 60 per cent of the value of the real estate. In 1961 this was raised to 66⅔ per cent. We now believe it would be safe and reasonable to raise the limit to 75 per cent. It may be noted that the figure of 75 per cent was the recommendation of the royal commission on banking and finance. It may be noted also that a number of states of the United States have recently raised the corresponding limit to 75 per cent. This change would be of advantage to the public, I believe, because it would to some extent remove the necessity of the borrower relying on the second mortgage market to borrow the money he needs in purchasing real estate.

The major amendment relating to investment in real estate would permit companies to invest in real estate where the earnings record of the property over a recent period of years would suggest that, if continued in future years, the investment would yield a reasonable rate of return and permit the main part of the original investment to be recovered. The size of individual parcels of real estate that may be purchased would also be increased. At present there is a limit of 10 per cent on the total investment that a company may make in real estate, other than properties for its own use. This 10 per cent limit will be retained but real estate of the leaseback type where the property is leased to a government or government agency, or to a corporation that has a dividend record sufficient to make its debentures eligible investments, would be removed from this limiting provision.

A few other amendments touching investment powers would also be made but these are of lesser importance.

Life insurance companies would also be permitted under the legislation to own subsidiary life insurance companies in foreign fields. Canadian life insurance companies have long done a large volume of business outside of Canada and have been a credit to Canada's name in many foreign countries. The companies have felt that it would be advantageous to them if they could carry on some of this foreign business through subsidiary companies rather than through branch offices. It appears that certain advantages accrue to this method of operation in the light of trends in the international conduct of the life insurance business. It was deemed appropriate, therefore, to propose an amendment for this purpose but subject to such limitations and conditions as may be appropriate in the view of the treasury board. Thus companies' moves in this direction would still remain under some degree of government supervision and control. It was deemed advisable also to open the way to life insurance companies to invest in subsidiary fire and casualty companies in Canada should they wish to do so. At present, under the existing legislation a life insurance company may, with the concurrence of treasury board, transact classes of insurance other than life insurance. However, it is considered that for the protection of the life insurance policyholder it would be desirable that any moves in this direction be made through a subsidiary company rather than through a branch of the existing life insurance company. Therefore the legislation would permit a life insurance company to own a subsidiary fire and casualty company in Canada, again subject to such conditions and limitations as may be prescribed by treasury board.

The third change having to do with the ownership of subsidiaries relates to real estate. Companies would be permitted to own subsidiary real estate companies for the purpose of owning and managing real estate. There have been in recent years attractive investment opportunities in this field and the industry has expressed the view that it would be advantageous if companies could make investments of this type. It would seem that if the real estate to be owned in this indirect way is similar to that in which the company could invest directly, the safety of the policyholders' funds would not be prejudiced by permitting companies to carry on this type of investment through a subsidiary company rather than directly. Again, however, any ownership of subsidiary companies of this type would be subject to such conditions and limitations as may be prescribed by treasury board.

A further amendment that will I think be welcomed by the house would permit the governor in council to grant a company a French or English version of its corporate name, subject to appropriate publicity through advertising in the Canada Gazette. This would avoid the necessity of companies coming to parliament for an amendment to their acts of incorporation for this purpose.

As respects loan and trust companies, the investment powers relating to common shares would be broadened in a manner similar to that discussed for insurance companies. Also the amendments would permit these companies to lend up to 75 per cent of the value of the real estate on a mortgage loan rather than the 66⅔ per cent as at present. This change parallels the change discussed earlier relating to insurance companies.

The limit on the amount that may be borrowed by a loan company or accepted in trust for an investment by a trust company would be increased from what is, in effect, 12½ times the excess of the company's assets over its liabilities to 15 times. It is believed that in the light of the financial strength and stability of our major trust and loan companies, such an increase is justified. It may be noted that the increase from 12½ to 15 times will be subject to the approval of treasury board on the recommendation of the superintendent of insurance. Thus, care will be taken to ensure that a company is well managed and in a sound condition before permitting it to take advantage of this provision.

The provisions relating to the granting of a French or English version of a company's corporate name noted earlier in connection with insurance companies are included in the bill with respect to loan companies and trust companies.

British insurance companies and foreign companies authorized to transact insurance in Canada are, under existing legislation, required to maintain assets in Canada on deposit with the Minister of Finance or vested in trust with trust companies at all times at least equal to their liabilities in Canada. It has been traditional to specify the classes of assets that may be so deposited or vested in trust in such a way as to make them parallel so far as is possible to the classes of assets in which a Canadian insurance company may invest its funds. This is an appropriate principle, since in both cases the welfare of Canadian policyholders is concerned. It would not seem reasonable to put the Canadian policyholders of a British or foreign insurance company in a disadvantageous position by imposing limitations on the investments of such companies that are not imposed with respect to Canadian companies. Therefore the traditional pattern is being continued and these amendments and the changes in the investment powers of Canadian insurance companies would be carried over to the classes of assets eligible for depositing or vesting in trust in Canada by British and foreign companies.

[Mr. Gordon.]

I should like to close these remarks by expanding briefly on the proposals contained in this bill concerning the retention in Canada of Canadian ownership and control of life insurance companies, trust companies and loan companies.

There are, at present, 38 Canadian life insurance companies registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act. Of these, 13 are mutual companies and thus questions relating to the ownership of shares do not arise. Such companies are owned by their policyholders. Of the remaining 25 companies 13 are under non-resident control and 12 remain in Canadian hands.

The 13 mutual companies transact 36 per cent of the total insurance business in Canada and the 25 stock companies about 29 per cent, but of this 29 per cent only 5 per cent is in the hands of the 13 companies under non-resident control at the present time, and 24 per cent is in the hands of the 12 stock companies remaining under Canadian control. This proposed legislation would apply to these 12 companies.

It may be of interest that prior to 1955 there was only one federally incorporated life insurance company owned by non-residents. Beginning in that year, and continuing through to 1960, non-residents acquired control of five federally incorporated life insurance companies, and also of two provincially incorporated life insurance companies that were registered under the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, and so came under the supervision of the federal department of insurance. In addition, five new life insurance companies were incorporated by parliament in this period where ownership and control were in the hands of non-residents from the outset.

It will also be of interest to mention that five Canadian life insurance companies took advantage of the amendments of 1957 to convert themselves into mutual companies. These included some of the very largest companies, and it is virtually certain that but for this action some or all of these five companies would now be under non-resident control.

There are at present ten federally incorporated loan companies subject to the Loan Companies Act, and eight federally incorporated trust companies subject to the Trust Companies Act. None of these companies is controlled by non-residents at present.

In my earlier statement I outlined in general terms the nature of the plan now proposed to prevent further purchases of existing companies by non-residents. Hon. members have now had an opportunity to examine the details of the legislation as set forth in the bill, and the proposed method of operation. Essentially, the plan is based on the control of the directors of a company over the entry of transfers of shares in the share register maintained by the company.

The relevant legislation in each case now provides that transfers of shares are not valid unless they are registered in the company's books. The plan proposed by this new legislation will require the directors to refuse to allow the entry of any transfer of shares in the books of the company where the transfer would cause the total number of shares registered in the names of non-residents to exceed 25 per cent of the total number of issued shares, or where the transfer would cause any such proportion that exceeds 25 per cent to be increased.

Further, the directors would be required to refuse transfers of shares to any one non-resident where the transfer would result in the non-resident, together with shareholders associated with him, becoming the registered holder of more than 10 per cent of the total number of issued shares. If any non-resident together with associated shareholders holds more than 10 per cent of the issued shares, this rule would not require any reduction in the holding but would require the directors to refuse to allow the entry of any transfer of shares that would increase the existing holding.

These requirements would make it necessary for the directors to satisfy themselves as to the residence of anyone requesting that shares be registered in his name. To meet the possibility of shares being registered in the name of a Canadian resident, where the beneficial owner is a non-resident, it is proposed in the bill that no one be permitted to vote shares held in this way. The directors would therefore call for declarations concerning both residence and beneficial ownership where shares are to be voted.

A further provision is included in the bill to the effect that if shares of a company to which the legislation applies are held by a non-resident directly or through nominees, and if the shares so held together with shares held directly or indirectly by shareholders associated with the non-resident exceed 10 per cent of the total number of issued shares, no one will be permitted to exercise the voting rights pertaining to the shares held by or for the non-resident. This provision woud prevent a non-resident from gaining control of a company by such means as owning 10 per cent of the shares directly and owning all the rest of the shares indirectly through a holding company or through a Canadian nominee.

As noted in my preliminary remarks on September 22, certain exemptions will be provided, based upon holdings existing at that date. In the case of a company where more than 25 per cent of the shares were held by non-residents at that date, the legislation would not require any reduction in the holding but would prevent any increase. Further, there would be no reduction in the voting power with respect to any holding of shares in excess of 10 per cent of the total number of shares that existed on September 22, unless such holding is increased after that date.

Also, it was noted that the legislation would not apply to a company that was then under the control of non-residents in the sense of having more than 50 per cent of its issued shares held by or for one non-resident. I may add, as may already have been noted, that the proposals would not prevent companies being incorporated in the future where the majority ownership is with non-residents from the outset, if this were the wish of parliament. Thus it is not intended by this legislation to close the door to the formation of life insurance companies by non-residents.

Another point of interest on which I might make some clarifying remarks is that relating to the transfer of shares that may take place between September 22 and the date this legislation becomes effective. It is not intended by this legislation to reverse any transactions that may take place in this period. However, the legislation would provide that, when it comes into effect, the voting rights will be suspended in respect to any shares transferred during this period where the transfer would have been prohibited had the legislation been in effect on September 23. This rule will apply principally with respect to the 25 per cent limit. Thus directors of companies concerned should take care to keep an adequate record of any such transfers that take place in this period, since the subsequent voting rights of the shares may be affected by this legislation.

Since this bill was introduced on September 23 we have received a variety of comments and suggestions. Some of the suggestions would result in improvements to the bill, and where it is reasonably possible I think that such suggestions should be accepted. I have in mind, therefore, that a few amendments might be proposed in committee, and if I may be permitted to say so in passing, it seems to me this is a fairly effective way of proceeding, namely to announce legislation and then permit an interval of time for interested parties to examine it and, if they have changes or improvements to make, to allow them to appear before a standing committee of the house, make their case, and if the committee thinks their changes are reasonable I for one would welcome changes of that kind.

For example, an amendment would be proposed to permit insurance companies to subdivide the par value of their shares down to a minimum of $1, subject to the preservation of a reasonable balance in voting power between the shareholders and the participating policyholders of a life insurance company. I might say the purpose of this is to reduce the market value of individual shares, so that there will be a broader market in Canada for the shares of certain companies.

A further amendment would permit loan companies to own subsidiary trust companies. We already have two examples of this situation now existing, and with the proposed modification in the borrowing limits, a parent-subsidiary relationship in this field would not weaken the protection given to depositors and debenture holders by these limits. A third amendment to the act would give insurance companies the power to invest in real estate which is leased to a municipal government in addition to the power proposed in the bill to invest in real estate which is leased to a national, provincial or state government. There may also be one or two other amendments of a minor and technical nature which the committee might be willing to entertain.

Those were the principal comments I wished to make before emphasizing again that at the conclusion of this debate I will move that this bill be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Mr. Lambert: May I ask the minister a question? It is related to a point of order. Is he satisfied that the amendments he proposes to put forward in committee do not extend the principle of the bill? If they do, he would find himself in a procedural difficulty because we could not adopt the amendments if they had the effect of extending the principle of the bill.

[Mr. Gordon.]

Mr. Gordon: I am satisfied they do not extend the principle of the bill. In any event I put these suggested amendments forward by way of explanation. It will be up to the members of the committee to decide whether or not they should be approved.

Hon. George C. Nowlan (Digby-Annapolis-Kings): We have listened with a great deal of interest to the minister giving a general outline of this bill, a bill which in effect amends four different Canadian statutes. As the hon. gentleman has said, most of these amendments are technical, at least as far as investments are concerned, and I agree it would be much better to deal with them in detail when we are in the committee. I agree also that this measure should be referred to a standing committee of the house rather than be dealt with here, in detail, in committee of the whole. If this is done I am sure the committee will spend several lengthy sessions considering these intricate matters; I am glad to see the chairman of the committee smiling hopefully as he assesses the task ahead.

As the minister has told us, we are dealing here with the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act. Quite a mélange. As a lawyer who practised for a long while in a small town I always took strong objection to these blanket amendments in which three or four acts were dealt with under one roof. In the absence of a large legal staff or the facilities of a great library one can devote a great deal of time delving into statutes looking for an amendment to, say, the Insurance Companies Act. You do not find one; you tell your client there has been no amendment, and then, by golly, you find it has been amended as part of a blanket operation which includes half a dozen others. This is a bad practice. I am not blaming the minister, in particular; the government in which I had some part to play carried on the same practice, over my protests I must say. And I still think the practice is a reprehensible one. However, that is a more or less technical point which I raise in passing.

As the minister says, this bill can be divided into two principal parts, one dealing with control and ownership and the other dealing with investment powers of companies. The hon. gentleman spent the major part of his time dealing with the investment provisions. Each of these parts is technical, but I think the investment sections are the more technical of the two. I do not propose to spend much time on them this afternoon; we shall certainly deal with them in committee. The government proposes to increase the amount which insurance companies may invest in common stocks from 15 per cent of their total assets to 25 per cent. It proposes to increase from 66⅔ per cent to 75 per cent the limit on mortgage loans in relation to the value of the real estate; it is also proposing to amend various other investment sections. All these proposals have merit, I think, and all of them will have to be carefully considered by the committee. I believe the committee will be the place in which to deal with them rather than try to deal with them at any length this afternoon.

