HOUSE OF COMMONS DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

THIRD SESSION—THIRTY-FOURTH PARLIAMENT

41 Elizabeth II

VOLUME X, 1992

COMPRISING THE PERIOD FROM THE SIXTEENTH DAY OF JUNE, 1992
TO THE SIXTEENTH DAY OF NOVEMBER, 1992

INDEX ISSUED IN A SEPARATE VOLUME

Published under authority of the Speaker of the House of Commons by the Queen's Printer for Canada

Available from Canadian Communication Group — Publishing, Supply and Services Canada, Ottawa, Canada K1A 0S9.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, June 16, 1992

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

REPORT OF CANADA–EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the report of the Canada–Europe Parliamentary Association parliamentary visit.

This visit was held in Ukraine from April 28 to May 9, 1992.

* * *

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the first report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons.

This report presents the results of our consideration of the government's decision to cancel the Court Challenges Program.

This report is also available in audio cassette format from the clerk of the committee.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–86, an Act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Valcourt moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

* * *

• (1010)

[English]

PETITIONS

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE EVANGELICAL CHURCH

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, I rise to seek leave of the House to adopt the following motion.

That, notwithstanding Standing Orders 132 and 140, the petition for a private bill from the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church presented on Thursday, May 14, 1992 and reported on by the clerk of petitions on Friday, May 15, 1992 be deemed to have been filed within the required time limit and received by this House.

Motion agreed to.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 35 residents of the south shore of Nova Scotia.

The petitioners note that the new firearms regulations now before the House leave many questions unanswered with respect to firearm storage and transportation, the capacity and alteration of firearm magazines and the need for increased fees payable on application for a firearms acquisition certificate.

Therefore, they humbly pray and request that the proposed regulations under Bill C-17 be referred to the standing committee on justice for further review, reconsideration, consultation with recreational firearms organizations before they come into force.

Since this petition was initially circulated, there has been a meeting with the officials of the Minister of Justice and the Lunenburg and Bridgewater Firearms Associations. Nevertheless I am pleased to present this petition on their behalf.

VIOLENT CRIME

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions, the first one coming from various parts of my riding from people who perceive a great weakness in our justice system. I think this petition was initiated on the basis of the death of Nina de Villiers some time ago.

The petitioners are asking the government to protect these vulnerable people and to do it by amending the Criminal Code, the Bail Reform Act 1972 and the Parole Act.

In their opinion it would help prevent murders such as the one that occurred to an innocent victim, Nina de Villiers, some time ago.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, the second petition is the same as other petitions coming I notice from all corners of the House. It asks the government to make sure, before any constitutional amendments are made, that the people of Canada are given an opportunity to react to any changes.

I notice the very same wording is being presented by all parties. Perhaps it suggests something to this government. There is a feeling out there that any change in their Constitution should reflect the feelings of the Canadian people.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 285 and 311.

[Text]

Question No. 285—Mr. Whittaker:

Since January 1, 1989, has any funding been provided to the Daishowa company, directly or indirectly, for the Forestville, Que., pulp and paper facility and, if so, (a) in what amount (b) in what form (loans, grants, contributions or guarantees)?

Hon. Pauline Browes (Minister of State (Environment)): To our knowledge, Daishowa does not have a plant at Forestville but rather a logging area. Its plant is located in Quebec City.

(a) Environment Canada, through the St. Lawrence Centre, provided $190,000 in funding to test the use of the bicarbone process for treating effluent from the Daishowa plant in Quebec City. The total cost of the testing is estimated at $996,000.

(b) The funding was provided by the St. Lawrence Centre under a Department of Supply and Services contract in exchange for which we would obtain the test results.

Question No. 311—Mr. Milliken:

Did the government provide funding, directly or indirectly, for the preparation and showing of "ParticipACTION" advertisements during the America's Cup races and, if so, (a) what were the costs of production, (b) what were the amounts paid to run the advertisements?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): ParticipACTION received $1,000,000 from Fitness and Amateur Branch of Health and Welfare in the 1991-92 fiscal year. The portion of that contribution allocated to the television public service announcements amounted to roughly $365,000. These funds represent a partial contribution toward the full production costs of television, radio and print media advertisements. Since ParticipACTION uses public service announcements, there is no cost associated with the "airtime". Consequently, the $365,000 federal government contribution in effect leads to a considerably sized contribution in-kind from radio, television and print media and corporate sponsors.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

CONCURRENCE IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1992–93

Hon. Gerald S. Merrithew (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993, laid upon the table on Thursday, February 27, 1992, less the amounts voted in Interim Supply, be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Since today is the final allotted day for the supply period, ending June 23, 1992, the House will go through the usual procedures to consider and dispose of the supply bill. In view of recent practices do hon. members agree that the bill be distributed now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am honoured today to speak about full supply for the Main Estimates for the fiscal year 1992–93.

This year the Main Estimates total $160.5 billion and through these estimates the government is seeking Parliament's approval for $48.8 billion in new spending authority. The remaining $111.7 billion represents statutory payments that have received previous parliamentary approval.

These Main Estimates reflect this government's continuing commitment to eliminating waste and inefficiency, as well as divesting itself of activities and organizations that no longer serve a vital public need in order to reduce costs and strike a proper balance between Canada's demands for federal services and their ability as taxpayers to pay for them. In this regard much has been achieved over the past seven years.

Program spending now represents only 16.7 per cent of Canada's gross domestic product as compared to 20 per cent in 1984.

During the period the annual growth in program spending, including Public Service salaries, has averaged only 4 per cent as compared to an average inflation rate of 4.3 per cent.

These achievements show the government's commitment to increased efficiency through the rigorous control of expenditures as well as the implementation of innovative management practices. They also reflect our commitment to good management and to the careful stewardship of the taxpayers' dollars. Our record is one of success.

The year-over-year increase in the Main Estimates is the outcome of a number of decisions and factors affecting the budgets of all 135 programs delivered by 116 departments, agencies and Crown corporations appearing in the estimates.

This increase can be divided into two broad categories: adjustments to statutory items, which amount to a net increase of $1.3 billion, and changes to voted items which amount to $1.7 billion.

Statutory spending is $112.1 billion or 70 per cent of total estimates. Spending in this category includes such things as: major federal transfers to Canadians in respect of Old Age Security, guaranteed income supplements, family allowances and unemployment insurance benefits; transfers to the provinces under the equalization program for health, education, and social assistance; general Public Service programs; and public debt charges.

It is important to note that the major factor underlying the growth in the voted portion of the Main Estimates is the continuing requirements of items funded initially through 1991–92 Supplementary Estimates. Items approved through 1991–92 Supplementary Estimates and included in the 1992–93 Main Estimates reflect the incorporation of new policy and workload increases announced or identified after tabling of the previous Main Estimates.

• (1020)

On a consolidated basis, the budgetary Main Estimates will increase by only 1.9 per cent over the level of the 1991–92 Main Estimates. However, within the 1992–93 Main Estimates there are four areas which account for more than 80 per cent of the total allocated budgetary spending. Public debt charges take up to 25 per cent of the total, social programs account for 36.1 per cent of the total, and fiscal arrangements account for close to 11 per cent of the total.

Social programs are the largest component of over–all spending. During 1992–93, the federal government will direct over $60 billion, which is 36 per cent of its allocated Main Estimates, in continuation of its efforts to ensure the health and well–being of all Canadians. Help is directed to those in greatest need through programs of assistance to the economically and socially disadvantaged, including the jobless, unskilled persons with disabilities, seniors and immigrants, as well as aboriginal people, veterans and children.

The departments of Employment and Immigration, National Health and Welfare, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and Veterans Affairs account for over 90 per cent of the spending in this sector.

[Translation]

The government has acted on its commitment to legislate expenditure controls that will limit spending over the next five years to the amounts set in the budget brought down by my colleague, the Minister of Finance. The expenditure plan for 1992–93 remains within the limits set in the 1991 budget and the legislation approved by the House of Commons.

Expenditure control has obliged departments and agencies to respond to increased demand with fewer resources. Furthermore, cuts and a freeze on operating and maintenance budgets have been part of the restraint measures announced in every budget since 1985, and since then, the result has been a 30 per cent reduction in the value, in terms of purchasing power, of operating and maintenance budgets for current programs.

Canadians would like the government to spend less and spend smarter, and to be more efficient. To that end officials responsible for resource allocation have carefully examined spending levels to ensure that public money is spent exclusively on services that respond to the needs and desires of Canadians.

The Minister of Finance announced a number of measures that will enable the government to achieve durable savings and be more effective, which means that fewer resources will be available for the government's internal operations.

Programs, including grants and contributions, have been cut back in many areas, while in others growth will continue but be restrained. We remain committed to green plan funding of $3 billion over the next six years, but certain expenditures have been reprofiled to the latter half of this period. We will also improve the operations of the Canada Student Loans Program which should result in savings totalling $530 million in 1992–93 and $3.4 billion over the longer term, that is, over a five–year period.

Costs associated with government operations will be further reduced. Departmental non–wage budgets have been cut by 3 per cent, while a review of spending related to communications will cut departmental budgets by an additional $75 million in 1992–93.

[English]

Also, in keeping with the 1991 budget statement and the Public Sector Compensation Act, the government limited salary increases to zero for 1991–92 and 3 per cent for 1992–93. The number of management layers below the level of deputy minister has also been reduced to three.

This causes the management structure of the federal Public Service to resemble that of many large organizations in the private sector which have been forced to restructure in order to reduce costs. In this initiative, we are at the end of a schedule of a commitment made in the 1991 budget to reduce the number of senior managers in the federal Public Service by 10 per cent within two years. At last count, the number of members in the executive group has been reduced by 320 since January 1991.

Because of the continuing restraint measures introduced by this government, the level of program spending contained in the 1992 Main Estimates has fallen to 16.7 per cent of gross domestic product from a level of almost 20 per cent in 1984.

As you will see, the reduced levels of expenditures have not only come from reducing transfer payments to individuals and to provinces. The most severe reductions have been made in government operating expenditures.

Expenditure control initiatives are not limited solely to cutting ongoing operations. We are also restructuring. To this end 46 separate organizations and advisory bodies will be wound up, privatized or consolidated with other organizations. This figure includes three new agencies which will be put on hold.

In today's difficult fiscal environment, there are not enough tax dollars to meet all the financial demands of government programs. Accordingly, the government is placing a priority on using the tax dollars available to finance the higher priority programs that benefit all Canadians.

Through user fees and cost recovery, the government is providing and improving services that it might not otherwise be able to afford and ensure that the best use is made of scarce resources. This gives paying clients more influence on the level of optional services provided by the program. Paying clients have a right to expect and demand a quality product or service at a reasonable price. User fees foster such a service-oriented operation and one that is more attentive to clients' needs.

In 1992, annual revenues from cost recovery and user fees are expected to exceed $3.3 billion, which is a 5 per cent increase over 1991–92 and nearly double from 1984–85 levels. Departments and agencies are attempting to identify areas where the application of user fees or cost recovery is appropriate, resulting in a continuation of the rising trend in revenue generation.

In December 1989, the Prime Minister announced a major renewal exercise for the Public Service. It is what we call PS 2000. The aim of this exercise is to benefit the taxpayer and client by making more of the scarce tax dollars available for service delivery and for internal administration.

As an interim step in this process, a number of special operating agencies have been or soon will be established. The establishment of these agencies enables managers to run their organizations more like a business, with greater focus on results and service. They have greater freedom to serve the Canadian taxpayer better, and managers can adapt more rapidly to changing clients' needs.

Also beginning in 1993–94, operating budgets will be introduced, which are expected to benefit both clients and taxpayers. Operating budgets are intended to give managers more flexibility to decide the most efficient use of their allocated resources. It also allows them to make the most economical use of scarce tax dollars to deliver services better on a timely basis.

• (1030)

[Translation]

These changes are merely a sample of the measures the government is prepared to take as part of its reform to offer Canadians better service at reasonable cost.

The Main Estimates before the House today reflect the government's firm commitment to reducing spending and introducing fiscal reform in the interests of Canadian taxpayers. Considering our achievements so far, I am sure we are on the right track.

I am convinced that Canadians will react favourably to the changes we have made in the areas of spending restraint and improving program operations. We will continue our efforts to structure and administer government programs so as to serve the best interests of all Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, first of all I want to thank my friend from Beauharnois—Salaberry for his remarks.

He is the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs. The point to be made of course is that as competent as he is, he is not either the minister responsible for the Treasury Board or indeed the parliamentary secretary for the Treasury Board.

I understand his dilemma. He was told to do a job this morning and he did it reasonably well, given the facts he had to work with. The sadness of course is that the one responsible for this motion, the gentleman in whose name the motion stands, does not see fit to rise and defend it. I understand that. I say to him that it is a fairly indefensible request that he puts to the House, that we at this point in time ought to give yet another carte blanche for an amount approaching $49 billion, $48.8 billion.

Before we get that generous there are a few things we would like to say to the gentleman from Beauharnois—Salaberry and the group he is obliged to represent here this morning.

For at least a couple of years, and indeed more than that, this country has been facing twin crises. Our economy faces very serious problems, problems that transcend even the current lingering recession and, of course, second and important also, national unity continues to be uncertain.

My friend from Simcoe Centre interjects that the national unity issue has been with us since 1982. She is almost right. She is right except for the date. She is slightly off on the date. She was not here at that time, so she can be excused for slipping on the date slightly.

The issue was put to bed in 1982, except there was a separatist from Quebec who would not have signed anything anyway. Everybody knows that including the Prime Minister right now who said in 1982 that was the case, who congratulated the then Prime Minister, Mr. Trudeau, for his leadership. He has since tried to rewrite history a bit, so she is almost right. She had a slight slippage, but I am sure she meant, in kindness to her, 1984. That is when the damage on this one was done.

There is an old rule, and it is worth following even in this Chamber, even in the government of a country. It is: if it ain't broke, don't fix it. If she is interested in knowing why we are in the constitutional mess that we are in today a good part of the reason is because in 1982 and 1984 somebody tried to fix something that was not really broke.

She interjects again: "Quebec was left out". A separatist premier from Quebec elected to be left out. No matter what the offer was in 1982 that would have been the case. I appeal to her good sense to not be rewriting history. Her own leader in 1982 said essentially what I am saying at this particular point.

[Translation]

As for the Constitution, it seems that the parliamentary committee, several provincial commissions and half a dozen constitutional conferences, including the one in Toronto in late May and more recently the one held here in Ottawa, last week I think, moved the constitutional reform project forward. I hope that the governments will use the opportunities to continue to seek a solution.

As I will explain later, the sooner we complete this constitutional reform, the better for our economy.

[English]

There are those who say that they are fed up with the Constitution, and I am one who says that from time to time, and that we should just stop talking about it. However, we cannot set the Constitution to one side for the moment because we cannot have an economy, strong or otherwise, if we do not have a country.

That uncertainty must be resolved, though the debate on that issue is for another time. However, in speaking to this motion I wanted to put the economy in the context of the national unity issue because they go hand in hand. It is difficult to intelligently debate one without being at least cognizant of the other.

Having said that, let me come to the issue immediately at hand, which is the request of the government that we kiss and make up, that we let bygones by bygones, that we give it another $48.4 billion so it can go out and spend some more like drunken sailors.

Let us review, let us go back as recently as the latest budget by the latest Minister of Finance, the gentleman from Alberta. He presented his first budget in February of this year.

We might return to the words of the Leader of the Opposition, the leader of my party. Last November he laid out a five-point plan that would guide a future Liberal government in restoring Canada's long-term industrial strength.

His plan, which we stand by today and will stand by as a government, included a call for policies to promote economic growth and a better balance between inflation fighting and other economic goals.

In January of this year my party unveiled a further five-point emergency economic recovery program. Let us examine the elements of that program announced in January. It included a 5 per cent down payment for first time home buyers, it would allow the use of RRSP moneys to purchase homes, and set up a national shared cost infrastructure program that would include projects already on the shelf at the municipal level across this country. It included more basic skills training and emergency federal funding for food banks.

• (1040)

In his budget a month or so after we announced that emergency plan the Minister of Finance, to his credit, did adopt two of our points, those two which relate to housing. As he will know, there has been a strong response from the housing sector, a response that impresses even the most optimistic supporters then and now of measures concerning housing.

However, while we welcomed those initiatives, the budget as a whole lacked a very clear strategy oriented toward economic growth. The minister himself admitted in that budget that the recovery will be "weak by historical standards".

The question is, now that the budget has been in effect for a full quarter, did he expect the recovery to be this weak? If not, then what is he going to do about it in light of the even more dismal figures that we see from day to day?

This government's track record is nothing to get excited about when it comes to making projections. If we look at the 1989 budget, the 1990 budget, the 1991 budget or this year's budget we will find that in terms of gross domestic product, inflation, deficit reduction and unemployment both finance ministers—the current minister and his predecessor, the present Minister for International Trade—in the last four budgets have been painting a very rosy picture, one that has not been borne out by reality.

Take 1990, for example, when the then Minister of Finance projected gross domestic product growth of 1.3 per cent. He was off by a country mile. It was only about a half of one per cent. Other figures for those four years will illustrate a similar picture.

That is the broad brush approach to this issue. That is generally why we in this party cannot stomach the idea of giving another carte blanche to this government, because of its track record to date.

Generalities by themselves, whether in this Chamber or in the country at large, do not really convey the agony and the human pain that is out there as a result of the terrible leadership of this administration.

Mr. Boudria: Lack of leadership.

Mr. Simmons: To put a human face on it, let us look at some of the realities as they relate to a particular part of the country.

My friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell says: "Lack of leadership". As usual, my friend is being his generous self. If it were only a lack of leadership, if only the Conservatives had not led at all we would not be in as bad shape as we are. However, I say to him, and I know he means well, that not only has there sometimes been a lack of leadership but there has also been some terrible leadership in the absolutely wrong direction.

We saw an example of it in the last few days when the Prime Minister pounded his chest for taking this great brave step in signing the biodiversity agreement. He became the champion because he had taken on the United States. Of course, the reality is somewhat different. Mr. Bush needed a favour.

He needed to appeal to the right wing that Ross Perot is appealing to in the United States. He picked up the phone and he called the man who has, without fail, delivered for him over the last few years. He said to him: "Prime Minister, pretend you are painting me into a corner because every time you attack me on this issue of biodiversity you get me votes down here in the United States".

Is it not more than passing strange that the two statements, the American President saying he would not sign the biodiversity agreement and the Prime Minister of Canada saying that he was going to sign it and lead the charge, synchronized almost within minutes, certainly within hours?

An hon. member: Coincidence.

Mr. Simmons: They were orchestrated to be done exactly that way.

We have heard from this Prime Minister before. Whether he is rolling the dice on constitutional matters or strutting the international stage, the script is the same. He tries to hoodwink as many people as he can at any point in time.

It so happens that the people he attempts to hoodwink have been hoodwinked once too often. He is transparent. They see through him.

Let me talk about some of those people, because I want to put a human face on this situation. I have the privilege to represent about 90,000 people in 158 communities in rural Newfoundland, on the southwest coast and a bit of the west coast of Newfoundland.

Since I came to this House I have talked about the plight of the fishermen. Some of the time I have been talking about the deep sea fishery and the impact of the pillaging by ships from Spain and Portugal. That has had a very serious and devastating impact. As recently as yesterday in Question Period, and on other occasions, I raised that issue and will continue to do so.

There is another set of circumstances that is also pulverizing a group of people in my riding. It is not the deep sea fishery per se, although it is an aspect of the fishery. I am thinking about the southwest coast of Newfoundland, the communities that start with Hermitage, Gaultois, McCallum, François, Grey River, Ramea, Burgeo, Grand Bruit, La Poile, Petites, Rose Blanche, Burnt Islands, Isle aux Morts, Fox Roost and Margaree, and Port au Bras. Those communities traditionally have had two fisheries, a winter fishery and a summer fishery.

For the purposes of simplicity I want to talk about the winter fishery, which takes place from January to March. That fishery traditionally has been a very lucrative fishery for those people but the bottom has gone out of it, not just this year but for the last four years. For example, people in the community of McCallum caught 178,000 pounds last year during the winter fishery and caught 61,000 this year, one-third of last year's catches. People in François caught 62,000 last year and caught 10,000 this year, one-sixth.

In the 1987 winter fishery people in Rose Blanche caught four million pounds. This year they caught a little over 1,000 or 2,000 pounds. The bottom has gone out. People did not look to unemployment because they fished winter and summer. They fished 30, 40 or 45 weeks a year. There are people on that coast who never drew any unemployment until this year because it was not worth their while. They fished 45 weeks a year and by the time they got their forms filled out it was time to go back fishing again.

I talked to such a man in the last few weeks. When I asked him whether he had enough stamps, as we call it, to get his unemployment he nearly poked me out. He took it as an insult because he had never even thought of fishing in that context. He told me that if his pride allowed him to draw UI this year, it would be the first time he had ever bothered to do so.

• (1050)

Those people in Rose Blanche, Burnt Islands and Isle aux Morts are in dire circumstances. I see from your signal, Madam Speaker, that my time is running out. There were other things I wanted to say but I understand I just have a minute left.

I would like to comment very quickly to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I greatly admire him in some respects but he puzzles me on this one. Why has he been so stubborn? Why has he obviously set out to punish those people in those communities I have mentioned? Why has he turned his back completely on the people in dire straits in those communities who, through no fault of their own, are hurting?

Those people went to St. John's as recently as a month ago. They met with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. He made a commitment that he would have an interim solution to their problem by May 15.

May 15 has come and gone. I wrote the minister about this issue two weeks ago and I am still waiting for an answer. I know he is a busy person but these people are hurting. They need some answers. I think they have waited long enough for those answers.

Those are the human reasons we are not going to support this motion because to give this government another $48 billion without knowing whether a few shekels of it are going to be given to my fishermen and plant workers would be to betray those people.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans may betray them, but I would like him to assure me that he is not going to. I can tell him that I will not betray them. I invite him to join me in doing something worth while for those people while there is still some time.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened to my colleague from Burin—St. George's. He talked a lot about the deep economic pain existing in his community and right across the country.

I am not sure if he mentioned the fact that the interest rates are at the lowest they have ever been in 20 years and inflation is practically non-existent. We on this side of the House in debate would not want to exclude some of the good things that are happening in this country right now.

However, I am having a difficult time in figuring out how we can rekindle the confidence in this country again. I am feeling in my community in downtown Toronto a sense of no confidence. People with jobs seem to be lacking in confidence more than those without jobs. One of the reasons this lack of confidence is there is that the banking institutions of this country are not really providing the necessary service to the small and medium sized businesses.

There are many reasons, but I would like to ask my colleague, who is an experienced member in this House, what steps does he think we should take in order to ignite the confidence in this country again? When that confidence is ignited it will lead to people taking risks again. That will ultimately lead to people creating more jobs. Could the member explain to the House some of things we should be doing to try to get this economy going again?

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I thank my friend from Broadview—Greenwood. He is right. He puts his finger right on the nub of the issue. The issue is one of confidence. People are despairing, even people who hold jobs are talking a much less optimistic line than one would expect. It can be demoralizing when travelling around this country.

The first challenge is one of inspiration. It is a challenge to send out to the people of Canada the message that there is some reason to hope. We do live in a great country. It is not the country that is at fault; it is the government. It is the government that has brought us to a point in time where all people can do is despair. Take the example I was on as my time ran out, of fishermen who through no fault of their own find themselves in very desperate straits. They cannot even get the time of day from the people in the administration they look to. We have a regional minister, a minister from Newfoundland, in the cabinet. He hardly gives them the time of day on this particular issue.

My friend the parliamentary secretary to the minister of fisheries takes exception. I understand he was unavoidably detained a moment ago when I was speaking but I invite him to read the transcript of what I said in the last five minutes. I am talking about a very particular incident.

I said that in general I have great admiration for his minister. But I said on the issue of the southwest coast he has turned his back on them. He has been given opportunities. He is making wild statements to people, including the press that he did not know they had a problem. I have been badgering him in this Chamber for a year, telling him about the problem. He has turned his back. I use this as an example of why there is a crisis of confidence.

What can be expected when all sectors of society are being pulverized. The fishermen, the plant workers on the southwest coast of Newfoundland, the industrial worker in southern Ontario, and the small businesses in border towns between the United States and Canada are lacking the signal that this government cares.

We are asked what needs to be done. The first thing that needs to be done is to restore some confidence, to re-establish a linkage with the people who put the government there in the first place.

There is the crux of the problem. If a government is only supported by 15 per cent or 17 per cent of the people, how can it reflect the wishes and aspirations of those people? I suppose without being too simplistic, I say the answer to the question of my friend from Broadview—Greenwood is to call an election.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I listened very attentively to the comments from my colleague and I want to congratulate him. I am sure that the electors of Burin—St. George's will be very proud of the profound statement he made today on behalf of his constituents who are suffering through these very difficult economic times.

Both he and I represent rural ridings. I have not yet had the opportunity to visit his riding, although I thank him for the invitation he has extended. I hope to take him up on it very shortly.

I can imagine just how difficult it must be.

In many communities in rural Canada some of the few federal government jobs that exist are with the post office. It pains me to see in so many communities in rural Canada that we have lost that institution, that the flag of Canada, which was in many instances the only flag in the community, has been removed and replaced with a pigeon wing, that the word Canada has been taken off the Canada Post mail box and replaced with the profound words "mail—poste".

I want to ask my colleague if his riding has been affected as mine has with such closures. How do his constituents feel about the loss of this national institution? I think only rural members can understand how profound it is in rural communities to see the loss of sometimes the only federal government building, the only federal presence in rural Canada that we have. I want to ask him to share the experience of his constituents in that regard with all of us.

Mr. Simmons: Madam Speaker, I thank my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

There are two Canadas out there: the American Express gold card Canada and the Canada that buys its money orders at the post office.

That first Canada as represented by the cabinet over there—I am sure they all have gold cards—will not be found in François, in Belleoram, in Point May, in North Harbour, in Cape St. George, in Grand-Le-Pierre, communities in my riding. Not many of them have a gold card. But until recently, they had the option of walking down the gravel road, along the shore to the post office to get their gold cards or their postal money orders to send money to Nellie who has gone to Alberta to get a job, to send money to Joe who is off in Dalhousie doing his degree, to send money to Mary who is taking a cooking course in St. John's, to make the car payment, or to make the payment on the motor for the boat.

• (1100)

They could do all those things, until members of the gold card clique connived their latest strategy. Take away from Nellie's mother and Joe's father in that community their gold cards and their postal money orders. Shut down the post office. If they want their mail, they can go down with a key in one hand and a blowtorch in the other and if they can get the mail box open in the dead of winter and the mail is not too soggy, they can retrieve it. But they must close the door fast because the snow might get in and tomorrow's mail will be wet.

Or, they may want money orders. They go over to the window in the dead of winter and blow on the glass making a hole in the frost so they can peep out. They have to watch for the car coming down the road from the community 40 miles away because the lady in that car is going to sell them the money order, if they have the right change and if they do not miss her when she goes by.

An hon. member: Great system.

Mr. Simmons: What a system. The gold carders of this country are unnecessarily pulverizing the money order people, and why? The champions of national unity are pulverizing national unity by removing from those little communities the very symbols of national unity which keep this country together.

I ask them to get out of their drunken stupor. If they want to do something for national unity, they should just go back to basics and give those people in those communities some service. They have as much right to it as those living in Toronto or Montreal or those with a gold card.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Madam Speaker, it is always a pleasure to follow the hon. member for Burin—St. George's. I particularly enjoyed his comments about postal service.

I did not enjoy them in the sense that I regret the conditions he was describing. I think he would want to agree with me and certainly other of his colleagues would want to agree with me that it is not just rural Canada that has had its post office service curtailed. The national symbol that the post office represents has been removed from other communities as well.

I have recently been involved in struggles with Canada Post over the closing of the traditional post offices in my riding, in Elmwood for instance which is part of my riding, and also the removal of services that existed in private outlets in longstanding businesses, for example, drugstores. Those services have been put in the 7-Elevens and other chains. It is not just in rural Canada that this is happening.

The member makes a good point and one which I have made before. That is, the government wants to talk about Canadian unity and holding Canada together. It is not a coincidence that we are having this problem when we have just come through a period of eight years where almost every national institution that we have as perceived by the people, not necessarily by the Conservatives, has been under attack.

Those include the privatization of Petro-Canada and Air Canada, the cutbacks to passenger rail service and VIA Rail, the downsizing of the CBC, the elimination of rural post offices and the reorganization of postal services in cities and suburbs. I am sure I could think of a few more things, but that is not what I got up on my feet to talk about.

The point is well made and Conservatives of all people should know it, real Conservatives that is to say; not this fraudulent bunch of 19th century capitalists we have over there. They should know the importance of institutions and the importance of maintaining institutions. But that insight has long since been buried somewhere in the republican mentality of the group over yonder.

We are talking about the estimates today and of course the estimates have to do with spending. I asked a question with respect to government spending and taxation revenue policy in the House on Friday, June 5. It was a question I had asked before and to which I keep getting a non-answer. It is like I am speaking a different language. It is the dialogue of the deaf. My leader has raised this question as well.

It has to do with the intention of the government to bring in legislation with respect to trusts on which we were protected from taxation in 1972 by the Liberals, by what is called the 21-year rule.

What happened is that in the Liberal tax reform of 1972 when the inheritance tax was removed and a partial tax on capital gains was introduced, the Liberals introduced a measure which had the effect of saying that these trusts would not be taxed until January 1, 1993. Now we all know how close January 1, 1993 is getting to be.

These are private trusts so one is able to say just exactly how much money is involved here. Estimates run as high as $70 billion, but certainly several billions of dollars are involved. Many of these trusts are the trusts of some of Canada's wealthiest families. We are not talking about ordinary Canadian families here.

This would be money, if it were to be taxed as it was intended to be taxed for the last 21 years, that could go toward the deficit, if the government were serious about fighting the deficit or if the government were serious about having everyone share equitably in deficit reduction.

We have asked this question repeatedly of the government: why is it bringing in draft legislation to further protect these trusts? We cannot even get the government to acknowledge the substance of our question.

I asked the minister of June 5 why he was bringing in this particular legislation. I mentioned the legislation by name. I described it so that there could not be any confusion as to what I was actually talking about. He said: "Mr. Speaker, I know the position of the New Democratic Party has always been to tax Canadians into submission. What is important is that we have a competitive tax system". No mention of the question I actually asked, and certainly no answer.

The same thing happened in the next exchange between myself and the minister. Here we had the Minister of Finance of the government which was responsible for bringing in the GST, chastizing me as a New Democrat for wanting to tax people to death. The difference is: who is being taxed to death here?

The middle class is being taxed to death, yes, but not by the NDP. It is by this government that has brought in a form of tax reform over the last eight years which has seen the burden on the middle class go up and up and the burden on the very wealthy minority at the top of the tax structure actually reduced.

I was asking the minister if they are serious about equitable sharing of deficit reduction, allowing this 21-year rule to run out and tax that money in the trust. If some special consideration needs to be given to certain kinds of trusts that exist for disabled children or something like that, it could be done some other way. We do not have to do it in a way to hit a certain minority of these trusts that may have to do with disabled children. We are going to exempt them all.

• (1110)

There are ways to do it. It seems to me that a couple of very well placed calls from high places have been made to the Minister of Finance. He gets up and says: "We must not tax Canadians to death". We must not tax the Bronfmans to death. We must not tax the Reichmanns to death. We must not tax other wealthy Canadian families to death who no doubt have some part to play in some ownership of these trusts".

Why is there concern for this group and no equal show of concern for the many Canadians who are not only being taxed to death but do not have the money to be taxed to death with in the first place.

This is the sure sign, the government bringing in this legislation, that it is not serious about real tax reform, that is not tax reform as Canadians understand it. Tax reform as Canadians understand it is tax reform that is fair. It is tax reform that makes Canada's tax system more progressive, not less progressive, as has been the case with the Tory tax reform since 1984.

There are many other loopholes we have been asking them to close from the business and entertainment tax deductions to many others. We get the same answer all the time, that we have to be competitive. Even on that argument which I reject, even if we take the government at its own word for a while, there are other countries with which we compete that do not have as generous business and entertainment tax deductions. There are other countries with which we compete including the United States that have much more severe inheritance taxes.

It is not a question of having to do what others do. It is a question of some strange power that the corporate elite has over this particular government at this particular time.

Mr. Angus: They own it.

Mr. Blaikie: "They own it", says the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. I think he is right.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): They owned the previous Liberal government.

Mr. Blaikie: As the hon. member for Edmonton East says: "They owned the previous Liberal government".

It is very strange. I am waiting for someone from the Liberal caucus one of these days to ask a question of the government as to why it is doing this and to urge it not to. Has there been a Liberal member who has stood up and urged the government not to bring in this particular measure?

Mr. Boudria: Yes. George Baker did this.

Mr. Blaikie: The member says that one Liberal member has done this. It was certainly not the official tax critic for their party. We await that question. I can understand the hon. member referred to that because he has a history of sticking up for the little guy and therefore being a minority within his own party. Has it been done officially on behalf of the Liberal Party? We await that with bated breath.

Going back just a minute to the business and entertainment tax deduction, we are always talking about there being a great deal of emphasis in right wing circles about making sure that ordinary Canadians do not rip off the system, that they do not get any UI that they do not especially deserve or qualify for or that people do not get any more welfare than they absolutely must get. All these things are legitimate concerns. No one wants to see any system ripped off.

Why is there not the same concern about, as Neil Brooks, an expert from York University once said, the fact that there is more fraud going on at a Blue Jays game than there is anywhere else. There are all these season tickets that belong to corporations, the cost of which is being deducted as a business expense, when in fact they are simply tickets that are being given out to family and friends and have very little to do with any sort of business expense whatsoever.

Why is it that certain groups of people in this country can deduct those kinds of expenses when ordinary working folks cannot deduct the cost of the tools they have to buy or teachers cannot deduct certain things they have to purchase as a part of doing their job? There are many other examples of people who are doing a lot more than simply shuffling paper around making money through mergers and other trickery who cannot deduct these kinds of things. Yet a very small minority of people are able to make these enormous deductions related to buying season tickets at baseball games or hockey games or whatever. It is this kind of thing that frankly I wish Canadians would get more upset about.

People get upset if they hear there has been some welfare fraud or something like that. The phone starts to ring off the hook in the constituency office. I wish we could just get Canadians as excited about the way they are being ripped off from the top of the sociological ladder. It seems to me that those ways of ripping off the system deserve more attention and involve an incredible amount of money.

One other thing I would like to cover, because there is a supplementary estimate related to it, is the question of the money spent in this country on the nuclear option through the money the government spends on Atomic Energy of Canada Limited and the Atomic Energy Control Board. I see a supplementary estimate here for Atomic Energy of Canada Limited of $177,605,000 and $37,934,000 having to do with the Atomic Energy Control Board.

Without getting into the larger debate about the appropriateness of nuclear energy as an energy option for Canada, which I reject and which I made obvious in my private member's bill that was debated and defeated in this House not so long ago, I wanted to say that we have a particular concern which I may raise in the House later on in Question Period about reports this morning of a study done in New Brunswick on possible dangers that may exist at the Point Lepreau plant in New Brunswick. Apparently the Atomic Energy Control Board has issued warnings to New Brunswick Power which do not appear to have been taken seriously.

There has been concern about the Point Lepreau reactor going back some time. I can remember being in New Brunswick in 1987.

Mr. Merrithew: It is the most efficient in the world.

Mr. Blaikie: The Minister of Veterans Affairs who is from New Brunswick says it is the most efficient in the world.

Mr. Merrithew: It is.

Mr. Blaikie: It may well be. That is not the point. We could have a perfectly efficient nuclear power plant that is efficient right up until the day it melts down.

An hon. member: Oh, oh.

Mr. Blaikie: The minister says something about Greenpeace. I know for some people, if we just say the word Greenpeace, immediately the eyes close and the ears seal up. It may well be that there is a real problem here. I do not think the minister should simply write it off the way he has. Neither should New Brunswick Power.

Certainly the AECB should not write it off because, if this report is true, it has issued these memorandums of concern to New Brunswick Power. Unless the minister maintains that AECB has been infiltrated by Greenpeace, which is not something I would not want to maintain at this particular point, then it would seem to me the minister, as someone from New Brunswick, ought to take these warnings seriously and at the very least inquire as to their validity.

I recently had the opportunity to visit Pinawa, the Whiteshell nuclear research establishment, and to meet with the union people there. I have met with management before in another context. One of the things that I would like to put on the record is that if today as a country we were to decide that we were no longer going to pursue nuclear energy as an energy option, it would not mean that the Whiteshell nuclear research establishment or Chalk River or any of these other places would shut down. There would continue to be important work that would have to be done related to everything nuclear that we have done so far. It is not a question of if the NDP were to implement its policy, everyone who has anything to do with the nuclear industry would automatically be out of work, or something like that.

• (1120)

We will continue to have to find out what to do with all the high level and low level radioactive waste that we have accumulated so far. That is a problem we will have for generations. Even if we had made a decision against nuclear energy yesterday, we would continue to have to devise decommissioning technologies for the reactors that we already have. We would continue exploring other ways of applying nuclear technologies, in medicine and a variety of other ways that may be appropriate, although not all of them will be. For instance, food irradiation I would not be in favour of, but there may be other appropriate applications of nuclear technology.

There are all these things, not to mention what we may feel called upon to do as a country with respect to the existing nuclear plants in the rest of the world which, whether we like it or not, are there and in the absence of some other alternative may need to be made less dangerous than they are.

There would be no shortage of work for a Canada that is committed to making its expertise available to a world that, quite frankly, still lives at the edge of the nuclear abyss, only it is not a weapons abyss any more. It is a reactor abyss, when you consider how many Chernobyls there are out there. I am not talking about Canadian reactors here, I am talking about reactors that exist mostly in the former Soviet Union and in eastern Europe about which there is a great deal of concern, and appropriate concern.

It seems to me that Canada could make a contribution there, short of being able in the short term to develop alternative energy sources for these countries, in helping to make sure that these reactors do not become one Chernobyl after another.

There is a lot of work for the nuclear industry to do in this country. We do not need a minister going around trying to market reactors and firing people who are not good at marketing them. We need a minister who is willing to put Canadian expertise at the disposal of the world to ensure that we do not have the kind of radioactive poisoning that we got out of the Chernobyl incident over and over and over again as these reactors in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, each one of them eventually, come to some unhappy end.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I was amazed at the evidence of new dinosaurism in the member's comments today, particularly when it deals with Atomic Energy of Canada and our nuclear expertise; known throughout the world, leaders in the world in science and medicine. He complains about food irradiation because he does not understand it. He says, my gosh, if you irradiate those potatoes so that they won't grow on the shelf and develop bugs in them and will be safe for people to consume, there is something terribly wrong about that because you have stopped the normal decay process.

That is new dinosaur activity from a new dinosaur party. Surely to goodness, when we have developed the safest and soundest reactor system in the world to produce electricity, where we have been in the forefront of nuclear medicine, where we have been in the forefront of learning how to preserve fruits and vegetables with irradiation, why should we abandon this because it is not within the understanding of the New Democratic Party, formerly the CCF which developed its philosophy in 1935.

The member comes from Winnipeg, a progressive city. I am just amazed how he could all of a sudden pull in these horror stories and worry about a Chernobyl when he knows that our reactors are safe and he knows that our reactors are efficient, when he know our nuclear medicine plays a leadership role in the world, and complain about the program. He says: "Well, we can always keep the nuclear industry around just to clean up the messes of others". This is such drivel. I make that comment because it surprises me that the New Democratic Party is such a dinosaur party.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the hon. member for Mississauga South has done it again. I do not know how many times I speak in this House and he comes in at a certain point, not having heard everything that I said, and attacks me for saying things that I did not say. I never put down the medicinal dimension of nuclear technology. I complimented Canadian expertise and said it ought to be put at the disposal of the world.

The member says that there is something wrong with our party because we devised our philosophy in 1935. It was actually 1932 and 1933. However, he makes no apology for the fact that his party quotes Adam Smith who formed his policies in the 1700s. If we just want to talk chronologically, it is not very debatable about who is more up to date. The fact is that neither Adam Smith nor anything said in 1932 or 1933 are applicable to today's situation. It is a question of trying to figure out what is applicable to today's situation.

I was simply making the argument that jobs in the nuclear industry do not depend on us pursuing a nuclear energy option. There are jobs in the nuclear industry in this country that would continue and would continue to be important even if we made that choice and we would still have an international role to play.

The member is not really interested in genuine debate. He wants to get up and caricature what I had to say. What I do find interesting, and this relates to what I said earlier in my speech, is that he did not get up and say anything about the trust tax exemption.

Some hon. members: Yes, that's right.

Mr. Blaikie: You cannot even get them to acknowledge that this is happening. You get up and ask a question about apples and they get up and throw oranges back at you. Why does the member not address that particular issue? He will not because it is embarrassing. It embarrasses all of them, what we over here call the Upper Canada clause. It embarrasses them that they are such toadies for the corporate elite in this country that they would do something that is so absolutely contrary to all their rhetoric about deficit reduction.

Mr. Blenkarn: A quick supplementary, Madam Speaker. Perhaps the member could tell me the bill that is going to abolish this great tax loophole that is before the House. Maybe he could tell me what the bill is so I can refer to it and read it. I am as interested as he is in the bill that we are going to have to vote on to abolish these tax loopholes.

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, the draft regulation number is 91-018.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I listened attentively, particularly to the last remarks. I am a little puzzled by this so-called Upper Canada clause that the member referred to.

As a member of Parliament from so-called Upper Canada, as a matter of fact the community where Upper Canada was founded, namely Glengarry where the United Empire Loyalists arrived after 1776, I am a little curious as to what is meant by this clause.

I represent, of course, those people with great pride. I consider it the birthplace of our province, as it is in my opinion. Obviously you know, Madam Speaker, that Simon Fraser, Alexander Mackenzie and Sir John Johnson came with those people to Williamstown in Glengarry shortly after the War of Independence in the United States and after they were chased out of that country, so many of them with just the shirts on their back, and came to found the province of Upper Canada in this land of trees, of the great pine forests of eastern Ontario.

I am a little curious as to what the comments of the member mean. Perhaps he could clarify them for the benefit of my constituents.

• (1130)

Mr. Blaikie: Madam Speaker, I would be more than pleased to clarify. I left out a word. I should have said the Upper Canada College clause.

I certainly withdraw any unintended implications that might exist for the entirety of Upper Canada, an area which includes a lot of people who never make it to Upper Canada College, including the hon. member. A very small minority go to Upper Canada College and actually develop a social conscience. They make it into the NDP, but the rest of them go on to bleed the country to death in a variety of ways.

I just want to say to the hon. member for Mississauga South that he should check the finance department press release. I called it a regulation but I was mistaken. It is number 91-018 in which the finance department on February 11 announced its intention to bring in the legislation I am talking about.

I would think a former chairman of the finance committee would be able to do that, and substantiate what I had to say today. In fact, he knew about it all along. He is just playing ignorant.

[Translation]

Mr. Hogue: Madam Speaker, today I would like to repeat an important announcement made yesterday—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member knows that we are still in the period for questions and comments. Are there any more questions or comments?

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

CANADIAN NATO PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

TABLING OF 13TH REPORT

Mr. Bob Hicks (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, on a point of order I apologize for rising at this time but I arrived in the House one hour late exactly to table a NATO report. I wonder if I could seek the unanimous consent of the members here to table it at this time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If we are to seek unanimous consent, we should know what we are consenting to.

Mr. Hicks: Madam Speaker, it is the 13th report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association presented in both official languages.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

SUPPLY

CONCURRENCE IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1992-93

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle for concurrence (p. 12117).

Supply

Mr. Jean–Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Madam Speaker, today I would like to repeat an important announcement that our government made yesterday on the future of the greater Montreal area.

To begin, I think it is appropriate to recall that our government has always kept up with the situation in Montreal in recent years and has always taken the required action so that Montreal and its people can regain their prosperity.

As you know, the past 10 years or so have been difficult for Montreal. However, we can now say that better days have arrived. The metropolis of Quebec has defined its vocation and is now at work achieving its objectives. Montreal is further strengthening its position and its economy is now undergoing a most interesting transformation.

That is why it is important to support this renewal in every possible way, in order to provide the greatest benefit to the whole Montreal community.

With this purpose in mind, the hon. minister responsible for regional development in Quebec announced yesterday that our government would give $150 million more to promote Montreal's economic development.

I would like to state right away that these funds are in addition to the large amounts that the Canadian government is already investing in the Montreal region in projects affecting all areas of Montreal's economy.

The $150 million announced yesterday will be used mainly to help carry out projects in the most promising sectors for the city's development, especially the seven areas of development recognized by our government as most likely to make Montreal prosperous.

I would also like to draw the attention of hon. members to the fact that our government has long been interested in Montreal's development.

In 1985, the government created the Ministerial Committee on the Development of the Montreal Region, supported by an advisory board from the private sector. In 1986, it proposed policies and initiatives to develop the region.

In the wake of the recommendations of this advisory board, our government in 1987 adopted a strategy highlighting Montreal's assets and emphasizing seven areas of development: international activities, high technology, finance and international trade, design, cultural industries, tourism and transportation.

Since 1987, the Government of Canada, together with its partners, has invested considerably in strategic planning for the industrial and cultural sectors of Montreal and its surrounding area. For example, let me remind you that the government helped establish the Canadian Space Agency, create the technological initiative centre, expand the Museum of Fine Arts, develop the Old Port and carry out many other projects that I will not mention now.

This kind of achievement, together with those of the other levels of government and of course the private sector, help define Montreal's true vocation and strengthen its competitiveness on international markets.

As you know, today more than ever, the Montreal area has resources and assets to realize its true calling as an international industrial and technological centre.

This $150 million will be invested with Montreal's partners in the sectors targeted for development. These new resources will help pursue the efforts in support of the strategy the federal government has been following since 1987 and support initiatives to innovate and consolidate strategic infrastructure.

The fund will make it possible to act in a complementary and/or joint fashion with the Government of Quebec and the Innovatech Corporation of Greater Montreal, which the Quebec government set up a few weeks ago. It will also help establish partnerships with private enterprise, corporations and groups that promote Montreal's economic development in order to launch projects, conduct analyses and equip Montreal with key facilities or infrastructure.

I would not like to conclude without saying that Montreal's development and prosperity require the concerted action of governments, educational institutions, municipalities and the private sector. We must all work together and keep working harder to meet this challenge.

Of course, the investment of $150 million more is part of this spirit of co–operation and partnership. But even more, this decision shows the Canadian government's firm intention to give all the players on the Montreal scene the resources they need to make the recovery of Quebec's metropolis the best possible.

[English]

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to speak about the government's estimates because an important part of parliamentary life is reviewing the government's spending estimates. Having them in committee has some advantages because it gives members an opportunity to go into quite a bit more detail.

I think we lost something by the move back in 1969 to have the estimates removed from the House so this is a good opportunity today for members to talk about the government's spending estimates.

• (1140)

I want to talk about agriculture and the situation which faces Canadian farmers today. 1990 and 1991 were perhaps the most difficult years for the grain and oilseed industry because of two factors; the government made drastic reductions in their payments and at the same time the world price for grains was dropping dramatically from something like $137 a tonne for grain and wheat to $95 a tonne.

The government at that time was involved in negotiations for the establishment of the Gross Revenue Insurance Program and the Net Income Stabilization Account. Farmers at the same time were being really stiffed or stonewalled as to financial support at a time when world prices were dropping through the floor. In fact, they were the lowest last fall that we have seen since the Great Depression. Prices were as low as $2 a bushel when you removed the handling charges and so on.

The government steadfastly throughout that period dropped the government support programs drastically. The kinds of rallies we saw across Canada last fall have not been seen in the country in recent times. I had an opportunity to attend a rally in Weyburn, Saskatchewan which was attended by some 3,000 people. I also had an opportunity to attend a rally in Regina where some 7,500 farmers were pleading with the government to provide assistance.

Ultimately the government did provide something, about two-thirds of the funds that farmers were shortfalled in 1990 after a wild and woolly scene last fall in which farmers pleaded with the government to come through with some financial assistance. At the end of the day it provided something like two-thirds of the amount the farmers had been cut back in the 1990-91 crop year.

The government does a masterful job of orchestrating things to appear as if it is the great saviour of Canadian agriculture. When the estimates came out this spring the government announced that they were up some $800 million or $900 million. In fact, those estimates were just reflecting the funds the government had shortfalled the farmers two years previously.

We tried to go into the details of what was actually being provided in the agriculture committee when the estimates were there. The minister was there with his whole panoply of 15 or 20 experts and specialists, but nobody could actually explain where the extra funds were.

We got out the Part III Estimates and it showed that the additional funding for this calendar year 1992-93 was barely up, when the Wheat Board deficit of 1990-91 was added in, by some $500 million or $600 million, even though the press release and so on showed quite an increase for this year.

The government is really masterful at smoke and mirrors and it is also a master at trying to orchestrate funds to come just the year before an election or during an election year.

It is very interesting to look at the government's own farm income financial conditions and expenditures. Since 1986 farmers have been through the worst financial crisis since the 1930s. However, government support programs only increased dramatically in 1987-88. Surprise, surprise, there was a general election in 1988.

At that time the financial support from the federal government was $2.6 billion across western Canada because it is the grain and oilseeds sector, which of course operates in other provinces, where there has been a great deal of havoc.

Then in 1990, with no chance for a federal election, support dropped by 50 per cent from $2.6 billion to $1.2 billion. The same thing happened in 1991. Those were the years when the world price of grain was dropping from $135 a tonne to $95 a tonne, yet the government was just totally stonewalling Canadian farmers. They did not do much better in 1991.

Finally, after mass rallies right across the country, the government came through with some funding but none of that was paid in the 1991 calendar year. In fact, most of it will be paid in 1992. That is where we get the higher payments in the Main Estimates this year.

Even with all the minister's specialists and bean counters, they still were not able to explain to the agriculture committee who was actually provided with this additional assistance or when it was going to be provided.

The government will say that things are going to be much better now it has the Gross Revenue Insurance Program in place. This program is designed to provide producers with a guaranteed gross revenue from a certain area of land; so much per acre.

There are a great many flaws in that system. The trigger mechanism is not as sure as it should be and the government has already made some adjustments. The neutrality of the system with regard to markets, production, and international obligations through GATT are very much in question.

The important thing is that the government has gone through a massive off-loading program where it has loaded much of the cost of these programs on to the provinces and producers. For instance, let us look at those massive payments the government made in 1987 and 1988. This was leading up to the 1988 general election when the government wanted to look good and essentially it was on the buying end of activity.

If we look at those years, 1987-88, the total program payments in Canada were some $2.8 billion or $2.6 billion in 1988. During those years the producers' contribution was some $250 million in 1987 and $313 million in 1988; most of that would be their crop insurance premiums.

Let us look over the estimated payments for 1993. This will be the first year there are no additional payments under some of the programs that were announced last year. We see that the program payments in the entire country are estimated to be $1.6 billion with the federal government making contributions of $900 million and the province making payments of $732 million. The producers' contributions are double what they were in 1988 and 1987 and are as high as $650 million. What we have seen here is a tremendous off-loading and the sharp reduction in benefits from what they were in 1987 and 1988.

• (1150)

The government is putting in place a system that will be mainly funded by provincial governments and by farmers. In fact the benefits coming out of the system will be pretty well covered, at the least in the calculations of the department, by payments made by the provincial governments and by the producers themselves.

Some farmers may think that they have put in place a program that is going to have massive payments and guarantees, but if we look at the government's own estimates they do not look very tremendous. In fact, even with this program in place in western Canada the realized farm income in the government's own projections for 1993 dropped back below what they were in 1986. They are lower by another 11 per cent in 1994, and lower again in 1995, 1996 and 1997.

This is a government that is projecting extremely low realized net farm income in those years ahead in spite of having put in place a program that is going to cost producers and provincial governments hundreds of millions of dollars, resulting from an off-loading of these responsibilities.

For some provinces, like Saskatchewan, in which a very high proportion of their income comes from agriculture and there is a relatively low population and massive debt, those payments by the province are going to be extremely onerous.

While this scenario has been going on during the past year, with the government off-loading its responsibility on to provincial governments and producers and causing perhaps the greatest uncertainty in the history of western Canada, at the same time we have had that going on in the grains and oilseeds sector there has been the greatest uncertainty in our history going on in the supply managed sector.

This came to a final, calamitous rally on Parliament Hill on February 21 at which there were some 30,000 to 40,000 producers from all over the country—from Prince Edward Island to British Columbia, to Ontario, Quebec and the maritimes, every province—who were concerned that they were going to be sold out in the GATT negotiations.

When the interim report came out from the Secretary General of GATT on December 13 recommending a tariffication program, which is very much in line with the government's recommendations on every other commodity except for supply management, the Tory caucus started to sell that idea. It did not get very far.

Within the matter of a month it had turned tail and the Privy Council Office and the Prime Minister's Office were having second thoughts about it. The political egos were figuring out what the new strategy should be. The new strategy was that it was going to oppose tariffication even though it initially agreed to it. The Prime Minister's Office is orchestrating meetings and sending groups off to Europe to make representations even though many producers and many Canadians believe it did not really struggle that hard in the negotiations that have been going forward.

Farmers do not trust the Tories because of the free trade deal with the United States. In that deal, back in 1985, 1986 and 1987, people like the then Minister of Agriculture were telling the House of Commons to have no fear about the supply management system, which is a system that provides producers with a reasonable return on their investment, their capital investment, their labour and their know-how. The Minister of Agriculture and the then minister of external affairs at that time said not to fear because they had put together a deal ensuring that the supply management system could continue.

The Minister of Agriculture told the Canadian dairy producers in January 1988 that he was going to put all the supply management items on the import control list. That was about a week after the government had initialled the original deal.

As soon as he said that the chairman of the finance committee of the United States Senate, Lloyd Bentsen, immediately challenged it. He said if those items were put on the import control list the Americans would take it to GATT and ensure that it did not happen.

In fact the government did put them on the import control list in late December 1988 after the general election and after the government had hammered through the FTA deal, despite the fact that 57 per cent of Canadians opposed it in that election. It felt that the support of 43 per cent of Canadians was adequate to hammer it through.

When it put those items on the import control list the United States took us to GATT and said that Canada's action was not part of the free trade deal and it did not meet Canada's GATT obligations. In November 1989 it succeeded, and ultimately the government capitulated in December of that year. In that case—which involved processed dairy products, ice cream, and yogurt, which is a processed dairy product—the Government of the United States had an excellent demonstration of its ability to export processed dairy products into Canada.

Processed dairy products represent some 63 per cent of our dairy production in this country.