As I see it, the major problem presented by this bill is one to which the minister himself referred in the latter part of his speech, namely the ownership and control of companies of this type. We must remember that when he gave notice of this bill the minister told us that provisions similar in character would be applied to the Bank Act when amendments to that act were brought in later on—whether this session or next session would depend on when prorogation takes place—and we would have to consider at that time an extension of these principles to banks as well as to the companies named in the measure before us.

The provisions dealing with control are, again, capable of being divided into two parts. One section deals with ownership by one foreign person or by associated persons or companies of 10 per cent or more; the other deals with the broad foreign ownership of 25 per cent or more. At least it should be said about this bill, as compared with other legislation we have had in this field, that the minister is not making it retroactive. In this way he will avoid some of the troubles he has encountered in connection with former measures he brought in to the same effect. This one would apply only to transfers which had taken place subsequent to the evening when he announced this legislation in the House of Commons.

I suppose that as far as this 10 per cent provision is concerned we should not quarrel too much with it. That one small group might get control by acquiring 10 per cent or more of the shares of one of our trust or insurance companies is a matter of concern, and I can understand why the minister is taking a close look at it. Ten per cent of the shares might give them operative control, in any event. When it comes to the phrase "not exceeding 25 per cent ownership" I am not so sure of the ground upon which he is operating. The royal commission on banking suggested it was wise to have a broad diversification of ownership. I think 25 per cent is not a wide distribution at all and that there is no great danger in this type of control. I noticed that the minister kept referring to "non-Canadian control". He repeated the expression time after time. I suppose that technically one could say "non-Canadian control" if shares are owned by shareholders outside Canada. But is it non-Canadian control or is it non-Canadian ownership? I suggest that the problem with which the minister is trying to deal is the problem of non-Canadian ownership, not that of non-Canadian control. I would point out that all these companies to which the present bill refers, the insurance companies, the trust companies and the loan companies, come under the direction of the superintendent of insurance and of the Department of Finance in general, under the control of the minister, and that those companies are very strictly controlled indeed. I do not think it is necessary to have legislation such as this to effect control when the parliament of Canada under existing legislation, or under legislation which could be enacted at any time, could exercise whatever control was thought desirable. For instance, if the minister wished to do so, and if parliament approved—I am sure the hon. gentleman would not wish to do so—we could order the Metropolitan Insurance Company down the hill here, a foreign controlled corporation, to invest all its funds in Dominion of Canada bonds. We have absolute power to control all its activities.

I checked briefly on some of these powers today. I do not intend to take the time of the house by going over them in detail, but the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act itself says that it is "intended to define the status and the power of such companies incorporated by parliament and to prescribe limitations on the exercise of such powers." Those words are in the statute itself. Then it goes on to carry out this intention, and I must say it does so in minute detail.

I am not going to detail the sections that establish the qualifications of directors. This act deals with the transfer of stock. Sections 10 to 15 deal with the transfer of stock, its allotment, calls on stock, and so on. Sections 24 to 28 dictate provisions for meetings; when they shall be held, how often, and so on and so forth. Sections 29 to 35 set out the extent of liability of companies and their agents, and so on. Then, dealing with insurance funds, sections 63 to 68 prescribe the nature of the investments insurance companies can make from government securities to real estate mortgages, and all the rest of it. These matters are defined there. Sections 69 to 71 require the most detailed reporting of the affairs of such companies. Among other things, it requires twice-yearly reports to the department and it sets out what may and may not be included in these statements. Sections 72 to 78 outline the rather considerable authority and duties of the superintendent of insurance.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I am simply pointing this out to emphasize the fact that I think we are here dealing in semantics rather than actuality, to a certain extent at least, when talking about foreign control, because the parliament of Canada, so far as all these companies are concerned anyway, under our existing legislation has very, very great control indeed. I think the minister deserves credit for trying again. I say this kindly; I think he has somewhat of a fetish on ownership and sometimes I think that influences his judgment to a certain extent and he may exaggerate these matters; because, as I said, the Canadian parliament, we in that parliament, the superintendent of insurance, the Minister of Finance and the department have the absolute power of life and death over these companies, which are controlled by this legislation at the present time. It is different entirely from the problem with which the minister was dealing previously. For instance, there are General Motors, INCO, and manufacturing companies controlled outside the country over which we do not have the legislative control that we have over these particular companies. As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I am not at all sure that it is necessary. The end may be all right. I am not quite sure what the end is; but I am wondering what the results will be of legislation such as this in accomplishing something which in broad outline, in so far as 25 per cent or so is concerned, is already a matter of Canadian parliamentary control.

I think we lose by legislation of this kind a certain flexibility of control which we have now. I think it would be more flexible under the present legislation than it will be under the change. I do not know what is going to happen. Naturally, not being a shareholder in any of these companies personally, I am not concerned, and I know none of us is concerned, with the effect on the shares of the companies per se; but I think it is going to have an adverse effect on the valuation of these shares. What you are doing is taking away the age old right with regard to private property, that of being able to sell something that you own and sell it to a person to whom you want to sell it. There are some restrictions on that today, I know, but they are very, very few. This legislation restricts that right and says that if you sell, the man who buys will be very foolish because he will not be able to transfer his shares; he will not be able to vote them. This creates a problem, because I think you may have one market for shares inside this country and one for shares outside the country. We are going to have, too, I think, a rather black eye again with regard to investment in Canadian securities.

Of course this measure will not affect anyone who bought shares up to September 23. But people who bought them at that time may want to buy more, and they are going to find themselves up against this provision with respect to registration. I doubt very much whether this type of legislation is in the interests of the Canadian financial community. As I said, Mr. Speaker, there are some elements of control in regard to foreign companies in certain areas and certain corporations, with regard to which I agree steps need to be taken. However, I doubt very much if they need to be taken in this particular field.

The minister spoke about the purchase of subsidiaries, or dividends, and I believe he referred to Union Carbide. That was a very happy way of repatriating a lot of dividends and getting them out of this country. I am not sure what the effect will be in the end, in so far as Canadian markets are concerned, where shares to the value of $60 million, $70 million or $80 million are sold and dividends are accordingly repatriated. The minister's purpose is to encourage minority interest in foreign-controlled corporations. I wonder just how much good it does to have 10 per cent, 15 per cent, 20 per cent or 25 per cent interest in a foreign-owned corporation. The control, I think, is exercised within the small group of directors, and moneys which are being invested for some reason in these equities in a minority position could much better be used in the development of further investment in Canada and in strengthening our financial position here, rather than doing it as is proposed in this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I notice that the clock is rapidly approaching the hour of five. There will be ample opportunity to discuss this measure in committee, when we can deal with the details of it. I know there are other hon.

members who wish to speak on this bill, and that is all I propose to say at this time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It being five o'clock, the house will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely notices of motions, papers; private bills, public bills.

PRIVATE BILLS

LAURENTIDE BANK OF CANADA

Mr. Ron Basford (Vancouver-Burrard) moved the second reading of Bill No. S-13, to incorporate Laurentide bank of Canada.

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure and honour to move the second reading of Bill No. S-13, to incorporate the Laurentide bank of Canada and to ask the house to refer the bill to the standing committee on banking and commerce. The incorporation bill in this case follows the example set out for these acts in the Bank Act. You will note from sections 1 and 2 of the bill that the sponsors of the bill and the provisional directors of the proposed bank are Mr. Peter Paul Saunders and Mr. Andrew Saxton, president and executive vice president respectively of Laurentide Financial Corporation, together with Mr. William Mainwaring, Mr. Paul Paine, Q.C., Mr. Edgar Saba and Mr. Howard Mitchell, all of the city of Vancouver, and Mr. Bernard Bourgeois, Q.C. and Mr. Lionel Leroux, both of the city of Montreal.

Naturally the sponsors will appear before the banking and commerce committee, where each of them may be examined individually as to his experience and ability. I would assure the house now that all of them are men of wide and varied experience in the financial, professional and business activities of their communities.

The capital of the new bank will be $30 million, divided into three million shares. The banking and commerce committee will be able to examine the plans for sale and distribution of these shares in detail. However, that committee will see that through the proposed distribution to the widely dispersed and varied existing Canadian shareholders of Laurentide Finance to the extent of 47 per cent, and through underwriters to the general public to the extent of 53 per cent, the shareholders of the new bank will represent a wide and varied segment of the investing public and that control of the bank will not rest with any small group of people or corporations.

Section 5 of the bill is a special section which provides, first, that the directors of the bank shall be Canadians and, second, that at least 90 per cent of the shareholders of the bank shall be Canadian. These provisions anticipate the legislation that we were discussing in the house this afternoon, and which we will be discussing this evening, as introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon). It is interesting to note that long before the Minister of Finance introduced this legislation, the promoters of three private banks were prepared to come to parliament promoting them in terms more stringent than the legislation introduced by the Minister of Finance.

Hon. members will note from the bill that the head office of the Laurentide bank shall be in Vancouver; that six of its provisional directors are from British Columbia and two are from the city of Montreal. It is intended that the bank shall be thoroughly national in character. It is obvious that any new national bank must start from some regional base, as did our existing chartered banks, and therefore the first branches will be opened in and around the two cities of Vancouver and Montreal, where the provisional directors reside. It is intended eventually, as conditions warrant, to provide a general banking service throughout Canada. It is because the head office will be in Vancouver and the principal management will be located there that I am proud to associate myself with this bill and with the incorporation of the Laurentide bank of Canada.

Without being critical of the existing banks, I am also aware of the difficulty that western Canadian businessmen face in capital formation. In the west, and in British Columbia particularly, we have a fast growing and developing region, a boom area, and yet not one chartered bank has seen fit to have a head office west of Toronto—a head office and financial policy oriented to the special needs and problems of western Canada. We in British Columbia have long felt the need of establishing financial institutions that are oriented to our special needs and problems, and I would hope that no one in this house will stand in the way of helping to fill this need for British Columbia.

Many members are not familiar with the tremendous developments going on west of the Rockies. Briefly I would point out that the gross provincial product of British Columbia, as of 1963, is equal to the gross national product of Canada in 1924. In 1924 Canada had some 19 chartered banks instead of the present eight. Our economy in British Columbia now is equal to that of the whole of Canada in 1924 and is such as to require, and is certainly well able to support, the head office operations of a new bank.

The other region of Canada to be immediately served by this bank is the province of Quebec. There are two leading French Canadians on the board of directors. Laurentide Financial Corporation has carried on business in the province of Quebec for a long and, I think, happy period. I trust members from Quebec, all eager to see the further development of their province, as I am of mine, will recognize the value of creating additional banking facilities within their province to contribute to the economic development of Quebec.

This is the second bill to come before this house for the incorporation of a bank. Some members have raised the question of whether Canada needs additional chartered banks. Members of the banking committee will want to examine this question in detail. Briefly, however, I would refer members to the royal commission on banking—the Porter report—which throughout makes it clear that in the opinion of the commission there is no hazard to Canada's chartered banking system by the incorporation of additional chartered banks. The Porter report has recommended a more open and competitive banking system. It has referred to the dangers of undue concentration in our banking system. I quote very briefly from page 362 of the report where it states:

> There must be sufficient competition among these institutions that borrowers and savers have alternatives open to them.

If the incorporation of an additional bank would endanger the Canadian banking system, one of the finest in the world, any of the existing banks or the Canadian bankers association had the full right and opportunity to come before the Senate committee and say so. They did not. Our Canadian bankers believe, like most members of this house, in the free enterprise system, and believe that the very essence of that system is the free play of competitive forces. We do not believe in the stifling of competition. Surely we cannot believe that our banking system should be left static, and ultimately by way of merger and takeover, fall into the hands of two or three chartered banks. In the last ten years alone the number of banks has gone from 11 to 8. This process should not be allowed to continue.

[Mr. Basford.]

There are those in the house, of course, who do not believe in the free enterprise system. There are those in the house who want to make drastic and sweeping changes in the banking system, but surely they also are not going to use their position in this house to prevent passage of this bill, resulting in protecting the existing chartered banks from further and desirable competition, and resulting in their giving the existing banks a monopoly over Canadian banking business.

There are those who point to the number of branches that we have in Canada, and say that that number is ample and sufficient for the needs of Canada. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it is not sufficient simply to say that we have so many branches and that that is enough. Surely a bank is, and must be, a policy making financial institution, whose services may be offered by one branch or by a thousand branches. The paucity or abundance of its branches is nothing more than a convenient extension of its services, but is not an extension of its policies. A bank, no matter how many hundreds or even thousands of branches it may have in operation, is one bank, having one policy, paying one rate to its depositors and demanding one rate from any particular class of borrower. This policy is formulated at head office and simply implemented by the large number of branch managers, and there is certainly not one policy for each branch, but one for the entire structure.

In Canada we have now shrunk to the point where, other than in Quebec and small portions of Ontario and the maritimes, there are only six chartered banks, and I include the Mercantile Bank in this number. In British Columbia we have only six, and in Alberta only five. To me it is self-evident that the person proposing to transact banking business and having eight alternative policy making financial institutions to which to turn obviously is better served than the Albertan or British Columbian who is limited to five or six. To me it is obvious that an increase in the number of chartered banks, thus providing to Canadians and the Canadian economy additional policy making financial institutions, can only be of benefit to the growth and development of our economy.