At the same time the United States kept its own GATT waiver, which it got in 1954–55 in negotiations. This government was going into those GATT negotiations that have been going on for the last several years with one arm tied behind its back. It has already lost to the United States. If GATT comes to naught the United States will have access for ice cream and yogurt, and ultimately for other processed dairy and poultry products.

It is little wonder that some 40,000 Canadian farmers in the supply management sector rallied on the Hill to show the government that they do not trust it and they want it to fight for them in GATT.

We hope that they will continue to keep that pressure on the government because it is the only thing that is going to make it fight for farmers in those international negotiations.

• (1200)

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague and seatmate on his speech today, particularly as it related to his own portfolio in the opposition as agriculture critic.

I would like to ask a question about the Tory government and its actual policy toward farmers in Canada, which we have seen since the free trade agreement. Farmers were left hanging to go it on their own. We saw that as it related to the yogurt and ice cream decision, and now we are seeing it in the GATT, in terms of the supply management sector.

I would expect that under the NAFTA farmers in Canada will again be left to go it alone. This government seems to have a great propensity to say to groups that have been very healthy and very much a part of our communities: "You can do it on your own. From here on in we are not going to support you. You are dispensable under these agreements".

I would like to know whether he thinks the government has done enough research and development in terms of trying to find alternatives for our farmers who have been sacrificed in these areas. There are abandoned farms in Annapolis County, an area that used to be a very thriving agricultural community. The farms are either not used or have a very limited use for the farmers who are left, namely dairy. They are slowly closing or selling their quota because of policies that have been put forward by both the provincial and federal governments.

If we as Canadians are abandoning farms and our communities, the farmers, the people and all the spinoffs that we have had across Canada, this government should come clean to the farmers and say: "We have to find other jobs for you", rather than letting them close one farm this week, another farm another week, and allow the slow dying of the rural farmers.

I have not seen research and development from this government to instil a new drive or a new desire for farms to be active or continue. I have not seen any offsets to the free trade agreement or to what is coming under NAFTA. We cannot compete with the cheap labour. Although we have low interest rates and a comparably low inflation rate, none of our farming communities seem to be able to come up with new programs in response to these three particular areas, the FTA, GATT and the proposed NAFTA.

Has the government failed this community? Has the government not done research and development? I do not feel that the government has done enough to support the small farmers in rural Canada who have been so much a part of the vitality of Canada.

What does the critic for the Liberal Party think that this government should be doing to offset the free trade agreement, the potential disastrous effect on supply management under GATT, and, even worse, the NAFTA, which would eliminate most of the rural farming communities that are still existing?

Mr. Foster: I want to thank the member for South West Nova because she has outlined the malaise and concern that exists in the country as a result of the government's failure in the FTA.

When it left this gaping hole in the FTA, which the Americans immediately seized on and made use of, it was obvious that the government had no intention of maintaining supply management as we know it. I believe supply management has given us greater diversity in agriculture than any other single act. I believe, for instance in Atlantic Canada and the maritimes, it is probably the most important economic diversification tool.

I recall attending a meeting with co-operatives and agricultural producers during the free trade debate in New Brunswick. People were saying: "Look, if you want to see what free trade will do for Atlantic Canada and for the maritimes, go over and see what agriculture is like in Maine where most of its dairy and poultry industries are non-functional". It has had free trade for the last 50 years.

The free trade deal has to be renegotiated. The vast majority of Canadians want to see it renegotiated. We need a subsidy code. Our pork and hog industry is being ravaged because under our tripartite stabilization program we end up with a massive countervail which goes on year after year. Clearly the FTA has been extremely harmful, but nothing like it could be or will be if the GATT negotiations go the way that we are afraid they will.

If the GATT fails, the Americans have total access or will have pretty well complete access to ice cream and yogurt. They have already won that in a GATT panel decision. It will simply open the floodgates for challenges on cheese, butter, powder and other dairy commodities.

Nobody knows exactly, but we hear that the FTA will be a separate negotiation. There are press reports this morning that there is some kind of an agreement. Our concern under the free trade deal was that the snap-back provision we had for fresh fruits and vegetables, especially those coming in during the growing season of June and July, was simply not adequate. That snap-back provision is simply not a functional mechanism. That is the kind of thing that has to be renegotiated, and 67 per cent of Canadians favour renegotiation.

Diversification and research and development application are very important. I noticed this year for instance that the agricultural research and development application budget has been cut by 4 per cent. If we have an inflation rate of another 4 per cent, we have got a 9 per cent effective cut in R and D. The economic competitiveness council called on the government one week before the budget came out to increase the capital cost allowance for the food processing industry, to double it from 25 per cent to 50 per cent. What did the government do? It increased it by 5 per cent, which is about the inflation rate.

We need the diversification that supply management has brought us. We had a resolution by one of our caucus members yesterday about ethanol, the member for Lambton—Middlesex. It really called on the government, but what did we get? We had Tory members from southwestern Ontario standing and saying they were the representatives of the Ethyl Corporation. I thought members of Parliament represented people, farmers. He said: "No, no. I am the representative for the Ethyl Corporation so I do not want to see ethanol opened up and used". It is one of the greatest diversification tools. It is a good environmental improvement. Yet we had Tory members saying they were going to oppose mechanisms for increasing the use of ethanol for our transportation fuels.

There certainly is a lot to be done. The estimates before us today cut R and D, which is not helpful to Canadian farmers. It is not helpful to rural Canadian agriculture.

• (1210)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am honoured today to request on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board supply for the 1992–93 Main Estimates.

These Main Estimates reflect our continuing commitment to eliminate waste and inefficiency, control spending and contain the costs of government, the need for significant changes in the way government operates, and our commitment to deliver services to Canadians in the most efficient manner.

This year the Main Estimates total $160.5 billion. Through these estimates the government seeks Parliament's approval for $48 billion in new spending authority of which some $13 billion of interim supply was granted earlier through Appropriation Act No. 1, 1992–93. The remaining $111.7 billion represent statutory payments that have already been granted previously with parliamentary approval.

Growth in the Main Estimates is the outcome of a number of decisions and factors affecting the budgets of all 135 programs delivered by the 116 departments, agencies and Crown corporations that appear in the estimates. This growth can be divided into two broad categories: adjustments to statutory items which amount to a net increase of $1.3 billion and changes to voted items which amount of $1.7 billion.

These Main Estimates fully reflect the government's continuing attempts to eliminate waste and inefficiency. This includes divesting itself of activities and organizations that no longer serve a vital public need in order to reduce costs and strike a proper balance between Canadians' demands for federal services and their ability as taxpayers to pay for those services.

In this regard much has been achieved over the past seven years. Program spending now represents only 16.7 per cent of Canada's Gross National Product as compared to 20 per cent in fiscal year 1984–85. During the same period the annual growth in program spending including Public Service salaries has averaged only 4 per cent as compared to an average inflation rate of 4.3 per cent.

In the 1991 budget a commitment was made to introduce legislation that would limit spending for the next five years. The Spending Control Act has been approved by this House and the spending plans outlined in the Main Estimates are well within the limits set out in that legislation.

These achievements clearly demonstrate the government's commitment to restraint and improved efficiency through the rigorous control of expenditures as well as the implementation of innovative management practices. They also reflect our commitment to good management and careful stewardship of the taxpayer's dollar.

The government's record since taking office in 1984 has been one of success. We are confident we are on the right track. Canadians have indicated that they want governments to spend less, to spend smarter and to be more efficient. To this end the government continues to scrutinize carefully resource requests by federal government agencies.

My colleague, the Minister of Finance in his latest budget, announced a series of initiatives intended to bring about immediate reductions in expenditures and contribute to lasting efficiencies in government programs and services.

First, a number of programs including grants and contributions is being reduced. Defence spending is being scaled back further. Expenditures on social housing will continue to grow but the rate of increase will be slower.

This government remains committed to the green plan and plans to spend $3 billion over the next six years. However some expenditures have been rescheduled for later years.

Second, the cost of government operations, that is the non-salary operating budgets, is being reduced a further 3 per cent. An additional $75 million in communications related expenditures is to be removed from the appropriations.

In addition to the expenditure reduction and reprofiling announced in the budget and in addition to the more than 20 Crown corporations that have been sold or dissolved since 1984, 46 separate organizations and advisory bodies will be wound up, privatized or consolidated with other organizations.

Cost recovery will also be extended to a number of additional areas with a view to moving the costs of providing specific services to the beneficiaries and away from the general taxpayer.

In today's difficult fiscal environment there are not enough tax dollars to meet all the financial demands of government programs. Cost recovery ensures that the best use is made of scarce resources. Through user fees and cost recovery the government is providing and improving services we might not otherwise be able to afford in order to ensure that the best use is made of scarce resources.

Ongoing restraints mean that the Public Service managers and organizations have to deal with increased demands for services on the one hand and ever decreasing resources on the other hand. The managers have to seek the balance in a creative, sensitive and constructive manner.

We also believe that an innovative, competent and dedicated Public Service is the key asset in supporting Canada's ability to compete. Dedicated and competent federal employees working across the country and in missions abroad are working to serve Canadians in many areas such as health and safety, protection of consumer interests, support of industry regions, aboriginal people, science and technology, foreign aid, representing and protection of interests abroad, protection of persons and property, protection of taxpayers through effective and fair administration of the Income Tax Act and the Customs and Excise Acts, and delivery of social programs.

The government as the employer wishes to inform Canadians that its employees are doing many things to serve them better and to bring the government closer to them. To improve efficiency in the Public Service, innovation management practices remain a priority for this government.

Since taking office in 1984 we have introduced a wide range of initiatives to improve the management of operations. Many of the recent initiatives are the result of the major renewal exercise PS 2000 announced by the Prime Minister in 1989.

In support of this initiative a number of special operating agencies have been or are in the process of being established. Managers of special operating agencies have been given the ability and the flexibility to run their organizations more like a business with greater focus on results and service. This gives them greater freedom of action to serve Canadian taxpayers better and to respond quickly to changes in client needs.

Also, in the context of PS 2000, a system of operating budgets is currently being introduced which will be used to provide a far more realistic measure of the administrative costs of delivering programs and services. It too will give managers more flexibility to decide what is the most efficient distribution of their allocated resources.

Operating budgets will also allow managers to make the most economical use of scarce tax dollars in order to deliver services better and on a more timely basis. Operating budgets are expected to be in place government-wide by the beginning of 1993-94.

In conclusion, this government is committed to providing Canadians with the best service possible within the resources available. It is committed to a Public Service where employees focus first on the public they serve. To this end we must make it easier for our clients to deal with the government by providing simple and accessible services and we must make it easier for our managers to move in this direction.

We will do this by continuing to restructure government operations and provide training to our employees. To achieve these goals, federal government organizations will work together to make government services available at common points of delivery service. They will develop, where possible, standards of service based on consultation with clients. They provide more flexible and client oriented hours of service. They will reduce the number of forms to make them easier to complete. They will move to electronic procurement and invest in new technologies and training.

• (1220)

The message is clear. This government is serious about restraint. It is responding to the desire of Canadians that we reduce spending wherever possible. We are serious about reform and the need for new organizational approaches with which to operate the government in a manner that suits the needs of Canadians.

The measures that have been announced in the budget and reflected in these Main Estimates clearly indicate our commitment to sound fiscal management and to reduce the demands on the Canadian taxpayers.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, I was interested in the speech of the hon. member for Burlington.

I know that he is very interested in science and technology, industrial diversification and the whole area of science and industrial design and so on. He talked about the government doing a slashing job on groups like the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada. I know the government is saving some $22 million with the wholesale destruction of those agencies.

In view of the member's interest in long term science policy and economic policy, I am wondering whether the government's move to slash all those agencies is out of concern or because of the politics of it, especially in western Canada and in other parts of the country with the Reform Party, and spending all of that money which I believe was $22 million on the 'feel good agenda' where we are trying to make people be happy and be satisfied and so on.

Does he feel that is a good trade-off. Should the Government of Canada be destroying long term agencies like the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada? Politicians by their very nature, with a mandate of only for four or five years, have to look at the short term. The Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada can take a broader view, perhaps a 10 year, 15 year or 20 year horizon as to what needs to be done in terms of retraining, education, science, specialities, direction, innovations or design that is good.

I am interested to know whether the hon. member feels that it is in the best interests of the country to slash agencies like the Science Council of Canada and the Economic Council of Canada, to cut off that opportunity for a window on the wider world and, more important, on the horizon of those special areas of education, university and design and new perspectives on where we need to be going as a country for our industries.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, the member poses an interesting question because the government has closed the two agencies to which he referred.

The question is: Is the information they supplied available from other sources? We are constantly being pushed by the academic world, in particular the universities, to help them in their research and development programs. The Minister of Industry, Science and Technology has introduced and put in operations centres of excellence in our universities across the country.

We find that we can get much of the information that we want, much of the research that we want through those universities. Take the drug program that we introduced through the extension of the Patent Act under Bill C-22. Most of that research and many of the companies involved in it came to Canada because they felt that we have a good university program where they could tap into and get much of the research done for the new drugs and processes that they were putting forward in biotechnology and so forth to help our medical services across the country. It is the same with our industrial research. The member I know is aware of the disastrous programs that were introduced by previous governments in research and development that cost us billions of dollars in the final analysis, fraudulent schemes that were put in place. I am not blaming the government for it. I am just blaming the way it was administered. There were fraudulent schemes that were put in place and exercised by many companies which came into the country, got research and development grants from the government and then disappeared out of the country again. There was no control over them. We have had a bad history in that regard.

I think what we have done is the right thing. The services that are available to us from our university communities are good. What we are doing with industry in research and development will continue to sustain our industry in the future. Certainly, in many of our industries we are leaders in the field and we will continue to be that way in the future.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, as I have just returned from the earth summit in Rio, my questions for the parliamentary secretary will focus on the issues that flow out of that experience.

In Rio the government reaffirmed its commitment to give .7 per cent of GNP for foreign aid. Regrettably there was no timetable attached to that commitment. Over the last five years that commitment has in real terms actually decreased.

My first question is whether or not this is more than just nice words and no action, the usual strategy of this government, or whether there are some real dollar figures that are planned from Treasury Board.

My second question also concerns my experience in Rio. I was horrified to come back to Canada and hear that there was a proposal to spend $4.3 billion on military helicopters. When one considers the kind of priorities there are, there has to be a fundamental rethinking about what is valued and what environmental security means. I would ask the parliamentary secretary whether or not there is some concern in cabinet for what environmental security is and what is going to happen with that planned expenditure.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister of Canada made a commitment that he was going to propose to cabinet and to put through in government spending a certain amount of money for foreign aid, it will be done. There is no doubt about that in my mind.

With regard to the helicopter acquisition, it has not come to cabinet yet. It is still being considered. The newspapers got hold of a story and they played it pretty well. Members, like the member who asked the question, have played on it.

The matter has not come before cabinet. It will be coming before cabinet. Much of that will be used for search and rescue. The condition of the 35-year-old helicopters that we have and the number of accidents they have had certainly indicate to me, at any rate, that these helicopters have to be replaced.

I would just say that the first time there is a need for search and rescue helicopters on either the west coast or the east coast and we do not have helicopters that are capable of going out and getting into that rescue operation, the hon. member will be on her feet, as will others, saying why are we not doing something about it.

We have equipment. Equipment wears out. These are 35 years old. There is talk of revitalizing them, putting new engines in them and so forth, but I do not know if that is such a good idea. We are going to have to replace those. Part of the replacement will come from the program that the government is going to be looking at in the very near future.

• (1230)

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Madam Speaker, I have a very short question. Having seen the budget, there were many reductions. My colleague has talked about the different councils: the Economic Council, the Science Council, and the Law Reform Commission which in my opinion were worth-while. The hon. member said there were other places they could go for that expertise.

Has the parliamentary secretary seen any studies that might have recommended that the ministers' offices should be cut back?

I cannot see most of them being very cost-effective because they now have a chief of staff who is paid almost at the level of a deputy minister. It seems to me this cost is an ineffective use of Parliament.

I am wondering if the parliamentary secretary would like to comment on that because I think there are an excessive number of ministries. Possibly some of them could be cut out altogether or doubled up.

Mr. Kempling: Madam Speaker, ministerial staff is the prerogative of the minister.

I can recall when I was in opposition one of the members of her party who sits in the front row had an exempt staff of over 125 people. I have never seen a parallel of that in our government. People on ministerial staff can be shuffled into various areas.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Name it.

Mr. Kempling: I am not going to name it. The hon. member knows better than to ask that question.

The shuffling of staff from one side to the other goes on quite a little bit. If the ministers need the staff to carry out the programs they are engaged in then they should have the staff to do so.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, there is a motion before this House that asks us to concur in the Main Estimates of the spending of the Government of Canada through to the end of the year, March 31, 1993.

As we look at these estimates we can talk about all that things that are happening and are not happening in the country. We can talk about financial matters and those other matters that concern the country very deeply.

There are certainly many problems that face this country today that are of a very serious nature. However, that is no reason for anyone in the House or any Canadian to go around being deeply concerned about how we are going to handle it, whether we are going to handle it, and what is going to happen to the future of our country.

If we have the determination and the insight, if we have learned something from past history in this country and from the past leaders of this country, from the people in the past who put this nation together over the years, then we will look at the past to get an answer to the present. If we have any vision in this country, any vision in ourselves, we will be able to look to the future and put it together.

I do not fear that Canadians today cannot meet the challenges that are facing us right now. However it is going to take leadership in this country and it is going to take serious dedication on the part of every member of Parliament, every senator, and every Canadian from coast to coast to coast in this country.

I want to go on the premise of our forefathers, of the sound foundation that has been built in this country over the years by people who had faith in themselves, faith in their country, faith in their fellow human beings, their comrades, and faith in God.

God has given us a great gift. It is called Canada. How we as generations of Canadians manage this Canada of ours is our gift to God, and I suggest that we not let our Maker down.

One thing that is bothering me greatly, as we have this last day for the study of the estimates for this fiscal year, is that the federal government is unloading its burdens on to other levels of government in this country, namely the provinces, the municipalities and right through to the very doorsteps of every individual taxpaying Canadian.

The estimates for this fiscal year are $160.5 billion. A new financial structure is going to be needed in this country and it is going to be needed now because the financial structure is all out of whack as a result of the niggling process of trying to pass the buck to somebody else.

With all my heart and every inch of my sincerity I maintain that the buck stops right here in the House of Commons of Canada. This is where the leadership has got to come from if we are going to manage this nation well.

Yes, we have a farm crisis in this country. It has been very well outlined by the hon. member for Algoma, who has an in-depth knowledge of the farm community and its difficulties in this country.

Supply management programs must be protected at all costs and they can only be protected if each and every one of us is determined to protect the farm community in this country. I grew up on a farm in this country. I have done all the chores that anyone could think of. I milked my two cows before I walked six and a half miles to high school because there were no school buses. I came home after school, got on the tractor, went out to the fields, drove the team of horses, milked the cows and tried to do my homework in the interim. It never hurt me and I recommend it to everybody.

There is nothing wrong with this nation today that a good dose of national spirit, personal determination, and the ability of every one of us to pull our weight would not fix. This country needs dedication. We have this great nation, this great gift that God has given us, called Canada. Let us manage it by working for it and not be afraid and back away from things in case we are going to fail.

We can never be afraid of failure because that is the first step to failure.

We must protect our farm system today because this country has been blessed with some of the greatest health standards in food anywhere in the world. I congratulate our Department of Agriculture and its officials for that, and the leaders of the past who put these programs together. Our health standards are excellent.

We need security of food in this country because any nation that cannot feed itself is in danger. That is a terrible failure. Over the beautiful farm lands and open fields of this country waves that great Canadian flag day in and day out, as it does over the small villages, towns and cities of this country. Let us get up in the morning and say how grateful we are to be Canadians. Let us go out and deliver the message to our neighbours and friends and inspire them to go on and build Canada, this Canada that cares greatly for her own people.

• (1240)

We have health care in this country that is unparalleled. If there is anything that we must do, if we think anything about our friends and neighbours at all, it must be to ensure that this is retained in the social structure of this country. I am sure every Canadian wants to see that done, but it requires determination and good management.

In my years in this House I have made some tremendous friends on both sides of this Chamber, and I have some good friends on both sides of this Chamber today. I appeal to everybody, at this moment and as they get up each morning, to say that we, the citizens of Canada, have the greatest opportunity to do things not only for ourselves in this country and not only to feel for those people who are unemployed and those people who do not have good health but we must have a heart and we must have a heart for them. National Revenue must have a heart for those people who are suffering and cannot pay their taxes because they had to feed their kids first. They have a wife and family to support.

I hope that the Minister of National Revenue will see it in his heart to back off on some of the sad cases that are coming forward. I have a number of them myself and my heart goes out to them. Our greatest resource is our people. Let us help them through this difficult time.

Our national resources are another point in question. Softwood lumber had a tremendous downturn when the Minister for International Trade signed that 15 per cent tax against softwood lumber going into the United States. We know it was not part of the free trade agreement but we also know that it was signed just before the free trade agreement was signed and the softwood lumber people in this area, and in my own Ottawa Valley which has been hurt terribly, were the sacrificial lambs of this government signing a free trade agreement with the United States. Let there be no question about that. Our lumber and natural resources have suffered ever since.

Even though it has been taken off, after many suffered as a result of it, the United States is now coming back and trying to nail us with it anyway. We will be interested to see what the report is.

The hon. member from Superior and—how could I forget? As a student I stood out on the highway in Cochrane hitch-hiking all night to get to Long Lac where I had a summer job. The member for Cochrane—Superior has brought this issue out extremely well.

Let us not say that it just happened on its own. This government has always said that we must compete. I could not agree more with it, and I do not think any member in this House could agree more. We must compete with the world if we are going to live but we are not going to compete in this world if we have a lack of commitment on the part of the government for research and development in this nation. Yes, we must talk about competing but the research and development programs of this country, or of any other country, are the engine that drives the economy. That is what answers the competition.

If it is the determination, the desire and the will of the government not to do R and D in the way that it should be done to benefit all Canadians then it is failing in its effort to compete at the same time as it is saying we must compete.

Emergency Preparedness Canada's training centre in Arnprior is an issue I want to raise at this time. For months on end the people in that community and Canadians from both territories and all 10 provinces of Canada, 3,000 people a year, come to that Emergency Preparedness Canada training centre in Arnprior to take training courses to handle disasters in their communities across this nation. There were great rumours it was going to be moved out of that centre. We had a large rally recently. I have been asking questions and raising the matter in the House. Finally the other day the Minister of Supply and Services, who is the regional minister for eastern Ontario, gave a commitment in writing to the Mayor of Arnprior this facility would stay in Arnprior and in the Ottawa Valley, and I thank him for that. I am not vindictive about these things.

I am a fighter for things for the Ottawa Valley and I am a fighter for things for Canada. When a person makes a commitment, then I thank him for it and I want that commitment kept. I want it kept for the county of Renfrew because it was very much involved in this.

Canada has had problems over the years. Today we have many problems but these are not unnatural. Every nation has its problems. As I said in the beginning, it depends on the will and determination of Canadians generally to face up to these problems of today. That is going to tell the rest of this country whether or not we have the conviction and faith within ourselves that our ancestors had to solve these problems and carry on with this great nation called Canada.

This is Canada. I am a Canadian nationalist. I have been a Canadian nationalist from the word go. I am not a Scot, I am not Irish and I am not English. I am Canadian and I will be one until the day I die. I almost got thrown out of a history class in high school because I was fighting for our Canadian flag. I am proud of that day and I have had some great discussions with that teacher since.

What is the sense of discussing all these other great issues today and worrying about them if, first of all, we do not have a united Canada? The difficulties over Canadian history have been great. One of the greatest things that has ever been done, one of the greatest visions of this country was building the first railroad across this nation.

To put things in perspective, let us go back to 1840 in Canadian history. Lord Stanley, who was the British Colonial Secretary from England at the time, said and I quote: "I have to express the hope that the formation of the Government of Canada may have the effect of extinguishing party and national animosities and of directing the minds of men in Canada"—You know it is not our generation now, because we would say "men and women in Canada"—"of whatever origin to the advancement of the prosperity of their native or adopted country". That was in 1840 and there were problems. We are still trying to face up to those problems today.

Then there is a quote from Stephen Leacock in 1926 regarding the contribution of those two great Canadians who worked prior to Confederation, Robert Baldwin and Louis Lafontaine. Stephen Leacock had this to say:

> From now on a new path of national development is indicated in the alliance and co-operation of the two races, English and French, each contributing its distinctive share to the political life of the country, and each finding in the other a healthful stimulus and support. This is the principle, entirely contrary to the doctrines of the older school, first introduced by the alliance of Baldwin and Lafontaine, which has since governed the destinies of Canada. On the validity of this principle, the future of the country has been staked.

It is a great and well-earned tribute to Baldwin and Lafontaine because they did a lot prior to 1867 in the 1840s, 1850s and 1860s to make this a great nation. George-Etienne Cartier had this to say in 1855:

> In the alliance which we have made between Upper and Lower Canada—we have not abandoned any of our positions.

• (1250)

Those are the words of great statesmen, so let us practise a little bit of that today. They had their nationhood idea and were trying to bring the races and various groups in Canada together. It is a great credit to the Fathers of Confederation after conferences in Quebec City and Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, that in 1867 a nation consisting of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Ontario and Quebec and the rest of the territories of Canada was brought together.

B.C. entered in 1871 on the promise a railroad would be built across the country. We know all the little scandals and the problems of bringing that railway to pass, but in 1885 it happened and B.C. remained in Canada.

We also remember the American Civil War between 1860 and 1864 ended up with a victory for the north. The Americans had a tremendous army at their command at that time. They had a great idea they were going to become the continentalists in North America. Some wanted to go right through to the North Pole and claim all of what is Canada today.

But what happened? The Fathers of Confederation saw this happening. They had the minds of statesmen and used them. That is why they brought Canada together in 1867, so we could protect ourselves from the pushing and aggressive interests from south of the border we see today.

Continentalism was what the Americans called it then. What is it today with free trade and the lumber issue I mentioned? They are still trying to come on to Canada and push us right to the wall. We, as Canadians, have to stick together today just as we stuck together in 1867. There must be unity within this nation. That line of steel started to be built across the country and Manitoba, a great province of Canada, entered Confederation in 1870. In 1873 that beautiful island, Prince Edward Island, joined Confederation. Saskatchewan and Alberta came in 1905, carved out of the territories of western Canada. Newfoundland came in 1949, and then we had Canada and the two territories.

This was leadership, Madam Speaker.

I want to end on this great note, because I want to appeal to every Canadian in every province of Canada. I want to appeal to those who are handling our constitutional debate today.

Let us remember over in Europe, tens of thousands of young Canadians are resting row on row in those cemeteries. They went over there to defend Canada, to defend freedom and to defend other free nations of the world. There were 619,636 Canadians who participated in World War I and 66,655 died. They were Canadians and young people. If you look at those grave markers you will see how young—18, 19, 20, 23, 24 years of age. They were young people who never had an opportunity to participate in the history of their nation, but they saved this nation for us, and are an inspiration to us.

They came from all over Canada. In World War II more than one million Canadians went to war to save freedom once again. We lost 45,000 Canadians in World War II. They too are sleeping far away from their homeland, but they fought for freedom. They fought for us so we could have this great nation and participate in a free world.

Then we joined the United Nations in the Korean war in 1950, 1951, 1952 and 1953.

Five hundred and sixteen Canadians are resting in Korea as a result of having fought under the UN flag in those years. We have done a great job peacekeeping around the world.

Just remember, we do not have Remembrance Day in this nation only on November 11 each year. Today is remembrance day. Remember all those Canadians who sacrificed their lives to save Canada's freedom and fight for the free world. Let us as Canadians determine today we have the destiny within ourselves to co-operate with one another, to tone down our demands and try to get along together as good neighbours. Let us build this great nation God has given us.

If we do not, we have failed. I do not want a single member sitting in this House today to ever leave Parliament and have any of our children or our grandchildren in the future say: "My father or mother or grandmother was a member of Parliament when this country failed itself"

I want to thank hon. members from all over this House for listening very intently. I have a great feel for members on both sides of this House. I think that is the kind of spirit we have to put into building the Canadian Constitution and uniting this nation. I call for my friends from Quebec, from every province of Canada and the territories, our aboriginal peoples and everyone, to make Canada great. Let us get on with our great nation, help our fellow man and help bring peace on an ongoing basis to the world.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I just want to compliment the member for his excellent remarks and the spirit in which he made them in this House on a non-partisan basis.

I think they are the kind of remarks we do not hear enough of in this House. I think the remarks were well placed today.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I too want to share the thoughts of my former colleague from Mississauga with the member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, who came to this House in 1965 as I did.

There was a certain celebration here last night for the class of 1968, but they are sort of young members here. Some of us are from the class of 1965 and are getting a little longer in the tooth.

I listened on television and came here to hear the end of his speech because of my personal respect for the hon. member and his generally objective view on most things, although most of us share party labels.

I obviously agree with him totally in terms of what he says about the state of the country and the fact we, as members, have a very special duty to help resolve those constitutional problems. I know how he feels sentimentally, but I would just like to ask him how he feels in terms of Parliament. We have seen all the negotiations and everything has been ticking away outside of this forum.

We have a referendum bill that already puts a three-day time limit on a referendum question if we get to that point. Does he not feel, as an experienced member, this House has to become seized of this in a real way in a very short period of time, if the negotiators in those conference halls outside of Parliament are not able to come up with some type of offer to present to Quebec?

This is the House of Commons for the country. What really bothers me about the process, although it is much better than the Meech Lake process, is the time clock is ticking. We might not be able to come up with a reasonable situation to offer to Quebec. Is it his personal opinion, as a parliamentarian with long experience, that if we can come up with the offer, that in effect, as some people have written, especially in the Quebec press, let us have the referendum in Quebec, whatever the question may be and just see how that province decides on a very precise question its relationship with Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, it is one o'clock p.m. The hon. member would have the floor after Question Period. I think it would not be fair for him to answer such a question in 20 seconds.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

The House took recess at 1 p.m.

S. O. 31

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, currently the average Canadian taxpayer has absolutely no sympathy for the administrative problems of Canada's revenue department. The cross-border shopping craze is a rebellion against over-taxation, nothing more and nothing less.

The Minister of National Revenue's answer to over-taxation would be to impose some more taxes by this thing he calls harmonization of the PST and GST.

When is the minister going to quit putting measures in place at border crossings which do nothing more than cause Canadian shoppers to show more ingenuity when they are returning from their shopping sprees in the U.S.?

When is the minister going to do something positive about cross-border shopping? For example, let him lower the federal excise tax on gasoline, which is the main culprit that forces Canadians to shop in the U.S. in the first place.

* * *

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, the Obstetrician and Gynaecologist Society of Canada wants the federal government to legalize the pill RU-486 for abortion purposes in Canada.

RU-486 pathologically affects the lining of the pregnant women's womb, causing the baby to undergo slow and agonizing starvation, followed by death and expulsion from the body. The drug has been known to cause fatal internal bleeding in some women.

The society is reported to have stated that: "The problem of legalizing the use of RU-486 is not with the government, but with the company itself, for fear of reaction from the pro-life people".

It is my opinion that the Obstetrician and Gynaecologist Society of Canada now considers itself the chief advocate and lobby group for Rousell Canada, the drug manufacturer, pushing for the legalization of RU-486.

I would expect that the government will remain firm and steadfast and not be swayed in any way in this decision to refuse the use of this drug for abortion use in Canada.

* * *

[Translation]

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Gabrielle Bertrand (Brome—Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a message from several hundred members of the Yamaska Valley Chapter of the Canadian Club, in my riding, to their anglophone fellow citizens in the other provinces.

[English]

We of the Canadian Club of the Yamaska Valley, in the Eastern Townships of Quebec, wish to tell you of the enrichment we feel in our lives because we have an opportunity to partake in two cultures. We consider this diversity a bonus. This province is not unique, just different. Most provinces have languages and customs which they treasure and want to keep. Quebec feels the need to preserve what it has and we accept this. We do think that a compromise can, and will be achieved, so that Canada will remain a united country.

A positive attitude recognizing that we are a privileged people is essential. These privileges were given to us as Canadians to enjoy and to share. Let us not lose sight of this.

[Translation]

I hope this message will be heard and understood across the country.

* * *

[English]

NUCLEAR POWER

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, a report prepared for a number of environmental groups in New Brunswick has called attention to the fact that there may be a serious situation developing at the Point Lepreau reactor in New Brunswick where aging high pressure steam pipes located over the control room might pose a potential hazard.

Apparently AECB has issued a warning to New Brunswick Power and this warning has so far been ignored. Also, concern has been registered over the fact that Point Lepreau or New Brunswick Power has not filed an emergency plan like they were asked to do by AECB after the Chernobyl disaster. In fact, all nuclear reactors were asked to file such plans.

I would ask the government in my statement today to get in touch with the AECB and to ask it to get tough with New Brunswick Power to make sure we do not have any kind of nuclear accident in that province.

Now is the time to do something about these things, not after the fact. This report ought not to be discredited as it was earlier in the House today simply because the person who prepared it had something to do with Greenpeace. It is groups like Greenpeace and others who have warned us before the fact about other possible hazards.

It is time we listened now rather than wait until something happens.

* * *

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-21 removed the government's obligation to contribute to the unemployment insurance fund.

The fund is made up of employee-employer contributions and not government money. It is to be administered by the LFDB and it requested that the spending for developmental use be increased from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion.

In a feeble effort to make it look as if the government is actually doing something positive for the unemployed, the Minister of Finance said: "We increased worker training and adjustment funds under the unemployment insurance program".

What he failed to mention was that this is not government money but it is the unemployment insurance contributions from employers and employees that he is using.

For example, community development projects are aimed at helping remote areas adjust to the changing market needs. This includes promoting alternative markets to whatever may have once fueled the local economy and I repeat, the local economy.

The local economy of P.E.I., in particular Hillsborough, has a record high unemployment rate which is having a tremendous impact on my constituents' lives, families, and well-being.

I ask the minister not to shuffle money around at the expense of the unemployed in Canada. If he is going to shuffle money around, shuffle it in the right places to help these unfortunate Canadians.

* * *

[Translation]

UNITED PARCEL SERVICE CANADA LIMITED

Mr. Marcel Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to draw the attention of the House to the pride and determination shown by a company in my riding, United Parcel Service Canada Limited. UPS, which provides a parcel delivery service over land across Canada, in addition to having its own air mail delivery service which also operates throughout the country, has acquired a reputation for providing quality service.

The company does 48 inspections on each aircraft before every daily departure. The company has also become a significant player in the trucking industry. UPS tries to improve its employees' knowledge of safe driving practices, and it is one of the leading companies in North America in providing safety training for its employees.

I applaud the determination of UPS to provide an outstanding mail delivery service, which confirms the feelings of pride reflected by the UPS team.

* * *

[English]

YOUTH EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, the government's approach to our youth, our students, is absolutely morally scandalous. The government has a brutal consistency. It attacks those who are most vulnerable, including young people between the ages of 15 to 24.

The unemployment rate, according to Statistics Canada, for Newfoundland youth was 34 per cent last year this time and it is now 36 per cent.

Combined with full-time students, the over-all rate for these groups, youth and students, is 43 per cent according to the latest statistics.

What has the government done? It has gutted transfer payments for post-secondary education. It has cut back on Challenge funding for summer employment by nearly $1 million in Newfoundland alone. It has tampered with Canada's student loans.

Our most vulnerable and precious resource is being wilfully pillaged by this government.

I ask this government now to retrace its steps, to amend its ways and to do something for that important group of people who are our future, while there is time left to do so.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, with the break-up of Yugoslavia and the recognition of new nations such as Slovenia, Croatia and Bosnia-Hercegovina, some are seeking the recognition of another new state which is referred to as Macedonia.

Whereas the Government of Canada supports the principles of self-determination and independence, we must not forget the history of this region. Archeologists and experts in ancient history will affirm that Macedonia is inherently woven into the fabric of Hellenic civilization.

On the other hand, the People's Socialist Republic of Macedonia is a post-World War II creation of Tito's Yugoslavia and is a falsification and expropriation of the concept of Macedonia. It is a deliberate and malicious attack on Hellenic history and culture.

• (1410)

I urge the Government of Canada not to recognize the so-called state of Macedonia. Another name is fine, but not the name of Macedonia. I further recommend the government work with the United Nations and the European Community to ensure that the Government of Skopje gives up its false and provocative claims to Greek culture, history and territory.

S. O. 31

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers have been without a contract since the summer of 1989. Despite the appointment of a conciliation officer in October 1989, of a conciliation board in October 1990, and a mediator in September 1991, the union is still without a contract.

Canada Post negotiators have attempted to deny that agreements were reached on many major issues during and following the mediation phase. For example, on the issue of wages, the government says it was not able to reach an agreement. In fact, both parties did agree on that issue.

I call upon the government to stop procrastinating and solve this matter forthwith.

* * *

BANKS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, over the last few weeks there was concern raised in this House that Canada's big banks would nail consumers for higher service charges to cover their mistake loans to the floundering real estate giant, Olympia & York.

In response, the Minister of Finance made it clear he would not tolerate the banks trying to recover their loan losses from small businesses or average Canadians. He contacted the Canadian Bankers' Association and spelled out his concerns. He also told this House he was standing squarely on the side of bank clients.

The man the press is now calling "Mad Maz, the consumers' friend", has got results. Last week several banks announced they are freezing their service fees for a period of time as a visible gesture that the O&Y mistake will not end up costing us all more money.

I want to congratulate the banks for their gutsy response to this public concern and of course we are all in debt to Mad Maz, the caped crusader of Canadian consumerism.

EARTH SUMMIT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, at this first opportunity to speak in the House since returning from the earth summit in Rio, I want to express my deep admiration and thanks to the Canadian negotiating team for their outstanding work on our behalf.

These women and men have given of themselves tirelessly over the past two years and in the final days and nights of negotiation in Rio worked around the clock. These 16 people are public servants in the truest sense.

Thank you John Bell, Vic Buxton, George Greene, Michael Small, Bob Applebaum, Serge April, Jerry Beausoliel, Alexandra Bezeredi, Barbara Brown, Louise Coté, Adrian DeHoog, David Drake, Fern Hurtubise, Jag Maini, John Sloan and Roger Street. You are among the heroes of the earth summit. I hope you can rest up, see your families and recharge your batteries for the crucial follow-up work.

Merci beaucoup.

* * *

BEEF INDUSTRY

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, the cattlemen and women of this country and indeed of North America are being attacked by environmentalists and animal rights groups.

Cows and bulls have existed on this planet since Adam and Eve and in fact the Lord asked Noah to preserve all species because of a big cloudburst a few years ago.

Now these brain-warped animal rights groups and environmentalists, who all gorge themselves on big Macs, blame beef for causing heart attacks. They blame the cow with its forward and backward belches, you know what I mean Mr. Speaker, for causing a hole in the ozone.

Cattlemen are now blamed for feeding grain, grass and silage to these cows while Third World children starve. Cows provide milk, butter, cheese, fat, meat, leather, protein, calcium, fertilizer, recycled, and hundreds of thousands of jobs. Cows are perfect examples of sustainable development. Take away the moo, in fact the oink or the baa, and the entire world starves.

IMMIGRATION ACT

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Minister of Employment and Immigration tabled a bill with numerous and complex amendments to the Immigration Act.

In this bill he provided for extensive management and enforcement measures but virtually ignored humanitarian considerations. Most serious, he did not take any steps to provide for an appeal on the merits for refugees whose applications are rejected.

The Refugee Board is not perfect and without a fair appeal process the system is seriously flawed. As an alternative, why did the minister not clarify and provide objective criteria for the use of section 114, the admission of refugees on humanitarian and compassionate grounds? This useful provision has been virtually shut down by this minister as a means of appealing deserving cases. During the past year only four out of 889 of these applications were accepted in Quebec and only 16 out of 2,288 in Ontario.

I ask the minister of immigration to put more balance in his bill and provide for a fair appeal process.

* * *

[Translation]

QUEBEC FEDERATION OF LABOUR

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier-Sainte-Marie): Mr. Speaker, in Vancouver last week, the Quebec Federation of Labour decided to split from the Canadian Labour Congress.

This decision came as a result of the CLC's refusal to recognize the QFL's specific role in representing the workers of Quebec.

This is just one more instance that proves Quebecers must have their own institutions to become complete masters of their own destiny and become full participants in international organizations.

The QFL realizes that after many attempts, by both sides I agree, there is a total lack of compatibility between Canadian organizations and Quebec organizations. This decision will make it possible eventually to create a single labour congress in Quebec and will encourage Quebecers to take similar action in all areas.

* * *

[English]

INTERNATIONAL HEART HEALTH CONFERENCE

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, the International Heart Health Conference chaired by Canadian-born Dr. John Farqhuhar was held in Victoria, British Columbia, on May 24 to 28, gathering over 700 delegates.

The Conference Advisory Board issued a declaration that clearly states that our nation has the capacity to drastically reduce the incidence of heart disease and stroke.

Canadians will be able to achieve this if we reinforce our commitment to maintaining the cornerstones of good heart health, good dietary habits, tobacco-free lifestyles, regular physical activity, and a supportive psycho-social environment.

I am sure all hon. members will join me in congratulating the Conference Advisory Board, including Senator Dr. Wilbert Keon, representing the Canadian Cardiovascular Society on the board, for its efforts in improving heart health world-wide.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRADE

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Yesterday the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism said in this House he could not make a premature disclosure as to the contents of the deal between Canada, the United States, and Mexico, and we will find out what is in the deal only after it is signed.

I want to ask the Prime Minister: Is it the policy of the government that the minister was representing when he said that the Canadian people and the House of Commons will not hear anything about the deal until it is signed?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the hon. Leader of the Opposition appreciates it but he is mis-stating and distorting the facts.

We have been quite open in presenting to this House various positions we have been taking in the North American free trade negotiations. There have been extensive meetings with his caucus representatives and the chief negotiators. We have also had extensive meetings with the various industry sector groups which are advising us on the negotiations.

As my hon. friend the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism has said, the final details cannot be known until the final negotiations are completed. We have been very open in a variety of ways of making sure that people do understand the clear objectives we have and some of the specific negotiating issues we are dealing with.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the minister or the Prime Minister. I would like to ask them what they are proposing at this time when they say the people are being consulted. We are talking to some premiers who are complaining bitterly because they have not heard anything from the government, let alone the people. Provincial governments have not heard anything from the government.

If this government thinks we will be faced with a fait accompli the government has another thought coming because we will not tolerate that.

If the government does not want to take this House into its confidence about this deal, will the government at least make the commitment that when it has signed this deal between Canada, the U.S. and Mexico, that it will authorize a committee of this House to have public hearings before this House is confronted with a vote. The Canadian people are entitled at least to be heard before we vote in this House.

• (1420)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, let me direct my response to the two things that the hon. member has raised.

First of all, as far as the provinces are concerned, we have had something like 35 meetings with the provinces over the last year on the issues. My hon. friend is, I am sure, referring to statements that were made by some premiers who were not aware. They had not been briefed or they chose not to acknowledge that they had been briefed on the results of these meetings. I have seen members of the provincial governments express their deep appreciation for the way that we have consulted with them and taken into account their views.

On the question of the activities of this House prior to the signing of an agreement, there will be every opportunity for a committee of this House to take the initialled agreement, have hearings on that initialled agreement, take the advice of various interested parties, parties that have been involved in the negotiation through the sectoral advisory process, and in that way the views of Canadians will be heard before the deal would be signed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, promises of the kind the minister just made tend to be received with some scepticism by Canadians, because during the last election campaign, the Prime Minister and the government made a very firm commitment to introducing adjustment programs for Canadian workers and companies. Three and half years later, none of these programs has been implemented. My question is directed to the minister or the Prime Minister. Before making any commitments under the new agreement with the United States and Mexico, does the government intend to introduce adjustment programs for Canadian workers, and will it do so immediately, and not by way of an election promise but by introducing legislation in this House, before the government is defeated by Canadian voters?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have to say this a second time, but my hon. friend is totally mis-stating what we have done as a government.

My hon. friend refers to what we said we would do at the time of the free trade agreement with the United States. We appointed a commission headed by Jean de Grandpré. It had representatives from the business community and the labour community. This committee made recommendations to the Government of Canada to increase the amount of training. This has been done.

My colleague has said a number of times that we have increased training from $1.4 billion to $1.8 billion. We have launched the Canadian Labour Force Development Board with representatives from labour and business to advise the government on the use of these training funds.

It was the policy of his party to delay the legislation that was going to implement the recommendations of the de Grandpré committee. If he is worried about—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Yesterday, in asking questions about what was in the agreement and what was not in it with reference to subsidies, the Minister of State for Small Businesses replied: "The government will announce what is in the agreement when it is signed".

Let me ask the Minister of International Trade, who says that is not the government's position, two questions:

In defending the existing free trade agreement with the United States, the government invariably points to the dispute settlement mechanism. Yet that mechanism, the centrepiece of the free trade agreement, is on the table in the current trilateral negotiations as the North American Free Trade Agreement supersedes the FTA.

Are United States negotiators seeking to water down the dispute settlement mechanism? Is that a price Canada will have to pay for a North American free trade agreement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): No, Mr. Speaker, it will not be the price that Canada has to pay, to use my hon. friend's words.

I also use the words that he used before, right after the last election when he said "every sparrow that falls will be blamed on the free trade agreement". Here is another sparrow that he is throwing out into the air right now. My hon. friend should know that in this agreement, as in any trade negotiation, nothing is agreed until everything is agreed.

I have responded to his questions. The chief negotiator has responded to his questions in the briefings that he is receiving. The openness that this government has demonstrated to the opposition parties and others in discussing what the negotiations are designed to achieve is totally different from anything that his government or previous Liberal governments have ever done in terms of letting Canadians know about what they are planning to negotiate or not negotiate in any trade negotiations.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the minister finds my ornithological metaphors so pleasing, but they do not in fact answer the question that I am asking, nor has he answered the question that I just put to him: Is the dispute settlement being renegotiated or not? However, the minister declines to answer that so let me move on to another question.

A major omission in the existing Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement is the absence of provisions regarding financial services on the one hand and government procurement on the other. Indeed, the government justified its entry into the current North American free trade negotiations to correct those and other anomalies in the free trade agreement.

Since the minister claims that he is seeking to improve the free trade agreement in the current North American negotiations, will there be provisions in the North American free trade agreement regarding financial services and regarding government procurement?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the answer to that question is yes and yes.

Let me just respond to the question that my hon. friend raised about the dispute settlement mechanism. We have made it very clear right from the start of these negotiations that things that were negotiated in the free trade agreement with the United States will not be renegotiated in the NAFTA agreement unless they can be improved upon. That certainly applies to the dispute settlement mechanism which was a centrepiece of our acceptance of the free trade agreement with the United States and has been a centrepiece in the success of the free trade agreement since that time.

With regard to financial services and procurement, these matters are both under negotiation. We have made it clear in both cases what our objectives are. In the case of procurement, if we are able to get a Uruguay round success at the same time, the procurement package will be a considerably larger one and a very attractive one as far as Canadian industry is concerned.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

The minister has said that Canadians will not know what is in the deal until it is signed. We even do not know the official statistics on this government's assessment and Canadians' assessment of the Canadian–U.S. trade deal and yet the government is taking us blindly into a trade deal when all we do know is that we have lost almost a half a million jobs because of the Canada–U.S. trade deal.

The minister has said that he is going to go out to Canadian business and ask it to help sell the deal. I remind the minister that just before the Canada–U.S. trade deal was signed the same multinational corporations in their campaign said: "Okay, what's in it for me: More jobs, better jobs, more wealth to improve government services such as day care and direct personal benefits. You will find that the average food bill for a family of four will go down $100 a year".

Is that the kind of promises that the minister wants business to go out and sell? Canadians know better. Why does the minister not do the right thing and, rather than trying to sell a bad deal, pull out of these negotiations and give Canadians a real birthday present.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I guess my hon. friend is still the spokesperson for the Canadian Labour Congress, but I think she has got her figure wrong. Rather than the 500,000 jobs that she stated were lost, the Canadian Labour Congress figures it is 1.4 million. She should get her figures right. Both of these figures are wildly out of perspective.

As I have said on many occasions if we have a record level of exports to the United States, if exports are up something like 5 per cent or 6 per cent since the free trade agreement came into force, how is it that is causing us lost jobs in Canada? It is the reverse. The free trade agreement with the United States is helping this economy through a difficult period. The $5 billion or $6 billion increase in exports translates into something like 75,000 or 85,000 incremental jobs since 1988 as a result of the free trade agreement.

• (1430)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I would suggest that the minister talk to those thousands and indeed millions of Canadians who are out of work. We have 1.75 million Canadians out of work. Then he will get the straight goods. Then he will know what the economic policies and trade policies of this government have done to Canadians.

I want to say it has been clear from the beginning of the negotiations of the Canada–U.S. trade deal and now the NAFTA deal that there are parallel talks going on in other areas. This government has repeatedly said that these trade deals do not affect social policies.

We saw the generic drug bill that was passed before the Canada–U.S. trade deal. Now the immigration bill which was introduced clearly indicates that there is a move toward harmonization of immigration policies with the United States.

I want to ask the minister responsible whether it is the intention of this government to continue drawing Canada into the United States by harmonizing Canada's immigration policy with that of the United States?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would be well advised, instead of standing up and making such a statement, to read the projected bill, try to inform herself and try not to mistake the position of the government, and then maybe we can answer an intelligent question.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, all we would like is an intelligent answer.

I have a supplementary question for the minister. Last September, as the minister knows, senior officials of the Canadian government met with senior officials of the Mexican and U.S. governments to discuss harmonization of refugee and immigration policy.

I want to say to the minister that Canada has had a long and proud history of admitting immigrants and refugees to this country on the basis of need, and not on the basis of wealth. I want to ask the minister whether it this government's intention to change those principles simply to cater to the needs of the United States, or whether there is going to be some sovereignty in Canada in developing our own immigration and refugee policies?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): No, Mr. Speaker. This is about furthering the view of the United Nations that the problem of genuine refugees is an international problem.

By the way, that is probably why today the United Nations high commission representative in Canada issued a communiqué endorsing fully the provisions of this bill fine-tuning our refugee determination process.

These people seem to look at the refugee determination system as an immigration problem. This is not an immigration problem. This is an undertaking by Canada to the world as a signatory of the UN Geneva convention to give protection to those people who need it. We are trying to exert Canada's influence throughout the world in order to give real protection to those persons who really need protection.

* * *

SOFTWOOD LUMBER

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

On May 11 the minister stated in this House: "If the United States does not allow the softwood issue to go to the dispute settlement mechanism panel then it will be a very serious thing".

Yesterday the U.S. Coalition for Fair Lumber Imports stated that the issue does not come under the free trade agreement and therefore is not subject to chapter 19 of the agreement.

What is the government's plan to avoid the issue being settled solely by American law?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, our plan is quite simply to file a joint request by the Government of Canada, the provinces and the industry for a hearing under chapter 19 of the dispute settlement mechanism. That has been done. We expect that the hearing will commence next month. The process will continue until we get a conclusion.

What Mr. Howlett said and what we say are totally at odds. We are a party to an action under the dispute settlement panel. Mr. Howlett is on the other side of it. Obviously he is going to say everything he can to try to disrupt that process. But the process is proceeding.

[Translation]

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary. What the minister just said merely adds to the current uncertainty among softwood lumber manufacturers.

Again, I want to ask the minister whether this question will be subject to chapter 19 of the free trade agreement, and will it be referred to the dispute settlement panel, yes or no?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology and Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend had his next question prepared before he heard my answer.

What I said in my response was that we have already filed an application under chapter 19. The application will start being heard next month. It will follow the process from there to a final conclusion, which as I said before we are confident we will be able to win.

What Mr. Howlett said and the facts and the process are completely at odds with each other. He obviously has an axe to grind as the chief spokesman of our opponents on this issue.

* * *

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister or acting minister of multiculturalism and citizenship.

This morning a unanimous report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons recommended that the Court Challenges Program be reinstated. I salute government members of the committee for having the courage to admit that the government made a mistake.

Will the government accept the advice of this parliamentary committee and reinstate this program?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the program was terminated because initially it was intended to provide a base for the establishment of jurisprudence in a number of cases.

The government felt that had been done and that obviously, in a period of strict budgetary restraint, if the purposes of the program had been fulfilled it might be wise to review that program and abolish it. That is what we did in the last budget.

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the unanimous report from the committee does not agree with the minister.

The Court Challenges Program is being forced to close its door in September. The committee's report calls on the government to make a public statement of its intentions within the next 60 calendar days.

Will the minister agree to such a report confirming government support of this program before the program closes?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister responsible will be looking at the report very closely. Along the lines of our normal procedures the government will respond to the report in due course.

* * *

EXTRADITION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns yesterday's decision of the U.S. Supreme Court that makes a mockery of extradition treaties which have been signed by the United States.

In welcoming this decision the United States Attorney General William Barr said: "Our general policy remains co-operation where possible with foreign governments".

Will the minister now send a clear message to the United States government that this Rambo-style, vigilante kidnapping is not acceptable anywhere in the world and that it is a flagrant breach of international law?

Will she immediately seek an exclusionary amendment to the Canada-U.S. extradition treaty to ensure the United States agents can never get away with this in Canada?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, Canada was an intervener in the case that led to this decision as it came before the court.

We continue to believe that the appropriate way for U.S. authorities to obtain custody of a criminal suspect is through a request to authorities of other countries, to Canadian authorities for example, under the extradition treaty that exists between our two countries.

• (1440)

Any attempt to abduct someone from Canadian territory we would continue to regard, as we have in the past, as a criminal act.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I wonder how the United States would feel if Canada ignored the treaty, sent the Mounties down to Washington, New York or Kennebunkport, seized an American citizen and brought him back to Canada for trial. I do not think it would accept that and neither should we.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. Will the Prime Minister now stand up for Canadian sovereignty, tell George Bush that U.S. extradition requests will be put on hold and that not one FBI or DEA agent will set foot on Canadian territory until this monstrous ruling has been overturned?

Will the Secretary of State for External Affairs do the right thing and seek an amendment of the treaty now?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, this is not a presidential decision. It was a court decision by the Supreme Court. Canada will continue to insist that the extradition treaty in force between Canada and the U.S. is the only method for obtaining the custody of fugitives between our two countries. We will express that in the strongest possible terms.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I do not feel that the minister's answer is sufficient.

This is an affront to all nations. It allows the United States to come into Canada, abduct Canadian citizens that it suspects of having committed an offence in the United States, and take them back to the United States for trial. It is a complete abandonment of the principles of the extradition treaties.

What I would like to know from the minister is: What is she prepared to do to bring this matter before the World Court for a full and proper hearing?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is very clear that this was a judicial decision in the United States.

I have said that we are going to continue to make our case in the strongest possible way. We have done it in the past; we intervened in a case. We will do so in the future in whatever avenues are open to us.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, this is a flagrant abuse of international law. As we speak there are Canadians who are at severe risk.

One such Canadian is Mr. Ken Walker of Richmond Hill who was taken advantage of by the Americans in a sting operation. He is still wanted in the United States although he has not broken any laws.

This morning he called the minister's department and said that he had concern about this ruling. He was told by the minister's department: "We understand your concern. Call your local police". That is a callous response to a man who is in tremendous difficulty as a result of this ruling.

What is the government going to do to protect Canadian sovereignty and the safety of Canadian citizens?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, and so does Mr. Walker if he wants to get into specific cases, that this government has acted on behalf of Mr. Walker as we have acted on behalf of other Canadians who are in difficulty in whatever country they may be in, including the United States.

This is a Supreme Court decision. We will stick by our stand, which the United States does not accept. We will pursue in every avenue we can that extradition is the only way in which to proceed.

* * *

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The minister knows certainly that Canadians throughout the country were very disappointed last week when his discussions with the provinces broke off and the minister could not reach a successful conclusion.

I would ask him to give us today in the House a report on the status of the negotiations. Second and more important, what step does he intend to contemplate next to solve the constitutional crisis?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, Canadians should not be disappointed that the process which yielded so many gains on the constitutional front was not able in that stage to get everything done.

From our point of view, there were four major questions remaining: an agreement on the Senate; an agreement on the amending formula; an agreement on reducing barriers to trade within Canada; and a means to bring us together on the basic questions relating to aboriginal Canadians.

There are ongoing conversations. I am quite encouraged by the people with whom I have been speaking, with their forthcoming nature and particularly the willingness to consider models of Senate reform which may lead us to an agreement on that question.

If the provinces continue to be forthcoming on those issues, we may well be able to get a breakthrough. If I have other plans to report to the House, I will certainly do that.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the minister for mentioning the four major areas that remain to be finalized.

I know that many, I would even say most, Quebecers hope that very soon proposals on renewed federalism will be forthcoming that will be acceptable to both the Parliament of Canada and a majority of the provincial legislatures.

My question to the minister is this: Do the areas that remain to be finalized include changes in the amending formula that would give Quebec a veto in the future? Is the minister prepared to give us the assurance that this very important point, which was part of Quebec's original demands, will be respected and that we can expect a positive response from the Canadian government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): In fact, on the basis of our discussions so far, Mr. Speaker, agreement could be reached on an amending formula where the Supreme Court is concerned. This is an important step, and even the premier of Newfoundland and the government of Alberta made it clear they agreed with this proposal.

Two major aspects remain: the Senate and the status of the provinces. I think we would be more likely to reach an agreement on an amending formula once we have agreed on the Senate.

That is why we are now discussing with the provinces a number of formulas that might give us an agreement on the Senate. However, it is up to the provinces to demonstrate their own flexibility and their determination to reach an agreement.

* * *

[English]

BREAST CANCER

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. As he well knows, breast cancer is now at almost epidemic proportions. This fact was underscored yesterday in this House with the tabling of a parliamentary committee report on the disease.

I would like to ask the minister again: Will the government consider making increased funding for breast cancer research a priority and will it do that by shifting existing spending?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I want to say first that the report tabled yesterday represents very good work. Of course, I have not yet had the time to look at all the recommendations that I want to do.

In terms of breast cancer, we will have to put more emphasis not only on breast cancer but also on other health issues. We are close to getting a report on foetal alcohol syndrome. The Hearn report on medical devices is coming too. We also have the drugs management report by Gagnon. All those reports have something in common: They deal with the health of women.

I would like to say to the House today, after one year as minister of health, I want to consider all issues dealing with the health of women. Those issues have to be seen in a particular perspective and it is that which I want to apply to breast cancer. If there is any way we can put more money toward breast cancer research and it is useful to do so, we will.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, this year in Canada over 14,000 women will be diagnosed with breast cancer and 5,000 women will die of it.

The subcommittee tabled its report on breast cancer yesterday. It found that breast cancer research in this country is grossly underfunded. The committee made one particular recommendation, that the federal government allocate $2 million to establish a Canadian breast cancer foundation.

• (1450)

I want to ask the minister of health specifically: Will he implement that recommendation and will he do it immediately?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in light of what I said before, I believe the member will allow me to consider all of the report and not just answer her recommendation today.

I repeat what I said. I said that if we believe it is the report's position that money is not sufficient in terms of breast cancer research, we will consider that possibility.

I am sure she knows there is no ceiling set in terms of money for research in cancer. It depends on the quality of projects presented to NHRDP or to the Medical Research Council. If we have good projects, I want to examine the money which is allocated. If we can do something, we will put more money into research for breast cancer.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the fact of the matter is the total allocation in the last budget year for breast cancer research from this government to the MRC was $849,000. That is abysmal and so is the track record of the department on women's health issues. I have mentioned the IUD, thalidomide, Depo-Provera, and breast implants.

Every two hours in Canada another Canadian woman dies from breast cancer. We do not have the time for more reviews. The study has been done. Will the minister implement it?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I said. I said that we should consider women's health issues in a different manner than we have so far. It may be that for too long that question has been seen in a man's perspective. I do not disagree with that, but we are saying we will put $1 million toward breast cancer and other health problems with women. I want to look at the options. If there is a necessity to provide more money, we will.

* * *

CYPRUS

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

After the minister's recent visit to Cyprus I am sure it is clear to her and to the government that if Canada withdraws its peacekeeping forces it is going to just help one side and at the same time hurt the other. That is not the basis to encourage a peaceful, just and viable solution to the Cyprus problem.

Will the minister confirm for the House that Canada will not withdraw nor will it reduce its peacekeeping forces on Cyprus until there is a peaceful, just and viable solution?

Will she also confirm for the House that Canada is prepared to apply the same standard of support for the UN Cyprus resolutions as it was prepared to apply for the United Nations Kuwait resolutions?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in dealing with the Cyprus issue it would be very difficult to make a commitment that we would stay until there is a negotiated settlement.

We have been in Cyprus for 28 years. We are very encouraged at the moment by the progress being made. Part of this is a result of having pointed out to the Secretary General earlier this winter that the Secretary General and the parties involved had a responsibility to come to a peaceful solution and Canada would not make a commitment to be there forever. Even the patience of Canadians runs out.

We are encouraged by the progress that has been made since then and with the changes going on in that region, with some of the parties involved, and how their interests are reflected.

We think the forthcoming discussions will be useful in making progress in Cyprus. We encourage the Secretary General to continue and also the parties involved to accept their responsibility for peace among their people in their region.

* * *

[Translation]

TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister of Communications quoted observations made by the chairman of the CRTC and me on competition among telephone companies, but he did not take a position or answer questions on behalf of his government. I repeat my question concerning consumers:

Is the minister prepared to assure us that the CRTC's decisions will have no negative impact on consumers and on residential customers and that local rates will not go up? Yes or no.

An hon. member: Good question.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend raises the question of the position of consumers with regard to the CRTC decision. I suppose the best source might be Mr. David Simpson, the executive director of the Consumers' Association of Canada who said: "We could have written this decision ourselves it came so close to what business and consumers were looking for". This is from the spokesman on behalf of the Consumers' Association of Canada.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I guess the minister has not been able to think about what he would like to say for himself and his government. I would like to ask him a supplementary.

Because this government has failed to pass legislation that will guarantee 80 per cent Canadian ownership and control of domestic telephone companies, including resellers, there is a threat of Americanization of our system since the CRTC opened up new areas of competition.

Given that the minister has made sovereignty a key policy of his new legislation, will he now move to pass those sections of Bill C–62 that will safeguard Canadian ownership of this key economic sector?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I will go even further than that. I very much appreciate the endorsement by the Liberal Party of Canada of Bill C–62. I think we should not just pass certain sections of the bill but we should pass the whole bill as quickly as possible.

* * *

EMERGENCY PREPAREDNESS CANADA

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Defence.

For a long time rumours have been flying around fast and furious to the effect that the Emergency Preparedness Canada training centre was going to be moved out of the town of Arnprior.

Last week the Minister of Supply and Services, our regional minister, clarified the situation by stating in a letter that the training centre will remain in Arnprior.

Will the Minister of the National Defence tell us today when we can expect the construction of the long-promised new residential building to be built at Arnprior?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, in the latest budget, all responsibilities for civil defence were transferred to the Department of National Defence. All procedures, including infrastructure, are under review.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, my next question is for the Minister of Public Works.

The property and facilities on which this nationally used Emergency Preparedness Canada training centre is located is the property of Public Works Canada.

Can the minister inform this House whether or not the total plans for the new residential building, which was supposed to be up and operating by December 1990, are now ready for presentation to Treasury Board and are they planned for Arnprior?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the whole question is covered in the first answer.

* * *

[English]

CLIMATE

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who signed on behalf of Canada the convention for climate change at the earth summit. It regrettably contains no targets or timetables for reductions.

Since Canada publicly committed to stabilize all greenhouse gas emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000 in Geneva almost two years ago, would the Prime Minister tell this House what Canada's emissions were in 1990 so that Canadians can know what that means by the year 2000?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that work has been undertaken to make a determination on the baseline level of information that will be the object of some discussion at the next meeting of the Canadian Council of the Ministers of Environment which will be held sometime next November.

I should also point out to the hon. member that the Prime Minister indicated not only would Canada sign the treaty but we would also ratify it within the year. We would also encourage other countries to enter into a prompt start process by which we could go out there and apply the dispositions of the treaty.

ENDANGERED SPECIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the Prime Minister who also signed the convention on biodiversity to protect plants and animals.

Would the Prime Minister tell this House what steps will be taken to protect the 227 endangered species of wildlife in Canada, a whopping 13 per cent increase since last year, that are on the brink of extinction? What is the Prime Minister going to do for the short-horned lizard, the phantom orchid, the white-headed woodpecker or the High Arctic beluga whale? Anything?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, given my hon. friend's interest in the environment and his presence in Brazil, I thought that he would have wanted to invite the House to join in a very genuine round of applause for the Minister of the Environment for his tremendous leadership.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: This was clearly an oversight by my hon. friend. He mentioned the endangered species, which range from the beluga whale to the NDP, I suppose.

My friend raises a very serious question. The Minister of the Environment has indicated that the government is participating in post-Rio conferences with specific plans to deal precisely with the very legitimate question raised by my hon. friend.

I think that as he participates in these post-Rio conferences, initiated by Canada, he will feel the same sense of pride that he did in Rio as he watched the Minister of the Environment and other parliamentarians guide the Canadian delegation, I think quite successfully.

* * *

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of the Hon. Gilbert R. Clements, Minister of the Environment and Minister of Finance for the province of Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, during Question Period, in answering a question by the hon. member for Yukon, I used the words "intelligent question".

This did not translate what I actually meant. I do not want to impute that the hon. member is not an intelligent person. I should have used the word "pertinent". That is what I meant. If I caused any heartache, or whatever, to the hon. member I wish to apologize.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

SUPPLY

CONCURRENCE IN MAIN ESTIMATES, 1992-93

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle (p. 12117).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate at one o'clock there were seven minutes left in the question or comments period. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants had the floor.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, after the very eloquent address this morning of the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, I was directing a question to him when time ran out just as I was posing the question.

Since we both came here many moons ago in the class of '65, and although there were some younger members honoured yesterday because of the class of '68, I was calling upon him to give his views—perhaps not necessarily those of his party, but from his own parliamentary experience—as to the state of the constitutional discussions. Does he see a danger in trying to come up with some type of an agreement? It might not find favour all across the country, and may not be in a form where it can be presented to the time clock that is ticking in Quebec.

From his point of view, what would happen, because Quebec has that law that there has to be a referendum in Quebec, if that referendum proceeds on a very clear question as to whether Quebec wants to stay in Canada—and of course we do not frame that question—and what would be his view if that question proceeded on the basis that we cannot put an agreement to Quebec before that October deadline?

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked me if I would put forward my views even though they may not be the views of my party.

I want to say to him that any views I give are those of my own party and vice versa because I do have my say within our party caucus and discuss the matter with my caucus members. I do not go off giving views that do not belong to the Liberal Party of Canada. That is called unity and that is what we are talking about in this entire debate.

To address the several questions which the member has just put to me, I want to say that if I were to give him the answer the minister opposite, who is handling the constitutional questions at the present time and federal-provincial relations, would really thank me for giving him the precise answers. If I were to come up with all the answers for the government at this time I would probably be the most famous Canadian going.

To ask me to tell everybody else what is going to happen in the days ahead is a little bit unfair because if we had the answers we would be going in that direction.

I said in my speech this morning that the rhetoric has to be toned down on this issue. I also said that the demands have to be toned down from all angles and that flexibility must improve across the country.

Parliament could be recalled this summer—the option is open—and we could debate the constitutional proposals or whatever. We could also be here to discuss whether or not we are having a referendum. But to say that if I had the answers I could give them now, anything else that I might say would disrupt the very sensitivity of the items that are being discussed now.

The member mentioned our long tenure here in Parliament. My long tenure in Parliament tells me not to disrupt an already sensitive situation. What I have said is that we must have the political will and the determination to handle this situation. This morning I said there is no such thing as failure. I also said that every person in this House, on both sides of this House, must make it their business to see to it that the constitutional issue is settled and that we can get on with the economy and the other great interests of this nation.

Let me remind everybody that there is far more to lose by standing aloof and making great demands of our own by individual groups or organizations than there ever will be to gain.

All Canadians and this Parliament must come together. We are a nation known as negotiators. We now have to negotiate to put this Constitution together and we are not going to do it if we are going to go off in 10 different directions at the same time. Now is the time to prove our mettle.

I want to say once more, in reply to the hon. member, as I said this morning, that 112,000 young Canadians are lying in cemeteries abroad, in Korea and throughout Europe, 18, 19, 21 and 24 years of age. They fought for this country and they fought for the free world. If we do not come to grips and unite this nation at this time as did the Fathers of Confederation, the Baldwins, the Lafontaines, the Georges-Etienne Cartiers and the Macdonalds, and all those great statesmen who followed on in the 20th century, then we are not only failing those 112,000 young Canadians who died in the name of freedom, we are losing faith with those who built this country in the beginning.

• (1510)

I say to members on both sides of the House and to the hon. member who asked me the question: We must have the political will to face up to this issue, to sit down and negotiate and bring the Constitution of Canada into fruition for years to come. We have the ability to do it. We must not lose it.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to enter into debate today on the motion to concur in the Main Estimates of the government, the spending estimates of the government.

It gives me an opportunity to raise a number of concerns in this House about issues across the country and in particular around some of the particular spending plans or lack of spending plans by the Government of Canada as they relate to my riding in northern British Columbia.

It is a good opportunity to do that today. The minister of forests is encouraging me to mention forestry in a few comments which of course I will be pleased to do. I would do that in encouragement to the minister. I know he is going to hang on my every word today about the importance of forestry to our area.

There are a couple of areas I would like to mention. I am pleased that the minister is here because a couple of the issues affect the community for which we share representation. I know he will be taking notes. I hope he will follow up on these as I have already done to the minister in writing.

In particular on forestry, just a bit of a nudge to the minister. He knows there have been discussions in Prince George regarding the Forestry of Canada Research Centre located in Prince George currently on the federal government experimental farm which unfortunately, from the federal government's point of view, through attrition and cuts and transfers really is being slowly chopped away to the point where most unfortunately we may lose a real presence by the federal government in terms of a role in agricultural policy and research. There have been many transfers of officials to Kamloops.

I am afraid we are going to reach a point in this operation where to some degree the government is going to say there is nothing left. It will then be in a position where it will have to close the whole shop down. That would be most unfortunate.

I know the minister is aware of that. He is aware of it from a departmental point of view as well, given the location on the experimental farm site near the airport in Prince George and the discussions I have had, and I know he has had, about attempting to relocate that facility to the new campus of the University of B.C. where I was pleased to attend the sod-turning with Premier Harcourt and of course the first convocation of the newest university in Canada. The minister of forests was present as well.

That is really great news for Prince George and the whole region of northern British Columbia. It is important because of what the minister's department can do in making a contribution to the operation of that university. I am talking specifically about the transfer of the Forestry Canada operations now on the experimental farm to the university site. There is a close co-operation that can be held with the collection of research capability and learning at the campus and also of course with the project locating right nearby which the minister has been to as well, Forests for the World, which is a display of the different tree species we have in the area. It gives the public an opportunity really to come and see just what having a forest operation is. It is located near the campus. I would urge the government and the minister to move as quickly as possible in making an announcement that we can have that Forestry Canada operation, small as it is, moved to the campus site.

The minister had appointed a committee and had promised to report some months ago. I have written to the minister to ask for more details on that and as to when we might get a decision. It is very important. It goes to the heart of what we are talking about here today. It is not grand schemes of a constitution. We are really talking about the nitty-gritty of government, some of the very basic spending plans that government can have in our ridings. I mention that as one of them.

As well, the minister should be tabling soon I hope a state of the forest report flowing from the legislation to create his department. Also, Mr. Speaker, you know as well as I do that we have expressed our concerns in this House before about the government's cuts to forestry programs across the country. I think of the FRDA program in British Columbia, which is a concern to all of us. We do not see Forestry Canada removing itself as a player in terms of co-operation that it can play with the provinces in forest renewal, in forest management. In particular following the world summit in Rio on the environment, it is all the more important that we maintain a presence, I argue, in terms of Forestry Canada. I know that is a subject of some debate and discussion on the Constitution.

I hope that in the final analysis when a discussion is held about whether we are going to have a forest department that the premiers, the Prime Minister and this House do not just throw out the work of many of us in our first days here as parliamentarians to bring forward legislation in this House to create that department. I would argue that there is probably a need today more than ever, given our demands on our forests from an international environmental perspective, for a federal forest department.

I hope at the very least in the discussions that some heed is paid to that particular issue during the constitutional debate and the debate that we are going to end up having in this House on that issue.

There is another spending issue that relates directly to forests and ties in directly with the work or the lack of it I suppose by the Minister for International Trade. That comes to the whole question of the softwood tariff dispute we have now with the United States. As you know, Mr. Speaker, I led a delegation of New Democrat MPs from the interior of British Columbia as well as my colleague from Thunder Bay in northern Ontario to Washington to meet with American legislators and officials on this issue. I think it was a very important two days. We delivered a strong message to the Americans about Canada and about our view on this issue.

We have some well known differences with this government's approach to this whole issue, but on the question of the softwood dispute we gave a united message to the Americans. I say that Canadians want to ensure that from this government they get the same message as well.

I have said on numerous occasions that it is important that we keep pressure on our own government. It is a pretty clear perception among most Canadians that this government just rolls over and plays dead whenever George Bush and the Commerce Department in Washington, D.C. basically tells it what to do. We found that in this dispute, whereas yet we have not heard a formal word from the United States, the Commerce Department or the Bush administration as to whether this whole softwood dispute can even be referred to this much vaunted dispute settlement mechanism that the minister of trade so often talks about. It is revealing of the weakness of the free trade agreement that even after three years of operation this government still has to plead with Washington, D.C. for this whole dispute to be settled by even a weak dispute settlement mechanism, which it is.

• (1520)

We have not heard the end of that yet. We may end up having a dispute over the dispute settlement of all things. It gives an indication of how much trouble we are in with this dispute. We are on the verge of perhaps the most massive trade dispute in Canadian history between our two governments. It is over an issue that is of critical importance, not just to the entire country but in particular to British Columbia which makes some 80 per cent of the softwood lumber exports to the United States.

Another issue I have raised throughout my riding and in different parts of the country is an important issue for many of the smaller communities in this country. In many cases we have to plead with different levels of government to get the kinds of services and programs we need. In many cases larger centres across the country take so much for granted. I guess I am reminded of that each day here in Ottawa where, of course, we would expect our nation's capital to have those kinds of buildings and monuments to our country and to the history of this area. However, at the same time, let us not forget the contribution made by the rural communities, the resource communities across the country. Yes, they are away from the major population centres, but they are just as deserving when it comes to government services and programs.

I am reminded in particular of a case where we were pleased to have convinced the Minister of Communications to provide some funds for an art gallery in Prince George. I would like to encourage the government to go a step further. We have to take a look at using some of the funds under the communications subagreement to help with the art gallery in Prince George.

In the election campaign in 1988 the previous government clearly rejected any federal help for a performing arts centre in Prince George. I have collected information since that election. I have been diligent at this because it was my sense that this government had spent millions of dollars elsewhere across the country on similar ventures but, of course, gave the cold shoulder to Prince George. To date that evidence shows that some $143 million in projects similar to that which we have been lobbying and working for in Prince George has been spent and authorized by this government, ranging from the Comedy Museum in Montreal. I have nothing against a good joke or project but we are just asking for our fair share.

I ask that the government give serious consideration to those proposals because that is the kind of nitty-gritty work the Government of Canada can do to show Canadians and residents of these communities that small communities are as deserving as any major population centre for the kinds of projects which bestow pride on a community for the work they have done.

We had a healthy contribution from the new Government of British Columbia for the Civic Centre complex in Prince George. That was announced on Friday. We are pleased with that. This government is prepared to spend billions of dollars on helicopters for which there is some question as to their need and yet a community that needs an art gallery and what have you is given the cold shoulder by this government. That is not good enough. We deserve and expect more.

As well there are a couple of transportation matters that are critical to ridings line mine in northern British Columbia where transportation is an important issue because of our location. I am pleased to have been able to work with community groups and others.

There is a new instrument landing system being put into Prince George, a project costing around $2 million. I am pleased to have been able to do that but we have more work to do, and I think of air strips outside of the Prince George area where in some cases we cannot even get a medivac jet in to take someone out.

If members from large urban communities would not be able to get an ambulance they would be shocked by that, yet that is what we have in many of these communities. The government has to make a commitment to provide the necessary infrastructure and programs necessary to provide these services to Canadians regardless of where we live in the country.

The finance minister at least alluded to that at the first ministers' meeting in Toronto on the economy some time ago. Prior to that he mentioned that the government has tucked away somewhere a capital projects fund.

I have written to the minister. I would like to find out a little bit about this fund. How much money does the Minister of Finance have tucked away somewhere? Is he going to spend it all in the run-up to the next election campaign as the Prime Minister was to apt to do prior to the last election campaign? Let us get some details on that capital projects fund. Let us make it public so we can see what is available and at least give communities across the country an opportunity to make representations to the minister for funds from that project.

One of those infrastructure programs on which I have been corresponding with the Minister of Finance, the Minister of Transport and the British Columbia minister of transport is the Yellowhead Highway program, which we used to have. It was a program that helped upgrade the Yellowhead Highway from my colleague's riding, Skeena, through my riding in Prince George—Bulkley Valley and down into the Kamloops area, represented by another of my colleagues.

That program was allowed to collapse and run out by this government and by the former government in British Columbia. I asked this minister in this government on behalf of the people along that highway and on behalf of the minister of transport for British Columbia, who has asked us to make representations to the government, to go ahead and hopefully renew that program.

At the earlier First Ministers' Conference that I mentioned, the Minister of Finance hinted at a national highways network. When a Minister of Finance is hinting at something like that we should take him up on it. However it is his turn, we have taken him up on the offer to renew this program. I now want to hear from the minister and this government whether they really are committed to an infrastructure program that can help rebuild those transportation arteries which we require all across the country.

I hope that before this House rises for its summer break the minister can make that kind of announcement to give some assurance to Canadians and the people in northern B.C. that this very important transportation link has the attention of the Government of Canada and will be dealt with, approved, and renewed in the near future.

I mentioned airports and air transportation. I mentioned highways, and the unique federal role in this particular issue, one which I do not think is thought of much in western Canada. When I drive on any of the roads in eastern Canada I note that there is significant federal presence in working with the provinces in highway reconstruction. We just ask for the same in northern British Columbia. I do not think it is asking too much for this government to treat one end of the country the same as the other.

I would like to conclude with an appeal to the government to please make up its mind about VIA Rail remote services. There is a run from Prince Rupert to Prince George to Jasper. This government said on October 4, 1989 that it would make a decision on this run. It has been announcing that it would be soon making decisions on this. We have been patient while waiting for the government to make a decision.

I appeal to the Minister of Transport and the government to make up their minds as soon as possible. Do not sit around and wait. We do not want to wait for an election campaign for good news, we will take the good news announcements now. I ask the government to get off whatever royal seat the government is on and make up its mind about this very important issue in our area.

• (1530)

It is an opportunity to provide that valuable transportation link. I have used this opportunity in the House to raise a number of important issues concerning the nitty-gritty of government spending and planning. I hope the government will take heed of some of these measures and make some positive announcements for all of us. It is a case of many communities asking and fighting for their fair share.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to make some comments on the 1992-93 Main Estimates for Agriculture Canada.

I would like to begin by presenting a few facts about the agrifood industry. In Canada, agriculture and food and beverage processing contributes some $50 billion to the economy every year. Food processing is the second largest component in Canadian manufacturing after automobiles, and the agrifood sector accounts for about 10 per cent of our total exports.

These are impressive figures that clearly demonstrate the importance of the agrifood sector to all Canadians. However, in this 125th year of Confederation Canada's agrifood producers are facing some of the greatest challenges in the industry's history.

The world economy is growing increasingly globalized and interdependent. New trading blocs are forming and more and more countries are entering the international marketplace.

The opportunities for Canada in this environment are enormous. Already an exporting country, we have the natural resources, the human resources and the technology to build on our strong trading base. However, if our agrifood producers are going to capitalize on these advantages they must move quickly to diversify and become more efficient and more competitive. They must adopt new technologies, new methods and new ways of thinking and doing business. They must put more emphasis on research and promotion, seek out new market opportunities and form new partnerships at home and abroad. They must begin to look much more closely at the long-term sustainability of the sector environmentally, economically and socially. They must do this in a time of continuing restraint, increasing competition and ongoing international trade wars.

In 1989, in an effort to help the industry adapt to changing realities, Agriculture Canada undertook the agrifood policy review in consultation with the provinces and the industry stakeholders. The review is based on four major pillars of reform: market responsiveness, regional sensitivity, self-reliance and environmental sustainability.

There has already been significant progress toward these goals. For example, the new safety net programs, GRIP and NISA, are designed to encourage greater self-reliance on the part of agricultural producers and greater income predictability.

The three-year National Farm Business Management Program announced in March is designed to increase farm business management training and to make more business information and consulting services available to farmers. The check-off legislation now before the Senate would encourage greater research and promotion by agricultural producers.

In 1992-93 Agriculture Canada's priorities will be to continue to build on the work of the policy review, to encourage continued adaptation and greater competitiveness in the agrifood sector, and to ensure improved government responsiveness to the changing needs of the industry.

The department will be working to build more effective, efficient and regionally sensitive partnerships with the provinces and the industry stakeholders.

It helps the primary and processing sectors improve their competitiveness and provides farmers with the information, services and training they need to improve their business management skills.

It helps the agrifood industry pursue new diversification opportunities; and helps maintain and develop domestic and international markets for our products through trade policy, marketing support, research and responsive regulations.

It promotes the environmental sustainability of the Canadian agrifood industry and the safety and quality of Canada's food supply.

Finally, it enhances corporate and organizational structures to better enable Agriculture Canada employees to provide quality service in response to the changing needs of the department's clients.

The federal budget contains a number of provisions which should help with these efforts. For example, the tax exemption for ethanol and methanol in gasoline blends will encourage the development and use of ethanol and methanol fuels made from feed stocks. This will not only lead to considerable new market opportunities for grain producers, it will also help to protect the environment and encourage increased producer involvement in value-added processing.

The Small Business Financing Program, which will run until the end of 1992, will help small family farm businesses in difficulty obtain loans at lower interest rates.

Tax reductions to Canadian manufacturers and processors will help to improve the competitiveness of food processors and farm input suppliers such as machinery manufacturers.

The review of Agriculture Canada regulations, in partnership with provinces and industry, will ensure that federal regulations are helping, not hindering industry adaptation.

As well, through the agrifood policy review, the department will be continuing its efforts to build a second generation of supply management and to ensure the efficiency of our transportation systems.

Through agreements like GATT and NAFTA, it will continue to work toward a more liberal and predictable international trading environment with more equitable trading rules.

The department also recognizes the need to continue to support our agricultural producers over the short term. Agriculture Canada's Main Estimates for 1992–93 total about $2.9 billion. Of this, more than $1.2 billion is being paid for GRIP and NISA and for the farms support and adjustment measure initiatives, FSAM I and FSAM II.

In the year ahead, the department will focus on improving safety net programs so that they do more to encourage industry adaptation. For instance, the provisions in FSAM I to encourage participation in GRIP and NISA are a good example of how income support spending can be used to foster greater self-reliance by agricultural producers. I would also like to note that governments are committed to extending NISA eligibility to the whole farm program.

Combined with the efforts of the federal government to stimulate economic growth through low inflation and interest rates, these initiatives should go a long way toward relieving the pressures on Canada's agrifood sector.

In fact, the 1991 census of agriculture shows that, despite the difficult economic times over the last year, we are already seeing some progress.

The census reported increased acres under cultivation since 1986, an increase in livestock production and more acreage dedicated to specialty crops, a sign that farmers are beginning to diversify.

As well, farmers are increasingly adopting more environmentally sustainable practices, with reduced use of chemicals and increased use of conservation tillage.

• (1540)

The 1992 survey of farms shows that farmers largely thought they were holding their ground financially. Some 48 per cent said their situation was the same, 13 per cent said the financial picture was better; and 38 per cent said things were worse.

In comparison, in the 1990 survey 43 per cent said their situation was the same and only 11 per cent said it was better. Some 45 per cent said their situation was worse than the year before, 6 per cent more than in the most recent survey.

The results show that farmers are more optimistic about the future. In 1990, 34 per cent thought their situation would stay the same, 19 per cent felt it would improve, and 39 per cent felt it would get worse.

In the 1991 survey 44 per cent thought things would stay the same, 25 per cent thought their situation would improve, and 23 per cent were pessimistic about the coming year.

More concrete signs of improvement can be seen in the grains and oilseeds sector which has been the hardest hit by the international subsidy wars. Wheat exports are 34 per cent higher at this point in the crop year than they were last year. Sales through the west coast have hit records every month except September.

Due to tightening world wheat supplies, especially in the United States, and greater demand from the former U.S.S.R. and China, world wheat prices have risen since the crop year began. This has resulted in higher Canadian Wheat Board initial payments. As well, we have seen higher initial payments for feed barley, designated barley and durum wheat.

I am confident that with the co-operation of all governments and with strong industry leadership we will continue to see improvements in the economic position of the agrifood industry in the years ahead.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the comments on agriculture of the hon. member for Elgin—Norfolk. I completely agree with him that there is a tremendous need for research and development in the food processing industry. If we lose the food processing industry, we lose the market for those producers.

Clearly that is one of the greatest challenges facing us with the free trade deal with the United States. There are no offsets. There is no protection as there was in the free trade deal for automobiles signed back in the sixties. Essentially we are just reducing the tariffs on processed products.

The agriculture competitiveness council recognized this in a report which it put out in January of this year. It said that we need more research, that we need to upgrade the equipment we have in the food processing industry, and that we were in a deathly competitive world with producers in Mexico, with producers in the United States, with producers in Ireland, and with producers in other countries. It emphasized the need for increased commitment by the government.

When we look over the 1992–93 estimates of the Department of Agriculture, we see that scientific research and development has been cut by 4 per cent or $11.4 million in 1992–93. Although the hon. member is talking about the right things, his government is doing the wrong things because its cutting back agricultural scientific research by 4 per cent.

If we add the 2 per cent, 3 per cent, or 4 per cent inflation that we face we see an effective cutback of probably 7 per cent or 8 per cent.

It is interesting that just before these estimates came down the Minister of Finance brought down his budget. In the agriculture competitiveness council report of January of this year, which was released slightly thereafter, it talked about the importance of the agrifood processing industry. It said that if Canada did not act immediately, if Canada did not provide very significant incentives to encourage investment in productivity enhancing activities in the agrifood sector, we would lose out. It recommended that we increase the capital cost allowance from 25 per cent to 50 per cent.

When the Minister of Finance brought in his budget he brought in a piddling 5 per cent increase. This is to save an industry of which he was the minister.

I would like to ask the member: Why is the government cutting scientific research? Why is it only providing a 5 per cent increase when the government's own agriculture competitiveness council recommended a 25 per cent increase? Why is there a cutback in agricultural research when its own competitiveness council was recommending that there be a massive increase of 200 per cent in current tax depreciation and research as recommended by its agriculture competitiveness council?

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his comments and his question. He will recognize that the policy review undertaken by the Department of Agriculture, by the former Minister of Agriculture, pointed to some of the things he has talked about: about further processing of products in Canada, not only in agriculture but other aspects of natural resources, so that we might create jobs in Canada and create that extra wealth for Canadians. I believe that is the direction the government is taking.

The hon. member talked about research and development. He thinks there have been cuts. I would tend to think that if the hon. member really took a look at it he would recognize that those dollars being spent on research and development by the federal government are under review. They will be put to greater use in the future to make sure that those dollars are wisely spent. We recognize we have to spend dollars in research and development. That is what the Minister of Finance was aiming at with his reduction in the federal budget.

I am sure the hon. member will also recognize the competitive council, in its discussions with Canadians across Canada, talked about the various things that might need some looking at such as the regulations which three departments, including the Department of Agriculture, have already started. It recognized that we needed to take a look at some of the regulations to make sure we were not hindering processing or further development in Canada.

The hon. member will recognize that the government looks at over-all expenditures. We are acting in a responsible way, trying to make sure those dollars spent are spent in a super controlled way so that we do not increase the deficit and end up with the problems we had when we took over the government in 1984.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, our side has agreed among ourselves to limiting debate to 10 minutes so that two speakers could be heard in the 20 minutes, starting with me.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent to give the opposition party the power to split the speeches?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, our twinning of the two ridings seems to be going very well. The students who returned from Your Honour's riding last week had nothing but praise for the reception they received. I hope when your students come back to our area under the 125 celebration we will be able to host them in the same way and to continue that program.

• (1550)

I rise today to talk a bit about the government's estimates, not necessarily estimates in terms of specific items as much as in terms of government spending. Our party before the budget and since the budget has put forward to the government the idea of creating jobs by putting money into infrastructure that is needed right across Canada.

Once again, I have to ask the government to see that this idea has merit. It can create jobs. It can get Canada moving again. As we look at our infrastructure, sewers, roads and various other types of infrastructure in different communities, we see what is needed to keep Canada at a certain level of ability to perform.

I know these are difficult economic times. I would just say there are probably areas this government could look at. One would be in the administration of the UI funds in terms of putting money into creating jobs rather than having to spend it on unemployment insurance or welfare rolls.

I do not see this happening. I see despair out there as to when the economy is going to turn around. When are we going to be able to use the low interest rates we have seen come down so slowly over the last while? They are down, yet the businesses are not picking up, at least in the rural areas. There does not seem to be hope or the new ideas with which the research and development we used to have in Canada might have created new jobs.

We saw in the budget the decrease in research and development. Over the years the government has cut back the Economic Council, the Law Reform Commission and the Science Council of Canada. All these areas have given greatly to Canada. I know members opposite will say that we can go somewhere else and get this research done. I heard it here this morning. Yes, we can probably go to the Americans as usual and ask for their statistics. They do not always apply to Canada because we have different values from the Americans, different values for what we feel in Canada has made us Canadian.

I want to raise another idea today. When I took part in the debate earlier I said that we have excess in our ministers' departments. We have excess in their staff and we have excess in people overseeing groups. The chief of staff who is highly paid, paid higher than a member of Parliament or higher than his minister, is he the same as the deputy minister or the assistant deputy minister? I do not understand why we need all these layers to produce something.

A very innocent example was given today in the House during Question Period. Yesterday we had an all-party report on breast cancer. The three parties agreed that cancer causes death: 5,000 women will die and 14,000 women will have breast cancer in Canada this year. These are real statistics. We do not need more studies to say that we need more research to prevent these senseless deaths from occurring in Canada.

If it were a man who had the same problem, it would probably be passed and we would not even have to ask about it in the House. It seems so ironic that the mothers of our children, the women out there today, have to live with an idea that more studies have to be done to tell the Department of National Health and Welfare that it would be a good idea to start putting some of its dollars into this, particularly when it says it has a ceiling with no limit.

I also want to raise the issue of CFB Cornwallis.

Over the last year I have seen the continuous reduction of jobs in my area. I do not have great companies in my area. I do not have ACOA that can find multitudes of businesses to bring into the area or a multitude of businesses to expand in my area. We do have CFB Cornwallis and it has provided jobs continuously for all my lifetime in that area. It has worked very effectively. It is in a cost-effective area. The taxes are not high, land is cheap, we have a ready-made harbour and ready-made facilities for any naval training. We have an airport and we have CFB Greenwood, which can work in conjunction with CFB Cornwallis. There are many reasons why CFB Cornwallis should be an ideal place for the Armed Forces.

Yet we have seen a reduction of jobs, with a further reduction of about 100 jobs contemplated within the next few weeks. We have seen businesses close and the threat of school closures. People who have been employed for years may have to face very tough times and leave their homes and area. This threat has been hanging over the people in the area for well over a year and a half.

What does CFB Cornwallis do and why is it important to the Armed Forces? Since 1968 all new recruits who speak English have been trained at CFB Cornwallis. I realize the Minister of National Defence has said as of last September the Canadian Armed Forces would be reduced to 75,000 for regular Armed Forces. This was in light of the conditions in the world, and I can quite accept that. But where are those 75,000 enlisted men going to be trained? My people are asking me where they are going.

I tell them we have the ideal facilities. We have been training since 1968. I do not know why we cannot be reassured it is going to continue, and we will be able to train new recruits for the Armed Forces across Canada. We can do militia, cadets, reserves, and we have done other training there over the years.

People look to Parliament to see what decisions are going to be made and if their future is protected. New recruits coming in from Alberta or Newfoundland want to know there is a place for them in the Armed Forces. Yet, apparently there are no new recruits coming into the Armed Forces because of whatever the policy is.

It is my understanding at the end of this month we will lose our base commander and a lieutenant-colonel will come in. It means the status of the base for new recruits will be reduced to a station. Those who have had a military base in their constituency know that somehow the government has failed to find something to put into CFB Cornwallis along with new recruits. I say that because our area is a bilingual constituency and we have a bilingual university. My people and I see no reason why we could not be training all new recruits in Canada. Certainly I cannot see why we would be even thinking of moving the English speaking new recruits anywhere else in Canada.

I have to voice these concerns to the House because we have had something and we see it slowly being lost through the reduction of jobs, the closing down of businesses, the threat of school closures and even hospitals. We have to ask ourselves if closing means when there is only one person left, then we close the area. If that is so, it is very cruel and unusual punishment to inflict.

• (1600)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Perhaps I may add just a few words. I would like to respond to the cordial remarks made by the hon. member for South West Nova and stress the superb co-operation between our two ridings, as a result of which residents of both ridings will be visiting each other this summer to create a brotherhood of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague, the member for South West Nova, which is adjacent to my riding of Annapolis Valley—Hants. I represented the riding of Annapolis Valley—Digby Annapolis—Cains, as it was called when I was first elected many moons ago and Cornwallis was very much a part of my responsibility. I certainly share the concerns she expressed here in a pretty objective way about what is happening to Cornwallis through attrition and/or ministerial decree, notwithstanding the fact there evidently is a committee on base consolidation and closures that is supposed to make recommendations.

Now we have had another statement from that committee. It is going to postpone fundamental decisions, perhaps until after the next election. I know and come from Nova Scotia too. We have had a history of servicing the services because we are never going to have the massive industries of other parts of the country. That has been part of our history and the pending closure of Cornwallis flies in the face of that.

I would like to ask the member how she feels this base closure committee is really performing. How can it objectively assess the criteria when the minister openly says there are going to be a lot more changes because only 17 per cent of the defence budget is being spent in Quebec? There are going to be changes in other parts of the country regardless of history, to make sure that is redressed. Does she feel this is the sword of Damocles hanging over the base at Cornwallis and the future is no brighter than the hon. member painted it in her remarks?

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants for his question. He expresses the concern of my constituents I run into every day as to why this is happening at CFB Cornwallis and soon to be CFS Cornwallis I guess. I have to agree, we are now going to have an infrastructure rationalization process in the ministry of national defence to look at the determined force requirements, determine infrastructure requirements and identify surplus infrastructure. That is what this MAGDI, Ministers' Advisory Group of Defence Infrastructure, said it would be doing.

I find it quite unique in the sense we are giving the Department of National Defence something I think we have never actually given up as parliamentarians, which was the exact role of National Defence in Canada. It is all right for the Department of National Defence to say what may be excess or why, but I do not think anybody should be allowed to say something is a certain way without looking at the effects it has on the community. That must be put into perspective at the Department of National Defence. The defence people are going to make the study and the decisions. At the same time the minister has said openly in committee 17 per cent is not enough of the defence budget for Quebec.

At the same time I know my people are asking why a new naval reserve is going up when we have all the facilities at CFB Cornwallis. Perhaps they are not being given the right answers. They are not being looked at. There seems to be a real dichotomy between the minister and where he sees defence going, and the Department of National Defence in its infrastructure rationalization without looking at economic realities. It could be one general prefers to have something over another general and that is who is going to have his case put before the Minister of National Defence to be reviewed. Parliament will have 30 sitting days to review and no more whenever the decision of the minister's review panel, which comes after the infrastructure rationalization process does it at defence. They are given to the minister. The minister looks at the proposals. He gives them to a review panel. The review panel hands them back to the minister. He then looks at the proposals and they come to Parliament.

By that time this great study says, get the people used to thinking they are not going to have something and then two years later you can do it.

I am saying it is not a fair way to treat Canadians. It is one thing to say you have to have an even distribution of defence dollars across Canada and that can be done perhaps in capital spending.

But we will never have tank cars built in Nova Scotia in the Annapolis Valley unless somebody decides to put a factory there with a lot of money because the centre of activity is in Ontario.

Surely we can train new recruits in the Canadian Armed Forces. We are going to have at least 50,000 enlisted men and they have to go somewhere to be trained. Why can it not be at Cornwallis? Why can this minister not give that commitment to not only South West Nova but to all Canadians?

It is the most cost-effective way. There is no way you can show me a less cost-effective way of spending our training dollars than at CFB Cornwallis.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the debate today is to indicate whether or not a member is supportive of the government's expenditure plan for 1992-93. I rise in the House to indicate the reasons why I oppose the expenditure plan and in particular reference to Winnipeg.

Members of the House will know that in the last decade Winnipeg has had a particularly difficult time. In the first part of this decade, from 1979-80 right through to the 1984 election, both Liberal members from Winnipeg stood up and worked very hard on behalf of the city.

Subsequent to that, the strategy of the federal government has been to pull out one support after another from our city. As a consequence, an expenditure plan this year does not show what can be done for Winnipeg.

The core area initiative, the most public of programs, the one in which most of us came to identify with a more optimistic future, a game plan for the city, has been taken away. It was not renewed at the end of this year when the opportunity presented itself to the federal Minister of Energy, who represents the federal government at the table.

A few weeks ago all of us watched great difficulties in our cities, from Toronto to L.A. Those of us who have downtown constituencies know the frustration felt by youth, families and the elderly as they found the city unsafe.

The one thing that distinguishes North American Liberals from North American Conservatives is whether or not we should sit back and allow this to happen, whether or not we should allow frustrations to boil over, whether or not we should tell people it is their problem and not ours.

From one generation to another, the Liberal tradition has been to stand up and fight for those people and find a solution. I personally find the expenditure plan lacking in energy and vision. Once again we see no particular plan of action for Winnipeg, or for any other big city in the country.

Canada is of a size where any government showing any sense of commitment can very quickly put together packages which do not overwhelm the treasury, to protect cities from the fundamental flaws we see in other countries. It is not good enough to sit back, watch TV and see another country or city crumble and say thank God it is not my city, province or country.

It is a chance to see what the worst signs and future can be, take the initiative and turn this around.

There are several things that can be done. I must say at the outset it is not a case of telling the government to come walking in with a big stick and big bucks and change things. No, no. The style of the 1990s must be that of partnership. There are organizations in the voluntary sector, well-meaning businesses, provincial governments and municipal governments. The field is filled with people with energy who want to make sure their cities work but they need one more actor at the table. They need a committed federal government.

• (1610)

What can the federal government bring to the table to help in the renewal of our cities that is not there now? First, the government can go back to CMHC and restore the long-standing commitment that we have to social housing and to assisting with low-rental housing across the country.

If we look at the dismal state of the housing market in this country and then look at the federal government expenditure plan, it is clear that there is a direct relationship. If the federal government, through CMHC, is not active in housing the market collapses in this country. If we want the strongest component for dealing with new Canadians who have put together non-profit housing organizations, for seniors groups and for the Lions Clubs of this country, we need the federal government to be there to finance and show direction. But no, that opportunity has been passed over.

Second, if we look at the renewal of older neighbourhoods, one of the most successful programs that we have had, I would say since the early 1970s, has been the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program, RRAP. It successfully helped low income homeowners, and in some cases landlords who were dealing in low-rental areas, restore their property so they could stay there. They continue to stay there because of the activities. Think ahead seven or eight years if there were no repairs in the inner city. Then we can just begin to imagine the worst scenes we have seen on television being a backdrop to Canadian cities.

Third, there is youth employment. Why is it impossible for the federal government to properly fund Challenge '92? Why were so many students not given the opportunity to work? In the case of the constituency of Winnipeg North Centre as many as 9 out of 10 in the category of non-profit organizations were denied an opportunity to work this summer because of underfunding of a program. If you do not have a job, how can you have hope and how can you get educated?

Fourth, changes in the unemployment insurance program have pretty well prevented aboriginal youth and many women who have been out of the work force for some time from getting proper training. Without training it is impossible to take a step forward.

Fifth is safety in the cities. There are a number of regulations and laws within the Criminal Code that can be changed. There are a number of initiatives that can be taken by the Solicitor General's office. It could start up the race relations organization that has been long promised, and nothing has ever been done. Why has something not been done to help out with the fundamental question of safety on the streets?

This is not an issue from the right wing. This is not an issue on which it is possible to say: "Oh well, it is only the law and order people who are concerned about safety". The average Canadian family living in a big city is concerned with the safety of themselves, their children and their parents. We, as a government, have an obligation to respond to this and come up with ways to design cities better, to make more functional laws and ensure that the support services are properly financed so that the basic question of personal safety is responded to more positively.

As for economic development, how can a city find its role in a new competitive world if the federal government, which is in charge of the trade arrangements and the international environment, does not take a concern with the individual cities of this country and in finding a role for the people living there in trading. What is the role of Winnipeg in the international economy? It has lost its role and it is having a difficult time understanding what it is to do. What is the expectation? How is it being helped by the federal government? There are 650,000 people living there and yet there is no plan for their economic functions.

On a much larger scale, the people of Montreal are facing the same crisis. The economic base of Montreal is very similar to that of Winnipeg. It relies upon the textile industry, the apparel industry, the construction industry, engineering and the transportation of commodities from the agricultural fields. They are all similar to components of the Winnipeg economy, and Montreal is suffering a similar collapse.

Does the government have in its expenditure plan that is under discussion today any particular points of reference to help the people of Montreal or Winnipeg? The answer is a resounding no.

If your national government decides that your problems are too small then how can you possibly begin to redevelop your own city? Where is the federal government when it comes to providing languages for new entrepreneurs in this country?

If we do want to develop trading partners in Asia, if we do want to develop partners in Eastern Europe, who has the language skills? Who has the documents in their language? Who has the ability to understand Canadian law and apply it to the international trade situation? Who is going to be supportive of the long trips over to these countries so that trade can begin?

It is not this government. That is what is sad. The expenditure plan has left out any reference to the tremendous problems facing Canadian cities. I use Winnipeg as an example but I could be talking to the House about Montreal, Toronto, or Edmonton. All these cities face a crisis, some of them somewhat different.

It is not for the federal government to come in and say: "We have the answer". However, it is up to the federal government to say: "We want to be a partner. Let us sit down at the table and let us go over a list of issues. You tell us what you need and we will help you form a better urban environment that will create jobs, create a strong economy, rebuild houses in neighbourhoods and get our cities going again".

The cities are the centre of economic energy and we must defend them.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I was listening very intently with a great deal of interest to the excellent speech given by my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I was struck by the common sense that he pronounced and the logic that he brought forward. At the basis of our Canadian society is the city itself. Therein we have the whole vehicle for our modern life in the urban context. If we allow our cities to become disorganized, to become debased, to decay and to become unruly then frankly we in this country have thrown away the very vehicle of our urban way of life.

I cannot help but think that this government is completely missing the boat when it comes to dealing with urban problems. He mentioned, and I think correctly, the violence in Los Angeles. It was a very tragic episode, not only in American history but in human history. That episode showed us that these problems have not been solved. The difficulty is ongoing, and it would seem that our governments are turning a blind eye to the problem or just do not know how to handle the situation.

From a judicial point of view, 8,000 people were arrested in the Los Angeles riots. It defies the imagination to understand how they are going to process these 8,000 people through an already crowded court system in the United States.

This is the sort of thinking that we must consider because what has happened in Los Angeles could very easily happen in Canada. We did have very unfortunate riots in Toronto as a result of a shooting incident. They gave us a clear signal that Canada is not exempt from these problems. If we do not deal realistically and strategically with the problems that exist in our cities then we are going to be faced with ever-increasing violence and disruption.

• (1620)

As the hon. member has mentioned, we must deal with the questions of housing and employment but we also have to work together at the three levels of government.

The Minister of Justice stated that she is promoting meetings and dialogue with the mayors of the major cities in Canada. Hopefully in a year's time we will have a meeting of the three levels of government, but this does not seem to me to be the response that is urgently required and that Canadians want.

The government must get in better contact with not only the problems that exist in our cities but also with the difficulties that it seems to be having in entering into a dialogue with supposedly friendly provinces and municipalities.

The situation goes much further than just the cities themselves. It goes to the thinking that seems to permeate our society today. There is a survival of the fittest attitude. Unfortunately this attitude is manifesting itself in very derogatory ways. For instance we do not seem to be doing what we should be doing for single parents and their children, ex-wives who have been separated or divorced from their husbands and are finding themselves incapable of meeting the expenses of raising their children let alone looking after their own needs.

We have a tax system that allows the ex-husband to deduct his payments to the ex-wife and children but the wife who receives the payments must pay taxes on what she receives.

We have heard that the courts and other authorities tell us that when the wives and children do get the money, it is less than half of what they need to raise the children. We are told that 12 per cent of the ex-husbands are living below the poverty line but 66 per cent of the ex-wives and families are living in poverty, even if they are receiving payments. If they do not receive the payment, that poverty level figure is increased to 75 per cent.

There must be more recognition of what needs to be done and how it is going to be done. If not then we are saying that our federal system stymies the justice and the equity that we all expect to have in this country. However, the government is not only turning away and not recognizing the problems that exist but it is also wilfully abandoning the programs that had meant so much in cementing our society, bringing people together, and giving people hope.

I just want to deal with two programs as they refer to the justice system. The first is the Court Challenges Program. We have talked to the government. We have asked questions in the House. We have asked questions in committee as to why the government would possibly do away with the Court Challenges Program. It is incredible to think that this program has been jettisoned by the government.

It is a program that cost $2.4 million. Certainly $2.4 million is a considerable sum of money, but we should consider that this program allowed disadvantaged and poor people to be able to take their perceived injustices and questions to court. Not everybody was given financing, but if it was determined that their case was something that needed to be brought forward and needed to be determined, viewed and questioned then the organizing group gave them funding of up to a maximum of $35,000 toward their legal fees.

This has been of immeasurable help to us. Not only has it helped disadvantaged people, visible minorities, single mothers, and aboriginal people but it has brought forward a good body of law. It helped us to enrich the body of law that we so proudly speak about in this country.

We have had court decisions that have resulted from the Court Challenges Program such as the Butler case, in which it was determined by a vote of nine to nothing that the obscenity rules in this country were directly related to violence against women and violence against the family. This now allows us to proceed, I would have hoped faster than we have, with tougher pornography laws, in particular, so that we can protect our children from this degrading and abusive form of material.

Also, we are doing away with our Law Reform Commission which has been the genesis of a great deal of our legal thinking. We have talked about the various bills in this House. We have discussed cases where in at least 44 recent Supreme Court decisions the Law Reform Commission was cited as being the origin of the particular legal thinking.

We now have Bill C–46 before the House, the contraventions bill. In 1976, it was the Law Reform Commission that requested this. The government first brought it forward in 1986 and finally we have the legislation that we have today.

It seems the government is determined to do it, but if we do away with our Law Reform Commission then Canada will be one of three Commonwealth countries without a law reform commission. We will be joining Zimbabwe and Bangladesh as the only three Commonwealth countries without a law reform commission.

Quebec is now in the process of setting up a law reform commission. This will mean that all provinces in Canada have a law reform commission, but the federal government does not. It is a travesty in a federal system that we would abandon this role and not consider our law more important than we have.

I think I have 20 minutes, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to be sure because we have a motion that members of your party will split the time for their speeches.

Mr. MacLellan: My colleague is in committee and cannot leave, unfortunately.

There is a certain fibre, a certain cement that we have had in Canada. We have been able to relate one to the other, we have been able to care for one another, we have been conscious of the needs of one another. It seems that these programs and these concerns are dissipating. It is mainly because the government is choosing not to keep those programs going.

In a lot of cases the government has set up or initiated good programs, such as the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, employment programs and various labour initiatives. It then has proceeded to reduce the funding for those programs which is counterproductive. This is not the way to proceed.

I also want to give a great deal of credit to the hon. member for South West Nova and to compliment her on the comments she made concerning the Cornwallis base. It is a tremendously important facility in Nova Scotia and Atlantic Canada.

When we see new institutions being funded and reorganization in the Armed Forces taking place when we have this excellent facility in Nova Scotia, the thought, even the very germ of an idea that we would let this facility go is absolutely galling and ridiculous. It is a marvellous facility not only in the technological expertise that exists there but also in the infrastructure which is so costly today. It has an excellent infrastructure and is in a marvellous location with very competent personnel. The thought that we would let this go is unthinkable. I certainly hope the government will listen to the words and reasons put forward by the hon. member for South West Nova. It is well worth listening to. It is a benefit to her constituents and to the country as a whole.

• (1630)

Frankly, the situation in Atlantic Canada is very bad at the present time. I think the government is trying not to notice this. How government members can possibly not notice it, how they can possibly come into the House and not be completely and utterly embarrassed by their treatment of Atlantic Canada is very perplexing to me.