The incorporation of this bank was endorsed by my own premier, Premier Bennett, who is somewhat involved in the banking business himself, when he made it clear to the banking and commerce committee of the Senate that he fully supported the incorporation of the Laurentide bank.

At page 50 of the proceedings of that committee on July 22 appears the following statement:

> Hon. Mr. Bennett: I would say that British Columbia welcomes the Laurentide bank as well.

I can only assume that the premier's friends here in the house, both in the Social Credit party and in the Créditiste party, will allow this bill to go to committee in order to indicate that the premier was being completely frank and honest with the Senate and with the country.

In deciding whether to incorporate this bank or any other bank one must surely apply the standards laid down by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) in the house some months ago. First is it properly financed? I say that the Laurentide bank of Canada, with a proposed capitalization of $30 million, with the support it will obtain from Laurentide Finance Corporation and the general public, is properly financed. Second, is it supported by financially responsible people? In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, in my brief outline with respect to the sponsors of the bill I have indicated that they are financially responsible people with wide and varied experience in the business life of their communities. Third, will control of the bank remain in Canadian hands? Section 5 of the bill provides for this.

I suggest that the Laurentide bank of Canada meets all of these conditions and careful scrutiny by the members of the banking and commerce committee will satisfy them that the Laurentide bank should be incorporated. In the words of a Vancouver Sun editorial of July 25, 1964:

> The bank is assured of a broad and diversified ownership, yet its backers have the resources of experience to ensure that it will be firmly established. One of its main objects is to meet the special needs of British Columbia industry and people. In this it will fill a long felt want. We welcome the bank's progress and wish it success.

There is no good or valid reason, Mr. Speaker, why the bill should not now be referred to the banking and commerce committee so that careful scrutiny of its proposals can be commenced, and I ask the house to give the bill second reading now and refer it to the banking and commerce committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Laprise: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member allow me to direct a question to him?

Mr. Basford: Certainly.

Mr. Laprise: Does the hon. member know that the sponsors of Bill No. S-13 have asked for three million shares, which would increase the sales value to $30 million instead of $10 million? Is that correct?

[Text]

Mr. Basford: Yes, this is true. An amendment to the bill was made in the other place. The original bill provided for a capitalization of $10 million and an amendment was moved and approved in the Senate to make the capitalization $30 million or three million shares.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this year we are seeing a proliferation or a sort of covey of applications for the incorporation of banks, I think it would be useful to look at the history of banking and chartered banks in Canada to see what has been the effect of the chartering of banks. Today we have a very limited number of chartered banks which are all engaged in the branch banking business. I suppose it is ultimately the intention of the incorporators of the Laurentide bank and of those who have other such proposals before parliament to go into the branch banking business, if business so warrants. Otherwise one might say to them: You are limiting your operations; all you want to do is to get in on the cream of the business.

In so far as stability and the requirements of the banking system of this country are concerned, banking is a quasi-public service and there are responsibilities in so far as the public of Canada are concerned with regard to the offering of banking and credit facilities. We know that much of the operations of the chartered banks today, particularly with the great expansion in the number of branch banks, is on the basis of a quasi-public service. If one were able to study the profit and loss statements of each branch, he would see that a great number of the smaller branches are in effect operated at a monetary loss, although I am sure that in the over-all picture they are not operated at a loss. Otherwise the chartered banks, who are not in the business merely shall we say for charitable purposes, would certainly not continue the operation of branch banks measured only on a profit and loss basis.

However, in the examination of any of these proposals to incorporate new chartered banks I think it would be good to look at the evidence of the superintendent of insurance when he appeared before the banking and commerce committee of the other place, in order to indicate just what has happened with regard to banks chartered by parliament. The first bank charter was granted back in 1822 in the old province of Canada, and between that time and 1867 some 80 banks were created in British North America, of which 35 had survived as of July 1, 1867.

It is instructive to note that those banks incorporated prior to 1867 have exhibited some characteristics of longevity which are rather admirable, because five of those banks or their successors are in operation today out of the total and limited number of chartered banks now in operation. However, as we know, in 1867 banking was placed under the exclusive jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and since that time up to the present day 77 further banks obtained charters, of which only three have survived. Of the 112 banks that were active on or which have been incorporated since July 1, 1867, 104 have ceased to exist. Of these, 38 never commenced business. I think it is quite instructive to note this as we go along in that we have three and possibly four proposals to consider this year and it is to be wondered whether they will all actually commence business. Twenty eight of those 112 banks have failed and 38 have been taken over or have been amalgamated with other banks. True enough, because of their limited operations and their limited financial resources it is quite probable that many of the mergers in earlier years were really for the purpose of salvaging the business and they would have failed had they not been taken over by stronger institutions.

We may say that 104 have ceased to exist, including 28 which failed and 38 which were amalgamated, but what did this mean so far as loss was concerned? I think it is an indication of the strength of the Canadian banking system that losses to the public have been only $15 million over the whole history of banking in Canada, of which half resulted from the failure of the Home Bank of Canada. The sum of $15 million included only a quarter of a million dollars of bank note holdings, and all of those losses occurred prior to 1882.

The last bank that failed in this country was the Home bank, in 1923. In looking at the structure and stability of our Canadian banking system I think it is very instructive to note that it survived a really serious onslaught during the early depression years. In other countries we saw banks falling by the wayside like grain before the scythe or mower. But in modern times, in the last 50 years shall we say, there were five banks incorporated which never commenced business. In the period 1913 to 1923, there were six mergers; from 1923 to 1934 there were seven mergers; from 1934 to 1954, there were no mergers; from 1954 to 1964, there were three mergers.

Mr. Basford: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Lambert: Yes.

Mr. Basford: I presume he is aware of the fact—I am not sure of the point he is making—that since the creation of the office of inspector general of banks in 1924, there have been no bank failures, and that under the modern Bank Act no bank, even after it has been granted a charter by parliament, can commence business until it receives a certificate from the treasury that it is in a position to commence business.

Mr. Lambert: This is granted, and I am sure it was as a result of the Home bank failure of 1923 that the office of superintendent of banking was created. This is an indication that the appropriate steps were taken and that control by parliament of our Canadian banking system has been salutary.

Let us have a look at the location of banks that have been incorporated, because it has been indicated there is a certain regional interest in promoting banks today. This is a small example, but we have one called the bank of western Canada with a proposed head office in Winnipeg. There is another, the bank of British Columbia and it will have a head office in Vancouver. There is this Laurentide bank and the petitioners for it are from both Montreal and Vancouver. This may be said to have a national span, but in essence the directors as named in clause 1 of the bill are primarily from Vancouver. They are in finance, the printing business and other businesses.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford), who is the sponsor of the bill, has indicated a great desire for a bank with its head office located in Vancouver. I suppose this may have been of some consideration in the establishment of other banks, but perhaps not so much, because of the more limited communications that existed in earlier days. Let us look at the number of banks which have been created since confederation, their location and the number that have ceased to operate. In Nova Scotia, there were four, three of which failed and one was merged; in

New Brunswick there was one, which failed; in Prince Edward Island there was one, which was merged; in Quebec there were nine, of which two merged and the remainder failed; in Ontario there were 16, of which ten were merged and the remainder failed; in Manitoba there were two, of which one failed and one was merged; in Saskatchewan there was one, which was merged; in British Columbia there were two, one of which failed and the other was merged.

As to those charters which were issued but not used, it is interesting to note the following figures: two in Nova Scotia; two in New Brunswick; ten in Quebec; 13 in Ontario; seven in Manitoba; two in Saskatchewan; one in Alberta; one in Yukon, making a total of 38 charters which were granted but never used.

In so far as the present bank is concerned I feel that the provisions relating to shareholders are an improvement over some of the provisions brought forward by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) in relation to maintaining Canadian control. The requirement is that a director shall be a subject of Her Majesty and ordinarily resident in Canada. In other words he shall be a British subject resident in Canada. Other legislation merely asks that they be residents of Canada though they may be citizens of any other country in the world. This is an element of Canadian ownership, of Canadian fiscal control in connection with the operations of the bank. There are restrictions also in connection with the registration of shareholders and of shares of non-residents of Canada. I feel it is incumbent upon me at this time to draw attention of hon. members to the history of bank charters as issued in Canada to date, to show that not all the charters which have been issued have seen the successful operation of a bank. The mere fact that we do issue a charter does not mean that there is going to be a successful operation.

We have certain near banks. I do not know about the operations of the Laurentide Finance Company, which would be closely affiliated with this bank, but I rather suspect its operations come within the ambit of what is called a near bank. We have in the province of Alberta not only a number of these near banks but we have provincial treasury branches whose operations come within the regulations of the superintendent of banks.

I do not want to delay the legislation. I am sure other members of this house want to express their points of view with regard to this proposal. I think it should be examined very carefully. Certainly in committee there will be a number of questions to which hon. members will require more extensive information perhaps than was given before the committee on banking and commerce in the other place, although the deliberations of that committee were of considerable assistance in considering this particular matter.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I have been interested in this bill and in the two other bills mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) dealing with applications for bank charters. I think I should say at the outset that I have no fears whatever that this bank, if established, will fail because it happens that under our monetary and banking systems it is virtually impossible for a bank to fail. If anyone has any fears about that, then I would refer him to the evidence of Mr. Graham Towers some ten years ago before the banking and commerce committee when we were revising the Bank Act. I think we can be sure this is a question we do not have to bother with today, as earlier legislators had before them the possibility that a bank charter, if issued to someone, was going to be a failure. I believe that is virtually impossible today.

However, this bank interests me. It interests me because of some of the questions that were asked in the banking and commerce committee in 1955 when the small loans companies were under examination because of the amendment to the Small Loans Act that was proposed by the superintendent of insurance. I think it is not too much to say, sir, that there was not a member of that committee who was not deeply shocked by the revelations made at that time of exorbitant interest rates being charged by some small loans companies. I recall on one occasion the revelation of an effective interest rate of 80 per cent on a small loan. I might say at this point, Mr. Speaker, that I am mentioning this because, in the evidence given by Mr. Peter Saunders before the banking and commerce committee in the other place, there was a clear indication of the intention to have a very close association with the Laurentide Finance Company. Therefore I think the operations of finance companies are of interest to us in connection with this application for a bank charter.

There was not a member of that committee at that time who was not profoundly shocked to discover the exorbitant rates charged by small loans companies, the enormous profits they were making, and the quadrupling and quintupling of the assets of these companies in the space of six or seven years, as revealed by the financial statements they were obliged to produce for the benefit of that committee.

We were also impressed by the fact that these exhorbitant rates were in no way justified by the loss records of those companies which at that time—and I do not imagine they have changed since then—were less than one quarter of 1 per cent. The usual argument in favour of exhorbitant rates is that a very risky loan is involved, yet we had evidence before us which clearly indicated, as the former superintendent of insurance pointed out, that the vast bulk of the Canadian people are almost pathologically honest and are determined to pay their debts at any cost.

We have before us a bill which is introduced largely by two extremely enterprising young men in Vancouver, one of whom I was very well acquainted with a few years ago and for whom I have a very high regard; but I was interested in the evidence given by Mr. Saunders on Wednesday, May 27, this year, before the banking and commerce committee of the other place, in which he had this to say:

> When Senator Cameron introduced our bill for second reading in the Senate, he mentioned that the bank was intended to be a subsidiary of Laurentide Financial Corporation Ltd. It has been our intention that the new bank should be in some fashion allied with the latter company, for the operations of the two institutions can be in many ways complementary one to the other as has been evidenced by similar alliances established by some of the existing chartered banks. Initially, it appeared appropriate that this alliance should take the form of a parten-subsidiary relationship, with subsequent public participation in the bank being invited when its circumstances had somewhat matured. However, it is apparent that if the bank should be a subsidiary of Laurentide Financial Corporation, the restrictions upon non-resident participation in its share capital—as set forth in section 5 of the bill before you—would have little meaning; transfer of control of the parent company to a non-resident would effectively place the bank under foreign control. I shall refer further to the question of control of Laurentide Financial Corporation later.

We have here a clear and frank statement by Mr. Paul Saunders that it was the intention of the promoters of the Laurentide bank that it should be a very close affiliate of a loan company; that in the minds of the promoters the operations of the two institutions would be complementary. I can well believe they would be so. I can well believe this would be as complementary as, in fact almost identical with a corporation which sets up a wholesale house and has a retail outlet too.

I suspect, Mr. Speaker, this is what would be the real definition of the Laurentide bank, that it is to be the wholesale house which will use the credit creating facilities of a chartered bank to funnel funds into a small loan company which will, in turn, lend them to the general public at vastly larger interest rates than the Laurentide bank itself would be legally entitled to charge. You may say, sir, that this is legitimate business, that this is the way to do it, and maybe it is. Maybe some of us do not quite like it. I do not question its legality, or anything of that sort, but it does raise another question.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. Basford) and Mr. Saunders before the Senate committee, and others who have spoken on these applications for bank charters, have stressed quite rightly the need for the establishment of a new bank in western Canada, particularly I think in B.C., and when I say that I am not speaking in any narrow, provincial, nationalistic frame of mind. But as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has pointed out, there is a vast booming expansion taking place in our province at present, and there can be no question whatever that it is to some extent being inhibited by the fact that there is no chartered bank in Canada located in B.C. as its head of operations, and I would make this distinction between merely having its head office located in Vancouver and having the main centre of its operations centered in the province of B.C., in the first instance at least.