In my constituency on Cape Breton Island we have a devastating economic problem. The meaningful programs we expect from government are not forthcoming. There does not seem to be a recognition of what is going on in Atlantic Canada and certainly on Cape Breton Island.

The community has no understanding whatsoever as to why the federal government has abandoned its role in Atlantic Canada.

We have the situation in the fisheries. We have asked the government time after time to please tell us what will be done as compensation for those who are going to be losing their livelihood.

In Newfoundland there are thousands of communities depending exclusively on the fishery. On Cape Breton Island there are communities which are completely dependent on the fishery. These communities will suffer irreparable harm if the fishery is closed. What is the government doing? It is causing tremendous anguish.

In Nova Scotia and Cape Breton we had an excellent tourist industry. It has been hurt by the GST and by higher taxes on gasoline. We depend mainly on Americans visiting our region and frankly, the GST and the gasoline tax are disincentives to come to our region.

It may be said that applications to obtain a GST rebate can be made. People just do not go through that process. They are not prepared to go through that hassle. They will stay at home. They will go as far as Maine, Vermont or New Hampshire and decide that is as far as they will go. We will lose the assistance we could have had from their visits.

This is so fundamental. It seems that everything in Atlantic Canada right now is tainted as far as the economy is concerned. Something has happened pretty well on all fronts to cause questions in every industry and every form of livelihood. This is a mystery to us all as to how this could have been allowed to happen to the extent that it has.

This is a great country, even though we have our economic difficulties at the present time. There seems to be different levels of Canadians. There is a gulf between the more prosperous regions of the country and the less prosperous, between the rich and the poor, and that gulf seems to be widening. This was not the way it was supposed to be. This was not Canada as most of us thought of it. This was not the idea that we ever imagined would be of such prominence in our country as it is today. This cannot really be allowed to continue because if it is we are going to ruin the spirit of the country as we know it.

Certainly in Atlantic Canada there is the feeling because the four provinces together only have a total of 32 seats that politically, government believes Atlantic Canada is expendable. The government asks: "Why worry about the fishery? Why worry about the tourist industry? Why worry about agriculture in Atlantic Canada? Why worry about the forest industry? Why worry about the communities that are suffering such difficulty? Because we can win an election and not have to worry about Atlantic Canada".

That thinking is diabolical. I want this government to reassess its actions. I want this government to reassess the needs that it is giving priority.

I want this government to realize that the four provinces of Atlantic Canada are very much in need of their federal government. The federal government cannot just say that at the very best, it is going to allow the concerns of Atlantic Canada to wait for another day when there are not so many other things on its plate. These people are good Canadians and they need the support of their government. They are asking for the support of their government and they are not getting it.

I want this government to reappraise its priorities. I want this government to be mindful there are Canadians in Atlantic Canada needing its help. I would suggest right now that there be plans and there be analyses of the economic situation and that the proper regional development framework and assistance in the short term be put in place.

What has happened is a tragedy and if something is not done very soon, the damage will be irreparable. These people who have depended on their government will find their government not anxious and in fact not even willing to help them when they need that government assistance so badly.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I found the intervention by the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys quite interesting. I was intrigued by his having mentioned early in his discourse the benefits provided to the visible minority community by the Court Challenges Program.

I wonder if he realizes that in fact the Court Challenges Program was never used to bring a single case to the Supreme Court of Canada. At the time the government decided to terminate the program there was an attempt to organize young lawyers within the black community to begin to initiate some cases. In fact, the Court Challenges Program was about to be used for the first time by visible minorities. I would like to hear what he thinks about that.

How does the hon. member relate that in the present social context to the fact that at the same time, the Law Reform Commission had prepared a preliminary report examining the issue of jury selection as it related to what had been suspected in Ontario to be an exclusion of visible minorities from juries? It was an initiative taken by Ontario to pursue that issue. Can that be seen to have a relationship to the government's decision to delay the implementation of legislation on the Race Relations Institute?

In short, there are a number of elements in the decision of the government to terminate programs or commissions that have impacted seriously on the ability of visible minorities to exercise their right to be a part of the process. This is at the very time when the issue of racial discrimination has become critical in many parts of this country.

Is all of this in some way connected to the introduction of sharp changes in the refugee determination system? This is at a time when the Reform Party is raising xenophobic questions with respect to government policy on immigration. Are we not finding a kind of xenophobic government in terms of the legislation that it is passing in response to the Reform Party and in disregard to the concerns of a considerable sector of the community?

• (1640)

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his questions and his comments. What he says is correct.

While the Court Challenges Program has not brought a case to the Supreme Court involving visible minorities, the matter had been under consideration and there was an attempt to correct that. It was unfortunate that the visible minorities did not get more support from the Court Challenges Program.

I think it is unfortunate too that the Court Challenges Program has been cancelled. The deficiencies of the program did not get a chance to be corrected. I feel that it could have played a very important part for visible minorities. They never really had the full benefit of it. I think that is extremely wrong, particularly when we are talking now about amending our Constitution and amending the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The government is in fact saying: "We don't need the Court Challenges Program any more", and at the same time considering these amendments. We are going to have to look at these amendments in light of their relationship to our legal system. The effect on visible minorities, aboriginal people and other groups is going to be very important. At this particular time when we need it so badly, the government is withdrawing it.

The member also talks about the Law Reform Commission and the jury selection process. He is right on that as well. This is something that was being looked at. Hopefully we were going to have a meaningful commentary on that.

We also had a very good report in process on the law and multiculturalism, an excellent program that dealt with the law relating to visible minorities and the various groups in our communities and exactly trying to relate one to the other. The actual fundamental preparation for it had been completed. In fact, there was a group of consultants from the various multicultural communities who were to meet with the government to discuss the report four days after the budget was presented.

The budget was presented cancelling the Law Reform Commission, the meeting was cancelled. These meetings have never been rescheduled. To the knowledge of the multicultural community, they do not know where the reports sits. They do not know if these meetings will ever take place. In fact, they are now of the mind that they will never see this report, that this report will never be made public. This is an unmitigated tragedy when we consider how much has gone into it and how much we need this report.

That is just the callous thinking and the disregard that exists.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. colleague and I thank him for his support for Cornwallis. I could not help but think that the question put prior to me was an appropriate one and leans toward the question that I would like to ask the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys.

The member mentioned ACOA, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. It has not proved to be very effective. In this government's implementation of ACOA, it has not proved to be an effective use of creating jobs or bringing new ideas into my area. I think I speak not only for my area but for the surrounding communities south of Halifax. We have seen it play a role in tourism, in building hotels and things like that.

Has the member experienced the same thing and does he have any ideas? I do. I have a couple of suggestions. I wonder if the member would like to comment on where ACOA has gone wrong under this government in terms of delivering $2 billion. I think most of my constituents would like to see where the $2 billion is going.

Mr. MacLellan: Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member for South West Nova that we would all like to know where the $2 billion went. It is probably the biggest mystery of all when we are talking about ACOA.

The concept of ACOA on paper initially was not a bad concept. What happened was that political patronage became the dominant consideration in ACOA. Moneys were given depending upon who you were and what constituency you lived in and what you had in your wherewithal to be able to do for the government at a later date.

That is crass. It was the number one criteria for ACOA.

By Cape Breton standards, we received considerable funding for large industries that were organized and applied for by people outside of the jurisdiction. They were given a lot of money. They could not turn the money down. We do not know what relationship they had with anybody in the government or the Public Service, so I cannot comment specifically.

They came in. They set up the businesses. They employed people who wanted jobs badly. The local people worked very hard only to find that when the funding was used up and the tax credit was gone, the job training grants were used up, all of a sudden the doors were closed in the industries.

These people were not only without a job once again, but actually had their hopes dashed because they thought that finally they were going to have something worth while and they were going to have a future. They were going to be able to look after their families and make a home for themselves in Cape Breton without having to worry about where the next pay cheque was going to come from.

This is not the situation now. We find ourselves back to square one. What we need to do is foster the local entrepreneurs who have a stake in the community and who have shown that they want to live in the community and to help them, not because of what political party they support or what they can do but on the basis of their ideas and what they want to do for the community.

That is going to have to be a fundamental consideration.

[Translation]

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to the government's Main Estimates for the current year.

However, I find it very difficult to understand why a number of opposition members have been telling us since this morning that the government does not spend enough. They complained that the government withdrew from certain programs and that it cut spending. We tabled Main Estimates totalling $160 billion for the year 1992–93. This does not include the interest charges on the debt we inherited, an irresponsible debt that goes back to the seventies and the beginning of the eighties, a $200 billion debt that causes all kinds of problems because of the interest which accumulates each year. I wonder how anyone could claim today that the government is not spending enough money when we realize that we have a budget of around $120 billion, that the public complains it is being overtaxed and we are being asked to increase spending in practically all the government's current programs. We are even being asked to introduce new programs. I realize there is significant need, but people should also realize that if we want to control taxes, if we want to reduce taxes, we will have to stop increasing program spending, or at least cut certain programs and focus on the priorities.

I think it would be interesting to consider how the tax money the government will collect this year to provide services to Canadians will be spent.

I just mentioned that first of all we have an unfortunate situation where a significant share of the government's tax revenue will go to paying the interest on our debt. The debt keeps increasing annually because we do not have the money to pay the interest, let alone the principal. This means that 25 cents out of every dollar spent in 1992–93 will be applied to debt charges.

There are members who wonder why the government keeps blaming the previous government for the deficit. They say it has now been seven or eight years and we should be able to find something else to talk about and come up with other reasons.

• (1650)

Unfortunately, as we have been repeating for six, seven or eight years, this debt got out of control and is causing problems now and will continue to do so for generations. The government became so ambitious that its revenues no longer covered its expenditures. It had to borrow to pay for programs it was making available to Canadians and which it really could not afford.

The fact is that more than 50 per cent of budgetary expenditures consist of amounts paid to individuals through our programs and through agencies and provincial and territorial governments. People still complain in this House about cutbacks in transfer payments to governments and individuals. That is entirely false. These expenditures have increased from year to year. I mentioned earlier that if we go back to the 1984 budget, this was a $70 million budget. Of course, the government was running an operating deficit of $16 billion that year, which meant its budget was actually $86 billion.

The fact remains that today, planned budget spending totals about $120 billion, which means that transfers to the provinces, instead of going down, have increased on an annual basis. Of course we had to limit those increases in recent years, in this budget as well, but there again, instead of cutting spending on transfer payments, the government is doing everything it can, within the fiscal room it has to manoeuvre, to keep upgrading these transfers and respond to the public's expectations as much as possible.

Eight per cent of this budget will be spent on defence. We have taken some very substantial measures to control defence spending, and new guidelines have been issued to deal with our new obligations to replace obsolete military equipment. We had to cut defence personnel to be able to modernize our fleet. However, 8 per cent of the budget will still be spent on defence.

As for Crown corporations, 3 per cent of the budget will cover that item, while 11 per cent is allocated to services other than defence, offered directly to Canadians by the federal government. These services are part of the cost of government operations. There are officials and people who provide those services, and these people have to be paid. This includes salaries and wages. It includes accommodation. It also includes equipment for inspecting food and drugs, if we want to protect the public and ensure our food is safe to eat. Of course it takes money to have this kind of control.

We have to control enforcement of environmental regulations. I think that investing in the environment is becoming increasingly critical. I think the public expects its leaders to take certain steps and invest in correcting the problems that have developed over the years. The opposition is asking the government to act, but I think it will realize how aware we are of the country's needs. We know a lot more money will be spent on dealing with environmental problems.

We also know how important air safety control is. This is part of the budget for services like aircraft safety and scientific research. We know that it is important to invest in research if we want to meet the challenges of the years ahead. Surveys and mapping are all services in which the government must invest and of course they are in the budget.

The budget also includes fields like health and safety. I see the Minister of Health here and we know very well that we must invest large amounts year after year for better health services and in research for the benefit of Canadians. Canada is a privileged country in this field.

Of course it is not perfect, but we must continue. We will find in the budget the money needed to correct the problems we have identified.

I just spoke about food. Food quality in Canada is the envy of the world, but we must keep track of it, monitor and control it. There are also the environment, medicine and roads. A country as large as Canada must invest heavily in its road system. As well, there are the seaway, airways, airports, ships and harbours. That is all part of our budget.

We often forget all that. We often take all the services we enjoy for granted, but of course they cost something and that is found in the budget. This budget also includes the protection of other consumer interests, like inspections and enforcing regulations on such things as weights and measures, communications and financial institutions.

Social programs and programs for native people are also found in our budget. Most Canadian families receive some income support. We know how important our old age pensions are to give our seniors a decent life. In addition, unemployment insurance is a huge cost in a difficult period when Canada must restructure its economy and face new challenges.

A major investment must be made in unemployment insurance benefits, because obviously in a time of such great change, Canadians are hit and they must be protected until the situation returns to normal. We can talk about family allowances. We know how important it is to help our Canadian families.

For that reason this budget gives more to deal with those needs, even though the government has very little room to move. As for competitiveness, I said that we are now going through extraordinary changes with the opening of markets; we talk about globalization of trade and we must face tremendous competition. It will not decrease but become more intense. Therefore we must invest and that is what we do in this budget.

We are investing large amounts in science, technology and the infrastructure we will need to face all those problems. We must also protect people and property. We are involved in security, policing, the courts, prisons and social reintegration of offenders. Again, we know that we are going through a difficult period and need more and more good security services in this country.

We have passed legislation on the security of individuals, of Canadians.

• (1700)

Structures and infrastructures must be provided to ensure public safety and deal with people who have had a brush with the law for one reason or another. Money must be spent for their rehabilitation. We cannot neglect them and let them turn into bad citizens. We have to see to it that they are rehabilitated as quickly as possible and, of course, that costs money.

As far as border protection is concerned, we know full well that to preserve its sovereignty, Canada has to protect its borders. A lot of money had to go that way. Canada is a three–ocean country and, as such, has borders, the traffic through which needs to be monitored. In order to be able to afford providing such services to the public, naturally money must be raised. Unfortunately, this means levying taxes. To do so, we need personnel and materials. Administering all that costs quite a bit of money.

Regarding the Immigration Act, again, we are a nation of immigrants in Canada. But this does not mean that immigration just happens. Controls are required as well as all kinds of expenditures that we have to take into account in our budget.

On the revenue side, there are the proceeds of the Customs Act, but then again, money has to be spent in order to collect custom and excise duties.

In a rich, prosperous country such as ours, in spite of the indebtedness I talked about earlier, compared to other countries, there is no doubt that we are privileged. It is our duty as elected members of Parliament to provide cultural and recreation services to our people, and a lot is invested in that. I think that a proud country like Canada must provide cultural services to promote culture throughout the country.

There is also the representation and protection of Canadian interests abroad. We do have to be represented abroad, world-wide, and that entails considerable expenses.

Add to that foreign aid. Considering how privileged we are as a nation, as I pointed out earlier, compared to other, poorer nations, these do need assistance of course. I believe Canada cannot afford not to provide assistance to countries where people die from hunger, which is not the case in Canada. I think it is the thing to do to provide assistance to bring hope to these countries and help them achieve some level of prosperity.

Finally, there are the parliamentary institutions, activities that all members of this House certainly consider as essential to maintain our democratic system. There is more. But I think you get a pretty good idea of how where the money goes, of how the taxpayers money is spent.

I would like to remind hon. members of one thing, especially those opposite, and I will close off on this. I have been sitting in this House for four years now and I would like the opposition members who, day in day out, criticize government for their lack of consideration for the Canadian citizens, for their lack of consideration in programs offered to provide security and an adequate quality of life, to keep one thing in mind. By the way, a recent United Nations study carried out throughout the world concluded that Canada was the country where citizens were afforded the best quality of life. Nevertheless, I believe that a lot needs to be done. Many Canadians are in need and need assistance, but let us not forget that there is a limit to how much taxpayers can pay. Canadians are already overtaxed. We cannot afford to increase our expenses without cutting somewhere else because we cannot go over the $160 billion planned for this year. We cannot even think of doubling this amount. Somebody would have to pay for it eventually.

I would therefore ask the members in the opposition to tone down their criticism and stop blaming the government for the shortfalls of just about every single one of its programs. There is a price to pay. In fact we have already reached the limit and I think that the recent budget is reasonable and that it will enable us to meet our obligations. We must of course take care of those people who require government assistance, but it is about time that most people who can provide for themselves do so without counting on the government, especially as regards unemployment insurance and welfare for which we provide transfer payments. At this point in time, we must focus our efforts on those members of our society who are in the greatest need of help. Mr. Speaker, all this is to say that this budget is extremely important and that it will allow a decent living for all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my friend that I listened attentively to his remarks and there were many things he said with which I agree.

I especially want to focus on that part of his speech near the end where he said that we must look after those who are in most need. It is important to explain to the people of Canada where we as Liberals have a different point of view from the government.

The people who are most in need right now in this country are those people who are out of work. We are talking of more than two million people.

It seems to me that if we are already spending about $35 billion in unemployment insurance and welfare, if we were to maybe add another $5 billion or $6 billion to that amount, we could probably get those people into the work force. Then we would have a productive labour force and it would not be the same sort of drain on the treasury. We would be creating an asset for that work, whereas right now these disbursements on welfare and unemployment insurance, not to mention the fact there is a lack of productivity, are a real affront to a person's dignity.

The government is constantly telling Canadians that we cannot do this because of the deficit and the debt of the nation. The member said we are paying about 25 cents on the dollar in interest payments. I personally do not think that is such a big deal.

In other words, if someone has a mortgage of $100,000 on their house and they make around $50,000 or $60,000 a year, they are paying 25 per cent or 26 per cent in interest rates and they manage to get by.

My question for the member is does he not think that Canadians without a tax increase could handle another $5 billion or $6 billion for the mortgage of this country if it meant we could put those two million people back to work?

• (1710)

[Translation]

Mr. Larrivée: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. He says that if we got another five or six billion dollars into debt, we could eliminate unemployment in this country.

Without wishing to be overly partisan, I would say that if we realize the extent of our current debt—

An hon. member: It's not too much.

Mr. Larrivée: It may not be too much, but we must not forget that the $400 million worth of debt some people seem to take for granted costs us 25 cents out of every dollar we collect to provide services for Canadians.

In fact, it costs us about $40 billion annually. When you talk about five or six billion, my answer is that if you had planned things differently 20 years ago, with the same tax revenue we would have had $40 billion to distribute in the form of services to Canadians.

The honourable member says that with five or six billion more, we could eliminate unemployment. Sure, there would be no more unemployed left in this country and we could even offer them bonuses.

Experience has shown that this kind of investment, and I am referring to borrowing to inject money into the economy, does nothing to deal with the problem. If that were the case, there would be no unemployment today. However, it is not the answer, and that is not how we will create jobs.

It is not the answer, because what is important today is training. The problem is not only the debt we have been handed down over the years but the fact that we have failed to train people for the jobs available today and the jobs available in the future. What we have to do now should have been done 20 years ago: train people so they will be able to work.

The jobs are there. In Canada, between 500,000 and 600,000 jobs would be available if we had the right people to fill them. However, people are not trained for these jobs. It would be wonderful if we had a magic formula that would deal with the problem overnight, but there is no miracle solution. We have to do what should have been done long ago, which is train people and prepare them for the jobs of tomorrow, and that is how we will become a prosperous country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but other members have a few questions.

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the speech by the hon. member for Joliette, who said several times that the United Nations had referred to Canada as the country with the best quality of life in the world. I also heard this on television, and I heard about the UN criteria for this kind of statement.

However, the UN overlooked a very important item. It forgot to say that Canada has been living on credit for the past 30 years. It also forgot to say what Canada would be like during the next five years. I predict that five years from now, Canada will be almost bankrupt. People will not say so, because they assume a country cannot go bankrupt, so let us say Canada will be getting increasingly poorer. In fact, we realize we are getting poorer every day.

Unemployment and the debt are out of control because we have 11 political powers in this country that are constantly bickering and cannot reach any kind of consensus, which means that all this is costing us a lot of money. A sovereign Quebec and a sovereign Canada with a dignified form of association would save us between three and five billion dollars, strictly in operating costs. Imagine how efficient we would be. We might save between 15 and 20 billion dollars. That is how we can stop Canada from going bankrupt.

If you want your beautiful Canada to go bankrupt, make a sovereign Canada with a sovereign Quebec, and an association between the two, and in this way we could have effective administration and together keep Canada from going bankrupt.

Perhaps we should invite the UN and give it some real criteria by which to judge what is good or bad for Canada.

Mr. Larrivée: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member, the sovereignist from Longueuil.

An hon. member: The sovereign.

Mr. Larrivée: Indeed, the sovereign of Longueuil. I want to thank the hon. member for his comments. He predicts that the future will not be rosy. He is a pessimist. I say everything will be alright, and I know it will be. Granted, as Canadians—all the provinces made the same mistake—we live beyond our means. We took advantage of our natural resources, but now we realize we have to change. We have to roll up our sleeves and adjust to a modern world, and then we will be on the road to prosperity.

When the hon. member says: "We are going to separate from Canada and we are all going to save money", I find that hard to believe. I am not so sure that will happen.

Mr. Parizeau in Quebec City says: "If we separate, we will reduce government spending. It will cost less in administration costs". When public servants in Hull started asking questions about their future—

An hon. member: That's Rocheleau's riding.

Mr. Larrivée: It is in the riding of Hull. Mr. Parizeau told them: "Don't worry, you won't lose your jobs. We are going to keep you all". Someone will have to explain how we can cut spending if we keep spending the same amount of money and maintain the same number of employees and provide the same services. Someone will have to explain why this is such an ideal solution. Mr. Speaker, we will continue this some other time. I thank you very much.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Dura lex, sed lex, as they used to say.

[English]

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to join in this debate on the Main Estimates.

I do so in the context of just having come back from the earth summit. It was a very intense experience, where the heads of state of 170 countries were united for three days by a lack of vision, a lack of urgency, and a seeming commitment to put national interests ahead of overwhelming global concerns.

I think they are all deserving of the condemnation of their citizens.

That having been said, in the Main Estimates we are talking about priorities of government. It is very clear coming out of the earth summit in Rio that what is required is a fundamental rethinking about what is important. I have been listening to the debate this afternoon and we are talking about the debt problem and so on, so there are political choices that have to be made.

I would like to inject a little sense of urgency this afternoon. Maurice Strong has a quote that is worthy of repetition: "We can be intellectually pessimistic, but we must be operationally optimistic". That is going to be my theme today. I figure I can be operationally optimistic by exposing some of the very skewed priorities of this government. It seems to be able to find money for the weirdest schemes and yet the money that is used to make a fundamental change that is so urgent in our world seems to be beyond it.

• (1720)

These are political choices made by this government and it is going to be responsible for having made them. I give the House one example. Dr. Nafis Sadik, the head of the UN Population Fund, confronted the representatives from those 170 countries with the need to increase social spending as a means of curbing over-population. Quite frankly, the population of the globe is growing so quickly that we are going to be losing space for future generations. It is not sustainable population growth. What does this government do on population?

In the last five years, it has decreased funding for planned parenthood. In 1984–85, it decreased it by 15.6 per cent, in 1985–86, by 12.5 per cent and in 1986–87, by 20 per cent. This shows the kind of wrong thinking this government has in its caucus. On the one hand, it wants to introduce abortion legislation and on the other hand it takes away funding for planned parenthood, to give women the wherewithal to find out about how to prevent unwanted pregnancies. This is an investment in our society that this government has chosen not to make.

It is an interesting statistic, further on the population issue, that the way to address overpopulation is to increase the access to education for women. It is an interesting statistic that for a woman who has not completed secondary education, the average number of children she will have is seven. If a woman has secondary education, that number drops to three which is still not a sustainable number but four less than seven. An investment in education for women is one thing this government should be doing, making education an attractive choice that young women could make.

The other way where the population can be decreased is if women have more participation in political decision-making. It is interesting and I think quite instructive that the Prime Minister remarked only a few weeks ago that Canada's international reputation depends on what his government does at home. I agree with that. It is interesting that at Rio there was not one government woman member on the delegation. This, in spite of the fact that the ministers both for external relations and for external affairs are both women.

Who does the government choose to send down to represent Canada's interests? Quite appropriately, the Minister for the Environment who did do a good job representing Canada. The other minister was the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. This was not a conference about fish, this was a conference about the future of the planet. Women make up more than 50 per cent of the human population on this planet. But no, the government does not send down a woman minister to represent it, it sent down another man to talk about fish. That is very instructive and it goes back to what I said earlier about governments acting out of national self-interest rather than very critical global concerns. I would like now to turn closer to home and talk about those other choices that this government has made because of course when you are government you have to make the tough choices. It is bizarre at best.

For example, the announcement when I was in Rio. I was incredulous to hear that there was a proposal to spend $4.3 billion for the world's most expensive high-tech helicopters to combat the Soviet threat. Has the government not been reading the papers lately? There is no longer a Soviet threat. Why does it not use the $4.3 billion to buy the whole Soviet submarine fleet? It seems that would make about as much sense.

The government says that those helicopters are going to be used for search and rescue. As a representative of a coastal community where some of those helicopters would be based, I should be in favour of this. I am in favour of the remotoring of those helicopters. I am in favour of giving the adequate resources for those helicopter pilots to do the job that they have to do. They do a good job with poor equipment in very unruly weather on the west coast of British Columbia.

However, when you put $4.3 billion up against $145 million in debt forgiveness that the Prime Minister announced last week, one wonders about the political priorities of this government. One wonders if the world has gone mad when we see that this is the way the government is behaving.

Put it also up against the $1.3 billion of federal funds per year for national municipal infrastructure where 63,000 jobs could be created. If we are going to spend $4.3 billion, let me make the shopping list for a change. Give me an opportunity. I could find a way to spend $4.3 billion which I think would be a more fundamental way of making those changes that are so necessary if this planet is going to survive.

The $40 million on proposed cuts including feasibility studies, consultant fees and designs for the purchase of extensive high-tech helicopters is just a ridiculous proposal for expenditure. Put that against the promise of this government in 1984 and again in 1988 for a national child care program. We are hearing repeated horrifying incidents of child abuse in Canada. Yet this government does not seem to see the linkage, that a national child care program would go a long way in addressing that.

The government is not giving it because the members of its caucus are in favour of keeping women in the kitchen and keeping a more traditional family. Those years have passed. Women are not in the home in the kitchen anymore. They are out supporting their families. The economy demands that they do that.

The people who are suffering are the children who do not have adequate child care. They are forced to be latchkey kids where they come home on their own after school or they have sort of take-a-chance kind of baby-sitting services where there are no standards. We need a publicly funded national child care program. If we really believe in supporting the family then we have to be able to give the resources to the people of Canada so the children have support.

Then there is the expenditure, and this is another whacko idea, of $1 billion on low-level defence systems. Who are we being defended from? We are talking billions of dollars.

I will go back to the millions, what the government did not fund. It cut $200 million from the Canadian Jobs Strategy, something that I know every single riding in Canada benefits from. Over the last two years of job training, a number of people have been employed, have been retrained and have been sent out into the work force.

• (1730)

What does this government do? It cuts $200 million from it.

Another example. The Conservatives cut three federal agencies which provided expert advice to the government; the Law Reform Commission, the Economic Council of Canada and the Science Council of Canada, costing $19 million. That was 185 lost jobs. The government also eliminated support for the Canadian Institute for International Peace and Security.

This is a time when the whole definition of what constitutes security is being redefined and the government eliminates funding for it. But it managed to find money, $46.7 million including a $13.7 million cost overrun on the Canadian pavilion at the World Exposition in Seville, Spain. Just so that viewers will know, that pavilion will be dismantled after Expo.

Is that an investment? It is no wonder that the Canadian taxpayers feel overburdened when they can see the kind of absolutely whacko ideas this government chooses to spend our money on.

The government has also capped the Canada Assistance Plan funding to Ontario, B.C. and Alberta. For B.C. alone, that means a loss of $166 million in 1991-92. But $50 million was found to support Canada 125 Corporation, a private non-profit corporation to promote Canada's birthday. Well, I can buy my own candles. I can bring my own hooter and wish Canada a happy birthday, and it is not going to cost $50 million.

The government has terminated the co-op housing program, a cut of $25 million. As the representative of one of the fastest growing ridings in Canada and also one of the most expensive ridings in Canada in which to live, this is a scandal that the co-op housing program has been eliminated. It is not only the wealthy who live in Saanich—Gulf Islands. It is those young families that are scraping along trying to find a way to buy a home. Co-op housing is often used as a start. But this government has chosen to terminate the co-op housing program, a $25 million cut. There was about $19 million found by the department of the Minister for International Trade for the propaganda and promotion of the Conservative "prosperity agenda". I put that in quotes because prosperity for whom, I ask?

Then there was the $14 million to sell the GST that nobody wanted. Believe me, that sales job was a big failure. There is still a lot of anger about the GST. On the other hand, the government has cut the Court Challenges Program in the 1992 budget, $2.7 million a year, that was allowing equality seeking groups and individuals access to courts to enforce their rights.

One wonders where the grand plan is when you see these comparisons. What is the priority of this government? It is more than just a coincidence that it is the social programs that are getting the short end of the stick while the flimflam and public relations it always seems to find the dollars for.

There was $800,000 to $1 million spent on new cars for cabinet ministers and senior mandarins over the last year, replacing vehicles still in top condition but not quite so bright and shiny. But there was also $3.4 million in cuts for funding for the aboriginal communications program.

In conclusion, this demonstrates that this government is devoid of vision, devoid of that sense of urgency I talked about that is necessary if we are going to survive into the 21st century. Maurice Strong was right that we can be intellectually pessimistic. We must be operationally optimistic. By speaking today in the House, I wish to expose the vacuous nature of this government's planning. It feels that by putting a fresh coat of paint on or a new ad that it can solve a lot of problems. This is not so. You have to get down and roll up your sleeves and work from the ground up by funding child care centres, funding family planning centres, educating women, putting more money into investments for education and technology and investing in the future of our country.

We have that vision and I hope when the election is called that people will see the vacuity of this government's agenda and choose a New Democrat government.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands. I must say that over all I agreed with many of her concerns about the government.

As members know, I do not share the ideology of this Prime Minister on the way this country should be governed. I have a different view than he does on free trade. I do not believe in this decentralist approach that is going on with the Constitution. However, I have to say to the member that I have a totally different view of the Prime Minister's actions in Rio last weekend.

I felt that the Prime Minister of Canada did a good job in Rio. I know it may sound strange coming from a Liberal to say that this Conservative Prime Minister did a good job on the environment, but I will state why I think he did do a good job. I thought that he stole the show when it came to the environment. In other words, this $140 million debt that we probably never would have had returned to us anyway, he managed to write off and create the perception that Canada was throwing in its oar, or to quote Maurice Strong: "He was operationally optimistic. He committed a further $20 million". I had some constituents on Saturday morning when I went to the Albion restaurant on Queen Street saying: "There he goes again, writing off another $140 million on the environment. What is he doing?"

As I said to the people in the restaurant on Saturday morning: "That is the cheapest $140 million Canadians ever spent, not to mention the environmental cause. Just think of the doors that will open for all of our environmental consultations, our environmental technologies and all of these things that are manufactured in Canada". Quite frankly, I think this was probably one of the best things this Prime Minister has done since he has come to this office.

My question to the member is: Because this person is of a different stripe, can he not do anything in terms of contributing to the dynamic of this country? In this case I personally would have liked to have seen him do more in terms of his commitment to the environment. It would not have bothered me if he had written off $250 million because, as many of us have said in this House, if we cannot save the planet, what good is the debt owing to us anyway?

If we are going to win credibility on this issue, I do not think that the New Democrats or the Liberals are the only ones who are concerned or committed to saving the planet. In this case the Prime Minister opened doors for us around the world where now if we just put our Canadian business card out there, I will bet we are going to get preferential treatment for environmental technology and environmental service for many, many years to come. I think that is what Maurice Strong meant when he talked about operational optimism.

• (1740)

Ms. Hunter: The hon. member's question and his comments preceding it demonstrate that national self-interest also extends to the Liberal party and not just to the Conservative Party.

In my comments I did compliment the Minister of the Environment for his performance in Rio. That compliment did not extend to the Prime Minister.

The 16 negotiators that Canada had there did an exemplary job. They did a stalwart job representing Canada. They are public servants of the highest calibre.

However there were only 16 of them doing that work and they had to work around the clock to be able to do their work. Compare that to the 22 from the communications unit whose job was to sell the story back in Canada. This demonstrates the real priorities of this government. It is willing to put more into flimflam than it is into substance.

The member's reaction shows that it is working with the Liberals, and that is why my operational optimism is to expose it.

As for the international debt issue, the $145 million write-off, we were never going to paid back that money anyway. Canadian taxpayers are paying it anyway, through bank rates, through interest rates. It is the bankers who are benefiting. The bankers are benefiting not Canadians.

The writing off of that debt is only one part of the solution to this problem. We have to realize that if there are going to be real changes it is going to have to be more than a $145 million write-off. There has to be more written off, there must be.

There must be some honesty with the Canadian public. The government must admit that we are never going to get that money anyway, that it was the banks that have been benefiting year after year after year on that issue, and that we are paying for it through bank interest rates, et cetera.

The Liberal member has demonstrated that he has the same lack of global vision that permeates the Conservative caucus. He demonstrates that it permeates the Liberal caucus as well. The only choice in the next election is the New Democratic Party.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments further to the speech by the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands. I heard the member say that we had to spend more on education, health and so on. Of course it is a priority to maintain those services. But we must also add that we have reached a certain level, which I think is very satisfactory and we need only maintain it. I think that we must first create some wealth. We should first create the wealth to be able one day to pay this frightful accumulated debt of $400 billion.

In 1984, when I was elected, we said that we absolutely must reduce the debt. Unfortunately, at that time, revenues were about $75 billion and expenditures $110 billion. Today, we see that revenues are about $135 billion and expenditures $165 billion, so we have not really succeeded in controlling government spending.

I think that we should create wealth. How do we create wealth? We had examples like free trade. Free trade was badly handled. We should have prepared for it, because if you open new markets, you must train the work force properly to deal with those changes. The dollar must also be kept as low as normally possible to encourage exports. Interest rates must also be reasonable so that our businesses can raise funds and thus create jobs. That was not done. Basically, free trade is a good thing, but it was so badly mishandled that jobs were lost. Our unemployment rate is now 11.5 per cent. I must say to the hon. member that we cannot think only of spending; we must also think of creating wealth, jobs and prosperous businesses so that we can then redistribute that wealth. So my question for her is how does she see the way of creating—

[English]

Ms. Hunter: Mr. Speaker, I see that the right wing thinking that has been demonstrated by the Conservative government and the Liberal opposition also permeates the Bloc Quebecois caucus. There is only that one choice. We do not have to create wealth, we have to redistribute wealth.

Rio de Janiero is a city of vast wealth, 12 million people in one city. There is a huge contrast between the vast wealth and the extreme poverty. We do not need more wealth, we just need more equitable distribution of it. That is the kind of vision that we need, not just in Canada but globally. We do not need more greed, we need solutions for all people on the planet. We do not need to act out of narrow self-interest.

We should act out of self-interest because it is our survival we are talking about, and that is the only thing that should motivate us.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, like others in the House today I am very interested in participating in this debate. I think that even my colleagues on the front benches will agree that this is not utopia but, as others have mentioned in the House today, our number one ranking in the world obviously means we are pretty important. There is no doubt in my mind that if we continue down the road we are on, with the leadership we have, we eventually will get a lot closer to utopia than we are today.

I had the opportunity to read some mail and some news clippings earlier this morning. There was a significant news clipping that came out of Washington, D.C., in which the media in Washington was questioning why the American government could not follow the same lines and same type of leadership as the Canadian government with regard to deficit reduction. Quite a number of my colleagues in the House have spoken to deficit reduction.

In my comments this afternoon I would like to deal with some of the successes of this government, particularly one specific program. It seems that members opposite are constantly nit-picking at various issues, although some of them may be important. At the end of the day they very seldom have compliments about the successful programs and efforts of this government.

The one program I would like to mention today is the Western Economic Diversification Program. The program was specifically put in place to promote the diversification of the economy in western Canada. In northern Ontario there is the FEDNOR Program and Atlantic Canada has the ACOA Program. I think that one of the most successful programs the government has introduced since 1984 has been the Western Economic Diversification Program.

The program is not meant to pit one person against another in terms of business competition. The program was put in place to diversify the economy, not to have a program financing people to compete against one another in a local community, in western Canada or in all of Canada. The specifics of the program lead the applicants to look at providing new products, new markets, new technologies, industry-wide competitiveness and most importantly, import replacements.

There is no funding for internal competition with existing companies or industries.

• (1750)

The program, as a result of being located in western Canada, has a western Canadian theme and western Canadian attitude. The head office is in Edmonton, there is a satellite office in each of the western provinces, and a liaison office here in Ottawa. It shows that the government understands that to put regional programs into place the management of those programs should be in the area that they are working within.

The program guidelines are very simple. We are looking for new products and new markets, but except for the very complicated projects that western diversification examines, most of those decisions are made in provincial or regional offices so that the applications by various companies and industries are reacted upon and processed extremely quickly.

Probably the most significant part of the western diversification concept is the fact that by far the biggest majority of all the monies that go out are in the form of repayable loans. The Government of Canada is not going out and giving money away and granting money to industry.

The Government of Canada has decided that if this is a business venture that will fly but needs a little kick-start then western diversification helps kick-start that particular project. At the end of the day the Government of Canada is asking those industries to repay their loans.

Like most things in life, the ones that you earn yourself are probably more respected than the ones that are given to you. That is probably one significant issue that arises from western diversification. You go in there and you work hard. At the end of the day you pay your debts, you feel well, and there is no indebtedness to somebody else.

There are a number of different aspects to western diversification. One of the ones that has been utilized most recently is the Quality Assurance Assistance Program. That particular program entails support from western diversification to take existing industries and help them upgrade to international standards.

Any Canadian company, whether it be in western Canada or elsewhere in Canada, that wants to compete in the international market knows that the standards that are required today are extremely high. If it does not have those standards it cannot compete in the international marketplace.

Those of us from western Canada truly believe we can compete any place in the world. With a little bit of repayable help from WD our industries in western Canada have had the ability to upgrade their facilities, get help from experts to make sure their quality reaches the required standard, and ensure they meet the international guidelines.

A lot of industry in western Canada will eventually be coming to western diversification. If not for funding they will be coming for guidance on how to meet these international standards.

Western diversification also gets involved with international marketing. A lot of smaller companies in western Canada have products that meet the international standards but they do not have the financial ability to enter the international marketplace to expand their markets.

Western diversification has taken a leadership role in promoting our products outside of Canada and in bringing people into western Canada to look at our ability to manufacture various goods.

The member for Saanich—Gulf Islands was making comments about this government's involvement in the environment. Western diversification, understanding the importance of the environment, took a leadership role a number of years ago in becoming involved with the South Moresby National Park. It has put well in excess of $100 million into the South Moresby park project to sustain a very special environmental area in Canada.

Western diversification also gets involved with projects dealing with various environmental standards and research. A good example is research into the low sulphur coal in western Canada that could be used in Ontario. We have a lot of quality coal which has a little bit too much sulphur and if the problem of getting rid of the sulphur emissions can be resolved, and they are working very hard at it today, I know that those colleagues of ours from eastern Canada will accept some western coal that is of good quality.

Western diversification has also entered into what has been called the partnership programs. I guess most of the House would remember this as an extension to what I remember as being the ERDAs.

We have had the ability to work with the provincial governments in western Canada dealing with forestry, mines, tourism, communications technologies. We had another program with the federal government, with the funds funnelled through western diversification, to each of the four western provinces. Each province had the ability to spend the money as it saw fit which would encourage economic diversification in its province.

The one that I can speak best about is one in the province of Manitoba. Through western diversification and the province of Manitoba, a number of small community infrastructure improvements are taking place as we speak so that the infrastructure is in place either to expand existing industries in a number of small communities or to attract a number of industries to these communities because they have the sewer and water facilities ready to go.

Western diversification has been a leader in co-ordinating various government procurement initiatives. The last speaker was talking about helicopters as an example of purchases that are very significant.

Whether it is fortunate or unfortunate, very few Canadians know about the activities of western diversification. The Government of Canada has made some very significant purchases that are situated completely in western Canada. As an example I would mention what is known as the CAATS program, which is the Canadian Automated Air Traffic System.

It was Hughes Aircraft which picked up the contract. This contract is worth over $380 million and from what I understand, by the time the Hughes company has finished investing in western Canada, along with the $380 million contract, the Hughes Corporation is looking at spending another $500 million in various types of industrial development. Once again the area that I know best is Winnipeg, and it has already set up a specific company to deal with the acoustics industry.

Another one is the Tactical Command Control and Communications System. The successful bidder has a contract worth $1.2 billion, the majority of which will be spent in western Canada.

When we look at some of the other expenditures the government is making throughout Canada, western Canadians will see from these two specific examples what the government is doing to diversify the economy into western Canada.

Western diversification is also very much involved in the sole source contract to Bristol Aerospace for the CF-116 update which is a complete update of the 18-year old CF-5 aircraft to give it an extended life. At the same time, the experience that Bristol Aerospace Limited has picked up has allowed it to expand into international markets. The company has attracted a significant amount of business from other countries in the world that need their CF-5 aircraft upgraded.

• (1800)

Not much more than six or eight months ago Western Star Trucks of Kelowna, B.C. was awarded a $200 million contract to provide DND with 2,750 trucks and shelters over the next few years. This contract provided over 350 jobs for the Kelowna area and maintained an existing industry probably longer than was initially expected.

I would like to talk about a couple of specific projects close to home in Manitoba. One is the Centre for Biodiagnostics which was announced a while ago. From what I understand, on Monday a representative of the government will be out to officially open the biodiagnostic centre. This initiative is a three-way co-operative effort, with western diversification putting some funding into the project, the National Research Council putting in a third of the funding and private industry putting in a third of the funding.

Within a very short period of time I think that we will find that the centre in Winnipeg will probably be the international centre for biodiagnostics in the world.

Another favourite project of mine which I believe eventually will be somewhere in western Canada and which will provide over 400 jobs, but is in the research and development stage right now, is that of Meadow Materials. Meadow Materials has taken it upon themselves to do research into how to take silica sand, which is a very significant commodity within the riding of Selkirk—Red River, being probably the supplier of the best silica in the world. Western diversification is working with Meadow Materials and the Manitoba government in doing the technology improvement so that silica sand along with apparently other materials will be able to make silicon metal. It seems very simplistic in a statement but the estimated job opportunities when the project comes to completion is well over 400. When you come from a community such as Selkirk—Red River 400 jobs in that area is very significant.

I commend the western diversification people for their efforts in making that actually happen.

To sum up, I have made comments about how maybe things are not exactly perfect here and although I do not think they are that significant, some of the decisions that we have made in government have not been perfect or idealistic. What I would like to put to the members opposite is that I think there are times when the government does do a good job and does come up with progressive thinking and provides jobs and opportunities in a very progressive way.

I guess what I am asking is that the members opposite sometimes give credit where credit is due.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, we might have forgotten in the last 18 minutes or so that my friend and hon. colleague opposite said that we had been excessive in our criticisms of the government and in fact we were well on our way to Utopia. That is what he said "well on our way to Utopia which could be accomplished if this government was re-elected". He said, Mr. Speaker, I know you heard it because my hon. colleague on this side heard him say that there was an awful lot of nit-picking that obscured the pursuit of the ideal perfection of the universe in Canada under the hegemony of the Conservative government. I suppose the last time we came so close to Utopia was during the recession when we lost 29.7 per cent of our manufacturing jobs. I guess it is true we have not yet achieved Utopia since so far this government has cost only 25.5 per cent of our manufacturing jobs through its free trade agreement. Just to put that into context, Utopia so far has cost us 510,000 manufacturing jobs.

In the 1981-82 Liberal Utopia, 270,000 jobs were lost. In fact only about 22 per cent of those were permanent job losses. Under present circumstances, the loss of 510,000 jobs in manufacturing in this Utopia constitutes 65 per cent of permanent job losses.

Just to give you an idea of the practical impact of that, six plants have closed in Windsor in the last two weeks, and nearly 40 plants have been lost in Windsor alone in this Utopia since 1989.

Others have cited the practical effect on ordinary human beings. We know there is a crisis among young people in this new Utopia and I do not want to be nit-picking. I do not want to nit-pick but I guess it is nit-picking to tell the hon. member we have an unemployment rate among youth of 17.7 per cent right now. That is almost 18 per cent unemployment among youth. There is a drop-out rate of 30 per cent among youth and also a 40 per cent illiteracy and innumeracy rate.

The impact of these circumstances on our youth in this Utopia is an increase in property crimes among youth of 57 per cent since this government has been building this Utopia.

Mr. Bjornson: Mr. Speaker, I would not say that is particularly nit-picking but I am glad the member brought up the problems he has in his own community of Windsor. The honourable member and I sat on a committee that did significant research into the auto parts industry. We found government policies which preceded us such as the National Energy Program, the low value of the dollar and the auto pact created an industry in southern Ontario that was not competitive.

The problem we have today is former policies, which people probably thought were all right at the time, but obviously did not work. As a result, we are going through a significant adjustment. I feel sorry for anybody who does not have a job, but these people do not have jobs because they are not high-tech. The reason they are not high-tech is the fact they work in a low-tech factory which is no longer competitive. If the leadership at that time had forced industry to modernize, educate its workers and be competitive, maybe we would not have the problems we have today.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate. Today we are discussing whether or not we should agree to give this government $48,902,383,552.00.

• (1810)

That is the decision we have to make. That is in the bill before us. I want to say to the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona I did not prepare this bill, but that is what is asked of us.

Now should we give $48,902,383,552 to those clowns across the way? That is the decision for us to make.

Let us evaluate what it did with the money we gave it last time. As you know, this House has voted money for this government on a number of occasions. Let us review some of its expenditures.

Only a few short days ago I asked the government how many departments and agencies presently had outstanding computer contracts, not the ones that are finished, not the ones that are over, not the ones they gave to their friends and have been completed, just the ones still in progress. Do you know what the answer was? The answer was $1,123,498,026.58. Those are just the outstanding contracts. My colleague asks very appropriately, does it not have enough? Seemingly not. This is what it is up to.

In my continuing quest to find out whether or not we should give this amount of $48 billion to the government across the way, more particularly to the Prime Minister, I asked other questions. It has come to my attention the Government of Canada does not trust Canada Post. I do not know why anyone would not trust Canada Post. I cannot think of any reason. But the Government of Canada used Interpost, which is a Dutch postal system partially owned by the Dutch government, partially owned by KLM Airlines and partially owned by a great Canadian company, Northwest Airlines of the United States.

It gave $733,000 worth of contracts to deliver the mail to this particular Dutch company over a recent period. Let me draw a parallel for my colleagues here in the House. That is a little bit like me owning a taxi company and using someone else's taxi-cab to go around town.

Mr. Kilgour: Save gas?

Mr. Boudria: I suppose it would save gas in my own cab, but it would not make much business sense. Then again, the government across the way does not make much business sense. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources used $301,000 worth of this particular service. Do you know the reason he gave me? Interpost offered low rates and "reliable service". The government used the Dutch post office to deliver its mail because it gave reliable service. What does that say about the Canadian postal system it owns and runs on behalf of the people of Canada? It tells me this government does not trust its own corporation.

That is not the only area where this government has wasted money. This government has been wasting money since it has been in power. It has been buying limousines, travelling around, doing all kinds of things and just wasting taxpayers' money like you would not believe. We have a first-class Minister of External Affairs who proved her class to all of us recently when she broke the edict of the Minister of Finance travelling here and there.

Mr. Peterson: First class travel.

Mr. Boudria: Last year it came to my attention this government had built a dog house in Rigaud. This particular dog house in Rigaud is at the Customs and Excise training college. Canadians were howling mad when they heard the price of this particular dog house. It cost $325,000 to house 10 of our salivating friends in Rigaud.

Do you know why it built the kennel in question? Because the old one was on the tennis court and the good people there, the head honchos at the place, wanted their tennis court back. What did they do? They ordered a new one built so they could practise their backhand courtesy of the taxpayers of Canada. This cost $325,000.

The amazing thing about it is the original cost was $226,800, but there was almost $100,000 in cost over-runs on a dog house, if you can believe it.

An hon. member: That is like going to the dogs.

Mr. Boudria: No wonder we are going to the dogs in this country.

I have been asking this government a number of questions. Again, I am trying to hold it accountable in an effort to make up my mind as to whether or not we should give it another $48 billion. I asked how many computer contracts were given to install the various computer systems for the GST. That sounds like a reasonable proposition. After all, the GST was much dreaded by most Canadians and much heralded by the Tories across the way. They even appointed eight extra GST-loving Senators to get it through the other place. Anyway it cost $9,343,771 in computer contracts over six months between January 1, 1991 and June 30, 1991.

An hon. member: And it did not have to pay the GST either.

Mr. Boudria: You are right. My colleague is quite correct. They did not even pay GST on those particular computer contracts.

I also want to talk a little bit about advertising. This government is quite good at advertising. I remember when the present Minister of Communications was a mortal opposition member and used to criticize the government. He said about government advertising at the time, which was minuscule compared to today, and I quote from May 3, 1982, Hansard:

"If the present situation is allowed to continue unchecked, we will find that the essential equilibrium between government and opposition, which has existed over centuries of parliamentary democracy, will be destroyed".

Those were the words of that member. Do you know who the top spenders in advertising in Canada were in 1989? The Government of Canada was first with $76 million in advertising; Proctor and Gamble was second with $61 million; GM spent $56 million and the others, of course, are much smaller. Those are the kinds of expenditures we have seen.

I will give a few other instances here. I could go on for quite some time, but unfortunately time will not permit. I want to bring to your attention the leasing of real property by this government. In its budget two years ago this government cancelled the construction of new headquarters for Transport Canada. It renewed the lease on Place de Ville here in Ottawa and spent $170 million to rent the building, which the government is renovating. The employees will be working in a construction site for no less than eight years while the building is being renovated for the ultimate benefit of the Campeau Corporation, not the tenant or the employees in the building.

Questions were asked at that time about how this happened, who lobbied for this contract and so on.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, having consulted my colleagues, I must tell you that we have concluded that we will refuse to give the government the $48 billion it is asking us for today.

• (1820)

[English]

Let us give the message to Canadians that this government does not need an extra $48 billion. It deserves a kick in the pants, which is what we will do at the next election.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to ask a very quick question of the hon. member.

He talks about whether or not the $48 billion should come to the government. Back in 1980 or 1981 the Liberal government was coming forward and asking for money. It was not really money because the government was asking that it be put on the credit card. In essence, I think every Canadian can understand that back in 1983 for every dollar of tax revenue the Liberal government was providing about $1.23 in services. Imagine that, Mr. Speaker.

Where was that extra 22 or 23 cents going? It was going on that Visa credit card and then the MasterCard because that was over-exposed. All the balances on those credit cards kept going up.

Now we are hearing the member moan and groan as the government is trying to get its fiscal ship back in order. Today, for every dollar in tax revenue there is about 95 or 96 cents going toward services. We have made that adjustment.

Is the member suggesting that the government should go back and is he concerned that it is only $48 billion? If we were following the policies of the Liberal Party ten years ago we should be requesting $96 billion and just putting those balances on the credit card.

I would like him to explain if indeed that is the case, why we are not asking for $96 billion instead of only $48 billion.

Mr. Boudria: It is always nice to get a question about credit cards from the government that gave us the American Express bank.

I find it interesting that a government member would be asking a question on credit cards. The government gave us the Amex bank, signed it by an Order in Council the day of the last election, probably in the fear that it was going to be turfed out on its ear and that if its friends at Amex could not be rewarded, the way to—

An hon. member: It didn't happen.

Mr. Boudria: The member says that it did not happen. No, it did not, but we will get to them next time.

The member asks us about fiscal responsibility. That is interesting given that one half of the accumulated debt in the history of Canada is there courtesy of the present Prime Minister and his administration.

In other words, the $400 billion debt we have today was only $200 billion in 1984, immediately after a very severe world-wide recession. After years of prosperity this government made it worse.

The member asks me how much I think the $48 billion should be. He has missed the point. The point is that Canadians have no faith in this government. Canadians do not trust this government to administer their money nor the affairs of the nation.

That is why my colleagues and I do not want to give any authority to this government to be running the affairs of the nation. It is not a bill that the government should be asking for; it is an election. That is what we need.

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): If in 1984 there had been a $200 billion surplus and now through compound interest it had grown to $400 billion, would you be upset by that? That is exactly what has happened to the national debt. It was $200 billion in 1984 and the compound interest on that debt has grown and doubled right now.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, this government is telling us that after some six years of prosperity, the last year and a half or so in a recession largely caused by the policies of this government, the best it could do was to double the debt in Canada. And government members are asking me to explain that kind of mismanagement? I am sorry, neither I nor the Canadian public can explain that, but they do understand it and they will take care of it very shortly.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, on the other side of this House sits the Tory government which has always been on the best of terms with the business sector. But what has this government done? During the last three years, our country has been undergoing a de-industrialization process. During the last three years, we lost 16 per cent of our manufacturing jobs while the United States lost only 7 per cent of jobs in that area. Therefore, this cannot be due entirely to restructuring, globalization and the recession.

An hon. member: Incompetence.

Mr. Peterson: It must be due in part to the lack of economic ability of this government.

An hon. member: That's it.

Mr. Peterson: In the automotive industry, our major manufacturing industry, the one which exports the most, during the last three years, we lost 21 per cent of our jobs, while in the U.S. the job loss figure was only 9 per cent. In other words, in the automobile industry, Canada is losing jobs 2.3 times faster than the U.S.

The last figures show an increase in unemployment. We are still in a recession and what is even worse is that those permanent jobs disappearing in Canada are moving to the U.S. and to other countries. As a country, it will be very difficult for us to adjust to that situation, but we have to start somewhere; all is not lost. There is still something we can do. First, we must create adjustment programs, those programs which were promised by this Tory government before the with the United States but which were never put in place.

Our objective must be to make Canadians the best educated, the best trained and the best equipped workers of the western hemisphere. If we reach that goal, we will see economical results in 10 or 20 years from now I hope.

We must remember that only the private sector can generate jobs and wealth.

That wealth is essential, not only for job creation, but also to reduce the deficit. We cannot increase taxes any more; it is impossible. Canadians have reached the point of ignition on the subject of taxes.

Let us be honest. Nobody in this House can tell us how to cut spending so that we can solve the deficit problem. What we must do is give the private sector the means to generate wealth, pay taxes, create jobs and transform the unemployed into taxpayers. That is what has to be done.