The analogy that has been drawn between the situation in California some years ago and the present situation in B.C. is a valid one. Many economists have pointed out that there is a very striking coincidence between the formation and development of the Bank of America, which was the first large bank in the United States to move on to the west coast, and the huge expansion which took place in California and which has now brought that state to the first position in the union to the south of us. Here in Canada we are now reaching the point where we need the same type of development in B.C., and I suggest that development cannot be achieved by the establishment of a bank which is going to deal, not apparently with industrial expansion but with a small loans business. It is going to provide the raw materials for a small loans company.

I am not suggesting for a moment that such a bank should not be established, but I am rather afraid, and I have some misgivings on account of what I heard in the other place and here, that if the house should pass this particular bill, and later pass the bill for the bank of western Canada, this will lay the foundation for a refusal to establish the bank of British Columbia on the grounds that the needs are now being filled by these other two institutions.

I suggest that the needs of B.C. will not be filled by either the Laurentide bank, which is to have its head office in Vancouver, or the bank of western Canada, which is to have its head office in Winnipeg.

I do not usually find myself fighting on behalf of the present government of B.C. I have grave misgivings about that government, but those misgivings do not go to the extent that has been suggested by some people, that the present government in B.C. in some strange, malign manner would be able to use this bank to interfere with the central government's authority over the monetary system and the total money supply of the country. Only a complete monetary ignoramus could ever suggest such an idea. While I have misgivings about the present government of B.C., I am quite sure the confines of the Bank Act and the scrutiny of the inspector general of banks will keep them in line.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, I have a further interest also, and I may say this just as a matter of historical political interest. Some years ago I succeeded in getting my colleagues in the C.C.F. to agree to insert a plank in our provincial platform which called for an application for a charter for a bank under the Bank Act. Later, I regret to say, my rather timid colleagues decided to take it out. So, I have a rather personal interest in the establishment of this bank. But quite seriously, sir, I am afraid some of the hon. gentlemen in the other place, and perhaps some hon. gentlemen in this place, who have never been able, or willing, or prepared to go very much further west than Yonge street in Toronto, have literally no idea what is happening in western Canada today, and the urgent requirements of that area for adequate financial institutions to finance the sort of expansion that must take place in Canada, in the same way as expansion took place in the union to the south of us.

So I am hoping that perhaps this chamber may decide to wait before making up its mind on this bill until we hear from the other place what is to happen with respect to the third bill which has been introduced in the Senate this session for the incorporation of a bank.

Mr. H. A. Olson (Medicine Hat): We listened with considerable interest to the plea by the mover of this motion that the bill before us be sent to the committee on banking and commerce for further discussion there. At that time, he suggested, it would be appropriate to examine some of the officers of the bank, the petitioners, and deal with the subject in some detail.

But I wonder if it would not be useful to consider having all three of the proposed bank measures referred to the committee at roughly the same time so as to avoid overlapping or repetition in some of the general questioning of officers which would have to take place. I realize that each of the promoters of these banking enterprises has expressed some different purpose. At the same time, if we examine the two bills S-6 and S-13 we will find, I suggest, that they are almost identical except for the names of the petitioners, the names of the banks and the location of the head offices. I expect that when the petition of the bank of British Columbia comes before this house for consideration the bill will be written in terms identical with those of the two measures which are now before us. Because of these striking similarities it seems to me a useful purpose would be served by having all three of these bills considered, possibly not together, but at roughly the same time.

A number of suggestions have been made in this debate that the Laurentide bank will not in fact provide the kind of financial services which are required to assist the tremendous industrial and commercial expansion which is taking place on the west coast. My hon. friend from Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron) has suggested that perhaps the purpose of this bank would be to provide the funds necessary to the Laurentide Finance Corporation. He found grounds for this suggestion in the evidence which was placed before the committee of the other place that there would be, at any rate, a close alliance between the bank and the finance corporation should the bank come into existence. The Laurentide Finance Corporation, as all members know, is primarily concerned with the provision of consumer credit. This may be desirable; it may be a service which is demanded by Canadians on the west coast as well as in other parts of Canada. But it certainly seems to me that there is a very real need for a banking institution in the far west of Canada which would be disposed to provide the kind of financing necessary in the much larger field of industrial and commercial expansion. I think some of the promoters of the proposed bank of British Columbia have stated that they are more concerned about the financing of industrial expansion than they are about providing what might be called retail credit facilities in competition with those offered by existing bank branches. I think the sponsor of this bill would agree that providing these large corporations with the capital they need for expansion is a most desirable move on the part of a bank.

Mr. Basford: I am most happy to agree with that. That is why I am sponsoring the incorporation of a new bank which will provide this sort of service.

Mr. Olson: I am pleased to hear the sponsor of the bill say that. But his words are perhaps slightly at variance with the evidence which was given in the committee on banking and commerce in the other place, where it was suggested there would be a close alliance—there was even the suggestion of a subsidiary arrangement—between the Laurentide Finance Corporation and the Laurentide bank. As I say, I believe the Laurentide Finance Corporation is more concerned with providing credit on a consumer credit basis—perhaps not exclusively—than about lending money to finance industrial expansion.

As members are aware, over the years we have expressed concern over the fact that the chartered banks are able to circumvent to some extent the statutory limit on interest.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock?

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to provide for the extension of credit to farm machinery syndicates.

An act to amend the Crop Insurance Act.

[Mr. Olson.]

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED UNDER ADJOURNMENT MOTION

Mr. Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to standing order 39A, to inform the house that the questions to be raised at ten o'clock p.m. this day are as follows: (1) the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge); water resources, speech by U.S. official to Alaska chamber of commerce: (2) the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan); national parks, Nova Scotia, transfer of land for second park: (3) the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher); immigration, Hal Banks, purported publication of departmental documents.

FINANCE

AMENDMENT OF ACTS ADMINISTERED IN INSURANCE DEPARTMENT

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Gordon for the second reading of Bill No. C-123, to amend certain acts administered in the Department of Insurance.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, it is the ill fortune of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) that myself and others who are going to speak tonight have to compete with the British election. However, we will just have to hold our souls in patience until it is through and we can find out what it is all about. I understand also that I must be rather careful tonight not to interfere with the minister's sleep. However, I want to warn him that I am going to cast all the pearls in my necklace before I allow him to get off to bed.

There are two purposes in this bill. I think most of us will agree with the general purpose of the bill. One is to inhibit and curb the continued foreign investment in Canadian financial institutions, and the other is to promote as an alternative the investment of Canadian funds in such institutions and in the general national development.

Sir, there are wider implications in this bill than are covered by those two concrete purposes. The bill presents a question to us that goes beyond even the question of foreign domination, important as that may be. It goes right to the question of just what is our economical and political philosophy in regard to world development. Just what do we think should be the purposes of a national economy, and what should be the purposes of an economic organization? We have also to decide in our own minds what price we are prepared to pay for the purposes that the hon. minister has in mind in this bill.

I think it is true to say that what I am inclined to call the g.n.p. economics has pretty well ruled the rest of the western world for a number of years past. This type of economic philosophy uses only one yardstick for measuring the validity or desirability of any economic policy, that is, the cheapest and most efficient way and place in which you can produce goods and services. It is perhaps carrying that theory of division of labour to its ultimate conclusion, with possibly even a certain amount of dreamy contemplation of one world which does not yet exist. The assumption seems to be, under gross national product economics, that man is primarily a producing and consuming animal rather than a social and political creature.

No one of course follows this thesis completely to its logical absurdity. Always there are reservations, and always there are exceptions. I think it is true to say, however, that this type of economic thinking has been the keynote of our economic thought for quite a long time past—possibly for 50 or 60 years —and any departure from that philosophy has required to be excused as a regrettable, if necessary, heresy.

On the basis of that type of economic thinking, which is all too popular in the world today, there is very little to be said for the minister's bill, because it insists on setting up roadblocks in the way of continuing foreign investment. Perhaps from the point of view of this very narrow school of economic thought one could make out a good case for this type of economic foreign investment in our economy. If we are prepared to eliminate all other considerations, all national considerations and all other social considerations, we have to decide, when we come to judge this bill of the minister's, just how much these other considerations mean to us.

The Fathers of Confederation, about whom we hear so much today, of course flew straight in the face of economic logic and common sense. I never cross the Rocky mountains on the way to my home in British Columbia without being impressed again with the folly and the grandeur of the concept from which this country was born. It was supposed by most of the Fathers of Confederation at that time that they had achieved the impossible when they had successfully defeated logic, geography and economics, and established the nation of Canada. The idea was perhaps in their minds that the job was completely done once and for all, because of course at that time they were living in a premodern capitalistic world. They had no concept of the sort of developments that we were going to see in later years, and the difficulties that they would pose for a country such as Canada, created in the face, as I say, of economic logic and geographic logic.

I think the same question faces us today that faced John A. Macdonald and his colleagues. That question is, is it worth it? They had to ask themselves that question. Was it worth flying in the face of all common sense, logic and geography to establish a nation in the northern half of North America? They decided the answer was yes. Again I think we have to ask ourselves today, is it worth it? Is it worth continuing? Is it worth attempting to preserve a Canadian identity, both economic and political, or would the part of wisdom be to relax comfortably into becoming merely an adjunct to the much larger and wealthier economy to the south of us, which would probably give us a fairly comfortable living but which would inevitably destroy the work done by the Fathers of Confederation?

This is a quite difficult question to answer, a question that Canadians have always been dodging for the last 100 years and have never come up with a continued and consistent answer. But I believe if we turn to the outside world away from North America we may find an answer to this question, because one very significant fact emerges, that virtually the whole of Canadian foreign and external policy is a repudiation of the economics of the gross national product. We are committed throughout the world to the building, to the encouragement, to the establishment of viable national economic units in the emerging countries of the world.

Not long ago I was on the Gaza strip where I saw the representative troops that Canada has had there for the last eight years. One of the purposes of our keeping our troops there and preserving the uneasy peace of the Middle East has been to enable the state of Israel to establish itself as a viable economic unit. The Israelis, of course, did exactly what our Fathers of Confederation did. They thumbed their noses at logic and geography, at economics and common sense. But there were other values involved and we as a people have recognized those values and consider them worth protecting and promoting.

We should perhaps examine those values in our own case and the very first thing we have to face is that the old adage that you cannot eat your cake and have it is just as valid today as ever it was. We cannot eat the nice, juicy, easy cake of sale of our institutions, our resources, our industries to wealthy foreigners and reap the short term benefits, and at the same time hope to achieve the long term benefits of an independent national identity, as an independent nation with independent thinking, with an independent culture and society. We just have to make our choice in this regard. If we are going to eat our cake quickly now, the Minister of Finance is wasting his time in bringing a bill like this before us and we should throw it out of the window out of hand.

I happen to think that Canada is still worth preserving. I think that Canada and Canadians have a role to play in the world. This year I had a better opportunity than I have ever had in my life before to visit other countries as the guest of the governments of two foreign countries in the Middle East, and I was impressed by the position that Canada and Canadians hold in the minds of these people. I admit that the irreverent thought occurred to me now and again that this high esteem was possibly based on ignorance of us, because one heard very little about Canada in other parts of the world, and it may be that when they know us better their esteem will drop. But one thing we can be quite sure of is that we shall not continue to enjoy that esteem if we decide we are going to take the easy way out and sell off bits of the family homestead, and whoop it up in town with the proceeds without any consideration of the future.

I am far from convinced that the minister's bill is going to achieve the very worth-while purpose he has in mind. I have suggested to him in earlier debates in the house that I thought he would have great difficulty in policing it. I have an idea that the complex ramifications of modern, large scale corporate capitalism are going to make it very difficult to deal with the problem of national independence by the means the minister is proposing. I do not, for instance, anticipate the possibility of seeing a great many company directors behind bars, alluring as the prospect might be. I suspect they will not get behind bars and I rather doubt if they will even suffer the $5,000 fine, but in any event we will give the minister an "A" for effort and cheer him on as a Horatius standing on the bridge. I am quite prepared to stand alongside him but I shall run away if large clubs are thrown at me. However, I will give him an "A" for effort.

I think, for instance, it would be possible to make out a case for the value of foreign investment in productive enterprises, that is, enterprises producing goods in this country, although to my mind the disadvantages would outweigh the advantages. But I do not think there can be any question at all that the continued ownership and control of financial institutions by Canadians is a prerequisite to Canadian independence, and that if we allow these levers of power in a modern economy to fall into other hands, then all power will fall into other hands also. However, I have an idea that the minister will have to go rather further than he is prepared to go now.

I doubt that the doctrine of laissez-faire is going to be able to deal with the world of automation and giant corporations. I suspect that laissez-faire will take its place with a number of other divine revelations that have been discarded in the course of human history, and that the minister will have to take more drastic and positive action than he is prepared to take at the present time.

There is for instance the Canada Development Corporation. Perhaps one should speak in a hushed voice in the presence of the dead when one refers to this corporation but I am hoping it is not completely dead and that the minister may be able to resuscitate it. I would hope that he would find the funds to deal with this problem of foreign ownership in public hands, that he might for instance be able to use the funds contributed to the Canada pension plan. Do we hush our voices here? I am not quite sure, but one thing I am quite sure about is that this would be a source by which a really decisive effort could be made with regard to Canadian investment in Canadian institutions along the line of the developments that have taken place in Sweden, where the funds from their extensive social security program now constitute one, if not the major, source of investment capital in that country. In that connection I would suggest that to my mind it is a daft idea to consider turning over all the proceeds of the pension fund to the provinces. I should like to hope that at some time we would perhaps replace a large part of the business of private insurance by public insurance, and there again have funds by which we could direct investment in our economy in the directions which seemed to us most desirable.