• (1830)

To do that, the government must change many of its policies, such as its monetary policy which has translated, over a period of 20 years, into an increase of more than 25 per cent of the value of our currency. This is an incredible burden for our exporters. This is a government that was not supposed to increase taxes, but it has done so 34 times since it came to power. It has also given us much higher interest rates, a very high currency rate, as well as taxes that are too high, while at the same time presenting us with the free trade agreement. Our exporters must face an incredible challenge trying to keep up with the American competition. This was not fair and we have seen the results of those measures.

There is another thing that must be done. It has to do with the relations between workers and employers and businesses. In Canada, we have the worst record among the 23 developed countries when it comes to the number of days lost because of strikes and lockouts. We have the worst record and the example came from this government when everybody saw what it did to its own employees.

I now want to say a word about training which was cut by this government. It is a cut of the contribution made from the general revenue for the training of Canadians. This contribution should in fact be increased so that we can become better equipped and better educated.

Let us now talk about science and technology, as well as research and development. Again, those sectors suffered cuts from the government. How can we face the competition at the international level, as well as globalization, when our level of research and development is but half of that of other countries?

Finally, there is the issue of co–operation between the three sectors, that is the workers, the contractors and the various levels of government. In Canada, we do not yet have the will nor the means to create this kind of partnership amongst the three groups, each of which is essential to job creation as well as prosperity in Canada.

In conclusion, I want to say that we must not be partisan when it comes to Canadian unity. We must remain united so that we can regain the potential that we used to have and that most Canadians now feel we have lost. If we do not work together, it will not be possible to envision a prosperous future and a country that enhances its capacity as well as the potential of its citizens, and in particular its young people who cannot find jobs right now.

Mr. Speaker, you will have noticed that in your own riding young people have nothing to do. When they ask: "What shall I do to find a job? I have a good education and I can work", what is your answer? What is the answer of my other colleagues? Must we tell them: "Wait"? No. We must create jobs and opportunities for these young people and this exercise must take place in a strong and united country.

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by congratulating the hon. member for Willowdale on using his alloted time to speak French. I think this is quite remarkable, and I think the hon. member is to be commended on his efforts to speak a language that is not his own in this House.

I would like to comment on some aspects of his speech. In fact, although the hon. member for Willowdale is a member of the opposition, his speech could have been made by a member on this side of the House. All the objectives and the principles he wanted to put forward are typical of programs the government supports wholeheartedly. We agree we should make an effort to increase manpower training. We agree Canadian citizens are overtaxed. We cannot go on increasing taxes. We agree a partnership should be developed between workers, the private sector and the government. All these principles are admirable, but the first item on the government's agenda is to stop further increases in the deficit we inherited in 1984, a deficit to which this government has not added a single penny. The current deficit has two components: the $225 billion, more or less, we inherited from the Liberal government the day after the election in 1984, and the compound interest.

I would like to raise another point with the hon. member, before asking any questions or suggesting he help us find answers. The day after the election in 1984, the Liberal Party left us another legacy as well: an operating deficit. The honourable member will recall that at the end of the 1984–85 fiscal year, the federal government's current account was in the red to the tune of nearly $16 billion. Today, that same account, thanks to the efforts of this government, now has a surplus of nearly $15 billion. We first had to deal with this current account deficit in order to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order. Since the period for questions and comments is very short, only five minutes, it is only fair to allow the hon. member for Willowdale, equal time for his answer.

Mr. Peterson: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. And I would like to thank the hon. member for Manicouagan for his question. First of all, as far as the deficit is concerned, this government was elected in 1984. At the time, the national debt was $170 billion. Eight years later, at this very moment, the national debt is $450 billion, under a Conservative majority government. This is not our fault. However, businessmen and homeowners know that when you have to buy something, you have to invest in the future. Whether we are talking about buying a house or a factory, sometimes you have to borrow money to pay back the cost of the loan.

Now, about youth training. This is an extremely important point. And investing in science and technology is also very important, we cannot overlook that either. We must invest in training for a prosperous future. Now is the time to invest in the things that count. That is the difference between this government and our party. How long is the government going to wait? Until the national debt reaches $100 billion or $200 billion? How long will it take? We must invest now.

• (1840)

[English]

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I too am glad to have the chance to participate in this supply motion involving $48 billion-plus. Most likely for those watching television it is not one of the most exciting things. However, as some of us remember or know from our history, the whole essence of Parliament is the granting of supply, the granting of the dollars necessary to make the government work. It began with the old dukes and lords leaning behind the bushes in the meadow as they tried to restrain the King from fighting wars and doing all the things the King did. That is where we get the title "Speaker".

The lords and the dukes would send someone to speak to the King about supply and all of the vitals for war and the King's court: the cows, the horses, and all the ladies necessary to make the King's court work.

That was the beginning of supply. That is where we get the name Speaker because it was the Speaker who was sent by the dukes and the lords to talk to the King to say: "You should not go to war and fight the War of the Roses", or "You should not go and fight this war of the Crusades".

That Speaker had his head chopped off up until about 1200 A.D. in the very civilized country called England. That is where supply came from.

This is the basis of Parliament. Though it is not the most exciting, sexy session of Parliament it is the basic session of Parliament.

I am glad to participate in that because I still believe that, even with all the imperfections and all the warts we have—because we do personify the people we represent, and certainly a lot of our constituents have warts, as do we—this is the highest institution in the land.

It is a strange place indeed. Just yesterday we had the courage in the Public Service pension legislation to force a vote on extending pension benefits to the gay community. That is certainly an objective of many members and it is an interesting debate. That came up for debate last night and was voted on last night. Those provisions were voted down.

Yet we evidently do not have the courage to force a vote or have members force a vote on our own pensions, with all of the problems that has caused the public domain.

There is this contradiction that many people are upset about. We seem to be so strong and courageous on certain things that are controversial, yet on other things that get right down to the nitty-gritty of our own work habits and our own emoluments we seem to be a little shy. I am really sad about that, but be that as it may we are still in supply.

I want to talk in the brief time that I have, having been fairly patient, basically not about the supply.

When talking about supply and the dollars involved in the bill that we are discussing, which affects all facets of the government, it is wide open season. It is open sesame. Anything is possible to say as long as it is in order.

That is what I am going to suggest, but still focus not on all the programs of government, not complain about the government I used to belong to because as I told the high school students and college students in my riding, there is not a party in this House of Commons or a party in the land that has all the answers to the challenge of government. We all think we have ideas but there is always a blend between the black and the white, and that is a grey area.

I have heard some of protestations of righteous indignation because the government has not done the right thing and the opposition can do it better. I was in opposition for many years and thought the opposition would do better. Then we got in government and I found we were doing some of the things we complained about in opposition.

Around the mulberry bush it goes.

I am going to do something I have never done since I became a member. I am going to read a column because it is so well written that I certainly could not improve it. It is generally about the issues I want to talk about.

I am concerned, as are all members and all Canadians, and yet we are getting tired of this constitution topic. I understand the reality. There have to be conferences. There are now phone calls being made. Parliament very well may be met with a package deal that really has not been ventilated much in Parliament. Yes, it was ventilated across the country ad nauseam in a sense, but there are many of us in the House who still want to have a chance to make comments here. I am going to anticipate what I believe are one of the two biggest problems.

The Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has been trying to do a good job. Quite frankly, the halo of unity and trying to come together and constitutional fatigue may be creating more problems that are simmering under the surface. The package I understand they are talking about has several ingredients that, frankly, have not been debated in this House of Commons and have not had that much debate in the country.

I am not talking about the Senate. I will mention the Senate in my closing remarks as you start to give me the high sign in the few moments I have. I am going to talk about something that is a little difficult to talk about. You raise the issue and people start to interpret and perhaps call you names. I am talking abut the issue of the inherent right of the aboriginals to self-government.

That has blossomed very quickly in these constitutional discussions that have gone on in the last several weeks and several months. There was a report here from the minister several days go. We are told in the press that there is a principle that has been agreed upon, although no legal text has been seen. There has not really been any explanation of the implications of that and what it really involves. One paper says it is just a form of municipal government. Another paper says it is another level of government, federal, provincial and aboriginal. Other papers say it is going to involve 400 or 500 self-contained aboriginal communities. Is the law of the land going to apply or is the law of the province going to apply? Are all people of Canada, be they aboriginal, English speaking, French speaking, going to be covered by the charter of rights? These are questions that, frankly, as far as I am concerned have not been given a positive definition. There is real confusion about it.

I am glad I have the opportunity under supply today to voice my thoughts and concerns and read a column that I think asks some very legitimate questions on this issue. Quite frankly, I am going to conclude with a suggestion that I do not think the Prime Minister will take, but I am certainly going to throw it out.

That is the purport of what I would like to say today. I believe we are getting into an area where I know the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has to put on a brave face. He has to be an optimist and he has to keep moving. We are getting into this interim period where we are not sure where we are moving. We also know we have passed referendum legislation, therefore, we may come back into the House on that. That itself has problems for an independent member and for all members. The referendum legislation limits the debate on the question, which presumably would be a package, to three days. In three days with members speaking 20 minutes and 10 minutes of questions, you can only get about 20 or 30 speakers at the most on that situation which will be the fundamental question affecting the future of the land, if it comes to that.

I am glad to have this opportunity to voice some thoughts in anticipation of what I gather the Constitution ministers are talking about and/or in part have perhaps agreed upon. I am concerned that in this halo of unity to try to bring it all together as we would all like and/or the constitutional fatigue and the open sesame of compromise, we may be creating a monster within a monster in some areas of potential agreement in principle, although none of us have seen the legal text.

In that light and in the time I have, I want to refer to a column that was printed in The Montreal Gazette today, June 16, by one Peter Blaikie, who as many of us know is more than just a Montreal lawyer, but was the former president of the Progressive Conservative Party, long before my friend from Cambridge was on the scene.

Mr. Sobeski: I was there then.

Mr. Nowlan: Were you there? I had the interesting challenge of running against Peter and getting bumped and I took my lumps. He is also president of Alliance Quebec. There is a person whom we know. We may not agree with everything he says, but he is not a fly-by-night person. As I say, I got my scar tissue from him. Everyone should go through a defeat every so often. It is great for humility, but you do not want to do it too often. This man is rather articulate. As I say, you are not going to agree with everything he says but it does confirm some of my fears.

• (1850)

I think it is good to get this in the public record, so I am going to do something I have never done before. I am going to read this column. This will most likely take about five minutes. I hope it takes less. I do not want to read it too quickly. It was in today's paper. It will have some things that some might not agree with but I will not comment on that. I just want to read the column and then conclude with some general remarks. This is titled, but of course he does not have anything to do with the title in the paper. As Madam Speaker knows, that may be some copy person in the editorial room. The article is entitled: "Questions, the headlong rush to 'get a deal' is dangerous" by Peter Blaikie, as follows:

> "Notwithstanding the label, the current debate is not about renewed federalism. It is not about the "distinct society", except as a form of camouflage. It is not about language and culture.
>
> At its most obvious level, the debate is about the extent to which the provincial power-grab, principally by Quebec, will succeed. At another level, it is about the extent to which powerful, skilful pressure groups will have their interests satisfied. More subtly, it is about the extent to which the Prime Minister will sacrifice the national interest to repay his political debt to Quebec's ultranationalists.
>
> Three things are certain in the event that a "deal" is struck. First, there will be no benefits, in the long term, for the overwhelming majority of Canadians. Second, the issue of Quebec's future will not be resolved. Third, to the extent that power is transferred to Quebec, directly or by way of the "distinct society" clause, the future work of the separatists will be made easier.

Of course, this man lives in Quebec.

There can be no doubt that, after 125 years, there is ample scope to renew the federation. But the principal rationalization for a "deal", which has become a mantra in some circles, is "the need to decentralize power." Arrant nonsense.

Indisputably, Canada is today the most decentralized country in the industrial world. Most Canadian provinces are currently unable to finance properly their existing responsibilities. There is no convincing evidence, even in Quebec, that the citizens of Canada, as opposed to the provincial political barons, want significant further decentralization. No case has been made for savings flowing from decentralization.

Why, when we have so little confidence in our leaders, are we so eager to let them cobble together a "deal"?

Why should we allow the separatists, as will occur in a referendum on "federal offers", to attack the proposal without having to defend their position?

There is a second, equally dangerous form of dismantling of Canada being proposed. Until recently the issue of native "self-government" has been largely ignored by political commentators. The virtual silence is profoundly disturbing.

In fact, the current proposal to enshrine, for Canada's aboriginal peoples, an "inherent right to self-government" is evidence of national dementia.

Consider the following questions which are only some of those one might ask:

a) What is the underlying objective, the vision, behind the proposal? "Self-government" is simply a means. What is the end?

One must conclude that the government has abandoned any belief that native peoples are best served by integration into the mainstream of Canadian life. Is apartheid the goal? If so, how will that improve the life of the aboriginal peoples?

b) What is meant by an "inherent right to self-government"? No one in Ottawa, or are otherwise involved in the constitutional industry, has the faintest idea. The defence of this lunacy is frequently that other parts of the constitution have been subject to interpretation by the courts over the years.

It is one thing, after the fact, to find that as national conditions change, so do the interpretation and application of the constitution. It is quite another when those actually drafting the document have no idea of the meaning of the language they are using.

c) If the natives' right is "inherent", why must it be granted at all? A right which is inherent is more fundamental than any right which can be "granted" by a constitution. At best, the constitution is merely declaring the existence of the right, not creating it.

This may seem to be mere semanticism. It is not. If, as appears inevitable, the courts have to grapple with the concept in the future, they will have to consider what the word "inherent" means: "Forming an essential or intrinsic element of; existing inseparably within an object or person; innate."

d) What are to be the continental limits of "self-government"? There is little doubt that Ottawa and the natives have dramatically different views. It appears, from Joe Clark's bafflegab, that Ottawa is thinking in terms of municipal governments. Anyone who accepts that the native leaders agree believes in Santa Claus and every other multiculture equivalent. Is it unreasonable that we, the citizens of Canada, its "owners" so to speak, insist that, before approving the "deal" that is going to save us from hellfire and damnation, our "servants" tell us what it means?

e) Assume for sake of argument, that all the parties agree that what is being discussed is a form of municipal government. A whole series of other questions, important but unanswered, arises. Since we have over a century of experience with municipal government, why have our leaders not simply defined self-government?

How many of these "municipal governments" are there to be? It appears native leaders consider that there are several hundred distinct aboriginal societies. Is each to be independently self-governing? Will they all be subject to the same rules? What is to be the territory of each of the self-governing units?

How is the new structure to apply, if at all, to those native Canadians who choose not to live within the boundaries of the "municipalities?" What is to be the relationship between the new level of government and the existing levels? To what extent will the native peoples continue to be governed by, for example, the Charter of Rights or the Criminal Code? A similar question can be raised as to the applicability of provincial laws.

The list of questions is endless. Either they have been answered, and the results are being concealed from us, or they have not. Both scenarios are disturbing: in neither case do our leaders merit support.

(f) To what extent is there unanimity of purpose among the aboriginal peoples? At first glance, there appears to be very little; the native women have not been reluctant to dissent from their male counterparts. Is it unreasonable to suggest that Ottawa should have required the native peoples to present offers they had previously adopted internally?

(g) Who is going to pay for the Canadian experiment in rewriting history, and how much?

When faced with these basic questions, which the media are too polite to put, lips will be sealed with Krazy Glue. We have the right to know the answers.

The real problem is that the answers are no doubt "the Canadian taxpayers and far too much". Vast sums are today spent on the affairs of Canada's native peoples. As we add yet another level of government, the cost will inevitably grow. As to whether there will be benefits to anyone but the elite of the aboriginal peoples, I am from Missouri.

That is the article in today's edition of The Gazette by Mr. Peter Blaikie, former national president of the Conservative Party and former president of Alliance Quebec. I appreciate having had the time to read the article into the record.

I just want to refer very quickly in the minutes I have left to those rhetorical questions asked by Mr. Blaikie in The Gazette today and some of the confusion over what self-government means. This starts to bother me because there is a very important case—and I mentioned it in a question in the House the other day—right now in British Columbia. It is the case of Delgamuukw v. the Queen, British Columbia and the Attorney General of Canada. It is the Gitksan clan.

This is fundamental to the issue. It is the very question the negotiators have been talking about. I have here a copy of of party of the factum of the appellants, the aboriginals. It is very clear. I am not going to waste time now in my remaining two minutes to read what the appellants, the aboriginals, believe the inherent right of self-government means. It means a lot of what is in the Blaikie article.

Under one the items in the appellant declaration they want the court to declare that they have the aboriginal rights to the territory, to proprietary interest in the land and to harvest, manage and conserve the territory and its natural resources, and on we go. This is a proprietary right, which means that other people who happen to be there now, be they corporations or individuals, third parties, will have a real interest in the interpretation of that.

Paragraph (iii) of the factum reads:

> The Appellants' existing aboriginal rights include an inherent right to self-government over the territory, themselves and the members of the Houses represented by the Appellants, in accordance with the Gitksan and Wet'suwet'en political, legal and social institutions;

That opens up all the questions that were actually raised by Mr. Blaikie's article.

The negotiators cannot try to confuse. Part of the problem with Meech Lake when it got down to the crunch was misinformation and disinformation at a very critical time.

I do not agree with everything the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs has done. I am afraid, because of fatigue, trying to be too nice and being locked in rooms with the same people over a period of time, one gets the Stockholm syndrome. People get too agreeable because they do not want to disagree with the persons they have been living with, talking to and meeting over six weeks or six months. I am afraid that element may have happened. I am glad the minister took a pause, got away, reflected and had discussions.

It is not the time at this critical hiatus to have any disinformation or misinformation and to kid around with this very important principle that has much to be meritorious about if it is the way some people interpret it.

Let us not try and fool the Canadian people by saying: "Oh, don't worry about it. It is only another little form of municipal government", when the people involved, the aboriginals, feel very much differently. I appreciate the time. My time is up.

• (1900)

In conclusion, I would just say I did not know about the referendum. I have mentioned to other people at another time here in this House, I think the Prime Minister, if this hiatus stays, if there is not an agreement, and some of these things are not clarified, the Prime Minister—and it is funny for me to say—may have a golden opportunity here using the referendum bill or an election on either the aboriginal question and/or the Senate question.

I certainly agree with the Senate question and there is a lot of hocus-pocus on that. I do not have time to get into that, but even Bobby Rae has forgotten that the 13 colonies, not the 50 colonies when you had a distinction between Virginia of 900,000 and little Delaware and Rhode Island which only had 40,000, something like the distinction between Ontario and P.E.I., not necessarily in fractions but it is that big versus small, the 13 colonies had the guts to in effect give the states two senators per state then. Granted they were not elected, they were appointed and different things, but they did it to balance off population.

I am for the abolition of the Senate. I think the Prime Minister could ride the abolition of the Senate either in a referendum and get momentum for an election or even have an election and pull a Mackenzie King on the King-Byng issue which resurrected Mr. Mackenzie King when Arthur Meighen thought he had him down on the ropes.

It is funny for me to say this because I can tell you this, if the Prime Minister called an election on the Senate and its abolition because he cannot get agreement on a constitutional package, I certainly could not be campaigning against him on the abolition of the Senate because I think that is what we should have. I think 80 per cent of Canadians would go for it.

Madam Speaker, you have been very tolerant. I have many other things to say but that shows you how terrified I am about all these issues here. There are many other members who want to speak. It is difficult to get in all of these views in the narrow timeframe I have.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I have heard the honourable and dare I say venerable member on two or three occasions raise this topic without a great deal of clarity about what the question really is.

The hon. member cites an article in The Gazette and he cites a court judgment in British Columbia, both of which have in common that they have paid not an iota of attention to the entire debate on the question of what the inherent right to aboriginal self-government is and has been accepted to be.

For the hon. member's edification, it is simply this. When the Europeans came to North America, the native people did not expect they would do anything but share this continent with the visitors. They were generous about it, generous in a fashion which was uncharacteristic of Europeans who thought they had a proprietary right over all that was there. That impetus from a different culture led to an effective colonization of the native people even though they had never conceded the land or their right to govern themselves.

In fact, the signing of treaties signifies precisely that the Crown recognized they had a right to govern themselves, which was inherent because it is a characteristic shared by all people, European or aboriginal.

I do not understand why it is so— difficult for people to understand something so elementary and something that they assume for themselves, except that they assume it for themselves at the expense of the native people and have done so ever since the Europeans arrived here.

What has happened here is that early negotiation, the arrangements that resulted, led virtually to the destruction of the native society, to poverty, to dependency, to paternalism, and they want it to end. I think most Canadians would like to see it end.

In fact, if I recall correctly, there is a poll that says 70 per cent of Canadians would like to see the native people negotiated with on the basis of the recognition of inherent right self-government, which includes one other characteristic that should not be too difficult for people to understand, and that is the assumption of equality in negotiation. Not another thing is assumed.

That judge in British Columbia and that writer in The Gazette refused to recognize this. The difficulty with the hon. member is that he is paying too much attention to a judge and to a Gazette writer rather than taking the time to talk directly to the native people. He should not be asking that question in this House. I suggest that he sit down with native people and discuss it in those terms.

He would be then, as has been the case with those engaged in the negotiations now, in a position to understand what is being discussed. He would understand that the native people want the same rights as everybody else on land which they have never conceded, but they want to do it as Canadians.

If we persist in looking at what they asked for as something alien instead of something inherently human then this kind of strange question, certainly strange to their ears, will continue to be asked.

As for the 13 colonies and their arrangement for an equal Senate, the hon. member ought to know that the equal Senate in the United States is no magical solution there either as it will not be in Canada. For example, in the United States right now it takes an average of three years to pass legislation. I am not so sure that is the kind of thing that we want to have here.

That is a partial answer to the question, but I would ask the member if he has done that. Has he made any effort to sit down with native people and ask them instead of a judge or a Gazette writer about the issue of inherent self-government? Has he explored the impact in the United States, not of the great disparities in population on the function of government there, but the effect of having two houses of virtually equal power in which one is equally distributed and the other is by popular election?

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, I am not going to waste much time on the second part of the question about the Senate because as far as I am concerned, I would abolish the Senate. I do not think the Canadian public needs another elected body to in effect prevent a lot of the laws from being passed. We can reform this House. The abolition of the Senate and mostly independent votes other than perhaps on budgets and throne speeches would do more to make this House live than any other thing I can think of.

In terms of the first part of the question from the hon. member, whom I respect, I must say, and I may be a little bruising to him but he can take it because he can give it out, if he believes what he said then I am glad for him, but he does not happen to be in that conference room. I have not read some of the things that he has said. The fact of the matter is, whether he wants to believe it or not, we do have a judicial system. The aboriginals went to court in British Columbia with a B.C. claim for large globs of land where there happen to be—

Mr. McCurdy: A racist decision.

Mr. Nowlan: Speak about racist. The hon. member has spoken in this House with proper indignation about the racial policies of South Africa and the apartheid policies there. Does he not see that there is some similarity? This is not a law or an accord or an agreement. If it was any of those things we perhaps would not have to worry so much and some of the problems could be ironed out if they are not all the way he says they are.

We are putting this into a Constitution and we have not even got an amending formula for it. That is the problem and that is the fear I have.

To answer the question, and I will say this very sincerely and honestly to the member who has been very rightfully indignant about South Africa and its policies based on race, is this not reverse apartheid to put in a Constitution that certain types of government are going to be dependent on race? I am sort of throwing this back to the hon. member and he may not have a chance to answer, but that is part of the fear. I think that is a little exhibit.

The hon. member is a learned person and a professor of microbiology and the sciences. Perhaps he can see that there is a little connection.

However, part of the norm is to have it explained by those who are making the rules at the conference table as to what this concept means. It is not as simple as the member said because it was the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of British Columbia who startled the Indian community by in effect coming out against the inherent right of aboriginal self-government and gave his reasons in a quite thick judgment, which I have.

To answer his question, no I have not talked to some of the Gitksan tribe but I have read the judgment.

• (1910)

It is a very profound judgment. I do not necessarily understand it all or agree with it, but it exterminated and cancelled out those initial rights as you well know. That is what the appeal is about, so I let the court take it.

Let us not kid ourselves, as we are talking about this and making a deal, there is not some knowledge and judicial opinion on what this is. At the moment, people and some of the leaders of the negotiations are saying very confusing things as to what it means. That is what gives me concern.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate and reject any suggestions by the opposition this government has lagged in its commitment to good stewardship of the economy and the public purse.

The fact is this government has been following a consistent and comprehensive plan to create the framework necessary to help Canadian industries and workers succeed and prosper in today's fiercely competitive global environment.

This action to improve Canada's economic fundamentals is helping to ensure our return to real growth and new job creation for our country this year.

Let me take a moment to put our current economic situation in a broader international context that sheds a more honest light on the opposition's self-serving attempt to wrap itself in the shadows of economic gloom and doom.

This spring the United Nations ranked Canada as the world's best place to live. According to the UN human development index, which takes into consideration income levels, the environment, education, health care and life expectancy, Canada has the highest quality of life of all 160 nations. Just as important, the international monetary fund this spring also forecast Canada will have the strongest economic growth of any G–7 country this year and also in 1993. The OECD and the Asian Development Bank have made similar predictions.

Even at this time of economic difficulty, we in Canada enjoy the second highest standard of living among the major industrial economies. Particularly to outside observers, Canada is the envy of the world. Canada is seen as a success, as a unique experiment that works.

Having said that, I want to emphasize it is not my intent to gloss over Canada's current economic problems. Yes, recovery has been weaker than expected and consumer confidence remains at a very low level. Our jobless rate is unacceptably high. But it is important we recognize that while recovery has been slow and confidence has been weak, it is nothing less than the reflection of the global interdependence that makes our economic policies so necessary.

As a major trading nation, and Canada is the seventh largest in the world, Canada has been hard hit by the world economic slowdown. Growth for the G–7 is expected to be 1.7 per cent in 1992 and that is hardly a robust recovery. Our vulnerability as a trader has been compounded by the industrial restructuring taking place here in Canada and also around the world.

This has been a difficult and painful process for many, as companies seek to control costs, improve productivity and enhance quality. But it is a process that must occur for us to survive and grow in a world of globalization and increased competition, accelerating technological change and new consumer demands.

The changes involved in such restructuring are affecting all regions across Canada and all sectors of our economy. It does not matter if you are in the auto industry, the steel sector, agriculture, natural resources, retailing, wholesaling, distributing or finance or whether you live in rural communities or big cities, the fact of the matter is we live in a era of global interdependence and no country can manage its affairs in isolation. As a consequence, one of the major challenges facing Canadians is the need to educate ourselves better. We must make a three-pronged attack in this regard. We must first retrain workers as traditional jobs become obsolete. Despite 1.5 million unemployed, we are told at least 300,000 jobs cannot be filled because of the lack of skills and training, particularly in the software and computer sector. Second, we must upgrade the job skills for employees as technology and market needs evolve. Third, we must improve formal education so today's students can find the jobs and succeed in tomorrow's work place.

To effectively meet the education challenge we must also get the economic fundamentals right. This includes turning around the government debt and government deficits. This is essential to keeping inflation down and making lower interest rates possible. Keeping inflation down and low interest rates is the key to sustained growth with price stability.

Deficit and spending control is also essential if we want to maintain the government's ability, whether it is a federal, provincial or even municipal government, to provide the resources needed in key areas such as education and health care. Let us remember every dollar of government revenue that goes to pay the interest charges on the public debt is a taxpayer dollar that cannot be used for productive investment or to assist those in need.

These basic economic facts of life are why we have worked to implement the fundamental changes needed to build a more competitive market-oriented economy, with less government intervention and reduced government inefficiencies. These actions include trade liberalization, and this includes both the free trade agreement and the GATT and the current negotiations on a North American free trade agreement. The objective is clear; we must secure fair and open access for our exporters to the international markets.

One can go back to 1965 when Canada was negotiating the auto pact with the United States. There were speeches in this House from the opposition members at the time who said: "Voting for the auto pact is going to destroy the Canadian auto industry." Ten years later the auto pact was a sacred trust among the unions. We must recognize trade liberalization is important.

Tax reform on the personal and corporate side creates a fairer tax system that enhances our export potential and competitive position. This government has been involved in deregulation, most notably in the transport and energy sectors.

Over 20 Crown corporations have been privatized, which has helped reduce the number of employees on the federal payroll by almost 90,000 since 1984.

Most recently, there has been the opening up of the financial services sector to encourage more competition and allow the industry to respond to the realities of the marketplace and in particular global realities.

Underlying these steps is a clear and fundamental economic fact of life. Governments do not create jobs, the private sector does. Government must create the type of economic and policy environment conducive to investment and job creation.

We have also taken some tough action that has been needed, including setting clear public targets and applying a disciplined wage policy to the government itself to get inflation down to the lowest level in almost 20 years.

What is the impact of doing that for consumers? What is the difference between a 7 per cent inflation rate and a 2 per cent inflation rate? If we accepted a 7 per cent inflation rate consumer prices would double in about 10 years. If as a nation we can accept a 2 per cent inflation rate, then prices would not double for 36 years.

Some people would say: "What's wrong with a 7 per cent inflation rate?" But if the nations you trade with and compete against have a 4 per cent inflation rate or a 2 per cent inflation rate, then five or ten years down the road you become increasingly uncompetitive. Keeping inflation down is very important.

• (1920)

These fundamentals for the Canadian economic renewal have been built on and expanded in the February budget. We are reducing taxes to instil confidence, increase investment and improve industrial competitiveness. But to pay for these tax cuts the Finance Minister also cut government spending. We are taking further action to streamline the rules and operations of the government itself.

Again, let me remind the House of the steps we have taken to restore consumer and business confidence in investment. The personal income surtax will be cut from 5 per cent on July 1, and there will be a further 1 per cent cut on January 1. This will reduce the federal tax burden on Canadians by $500 million this year and by more than $1.2 billion every year after that.

Of course, I come from the province of Ontario and the Finance Minister brought his budget down in February. The Ontario government brought its budget in at the end of April. On page 28 of the Ontario budget there is a chart that shows the federal surtax reduction. For example, if you are a single person making $30,000, according to this chart your taxes will be reduced by $75 on the surtax. But what did the Ontario government do? It introduced an Ontario rate increase which took away that $75.

If anyone wants to get a copy of the Ontario budget they will see the provincial government increased what the federal government reduced. That is one of the dynamics we have to deal with. As a federal government reduces taxation it creates a vacuum and there is always a fear a provincial treasurer will come in and snap up that increase. It happened this year and the residents of Ontario are well aware of that.

In the federal government we announced the home buyer's plan, allowing Canadians to build or buy better houses using their funds and RRSPs. The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation also reduced the amount of down payment required for a home buyer to qualify for CMHC insurance.

These actions, combined with lower mortgage rates, are already showing positive results. For example, as CMHC pointed out last week, 26,000 families have taken advantage of the 5 per cent down payment required to purchase a home. It is also important to note three-quarters of these families say they would not have been able to buy when the down payment requirement was 10 per cent. In other words, we are helping to make home ownership affordable for more Canadians than ever before.

The budget took further important action to restore the industrial and economic capability. We announced tax measures worth some $2.3 billion over five years to help Canadian manufacturing and the processing sector become more competitive. There were three things that were in the last budget.

The manufacturing and processing tax rate will be cut from 23 per cent to 22 per cent effective January 1, 1993, and to 21 per cent on January 1, 1994.

The capital cost allowance for manufacturing and processing machinery has been increased from 25 per cent to 30 per cent.

Third, we are also prepared to reduce the withholding tax on direct dividends paid to non-residents. This step, combined with the drop in the manufacturing and processing tax rate will help improve the investment climate and competitive edge we have. It will help rebuild the manufacturing and processing sector that has been shaken by the economic slowdown and restructuring.

I read out a lot of numbers and I am sure some members of Parliament are a little confused by what all this means. It is important because we happen to be located next door to the United States of America. When you take a look at the marginal effective tax rate on companies, it is currently 21.6 per cent in the United States, while in Canada it is 23.4 per cent.

Those were the numbers before this budget. After these three changes take place the effective rate in Canada will drop to 20.6 per cent. The Americans, if they do not do anything and they do not increase or reduce taxes—and they have a large debt they have to pay—would stay at 21.6 per cent.

In other words, today the tax rate for a Canadian manufacturer is 1.8 per cent higher than its U.S. competitor. But as of 1994 the Canadian marginal tax rate will be 1 per cent lower. Therefore, by doing those sorts of things it helps Canadian manufacturers. By helping Canadian manufacturers it creates employment. I will repeat again, governments do not create jobs; it is industry that creates jobs.

We are also establishing a small business financing program to help firms in temporary financial difficulty adjust. The ceiling for loans under the Small Businesses Loans Act will be doubled.

We will also streamline the administration of the scientific research tax credit system and in this way enrich it by a further $230 million. We will revise the lifetime capital gains exemption to restrict its application to real estate. This will encourage Canadians to direct financial resources toward productive investments that boost the ability of Canadians to compete globally.

These measures do not compromise our commitment to reducing the deficit. The budget includes spending cuts needed to balance our tax cuts and continue the track needed to reduce the deficit to the point where we can begin the process of paying down our national debt.

What are some of those spending cuts? Defence spending will be cut by $2.2 billion over the next five years and this is a real peace dividend. We certainly will not disregard our obligation to our forces but the results will be a smaller and also a more effective and better equipped defence force.

Forty-six federal agencies and organizations will be eliminated, streamlined or deferred and federal grants and contributions will be reduced by $375 million over a five-year period.

Then of course, these actions will allow us to provide a tax break to all Canadians. This also helps the manufacturing and processing sector while setting us back on course to get the deficit to fall to $27.5 billion this year and $22.5 billion in the next fiscal year.

By 1995-96 we will have zero financial requirements. In other words, there will be no need for the Canadian government to go to the market and borrow. The government will have sufficient cash flow to meet its requirements during the fiscal year.

In closing, let me point out that the current economic situation is in line with what was indicated in the budget, that the 1991 final quarter was weak and that this weakness would continue over into the first half of 1992. I am glad to say that there are also real signs that this turnaround is taking place to the benefit of Canadians.

The simple fact is our structural reforms and budget measures combined with an upturn in the United States, our major export market, has positioned Canada for renewed growth and job creation as the year progresses. This is not just a matter of opinion. These are positive indications that the economy is strengthening.

A few quick numbers as my time is winding to a close. Motor vehicle production in April was up 7.3 per cent above its first quarter level. In the first quarter real exports were 3.7 per cent above their level in the fourth quarter. In March alone they rose by almost 2 per cent and the Conference Board index of business confidence rebounded to 16.1 per cent in the first quarter after declines in the previous two quarters and it is at its highest level in almost two years.

These indications are in keeping with the budget outlook that the growth will come slowly in the first half of 1992 and will continue to grow in the second half and will rise to 4.5 per cent for 1993. There is no doubt our country has a way to go before we can truly say that we are out of the economic woods but it is just as clear that we are on the right path. That is why this government intends to stick to this course. We will not repeat the errors of a previous government which tried to borrow and spend its way out of a recession. The result of that policy approach is with us today in the large national debt that so drastically limits the resources available to our government.

• (1930)

No, we will not jeopardize Canada's future by abandoning the policy directions we have put in place. They are helping us make a more competitive country, the low inflation rate, low interest rate, a high productivity country that can take advantage of our new opportunities in world markets. That competitive strategy will provide all Canadians with the best guarantee possible for a more secure and prosperous future.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Mount Royal. Will the hon. member confirm the fact that she is splitting the 20-minute period with the hon. member for York West?

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Yes, Madam Speaker, I have just been so advised.

Hon. members from this side of the House want to talk to this government's poor record and poor public policy and the fact this country is suffering dreadfully. The question often asked is: "They have been raising money and bleeding me almost to death with 34 tax increases over the years and the GST. All that money flowing in, where is it going?" That is what people are asking.

Some of the things that my constituents are most unhappy about in my riding of Mount Royal are the cuts this government has brought in in a general overview, particularly as they affect our youth, our students. It is morally scandalous because they are the future of this country.

The government has been consistently attacking those kinds of support mechanisms that were in place. Those mechanisms were helping our youth to get a foothold, to get started so they could be the future to support the wonderful country we used to have before all the unfortunate short-sighted cuts were put into place. Those cuts are affecting the health of our society, the psychological health, the social health and the fiscal health and well-being of our society.

Looking at the unemployment rate from Statistics Canada right across this country, we know that unemployment has just increased exponentially. We know that when there is unemployment there is concern, stress and nervousness. It affects the entire family. For young people, it affects their view of the future and any hopes for the future. The impact of the family stress is showing itself in the cranky mood out there right now.

I would like to know what this government has done to alleviate the situation of our youth and our students who are unable to find jobs. What has the government done? It has gutted the transfer payments for post-secondary education. It has cut back on summer challenge funding. It has tampered with the Canada Student Loans Program in the budget.

Our most valuable and precious resource is being wilfully pillaged by this government, the talent, the potential. The government's failure to provide the needed tools for these young people really hurts more than anything else.

Our seniors are hurting and their cost of living adjustments are not what they should be—32 cents or 37 cents is not helping them. The last time around their cheques showed a 75 cent increase. They certainly are not going to be able to buy a loaf of bread and a bottle of milk with that kind of increase.

Seeing the jobless youth for tomorrow really hurts the family and our seniors in this society. I think the government has been extremely short-sighted in that regard.

There was tremendous short-sightedness on the part of this government when it cut the Economic Council, the Science Council and the Law Reform Commission. The government did not like the information it was receiving. It did not like the studies being tabled because they did not support Conservative views of society. It did not like a strictly market-oriented approach. The bottom line is all that counts and nothing to support the social services and the other kinds of projects and programs that have distinguished this country in its social perspective. The government just shut them down.

What else did the government do? It merged the Canada Council with the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council without even consulting to find out if that was the best thing to do.

The government cut down on the race relations money or it cut out the race relations program entirely. It cut out the Heritage Language Program which was most effective. It cut down on the Court Challenges Program. In fact, it is cutting out the Court Challenges Program.

The minister today had the nerve to say that all the areas of discrimination have been established and the landmarks have been set. Therefore, there is no need for any more information in this regard, so there is no need to have or to support the Court Challenges Program. That is far from true. I just came from a meeting for people suffering from AIDS and from HIV. They have serious problems around discrimination. We have heard from the disabled who have serious problems around discrimination. They need to go through the Court Challenges Program to be able to make this government see the light of day and to have it carry out proper programs in this country.

With respect to housing, the government has cut down on social housing and co-op housing to a degree that instead of making the economy turn it is cutting out access for people who desperately need proper housing.

What should I say about child care, the basic building block to equality. The language that this government uses is a fancy package for no content in its budget, no content in its programs, no vision for the future and no vision for this country. It is an absolute and utter disgrace.

The first and primary building block after having a family and having a decent home is a child care program. It is unfortunate and maybe at the same time not so unfortunate, but the reality is that we need two income earners in a family today to be able to live conveniently and properly.

The programs this government has put into place are a sheer disgrace.

I am really pleased to have the portfolio of critic for communications and culture. I feel it is incumbent upon me to alert the community out there to start talking to individual members of Parliament and tell them what this government has done.

The government has passed status of the artist legislation. It is very proud to have passed that legislation, but it made cuts in every single program that could possibly enable artists to function effectively and to earn a decent living. It is one of the reasons the artists are the poorest earners in this country. It is not because they have not got something to contribute; it is because this government sees them as a luxury.

Our country is obsessed with debating the Constitution. We are all constipated from the Constitution. This is a political question that should go away, please. Then we can address the real issues facing this country, the economy and putting into place the kinds of structures society needs to move forward and to face the global challenges out there.

We are capable. We are the best in the country and the world. We have good ideas. We have good businesses. We have good people. But it will not work if all we do is stick to one silly discussion. Let us get it over and done with and keep this marvellous country together and move ahead and address the issues that are seriously of concern.

The Standing Committee on Communications and Culture did a very fine landmark study called The Ties that Bind—Les liens qui nous unissent. Throughout the many hours that we sat and talked and had hearings and deliberations, we found many of our problems in this country could be examined as a cultural issue and could be solved easily through a proper cultural financing approach.

If a country wanted to remain a country and it wanted to have a spirit, how would that spirit be expressed if it was not through the cultural products produced by that country: the films, books, magazines, literature, television programs, artists and creators. There is a method that transmits all that information and that is through the communications mechanisms.

In terms of communications, the CRTC just opened yesterday telecommunications and telephone. No more monopoly. There will be a choice in the long distance market, but there was a concern about that. It is good for business to have choice in the long distance telephone market but it is also important to ensure that the private consumer is not going to be strangled or challenged by increases in local rates for home telephone use.

It is totally unnecessary, if there is a proper monitoring mechanism recognizing that a unified and integrated telephone system is not destroyed. Ma Bell and all its subsidiaries and colleagues are out there. They will be given opportunities at the business level, but do not touch the consumers in the home. That is the message that comes out: consumers come first.

What do we need to have an effective monitoring system here in this country?

• (1940)

We need the regulator to have the power to put into place the regulations and to keep a watchful eye on this new and evolving situation here in Canada. It can be a very healthy situation as long as we do not—I cannot believe I have only one more minute but if that is the case I am making a plea not to cut the CRTC budget. Put the six commissioners in place who are still not in place. Almost half the commissioners are not in place. It is ridiculous. How can we monitor and make this system work, for business as well as for the consumers, if we cut its budget.

We cannot cut out in that area.

It is just a shame that I cannot read into the record the kind of information that no one thought was out there for the cultural community. Everybody breathed a big sigh of relief after the budget came down. They thought there was nothing in there. However when they found out what was in this green book, another little document called Managing Government Expenditures, they discovered a section entitled "Ongoing reductions in non-salary operating budget". That is a convoluted way of saying cuts, cuts, cuts in the cultural sector.

For the communications and cultural sector they totalled $6.23 million just in 1992-93.

I would be pleased to give the breakdown if someone wishes to hear it for this particular sector. I do not wish to take my colleague's time unfairly.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment my friend and colleague from Mount Royal on her not only factual presentation but very passionate and emotional appeal to the good senses of the government, if those senses still exist in some dark corner.

I have a two-part question. Would she care to finish her outline of the list she was unable to deposit before the members of this House? Second, she listed a long litany of cuts not only to very worth-while initiatives and projects but also to projects that have a minimal impact in terms of the $160 billion package that we are debating tonight, but an incalculable worth.

I am wondering if it is not more a question of ideology and public relations than of saving a few dollars to the public purse along the way.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I do believe it is a matter of ideology. Probably the reason I chose to be a Liberal was because we are not frozen in the ideological left that feels that the government should do everything and the state should be involved in everything or in the ideological right that says that the marketplace shall determine where everything goes and there is no role for government.

There is a role for government. If the government does not involve itself in good economic policy related to good sound social policy, we are not going to have a good society out there.

If we have a destabilized have-not community that is suffering from poor social policy we will never have a decent economic environment in which to grow and prosper.

The economic and social policies are very closely interlinked, and I thank the member for the opportunity to bring that to the attention of my constituency.

In conclusion, I would like to list the litany of cuts which will be increasing over the next five years. Before I do that, I would like to quote the words of Vincent Massey. I would like to quote him for my colleagues across the floor, all of whom are pretty decent human beings who are feeling pretty rotten about having to go out there and face their electors this summer. In 1924 he said:

> The economist can, of course, give us the facts. That is his job. He is a good cartographer, but a bad pilot. There were plenty of crises in the nineteenth century, when cold-blooded economic fact would have been the end of us if there had not been some vision to interpret it.

The vision to interpret, so that we can have a country that is meaningful from a cultural perspective and can be identified on the world's map, is cut when the Department of Communications is losing $1.8 million; Canada Council, $230,000—it is death by attrition; CBC, $400,000; Telefilm, $210,000; CRTC, $290,000; National Archives, $590,000—that is a disgrace; National Arts Centre, $150,000; National Film Board, $470,000; National Library, $550,000; National Gallery, $530,000; Museums of Science and Technology, $210,000; Canadian Museum of Nature, $260,000; Canadian Museum of Civilization, $540,000.

There are additional figures I would have been happy to give. If we want a country that is sovereign, that has cultural identity, that differentiates itself from the world marketplace, that has a reason for existence, then arts and culture and the role this creative intellect brings to our society are fundamental. We better start putting it first. It is a very important economic lever as well as a cultural expression of our people. It is the heart, soul and mind. It expresses who we are and why we exist.

We have problems as a nation. There are differences linguistically and differences culturally. We have the strength of Canada and its diversity. That is the unity of Canada. That diversity is expressed culturally in a variety of ways. It is the food we eat. It is the films we see. It is the way we entertain ourselves. It is the way we play. It is the way we have fun.

I ask members to come to Montreal and I will show them a city that is as culturally diverse as any city in this country. Its people know how to have fun and play together as neighbours, whatever the language. In my riding they speak 36 languages, besides the official English and French. They are proud to speak both.

[Translation]

It is a pleasure to live in Quebec and in Montreal. Come and participate. Let us keep this country and prosper together.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I am going to try to pick up where my colleague left off in a brilliant and articulate way.

We are discussing tonight a package of estimates, a package of financial expenditures by the national government that total $160 billion for the current fiscal year 1992-93. Those are big numbers for most Canadians. It becomes difficult to understand how large a pool of financial capital that really is when we begin to think of our finances back home.

The Constitution is clearly on the national agenda. Canadians from coast to coast to coast want that national unity dossier closed and closed successfully. At the same time people are constitutionally fatigued in part because it is a natural phenomenon that they feel it has become too much of a national pastime to discuss our Constitution. More important, they are fatigued out of a sense of frustration that the leadership at all levels, but starting here in Parliament in Ottawa, has not focused on the state of our economy to the degree they would expect.

Some of them are looking at their television sets this evening. They are probably in their living rooms thinking and asking themselves how much of this $160 billion expenditure package is being utilized to help the country get itself out of this economic malaise that unfortunately has gripped this nation for far too long. The average resident in my riding of York West wants to know the bang economically that we are getting from their bucks.

I was reading the result of a poll that compared a poll by the same pollster in 1982, 10 years ago, which essentially asked Canadians: "How hopeful are you for the Canadian future? How hopeful are you for your own family? What is the satisfaction level that you feel in terms of your place in the Canadian society?"

• (1950)

It was quite telling to notice how much those levels have dropped dramatically since 1982 in terms of their own personal hope and the hope they attach to the country. I do not wish to be negative for the sake of being negative or to be negative because we happen to be temporarily on this side of House. I refer to those statistics because they are basically cemented to the economics of the day. Many Canadians are disillusioned.

Many Canadians are indifferent. Many Canadians are hopeless in terms of their economic livelihoods.

When we talk about $160 billion, the person who is unemployed in my riding cannot help but think why we could not utilize some more of those moneys in terms of stimulating the economy and stimulating economic growth and with that growth jobs. What is so wrong with the logical feeling one gets when one looks at $160 billion?

What about individuals who are looking for some retraining but are told by employment offices across the land that the training funds have all dried up? Then they watch their television sets to forget about the real world and they see government advertising. About what? About its great training programs.

What about individuals who want to learn a job, a trade? Why can we not be like other modern countries and put in place effective apprenticeship programs? We would be saying that they do not need a university degree to be a somebody, that a university degree is as good as a plumbing certificate, a carpentry certificate, or a tool and die making certificate.

What about the transition programs that this government promised after having signed the free trade agreement with the United States? Those programs are needed when workers become displaced because of the free trade agreement. The agreement went through. People were displaced. But we are still waiting for those transition programs.

In a study done by the Montreal Board of Trade of my province of Ontario, the manufacturing capital of this country, some 400,000 jobs were lost. Most of them were in the province of Ontario. In my own metropolitan city of Toronto 8,000 firms have closed their doors with a direct loss of 63,000 jobs. Another 33,000 jobs were lost because of industry and companies beginning to size down.

We have a situation that is serious. It did not accrue somehow last week and we are complaining about it this week. The government says: "Give us a chance. Let's analyse it. Let's go back to the drawing board". This recession, this malaise, has been in some regions of this country more than others for a very long time.

It is frustrating to be a member of Parliament in the opposition. We are not sure where a parliamentary majority starts and finishes or where a parliamentary dictatorship starts and finishes in terms of trying to bring to the equation a number of variables that we feel are important.

Maybe there is something to aspirations of Canadians who hope for a minority Parliament or a minority government the next time around because it is the most accountable government Canadians have come to know. Nothing is a better lesson than the last eight years.

We talk about $160 billion of expenditures by the national government. It seems to me almost ironic that we are debating this tonight. Yet day and after day we have a government that continues to tell us in the opposition on behalf of Canadians that it cannot afford to stimulate the economy, that it cannot afford to have increased training, that it cannot afford to have transition programs, that it cannot afford to do apprenticeship programs and that it cannot afford child care, all under the pretext of the deficit. We are not preaching fiscal irresponsibility, nor is any Canadian advocating that we be fiscally irresponsible. But as my colleague said previously, there is a role for a national government to play. There is also a role for national governments to play in the economy. It would seem logical to me that some stimulus, some incentives are an investment in the future, that they would bear some fruit. We spend $30 billion a year to keep people on unemployment insurance and when they are finished their unemployment insurance we tell them to collect welfare, and they collect another $12,000 on welfare.

Canadians want to work. Canadians want to regain their dignity. Canadians want to be productive. Canadians want to be part of building Canada. They do not want to be part of the soap opera crowd that stays at home watching television, then goes down to their local unemployment office to collect a cheque. There is no dignity in that. There is no satisfaction in that and there is no satisfaction for those who are fortunate enough to be working and also paying for those services.

I will wind up my 10 minute remarks by saying that we are voting tonight on expenditures of $160 billion. Clearly there was room in this national government budget to help Canadians go back to work and to help Canadians help themselves. By helping themselves they will help the country. If they feel better and feel more dignified, that poll in 1992 that showed a dismal drop in attitudes would be changed and changed for the better.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I want to first of all thank my colleague. He took a very reasoned and rational approach to an incredibly large amount of money and indicated that when you are spending $160 billion, there is certainly room to do something constructive and helpful to move this country out of its doldrums and move the population, who are feeling so badly about being out of work. I have forgotten what the figure was for people out of work, and I am going to ask my colleague if he could refresh our memory as to what is happening out there in terms of unemployment.

More particularly, I know my colleague is a man who has good ideas. He talked about all the things that could be done and the feelings of satisfaction and dissatisfaction. I wonder if he could address some of the good ideas this party has put forward that could effectively create jobs and meet the aspirations of the unemployed that he was talking about.

Mr. Marchi: Madam Speaker, I would be happy to respond to my colleague's question.

One of those classic examples that comes to mind is one that has been proposed by our leader as recently as last week when he addressed the Conference of Mayors and Municipalities in Montreal concerning the idea of trying to get the federal government to support an infrastructure program, a program that would see the three levels of government participating in the restructuring, rebuilding and renewing of our inner and outer cities.

Again, it is a question of common sense and logic. You know as well as I do, Madam Speaker, whether it is Montreal or Toronto or Vancouver or Hamilton or North Bay or Sudbury, those cities and towns constantly need upgrading. Whether it is a question of doing it sooner or later, it would be advantageous for unemployed Canadians if we moved those projects up.

• (2000)

I used to be in municipal government in the city of North York and know of what I speak. There used to be a large number of projects on our shelves that we, as a municipality, were unable to afford a dollar on the dollar. We were only able to put up 30 cents, 33 cents, or 45 cents on the dollar in terms of initiating those projects. The remaining moneys for that $1 would have to come from the other two senior levels of government.

So there is a role for this government to play in actually kick-starting those projects. They could be taken off the shelf so that we could at least put carpenters, bricklayers, electricians, and the other trades back to work, which would then have an impact on the other services. There would be a sense of momentum, of movement, and some confidence would be rekindled in the economy.

Clearly one idea we have advanced is a national restructuring program with our cities and municipalities. We have asked for not great sums, certainly not as much as the refitting of the new helicopters would require, some $4.3 billion.

I am not suggesting our navy or our Armed Forces do not need upgrading but there are a number of different opinions concerning the dollar figure that is being attached to that $4.3 billion helicopter purchase and that it clearly could be scaled down.

My point is the government was very quick to approve those moneys and yet it was equally quick and easy for this government to dismiss other such ideas as not being in keeping with the financial plans of this government.

Some of the greatest frustrations for Canadians is that no one is listening to the ideas they have advanced. The idea for a restructuring program in our inner cities is not necessarily only coming from this side of the House and the opposition leader, it is coming from municipalities, from local elected officials, from provincial officials. The idea is being supported on the street level by those Canadians who dearly want to go back to work, including my own city of metropolitan Toronto.

There now seems to be more construction in Ottawa. We have the unbelievable situation of Toronto contractors coming to bid on jobs in Ottawa when two, three or four years ago that was absolutely an unthinkable solution but it is here and unfortunately we have to deal with it.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, there is a story going around about two tourists on safari in Africa. They were admiring the wonders of the grassy plains when suddenly they were charged by a huge lion. There was no place to hide and their vehicle was too far away to take refuge. One tourist stared in amazement as the second man bent down to tie up his shoelace. "You cannot possibly outrun that lion", he exclaimed. "No", replied the first man as he broke into a fast trot. "I do not have to outrun the lion. All I have to do is outrun you".

Canada's future industrial strength depends on our ability and the ability of Canadian businesses to outrun the competition world-wide.

I am privileged to speak in the House today about a number of accomplishments in support of Canada's international competitiveness as promoted by the government's flagship economic department, the Department of Industry, Science and Technology Canada or ISTC as it is known.

Recognizing the link between science, technology, and industrial development, in February 1990 this government set up the Department of Industry, Science and Technology Canada specifically to promote international competitiveness and excellence in these areas.

ISTC works in co-operation with other government departments and agencies, with business and the academic community, to develop a wide range of programs and services to help Canada improve its international competitiveness.

Since its inception, ISTC has played a key role in developing the national Prosperity Initiative. The Prosperity Initiative recognizes five key areas where Canada must improve its competitiveness if we are to sustain long-term prosperity in this country.

I would like to repeat these five areas just for the record. They are learning, research and development, investment, our internal Canadian domestic market and our ability to export.

Let us consider the concept of the learning society put forward by this government in the last Speech from the Throne. We are only too aware of the unhappy statistics about high school drop-out rates in Canada. We know that about 85 per cent of the technology we will use in the year 2000 was not even invented in 1990. In this world of rapidly changing technologies, we must encourage our children to pursue studies in mathematics, sciences, engineering and related disciplines.

We realize too that learning is a lifelong process which must continue on the job as well as in the schools. ISTC has a number of programs aimed at supporting and promoting the scientific education and training of young Canadians. For example, the Canada Scholarships Program provides undergraduate students with $2,000 a year for up to four years of study in the natural sciences, engineering and related disciplines.