I was interested this afternoon to hear the voice of the dinosaur from the primeval swamps when the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) told us that this was an invasion of the age old rights of private property. I could almost hear the voice of Charles I saying "hear, hear". He had age old rights, the age old rights of the divine right of kings, and of course he lost his head over them. I do not imagine that the genial member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings is going to lose his head, but I suspect that the minister must be very cheered at hearing this enunciation of the Tory credo, because it made him look like a positive apostle of progress and made us perhaps forget that this very hesitant, gentle, timid step against the whole bastion of modern capitalism is but a slight chipping at one of the outlying bastions of that structure. However, I think we can perhaps be thankful for small mercies. We have to be, with regard to the present government. I should like to conclude by saying that to my mind the Minister of Finance might perhaps be considered one of the small mercies of the Liberal government now in office.

Mr. R. N. Thompson (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, it has now been several weeks since the Minister of Finance (Mr. Gordon) introduced this very lengthy and profound legislation we have before us in the form of Bill No. C-123. He has announced that this legislation is intended to prevent foreign takeovers of Canada's most important financial institutions. In principle this is good. The objective is right. I believe that the motive behind the proposed amendments is good and one to which we can subscribe. What I am concerned about, Mr. Speaker, is whether or not this legislation that we have can in any way be effective in reaching this stated objective. I believe that what we have before us is something that is correct in the direction at which it is aiming, but it is wrong in the means through which it is expected to attain that objective.

What concerns me in relation to the investment provision is that under existing regulations insurance companies are allowed to invest 15 per cent of their money in common stock. What percentage of that which they are allowed to invest is being used? My understanding is that it is less than one third of the 15 per cent that is being utilized at this time. It is my understanding also that the reason for the reluctance of insurance companies to put any substantial percentage of their investment money into common stocks is that the loss in value at any given point is not taken into consideration by the Department of Insurance in the evaluation of the balance sheets of these insurance companies. There was no provision in this statement to change this condition. My question to the minister would be, does he intend to rectify this situation so his proposal of 25 per cent can be effectively utilized by the insurance companies which are allowed 15 per cent now.

In my opinion the basic reason the insurance companies are not now using this permissible 15 per cent in common stock investments is that they are required to show the market value of this common stock on their balance sheets at the time the balance sheets are made up. Should this stock be low in value at that time it would affect their financial situation in so far as their reserves are concerned in relation to the requirements for their outstanding policies. This is the reason I have grave concern about what the minister has stated as being the objective of this legislation being reached. If the insurance companies have too much money in common stock, it could result in a serious situation. This cannot be said of mortgages or of government bonds or even the bonds of large corporations. If it is essential, perhaps there is some other way of encouraging insurance companies to invest their money in common stocks, which are really the basic type of investment, the most valuable type, so far as the general economy is concerned.

I have watched carefully the financial pages of our press, and I find that this doubt is generally held by many of those who are considered experts in this field. I quote particularly from one of the lead editorials in the Globe and Mail for September 25:

> This appears to be again the case with the new policies he has announced—

The reference is to the Minister of Finance.

> —concerning ownership and operation of the country's financial institutions. It may be months before the lawyers and accountants have worked out in detail exactly what the legislation means. But it would appear from a first look that Mr. Gordon is seeking a reasonable end by unreasonable means.

Then, going on in this editorial I read:

> The damage he may do to foreign investment is not likely to be offset by the gesture he is making toward the encouragement of Canadian investment. He is probably right to permit insurance companies and other financial institutions to invest up to 25 per cent, instead of up to 15 per cent, of their assets in common shares. The insurance industry has asked for this discretion and the banking commission recommended it, but the practical results remain to be measured.

With freedom to invest up to 15 per cent of their assets in common shares, insurance and other companies have in fact invested only 4 per cent. They have argued that the technical regulations have discouraged such investment, and Mr. Gordon is now easing the regulations. It is possible that this will release substantial sums for investment in industry, but no one would want to see the insurance and trust companies forget that their first rule must be safety and security.

Mr. Gordon is also following the recommendation of the banking commission in raising from 66⅔ per cent to 75 per cent of value, the money that can be lent on a first mortgage. He is a little behind the times, however, as many companies are already lending 83⅓ per cent of value on a blend of first and second mortgages at reasonable interest rates.

I believe that this editorial, Mr. Speaker, is typical of the fears in financial circles. I believe the minister must clarify some of these points as we go along in this debate. The minister has said this legislation will release millions of dollars of insurance money for private enterprise, when really he is not making this possible. I have found myself wondering, as I have studied the legislation, if perhaps the minister is not making way for the Canada pension plan which will be a means of channelling off the cream of all the private savings in this country into a huge fund which will be available as social capital to the provincial governments of the country. The fact that this type of saving is going to be channelled off into what can be classified as social capital is certainly something that is going to produce problems. Perhaps the minister believes they can be corrected by this legislation.

Our basic concern with the measure, Mr. Speaker, is simply that, while we agree with the objective, we cannot see how that objective will be reached through the application of the amendments contained in this bill. We will await with much interest further remarks from the minister. We look forward also to the detailed study of this legislation. Obviously, it is going to take considerable time because of the vital importance of it. By way of summary, Mr. Speaker, I might say that the objective is good, but the means by which this objective is going to be reached are things about which we have grave doubts, if we are going to preserve the availability of private capital and the ownership of our Canadian enterprises so that we will be able to go forward not only to make these enterprises Canadian to a larger extent but to provide the necessary capital which we need for the development of our industry, the development of our resources and the general economy.

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I made my initial remarks, on the proposal that is before us this evening, on the night of September 23 when the minister introduced the bill after his statement on motions. At that time I made certain observations on the purposes of this bill, and I think subsequently it has been pretty well clarified that its purposes were as I had indicated. However, on that occasion I had to make certain reservations until such time as I had an opportunity of reading the bill. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I think my guardian angel must have been with me on that occasion because, having read the bill, all 54 pages of it, I now find it is full of prickly burrs and contains one or more fish hooks.

I was especially amused by the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron), who made quite a play about the stand taken by my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis-Kings. In so far as the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands was concerned, he seemed to think this bill was a mere nibbling away or cautious approach to a problem. All I can say is that if one followed the train of thought in his speech, assuming there was any thought in it, one would conclude that the N.D.P. would go much further, but how far we do not know.

The hon. member was most coy. He hinted at a great nationalistic approach, at a sort of massive take-over of foreign interests in Canadian corporations. He did not limit his view to the bills being amended but dealt with the whole ambit of foreign ownership. He asked, where was the Canadian development fund, and this was the first time I heard that fund was to be used for this purpose. I understand it is to be used for the infusion of funds, accumulated in Canada by the government, into the development of industry, and not for the purposes of patriation of foreign interests.

Then he asked, where was the great fund that was to be accumulated under the Canada pension plan, and said the government might have used that fund in order to return to Canada a greater degree of ownership in our industry and business. Of course we know that the funds which will be accumulated under the Canada pension plan have already been given away to the provinces, and it is clear there was never any thought that they should be made available for this purpose. The hon. member did not tell us where and how far his party would go in this regard, and I say quite frankly to him he was either afraid to do so or did not know where it would go.

I must confess that the detailed provisions of this bill are very complicated, and I am pleased the minister has agreed that it be sent to the banking and commerce committee. I am pleased that he is not repeating the mistake made by his colleague, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Hays), who had to fight on the floor of the house to get a bad bill passed, a bill which would have taken half the time in committee of the whole had it been sent first to the committee on agriculture, the members of which could have gotten a great deal more information which ultimately would have resulted in a better bill. Therefore to that extent the minister acted very wisely. Perhaps it was a question of live and learn.

Mr. Gordon: Live and let live.

Mr. Lambert: No, I think it was a question of live and learn. In any event, there are provisions in this bill dealing with the retention of ownership in Canada and the control of Canadian life insurance companies not now under foreign control.

I must reiterate what was said by my colleague, the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan), that there seems to be some sort of fixation on the matter of control of the companies covered by the four bills that are being amended by Bill No. C-123. I believe the minister really means he wants to establish a greater degree of Canadianism in the ownership of these firms because the question of control, as pointed out by the hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, really lies with the superintendent of insurance and the governor in council.

This area of financial activity, and that of the chartered banks, are among the most carefully scrutinized and overseen. There is not any manufacturing or retail concern which has, in a manner of speaking, some government official sitting alongside the president's desk, as one might literally say is the case with life insurance companies and foreign insurance companies, where there are regulations governing the nature of their investments and the trust funds they must have on deposit with the government. My colleague put these matters on record this afternoon and they will be found in today's Hansard. Therefore I say this question of ownership and control is confused in the government's thinking, and it is trying to convince the public that by introducing these provisions it will establish greater control over these companies.

The minister is trying to do something with one hand which he is undoing with the other, and I cite one point, in that right at the very beginning of the bill there is a provision which reduces the financial qualifications for directorship. Under the law as it stands, in order to be elected a director of a life insurance company a shareholder must have in his name shares in the amount of at least $2,500, or on which at least $500 has been paid as capital, or credited as capital, if such calls have been made on those $2,500 shares; but under the provisions of this bill this amount is reduced to $250, which it is stipulated shall be paid in cash. In other words there is a reduction of the application for shares to one tenth, or of the actual posting of cash to 15 per cent. This means nothing so far as ownership and control are concerned.

I shall have something to say later about the question of who is a resident of Canada, but under this proposal a foreign national resident in Canada, having $250 worth of common stock in a life insurance company, is fully qualified to be elected a director. The control lies in a whole body of directors and you could have a whole series of foreign nationals resident in Canada, as executive officers of a life insurance company, but whose investment is a mere $250. That is a pittance, and one can give them the whole beneficial interest. They do not have to hold these shares in trust.

What is $250 today? And therein would lie the day to day control of the board of directors, the control of that company; because in a public company such as many of our life insurance companies are, it only requires effectively a small group owning a relatively inconsiderable proportion of the share capital to really control it, because the individual shareholders do not turn up; they sign proxies in favour of management. As long as things go reasonably well you can control one of these companies with 20 per cent of the shareholdings. It is a continuation, so control lies not in Canadian hands but in foreign hands. But we are asked to say they shall be residents.

Again I make the point I made last year at the time of the minister's budget and again this year, on this question of Canadianization. The fact that persons are ordinarily resident in Canada, if this is to be the yardstick of Canadian control, I say to the minister is meaningless. I would prefer, as I indicated this afternoon, the provision in one of the private bills for the incorporation of a new chartered bank which lays down that these people shall be British subjects ordinarily resident in Canada. If the minister is talking about Canadian control, let him say "Canadian citizens ordinarily resident in Canada" not just "residents".

Let us come to the other point of residence. The bill speaks of a non-resident being an individual who is not ordinarily resident in Canada. The emphasis is on the negative all the time; you are something because you are not something else. But what do they mean by "a person ordinarily resident in Canada"? For the income tax law it is that your ordinary day to day residence is in Canada for at least 180 days. Does this mean that for the purpose of this act one shall be deemed a resident of Canada if there is a stay here of 180 days in one calendar year or one fiscal year? There is nothing in the bill to indicate this. Again, I say to the minister that he is only going half way. I am not necessarily accepting the principle of what he is trying to do, but in the attempt to do what I think he has in mind I do not believe he is going about it in the right way.

I know the minister's preoccupation with some sort of Canadianization of our corporations. I will not repeat the remarks made by my hon. friend from Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) as to the complexities of the 10 per cent in the hands of one individual and the acquisition of anything over and above that which cannot be voted. This will have to be studied in committee. All I can say is that this is going to be almost a Frankenstein to administer. I may be wrong, but I have a feeling that a great administrative monster is being created. I do not know what sort of burden this will place on the backs of the registry and transfer agents who keep the day to day records of the ownership of the shares of any of the companies which may be affected by this legislation, but I am certain they will have a very difficult job, and of course it will mean an increase in the administrative costs of overhead of all these companies. The numbers indicated by the minister this afternoon do not indicate too many companies in a numerical sense. I do not know, but I suppose there may be a couple of hundred at the most. We hope there will be others. After all, the bill provides for investment in subsidiaries and the creation of subsidiaries, controlling interests by life insurance companies, trust companies, loan companies, etc. as well as participation by other life insurance companies in the acquisition of certain assets. All this represents shareholders, and one must keep a careful watch upon who owns what to see they do not get over the indicated percentages.

However, there was another point to be considered, and this is one which I think we shall have to go into in committee in much greater detail. This was that the burden of any infraction—and it is a knowing infraction by a director—of the registration of shares in excess of the amounts permitted in the amendments to the acts will be the responsibility of the directors, who may face a prison term or a fine or both. But this says nothing about any penalty which may be imposed upon the transaction leading to the acquisition of these shares. It does say the transaction shall not be void in so far as the shares as concerned. True, I think there is a disability in not being able to vote them when the percentage is in excess of the 10 per cent or the 25 per cent as the case may be. But I am wondering, and I hope the minister can give me an answer in this regard, why it was not indicated in the legislation that a transaction entered into knowingly with a view to acquiring in excess of the amount prescribed should be void, in other words, not even the beneficial interest in the shares could be acquired; or perhaps not void—that might be going too far—it might be voided, and that a share transfer which was in breach of the amendment would be validated if it had been carried out bona fide and for consideration by a person who was not knowingly endeavouring to acquire shares in excess of those permitted.