In 1991 there were 6,000 students benefiting from these scholarships in Canada. I would like to add that about half of the Canada Scholarships are awarded to female students. The program has recently expanded to provide scholarships for technologists and technicians.

This program is helping to ensure that Canada has a pool of technically skilled and highly qualified persons in fields critical to our industrial and technological competitiveness.

The department also leads a national public awareness campaign on science and technology aimed at Canadian youth to encourage them to place more value on, and to pursue careers in science, engineering and technology. ISTC also funds a program called Science Culture Canada which aims to develop a better public understanding of science and technology, especially among young Canadians.

National organizations and specific projects such as science fairs, exhibits, books, videos and lectures are sponsored throughout this program and such activities help to make science and technology less arcane, more accessible and more relevant to people in their daily lives.

Closely linked to the concept of a learning society is research and development. With the rapid evolution of technology, facilities are now in place to permit the almost instantaneous transmission of information and ideas. In these circumstances it is critical that our research and development performance keep stride with the pace being set by our world competitors.

Our record in this country is mixed. In high tech sectors such as electronics, aerospace and computers our research and development spending is ahead of the averages of most of the OECD countries. Yet only four Canadian manufacturing companies in 100 are doing any research at all and the top 10 companies account for almost 40 per cent of our research and development spending.

ISTC actively supports partnerships between government, industry and the research community to promote research and development and the application of new technologies.

Through the networks of Centres of Excellence, 35 universities, 37 major industrial bodies and over 500 of the top researchers in this country are working together in co-ordinated multi-year research projects in areas like biotechnology, disease control, industrial materials and processes, information technologies and atmospheric research.

Studies in Europe and the United States have shown that roughly half of business productivity gains can be directly attributed to technology improvements. But the best technology in the world is useless if you do not know you need it or you do not know where to find it or you do not know how to use it.

Real progress lies in the building of alliances and partnerships, in the sharing of ideas, information and resources and in the effective transfer and application of new technologies. In order to maintain Canada's position as a leading economic nation, we must strengthen existing partnerships and we must forge new ones.

For this reason, ISTC has initiated the Strategic Technologies Program to promote networks and alliances among the research community and government and industry. The program encourages the development and the diffusion of such technologies as biotechnology, microelectronics and advanced industrial materials. The program helps to provide a critical mass to Canada's research and development efforts to facilitate the gathering of scientific expertise, capital investment and market source development.

Our Advanced Manufacturing Technologies Application Program helps small and medium-sized enterprises to identify the technologies appropriate to their needs and to organize their production methods and train their employees so that the most effective use is made of these technologies.

• (2010)

Through the Technology Outreach Program we support technology centres that offer management and technical expertise, testing facilities, training, and intelligence to small and medium sized enterprises to help them develop new products and new processes.

ISTC is also active in promoting the principles and goals of Canada's green plan while at the same time recognizing sound business opportunities in the environmental sector. Our Environmental Technology Commercialization Program helps Canadian industry to commercialize environmentally friendly technologies both for the domestic market and abroad. Strong public and private sector spending in the environment over the past decade has created huge multibillion dollar markets in North America and Europe for firms that supply environmental goods and services to governments, businesses and households.

In 1990 Canadian production activity in this field was valued at nearly $10 billion. ISTC estimates the real annual expansion rate of the sector to be between 5 and 7 per cent. Programs such as these complement long-standing and successful programs like the Industrial Research Assistance Program of the National Research Council. This unique Canadian technology network consists of institutional partners and technical advisers who combine technical advice with access to financial and information resources. They deliver these services at the level of the individual firm.

These programs in support of research and development and technology transfers are vital to the continued prosperity of this country. We recognize that there is more to competitiveness than innovation and a highly qualified work force. We know that Canadian businesses must pursue a competitiveness agenda that includes human resource development, technological application, state of the art production methods and improved business management skills suited for the challenges of the nineties and beyond.

ISTC plays a vital role in working toward the improvement of the skills of business managers, including their understanding of technology and how best to use it.

A range of other services are available for small and medium-sized enterprises to increase their technological sophistication. For example, the Manufacturers Visitors Program sees Canadian firms open their doors to small and medium-sized businesses to show how they have successfully applied the principles of just-in-time inventories. Total quality management, empowerment of employees, and technology transfers are other assets of that kind of program.

It is precisely this sharing of ideas and experiences in the Canadian industrial context that will help to ensure Canada's continued competitiveness and prosperity as we move into the next century.

Through the annual Canada Awards for Business Excellence and the Strategies for Success initiative ISTC honours the companies and the individuals who have demonstrated a commitment to business excellence in Canada.

It is part of ISTC's mandate to provide Canadian businesses with information and services that will help them to hone their competitive edge. The department has set up 16 business service centres across the country. At these centres businesses can consult the Business Opportunities Sourcing System, a computerized data bank that offers profiles of over 26,000 Canadian companies.

Entrepreneurs can access thousands of licensing offers from around the world, or obtain information about government programs and about science and technology improvements, both domestic and foreign. Eleven of these business service centres are run jointly with External Affairs and International Trade Canada as international trade centres. Accessing the resources of over 100 Canadian missions overseas these centres are able to help provide firms with vital information to improve their export sales.

I mentioned earlier that one of the five key areas for our continued prosperity was our ability to export. I would like to speak for a moment or two about the importance of international trade. The fact is that Canada is a trading nation. This country was carved out of the wilderness by traders. Trade has kept food on our table and clothes on our backs for over three centuries. Trade has helped to build the high standard of living and the enviable social safety net that we enjoy in Canada today.

ISTC is committed to helping Canadian industries and businesses be competitive in the international marketplace. It is our objective to help develop and secure access to world markets for Canadian products and services. Working with industry we are assessing Canadian strengths and weaknesses in relation to world markets. We are developing strategies to position Canadian firms to compete more effectively.

There is no turning back from the reality of global competition. In today's world it is by stimulating initiative and the will to succeed that modern nations can achieve higher standards of living, greater security and continued prosperity for their people.

The department has launched a series of sector competitive initiatives in areas ranging from commercial education to micro-electronics, from forest products to the fashion industry, from advanced manufacturing technologies to the emerging environmental business. Working closely with industry, labour and other government departments, we are identifying issues, challenges and opportunities specific to each related sector and we are developing action plans to address them.

ISTC and International Trade Canada are working together to promote new market opportunities created by the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement in areas such as consumer goods, food, textiles, clothing, footwear, consulting services, education and training services, and so on.

Confronted with the enormous challenges of our times we sometimes forget to acknowledge our achievements and concentrate only on the problems that remain to be solved. Therefore it is useful to take a good look from time to time at the solid hard work and accomplishments of a department in our Canadian government such as Industry, Science and Technology Canada. ISTC is in the business of promoting international competitiveness and excellence in Canadian industry.

Through programs and services such as those I have briefly mentioned tonight the department strives to co-operate with and promote the interests of the Canadian scientific, research and industry sectors.

The men and women of ISTC deserve commendation for their dedication, initiative and creativity in seeking and applying uniquely Canadian answers to the challenges of international competition.

Canada is a fortunate and wealthy country. It is no accident that the United Nations recently rated it as the best country in the world in which to live. We have problems and challenges ahead of us, but we also have the tools at hand to solve them.

I am pleased to have had this opportunity to share with this House some of the tools available in the Department of Industry, Science and Technology to help us in our pursuit of international competitiveness and prosperity. As I said at the beginning, the job is not to outrun the lion, the job is to outrun our competition. We are organizing Canada to do just that.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I listened to the Minister for International Trade trying to defend free trade. At least that is the way I heard it. It was very loud and very forceful. It reminded me of the line that my colleague from Edmonton East tells me comes from Hamlet: "Full of sound and fury signifying nothing".

It would seem that the government has determined that it is important at this stage in the life of Canada to try to sell the free trade idea to Canadians in the same way that it tried to sell it in the election campaign of 1988.

I did a lot of door-to-door canvassing in that election. I canvassed over 2,000 homes. The issue that was raised more often than everything else put together was that of free trade. It was not that the people I met were opposed to it and neither did they support it, they just did not know. They had the feeling that the government was holding back, that it was not telling them anything about free trade itself and was simply trying to persuade them that they had to accept it as an article of faith. It is like Castor Oil, have some because it is good for you. That was really what the government was trying to do the Canadian people.

In some areas of the country it worked. It did persuade people to swallow this article of good faith, to swallow this free trade deal with the U.S. and see how it would work out without ever really being persuaded to be in favour of it.

• (2020)

[Translation]

Mr. Fontaine: Mr. Speaker, I found out about the subject of today's debate and I see no reference in it to the free trade agreement that has been so beneficial for Canadians and Canadian businesses.

I think that the agenda deals with an entirely different subject and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether members can on their own initiative change the program and comment on subjects that are unrelated to it. I would like you to give us your opinion on this, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is a precedent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est)): I would like to tell the hon. member for Lévis that I took what the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan said as part of his preamble and that he was just getting into his subject when you interrupted him.

[English]

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who interrupted has probably forgotten that the architect of all of the economic problems of Canada right now is the person who spoke this afternoon, the person who is now the minister for free trade. He was the Minister of Finance. He was the Minister of Finance when the Conference Board of Canada said that the government "has induced the first made in Canada recession ever in the history of our country". We are still in that recession. The hon. member for Lévis might say that we are not in a recession any more, that we are in a depression now. Certainly things are very bad.

In spite of all of the assurances given by the now minister of trade, the former Minister of Finance, there is absolutely no sound evidence that we are getting out of it. Neither is there any sound evidence that the free trade deal is going to help us get out of our problems. On the contrary, there is a good deal of evidence to persuade me and a lot of Canadian people that it is the free trade deal that has created our problems. It is not just the free trade deal as far as we know it, but the parts that we have to guess about, the parts about which we have to speculate.

For example, a former minister of the Crown was the first minister to say that the Canadian dollar is so high because it was part of the free trade deal that Canada would agree to get the dollar high. If you want to make trouble in Canada, what is the first thing to do? Make our exports so high in price that nobody wants to buy them. Of course the high dollar does that.

What is the next thing to do? If you have cut off the foreign markets, then cut off the interior markets, cut off the internal markets. Don't give people who will spend it the money to buy consumer goods within our country. Of course, that is what they have done as well. The dollar was high and that pushed up the price of our exports and hurt our markets. Interest rates were very high and the government was taxing people to try to get the money to pay that interest. Of course, that was pushing up the costs of living for the people in the lower income tax brackets.

The government from the time it was elected has been taking money away from the poorest and from the lower to middle-income people and giving it to those who are in the highest income brackets.

Let us take a look at the budget with which we are dealing right now. There is the GST, of course. Does the pittance where the lowest income tax people get a lower amount than those who are getting—

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est)): Order, please. I would ask hon. members present to keep order, please, so that the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan can continue his speech.

The hon. member again has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Stupich: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I appreciate the fact that they are listening and that they are commenting. I suppose it hurts to have to listen to some of this. I can appreciate why they are trying to drown me out.

It is obvious that the government has been lightening the tax load for those at the highest income levels and increasing it for the ones at the low income levels. It has been doing that, there is no question about it.

In this particular budget when it comes to housing, what does it do? It said to the people who needed it most and could afford it the least "we are going to cut back on the funding for social housing, but we are going to increase the funding for those who have plenty of money. Families can put as much as $20,000, $40,000 of their RRSPs into housing".

The people who do not need that kind of help are getting it. The people who need it are being cut off. There is evidence. Make it higher and perhaps 28,000 would take advantage of it.

The point I am trying to make is that it is helping those who do not need help from the government who could have acquired homes, who could have built them without any government help, and saying to the ones at the bottom that they are not getting any government help. They need it so they do not deserve it. That is what it has been doing.

The ministers of the Crown have been quite open about this, quite honest about it. What they have argued is that if they leave more money in the hands or the pockets of the people who are most wealthy, perhaps they will invest it. They might invest it in Canada. They might invest it somewhere else, but they will invest it and it is good for people to have the wealthy ones investing.

If it is given to the poor, what are they going to do with it? They will spend it. That is wasting it. Let us take it away from the poor and give more of it to the high income people. That will be good. They will invest it.

What they are going to invest it in and who is going to buy the product they of course do not bother dealing with. They assume that is going to happen automatically.

In housing, they help the wealthy and they hurt the poorest. What about—

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Give them a break.

Mr. Stupich: The member says give them a break. Well, if he is one of the wealthy he has had the break and he has had it ever since the Tories were elected in 1984. He is still getting it. Heaven forbid that they get re-elected again but if they do, there is no doubt that they will get even more help at the expense of the ones in the low and middle income brackets.

What do they do with industry? Industry laps it up. They like it. But they made the help available to the manufacturing and processing industry by reducing the income tax. A reduction in income tax does nothing for you at all unless you are making a profit. It is only when you make a profit that you pay income tax, and often not even then.

Nevertheless they are helping the industries that are already successful and doing nothing for the thousands of industries, firms that have gone bankrupt and are still going bankrupt on a daily basis. There is nothing for them at all, simply help the ones who are already being successful and who do not need government handouts.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Capital cost allowance. He doesn't understand.

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, that is next on the list. Capital cost allowance, hastening the rate at which they can write off capital investments. It is another dodge. It is another way of handing to those who need it.

Unless you are going to pay income tax, you do not need to increase your CCA. You do not need a higher capital cost allowance unless you are in an income tax bracket already.

Sure it lowers an expense for those who do not need the help. That is the point I am trying to make. They are helping the ones who do not need the help and they are not helping, indeed they are hurting, the ones who do need the help. That is what is wrong with this budget and that is what has been wrong with every budget since the Tories were elected in 1984.

I can recall a federal member of Parliament decades ago, a CCF member who never lived long enough to become a New Democrat member. He used to argue then and he argued in the House of Commons: You want to improve the economy. We talked earlier about exports. The second feature is to put more money in the pockets of people who are going to spend it. If you did give more to the people at the bottom levels, they are not going to go on holidays. They are not going to invest it in an opportunity outside Canada. They are going to spend it here in Canada. They are going to put that money to work within our own country and put people to work by putting that money to work.

There are ways. The Minister of Finance who was clever enough to put us into the first made in Canada recession ever knew how he did it. He did it by keeping the dollar high and by having high interest rates that go together. He is trying to reverse it now but not quite enough. It is not the same person, but the same government. He does not have quite enough nerve to do it fast enough.

For a while they thought they made a mistake. They thought they were coming down too fast. They have been so frightened ever since at having made one small mistake that they are extremely cautious, cautious to the point that there really are no signs that we are recovering from the depression we are currently in.

In this budget the federal government also reduced the income tax. That is great. It was across the board, it helped everybody. Some of the people in the lowest brackets, the ones who are paying income tax, are ahead as much as $14 a year. There are others who are ahead $1,000 a year. If they turned it around and gave that $1,000 to the poorest and the $14 to the highest income people, it would have done some good.

• (2030)

The ones at the top do not need that extra money to spend. They are not going to spend it here anyway. They are already eating and drinking as much as they want. They are using the consumer goods to the extent they want. They can afford it. The people at the bottom are not. Even that income tax reduction was at the wrong level.

The government was very critical of some of the provinces for the problems they had. It cut back on the increase in transfer payments and led those provinces into the problems they now have.

An hon. member: He is not worth listening to.

Mr. Stupich: I do not know whether the hon. member has spoken in this debate.

An hon. member: Transfer payments are going up.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Tremblay (Québec-Est)): I would ask the hon. member to always address his remarks to the Chair. I must also tell him that in a few minutes, during the period for questions and comments, he will have plenty of opportunity to ask questions and to comment. I give the floor to the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

[English]

Mr. Stupich: The member is listening but not quite sharply enough. What I said was not cutting back in transfer payments but cutting back at the rate transfer payments were increasing. There is a difference.

An hon. member: They do not know the difference.

Mr. Stupich: If he wants to listen to me and criticize or comment, then he has to listen a bit more carefully than he has been to this point.

The provinces have a problem, there is no question about it. They depend to a large extent on the transfer payments, the moneys they get from the federal government. All of the provinces get some and they all depend on it.

All of the provinces have public debt they have to pay. They have to pay interest on it. They have to try to get out of debt because debt to them is a way of financing current expenditures to some extent, and also capital expenditures. It is a very real thing. They all try to avoid it and get out of debt because interest to them is a cost.

It is different for the federal government. The federal government borrows money as well, of course, but it uses borrowing as a means of transferring more income to the wealthy from the low middle-income people and the low income people. The provinces have to pay it. The federal government simply collects it from one group and gives it to another. Only those at the top of the income level can buy significant amounts of Canada Savings Bonds or any of the other debt instruments the government uses. So there is that difference.

To the provinces debt is a real problem. To the federal government it is an opportunity for them to transfer more income into the pockets of those who need it least.

There was an item in the opening speech where the government talked about a national highway program. I thought it was coming to its senses and we were going to see something good in this coming budget.

The national highway program would do a couple of things. In the first place it would create a tremendous amount of job opportunity from one end of Canada to the other. It could be financed within Canada and would provide work in every province of Canada.

Those dollars being received by the people working on those projects would be spent in their own communities, in every province, from one end of Canada to the other. It would turn over time after time after time. It would generate a tremendous amount of economic activity.

Every time it turned over, the federal government would be there with its hand out getting its share of GST and income tax from those who were profitable working on that highway program. It would have been a tremendous income generator for the federal government. It would have been a tremendous income generator for hundreds of thousands of people in Canada who are unemployed. It would have given them some hope.

It would have done something else. Such a program would have helped tie Canada together from one ocean to the other, east to west. It would have helped eliminate some problems we have with north-south boundaries between provinces. It would have helped strengthen the east-west boundary between us and the U.S.

I have to ask myself why did nothing come of that? Why was it dropped? Who put it in there? Who wanted it in there? Opening speeches are contributed to by many people. The different cabinet ministers have an opportunity to say what they want. Somebody wanted the kind of program that would generate real economic activity in Canada and tie the people of Canada together from one end to the other. But somebody did not want it because there is not a word of it in the budget. Nothing. It is something that could have been so good.

Instead of that we have billion dollar programs for helicopters, for example. The only way we can put those helicopters to use is searching for submarines. The hon. member for North Island—Powell River suggested we buy the submarine navy from the Soviet Union or whatever country has it now and give them wheat in exchange. They desperately need wheat; they do not need the submarines. Then we would have some submarines to watch with our helicopters.

What are we going to do with those helicopters? They are not good for any other job except that. Billions of dollars are being wasted on projects like that when we could have had something that would have generated a lot of employment and economic activity. It would have been good for the economy here in Canada. It would have strengthened Canada from one end to the other. It would have strengthened that border. But we are not doing that.

This budget and the spending program announced by the Minister of Finance followed the regular Tory tradition that has been evident for the last eight years, since the Tories were elected in 1984. It continues to take money from the poorest and the low middle income people out of proportion to what it is taking from the highest income people. It continues to give new incentives and opportunities to those at the top of the pile to improve their position. It does nothing to get the economy going.

This housing program is going to run out pretty quickly. How many people in those categories need new homes? How many of them are really going to take their money out of RRSPs to that extent and put it into new homes? Yes, there has been a flurry of activity as the member pointed out. How many more homes would have been built had the government been prepared to put that money into social housing in every province in Canada? That kind of program is needed from one end of this great country to the other. A national program like that could have helped tie Canada together.

There are a couple of things the government could have done. It could have done something to improve our economy and it desperately needs it. It could have done things to help pull Canada together and Canada desperately needs that. The government is following the agenda it came into office with in 1984. It has failed Canada for eight years. It is time to let someone else take over the reins of government, someone dedicated to the idea of building a real Canada. Canadians are proud of Canada now, but we could be even prouder. There is more we can do for ourselves and more that could be done. We could improve our economy. We could improve our country and make Canada a much better country in which to live.

I am proud of it now and pleased to be here. I am very happy to be a Canadian, but I am disappointed at what we have been able to do for ourselves with this Tory government that has been in office some eight years. Goodness knows just what bad news it is holding back to present us with later. I hope this government does not get re-elected whenever the next election is because Canadians cannot afford this kind of government much longer.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I think it has probably been a long time since this House has heard such a disjointed and convoluted bit of rhetoric. The member has talked about the inadequacies of the federal government's proposals. He suggested we spend money on social housing and creating jobs through public employment projects such as perhaps a national highway system. He has talked at length about ways the government should be spending more money, giving money to lower income people. He did not address where the money was coming from.

An hon. member: Yes, he did.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): He did not talk about the possibility of raising taxes for the bulk of Canadian taxpayers who really contribute the funds. He criticized reducing tax rates for small businesses without addressing the negative impact it would have on small business and job creation if we do not reduce tax levels.

• (2040)

He talked about the dangers of the debt and the deficit on a provincial basis. He spoke quite rightly about debt as being a disease that cripples and maims the abilities of governments to help people. On the federal level he talked about the deficit as being poor social policy because the existence of a deficit, necessarily by its very existence, is transferring wealth from the lower income people to the higher income people.

Do you know something, Madam Speaker? He is right. He is absolutely right because when we run a deficit the people who finance the deficit are generally those who have the ability to purchase Treasury bills, Government of Canada bonds and savings bonds. He is absolutely right. I agree with him.

When we run a deficit we are transferring money from all the single mothers, from all the elderly people and from all the disadvantaged taxpayers in this country. We are taking their tax dollars and putting them in a form of income in the bank accounts of the higher income earners. Is that not right? That is what he said.

The member showed a great deal of wisdom and insight in saying that. That is exactly why the mandate of the government has been to cut back spending, to reduce the deficit and to try to get a handle on this immoral flow of wealth from poor to rich. Surely if he sticks by his principles—and he is a man of the New Democratic Party people and constituency—he will have to support the government's financial and fiscal thrust.

I want to know what argument the member puts forward for attacking the government's agenda of trying to reduce our deficit financing and stop transferring money into the bank accounts of the higher income earners.

Mr. Stupich: Madam Speaker, I wish we had more time to go on with this and that the member would stay in the House. Perhaps he would learn something.

The member said I did not suggest where the funding would come from and that I criticized the government for having relieved the tax load on the high and upper middle income people by some $1.4 billion in this first year and by $2.5 billion in the second year, money that could have been used to create $25 million worth of economic activity. That is where the money would have come from: the giveaways to the wealthy. That is what I am suggesting.

Also $4.3 billion was spent for helicopters. The point I was trying to make is that we do not need those helicopters. There were $40 million on proposal costs dealing with the helicopters and $1 billion on low-level air defence against Soviet Russia. Soviet Russia does not exist any longer. This is $1 billion on a system that does not work. The government spent $250 million to purchase anti-tank guns. We will have to build the tanks first or buy them somewhere, or what are they going to shoot at? Will it be each other?

I tried to point out where the funding would come from. I am trying to say that the government is wasting money. We need not take all this money. Some of this money could go into the deficit. It could just take a portion of it and put $2.5 billion of it, one year's saving of income tax to the wealthy, into a national highway program year after year. That in itself would have a significant effect upon lowering the deficit by creating economic activity in Canada and by paying wages to people who would spend them here in Canada.

It is obvious. I hope the member now realizes the error of his ways.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I would like to make some comments about the estimates that we are going to vote on tonight. It is one of the most important votes we have in this Chamber. We are going to allocate approximately $160 billion to the government so that it can spend.

I remember when we took office as Conservatives in 1984 that the budget at that time was only $90 billion and the debt was only $180 billion. After so many years we are still running a huge deficit of $30 billion probably this year and next year, annually, and the accumulated debt is over $420 billion.

We are in a bind because a lot of the money we collect from the taxpayers has to go to servicing the debt. Naturally this does not allow us to move in the direction we would like to move and probably spend more money on infrastructure and other projects, especially in a time of recession.

I remember just a couple of months ago the Minister of Finance would not pronounce the r word, recession. He said: "We are not in recession. There is no problem. We are going to get on with economic activity". He did not realize—and a lot of the members on the government side did not realize it—that the economy was slowing down and that we were losing a lot of economic activity because of a free trade deal with the United States that had not been negotiated properly.

The people who negotiated the deal said that we would have an adjustment period for our industry, and so on and so forth. We have just to look at certain areas like the border towns of Cornwall and others that have lost almost all of their industry. Almost all their industry has moved to the United States.

It is quite understandable because in any situation where we have a free trade deal, we need parity as far as taxation is concerned, as far as the cost of money is concerned and as far as productivity is concerned. Otherwise we are at a loss. We cannot compete.

What happens is that people in business know. For instance, a factory situated in Mississauga where industrial land goes for $300,000 or $400,000 an acre can get the same land across the border in the United States, in Buffalo, for $30,000 or $20,000. The labour cost is lower. A lot of these companies move across the border to establish their economic activity in the United States.

All this has compounded the problem we are facing today. We are simply becoming suppliers now of raw materials for the United States and other parts of the world. As most of our trade goes to the United States, we are supplying the raw materials.

The Minister for International Trade has a special line now. He says: "We have much more exports to the United States". Naturally we might have more exports, but it is raw materials. It is not manufactured goods. This is the problem. Factories are being established in the United States. We export raw materials, and who benefits but them? I will conclude because my time it up.

Mr. Stupich: Madam Speaker, yes, it is true. The government has gone terribly into debt in the eight years it has been in office after promising quite a different approach.

We can recall that every year in at least the past four years the Minister of Finance has stood in this House and has predicted that year after next the deficit would be less than $30 billion. Each year it is the year after next. It is always the year after next. It is never next year or never this year. It is always in the future that it is going to be under $30 billion. He has not made it and he will not make it until he does something to get the economy going.

By spending a bit of money to get the economy going he will get the deficit down. We will be able to reduce not just the deficit but the debt itself.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Madam Speaker, it is interesting to listen to the debate this evening. I do not think anyone on that side of the House, the opposition side of the House, has spoken in favour of a reduced tax burden when we think through what they have said. They are all in favour of increasing and expanding government services, that no deed should be left undone.

I raise that for a particular reason. The Ottawa Citizen and other newspapers across this country referred to what they call tax freedom day. The headline in The Ottawa Citizen read: "Tax Freedom Day. It took until June 10 to pay all taxes, report finds". That is what the report that is put out by the Fraser Institute tells us. Tax freedom day is the day when all Canadians theoretically free themselves from what they call pesky tax collectors. Obviously it varies from province to province. In Ontario they tell us it is June 13. In Prince Edward Island, I guess we can give P.E.I. credit, I think there is at least one Islander in here tonight, the date is actually May 10, so theirs comes earlier than in most provinces.

• (2050)

I make that point because the reality of governing is that when you have to deliver services, you have to pay the bills. That is the part that most of us have difficulty with when we listen to members from the other side of this House. They forget that at the end of the day the bills have to be paid.

I take delight in the words of the Liberal Party which governed this country or did form the government until 1984 when we replaced them. In 1984 when we took office, one of their top people and a former cabinet minister took great delight in bragging that they left the cupboard bare. In other words, the Liberal government left the cupboard bare. There is nothing there. There is no money there to use.

The government that replaced them, which was us, would have a difficult time governing simply because there was no money. They left the cupboard bare. Much to their astonishment we got re-elected in 1988. If things work out, however we never know what is going to happen in the next election, and if the economy begins to move forward and a few other things happen, I suppose we will have a fair kick at the can in 1992 or 1993 whenever the next election comes, although we never know when it is going to be.

The point is that when we took office in 1984, we inherited a debt of $200 billion. Even the members on the other side of the House do not argue with that number. They accept it as being a reasonable figure. Some might suggest that the figure was a little higher. Some will say that it was $240 billion and others will say it was a little more.

The point I want to make is if you put compound interest on that debt and work it through an eight year period, that is where we are today in this country, a little over $400 billion in debt. It is the compound interest on that debt. It was because they left the cupboard bare that we are in this financial mess. We are not trying to disguise that.

One thing I want to point out is that the only real measurement of the debt is in terms of the Gross Domestic Product. That is where I think we can take some pleasure from what we have done as a government. The economy under this government has expanded faster than any other economy in the world with the exception of Japan since 1984. I think we can take some pleasure in that.

We can also take some pleasure in the fact that in relation to Gross Domestic Product, our debt position has been halved. It is just half of what it was in 1984. We have made tremendous progress. In fact, if it were not for Tory policies, our debt would be much higher than it is today. They tell us that if we continued the spending habits of the former government, our combined debt in this country would be somewhere around a trillion dollars, up in the nine hundred and some odd billion figure. There are so many zeros on the end of that one you can hardly keep track of them.

Therefore, we have made tremendous progress. We are going to continue to make progress because we are exercising the kinds of restraints we have to exercise in order to take control. We have to take control of the economy, and we have. We are always compared to perfection. When you are governing, you are always compared to perfection. If you compare us to former governments and what they have done, I think we fare quite well. If you are comparing us to what a perfect world should be, maybe we a little bit in a sense fall short of the mark.

I am going to quote from Somerset Maugham. Somerset Maugham said: "Only the mediocre are always at their best".

An hon. member: We are almost perfect.

Mr. Thompson: We are almost perfect. That is right. We will accept that one. We are almost perfect.

Things are getting better. I think most Canadians realize that. I want to point out again a couple of statistics. These are not my words. They are not the government's words. I am quoting from the Edmonton Sun, of all places. The Edmonton Sun ran an editorial on June 2, 1992. I will quote some of the numbers that I think are worth repeating. They tell us that inflation has been at less than 2 per cent since January. Interest rates are continuing to fall, which obviously most of us know. In fact, if we compare where we are today with where we were 10 years ago, I do not think there is any question that we are in the right position in regard to interest rates.

I will use the date of August 6, 1981, a little over 10 years ago. Interest rates under the Liberal government at that time were 21.24 per cent. Today they are hovering just about at the 6 per cent range. I do not have to remind anyone what that does to you if you are in business, if you are carrying a mortgage or if you are going to take on more debt, whether it is a car loan or a business loan. It is just devastating.

I was in the business world at that time. I know what it does for the average citizen. It is something they cannot cope with. That is something that we have got firm control over, inflation and interest rates.

This article goes on. It says that this means that our own personal dollars go farther and buy more. Our pay cheques are not being quietly eroded and our mortgages and consumer loans are easier to pay. Further on in the same article it says that our dollar has dropped by 7 per cent since November, which makes it easier to sell our products to the U.S. and foreign markets.

Let us talk about the U.S. and let us talk about foreign markets. The point that we want to make is that exports right now to the U.S. are at an all-time high. I do not think there was a member on that side of the House today—I did not hear all of the debate, there may have been one sitting over in the corner—who mentioned that. Exports to the U.S. right now are at an all-time high, recognized by just about every economic think tank. Any student of economics recognizes that they are at an all-time high.

Where the opposition is having difficulty with some of our policies is they measure the unemployment rate in Canada against some of the policies of this government. They measure unemployment against the free trade agreement as an example. The previous speaker just mentioned that. The member suggested that any deal that we made was a bad deal or any agreement that we get into with the United States or any other country is always a bad deal because we are the loser.

That flies in the face of logic. The truth is the absolute facts indicate that we are doing very well, thank you, that we are competing like we have never competed before, much to the advantage of the citizens of this country. They focus on the unemployment number and merely that number and suggest that because that number is high, we are doing something wrong. They suggest that if that number is high we have lost jobs to the United States because of a series of trade arrangements we have had with other countries of the world, particularly the U.S.

• (2100)

I think what we have to do is focus on what is happening in the United States as compared to Canada.

In the United States right now there is a politician running around by the name of H. Ross Perot. Some are suggesting that he is going to unseat the incumbent President, Mr. Bush. H. Ross Perot is one of those who suggest that the United States gets the short end of every trade agreement it has ever entered into, particularly the one with Canada. Up here we are suggesting just the opposite.

He is pointing out an extremely high unemployment rate in that country and says it exists for only one reason, because we got the better of them.

I guess time will tell whether we did or did not. The point is that it is always easy to look at that number, especially during a recessionary period, and blame it on the government of the day, the President of the day or the Prime Minister of the day.

The fact is that we are doing okay, and we are doing okay compared to our neighbour to the south. Those figures suggest to me that our numbers on a percentage basis are not much different than the United States.

One state I would like to examine in comparison to Canada is California. In terms of sheer size, the growth of the economy or the Gross Domestic Product of California's economy is somewhat similar to Canada's, and the population of the state of California is similar to that of Canada. We are a nation of approximately 27 million people and it has a population of approximately 30 million.

The opposition in this House accuses us of having lost 350,000 or 400,000 jobs because of the free trade agreement with the United States. What it does not realize is that the state of California, which has approximately the same number of people as the country of Canada, has lost 600,000 jobs in the last two years. That suggests to me that we are doing okay.

Let us take a look at the merchandise trade surplus. In the first quarter of this year it was up $3 billion, compared to a surplus of $7.4 billion for the entire year of 1991. We cannot help but see that is a very positive sign, it is a healthy trend developing.

They go into our exports and tell us that in the first three months of 1992 we are up a record 6.7 per cent. Our manufacturing output is up around 2.5 per cent.

Those trends are continuing and they are going to continue because we do have the fundamentals right. That is something that not one of them on the other side will argue, if they really want to argue in real terms about the definition of a healthy economy. They cannot argue that because they know that we are absolutely on the right track.

Not too long ago they attempted to argue that our position was being threatened by a high Canadian dollar. However that high Canadian dollar—although it has slid back a little, not a lot, and I mentioned the 7 per cent figure since December—forced us to become more efficient, to become better at what we do. In some cases it meant streamlining and in some cases it meant investing in new equipment. In some cases it meant dealing with fewer employees to compete with the rest of the world.

We have gone through some of those structural changes. In my own constituency I can point to businesses, in some cases major businesses such as pulp and paper companies, that had to go through that experience. They invested in new equipment and they had to scale down the number of employees within their plant in order to compete. That is very difficult for a company to do and it is very painful. It is something that none of us could actually stand up and support because it means that at the end of the day there is a family member, a friend or acquaintance who has lost a job because of this restructuring or streamlining within a particular business.

There are businesses back in my constituency that have done that and have survived the very tough last couple of years. They bit the bullet when they had to, although not too many of us were happy with them for having done it at the time.

Their productivity since that time has increased. They are actually increasing their output and decreasing the number of employees. They have done the streamlining necessary to compete in the 1990s and into the turn of the century.

There is a very high human cost to do that, none of us denies that. However, it is something that every country in the world is going through. I think we have gone through it sooner than some of the others and that is one of the reasons that the export capacity numbers are increasing.

If we examined those numbers most of us would find them most impressive. For example, last year we exported $12 billion in farm and fish products, $15 billion in energy materials, $19 billion in forestry products, $6 billion in aircraft parts, $32 billion in motor vehicles and parts, $7 billion in chemicals and fertilizers, $4 billion in office machines and equipment, and $4 billion in industrial machinery.

The numbers speak for themselves. We have experienced those difficulties. We have experienced a high Canadian dollar and we have suffered through it. At the end of the day our businesses and industries are going to be in a stronger position leading into the next few years. That is not to say that we will not go through this restructuring again because we will.

Back home in my riding and in every riding represented in this Chamber businesses have gone through that and will continue to go through it.

The finance minister often says that in time when we look back at what has happened in the last few months and the last couple of years it will probably be compared to the industrial revolution because some of the changes in our society are very much in line with what happened back then. There are some very quick and fundamental changes. There are structural changes that are very difficult. Truly at the end of the day they are going to pay dividends.

I think that what we have done will prove to have been the right thing. If we examine the numbers concerning inflation, foreign investment, and our export capacity they are very much in our favour. That is simply because we have done the correct things. We made tough decisions. I really think that at the end of the day they will pay dividends for all of us.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I listened to the member for Carleton—Charlotte and I heard him say several times that we are doing okay. Quite frankly, I think that the economy of this country is heading in the right direction.

I agree with the member, and I have said this repeatedly in this House, that our interest rates are at an all-time low, certainly a low for the last 20 years. There is no inflation.

• (2110)

He cannot argue with me that there is not a lack of confidence. There is a lack of confidence in the market today. Despite these low interest rates and the zero inflation, we need something to get the entrepreneurial spirit of this country going again.

An hon. member: Spend money.

Mr. Mills: The minister responsible for the Treasury Board says: "Have people spend money". Did I hear that correctly? I agree with him but we are going to have to send some stronger signals out than just the inflation rate and the interest rates.

The financial institutions in this country are not supporting these lower interest rates and the low inflation. It is still very tough for small and medium-sized businesses to get credit for risk taking or credit for expanding their businesses. I know the Minister for International Trade does not agree with me on this.

The banking institutions in this country are like a cartel. Let us face it, they all move together. I met with some bankers last week from the Canadian Bankers Association on this particular issue. I will not name any names but they basically said to me: "We like making small business loans but we are not in the business of high risk". Any investment is a risk of sorts and certainly it is with most small and medium-sized businesses.

There is room for the government to use its leverage, its muscle. It can give all of the speeches its members give in this House of Commons to the people of Canada to try and motivate the banking and financial institutions to be a little bit more aggressive in making loans to small and medium-sized businesses.

I want to make one final point to the member. He can stand here today and say that we are doing okay. There are a lot of people in this country today who are doing okay. Never expect members on this side of the House to forget the people in this country who are not doing okay. There are a lot of people right now who are not enjoying the results of this low interest rate and this low inflation. I am speaking specifically about the unemployed. Do not expect us for a minute to stop reminding the government that we have to get these people back to work.

I wonder if I could have the member's reaction to those statements.

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, I guess there is always room to agree and disagree, but I do agree with much of what the member had to say. I do not think it is simplifying it in a sense what I said. We are doing okay, but again I do not think we can say we are perfect and we are doing enough.

I do not know what an acceptable unemployment number is, but whatever it is it is always too high obviously. I do not think we can lay back and say we have done enough and that everything is bright and beautiful because it is not. There are a lot of people hurting out there. There are a lot of people hurting in my own neighbourhood and I know that. The indicators are out there.

Again, he mentioned that we cannot take total salvation in the interest rates. We cannot take total salvation in the inflation rate. I agree totally with that as well. They are positive signs that things can happen and they are happening. Again, when there is a job lost it is so much harder to bring that job back, is it not? Losing 10 jobs, it seems they can go like that but it is a lot harder to bring them back. It is more difficult and that is why the fundamentals have to be there.

Regarding the banking institutions, I could not agree with him more. Maybe it is time we all went on a bank bashing rampage in this House because Canadian banks are ultra-conservative. I think the Canadian banks have a great deal to be ashamed of.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Loosen the purse strings.

Mr. Thompson: What were their profits last year, $6 billion?

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Record profits.

Mr. Thompson: Record high profits last year.

An hon. member: And they paid tax last year because our government put on the tax.

Mr. Thompson: I agree.

An hon. member: That is a good point.

Mr. Thompson: This is fun when we get a little dialogue back and forth here.

I agree the banks had record profits. We did possibly collect record taxes from them and maybe we can take some comfort from that but the truth is their profits were extraordinarily high during a period when businesses were in extraordinary pain. When that happens I think there is something wrong.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): And where do they get their money?

Mr. Thompson: Where do they get their money? We know where they get their money.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Where do they gamble it?

Mr. Thompson: Where do they gamble it? Tell me.

An hon. member: Olympia & York.

Mr. Thompson: Well there you go. But it is shoving out the little businesses isn't it? It is a five-way debate now. I think it is important that this point is raised.

Last weekend the finance minister was in my part of the country and we had a little economic symposium set up. I was pretty fortunate and we had a great time last Saturday. One of the questions asked at the symposium was exactly the same question asked here by the member for Broadview—Greenwood and that is the record high bank profits. They also asked about the record high foreclosures or business failures in the last couple of years.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): What about credit card rates?

Mr. Thompson: And credit card rates extremely high.

One of the things the minister pointed out, and I will point it out to the nation, is that if you have specific cases where you feel a bank is unfairly treating a particular business or not taking a real solid look at the expansion of the business, bring them to the attention of the minister, or bring them to the attention of any member in this House. I think that is what we have to do because we cannot argue in generalities because any time I try to do that I get in trouble.

When we are on our hind legs speaking in the House we tend to get in trouble when we talk generalities. But it is incumbent upon everyone out there listening to speak out. If they know of particular instances where they believe the banks did not treat them as fairly as they should have or did not take them seriously, it should be brought to our attention.

Mr. Boyer: Tell Maz.

Mr. Thompson: Tell Maz. We do. I think we had better go after the banks. Every member of Parliament should be concerned about that whether they are on that side of the House or on this side of the House.

Now I know I have angered my bank manager friends back home but they just have a job, they do not write the rules.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to wade into this interesting debate on the subject of the government's estimates for the 1992–93 fiscal year.

The exercise sounds simple enough. We are basically debating and voting on an appropriation of $34.9 billion. That is probably the largest block of money that Parliament has authorized and it is doing it in a year of recession and a year of difficulty in our economy.

The total appropriation is actually $48.9 billion but interim supply provided the other funds. I find it remarkable to think that this amount of money is being appropriated here tonight when I know how little scrutiny that spending has had in the House of Commons and in the committees. I think that is an unfortunate thing. The rules that exist have evolved over decades and centuries. I can say quite honestly the vote that will approve the spending of $48.9 billion minus the interim, has barely even seen the light of day by the public.

• (2120)

In the Solicitor General's area where I work in the House of Commons, large sums of money are involved. Canadians know it takes a lot of money to run and operate various levels of government. There is one in particular I want to note because it has received no scrutiny. Most members will say: "Well, it is in the estimates somewhere. You have the Part III of the Estimates document". My answer to that is sadly, it is not. That agency is called the Communications Security Establishment. We actually do not know how much money it spends because the figure is buried and for reasons peculiar to government in the area of national security, we are not told. The guesstimate is the amount is $250 million, but we do not know and we do not know what they spend it on. That is just not right.

I am putting on the record the fact it is happening. I will be required to vote tonight and my party will probably take the usual opposition stance in relation to an appropriation bill like this. I want it known members opposite are approving an expenditure guessed at $250 million and they do not know where $1 of it is going. That is not what this procedure was meant to do.

I know members opposite did not create the procedure. I am trying to say the system needs reform in a major way. The rules of the House provide the estimates, as presented in this House and passed through committees, are deemed to be adopted this past May 31. Even the rules say: "What the heck", if you do not have an opportunity to review the details of the expenditure or have the opportunity to ask the questions. If the government-appointed chair of your committee has decided the committee just is not able to sit and does not call a meeting, then I guess the questions do not get asked.

I should say I am not advised of any case where a committee has been prevented from doing its work. I am sure all committees have made some effort.

Sadly, I heard someone say the hours and effort spent by members in reviewing estimates this year was approximately one third the hours spent the previous year. I do not think we are losing interest, but it does indicate the system simply is not working.

There is no real accountability of the government to Parliament and through Parliament to its electors. There is at election time, but on a day to day basis, on a fiscal year basis, on an estimates basis there simply is not. There is nothing at risk. A majority government knows in every case the appropriation will be approved and questions will not be asked.

Today at liaison committee, the Auditor General appeared and made some very constructive comments about how the process could be improved. I do not know where that will go, but members seem to be quite interested in that.

In comparison, our U.S. friends have an appropriation system where committees of their houses, the Senate and the House of Representatives, actually approve every item of expenditure. If it is not approved in committee vote by vote, the money is not spent and it is not approved. That is not the case here. We get one vote tonight and that is all. The tone of the debate here today and in previous debates has been fairly general. I cannot help but note that a lot of the discussion of the previous member had to do with how well the government is doing with the economy. Precious little was said about the real issue in the debate; that is, the expenditure of the $48.9 billion. That is a sad thing. I have been here for part of the day and opposition members are doing the same thing. I want to try to focus to that precise issue, the actual estimates procedure.

This is not just a ritual that we are going through. We are spending our taxpayers' dollars, that big number that I just mentioned. I am not going to repeat it.

Nowhere in the system is there now a method of looking at cost efficacy, of looking at the value for money spent. It just is not there. The resources are not there. The Auditor General mentioned it today and members at the committee I just mentioned discussed it and we are looking for ways. I do not know if we will succeed in quickly finding a solution.

I thought I would mention a series of thoughts that were generated in the 1988 election campaign. I had written some of them down. They are not all my own. It occurred to me and others at the time that what was needed was some mechanism like the mechanism provided by the Auditor General for Parliament in overseeing the public accounts. Perhaps a branch of the Auditor General's function would actually do management or efficacy audits and do it, not on a comprehensive basis because government is really too large.

There was some thought of creating within the Auditor General's office an efficacy audit function and suggestions that it be staffed by individuals seconded from the private sector on two-year contracts—it probably takes a half a year to learn what Ottawa is all about—and staff it with 25 or 30 individuals who deal with large numbers and management efficacy issues in the private sector. They would be seconded.

They would have two-year contracts or at least term contracts. They would target a particular ministry and monitor it for a period of time and provide at the end a report to Parliament dealing with the very issue of efficacy of management audit or value for money, not whether the government's policy direction was necessarily right or wrong, but whether or not the objectives achieved by the ministry were valuable in relation to the amount of money spent.

I think that Parliament ought to be looking at exactly a mechanism like that.

I want to close my remarks by commending to the House and to my colleagues here the search for improved mechanisms of accountability for government spending.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, I certainly listened with interest to the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River and as he said, there is no mechanism to verify the estimates. They go to the committees and the committees are controlled by the government and the votes are simply a formality. Here tonight we are going to vote on the whole and there is no mechanism to know where the money is being spent and whether it is efficiently spent or not.

It was interesting to listen to him when he mentioned the United States. He says at least there they have a mechanism where each item is reviewed by both houses, their Congress and Senate, so that there is much more responsibility on how money is spent.

We are taken for granted here. The government has its majority. It brings in the estimates and the money is spent. Even so, we listen to a lot about how we have a huge deficit and how the previous member, the member for Carleton—Charlotte, said we have taken control of our economy. He said we took control of the economy. I wonder how we can take control of the economy if we run a deficit of $30 billion, if unemployment figures across the country vary from 11 per cent to 22 and 25 per cent in certain areas.

• (2130)

We have a huge unemployment rate. If we are not counting the people who are not on unemployment insurance but are already on welfare, it becomes an extremely high percentage of the population. We certainly have not taken control of the economy. We are really in a depression right now, and not even a recession.

The question arises: how can we change that situation? We can change it simply by having, as some members on this side of the House have suggested in the past, some capital spending on the part of the government. We stimulate the economy when it is on a downturn and we let it go when the economy is prosperous as it was in the past.

From 1984 the Conservatives had a real mandate to try to control the economy and to bring the deficit down. They have not done that and the member opposite knows it very well.

Mr. O'Kurley: Did it work in the province of Ontario to stimulate the economy?

Mr. Kindy: Some member is talking about stimulating the economy in the province of Ontario, if I hear him right. Naturally the economy in Ontario has suffered, mostly through the free trade agreement. This free trade agreement has been brought in by the Conservative government without enough studies. This is why right now we are not in a recession but in a depression.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member would certainly allow one-minute rebuttal from the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

Mr. Lee: Madam Speaker, the hon. member has quite fairly made reference to the remarks by the hon. member for Carleton—Charlotte.

He focused on good news. There is the odd piece of good news out there, but the fact is that the government pursued an economic policy over the last year or two of high interest rates in an attempt to bring inflation down. There was a free trade adjustment going on, plus a global restructuring in a number of areas industrially, and it has basically brought this economy to its knees. Part of that recession was government induced. The existence of a large government debt did not help and our economic circumstances are really not too good.

The hon. member was not misleading when he gave his facts, but he is certainly showing an awful lot of blue sky when Canadians are seeing it as otherwise. We are looking for reality and accuracy in these debates.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Two members were splitting a 20-minute period. We have just finished a five-minute period of questions and comments.

I will recognize for the second 10-minute period the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am actually quite disturbed by the bill we are voting on tonight. We are talking about almost $50 billion of taxpayers' money when we include the both packages we will be approving or voting on tonight. That is an awful lot of money to be making a decision on. The member for Scarborough—Rouge River made a very good point which was that we probably should have a much longer debate on this with much more ability to be specific about where this $50 billion is going. I do not know if a $1 billion expenditure could be put through this quickly in a board meeting of a major corporation. We are talking here of almost $50 billion of taxpayers' money.

How do you address all of this appropriation in less than 10 minutes? It covers everything from the Department of Agriculture to Enterprise Cape Breton, the communications—

Mr. Boyer: Speak of something specific.

Mr. Mills: The member says: "Speak of something specific". The specific thing I want to refer to is the fact that the process of spending $50 billion worth of taxpayers' money in one day is a little too quick. There should be a much longer debate on this with more specifics especially when people out there are having difficulty right now. They are saying: "When you are spending almost $50 billion, isn't there some way you can find in that lump sum of $50 billion a little bit more money for training?"

Right now in the city of Toronto people wanting to be retrained cannot find places to be retrained because we have apparently run out of money. It does not matter what part of the city it is. You can go to Centennial College, Seneca College, Humber College, George Brown College, there is no more training money left and here we are approving $50 billion.

If we were addressing the most serious problem that is facing our economy today in a more direct and radical way, and I am talking about the fact that there is close to two million people unemployed out there right now, then I might feel a little bit more confident.

Mr. Boyer: The amount of money in this year's budget is bigger than last year's budget.

Mr. Mills: The member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore says that there is more money in this budget or in this appropriation for training than there was the last time.

An hon. member: Where is it?

Mr. Mills: It is still not enough. We heard the member from Carleton—Charlotte talk earlier about how well the economy is doing with the zero inflation rate and the low interest rates. The government has room to put a little bit more money into training. It has room to put money into some capital projects to get people back to work.

At what point do you loosen up? Canadian taxpayers, and we are all representing Canadian taxpayers here, are being asked to give the government $50 billion. This is at the same time as there are low interest rates and low inflation. At the same time government has no money for retraining and people cannot find opportunities to be retrained. There seems to be a lack of confidence in the market and therefore we are stuck and we have very high unemployment.

If government knew it could not get approval of this $50 billion unless it found $2 billion or $3 billion for capital projects, I bet that money would be found pretty quickly. It would find it fast. That is the point I am trying to make. It has all the leverage on that side of the House. What we are trying to do is appeal on behalf of the two million unemployed that in this approval of $50 billion you are getting of Canadian taxpayers' money, find $2 billion or $3 billion to put people back to work or to prop up the retraining fund.

• (2140)

I know there is absolutely no room in this economy for any tax increases. If anyone had mentioned today the idea of a tax increase in this economy, I think they would be shot on the spot and no one would even care. We are not talking tax increases here.

I do think there are enough assets, good will, skilled labour, and talent in this country that we can afford another couple of billion dollars on the deficit to put people back to work.

I am not treating that lightly. We spent $35 billion last year on welfare payments and unemployment insurance. Would it not be better to add another $2 billion or $3 billion to that and get some capital works projects going and get people back into the work force so that they can have their dignity back? Then they would become taxpayers.

I just received a note from my colleague from Cochrane—Superior. There are currently 30,000 unemployment insurance recipients who run out of benefits every month. Most of them end up on welfare. There is no retraining. The funds are gone and very few job opportunities exist because—and the member for Carleton—Charlotte was so right when he agreed with us on this—the cartel of financial institutions in this country right now is doing very little to stimulate, help, and push along the 1,700,000 small and medium-sized enterprises in this country that are our greatest hope for putting people back to work.

I compliment the member for the idea that he put forward to this House and to the nation, that if anybody does not feel they are being treated fairly by their bank, the Minister of Finance will welcome hearing from them. I think that is a step in the right direction.

It is very tough in 10 minutes to talk about what is going on in a package of $50 billion. It is very tough but it would be irresponsible for us on this side of the House to look the other way when we have close to two million people who are out of work and not enjoying this zero inflation. They are only enjoying the pain of the zero inflation and the low interest rates.

Once again we appeal to the government. We on this side of the House are begging you to go through this bill appropriating $50 billion and see if you can find something that will help put those unemployed people back to work as soon as we can.

[Translation]

Mr. Louis Plamondon (Richelieu): Madam Speaker, I will be brief so that my fellow members can also speak on this.

I think that a fairly clear consensus came out of what I heard today on the motion by the President of Treasury Board for consideration of a deficit budget for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1993, a budget that all members here in the House called lacking in courage and especially lacking in new ideas to fight this deficit that is eating away at our economy and our future.

It is with this in mind that I address the hon. member who just spoke about cuts and making better use of money. For example, does he agree in this recession with the government in its budget this year? We know that last year it spent $2 billion more than it forecast the year before. Does the previous speaker, since I must address him through you, Madam Speaker, also agree that we are wasting, for example, $40 million on advertising this year to tout the benefits of Canada's 125th anniversary, without forgetting all the incredible mistreatment of francophones in those 125 years and also of the native people? It is spending $40 million to brag about that on television and it will waste $600,000 next week on a monument to the Queen of England. Would we not do better to cut such foolish, frivolous expenses as sending 12 members of Parliament to the earth summit in Rio with the Prime Minister? Would it not have been enough for the Minister of the Environment and the Prime Minister to go there, instead of 12 official committee members, together with members who were invited by the Prime Minister to go at a cost of $200,000 or $300,000? Does the member who just spoke not feel that we are squandering public funds and forgetting to find solutions for the problems of unemployment and the economy? It seems that the only criterion guiding this government, and I close on this point, Madam Speaker, is just a hope that interest rates and the economy will get back on track. It has no philosophy; in other words, it governs from one crisis to the next, without clear objectives.

[English]

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I can hardly believe that the member for Richelieu would throw me such a lob ball.

I think that this government would probably be saving $4 billion to $5 billion a year if we did not have to contend with the separatist threat that comes from these six, seven or eight members. I cannot even remember how many of their members sit in this House, this nation's boardroom, the boardroom of Canada. I was elected here to try and do productive things to keep the country together. They are constantly sewing doubt and seeds of division which infect foreign investment and investor confidence. They do not realize that this $125 million, or whatever, is to try and keep this nation together. I do not know of a Canadian who would not support a bill to spend that amount of money if it meant keeping this nation together.

The member for Richelieu does not believe in this country. He is trying to separate, trying to set up a sovereign country for Quebec, which view obviously I do not support.

Canadians do not question that. They do not question that. But what they would like to see at the same time is the government, because of the dissension and the division and the lack of unity in this country, which is mostly caused by this sort of separatist thrust that we are eventually going to have to face right on in the next 30 or 60 or 90 days, get that resolved one way or the other. Then I think we are going to go back to being that united galvanized country that we were before this nonsense started.