There is one other aspect of this legislation I should like to speak about and that deals, I believe, with the trust companies and the life insurance companies. I refer to the delegation by parliament to the governor in council of the right to change the name of a company into a French or English form as the case may be, by way of order in council, without their having to come to the house and to the Senate in order to get the change of name. We have seen a goodly number of bills in this regard and I must say I express some sympathy personnally with a company which faces this problem.

Unfortunately there have been some instances where a bill that has come to both the Senate and the House of Commons to give a French version of an English name has been seized upon as a weapon to stall, and to get into matters which have no relevance but which occupy the time of this house tremendously. I think, subject to further consideration, this provision may balance itself out. I do not know which is the greater convenience. Certainly I would think it would be cheaper for the company to do it by application to the governor in council, as will be provided for under the regulations that will be passed in this regard, than to do it through petition and private bill.

I would also like to receive some clarification from the minister as to who is to determine the degree of residence and who is to determine whether there has been indirect control by a trust, as mentioned in clause 16 with regard to section 4 (b). This is of great interest to us. Is it the superintendent of insurance who is to determine whether there is such indirect control under the trust? The bill is silent in this regard; nowhere have I been able to see this. Perhaps the minister would make a note of this point and give the house the information, because I think it is very important to know what person or persons are to be the judge of matters of this kind. Where lies the discretion of the interpretation; and is there appeal from it? What recourse would a corporation have with regard to an adverse decision as to the residency of one of its shareholders, or as to whether there was a breach of the rules through indirect trust? This is all I am going to say at this time in regard to the ownership or the retention of control, so-called, of Canadian life insurance companies not under foreign control.

I would like to turn now to the consideration of the changes in the class of assets that may be vested in trust in Canada by British insurance companies and foreign insurance companies, so that they are both put on the same basis. There is an extension provided for in regard to bonds issued by fabriques of parishes in Quebec. I may be a little hazy in this connection, but does this mean the incorporation of a religious parish in the province of Quebec; and is there any difference between that and a properly constituted parish in one of the common law provinces, because they all issue bonds to cover indebtedness for capital purposes. I know there are fabriques in other provinces because during my experience with one of the chartered banks I was certainly aware of bank accounts being maintained by the fabriques of French speaking parishes outside the province of Quebec. Why, therefore, is the provision limited to fabriques of parishes in Quebec? Why not in New Brunswick; why not in some of the other provinces? Perhaps the minister will answer this question when he is replying later.

There is also going to be an extension of investments in leases and leaseholds. In the committee we will be able to go into some of the legal implications of what you can do in the hypothecation of leaseholds in those provinces with the Torrens system, where they do not provide for the separate registration of titles to leaseholds. This is a narrow legal point. There cannot be a separation of the freehold from the leasehold, at least as the legislation now provides. If my memory serves me correctly—and I hope I have not been away from the law of the province of Alberta too long—this would be the case in that province. True enough, one can hypothecate a lease through filing a caveat, but it is a complicated process and it is not as neat as would be the case if the leasehold were registerable as a separate title. I will not go into that matter further, but we can deal with it in committee.

The one instance where I think the minister has taken a step in the right direction, though, is that he has opened up the provisions concerning investment in the preferred shares of companies which have the proper dividend or earnings record. The old provision which required a company to have had earnings of a minimum rate of, I believe, 4 per cent and to have had declared dividends for a period of five or more years was, I think, self-defeating because this category of companies was forced to divest itself of its earned surpluses through dividends so that it could sell its preferred shares to a firm that was investing in it. It was being prohibited from accumulating capital for its own expansion by the requirements of the act, which forced it to declare and pay dividends so that life insurance companies could invest in its preferred shares or in other types of obligations. I think that was wrong and I am glad to see the minister has taken this step. I am hopeful that this amendment will see an improvement in this particular type of investment.

One concern that I hinted at when the minister made his first statement was that now trust, loan companies and life insurance companies would be able to invest in real estate companies. It is all right if you have these companies able to control a realty holding company which is concerned with the real property or the premises—the bank premises, or whatever you want to call them —or in any event, the premises of the life insurance company, and actually administering those properties. True enough, we know that the life insurance companies have rather large office buildings; they only require part of them, and the rest is an investment in order to lower the cost of their own premises. I think this is perfectly all right. But what concerns me is the possibility that by owning and controlling real estate companies, life insurance companies and trust companies will be able to get into the really promotional field in real estate development. If there is anything that is creating an inflationary pressure in Canada and in the United States, it is this particular process of real estate promotion whereby an individual can get into a proposition with only his shirt, obtaining mortgage upon mortgage and deal upon deal at very high costs.

Perhaps we should look at some of the real estate promotion deals which have been very speculative and have turned sour. I am not going to mention any names, but we are all aware of a very large operator in Canada who had to liquidate rather quickly, and at great loss, some of his more grandiose real estate development schemes because of this increase in pressure and need for money.

A great deal of pressure would be put on trust and life insurance companies, to the detriment of the policyholders of those companies, as a result of some form of financial recession, and a great many of these real estate schemes would then begin to go sour. This is an area of our economy which must be watched very carefully. I am hopeful that during the committee hearing stage we will have the benefit of full and frank explanation by appropriate officials, including the superintendent of insurance and others who may be able to advise the members of the house in this regard.

I am pleased to note that there is an increase in the ceiling on mortgages to 75 per cent of the appraised value of properties. I think such an increase has been due for some time. This certainly will do away with that sort of fringe or second mortgage business by which the purchaser of an older home, who is not able to purchase it under the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation provisions, must borrow $5,000 or $6,000 in order to obtain $3,000. This second mortgage field at this time is rather nauseous and, in my opinion, requires a great deal more control by parliament at an early date.

Mr. Speaker, I could say a good deal more in this regard, but in conclusion I should like to make reference to the news we received today about a loan company owned by foreign interests which has made what is considered to be the first move to link up with a mutual fund distributor—a mutual fund distributor being a Canadian company. Perhaps at the present time this type of operation is being undertaken in order to wiggle past the provisions of this amendment. In any event I think we should have a great deal more in the way of explanation before we can really give our approval to this measure. I might suggest to the minister that we should have a clear indication of other proposed amendments, because I am a little worried about the procedural problem with which we will be faced if we do step outside the principles of the bill as enunciated.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a few remarks, and because of the pressure of time I will be as brief as possible. One of the remarks made by my colleague who has just resumed his seat, concerning the increase of the mortgage loan percentage to 75 per cent, represents one aspect of this measure with which I cannot agree. I shall deal further with that subject in a moment.

This bill leaves us wondering just what the Liberal party policy is on foreign investment. We have heard very diverse views expressed. The minister on previous occasions at any rate, and to some extent in respect of this measure, has attempted to choke off foreign investment as fast as possible by increasing taxes, or attempting to do so, and by imposing restrictions.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Pearson) and other members of the Liberal party have advocated a free exchange with the United States, particularly in respect of the passage of funds. The pre-election promises of 1962 and 1963 were that anti-Americanism, as it then was defined, would come to an end. We wonder exactly what the Liberal policy is.

The bill we have before us represents a compromise, at least within the Liberal party, of the two extreme views. I can recall the anguished cries that were raised when the former Conservative government brought in the comparatively innocuous bill on corporation and labour union returns. That was not a restrictive bill but a bill which became law, intending to give the government more information in respect of foreign corporations carrying on business in Canada. The hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) on April 2, 1962, as reported at page 2402 of Hansard said this:

> We need foreign capital. In order that we can develop a country as big as Canada, we need that foreign capital. If we need it, we should not discourage it before we start.

This remark was made in respect of a rather innocuous part of the bill, but it does make us wonder how quickly an attitude can change, depending upon the position one is in.

In support of my view that this bill is somewhat watered down and has only a moderate effect, I point to the reaction it received in the United States. Judging from the small amount of editorial comment we have noted, the bill itself is not very effective. I should like to quote from the Toronto Daily Star of September 23, 1964, and particularly a report from Washington by Martin Goodman, Star staff writer, as follows:

> U.S. officials accepted almost casually today Canada's latest effort at economic self-determination.
> "We had anticipated most of this," one official said of finance minister Walter Gordon's new rules limiting foreign ownership of insurance, trust and loan companies to 25 per cent, and expanding the investment power of insurance companies in common stocks.
> "Naturally we oppose any discrimination against foreign investors," he continued, "but in practice, I don't think this will have much effect on U.S. interests."

With these general remarks I pass on to two or three particular matters on which I should like to comment. As has been stated, the bill really is in two sections. The purpose of the first is to reduce the possibility of further invasion by foreign interests of our life insurance companies, foreign insurance companies carrying on business in Canada, trust companies and loan companies, resulting in the taking over of such companies by outside interests. I think this is quite a desirable objective. The main objection that has been raised is that administratively this will be very difficult to control and time only will tell whether it is effective.

The life companies and other companies are given the power to require declarations and other evidence, but it seems to me it will be almost impossible for these companies to find out in many instances who are the real shareholders. Quite recently in the committee on banking and commerce we were discussing amendments to the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act which is administered by the dominion bureau of statistics under the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Sharp). At that time it was stated with reference to similar situations that it was almost impossible to do this and that most of the companies would not make the effort to discover who the real owners of the stock were, to ascertain whether the company was foreign or Canadian controlled. In that regard the obligations of the company under this bill are quite limited.

The right to have an English or French name is commendable, although I think there may be some technical difficulties. Perhaps the wording is not strong enough because it does not make a change in the name of the company but only permits the company to use another name. As far as I am concerned as a member of the banking and commerce committee and the private bills committee, some relief from having so many bills come before us involving nothing more than a change of name will be welcome. I think it will result in many members being able to get on with other work because the only argument that ever arose in those committees was as to the semantics of how the French or English language should be used in translating the original name of the company. I should think that someone outside of parliament who is versed in the language could do just as good a job.

The last subject I want to mention relates to the investment powers of life insurance companies, trust and loan companies under the bill, and there are two aspects involved. The first is real estate. As I stated at the beginning, I believe that 75 per cent of the appraised value of real estate is too high a figure for the mortgage investment of funds belonging to other people, notwithstanding the recommendation of the royal commission on banking and finance.

Not very many years ago companies would not accept anything more than 40 per cent of the appraised value as a trust loan, and in some cases some companies will not do so yet. Fifty per cent is marginal. The percentage was previously raised to 60 per cent and then 66 per cent, which I thought was stretching it quite a bit. I think that raising it now to 75 per cent takes the security of a first mortgage beyond what is prudent and into the realm of a risk investment.

The royal commission itself was not too enthusiastic in this regard. They did come up with a figure of 75 per cent, but on page 287 of their report they mention that there are two kinds of companies lending mortgage money, one comprising the caisses populaires, credit unions and finance companies. In regard to these they had this to say by way of horrible example:

> Some of these, as we have mentioned, are now making first mortgages up to 80 per cent or more of property values for fairly extended terms.

They thought this was pretty high. On the next page they went on to state:

On the other hand, there is a case for restricting the banking institutions and life companies, which accept funds generally from the public, as well as the pension funds which accumulate the savings of members who frequently have no choice about their contributions.

Contrary to the view expressed by my colleague, the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), I think that 75 per cent is too high, and I hope the committee will give further serious thought to this matter.

There is another reason for this objection, namely that the public generally accept these limits as being safe limits. Having in mind the fact that real estate values are excessively inflated, I do not think that 75 per cent on real estate constitutes a safe trust investment for other people's money. As a maximum figure it is in my opinion a bad example. People generally tend to accept what parliament lays down, and I am afraid that such a high figure will result in inflation.

The minister said that the raising of the first mortgage limit to 75 per cent might do away with the necessity of second mortgages. I cannot see how this logically follows. At the present time the limit is 66⅔ per cent of appraised value, and generally speaking people are taking second mortgages amounting to another 15 per cent. This raises the total to 81 or 82 per cent; so taking a first mortgage of 75 per cent will not eliminate second mortgages under present standards. Furthermore it will make first mortgages a much more shaky investment and I believe the objective will not be achieved.

The other question about which I am concerned has to do with common stock. The bill raises from 15 per cent to 25 per cent the permissible amount of common stock that a company may hold. Most companies believe that 15 per cent, the limit now, is much too high. At the present time life insurance companies hold at book value only 2 to 3 per cent of their total assets in common stock. At market value this might run to 5 or 6 per cent, but this is just about the average.

If you are going to raise the limit from 15 to 25 per cent, all that will happen is that those companies which do invest in a large amount of common stock will be encouraged to take more, but those which are prudent investors will not increase the amount they now have. Both with respect to real estate and common stock we can only hope that the insurance, trust and loan companies will not take advantage of the maximums that are set, and if this is what we hope then surely the legislation is not very good. This is certainly something that requires serious thought. Furthermore, there is no incentive for these companies to take the extra risk involved in a higher percentage with respect to mortgage money in a higher amount of common stock.

[Mr. Aiken.]

With these few remarks I should like to summarize my conclusions with regard to the bill. First, it does represent a moderate approach to the problem of foreign investment and the intention is good. I believe it is a much better approach than has previously been used. I believe that the administration will be so difficult it will not be effective. This is what I fear. If it is not effective, then it is not good legislation.