• (2150)

Mr. Bill Domm (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for Science): Madam Speaker, the members are well aware, I trust, of the government's ambitious program to reform the Public Service to make it even more efficient and client oriented. Getting better value for the tax dollar has been the order of the day. Available resources have had to be redirected to the point of service delivery, that is where the client is, and away from overhead and administrative processes. Only through this action could the adverse effects of restraint on programs and services be minimized.

Changing how government does business means more than rethinking what government does. It means more than getting out of some activities, consolidating others, eliminating duplication and unnecessary processes, postponing some purchases and setting aside some worthwhile activities that cannot be afforded. It means improving how government does things to direct taxpayers' dollars toward better, more responsive and more client-oriented services, particularly at the point of service delivery; to make it easier for individuals and businesses to deal with government; and finally to focus resources and energies on clients' needs and ensure that public servants are ready, willing and able to resolve problems, answer questions and provide service courteously and quickly.

Concrete measures are being taken to improve services for businesses, more specifically to facilitate, streamline and modernize business dealings with government. One example is the move to a single business registration number. Another is the government's proceeding toward fully automated procurement that will reduce transaction costs and speed up the administrative processes.

A systematic internal review of the existing regulatory burden in each department and each sector is being launched. Regulations will be reviewed to ensure that: government intervention remains justified, regulation is the best among available alternatives, the design of the regulatory program maximizes the gains to beneficiaries in relation to the cost to Canadian governments, businesses and individuals, and resources are available to allow efficient compliance and enforcement.

The government believes that an innovative, competent and dedicated Public Service is a key asset in supporting Canada's economic competitiveness. Canada has a world class and high quality Public Service that is being saluted during "National Public Service: Serving Canadians Better" week.

This special week is being celebrated for the first time this week as a result of Parliament passing a private member's bill on June 4. This new national week will enable all Canadians to acknowledge the thousands of conscientious and responsible Public Service employees who are working to serve the public wherever Canadians are, in major centres and in smaller communities across the country, and from missions abroad.

The government is also decentralizing decision-making. We are changing what we ask of our program managers. Rather than directing them to follow rules we are asking them to focus their energies on serving their clients. We are making sure that public servants get adequate training to meet the demands of increasingly complex jobs. We are empowering them to make decisions and to be responsible for those decisions. We are holding them accountable for achieving results.

Many of our recent initiatives are the result of the major renewal exercise that the Prime Minister announced in December 1989, Public Service 2000. For the taxpayer and the client Public Service 2000 means that more tax dollars are being devoted to service delivery and less to internal administration.

Administrative decision-making is being decentralized. Program managers are challenged to focus their energies on serving their clients. They are being held accountable for the results and the bottom line of their programs, and training is crucial to making this all work. Public servants are being empowered to make their own decisions and to be responsible for them.

Central agencies are reducing and streamlining demands made on the departments. Internal administrative processes are being reduced and very much simplified. Investments are being made in people and in new technologies. Investment in information management is being undertaken to make it easier for clients to conduct transactions with the government and to reduce costs, red tape and paper.

Operating budgets covering salaries, operations, maintenance, and minor capital are being established. They give managers flexibility in deciding how best to spend their resources in order to maximize the results. They hold a promise of increased management efficiency, increased adaptability to changing client needs, and increased accountability for the use of the tax dollar.

Commencing April 1, 1992, a number of departments and agencies began operating budgets on a department-wide basis as pilot projects.

The way government has transitionalized and transitionally been organized has not always been conducive to clients' receiving simple, easy, and accessible service. At present there are thousands of different points of service delivery across Canada; a reflection in part of the expanse of this country and its dispersed population.

However, it can be confusing and very frustrating to Canadians to have to speak to several people from several departments on a pension matter, for example. A number of measures announced in the budget will help change the way in which services are provided.

Departments will be moving to adopt more flexible hours and to work together toward the development of single-point access to clusters of government services. In the larger urban centres, departments providing similar services will look for opportunities to collate service delivery.

In the smaller communities, existing offices of one department will serve as the service delivery point for several departments, responsible for dispensing basic information on programs and services and providing forms. This process has already begun using the Canada Employment Centres as service delivery points for other government departments.

Representatives from these departments will link with Canada Employment and Immigration to establish the exact way in which the employment centres can be used to provide residents of these communities with direct access to a fuller range of services.

The new concept of special operating agencies was introduced in December 1989. This structure gives managers the wherewithal to run their organization more like a business, with greater focus on results and the bottom line.

In return for commitments to performance, managers receive increased administrative flexibility and delegation. They enjoy greater freedom of action to serve Canadians better and to adapt more quickly to changes in client needs.

Five agencies are now in place. Nine others are in the final stages of preparation and they are producing results. For example, the government telecommunications agency has succeeded in offering a credit of $8.5 million to departments. The government is actively seeking opportunities to extend the application of the agency model.

Departmental managers will be accountable for the services delivered and for bottom line costs in a way they have not been to date.

The Veterans Independence Program administered by the Department of Veterans Affairs will improve service to clients and minimize the administrative burden. This will involve prepaying entitlements and asking clients to submit their expenditure claims only once and at the end of the year.

Revenue Canada Taxation has already introduced no calculation tax forms for individuals whose returns are relatively straightforward. A similar saving in time and cost will result from the introduction of the new T-2 short tax form for businesses.

I have one last closing remark. As hon. members can appreciate, the innovations that I have just described mean that money taxpayers have entrusted to the government—and that forms part of the Main Estimates—will be spent with care and will buy increasingly more efficient services that Canadians can depend on.

• (2200)

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being ten o'clock, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(16), to interrupt the proceedings and to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the supply proceedings.

The first vote is on the motion for concurrence. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 218)

YEAS

Members

Anderson	Andre
Atkinson	Attewell
Belsher	Bernier
Bertrand	Bird
Bjornson	Blackburn (Jonquière)
Blais	Bosley
Boyer	Browes
Cadieux	Cardiff
Chadwick	Charest
Chartrand	Clark (Yellowhead)
Clark (Brandon—Souris)	Cole
Couture	Danis
DeBlois	de Cotret
Della Noce	Desjardins
Dick	Domm
Dorin	Duplessis
Edwards	Epp
Feltham	Ferland
Fontaine	Friesen
Gibeau	Gray (Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine)
Greene	Gustafson
Halliday	Harvey (Chicoutimi)
Hawkes	Hicks
Hogue	Holtmann
Horner	Horning
Hughes	Jacques
James	Johnson
Joncas	Jourdenais
Kempling	Koury
Langlois	Larrivée
Layton	Littlechild
Loiselle	Lopez
MacDonald (Rosedale)	MacDougall (Timiskaming)
Marin	Martin (Lincoln)
Masse	Mazankowski
McCreath	McDermid
McDougall (St. Paul's)	McKnight
McLean	Merrithew
Monteith	Moore
Nicholson	Oberle
O'Kurley	Paproski

Plourde	Porter
Redway	Reid
Reimer	Ricard
Richardson	Robitaille
Saint-Julien	Schneider
Scott (Victoria—Haliburton)	Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)
Shields	Siddon
Sobeski	Soetens
Sparrow	Stevenson
Tardif	Tétreault
Thacker	Thompson
Thorkelson	Tremblay (Québec-Est)
Tremblay (Lotbinière)	Turner (Halton—Peel)
Vankoughnet	Vézina
Vien	Vincent
Wenman	White
Wilbee	Wilson (Etobicoke Centre)
Winegard	Worthy—118

NAYS

Members

Allmand	Angus
Bélair	Berger
Bevilacqua	Black
Blaikie	Boudria
Caccia	de Jong
Dingwall	Ferguson
Finestone	Fisher
Fontana	Foster
Fulton	Funk
Gagliano	Gardiner
Gauthier	Grey (Beaver River)
Harb	Harvard
Harvey (Edmonton East)	Hopkins
Hunter	Jordan
Kaplan	Karpoff
Karygiannis	Kilger (Stormont—Dundas)
Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast)	Kindy
Kristiansen	Lee
MacAulay	MacLaren
MacWilliam	Manley
Marchi	Marleau
McCurdy	Mifflin
Mills	Nault
Pagtakhan	Peterson
Phinney	Plamondon
Proud	Prud'homme
Rideout	Riis
Rompkey	Simmons
Skelly (North Island—Powell River)	Stewart
Stupich	Vanclief
Walker	Whittaker
Wood	Young (Acadie—Bathurst)—64

PAIRED MEMBERS

nil/aucun

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-87, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1993, be read the first time and printed.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

[English]

Mr. Dingwall: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. My question is to the minister responsible. Could he indicate to the House if the bill is in its usual form.

Mr. Loiselle: Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to give the House the assurance that the form of this bill is the same as that passed in previous years.

Mr. Loiselle moved that the bill be read the second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Madam Champagne in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-87, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1993.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 2 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 2 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 3 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 3 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 4 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 4 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 5 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 5 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall Clause 6 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Clause 6 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the schedule carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: On division.

Schedule agreed to.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Chairman, after years of hard work, it is a relief, at least for those who are interested in what happens in Parliament, that after repeated appeals to the House and to the Chair, I can now thank the Clerk and his staff, because at last I have a better idea of what is going on, now the votes are finally written in alphabetical order, in French and English. When you call the votes in English, I know exactly what they are in French. This is the second time this has happened in the history of Parliament. In fact, I really do not have to thank you, but I just wanted to point this out, because at last we can understand—

Madam Chairman: The hon. member has been looking forward to this for quite some time.

Mr. Prud'homme: I am starting to understand, Madam Chairman. Perhaps if more attention was paid to—I was saying that at last we have, in alphabetical order, what my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier has been asking for years. I do not see why there is so much brouhaha when someone is speaking in French.

Would you please call the House to order?

Madam Chairman: Order, please.

[English]

Order, please. Members who have been here for a few years know that the hon. member has been making a special request for many years and he is now telling us that he does appreciate that changes have been made. There is actually no debate allowed at this time. The hon. member has risen on a point of order. I think he will close his point of order now so that we can continue.

[Translation]

Mr. Prud'homme: Of course, Madam Chairman. And thanks to your call to order, I will be able to thank the House, although I really do not have to, for something that should have been done a long time ago. However, I think it should be said that at last people have realized that members whose mother tongue is French have a better idea of what is going on if everything is in alphabetical order. The process is so quick, and you are so efficient, that we easily lose track. So, my thanks to whom it may concern.

[English]

The Chairman: Shall clause 1 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the preamble carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Preamble agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall the title carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Title agreed to.

The Chairman: Shall I report the bill?

Bill reported.

Mr. Loiselle moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Loiselle moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker: It being 10.35 p.m., this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 10.37 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, June 17, 1992

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

WOODLOTS

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, proposals by the Ontario government would give counties and regions authority over woodlots greater than 2.5 acres and other municipalities the power to control individual shade trees, windbreaks and fence rows.

These proposed changes could have a serious impact on private landowners' rights and should be of concern to anyone who has a tree growing on his or her property.

Ontario is pushing responsibility on to municipalities while at the same time allowing clear cutting on its own Crown lands. My constituents are tired of too much government and this proposed legislation promises to be a nightmare of permits, regulation, and enforcement; all to the detriment of the taxpayer.

Canadians love the privileges that come with freedom, peace, private property and the pursuit of the work ethic.

At this sensitive time in our country's history, I urge members of Parliament to work to find ways to support and encourage law abiding, environmentally conscious private citizens rather than targeting them with restrictive and expensive laws which have not worked in eastern Europe or elsewhere.

[Translation]

MULTICULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, once again the Conservative government is interfering with multicultural organizations instead of co-operating with them.

[English]

The minister is trying to undermine the World Sikh Organization by funding to the tune of $130,000 the National Alliance of Canadian Sikhs.

The World Sikh Organization has represented Sikhs without any grants or subsidies from the government, yet the minister has the nerve to proclaim the alliance as the principal organization representing Sikhs.

It is time the government stopped interfering in the internal matters of ethnocultural communities and the Sikh community specifically. The role of multiculturalism and citizenship should be the building of bridges and not barriers.

* * *

[Translation]

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Jean-Pierre Hogue (Outremont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to draw your attention to a measure taken by our government to support Montreal's economic development over the next few years. I do so on behalf of the members of the Montreal caucus I have the honour to chair.

Monday, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development, announced that $150 million would be allocated by the government to support projects in sectors that would afford the best prospects for Montreal.

This initiative by our government is well suited to the partnership that exists today between government and the private sector and which is aimed at making Montreal a world class industrial and technological centre.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that I have the firm conviction that with this injection of $150 million Montreal will be able to further enhance its role as a centre of excellence for a variety of disciplines.

I would like to recall the work done by members of the Montreal caucus who made this initiative a success and, again, our thanks to the minister.

* * *

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, three days ago the national police of El Salvador kidnapped Jose Adolfo Rodas Rivera without a judicial order and are holding him in police headquarters, likely torturing him.

Rodas is a leader in the Christian Committee for the Displaced People, the group that has promoted the peaceful return of peasant families to war–torn areas of El Salvador.

The police are the force of the old military elite trying to block the peaceful return of democracy to El Salvador. With continuing United States' money and arms, El Salvador continues to drive some people to become refugees

Therefore, this is no time for Canada to begin dismantling our laws for giving shelter to refugees. We must not classify El Salvador as a safe country from which no real refugees come. We must not return Salvadorans to the United States without first examining their refugee claims, as Bill C–86 would allow us to do.

Instead, Canada should call on El Salvador to release Rodas unharmed, and on the United States to cease arming the Salvadoran security forces.

* * *

CANADA 125 CELEBRATIONS

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of this House and my colleagues an important event that will be held in the town of Lacombe in my riding on July 1, 1992.

In honour of Canada's 125th birthday and in memory of Roland B. Michener, late Governor General of Canada, who was born in Lacombe, Alberta, the town has requested the donation of trees from communities across Canada as a living tribute. They hope to plant 125 trees in Michener Park, each one of which will have the name of the donating municipality engraved on a plaque. It is hoped by this to symbolically bring Canada together.

I would like to congratulate the town of Lacombe and all the constituents involved for their enthusiasm, dedication, and for this special way of celebrating Canada's 125th anniversary.

* * *

[Translation]

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): In my riding, the St. Germain School has started a unique project on Canadian unity. Youngsters in the fifth grade studied present day Canada and asked a number of questions which I will quote here.

(1) Will Canada separate? (2) What will happen in that case? (3) What can we, as students, do to prevent this from happening?

What did they recommend? I will read it to you:

> We want to do something for Canadian unity, and we have a message: A puzzle is worthless if there is a piece missing! We made a big flag which was signed by more than 600 people at school. There is a message on the flag: Long live a united Canada! Let's talk. Let's communicate.

[English]

The message is clear. It is not unlike the others I received from Collège Louis–Riel when they held a citizenship court, or from H. S. Paul and Samuel Burland schools, including the many hundreds of other students when they held their Canada 125 celebrations: "Let's keep our country together by talking to each other".

Merci, thank you to all of our young people.

[Translation]

THE LATE JEAN-CLAUDE LEBEL

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon I would like to draw the attention of honourable members to the sudden passing of a senior federal official.

Yesterday, we were told about the death of Mr. Jean-Claude Lebel, who for the past three years had been deputy minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, of which he was both the principal artisan and leading light.

He will be remembered by his employees, his federal and Quebec counterparts and his many co-workers and friends, not only as a dedicated and tireless public servant but also as an ardent defender of regional development in Quebec.

Speaking on behalf of all members of the Quebec Conservative caucus and on behalf of the members of this House, I wish to offer our sincere condolences to Mr. Lebel's family.

* * *

[English]

BILL C-80

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to advise Canadians that this government is ignoring the democratic process by rushing Bill C-80 through committee stage, denying experts in the field who unanimously oppose this legislation an opportunity to appear before the committee.

This bill hammers the last nail in the coffin of universality and will profoundly affect the lives of poor children. Yet the groups and individuals who work on the front lines dealing with these children are being denied the chance to say how the bill affects them.

• (1410)

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Health and Welfare has said that she does not see the need for social policy groups to present briefs to the committee because the bill is essentially a tax bill. Even the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the minister responsible for children, is not slated to appear.

When will the government stop looking to expensive tax lawyers for answers and start listening to what hungry children and advocates are saying?

I urge members of the government side to keep the debate open, even though they might not want to hear what the experts are going to say, and allow witnesses the time they need to present briefs to the committee. When is the government going to listen to the ruinous effects its policies are having on Canada's children?

* * *

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank Bernard Valcourt, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, for bringing some common sense to our immigration system. In my riding, in town hall meetings, in my mail and in personal interventions, constituents of Halton—Peel have been asking for a system that is fair, that costs less to run for taxpayers, and yet maintains the humanitarian reputation of Canada.

Among the much-needed reforms we now see is a guarantee that refugees coming to this country will be legitimate. Speedy family reunification for immigrants allowed into Canada, encouraging immigrants to come here who have the skill and capital that Canada needs, and positioning those immigrants in the geographic areas where they are needed in this country and finally, tough new rules to keep criminals and terrorists out of Canada.

These are simple requests from the people of my riding and I would like to thank the minister for listening. As we all know, the government that listens is the government that lasts.

* * *

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, on April 6, 1992 I placed a question on the Order Paper related to projects funded by the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and requested a response within 45 days.

Today is the 72nd day since I made my request and I have not yet received a response.

People throughout my riding and the rest of Atlantic Canada have the right to know what projects ACOA has funded. People want to know what the agency is doing with their tax dollars.

With unemployment in Prince Edward Island over 18 per cent, it is hard to see how ACOA is helping Prince Edward Island.

I call upon the minister responsible for ACOA to shed some light on the situation and answer my question.

* * *

[Translation]

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to make the House and all Canadians aware of the courageous effort of 13-year-old Virginie Larivière following her young sister's violent death. Virginie has undertaken to have a million Canadians sign a petition to reduce violence on television.

As more and more studies show a connection between violence on television and violence in our society, it is our duty to act and ensure that our regulations reflect the kind of society we want.

In the wake of her sister Marie-Ève's horrible death, Virginie Larivière gives us a lesson in courage, humanitarianism and dedication that should inspire us all.

I therefore ask for the support and involvement of all hon. members to help distribute Virginie Larivière's petition throughout the country and to work to reduce violence on television and violence in all its forms.

* * *

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons unanimously declared that the federal government should reinstate the Court Challenges Program, which was abolished in the most recent federal budget.

The Court Challenges Program, which is to end in September 1992, enables disadvantaged groups to have their cases heard in court. The committee notes that without this program access to the recourses provided in the Charter will no doubt be limited to groups and individuals that are already favoured financially and politically.

The government must recognize its responsibility to this country's minorities, like the French-speaking minorities, and restore the Court Challenges Program which has proven to be a fundamental tool for recognizing the rights of francophone and Acadian communities.

* * *

[English]

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, the residents of my riding of Sarnia—Lambton will applaud the government's proposed changes to the Immigration Act. My constituents will recognize that the changes respond to the realities of the 1990s and provide the government with tools to maintain the integrity of the system.

My constituents will welcome the news of proposed measures which will streamline the refugee system and provide better service, curtail the abuse of immigration and refugee systems, including better controls at the border, as well as impose time limits and standard processing time to help eliminate the backlogs.

At the same time, I know they will also applaud the government's renewed commitment to reunite families, protect refugees and promote economic development.

Finally, I know my constituents will appreciate a reformed and revitalized immigration program which is fair, balanced and effective, a program designed to best serve their interests.

* * *

HENRIETTE HADDAD

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, seven years ago, Madame Henriette Haddad disappeared in the streets of Beirut.

Today, for the first time, there is encouraging news suggesting that Henriette Haddad may indeed be alive. Her family and friends have worked tirelessly for her release over the years and have often expressed their frustration at the lack of support of their government.

Today Angeline Fournier, co-chairman of the committee to free Henriette Haddad, said that a high official of the Iranian embassy in Paris had told them the fundamentalist Iranian group was prepared to release her on humanitarian grounds. This group is the Iranian Revolutionary Guards.

As Madame Fournier said, this is the opening of the door for the first time. They are calling upon the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs to provide help in this very delicate matter.

I would urge the government to provide full assistance to the family and friends so that very soon Henriette Haddad will indeed return home to Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

NATIONAL HEALTH CARE SYSTEM

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Provincial health ministers are meeting in Ottawa with their federal counterpart to discuss the increasing costs of our health care system and looking for ways to deal with this problem. We are very worried at this point, because Canadians know the health care system we have in this country is the best in the world. They are afraid that provincial governments want to introduce user fees which will have a very negative impact, especially on the poorest members of our society.

I therefore want to ask the Prime Minister whether he can give Canadians assurances that our national health care system will remain universal and free for all Canadians and especially for the neediest members of our society.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have said many times that the federal government's position on health care has been the same ever since the Canada Health Act was passed.

Last September in Winnipeg, at a meeting of all Canadian health ministers, the first principle to be reconfirmed by all provinces was the guarantee that the five main criteria—universality, accessibility, portability, and so forth—would be maintained. The federal government's position has not changed.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the minister.

I am glad to hear the minister say the government's position has not changed, but will the government make the necessary arrangements to ensure the provinces will not have to change the system?

As a result of the 1990 and 1991 budgets, the Minister of Finance has created a situation where, in a matter of just a few years, the provinces will no longer receive direct payments from the government for health care. Could the minister inform the House that the government will review this situation in order to keep in place the necessary mechanisms to maintain the integrity of our health system by continuing transfer payments to the provinces, as well as transfers of tax points?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the Leader of the Opposition that cash payments in the form of tax points were requested by the provinces when he was a member of the government, if I am not mistaken.

However, in September the provinces also admitted that considering the $60 billion invested in the health care system in this country, which makes it the costliest public health care system in the world, it was agreed that in fact it was not a problem of resources but rather of better managing the funds available.

• (1420)

Last night, the Minister of Finance and I met HEAL, a health care lobby group. They too agreed that the problem with the health care system in Canada is not, basically, a resource problem. The money is there—$60 billion—so it is more a matter of management. The provinces, from New Brunswick to Ontario and from Newfoundland to British Columbia, have on the whole taken on a number of responsibilities, which leads us to believe that we are on the right track. Together with the provinces, we are trying to maintain—as the Leader of the Opposition said, and I agree with him—the main criteria for the system, with the knowledge that the capacity to finance the system is there, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question of the minister. In the discussions he is having with the provinces at this moment, will the minister tell them very clearly that there is absolutely no possibility in Canada that we will go for user fees in medicare for Canadians and that hospitals in Canada are for sick people, not for rich people and that this very important regime will remain as it is for the benefit of all Canadians?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, all the provinces in light of the resources we provide are subjected to the Canada Health Act which directly forbids any province charging what we call a user fee. There is no problem at that level. We would have to amend the legislation to be able to do that.

To the credit of the provinces also, we have to say they are trying to do a lot, trying to manage the resources they have in spite of increasing costs. It increased during the eighties about 12 per cent, which is too much for the capacity we have to pay today.

We give the guarantee that the law will not be amended, that we will keep it. At the same time, Canadians have to know, and I think they share this view, that all efforts have to be made to protect the best system in the world, but within their capacity they have to pay for it.

* * *

BREAST CANCER

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health.

This week's report on breast cancer highlights a social problem of near epidemic proportions. Last year, this government gave the Medical Research Council $849,000 and only $189,000 of that money went to direct research for breast cancer.

Will the minister and this government recognize that funding for this research is a matter of urgency and provide the recommended funding now that is recommended in this report?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I gave an answer to the same kind of question to my friend from British Columbia yesterday.

I said we definitely have to look at all the questions of research on cancer and breast cancer in a particular way. I repeat what I said yesterday. I believe that all those issues dealing with women and health have been seen too many times from a man's perspective.

Having said that, the hon. member has to know, and it is easy to know, that funding for breast cancer is not predetermined. We can fund $3 million, $4 million or $5 million now if the project submitted to NHRDP and the Medical Research Council has the quality to warrant funding. Yes, I am ready to give more money and to at least consider the possibility if it can be confirmed that any project dealing with breast cancer has been turned down because of a problem with money.

It never happened to my knowledge or to the knowledge of the Medical Research Council.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, yes, I heard the minister's comments yesterday. If you ask any pure scientist, $189,000 is not enough money.

There are five women whom I know in the Pratt family, two with breast cancer and three of them very high risk. We know that cancer runs in families. We know that there is a shortage of radiation technologists. We know there is a shortage of radiation equipment. We know there is not enough research money and this is a women's issue.

Will the minister indicate to this House what this government's action plan is going to be to deal with this very serious situation?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, once again, I think that I confirmed twice yesterday and again today that I am ready to listen and look at what we can do. Immediately I see a kind of slippage of the member when she says we have to provide more equipment. She knows that at that level the provinces have full responsibility and the federal level cannot go to the province of Ontario and say it will supply equipment.

Once again, I repeat what I said, we have to be more sensitive to breast cancer particularly. I am ready to look at the full report provided yesterday and to do my best. We have not predetermined money. Maybe $800,000 is not enough, but it has not been determined by the department or by the Medical Research Council. It is based on projects submitted by researchers. Maybe we should support more research, particularly among women, and maybe it would help to supply more money.

* * *

HEALTH

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I also have a question for the minister of health.

The joint meeting of the federal-provincial ministers of health and finance is extremely important for the survival of our national medicare program. It is no secret that the minister's colleagues are primarily concerned about the unilateral federal withdrawal from the cost-shared partnership in financing health care.

Does the minister agree with the statement by the Newfoundland minister of health, Chris Decker, that the federal government cannot afford a universal health care system or, in the words of Mr. Decker: "They talk about it but they cannot deliver".

What has happened to the federal government's commitment and obligations under medicare to all Canadians?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member is wrong when he says that the provinces are particularly upset by the unilateral withdrawal of resources.

If he looks at information that we released in September in Winnipeg, all the provinces, except Quebec because it was not there, but including British Columbia agreed at the time that the problem is not a question of money. Once again, it is the most expensive public system in the world. We have to use the resources we have. In that respect we work with the provinces and continue to do that in light of the fact that we can improve the management and the system and keep the best system in the world.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

The minister of health for B.C. said: "I think medicare is being threatened and largely responsible are the federal cuts in transfer payments to the provinces". The National Council on Welfare, the government's own advisory group, has calculated that the cuts to the federal financing formula for health will amount to more than $60 billion by the year 2000.

Can the minister tell the House what kind of a health care system will result from these unilateral cuts? Will it be a patchwork with different standards in each province, including user fees, higher premiums, extra billing by doctors or a two-tiered U.S. style health care system?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I do not know how many times I have to tell the member that there were no cuts. There were reductions in the way we transfer payments. Of course, that is the usual language of the NDP and we are used to that. I would appreciate having the same kind of interesting question I got from the member for Nepean.

I repeat, $60 billion in the health care system in Canada is a lot of money. It is the most expensive in the world. We are trying to work within those resources. I can say that the provinces are encouraged to do that. I will continue to work with the provinces which want to work in that respect.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister.

Can the minister explain how medicare can still be considered a cost-shared program when the federal share has declined from 50 per cent in 1980 under successive Liberal and Tory governments to 31 per cent that it is today? How much lower will the federal share shrink in the remaining three years of the present freeze? Will it be 25 per cent, 20 per cent, 15 per cent or even lower?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the member should know that maybe the direct transfer payments have been reduced, but the tax points have increased since 1982-83, which means that we give more money today than we gave 10 years ago.

The meeting tonight between the ministers of finance and the ministers of health will not be to say we will put in a billion dollars more. We will be there to determine how we can keep the system working the way it does, keeping in mind that we have to protect the system in light of the fact that we have reduced resources at the federal level. The ministers agree with that. They agreed last September and they will continue to agree.

• (1430)

If we put in more money as the member wants, we would just have the same problem we face today because we inherited a $500 billion debt. Fortunately the NDP is not there or it would be $1,000 billion.

* * *

REFUGEES

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Minister of Employment and Immigration tabled his voluminous immigration amendments which included extensive management and enforcement measures but paid little attention to humanitarian concerns.

Since the minister had the opportunity, why did he not provide an appeal on the merits for refugees whose applications have been rejected, as recommended by many NGOs, churches and the legal community?

The Refugee Board is not perfect, and without an appeal process the system is seriously flawed. Now is the time for an appeal process.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member opposite should read the bill carefully and he would see that in subsections 114(2), (6) and (5) we seek the authority to apply selection criteria.

The bill tabled by my colleague responsible for employment and immigration maintains Canada's humanitarian tradition as it pertains to economic requirements and employment that we must use in the immigration model. I wish to assure this House again that we will continue to respect refugee claims.

The bill tabled yesterday simply adapts the act to the realities of 1992 so that we can have a fair, equitable and efficient system.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the minister did not even answer my question. I was asking about an appeal on the merits process. She did not address that question.

[Translation]

As an alternative, why did the Minister of Employment and Immigration not specify and provide objective criteria for admitting refugees on humanitarian grounds? The minister almost eliminated this useful provision that allowed the most deserving cases to appeal. Will the minister or the government consider amendments to the bill to make better use of this provision and provide a fairer appeal process?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Mr. Speaker, the amendments made to the bill yesterday—or rather the suggested amendments, I should say, because we will have an opportunity through the parliamentary process to express our point of view—make procedures into regulations. So regulations rather than procedures will make it possible for applicants to appeal using the regular process. In any case, everyone in Canada will be able to exercise their right to appeal and each case will be heard on its merits.

* * *

[English]

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Last night we saw the spectacle on national television of B.C. vegetable producers ploughing down their crops because United States farmers are dumping low priced, low value vegetables into the Canadian market.

We know that the government in the free trade negotiation gave up the right to have a seasonal tariff. I want to ask the minister what the government is going to do. What action is going to be taken to keep these producers in business?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I know my hon. friend did not deliberately misinform the House.

We have a snap-back provision that was negotiated in the trade agreement between Canada and the United States which has been used by the government when necessary.

The hon. member should be aware that the association which represents these producers requested a hearing be held into the dumping allegations. They have been working with the Department of National Revenue to assemble that information. The Department of National Revenue is co-operating in presenting this case. We have worked hand in hand with our sister departments and we will work with the producers.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows, as every producer across this country knows, that the snap-back provision is absolutely useless. It just does not protect the industry.

The Department of National Revenue published a press release last week saying it would be making a determination in 90 days. That is simply unacceptable. The crops will all be ploughed down within 90 days.

Will the government bring in a determination for an anti-dumping duty by June 23 when the House rises? Will the minister give that kind of commitment to those producers today?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as beneficial as that might appear, the hon. member would be the first to complain to our trading partners if they attempted to run roughshod over a process that was established to allow it to take place.

Those critics of doom and gloom who identified that the free trade agreement would cause the destruction of agriculture have to recognize fact. The fact is that the number of farms has reduced at a lower rate in the last five years in Canada than any time since 1941.

Another thing the hon. member and other colleagues should know is that agricultural food exports to the United States since the free trade agreement have increased 29 per cent, almost 10 per cent a year. The hon. member should recognize that.

* * *

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

Both the Nova Scotia government order establishing the inquiry into the Westray mine disaster and the provincial statute authorizing the order specifically restricts the inquiry to matters, and I quote, "in relation to which the legislature may make laws".

In other words, every aspect of the disaster within federal jurisdiction, such things as federal government investigations and safety assessments or regional development funding or cabinet assessment, is beyond the scope of the Nova Scotia inquiry.

Will the Prime Minister now admit that all the government's assurances for the last month that no federal inquiry was needed were in fact completely incorrect, that the Nova Scotia inquiry cannot inquire into strictly federal actions and responsibilities in the disaster?

An hon. member: He should go to Hollywood. The walk would do him good.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): No, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): That is not entirely comforting, Mr. Speaker, so I would ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister.

The inquiry commissioner, Justice Richard, himself said yesterday when talking about the huge volume of documents his inquiry already had to review:

> I have no jurisdiction as a provincial inquiry over documents outside the province.

The justice himself recognizes the restrictions on his inquiry.

Will the government now stop trying to hide its own actions and responsibilities behind a provincial inquiry which cannot investigate them and call a federal inquiry which can?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly true the judge did say that he did not have jurisdiction over documents issuing from a federal jurisdiction, but we sent them to him anyway.

* * *

FISHERIES

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It concerns a matter of paramount importance to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador: the state of the fishery.

Yesterday in St. Anthony, Newfoundland nearly 1,000 men and women marched and demonstrated, calling upon governments and calling upon politicians of every stripe to acknowledge and to deal constructively with the crisis in the fishery. These people have been without income since May 15 and have no prospect of future income in the face of the imminent moratorium on northern cod stocks.

I want to ask the Prime Minister whether or not the government is prepared to consider now making available assistance to sustain these families until such time as a long-term program to rebuild cod stocks is put in place by the minister of fisheries and long-term assistance made available to those who are going to be displaced because of conservation measures.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government is very concerned about the situation of the fishermen not only in St. Anthony but throughout Newfoundland and Labrador and Atlantic Canada where their incomes have dropped quite dramatically because of the problem of cod stocks and fishing stocks generally for reasons that we are acquainted with.

• (1440)

One of the reasons why the government in 1990 responded with a $584 million Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program, and I think almost a $40 million catch failure program the next year, was precisely to accommodate this sad reality. The situation has not improved and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has been working on a program that we think will be helpful and constructive.

I have been talking to some of the union leaders in Newfoundland as late as last evening. The minister of fisheries, who is travelling in Atlantic Canada, will be talking to me again tonight. We hope to move forward and respond to this very real problem that is hurting all the fishing families in Newfoundland and Labrador.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, members on this side of the House from Newfoundland, indeed members from Atlantic Canada, appreciate that the government has put assistance programs in place in 1990 and 1991. Federal governments going back over 10 years have had to assist the Atlantic fishing industry on occasion.

I want to make clear to the Prime Minister what the families are asking for now. What they are saying is that they understand that whatever action must be taken to rebuild those stocks must be undertaken no matter what the cost, including the cost to families. Until such time as the long-term plan is put in place, as it must be, and until such time as long-term compensation measures are worked out, as we are confident they will be, in the interim, just to sustain the basics of life, to put bread and butter on the table, can Atlantic fishing families, in particular in Newfoundland and Labrador, expect this government to intervene to provide them with some economic assistance soon, now if possible?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my friend quite properly divides the problem in two. The long-term problem will partly be resolved as a result of the UNCED conference in Rio and other long-term initiatives to revive the cod stocks off Newfoundland and Labrador. That is certainly a long-term problem. I think we are in general agreement that the minister of fisheries, for example, did a tremendous job in Rio in regard to the protection of the interests of Newfoundland and Labrador.

With regard to the more immediate problem, as we know Rick Cashin is chairing a task force in regard to the specific problem. The minister of fisheries and the member for St. John's East have been making specific recommendations to the government as to how the Government of Canada can assist the fishermen and the communities in the short term, which I think is the problem raised by my hon. friend.

The record indicates that when the people of Newfoundland and Labrador needed assistance this government, the Government of Canada, did not fail to respond. I am waiting to hear from the minister of fisheries in regard to his ideas. When he has a specific program I am satisfied that the government will respond in a fair and I think helpful way to the fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a Newfoundland inshore fisherman from Fogo Island, Mr. Larry Donahue, trying hard to catch fish, watched helplessly as 50 of his nets were dragged up and destroyed by a factory trawler from France in the northern cod zone.

How can the Government of Canada not only give France cod quotas in the northern cod zone but now notify the Canadian Embassy in Paris that it is going to give France more quotas in the northern cod zone from July 1 until September 30 when the boundary dispute has been settled?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the boundary dispute has been settled. I think it has been settled very much to Canada's satisfaction and in the interest of the Newfoundland fishery. I should point out in terms of what is happening right now, the quotas that have been granted now until the end of September follow directly from the agreement of March 1989. There is a legal obligation to continue with that.

No one will be happier than the minister of fisheries and the Government of Canada once this obligation is completed. We will be in a position to fully manage as a result of the decision that was made by the boundaries commission.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, the 1989 agreement signed by the Government of Canada gave France northern cod quotas for two years "in proportion to the Canadian offshore allocation".

Does the government not realize that there has been a moratorium on the Canadian offshore allocation for the past six months and any proportion of zero is still zero even for France?

Why is the government giving northern cod quotas to France illegally?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, unfortunately the way article 5 reads is not the way the hon. member has described it.

The 15 per cent that was granted was based on the law. The decision did not come down before May 15. The hon. member is trying to over-simplify what has been a difficult and technical problem for us. After September 30 we are going to be in an excellent position, thanks to the fact that we won a very important international case which has the best possible implications for the fishery in Newfoundland.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the distinguished Minister of Justice.

Increasingly, Canadians are becoming quite disturbed by the punishment meted out to young offenders under 17 years of age, especially if they have been convicted of a homicide or brutal assault.

What action does the minister intend to take to stop the giving of a slight slap on the wrist and young offenders being told to be good and go back home?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member who is a man of rare discernment and good taste for the question.

The question is a serious one. It has been dealt with to some degree already by members of this House in passing amendments to the Young Offenders Act and of later statutes which provide a greater range of options available to judges in transferring young offenders' charges on very serious crimes to adult court thereby providing a larger range of sentence and parole options.

As the hon. member will know, there is considerable concern in this country with the Young Offenders Act. Some of it is more a reflection of how the act is implemented than what is in it itself. We are undertaking with the active participation of members of this House, in particular members of our caucus, a review of the Young Offenders Act in order to try and address the concerns the hon. member raises.

Confidence of the Canadian people in the justice system is absolutely vital. We wish to address the concerns of Canadians with respect to the Young Offenders Act and we are geared to doing that.

* * *

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Many Canadians are deeply concerned about the continued imprisonment in Brazilian jails on 28-year sentences of two young Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer.

I want to ask the Prime Minister to confirm that he raised the plight of Lamont and Spencer with Brazilian President Collor during his recent trip to Rio for the earth summit.

Will the Prime Minister indicate to the House and to the families of Christine Lamont and David Spencer the nature of the representations the Prime Minister made and the response of the Brazilian president?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to confirm to my hon. friend that I did indeed raise this very serious case with the President of Brazil in a meeting with him a few days ago in Rio.

I put forward views that I thought would be helpful and appropriate in regard to that situation. He is taking them into consideration and I would expect that we will be advised of the decision of his government.

• (1450)

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I would certainly be interested to know what the views were of the Prime Minister with respect to an appropriate resolution of this.

I would like to ask my supplementary of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. She knows that last week the House of Commons justice committee unanimously agreed to urge the minister to request the expulsion of Lamont and Spencer in accordance with Brazilian law and in accordance with Canada's obligations under international human rights conventions.

My question is straightforward: Will the minister now accept this unanimous all-party recommendation, show leadership on behalf of these young Canadians and seek their expulsion from Brazil and their return to their families in Canada?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been very troubled by and interested in this case. She called me in Brazil to advise me of the unanimous report that had just been released, I think it was that night, by the committee.

I examined with Brazilian officials the concept that they were sitting around waiting for a request for an expulsion to which they would respond immediately. This is not the case. This is not an accurate assumption and people ought to set it aside.

I did raise with the President the opportunities under Brazil's constitution available to him and to the Government of Canada in considering the plight of these two prisoners, for whom we all feel a great deal of concern and anxiety. After a good discussion with the President, I left with him an invitation to communicate with me as quickly as he could regarding a resolution on it.

* * *

RECREATIONAL FISHERY

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

I had the opportunity at the request of the then minister to chair the last national recreational fisheries conference in 1989. Another such conference is being held in September of this year.

I am concerned to hear there are signals emanating from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans which indicate a diminishing priority for recreational fisheries in that department. The most important signal is the apparent termination of the national recreational fisheries survey.

That survey is one of the most important tools we have for managing the recreational fishery in Canada. Among other things, it indicates that sports fishing is a major contributor to our economy to the extent of about $5 billion directly and it involves six million citizens.

I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary whether the recreational fishery survey has actually been cancelled and if so, why? Does this reflect or reveal a diminishing priority for recreational fisheries in the department?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that the recreational fisheries survey is done every five years. The preliminary results of the 1990 survey were already issued in the fall of 1991. The final results will be issued this fall.

The hon. member is also aware that the conference which takes place every so often will take place again this fall. It will be co-sponsored by the federal and the provincial governments involved.

I can assure the hon. member that the 1995 survey is already committed to and will be carried out by the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

* * *

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Solicitor General.

Media reports today allege that the names of CSIS informers are "now routinely given to politicians". If this is accurate, it is scandalous.

Will the minister tell this House whether this report has any foundation? If so, will he immediately investigate this serious breach of national security and report to Parliament on the precise steps he is taking to rectify it?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that this matter has been raised in the House. I want to assure my friend that names of CSIS sources are not and in fact in the course of my tenure as Solicitor General have not been revealed to the Solicitor General.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): These reports indicate very clearly that even the government's own officials are questioning the minister's authority to be in possession of this information.

Will he give this House his assurance that this sensitive informant information in his hands will not be shared with fellow politicians and that information gathered by CSIS will be monitored closely within the rules of law?

Will he commit now to report to Parliament either to the national security subcommittee or to the Security Intelligence Review Committee on this serious matter?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I repeat my previous assurance to the House and to the Canadian public.

CSIS sources are not revealed to me in the course of the conduct of my operations as Solicitor General. From time to time, I am made aware of the circumstances surrounding a particular sensitive operation, but never the name.

CANADA POST

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for Canada Post, my question is to the Prime Minister.

Canada Post Corporation announced its plan to rationalize the nation's mail sorting system. That announcement identified 92 communities where some 295 jobs are in jeopardy as well as service to those communities.

Reports suggest this is the beginning of many phases. Will the minister admit this is the tip of the iceberg and that more reorganization affecting some 500 jobs, employment and local economies are in jeopardy?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member has indicated, the minister responsible for Canada Post is absent on important government business.

I will take notice of the question and I am sure that he will report to him very quickly.

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I think that we are looking at jobs across the board.

On July 1, Canada Post will start with a new program of collecting tax and duty on mail products from foreign countries. Some work previously done by Revenue Canada will be transferred to Canada Post.

How many jobs will be lost there? How much work will be contracted out? How much will Revenue Canada be paying Canada Post for this program?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I will also inform my colleague of that particular question.

* * *

BANK SERVICE CHARGES

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

There is an awareness out there in Canada by consumers and small businesses that what the banks lose on their real estate investments they will pick from the pockets of consumers and small businesses.

Some banks have announced a freeze. That is like closing the door after the horses have eaten all the hay, all the oats and then left.

My question to this minister who is also the Minister of State for Agriculture: Will the minister call in the banks and tell them to roll back their service charges and then freeze them?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, a week ago or maybe a little more, the Minister of Finance and I said in this House that we had told the banks that there was no question of making consumers pay for any losses incurred by any of them in real estate transactions. We reassured the House on this point several times.

My colleague also knows that I personally met the bankers' representatives to ask them to lower credit card interest rates—this is the subject that concerns him. Rates have fallen nearly 5 per cent and are now about 7 per cent, the lowest in the past 20 years. This is quite something and is due to this government's economic policies. I believe that it is all to the good for consumers.

[English]

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I have only one thing to say to the Minister of State for Agriculture and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, that is horse feathers.

My question had nothing to do with credit card interest rates. We are talking about bank service charges. I will repeat again to the minister, will he call in the banks and order a roll back on the service charges and then a freeze, not for three banks, but for the six biggest banks?

• (1500)

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague just mentioned, several banks have already said that they were freezing these charges for some time. This shows that there is very keen competition now. It is common knowledge that the financial institutions are competing fiercely with one another. Interest rates are at their lowest level and the banks are outdoing each other to get customers, which only benefits consumers. Instead of blaming the government, my colleague should thank us and congratulate us on our economic policies.

* * *

[English]

MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who has indicated that he is looking for ways to help Canada compete by improving our municipal infrastructure as long as it is within the existing fiscal framework.

About one-third of the green plan budget or $1 billion has not yet publicly been committed.

I want to ask the minister if he is prepared to help the environment improve our competitiveness by using and spending the remaining green plan funds to put Canadians back to work, building and rebuilding our municipal infrastructure, rather than spending the money on more studies?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question because it allows me to point out that in the green plan $.25 billion over six years is going toward infrastructure for Indian peoples in this country, for our native people to upgrade their water and sewage systems. We are helping in an area where it is badly needed and the green plan is doing that.

As far as infrastructure for municipalities is concerned, I remind the hon. member that we are working in our airports to improve the infrastucture there which creates employment and activity, and is our responsibility. We are helping with the fixed link, for example, to P.E.I., which will have private industry financing, but at the same time encouragement from the government.

As the first ministers mentioned in their meeting of the Prime Minister and the premiers, we are taking a look at the the Trans-Canada Highway and the national road system as a possibility of an area where we may be able to co-operate with the municipalities. That is ongoing with the provinces at the present time.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw the attention of hon. members to the presence in the gallery of Mr. Jim Snow, Member of the House of Representatives, Parliament of Australia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

* * *

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. During Statements Pursuant to Standing Order 31, the hon. member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing made reference to and criticized the procedures on a bill, Bill C-80, which is currently in committee.

My position is that it was inappropriate and should not have been done at that time.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government response to 111 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[Translation]

PUBLIC SERVICE STAFF RELATIONS BOARD

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORTS

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have two series of documents to present today.

On behalf of the right hon. President of the Privy Council I am pleased to table in this House today, in both official languages, for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1992 a copy of the annual reports to Parliament of the Public Service Staff Relations Board; the first one concerns the management of access-to-information legislation and the second the protection of personal information.

* * *

TRANSPORTATION SAFETY BOARD

TABLING OF ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, also on behalf of the President of the Privy Council I wish to present to the House the annual report to Parliament of the Transportation Safety Board of Canada, as required by the Access to Information and Privacy Acts, for the period ended March 31, 1992.

* * *

[English]

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO-OPERATION IN EUROPE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House the report of the heads of delegation meeting of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe, the CSCE, on May 22, 1992, in Budapest, Hungary, in both official languages.

* * *

[Translation]

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY, REGIONAL AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

PRESENTATION OF SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval—Ouest): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Standing Committee on Industry, Science and Technology, Regional and Northern Development, I wish to present the committee's second report concerning the tourism industry.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[English]

PETITIONS

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to submit a petition with regard to the Court Challenges Program. A number of individuals from the province of Ontario signed the first petition, as well as individuals from elsewhere in the country including the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, who are all objecting to the cancellation of the Court Challenges Program.

The petitioners call upon the Government of Canada to reinstate the Court Challenges Program which has benefited Canadians and minority groups across this country. They hope the government will act promptly in terms of reinstating the Court Challenges Program.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to table ten more petitions today, further to a campaign by Canadians, urging the Parliament of Canada to review the government's decision to abolish the Court Challenges Program. As you know, this program enabled Canadians to go before the courts to defend their constitutional rights, to have them clarified and sometimes obtain recognition of those rights from the mostly provincial authorities.

The Court Challenges Program did not cost much—only about 10 cents per Canadian per year. It enabled Canadians to seek equal justice for all.

The people who signed these petitions call on Parliament to reconsider reinstating the Court Challenges Program which gives all Canadians equal access to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Mr. Speaker, we are happy to see that a committee of this House has unanimously supported the action taken by all these petitioners.

[English]

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today on behalf of constituents of the riding of Macleod resident in the area of Claresholm and surrounding area, sponsored by the Kinsmen and Kinette clubs of Canada. It is a petition to promote pride in being Canadian, something which we are all proud to be.

Included on this petition I note the signature of a minister of the Government of Alberta as well. We are all proud to be Canadians.

AIRPORT POLICY

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege to table a petition under Standing Order 36 from a number of residents of Calgary North who are concerned that the Department of Transport may amend the present airport policy which has insulated the citizens of Calgary North from noise generated by the airport since 1986.

• (1510)

The petitioners urge that the Department of Transport maintain the present airport policy regarding runway No. 28 which requires that all departing flights make a 15 degree turn to the north.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions from constituents in the Scarborough area.

They feel strongly about the imposition of the GST on books and call upon Parliament to reinstate the tax free status for the printed word by reinstating the zero rate in the GST regulations.

HOUSING

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition from constituents in the east metro Toronto area which calls on the government to participate in shared cost provincial and federal co-op housing. It calls on the government to maintain its participation in the field and to maintain the existence of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present nine petitions from Portage la Prairie, Carman, Oakville and surrounding municipalities signed by hundreds of people in the area.

The petitioners ask the government to replace or to change the Young Offenders Act so the right punishment and a stronger punishment would go to young offenders who are accused and found guilty.

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION

M. Mac Harb (Ottawa–Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting to this House a petition signed by residents of the Ottawa—Carleton area. The petitioners are asking the government to table a fairer bill for people seeking refuge in Canada.

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition under Standing Order 36. It was co-ordinated by Elizabeth J. Dutton of Thornhill. This petition calls for the government to enact legislation providing for:

(a) a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government; and

(b) the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by:

(1) a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada together with;

(2) a majority vote in a majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize more petitions, the Speaker has a ruling to make. If I may impose on the House for a minute, let us hear the ruling and then I will come back.

* * *

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

FISHERIES

Mr. Speaker: I am in receipt of a notice of motion under Standing Order 52(1) from the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte on an application for an emergency debate.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I wish to give notice of my intention to move the adjournment of the House pursuant to Standing Order 52, to discuss a specific matter requiring urgent consideration, namely the plight of fishermen and fish plant workers in Newfoundland and Labrador who have been without any source of income since May 15.

These individuals require urgent interim economic assistance to sustain the basics of life until such time as the Government of Canada, under the guidance of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, makes final decisions on a fisheries management program and provides compensation for those who will be displaced as a result of conservation measures.

I have a brief comment. Members of the fishing community in Newfoundland and Labrador and, indeed, throughout Atlantic Canada, are aware that Parliament is scheduled to adjourn within a matter of a few parliamentary sitting days. They are aware that dramatic and drastic action must be taken to sustain the cod species, the cod stocks. They are prepared for the consequences of those decisions but they want, I believe legitimately, their voice to be heard before the House rises for a scheduled summer recess, and that both the problems and the potential that exist in the current environment be discussed in this place.

They sense that the deep calamity they are experiencing is one that has been discussed and has been understood and has been acknowledged and has been dealt with by the Parliament of Canada. It is in that spirit and in the spirit of the exchange in Question Period today that I make this request on an urgent basis, Mr. Speaker.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I want to thank the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte for his notice. I want to say to the House that the House will understand that in other obligations I have had in the past, I would have a very real understanding of the issue, as brought before the House today by the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. I know that concern is shared by other members.

I listened very carefully today to the exchange between the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte and I noticed the member referred to it in his intervention at this time. However, I feel that I must adhere carefully to the rule. Despite the fact that this is not only a serious matter but is a matter of intense concern to a lot of people, I am not disposed at this time this afternoon to adjourn the House business for a debate, but I shall be watching the matter very closely.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

PETITIONS

POVERTY

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege of presenting a petition to the House of Commons and the government from Ellen Sommerville. This a petition of largely senior citizens from my riding who point out that some 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty and that hundreds of thousands of Canadians across the country who are senior citizens live in poverty.

The petitioners therefore appeal that it is undignified to increase Old Age Security by 37 cents a month. They would rather have the government keep that 37 cents each month than be humiliated in that fashion. They are requesting the Government of Canada to try to make the Old Age Security not only dignified but realistic to meet the aspirations of senior citizens in this country.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to present petitions on behalf of constituents of Winnipeg North with respect to the Old Age Security pensions and the Seniors Independence Program.

My constituents are concerned that there are still thousands and thousands of Canadian seniors who live in poverty, that in fact the 37 cent increase in their pensions in April 1992 not only ignores the needs of many of them but is an insult to them, and that moreover the federal government has a primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions.

Therefore, these petitioners humbly pray and call upon this House to ensure that the Old Age Security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of our seniors and that the government restore a strong support for the Seniors Independence Program.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have the privilege and honour to present two petitions by good constituents and especially good Nova Scotians on something that exists right at the grassroots of one's riding, and that is the concern that my petitioners have about the variance between federal truck rates and provincial truck rates and the problems that this causes in predatory pricing.

My petitioners call upon Parliament to enact legislation for the adoption of minimum rate schedules for dump trucks on federal projects at rates not less than the minimum truck haul rates and conditions set by each province where the federal project is to be undertaken. I so humbly pray on their behalf.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present to the House a petition from a number of my constituents living in the Ernestown and Napanee areas situated in my riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington.

These petitioners are supporting the government's commitment as stated in the Speech from the Throne on May 13, 1991 to introduce legislation which would permit a national referendum on the Constitution if necessary.

• (1520)

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which is signed by residents of Ottawa, Gatineau and Hull collected by Janice Manchee from the Public Service Alliance of Canada, Human Rights Division.

The petitioners note that in October 1985 the subcommittee on equality rights of the justice committee unanimously recommended to Parliament that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in all areas of federal jurisdiction.

They note that the government promised in March 1986 to implement this recommendation but that some six years later the government has yet to act. They point out that the Canadian Human Rights Commission has called for this amendment and that a number of provincial governments have acted.

Therefore, they call upon Parliament to ensure that government and Parliament act to bring forward immediately an amendment to add sexual orientation to the Canadian Human Rights Act as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

STEVEN OGUNWUYI

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): I have another petition which is signed by residents of Vancouver and Burnaby which notes that Steven Ogunwuyi, a Nigerian of 23 years of age, was unwittingly implicated in an unsuccessful coup attempt against the unelected president of Nigeria. It notes that prison conditions in Nigeria are appalling and that other people implicated in the coup have been executed after totally unacceptable trials.

The petition notes that he has escaped from Nigeria and is seeking refugee status in Canada and he fears for his life. Therefore, the petitioners urge the House of Commons to request the Minister of Employment and Immigration to allow Steven Ogunwuyi to remain in Canada on compassionate grounds.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by 210 students and staff from Sir Frederick Banting Junior Secondary School in Coquitlam.

The petitioners say that Dupont is the world's largest producer of CFCs with a major plant here in Canada capable of producing up to 18,000 tonnes annually. For almost 20 years the company has continued to produce these chemicals, despite scientific evidence linking them to the destruction of the ozone layer. They say that ozone in southern Canada will be depleted by 15 per cent this year, resulting in a staggering 26 per cent increase in skin cancer, and that the only real answer is to stop producing those ozone-destroying chemicals now.

The petitioners demand that Dupont stop its production of ozone-destroying chemicals now.

PROUD TO BE A CANADIAN

Mr. Lee Clark (Brandon—Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure and the honour to submit a petition signed by a number of residents of Brandon—Souris, including a number of young people who believe very strongly that it is important for Canadians to take pride in a united, strong and independent Canada, and noting that very often we are too reserved and we thus conceal our patriotic feelings.