The present bill might be a logical second step to the program started by the previous government, which started in a rather general way with the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act. This could have been a very logical second step. I say too that a relaxation of the rules governing investment of other people's money to the very limit of good practice is not justified by the possible benefits. The royal commission suggested that this particular item, the increasing of mortgage loans to 75 per cent, be used in concert with three or four other measures. It was suggested they could bring about certain results. We are only introducing one of these without the others. This legislation by itself will not achieve what the royal commission expected.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I will not oppose the bill, because it is going to committee. The minister has stated he is going to propose some amendments and I think that not only the amendments he proposes, but others, might be brought before the committee to reduce these limits, which I think are too high in respect of both mortgages and common stock in relation to investment by public companies. They are handling other people's money.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: If the minister speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Walter L. Gordon (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, before I comment on some of the interesting speeches that have been made, might I ask the permission of the house to apologize for a remark I made earlier today? I said I thought the Renault and Peugeot works were going to be established in Terrebonne, although I was not quite sure about it. I have since made inquiries and I find they are to be established at Point aux Trembles in Mercier. I apologize to the two hon. members who might have been embarrassed by my earlier remarks.

The hon. member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings (Mr. Nowlan) in his remarks referred particularly to the ownership clauses of this bill. As I interpreted what he said, I gathered that he had no real objection to the limitation of 10 per cent against the holdings of any one non-resident, but he thought that the total holdings of 25 per cent for all non-residents was overly restrictive. I recalled, as he was speaking that he was a member of a government which, in 1957, enacted legislation which enabled Canadian life insurance companies to become mutual companies and in this way to avoid any of their shares being acquired by non-residents. As I said in my statement earlier, this undoubtedly prevented some of the larger Canadian insurance companies from falling into the hands of non-residents. To that extent I, for one, commend the legislation. I must say I did not think at the time, and I do not think now, it went quite far enough. However, I hope this particular bill will fill the gap.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Cameron), in his usual witty and cogent remarks, said that he agreed with the bill in principle but that he was afraid it would be difficult to police. Several other speakers also referred to their fears that this bill would create administrative difficulties. I think the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) referred to it as a Frankenstein to administer and that it would become a great administrative monster. Well, Mr. Speaker, the bill has now been open to public gaze for some weeks, and while I respect the fears of the hon. members who have spoken on this subject I am also interested in the fact that the companies themselves, who will have to do the administering, have not seen fit to suggest, to me, that they see any particular difficulties involved in the administration of these particular provisions. On other occasions I have noticed that when the officials of companies are fearful they will be involved in administrative difficulties they have not been hesitant in coming forward and letting me know about it. The absence of these representations in this case, therefore, rather cheers me. I have a feeling it is going to work very well and very easily.

The hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands stated, and I thought there was a rather plaintive note in his voice as he expressed the view, that he did not think there would be many corporation directors who would find themselves behind bars as a result of this legislation. I hope that his fears turn out to be justified. I would not like to think of our jails being filled with company directors or anyone else. In this particular case I will expect, as I am sure all hon. members of the house will expect, that if this bill is passed by parliament company directors and everybody else will obey the law. They will see that the wishes of parliament are carried out and, incidentally in the process of so doing avoid any possibility that any of them might incur the fate to which the hon. member referred.

As I remember, he also mentioned the Canada Development Corporation and, if I am quoting him correctly, added that one should speak in hushed tones in the presence of the dead. I should like to reassure him on this point by stating that this particular body is not dead and I hope it will be produced in lively form, and that he will be one of the first to support the measure when it comes before this house.

Mr. Herridge: Has it been hibernating over the winter?

Mr. Gordon: My hon. friend and neighbour in the Roxborough apartments has asked whether this project is hibernating. I think it is fair to say that the weather has been a little inclement for it in recent months. I do not know if I am overly optimistic, but I think the weather is getting better and we may see more of it in the not too distant future. It seemed to me there was a somewhat different tone to the remarks the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) used to commend this legislation, when it was presented to the house and discussed on September 22, from the tone he used tonight. I have not looked up Hansard within the last day or so, but it seems to me that on that occasion he was quite enthusiastic about this legislation.

Mr. Lambert: Certain aspects of it.

Mr. Gordon: I remarked upon it particularly because he is not always known for the enthusiasm with which he greets legislation presented by this government, and on that occasion it seemed there was a rather happy change in his tone and viewpoint. I am only disappointed that on reflection, or perhaps after discussions with some of his friends—

Mr. Lambert: No, on looking at the bill.

Mr. Gordon: We are only talking about the principle of the bill at the moment, and the hon. member seems to have somewhat modified his earlier enthusiasm. I liked the hon.

member for Edmonton West on September 22 more than I liked him this evening. Naturally I am not talking in a personal sense, but he did raise some questions that deserve to be answered. However, Mr. Speaker, I would not like to offend Your Honour, or the house, by dealing with detailed questions which I am sure you would rule could be better discussed in committee. So, if my hon. friend will forgive me, I shall try to stick to the principle of the bill this evening, but I assure him that the points he raised will be carefully considered and will be answered fully when the bill reaches committee stage. As an example, he referred to the question of fabriques, the qualifications they would have, and whether they would come under this bill. This is the kind of technical question that could be better handled in committee.

One other point of principle was touched on by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken). He questioned the desirability or the wisdom of permitting insurance companies, trust and loan companies to lend up to 75 per cent of the value of real estate on mortgages. I would remind him that this was a recommendation of the royal commission on banking and finance.

Mr. Aiken: Are royal commissions always 100 per cent correct?

Mr. Gordon: Some have a better batting average than others, and I can think of one whose batting average is going up.

Mr. Knowles: Would that be the Hall commission?

Mr. Gordon: My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre seems to be going a little astray from the principle of this bill in that comment, although I sympathize with his interest in the subject to which he refers.

On this question of whether it is wise to allow these lending institutions to lend money up to 75 per cent of the value of real estate, or whether the limit should be retained at 66⅔ per cent, I think this is a matter of judgment and opinion. I must say I was impressed by the views of the royal commission on this point, and after careful consideration and full discussion with my colleagues in the government we felt this was the kind of recommendation that we were prepared to recommend and implement.

I think those are the main points of principle that were raised, and I assure hon. members they will have ample opportunity of discussing the clauses of the bill in committee. As I said earlier, I would move that it be referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on banking and commerce.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Lamoureux in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

1. Departmental administration including fees for membership in the international organizations listed in the details of the estimates, $5,180,500.

Mr. More: Mr. Chairman, it is not my intention to hold up the passage of these estimates but I would like to bring one or two matters to the minister's attention.

I have no fault to find with the general statement he made, which contained some interesting things that I was glad he mentioned. I remember the great cries of Liberal party spokesmen that Conservative policies were ruining our economy, yet in the minister's statement he referred to 44 straight months of advance, and a partisan Conservative like myself was glad to hear him make that statement and to see it in print.

There is a most interesting article in tonight's Ottawa Citizen, headlined "Wheat Sale" and written by Garth Hopkins, associate editor of the Financial Times of Canada. This rather concise article points out the impact on the economy of at least the prairie provinces, and in retrospect upon Canada as a whole, of the benefits received from the sale of wheat and flour under the deal that was announced with Russia last September. It points out that this sale meant direct increases of $205.8 million in the income of farmers in prairie provinces in the first six months of this year, as compared with the amount they received in the first half of 1963.

Indirectly this sale meant much more than that because it provided extra work for the railroads, for ports and shipping, and all other industry which dealt with the moving and delivering of the grain to the export market. I note that the article points out that the increase during the first half of this year for Alberta was $46,703,000; for Saskatchewan $155,305,000 and for Manitoba $3,784,000. I think the minister would be the first to admit that this has had a terrific impact on the economy of the country.

Certainly no politician was responsible for the bounteous rains, good climate and growing season which produced the grain, but I have a memory of the minister jumping into his first puddle, when he went west and said the advice of the former minister of agriculture was irresponsible when that former minister told farmers to grow all the wheat they could. Far from being irresponsible I think it was far-sighted advice, and I am sure the minister was happy the wheat was on hand when the sale fell into his lap here in Ottawa. I hope more sales fall into his lap, or if he gets them himself I will give him credit for them. We are all delighted that the economy received this great boost during the first half of the year.

I should like, now, to refer to another industry in the province of Saskatchewan which will be of great benefit to the economy of the province and to the economy of Canada as a whole, that is the growing potash industry which has been established there. There are now two plants operating in Saskatchewan. There is one at Esterhazy which is a shaft mining venture. It is so successful that I understand it is to be extended and another shaft sunk. Then we have the new plant of Kalium Chemicals Limited at Belle Plaine 30 miles west of Regina. In deference to my hon. friend from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre I should like to say it is only 15 miles from Moose Jaw, but then they have to establish themselves in Regina to get the services they need for an industry this size. It was my good fortune to be present at the official opening on September 30. I was pleased to see the hon. member for St. Paul's in attendance there, also; I know this development is of great interest to him. This development uses a different method of procuring this mineral from those which have been used in the past. The potash deposits in this area lie some 5,000 feet below the surface. The depth is so great that I understand shaft mining is not economic, so this new process has been developed. It has been tried in various countries of the world over the last 50 years without success. Kalium Chemicals Limited some nine years ago began a strenuous effort to develop this successfully. Some seven years of hard research went into it and some two and a half years of operating a pilot plant, and today we have this $50 million plant operating successfully. On the opening day, the official opening day on September 30, 7,000 tons of this mineral were shipped in two trainloads to some areas in Canada, and throughout the United States. It was pleasant to see the cars going out on trains, one on the Canadian National and one on the Canadian Pacific—we must be fair to both our rail complexes—for many states of the union south of us. It is also interesting to note that large amounts of this potash will be shipped to Europe and to all parts of the world where the need for it is very great.

In his remarks, the premier of Saskatchewan on the official opening day intimated that the returns to the provincial government from this venture in a year's operation would be nearly $400,000 and that the two ventures operating in the province in this current year would have net returns of $30 million. I was interested in a note I took out of the Globe and Mail, I think it was, of September 30 to see that prospective further developments will mean some 1,500 new jobs in the Saskatoon area where the proposed new developments are taking place. This one plant of Kalium Chemicals Limited in its own operation provides 235 new jobs and it is considered that the over-all figure, including those who serve the plant and deliver the product, will amount to some 500 new jobs. This indicates the great impact this industry has on the economy.

The reserves of potash in this region are tremendous and I am told they are sufficient to supply world demand for 8,000 years. These are proven bodies. One well known figure in this area of development told me that for all they knew at the moment it could be they had sufficient for 88,000 years. I think this indicates that the minister should take a concrete interest in this development. The government should take a great interest in it and certainly the people and the government of my province and, I believe, the people of Canada as a whole, welcome it. I am told on good authority that there is a prospect of ten more major potash operations in the near future in Saskatchewan and that many of them will be of the solution type.

The reason I am talking about this tonight is that involved in whether these can go ahead in the immediate future or not is the question of federal taxation policy. On September 21 my colleague from Kerrobert, Kindersley directed a question to the Minister of Finance with regard to the tax on solution mining operations. As is well known, the shaft mining operation qualifies for tax concessions over a three year period. The solution mining operation has none. Yet I am told the capital investment for this alternative method of mining is the equal of the shaft. I know there are some problems connected with a formula which will permit the removal of this discrimination but I am sorry to say that there appears to be not too great a sense of urgency in the thinking of the minister or the government in regard to finding the new formula which is needed. My colleague asked a question on September 21. He was told this was a matter of policy to be announced in due course. This was the answer after notice of the question had been taken by the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance. The answer was given on September 30, some nine days later, and that is all the information he got. On October 1, I believe it was, I directed a question to the Minister of Finance on this matter. I thought I was on good ground in quoting a statement which I alleged was made by the premier of Saskatchewan that the minister's policies in this connection were stupid and shortsighted.

I have never got involved in personalities in making my arguments and it certainly was not my intention to get involved in any personalities when I asked this question, because a press conference was held in connection with the official opening of Kalium. I did not hear the statement but two people—and I checked carefully about it—told me that these were the words the premier of Saskatchewan had used. I thought it was a forthright statement of criticism. I did not see anything personal about it because the policies which the minister presents in this house are, as I understand them, the policies of the government and it was the policy the remarks were directed to. Certainly there is no difference between the premier of Saskatchewan and myself in urging this government to take action to remove a discrimination which may affect the early development of further potash operations in Saskatchewan. We are resolved in our aim and it is to arouse this government and arouse its interest in this matter so that they will take some action.

As I say, I know the difficulty but certainly it is not right that companies producing the same product in the same area from similar ore bodies should suffer discrimination because of tax policies and be placed at a disadvantage. These bodies of potash are there at great depth. There is interest in developing them. The capital is there but the taxation policy now in existence may cause a delay, the premier says, of two years in their exploitation. I do not think we can afford such a delay, nor can the people of Canada. As I say, I quoted the premier of Saskatchewan correctly, as I understood it at the time, as saying the policy was stupid and shortsighted. He has denied using the word stupid. I accept and apologize for having attributed it to him. In the Leader-Post of October 7 the premier of Saskatchewan—and we are not having a quarrel about this and I am not trying to argue whether he said it or not—denies saying that Gordon was stupid, according to the headline.

[Mr. More.]

I did not say that either; I said that I understood the premier to say that the policies were stupid. I think this headline is wrong, because as I understand it the premier was referring to the policies also and not to the individual who occupies the office of Minister of Finance. I point this out, Mr. Chairman, realizing the impact of new industries of this size and this kind of investment on the economy of my province, and Canada as a whole in the years ahead—and it can be in the immediate years ahead.

All I wish to do at this time is urge the minister to impress upon his colleagues the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Industry—he has a great, new department of highly paid experts—to work on this problem and remove this discrimination. The Minister of National Revenue should also get at this problem, and get at it right away, because there is just no reason that we can condone for having a taxation policy continued, now that the solution mining process has been proven successful and is in operation; a taxation policy that discriminates, that may stall huge capital investment that will provide a large number of needed jobs within the next few years. This type of policy will not be condoned by the people of my province, and I certainly believe they would have the sympathy of the people of Canada.

I regret having directed my question to the Minister of Finance using words I alleged had been made by the premier of Saskatchewan, which he now denies and which denial I accept. I say nothing more in that regard. My purpose, however, is the same; I wish to ask the minister to use his good offices to urge his colleagues to find a solution to the problem that may hinder the development of which I have spoken. We need it; we do not want it to be stalled, and the matter has real urgency.

Mr. Alkenbrack: Mr. Chairman, in taking part in the discussion on item 1 of the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce this evening I have two or three points of criticism of the system as it is today, and the administration of the department. I will not be too severe in my criticism this evening, I congratulate the Minister of Trade and Commerce upon bringing forth his estimates, although I do not always agree with him or his colleague the Minister of Finance with whom he must at all times maintain close liaison.

Our trade and commerce, broadly speaking, cannot prosper if we employ a narrow outlook in the legislation concerning our secondary manufacturing industries. I point out to the minister a gross injustice that has been perpetrated on the area which I represent, the riding of Prince Edward-Lennox mainly, although it goes beyond that. In 1954 the Del Monte company of California was permitted to buy Canadian Canners, which was our largest secondary manufacturing industry in Prince Edward county, manufacturing agricultural products into food products. The Del Monte company of California bought out Canadian Canners in our area and, sad to say, immediately closed up all the factories, and to the agreements in connection with those factories which they sold to Canadian individuals and Canadian companies they attached a solemn clause right in the deed that they would no longer be used for canning agricultural products. In other words, today we still have at least one of these good canning factories that could be started up at very short notice to continue to serve the area as it did before 1954; but according to the agreement, that hard headed bargain made by the modern Sam Slick across the border, that factory can no longer be used to can tomatoes, peas and corn, the products of Prince Edward county. I deplore the situation that was permitted by a Liberal administration back in the 1950's and I recommend to the minister that he use his powers to correct it. Any agreement of that kind should be automatically voided in connection with these properties. I have no doubt that in other industries the same thing has occurred. It may have occurred in our lumbering industry, in our paper making industry and in other forms of secondary manufacturing.

Only about a week ago I had a strong, forceful but reasonable complaint from a citizen of Prince Edward county who owns one of these factories but cannot use it for the purpose for which it was built. Second, Mr. Chairman, I have a complaint regarding the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, over which the minister has jurisdiction. This complaint is in the form of a letter from a prominent Canadian manufacturer. The letter is dated August 13, 1964, and I wish to quote from it as follows:

> Under normal conditions I do not sign cheques on the current account except when they exceed a certain figure.

The letter is signed by the vice president of this company. It continues:

> However, I had this opportunity today when our secretary treasurer was on a short vacation. Amongst the cheques to which I affixed my signature today was one in the amount of—

—almost $600, for—> —payment of union dues for July 1964—district 50, united mine workers of America, to be sent directly to 1435 Kay street N.W., Washington, D.C.

> It seems incredible to the undersigned that our government would stand by and let moneys for union dues go out of the country. This must be an average monthly payment that we're making on behalf of the union and when you multiply this by thousands of manufacturers in our country, the amount going across the border must be fantastic.

Mr. Regan: Mr. Chairman, will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Alkenbrack: You will have a chance to make your remarks after I have finished. The letter then continues as follows:

> Again, when it contributes to the elegant living of such union leaders as we read about in newspapers, the situation is that much less digestible.
> Surely some legal aspect of this situation could demand that the dues be held in Canada for the use of our own citizens. At least a great proportion of it would be spent here.
> I am sure this is just a "cry in the wilderness", but I could not help but comment on the situation when it was drawn to my attention in the manner as outlined above.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, it is ten o'clock.

Mr. Alkenbrack: I think we should have unions of a national and Canadian nature controlled in Canada and not by union officials of the republic to the south.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask about the business for tomorrow, and for a forecast of business for next week.

Mr. MacNaught: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we will continue our discussion on estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. However, if that discussion is not concluded by one o'clock it will have to be interupted, because the minister will not be available after that time. We will then consider the votes relating to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, under the jurisdiction of the Postmaster General. After that we will take up the estimates of the Department of Veterans Affairs, followed by the estimates of the Department of National Revenue.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that I cannot make any forecast at this time for the business on Monday.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the house under provisional standing order 39A deemed to have been moved.

WATER RESOURCES—SPEECH BY U.S. OFFICIAL TO ALASKA CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, what a good many Canadians consider as a tragic surrender of Canada's national and historic right, the surrender of vast quantities of Canadian natural resources, and the unnecessary invasion on civil and property rights of a good many Canadians under the terms of the Columbia river treaty, has alerted many to the need for a Canadian inspired national water management policy which provides for a determination of the future requirements of water in Canada. It is because of this concern and because of a speech made by a certain gentleman in Fairbanks, Alaska, that on Tuesday last I asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources the following question:

> Has the minister's attention been directed to the report of a speech made by Mr. Gus Norwood, executive secretary of the United States northwestern public power association, to the Alaska chamber of commerce? If so, would the minister inform the house of his reaction to these proposals and projections and their effect on the future development of Canadian water resources?

It is for the particular reasons I have mentioned that we are watching very closely these speeches made by United States authorities, and particularly those of the United States army engineers who, as everyone who is aware of the history of the development of the Columbia river treaty knows, got their way almost completely in so far as the terms of that treaty are concerned.

The speech I have reference to was made in Fairbanks, Alaska, and I am going to quote a few paragraphs from it before the parliamentary secretary to the minister replies.

> An American expert says the west coast of North America is entering a golden age of hydroelectric power and long distance power transmission development.

A golden age from their point of view.

> Gus Norwood, executive secretary of the northwest public power association, bases his prediction on almost $5 billion worth of construction planned or under way. In a speech to the Alaska chamber of commerce he said the total is composed of: $700 million in electric interties between the United States Pacific northwest and the southwestern states; $700 million in developments under the Columbia river treaty between the U.S. and Canada; $800 million Peace River development in northern British Columbia; $2,500 million in hydro projects in the U.S. Pacific northwest.

Then it continues:

> "This hydro and intertie program is shrinking the whole west coast of North America," Norwood said. "From Rampart dam on the Yukon river to Los Angeles is 2,700 miles. By the end of 1968 there will be in operation 1,800 miles of 500,000 volt transmission lines from Fort St. John, B.C., on the Peace river, to Los Angeles."

He continued:

> The advent of extra high voltage transmissions "opened the door of opportunity for the Rampart dam and other projects on the Yukon river and many other great rivers in Alaska and Canada."

The article continues:

> The interties are part of a vast grid planned by the U.S. government that would link 11 states. Four extra high voltage lines would carry surplus power from the Pacific northwest states to California and Arizona. Examining the "problems" of power surplus, Norwood maintained that the interties permit "building hydro in advance of local loads and selling the surplus in the southwest."

That is the southwestern United States, Mr. Speaker.

> "The availability of the huge Pacific southwest market assures any west coast dam building agency of an outlet for surplus power, especially in that critical period when power comes on the line and debt service must be paid, but the local power market takes years to load the project."

I presume in that instance he is referring to the Canadian market to a considerable extent. I was also very interested in a letter that appeared in the New York Times of Sunday, October 4, written by a gentleman by the name of Daniel Allan, of Brooklyn. He deals with the army project for an Alaska dam and says:

> It is no surprise that the army corps of engineers wants to build a dam where it would do the least good, effect the most damage and cost the most money. That body has consistently demonstrated a singularly unique immunity to reason and a callous disregard for the beauties of nature.

Then he goes on to deal with the Rampart dam proposal in Alaska which will affect the development of Canadian water resources on the Yukon river. He says:

> Not content with this, the dam builders have moved on to bigger but not better things, in this case intending to surpass in Alaska their dubious accomplishment in Colorado. Such shameful waste is more characteristic of the 19th century than the 20th.

I see my time is nearly expired, Mr. Speaker. I have asked a question, made reference to the report of the speech by Mr. Norwood and mentioned the apparent concern of a United States citizen who is aware of the projects that the United States army corps of engineers has under consideration.

In conclusion I want to ask the minister an additional question. Will he tell the house what the government is doing to protect our remaining water resources in Canada?

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member drew the attention of the house to some United States comment seeking a continental water policy. I can assure him at the outset, and I assure the house, that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is thinking primarily in terms of a Canadian water management policy.

On September 28, in answer to a question posed by the hon. member, which is found at page 8487 of Hansard, on the same subject, the minister stated in his reply:

> At the present time the building of that dam—

That is the Rampart dam.

> —and the transmission of power through Canada would not be in the interests of Canada. Moreover, the economic considerations involved in the transmission of power for well over 1,000 miles as well as the fact that transmission would have to take place entirely through Canada would, I think, place us in a very strategic position.

This reply, which was given by the minister to the hon. member on that occasion, indicates I believe the minister's reaction to the proposals and projections about which the hon. member was worried this evening. It indicates also his views on their effect on future development of Canadian water resources. I can only say to him that Mr. Norwood's speech before the Alaska chamber of commerce provides no additional substantive information upon which I could make comment this evening. All it does is speculate hopefully on the possibility of this development taking place some time in the near future from the United States point of view. This is all I can say in answer to the hon. member's comments this evening.

NATIONAL PARKS—NOVA SCOTIA—TRANSFER OF LAND FOR SECOND PARK

Mr. Gerald A. Regan (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, despite the undoubted preoccupation of members of the house with the elections that are taking place in Great Britain and the changes in the Soviet union today, I should like to turn the attention of the house to the question of the new national park in western Nova Scotia. On Tuesday I asked a question of the minister of northern affairs which reads in part as follows:

> Inasmuch as preparation of the new national park in western Nova Scotia appears to be behind schedule, can the minister indicate whether the province of Nova Scotia has transferred the land involved to the federal government so that construction can be started? If not, can the minister say what is delaying the government of Nova Scotia in this matter?

I think it goes without saying that this new national park in western Nova Scotia is of great importance to the development of the tourist industry in that part of the province. In recent years the tourist industry has become a very important part of the economy of Nova Scotia. It is important also to the nation, of course, because any United States tourist dollars that come into the country as a result of the visit of tourists from New England to Nova Scotia are new dollars. They are new money and they certainly help us with our balance of payment problem. At the present time most of the tourists who come to Nova Scotia, other than by the Bluenose from Bar Harbor to Yarmouth, do not visit western Nova Scotia. Those who come on the Bluenose obviously do. I feel that the presence of a well developed national park in the western part of the province could result in many of those who come around by Amherst, and into the province that way, visiting the western part of the province. This would result in a lengthier stay by visitors and result in more money being left in the province by those tourists. This is desirable.

In view of the fact it is now well over a year since the agreement was concluded between Nova Scotia and the federal government for the establishment of this second national park, and according to the statements that were made by both levels of government at that time, there was an indication that the land necessary would be passed over to the federal government by the province much earlier than this, so construction of the national park could proceed, I ask the minister why this has not happened. I would ask him if he knows whether the province has acquired all the land involved and, if not, how soon it will be in a position to transfer the land it does hold.

I would point out to the house that a very large proportion of the land which will comprise this new national park was provincially crown owned, and a large part was owned by the Mersey Paper Company. With regard to those lands there should not be any holdup or delay. If there has been some delay on the part of the province I would be very eager to hear the explanation for it, especially concerning delay on individual plots of land. I would urge the department to work out an arrangement with the province of Nova Scotia whereby the vast amount of land already acquired could be transferred to the national government so that work on that part at least could begin.

It is very important that we have this new national park in operation and fully equipped by 1967. That will be a year in which there will be a great inflow of American tourists to this country, and it is important that we have the park well advanced at that time.

I might also say I am pleased to see that the original plan has been expanded so as to include a physically separated area along the coast in Queens county, which will provide beachland as part of the park. This is something to be commended, but if there is any delay in the acquisition of land in that area I would urge the minister to work out an agreement with the province whereby construction in other areas of the park could begin as quickly as possible.

If the province of Nova Scotia has not acquired all the land, then I hope it will take action to have its agents step up the pace because I see no reason, after this passage of time, why all the land should not already have been acquired by the province.

Mr. John N. Turner (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I want to echo the enthusiastic applause which greeted the rising of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Regan) this evening. I am sure it was a tribute by his fellow members to his industry in representing the city of Halifax and the province of Nova Scotia in the courageous and conscientious way he does.

In answer to his query I must say that the province of Nova Scotia has not yet transferred to Canada, free of encumbrances, title to the lands which it agreed should form the national park in that province. By way of explanation I might say that where the title to the land lay with the crown in right of the province there was, of course, no difficulty. However, clear title has still to be obtained from private individuals and concerns in respect to some of the potential park area before that land can be transferred outright to the crown in right of Canada. I understand that the province is still proceeding with such acquisition and that this acquisition involves negotiation with the owners.

I shall inform the minister of the constructive suggestion made by the hon. member, that where there has already been a substantial block of land assembled by the province of Nova Scotia it should be deeded immediately to the Canadian government so that plans for the park may proceed. Though the land has not yet been transferred to the federal government, the national parks branch officers have been on site, taking surveys of the land and preparing development plans so that the federal government will be ready, immediately upon transfer, to initiate the park immediately, so as to satisfy, I hope, the legitimate ambitions of the hon. member to have this park ready for the people of the country, as an added glory to the province of Nova Scotia, by the anniversary of confederation.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.22 p.m.