They have signed this petition in which they support the Kinsmen and Kinette clubs of Canada, specifically in their Proud to be a Canadian project. They indicate that this project is an opportunity to nurture a positive life-long relationship, whether based on heritage or whether based on the flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles, and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

HOUSING

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today under Standing Order 36 to present two petitions signed mainly by people in my riding of Edmonton—Strathcona.

This first petition calls upon Parliament to recognize housing as a shared provincial-federal responsibility, to support the federal non-profit co-operative housing program, and to maintain the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): This petition calls upon Parliament to consider removing the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products.

NORTH THOMPSON RIVER

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure and indeed an honour to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents from British Columbia who now, in total petition numbers, total well over 10,000. They point out that a firm called Multinational Resources intends to divert water from the North Thompson River in British Columbia in order to sell the water in southern California.

They are going ahead with this plan. They are spending millions of dollars on pre-engineering studies and feasibility studies. These residents are saying it is time that we say "forget it; scrap your plans because the waters of Canada will not be sold to California through river diversion".

TAXATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I have petitioners from Manitoba who ask for a fairer and simpler taxation system. They feel that the current system is unfair toward the poor, too onerous for middle class Canadians and business people and they want to ensure that it is non-discriminatory. For example, they refer to taxable child credits. They point out that certain people get them and others do not.

RADIO AND TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): My other petition, Mr. Speaker, asks Parliament to ensure that the CRTC monitors very closely the use of foul language on radio and television. They point out that it is not necessary to use that type of language to inform or entertain.

The petitioners point out as well that it counteracts efforts of the family in this regard.

CHRISTINE LAMONT AND DAVID SPENCER

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which is signed by residents of Kamloops, Vancouver, Burnaby and other cities and municipalities in British Columbia which notes that two Canadians, Christine Lamont and David Spencer, who have been sentenced to 28 years each in a Brazilian prison, have suffered miscarriages of justice, cruel and unusual treatment in Brazilian prisons and discrimination in sentencing and parole.

The petition notes that the only relief which is available from their severe punishment is for Canada to request expulsion in accordance with Brazilian law.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to request the Government of Brazil to expel Christine Lamont and David Spencer and return them to Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I have one other petition. It is signed by a number of people from Coquitlam and Port Coquitlam, British Columbia. The petitioners ask Parliament to amend the Income Tax Act to allow all wage earners to be eligible for the goods and services tax rebate, regardless of age, because taxpayers under 19 years of age cannot get the rebate while awaiting the repeal of the tax itself.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I was wondering if I could get unanimous consent to go back to Private Members' Business because there is a bill I wish to introduce.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PENSION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–352, an act to amend the Pension Act (pension commencement date).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleagues for the unanimous consent.

This bill is based on a basic fundamental principle which is as follows. If a citizen owes the government money, the government can come at any time and collect that money, obviously according to the laws and procedures which exist. There are a number of programs to which citizens are entitled, particularly in the domain of pensions where it does not work that way, where retroactivity exists for a very limited period of time.

The intent of this bill is to ensure that retroactivity is permitted when a citizen merits a particular pension and he or she did not ask for it at a particular point in time, perhaps because of lack of knowledge. That is the intent. Hopefully, we could look at other areas besides this one later.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Duhamel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

* * *

[Translation]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

[English]

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Barbara McDougall (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, be read the third time and passed.

• (1530)

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to open debate on third reading of Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act now that the legislative committee has completed its study and reported its findings to this House.

First I would like to thank the member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold who chaired the legislative committee and the hon. members who studied the bill very closely. Second, I would like to express appreciation to the witnesses who took time to appear before the committee to make their views known.

As a result of the committee's thorough and thoughtful work, a number of amendments have been made to the bill and I am pleased to note that these clarify and strengthen the intended effects of the proposed changes in the pension programs.

All members will recall that the President of the Treasury Board has already described Bill C-55 as an important step in the evolution of the various pension plans in the federal Public Service. It is a bill that makes a number of improvements to the plans, thereby responding to some of the long-standing concerns of the plan members.

It fulfils the government's commitment to ensure that its pension plans, like all other employer-sponsored pension plans in Canada, comply with the new Income Tax Act rules for registered pension plans and it moves to improve the funding and the financing of the benefits provided under the pension plans.

Bill C-55 is a relatively complex bill in that it proposes amendments to the existing pension statutes, provides for details of some program improvements to be established by regulation and enacts two new statutes.

The principal statutes the bill would amend are the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the RCMP Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act. The new statutes that would be enacted by Bill C-55 are the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

I would like to take a few minutes to remind all members of the various fairness proposals and improvements contained in Bill C-55.

First, the Public Service Superannuation Act would be amended to provide pension coverage for part-time employees who work more than 12 hours a week. Coverage for existing part-time employees would be optional but it would be compulsory for employees engaged on a part-time basis in the future.

In addition, employees could choose to buy back periods of part-time service up to and including January 1, 1981. While providing all employees with increased flexibility to balance work and family responsibilities and still continue to accrue pension benefits, this proposal is expected to be particularly helpful to women, since they are most often the ones who decide to work on a part-time basis while their children are small.

Similarly, women with young families will be among the plan members most likely to take advantage of the bill's proposals with regard to paying back pension contributions for periods of leave without pay.

Current provisions can impose financial hardships which the bill would alleviate by allowing plan members to elect not to count periods of leave without pay in excess of three months. Later on the plan member could choose to count such periods and pay for them over a more extended elective service period.

The bill's proposal to establish an early retirement program for the operational employees of the Correctional Service of Canada would honour a long-standing commitment of this government and of previous governments.

I believe that all hon. members will support this initiative which would provide those individuals who work in the highly stressful environment of the various correctional institutions and associated programs of this country with the flexibility and financial resources to move on from that environment after a reasonable period of service. Such a program would contribute to the general public's security by ensuring that the corrections work force continues to be effective.

I am particularly pleased that the bill proposes improvements to the life insurance plans, known as the supplementary death benefits plans provided by the Public Service Superannuation Act and the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act. Coverage would be doubled from one year's salary to twice the salary of the participant and the paid-up benefit—that is the benefit on which no participant contributions are required and the only benefit remaining after age 70—would increase from $500 to $5,000.

These improved benefits would be funded solely from the reserves in the death benefit account. There would be no extra cost to either the plan participants or to the taxpayers.

Most of the improvements in the pension plans I have mentioned so far have an important bearing on family financial planning. One of the new statutes that would be enacted by Bill C-55 would also assist in this area. I am speaking of the Pension Benefits Division Act which would allow benefits accrued under federal pension plans to be recognized as family assets that could be subject to a division on marital breakdown.

In most provincial jurisdictions and under the federal Pension Benefits Standards Act, plan sponsors are required to honour court orders for separation agreements that specify such a division. Up until now there has been no mechanism under the federal plan to permit what is commonly referred to as credit splitting.

The Pension Benefits Division Act would, subject to provisions of a court order or spousal agreement, permit a lump sum of up to 50 per cent of the value of the pension benefits accrued during this specific period to be transferred to a retirement savings vehicle for the legal or common law spouse. The plan member's pension benefits would then be adjusted accordingly. I believe that the Pension Benefits Division Act and regulations once enacted should provide valuable assistance to couples who are endeavouring to arrive at a fair and satisfactory property settlement.

One other improvement which responds to requests made over the years by retired Public Service employees, members of the Canadian Armed Forces and members of the RCMP is the opportunity afforded by Bill C-55 for pensioners under all the plans to provide survivor benefit coverage for a spouse married after retirement or after age 60 in the case of the Canadian Armed Forces and the RCMP.

This elective opportunity would be accompanied by an actuarial adjustment to the plan member's own pension, an adjustment made necessary by the need to maintain the actuarial soundness of the pension plans and in keeping with the principle that the liabilities of pension funds are normally not extended to cover individuals who become family members after the plan member has retired.

I would also like to remind hon. members that the bill contains two provisions that would affect members of the Canadian forces and the RCMP only. One is the extension of the pension coverage to full-time members of the reserve force who left the regular forces without entitlement to a pension; the other is the standardization of age and service requirements under the RCMP Superannuation Act for voluntary retirement of officers with the requirements for other ranks.

I would not wish to go further without mentioning Bill C-55's proposals, which would apply to all the pension plans for the full funding of the plan member's benefits as they are earned. This means that the credits made to the various pension accounts, representing employer and plan members' contributions together with interest earnings, must be sufficient to cover all future benefits of plan members as they are being earned.

As part of this exercise, the basic pension accounts of the PSSA, the CFSA and the RCMPSA would be combined with the relevant portions of the supplementary retirement benefits account. The responsibility for any unfunded liabilities would be assumed by the government. Employee contribution rates would remain the same and the government would contribute at whatever level is necessary to maintain full advanced funding of the benefits as they are earned.

• (1540)

I must emphasize that the bill's provisions for full funding increase the security of the plan and mean that there must also be sufficient funds credited to the account to cover the cost of all benefits acquired as of any given date. I trust that this will reassure those public service unions and pensioner organizations who voiced concerns at committee that the effective date of combining the accounts would allow the government to take a contributions holiday.

I have already mentioned that Bill C–55 would ensure that the federal pension plans comply with the Income Tax Act rules for registered pension plans in the same way as any other employer sponsored pension plans in Canada must comply.

Compliance would be achieved through a combination of statutory amendments to the existing plans, regulation–making authority and the enactment of a new statute, the Special Retirement Arrangements Act.

For example, statutory amendments would limit the level of salary on which benefits can be based so that those benefits would not exceed the maximum accrual of $1,722 for each year of plan membership permitted by the Income Tax Act and regulations.

At the same time, the bill provides a mechanism to continue elements of the program that exceed the income tax rules through retirement compensation arrangements. With the exception of the members of Parliament pension plan, these arrangements would be authorized under the proposed Special Retirement Arrangements Act. The retirement compensation arrangement for members of Parliament would be provided under the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

I am happy to report that Bill C–55's proposals have largely been welcomed by plan members. However, some public service unions and pensioner organizations have been critical of the regulation–making authority contained in the bill and have caused what I feel to be undue alarm by alleging that the authority for continued Income Tax Act compliance could be used by this government or any future government to change the indexing provisions of the pension plans.

I want to assure hon. members, as the President of the Treasury Board has assured the organizations involved, that there is no intention on the part of this government to use the regulation–making authority for any purpose other than Income Tax Act compliance. A thorough review has confirmed that the authority would not be used to modify or alter acquired rights including indexing.

However, in recognition of the concerns felt by plan members, the government proposed a motion to the committee, which was carried, that would explicitly limit the scope of the authority to compliance with the Income Tax Act and regulations as they read on January 15, 1992.

As well, an amendment has been included to reinforce the fact that no regulation under this authority can have a negative impact on accrued rights. The question of meeting future income tax requirements would be addressed as part of the promised stakeholder view of the fundamental elements of the pension plans.

Union criticism has also been directed at the proposed early retirement program for operational employees of the Correctional Service of Canada. While welcoming the program, the unions have let it be known that they would prefer to see all the details of the program set out in the statute as the authority for establishing a program instead of being left to regulation.

However, hon. members are well aware that the regulation mechanism is surrounded by safeguards to ensure that regulations are within statutory authority and that they are made public both before and after enactment. Regulations are, of course, also subject to a review by the Standing Joint Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations.

In addition, unions may rest assured that the regulations of the Correctional Service program will not be developed without prior consultation.

The subject of consultation brings me now to the question of the stakeholder review. I have already indicated that Bill C–55 is one step in the Public Service reform process. The next step will be a review of the outstanding issues involved in the Public Service plans and the plan of members of Parliament.

Among the issues to be resolved for the Public Service plans are plan management, the rate of return to be credited to the funds, future inflation protection arrangements, and questions related to plan design including such things as conformity with the federal Pension Benefits Standards Act and the possible redesigning of survivors benefits. These are matters that were spoken about by witnesses before the committee.

As soon as Bill C–55 is passed, the president intends to meet with his advisory committee on the Public Service Superannuation Act to embark on the next step of the pension reform process. I know that the President of the Treasury Board is looking forward to working with representatives of the various stakeholders in the plan so that together they can come to a consensus and reach solutions that will be as satisfactory as possible to all parties concerned.

I therefore urge hon. members to expedite the passage of Bill C–55 so that we can implement the improvements it proposes and so that there will be no further delays in providing pension coverage for part-time employees, paying out the increased supplementary death benefits to the appropriate beneficiaries, or affording separated and divorced spouses a fair division of the pension benefits accrued under the federal plans.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, this bill has come to typify for many of us who have been involved intimately in every clause, every section and every word of it and in every moment of lengthy committee hearings and debate on the bill the approach of the government. It presents one thing and actually does another. It takes small improvements and surrounds them by a bush of unpleasant, unwelcomed and damaging changes. It looks after those who have the most but not those who have the least.

I want to go into some specifics to put some flesh on those contentions. Last December 10 the minister announced that there would be changes to the pension legislation. He announced that there would be improvements to remove some unfairnesses in the pension situation and that there would be changes to bring the act into conformity with the Income Tax Act. Nobody could disagree with those intentions. We as the Liberal Party did not disagree with those intentions and those principles at the time the bill was debated at second reading stage.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am sorry to interrupt the member but I just want clarification. We are questioning the member who just spoke. I hope she is not starting her debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Under the Standing Orders there are no questions or comments. The first two speakers receive 40–minute speeches without questions or comments. Then we will go to the third speaker who will be from your party and who will get 20 minutes plus 10 minutes of questions and comments.

Mrs. Catterall: However, as the committee began its deliberations and finally had time to look at what the bill had to say, it became evident that the government had brought in some improvements to the bill as it had promised, some very minor improvements, but was then using this bill to hijack in a complete takeover of the management of the pension plan, contrary to the promises by the minister back in December that no changes would be made to the management of the pension plan except following a thorough and complete review in consultation with all the other stakeholders.

Those stakeholders include members of the Public Service who contribute 7.5 per cent of their income to their pension plans. It also includes hundreds of thousands of retired Public Service employees who collect benefits based on the contributions they made during their working years.

Despite the promise of the minister that any change in the management of the plan would be dealt with through a thorough and consultative review, this bill has been used to attempt to take over the management of the plan to an even greater degree than the government already does.

• (1550)

I want to go through several very specific aspects of how the government has approached this bill to explain clearly why we are voting against it despite some long awaited improvements in pensions, especially some that relate to charter rights of certain groups in society.

Pension reform has a long history going back over a decade. In the early 1980s there was a major parliamentary review of pension plans in Canada in recognition of the fact that Canada had an aging population and that in the very near future we would have a much larger proportion of our population in the retirement years.

There was genuine and legitimate public concern about how people would support themselves in retirement and whether the country's pension plans were adequate for people to live with dignity, decency and comfort after a lifetime of working.

That commission reported and recommended some major reforms to numerous pension plans and to legislation governing pension plans in Canada. Shortly after there was a review of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to see how pension plans in Canada, among other things, conformed with the charter. That committee also reported and recommended major changes to pension plans in Canada, including the public sector pension plans.

The government of the day responded to those two committee reports. It brought in the Pension Benefits Standards Act which applies to all federally regulated employers and their pension plans and told them what standards private sector pension plans had to meet. It did not and has not to this date brought its own public sector pension plans into conformity with that act.

Once again it is the government saying to everybody else in Canada: "This is what you have to do, but we can ignore our own laws; we can ignore our own rules".

It changed the Canada Pension Plan to meet the standards the committees having reviewed the plans had recommended. But while Public Service employees, Armed Forces employees and RCMP personnel continued to contribute generously to their pension plans, those pension plans continued not to meet the basic test of fairness that the government imposed on private sector plans and that it had implemented for the Canada Pension Plan.

The government continues to say "trust us". The government continues to say that it will sit down with employees, will review the pension plans, will see where changes and improvements need to be made, and will do it jointly and in partnership. Those are words the government uses very nicely but seems to have a hard time living by.

Let me make it clear why there is no trust on this issue. There is no trust because it is now close to a decade that people have waited for the pension plans to be brought into conformity with the recommendations of two major parliamentary committees and into conformity with the government's own legislation.

It is now nearly a decade that they have been waiting for the government to legislate a fair rate of return on the $73 billion worth of pension funds that Public Service employees, Armed Forces personnel and RCMP personnel contribute. It is now nearly a decade they have been waiting for some say in the management of their own money. But the government unilaterally continues to decide what the benefits are, what the contributions are, what the rate of return to the fund is, and continues to cheat people contributing to these plans of a fair rate of return on their own money.

It is now seven years since the President of the Treasury Board promised the review, five years since he promised it again, three years since he promised it the third and fourth times, and now six months since the latest President of the Treasury Board has promised a review.

Not one step has been taken to consult with the pensioners or to consult with the people, whose money we are talking about, to conduct that review. Why should there be any trust?

It is no wonder that people who have watched this process carefully and who have waited patiently for improvements and fairness in their pension plan, as the government has dictated for other pension plans, say that this is a government that operates by stealth, by hidden agendas, by secretive decision making, by subterfuge and by double-dealing. This bill demonstrates that very clearly.

The government likes to say that it wants to co-operate with its employees, it wants to co-operate with its partners in these pension funds. It has failed to listen to the testimony that was put before the committee. It failed to respond to the concerns of the pensioners and future pensioners and to members of the opposition. Very legitimate points that were raised in committee were not responded to and were not addressed.

There were numerous amendments put before this House in a last minute effort to try to get the government to live up to its word on this bill and on what it was supposed to do. Those amendments were unanimously turned down by the government.

Finally, the bill shows a complete lack of fairness. It is almost as if the government has trouble passing up any opportunity to profit from human misfortune. That is most evident in the comments I will make shortly on how divorced and separated wives of Public Service pensioners, armed forces or RCMP personnel are treated.

I want to talk about some of the specifics of the bill. The government has done, as we say and as we admit, a couple of minor improvements in the pension arrangements. For instance, the improvement in the supplementary death benefit is certainly a step forward. For a number of years now there has been a tremendous surplus in that supplementary death benefit account as people's salaries have improved and as their contributions have grown. The supplementary death benefit payment has remained at a paltry $500 for many, many years.

The fact that the government has finally chosen to give people the supplementary death benefit that they are paying for and that they have generated a surplus to pay for is not particularly credit-worthy except to say that it is a tad overdue.

The major claim the government has made to giving us a fairer pension plan is that it will now allow pension splitting. In other words, it will allow in its own plans a tiny portion of what is allowed under the Canada Pension Plan or what is required under private sector pension plans. Behind this small provision in the bill lie thousands of lives of misery, thousands of years of poverty, mostly for women and their children. The government has failed miserably to resolve that situation.

This bill continues to leave in the hands of not even parliamentarians but Treasury Board officials the discretion to deem somebody to be dead just so they do not have to pay them a pension. This means that somebody who is married to an armed forces officer or an RCMP officer—I refer to those services because that is where the situation arises most often—for the entire period of time that the pensioner was accumulating the pension, may be left without any pension. The government, despite knowing for a decade that this is a serious failure of this pension plan, has entirely failed to correct that problem.

• (1600)

There are women who have participated throughout a marriage in the accumulation of a pension benefit being denied that pension benefit. This bill makes it worse for the spouse of a member of these plans because it now reduces from three years to one year the period in which a second spouse or common law spouse can be recognized for pension purposes.

Someone who marries a pensioner later in life who had no part in the accumulation of the pension plan may benefit, where a long-time spouse is denied the pension, even when there is a separation agreement or a support order entitling that person to half the pension when the pensioner dies.

Treasury Board has the right to totally ignore the wishes of the pensioner and the needs of a lifetime spouse and to deny any pension whatsoever to that person.

Where is the family compact when we are talking about women who followed their husbands around the world in military service, who gave up any opportunity to develop their own careers, who in essence became part of the military in supporting the career of a military member, who never were able because of that to develop their own pension plans and who could be left in poverty by a government that would bring forward a bill like this and leave that unjust and unfair situation in place?

The government will say it is allowing court orders to say that a spouse can get a capital value. That is a help. It makes it easier for a couple separating to divide an asset without putting both of them into poverty. However, there is no guarantee that the spouse will have an asset that will anywhere produce the pension that the spouse has earned by being married.

In other words, this bill totally ignores the principle which has been well established in the courts that a pension acquired during a marriage belongs equally to both partners. Until we start dealing with those issues, any time a bill like this comes before us we are still going to have, as a member of Parliament said during Question Period, 80 per cent of women alone after the age of 65 living in poverty. How can we possibly justify that? How can the government possibly justify not correcting that situation when we have spent three months on this bill and it has spent nearly a decade on it?

The bill does not deal at all with the problem, of which the government is well aware, of a disabled person getting a pension and then being deprived of a full pension if their marriage breaks up because of the disability.

Regarding correctional services, this is one very positive step forward, long overdue. I can only ask the minister if this legislation allows correctional services workers to take early retirement, why is the government afraid to spell out clearly in the legislation what that is going to mean, how much it is going to cost them and what they are going to be entitled to?

Why do I get an answer back from the President of Treasury Board that we cannot include northern correctional services workers in this provision because they have not asked for it? If it is fair for correctional services workers in southern Ontario, it is fair for correctional services workers in the north.

Why is the government unsympathetic to including airport fire-fighters in this same provision? Their work is dangerous. It is stressful.

For all the reasons that early retirement is provided to correctional services workers it should be provided to others who are engaged in similarly dangerous, stressful work in which virtually the quality of their work cannot be maintained after a certain period of time.

The government is including part-time workers but it has failed to listen to pleas to include seasonal workers. These seasonal workers may work the equivalent of a year and a half in eight months every year, yet they are not allowed to contribute to the full value of the work they have performed for the Government of Canada.

For seven years this government has been promising a thorough review of the pension plans, for seven years it has been promising action on these items, yet we are presented with a bill that does not deal with these issues.

I spoke about fairness and about treating people with some equity. Therefore, I can only ask the government why officers in the Armed Forces and the RCMP, senior management and members of Parliament—in their bill—are allowed to have a 60 per cent survivor pension for their spouses but public service employees, regular run-of-the-mill RCMP personnel and Armed Forces personnel are not?

The government knows perfectly well, although it refuses to produce studies on what it would cost, that providing a 60 per cent survivor benefit for pensioners of public service employees, RCMP and Armed Forces personnel would probably cost less than one-half of one per cent. Yet it would be the difference between living in comfort and dignity and living in poverty for the survivors.

The government has even had trouble living with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this bill. It has perpetuated and continually failed to accept amendments to remove a clause that is so offensive to the Charter because it is based on discrimination according to age. It is offensive to women because it is based on the concept that women only marry retired pensioners to get their money, and offensive to retirees because it is based on the concept that nobody could possibly be interested in marrying a man over the age of 65 except for his pension. This is the famous gold-digger clause. If one is over 60 one cannot be presumed to have a wife who has married that person over 60 simply because she loves him and wants to spend the rest of her life with him.

Therefore, the government has to protect pensioners against women like that by saying that if someone marries somebody after the age of 60 when they are retired that person does not have any entitlement to the survivor's pension, even though that retiree has contributed to that pension and to the survivor's rights under that pension for an entire career.

I think we all know that people are living longer now, they are healthier longer and they are active longer. Life goes on, and people do get remarried. A person came before us whose wife had died when he was somewhat younger. He married again after the age of 60 and expects to live a long and happy life with his second wife, but she will not get any survivor's pension when he dies. He is worried and concerned about that because it is pretty difficult when on a pension to provide a second pension for a second spouse.

I want to talk about part-time employees. The government has claimed that one of the major victories of this bill is that it would allow part-time employees to contribute to the pension plan. It does and that is important. It is important for a lot of women who work for the Public Service and choose to work part-time for a portion or all of their careers because they like to balance their work with their family responsibilities. They may work part-time for a short period after they have been on maternity leave, or for a longer period as they help their children get established.

Yes, this bill does allow, in a very limited way, part-timers to be included in the pension plan.

• (1610)

If the member for Ottawa—Vanier were to enter the Public Service at the age of 60 he could contribute for service in the private sector back to the time when he was 18 years old and he entered the labour force. He could then have a full pension when he retired. However, part-timers are not going to be able to do that. They are only going to be able to go back a limited number of years.

What right do we have to say that the work of part-timers is less worthy than the work of the member for Ottawa—Vanier if he were to enter the Public Service and to say that they do not have the right to go back to the beginning of their working careers and contribute for all their part-time work because it is deemed to be less valuable and less worthy? That is straight discrimination.

It is even worse than that. The bill says that unless a person was contributing to the pension plan the day this bill is passed they cannot contribute for part-time service. In other words, the vast majority of the part-timers now in the Public Service will not be able to take advantage of this despite the glorious announcements by the minister and the government.

Once again duplicity and deception, trying to pull the wool over people's eyes, seem to be the way this government operates. Give me one good reason why somebody who is working full time today and contributing to the pension plan should be able to contribute for their part-time service in the past or in the future but somebody who is working part time today, even though they may have contributed for ten years to the pension plan, cannot contribute for their part-time service. How can that possibly be fair?

The parliamentary secretary himself said that it is mostly women who are part-time workers. Why does he want to continue to discriminate against mostly women?

While the member for Ottawa—Vanier could enter the Public Service and decide 10 years from now to buy back his service back to 1940, part-time employees have only a year to decide that they want to buy back their service.

As I said in my speech on second reading, even when the government tries to do something a little bit good it does a very little bit and it tries not to go too far.

This concerns the issue of trust and honesty with people. The government said clearly that issues about the management of the pension fund would be left to a complete study and review that would be made in consultation with the employees and with the pensioners. Yet in this bill it has failed to set up any kind of management board that would give employees any stake in the management of their own money.

Six months after the minister's announcement not one step has been taken to meet with those pensioners, to meet with representatives of the employees and talk about how that review is being done. After waiting seven years, since 1985, through successive presidents of Treasury Board, for a promised review is it any wonder the employees and pensioners do not really believe that a review is going to happen now, any more than it has happened in the past?

On the other hand the government, having promised that review, has used this legislation which it said did other things to try to shoehorn in a complete takeover of the rules by which the pension fund is managed: how much is contributed, how much in benefits are paid, whether indexing is paid, how much the government contributes, what the employees have to pay. The government has tried to take all this over in this bill.

How can the government tell people: "We want to sit down with you and we are going to work out the management of the plan"? It has tried to do those things that are in its own interest.

Let me give some examples. The current amount of money in the pension fund is over $75 billion. The surpluses in the three funds in 1991 were $23.5 billion.

Now by doing as the government tried to do by saying: "We will just contribute what is needed to meet the requirements of the fund", it would have essentially been taking over that $23.5 billion of surplus money which does not belong to it. Public Service employees have contributed more year by year for over 30 years than has ever come out of that pension plan.

With this bill, the government thought it had a sneaky way of getting its hands on some of that money rather than keeping it to pay out pensions. But these figures also give a lie to statements of various ministers over the last seven years that somehow we have to bring the Public Service pension plans more into line with the private sector, that they are underfunded, that they are a huge burden of debt on the Canadian taxpayers.

I read the figure again, a $23.5 billion surplus last year. Who do you think gets to use that money and pay interest on it at less than market rates? The government. Who do you think benefits? The Canadian taxpayers because that is a direct reduction off the debt and the deficit. Who do you think loses? The pensioners and the contributors because this government refuses to treat that fund as any other well-invested fund and return to it a suitable rate of interest and rate of return.

The bill sets up something I consider far more dangerous than what is in it and that is what is not in it. It follows a consistent pattern of the government to do more and more by regulation. In other words, government takes out of the hands of Parliament the right to review legislation and puts it into the hands of administrators to decide what should happen.

When I look at a bill like this and Bill C-26 which is going to be coming before us later today, I wonder why we have a Parliament at all. Why do we not just have a growing number of bureaucrats to administer, devise, design and print a growing number of regulations? We would never need to meet in this Chamber at all. You and I, Mr. Speaker, could go out and play golf four days out of five and never be missed.

When reading a piece of legislation, people are entitled to know what their rights and obligations are. People are entitled to know that in a democratic government decisions are made in this Chamber about what is in legislation, not in closed rooms and not by administrators who are not accountable to the public. People need to know we are not going to have an army of administrators administering a growing volume of regulations.

I simply cannot understand the contradiction of a government that says it wants to deregulate and then brings in a bill like this, which does not really say anything except it will pass regulations to do it.

That does not let people know what their rights are. It does not let them know what their obligations are. It removes from Parliament the right to decide how public money is going to be spent and what public policy is going to be.

One of the big contentious issues has been whether or not this legislation touches indexing of pensions and other rights that people have under the bill now. I want to quote from a letter from the President of Treasury Board to the committee: "There will be no change to the indexing benefits except by statute. The amendment to be proposed will make it absolutely clear that this is the case."

That amendment does not make it absolutely clear. The minister has not met his commitment to this House, to the committee, to the pensioners and to the contributors for whom he is the trustee of their money. It is not his money, not the government's, not mine and not the member for Carleton—Gloucester's; it is their money.

• (1620)

On Friday, the government refused to accept a number of amendments that would have met the minister's commitment to make it absolutely clear. The government had amendments before it which said "for greater clarity, standard provision in many bills". It refused to accept that amendment. Is it any wonder the pensioners do not trust the government? Is it any wonder Canadians do not trust it?

Finally, if we have any doubt about whether this government still believes in democracy and whether it still believes in this Parliament's right to set the laws of the land, there is a provision in this act that is the most shameful and most shocking I have ever seen in a piece of legislation. It undermines the right of Parliament and the right of Canadians to have their laws made here by their elected representatives.

Let me state what the provision in the bill says and then ask all parliamentarians who believe in democracy whether they want to vote for it. That provision of the bill says: "For greater clarity, where there is any conflict between the regulations and the legislation passed by this Parliament the regulations prevail, not the legislation".

That is a wide open door for a future government, a future cabinet to make regulations contradicting the legislation passed by Parliament. Is that acceptable to anyone in this House? It is not acceptable to me. It is not acceptable to the Liberal Party which believes that the laws of the land should be made by Parliament and the elected representatives of the people.

Others members of the Official Opposition will have a great deal to say about this bill. I personally find it regrettable that the government, after having a Charter of Rights and Freedoms for 10 years, could not at least have chosen to ensure that pensions in its own domain are fair.

It has passed laws to create fairness in the CPP. It has passed laws to impose fairness on private sector pension plans. But it has totally ignored the needs of people based on gender, age, marital status, and disability in this bill. It has failed to be honest about its intentions with this bill.

On behalf of the members of the committee and certainly members of the Liberal Party, I personally want to thank all the employees' associations, private individuals, women fighting for fair pensions, fighting to be recognized as still being alive even though they are separated or divorced, and retirees, many of whom have worked in government and are very knowledgeable and expert in pension matters. I thank all of them for the work they have done on this bill and for the expertise that none of us individually could have brought to it.

I express my regret that the government chose not to table with the committee its studies on pension matters which made it more difficult for us to do our work thoroughly and well.

I express my great regret that at this point in time we do not have a bill before us that all parliamentarians can support enthusiastically.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to speak on Bill C–55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact a special retirement arrangements act and the pension benefits division act which I have examined very carefully for the New Democratic caucus. We will be voting against this piece of legislation.

First of all, I want to recognize in a very serious way the people who came before the committee.

The comments made by the member for Burlington certainly do not reflect the hundreds of letters that I have received from across Canada with regard to Bill C–55. He said that there is general agreement from the members. I certainly have not heard that.

We did not hear that from the witnesses who came before the committee. The Treasury Board Secretariat was the first one who came before the committee and outlined the bill. Then we got into the real disturbing parts of the bill when the Professional Institute of Public Servants came before the committee with a very well documented presentation, and I commend it for that.

The Federal Superannuates National Association came before the committee and also expressed its concerns with regard to this piece of legislation. The Public Service Alliance of Canada also recommended numerous amendments, some of which the government did accept.

Others who came before the committee were William Lewis, Robert Battram, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Veterans Association, the Association of Members of Division "C" of the Mounted Police, A.J. Campbell, Organization of Spouses of Military Members, Canadian Pensioners Concerned Incorporated, the Armed Forces Pensioners'/Annuitants' Association of Canada, and the Committee of Spousal and Children's Pensions Survival and Related Benefits.

I want to say that each one of those groups outdid itself in its presentation in explaining very clearly to the committee the very, very serious ramifications of this piece of legislation.

I think it only fair that I start by talking about several of the good features of the bill. The bill proposes some changes which we are very pleased to see, such as federal part-time workers now being covered in pension plans. Finally, after years of lobbying, federal part-time workers can now become members of the superannuation plans. This will especially help women, who form the majority of part-time workers. They are an important target group for pension reform and this new provision will help give them more income after retirement.

There is also the new early retirement for correctional workers. We are pleased to see the new early retirement act for correctional workers, another idea that has been pressed for at least a decade. Correctional workers have highly stressful jobs and deserve the kind of unreduced early retirement plans that air traffic comptrollers have had for some time now.

Regarding the new pension splitting, the new pension division act instructs the federal government to enforce court ordered divisions of federal pension credits under marital breakdown. This idea is very good and very late. It is good to see the government has finally responded. There are many problems with the method the government has chosen, however.

On behalf of the NDP I proposed over 25 amendments to this bill in committee and in the House. I and my colleagues moved many more amendments, attempting to make this a better law. The government agreed and proposed modified versions of several of our amendments. I commend it for that. Despite these improvements, however, many serious problems remain.

I would like to talk about the five major areas of concern: one, the new regulatory authority; two, the new early retirement plan for correctional workers; three, supplementary death benefits; four, MP pensions; five, the new division benefits division scheme.

On the new regulatory authority, although simple for compliance with the Income Tax Act, the bill also gives the government new regulatory authority over fundamental aspects of federal employee pension plans. This is a new fundamental shift away from the scrutiny of Parliament. Such a change is, at best, unnecessary and at worst highly dangerous and open to abuse by the present and future governments.

As the member for Ottawa West has indicated, what this House is allowing and what this government is doing is taking authority away from the House of Commons and putting it into regulations and through Governor in Council it can make changes to pension plans in the future. This is a very dangerous method of dealing with pension plans.

• (1630)

It was set out that the following were proposed to be determined by regulations. Here are the kinds of regulations we are going to be getting into when we get into this type of thing: Rate of interest on superannuate account will be done by regulations; periods of amortization, regulations again; amount of government contributions, regulations again; control of account surpluses, regulations again; general authority to comply with the income tax whenever necessary, regulations again.

I put forward 15 amendments to take away the sweeping grab for regulatory power and restore these fundamental issues to Parliament.

The government came forward with some amendments due to NDP pressure and lobbying by federal employees' unions. The government has agreed in committee to amend the bill to restore into law the existing provisions for: calculating the rate of interest on the superannuate account, the fixed periods of amortization, guaranteed matching employer contributions and compliance with the Income Tax Act as of 1992. These issues are far from being resolved because they do need to be reviewed urgently, but the amendments to the bill at least reinstate the provisions which exist in the current acts.

Turning to indexing, despite assurances from the minister to make it absolutely clear that there would be no changes to the indexing benefits except by statute, there remains general regulatory authority for future changes to and reductions in federal government pensions.

It is a matter of trust. The legal wording of the regulatory clauses is ambiguous enough to give us reason to doubt this government's intention. Even if this government could be trusted, the point is that this law will be around long after this government. Federal employees must be protected from future abuses as well.

Unfortunately we have many reasons to be sceptical of this government.

Turning to advisory committees, the government has not consulted with the advisory committee of the Public Service Superannuation Act for five years despite the drafting of this legislation. We had a member of the advisory committee come before the committee on one of the presentations who told us that they had not met for over five years. That is shameful, with new legislation coming to the House and it has not even had discussions in an advisory capacity with the advisory committee.

The NDP urges the minister to fulfil his promise to consult with all stakeholders and to review the fundamental issues of rate of return, inflation protection and planned management.

The federal government is both the employer and the administrator of the pension plan of federal employees. There is a need for greater involvement of all stakeholders than in the past.

The NDP further urges the government to replace the ineffective advisory committees with a more authoritative joint management board. A management board should be comprised of equal representation of employers, employees, retirees, and at least one spousal representative. It should be chaired by an appointee of the Treasury Board. The board should be required by law to meet and to consult regularly.

Turning to government resistance, the government steadfastly refuses to establish such a board despite growing pressure. With Bill C-55 the Governor in Council appears to have even more power to change federal pensions unilaterally despite employee and retiree concerns. This is unacceptable.

The original bill threatened to take a huge step backward. As amended, the bill is less dangerous but remains regressive.

There was a clause in the bill, clause 32, which I asked to have removed. It read:

> The Governor in Council may, for the purpose of ensuring the practical and fair application of this Act in any case where regulations are or have been made under subsection (1), make regulations
>
> (a) adapting any provision of this Act or of any regulation made under this Act;
>
> (b) respecting the application of any provision of this Act or of any regulation made under this Act; and
>
> (c) generally as the Governor in Council may consider necessary for that purpose.

These are excessive powers being given to a group of people to sit down, to make recommendations and to make changes without even consulting the House of Commons. It is dangerous indeed.

The early retirement for correctional workers clause is new. I commend the government for recognizing them, but it has serious flaws. The bill creates a new early retirement plan for correctional service employees in recognition of the highly stressful nature of their work. This is a good idea that the workers have demanded for many years.

However, the plan is seriously ambiguous. The government had promised that correctional workers arrangements would follow the model of the current act which prescribes the rules for early retirement of air traffic controllers. Mysteriously most details about specific arrangements for correctional workers have been left to regulations which the government has yet to reveal. Again, regulations that we know nothing about.

I have recommended that the government provide the regulations outlining the conditions of early retirement or adopt amendments which give legislative sanction to the March 8, 1982 agreement reached between the union of Solicitor General employees and Correctional Services Canada. The government has refused to do either.

I also attempted to amend the bill to include former employees of the the Government of Canada who are employed by the governments of Yukon and the Northwest Territories. This would have laid the legislative basis for future agreements between these governments and their workers.

In committee we pressed the government to raise the benefits from the current 50 per cent limit to at least 60 per cent, which is the case with many other plans such as the privileged group of RCMP senior officers and MPs. The government promised that this issue would be dealt with when the superannuation plans were reviewed. This is another urgent reason to set up the review and we look forward to the government taking action on this matter.

Turning to ex-spouses deemed dead, the bill fails to delete the clause that gives Treasury Board the power to deem ex-spouses dead for the purpose of survivors' benefits. Treasury Board argues that this is simply a way of handling cases where ex-spouses cannot be located.

However, witnesses believe the government wants to keep this clause in order to exclude former spouses from their share of death benefits based on the continuing assumption that ex-spouses have chosen to be disenfranchised, to opt out. How ridiculous can it be? This is archaic and unfair and should be removed from the legislation.

On a preferable system for prorated division, the NDP prefers a system that recognizes the period of contributions during cohabitation under the marriage contract and respects past divisions of assets under separation or divorce court settlements. The death benefit should be divided on a prorated basis to ex-spouses based on the length of contribution during years of marriage, not the moment of death.

The Canada Pension Plan provides for the length of time that the husband and spouse live and work together. It recognizes it. Why can we not do it in this piece of legislation?

Spouses at the time of death now, including post-retirement spouses, should not be allowed to be elected by the plan member as their sole beneficiary. The beneficiary should be irrevocably designed by law on a prorated basis.

With regard to MPs' pensions, the Leader of the New Democratic Party has called for this to be handled by an outside group.

• (1640)

I applaud her efforts to get the government to have this done by an outside group. I am not going to comment with regard to that issue. I am sure when it has studied fully it will come back with the kind of recommendations that will probably satisfy the House of Commons.

On the new pension divisions act, the bill creates a mechanism for federal employees pension credit splitting upon marriage breakdown. Former spouses will have the option of applying for a court ordered share of the plan members pension.

On constituency, this is an idea that has been a long time coming. The Canada Pension Plan has for years provided for the automatic division of pension credits. Since 1987 with the passage of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, federally regulated employees in the same sector have been entitled to various methods of pension credit splitting.

Now, five years later, the federal government has extended the same protection to its own employees. Divorced and separated spouses of federal employees have lobbied for years to achieve such a law.

I remind the House that older single women are the poorest citizens of Canada and one of the major reasons for this poverty is the inferior pension benefits provided to them. I commend the government for finally responding to this need.

There are problems, however. I am extremely disappointed to say that the method of the division proposed in this bill is deeply flawed and does not provide consistent treatment of federally regulated employees in the public and private sectors.

The government had the obvious models of the Canada Pension Plan and the automatic division system of the flexible provisions of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, the other model. The government chose neither.

Instead, the government decided to limit benefit distributions to one method, the much more restrictive, cumbersome and less fair lump sum transfer. This method is not easily accessible and has many built-in time delays and court costs. An evaluation of those lump sum amounts fails to take into account many important factors.

There is a better option; namely, the imposition of a trust. A trust would be imposed on the plan administrators to immediately convey an interest to a spouse on a portion of the pension. The non-member spouse would be considered to be a pension plan member who has terminated employment. There might be an option of keeping the benefits in the plan and being entitled to a deferred payment from the plan.

The federal superannuation plan would provide monthly pension cheques to the spouse when the spouse becomes eligible to receive them. Ex-spouses could pay an administration fee for the services of the trust.

On committee amendments, the NDP had four of our amendments accepted by the government in committee. The government proposed its version, disclosure. The bill will now ensure that non-plan member spouses have equal access to their spouses' pension information. This will help former spouses to obtain a fair settlement of a pension they helped to earn.

On period of co-habitation, this ensures that the absence of a court order specifying the period of co-habitation. The minister must use provincial family law guidelines in determining the period.

On valuation regulations, two amendments provided direction to regulations of pension valuations to follow sound and fair methods.

There was another motion with regard to surpluses. I tried to have that motion introduced in the House. It was moved out of order. It was a very important motion because the issue of surpluses in the pension fund is one that should not be done by regulation. It should be done by legislation. The NDP's motions tried to identify those various areas.

In summing up, I want to say how really enthused I was as I entered into deliberations on this bill and looked at the possibilities of many changes where we could have had a management board set up at no cost to the government. A management board could have been brought together with some government people, the employees, the retirees and spousal representation so they had some input as to what was going on.

When we failed at that we tried to get them on an advisory board, but we could not even get them included on that.

It is not the intention of the government to allow input from the outside. This is clearly a regulatory bill. It has moved away from legislation into regulation and it will be regulated by the government.

Because everyone seems to feel that there is protection there with regard to indexing, let me stress that all it would take for this government to make those changes would be some changes in the Income Tax Act that would nullify benefits within the indexing of pensions.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on third reading on Bill C-55 with great disappointment. I believed the government in its first communiqué to the people of Canada, that this bill was to correct certain anomalies and improve the pension of our public servants, RCMP and armed forces personnel.

Those of us who have a special interest in Public Service pensions have been well aware for some time that many changes are needed to make the regime of Public Service pensions fairer, even to simply bring it in line with the rules governing other pension plans.

I want to pay special tribute to a few members of this House. It strikes me that we had a rather good contribution to the debate last Friday when the member for Restigouche—Chaleur tabled I believe about 77 Liberal amendments which were all debated but defeated by the government. I want to pay tribute also to the member for Carleton—Gloucester who has a deep interest in pensions, the member for Ottawa South and his great knowledge of the whole question, and especially to my colleague from Ottawa West who has made a good contribution to this debate today in the beginning of the debate on third reading, an important stage of any bill.

I recognize that we will have to persevere and continue in this work of ours to try and improve the pension plans of public servants to make them fairer. That is the theme we should try and development.

Unfortunately the Conservative government has not taken the opportunity to make the Public Service regime fairer. An opportunity to amend this pension regime does not come every day and one must recognize that. It is astonishing to me that the government has not taken its responsibility in this area more seriously. It gives us hope but it did not produce anything of any substantive change, in my view, to make this plan fairer.

Perhaps I should not be surprised, given the attitude this government has shown toward the Public Service of Canada. Over the last seven years it has targeted the Public Service unfairly, mostly for political gain. It has made the Public Service of Canada the scapegoat for its own mismanagement and destroyed morale in the Public Service.

The Tories have been negligent in their responsibilities. As members of the Official Opposition, my colleagues and I have done our best to counter this negligence. Our efforts were obvious in the number of our amendments in committee, which were mostly defeated by the Conservative members. We tried in the House to come back with some substantive arguments to convince the majority of this House that the report stage could change things and make an improvement but it was to no avail.

I want to go on to explain some of the amendments that we wanted to make to the bill to make it fairer, more current, to improve the future for pensioners and to make them more confident in their ability to meet the challenges of the coming years. The government will now be giving pensioners who marry after the age of 60 the option of arranging for survivor's benefits. We wanted to amend this provision so that pensioners would not have to reduce their own pensions to do so. It was defeated.

• (1650)

We asked the government to provide the option of remedial action to employees to give them the same option provided to deputy heads, senior military personnel, RCMP and political appointees. We asked for fairness for most of our public servants. We asked that they be treated as well, if not better, than the leaders of the services, who are usually the big-shots in the system and have access to the regulations in the legislation and can change them to fit their purposes. However, this is not available to the average public servant. The remedial action was important and it was defeated by the government.

We asked the government to consider establishing a structured way to receive advice. God knows it needs advice. We asked that the regulations receive the approval of the pension committees of the Public Service, the RCMP, and the Canadian forces. We asked that the government listen attentively to what they had to tell them with regard to pensions.

Pensions are non-negotiable, and public servants would like to have some kind of contribution to the betterment of those plans. That was defeated.

We asked the government to consider the concerns of spouses. We have to commend groups like Canadian Pensioners Concerned Inc. and Group Action for Individual Needs. Many people in my riding wrote to me and gave advice and the benefit of their experience in this field, and I thank them for those efforts. Again, the government turned a deaf ear.

These people to whom I have just referred have made significant contributions to their families over the years, giving up their own careers and in many cases chances for employment. Pension building was not allowed for them, and because of that they have been impoverished.

Sometimes they even sat with their spouse as representatives of this country in other countries. Many spouses choose to take their share of a pension as support rather than as an asset in order to have enforcement. These spouses should be able to apply for benefits under the new Pensions Benefit Division Act. We made an amendment, we proposed that and the government defeated it.

Another amendment my colleagues and I suggested to make this bill more fair would require that a legal spouse be informed should the other spouse, living in a different location, take on a common-law relationship. Measures can be taken to avoid having innocent people hurt by these kinds of developments. We wanted to add a clause to the bill which says that the spouse who is legally entitled to pension benefits should receive half of the contributions she and her spouse made. That is fair, and it was defeated.

We introduced an amendment to enable the government to award the amount of pension stated in a court order regarding division of assets. The bill provided that the amount of pension to be transferred was to to be 50 per cent or less, regardless of the court order. We believe the government should award what is in the court order. That was defeated.

We wanted to delete sections which gave the minister the power to declare a period as the period of co-habitation, even in the absence of a court order or spousal agreement specifying such a period. We believe that spouses should not lose part of the pension because the minister did not exercise his power to declare the period of co-habitation. Again, that was defeated.

We also wanted to delete the part of the act saying that pension credits cannot be divided in the absence of a court order or agreement. In our view, it gave the minister the power to ignore a provincial court order or agreement between spouses as to the division of benefits for unnamed reasons. This provision could be unconstitutional since marital property is under provincial jurisdiction.

We put forward an amendment to ensure that the government consult interested parties about regulations, in particular organizations representing spouses or former spouses. Again, that was defeated.

Did the government listen to suggestions made by us in committee with an open mind? Did it agree that fairness is an objective that we should all seek? It would appear not, since it defeated all of our amendments and all the amendments that were proposed by the witnesses.

We called on the government to bring the Public Service pension regime into line with the standards established by the pension benefits standards legislation, introduced in 1985 by this government.

We told it: "Abide by the law, abide by your own standards that you imposed upon the private sector". The pension benefits standards legislation introduced in 1985 established the minimum standards that private sector employers have to honour in managing their employee pension plans. One of the main provisions of the pension benefit standards legislation was to ensure that private sector employers observe the 1966 Canada Pension Plan rules regarding widows' pensions. These rules state that widows must receive a minimum 60 per cent pension. This has been part of our law for 25 years under the CPP. It became a requirement for private pension plans five years ago.

However, under the Public Service pension regime widows receive 50 per cent. Bill C–55 makes no effort to change this. Are the Tories concerned about the large number of older women in Canada living in poverty? Why is it that a public servant is entitled to only 50 per cent and all the others are entitled to 60 per cent by legislation?

It is clear to me that the government should treat its own employees according to the rules it has established for other pension plans. It is only fair to do so.

In 1985 the President of the Treasury Board said the Public Service pension regime would meet the rules of the Pension Benefits Standards Act. I was here when that statement was made. Why did it not happen? Why can't this Conservative government be fair to its own public servants? It is no wonder that many public servants are suspicious of the government's intentions regarding their futures and their pensions, and have serious hesitations about this legislation.

Public servants do not trust the government's intentions. Many are worried about the government's management of their own pension fund. Some even leave the Public Service before their pension fund is "locked in", so they can cash it out because they do not trust the government.

Once again, in the management of this pension plan the government does not follow the rules it has established for other pension plans.

The most recent report of the Auditor General sheds light on this issue. It notes that the four key standards established by the Pension Benefits Standards Act are relevant to the Public Service pension regime. Those four conditions are:

1. An employer ensures that the pension fund moneys are held in trust for the members and former members of the pension plans;

2. A pension fund shall be administered by a board of trustees pension committee, one member of which shall be a representative of the employees;

3. The administrator shall have a clear fiduciary responsibility for the fund;

4. The fund shall be prudently invested.

These four criteria do not apply to Public Service funds.

• (1700)

The report notes that these standards are "intended to protect the interests of plan members by ensuring that meeting pension promises is not dependent on the good will of employers". This government acts as plan sponsor, custodian, trustee, administrator and investment policy maker for its Public Service pension fund. This violates the standards established by the Pension Standards Benefit Act, an act of this Parliament, a bill of that government and it does not follow it.

The government borrows from the pension fund to finance its own needs at rates it sets itself. The member from Ottawa West mentioned the amount. It is above $71 billion. These rates are below what other pension plans earn. The difference in return, and it is not me saying it, Mr. Speaker, it is the Auditor General of Canada, the bookkeeper of this country who says it, has varied on average from 1.5 per cent to 2.3 per cent between 1959 and 1990 from plans which were market invested.

Furthermore, the government's largest internal borrowings are from the pension fund. As of the end of 1989–90, $71 billion was owed to the pension accounts by the Government of Canada. It is obvious that the government is in conflict of interest. It should be prudently managing the Public Service pension fund, but it wants to minimize the cost of its borrowing. Why would it pay a higher rate of return for the money it borrows from the Public Service pension funds when it is obliged to minimize its borrowing costs.

Under Bill C–55, the government proposes that the minister alone shall decide how much the government will contribute to the various pension plans, what rates of interest it will pay and that this will be done through regulation. Will the government consult the employees about this? Past experience tells us that it will not. This bill basically allows a government to reduce its deficit in the short term, but prepares the way for a much larger deficit in the future as pension obligations come due. A whole speech could be made on that. I have not got the time to do so today, but I will some day.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, while the negative aspects of Bill C–55 outweigh the positive ones, certain provisions do show some improvement, and I acknowledge that. Take for instance the combining of retirement benefits and supplementary benefits in the Public Service superannuation account.

At the present time, supplementary benefits are invested at a rate of interest for five years, while the superannuation account is invested based on a 20–year rate, which means that there was indeed a difference between the supplementary benefits fund and the pension fund.

Once combined, the indexing factor would apply to all Public Service pensions, which could mean an improved yield, given the more favourable rates on 20–year bonds.

Although I have some reservations about the future regulations, I am happy that employees who work 12 hours a week and more will now be allowed to contribute to the fund and entitled to pro rata benefits. Employees will have the option of buying back previous years of part–time work since 1980.

On May 15, 1991, I tabled before this House a motion to put in place for correctional staff an early retirement package similar to that of the Canadian Armed Forces and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I figured that the Canadian men and women who work in correctional services deserve to retire early if they so wish. So, I am pleased to see that Bill C–55 incorporates this objective and calls for such a package to make early retirement available to the correctional staff.

While these few provisions are positive, Bill C–55, as I said, is totally flawed. Government failed to deal with the most controversial and contentious management issues. For instance, it did not deal with the rate of return on investments in pension plans similar to those in the private sector. It did not provide for safeguards against inflation like indexation either. It did not deal with the issue of how the plan should be managed, designing a basic plan or raising surviving spouse benefits from 50 to 60 per cent.

This bill is a real disappointment for us. Instead, the Conservative government has given itself many regulatory powers. You only have to flip through the bill to recognize that a lot of things in it are not right. In fact, one of the more scary provisions of the bill provides that the provisions of the regulations will prevail in the event of inconsistencies between the act and its regulations. This sets a dangerous precedent for any other future pieces of legislation. Some will even say that it is ultra vires, undemocratic and contrary to the Constitution. I am going to read Section 80(3) which is as follows:

> (3) In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) and the provisions of this Act or any other regulations made under this Act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

Laws are made here, in this Parliament, not through regulations. We are opposed to this provision which intends to change the way we deal with pensions. In view of the negative aspects of—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret the member's time has expired.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to this debate today and at report stage on Friday. I find it extremely informative.

I had the opportunity a few weeks ago to have a public meeting on Public Service issues in my constituency of Edmonton Southwest. Prior to doing so I consulted with Mr. Daryl Bean, the president of the Public Service Alliance of Canada, Iris Craig of the Professional Institute of the Public Service and of course with Mr. John Edwards of PS2000.

My objective was to inform myself on Public Service issues. It became very clear that there was a fair amount of interest and an alarming amount of misinformation about the provisions of Bill C–55. I think the debate and the record of the debate will in some cases have clarified that and in some cases, without naming the sources of the confusion, have confused the issue.

The objective of the bill of course is to bring Public Service and members of Parliament pensions in line with the requirements of the Income Tax Act. That is truly the objective of the bill. There are those, and I do not fault them for their motives, who have sought to have the bill reach out beyond its own capacity to include other areas of operation of pensions, some worthy and some questionable.

The President of the Treasury Board gave an undertaking on Thursday last which I think is a comfort to all Canadians; that is that the whole question of pensions of members of Parliament will be referred to an outside committee for review and recommendations. This move I think is overdue. I am pleased that the President of the Treasury Board has agreed to it at this time. He had given some earlier indications that he would be prepared to do it, but he made the formal undertaking last Thursday.

That will have the effect of sending a message to the Canadian public that we do not think we are above the law or we do not think that we are in a position to always operate without some other input. I have found it interesting that many critics of MPs' pensions who have been stimulated by the ads of the National Citizens' Coalition, which my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell referred to the other day in debate, have been badly misinformed.

The fact of the matter is that regardless of the merits of that scheme or the lack of merit of the scheme, there is a basic question that remains in the minds of the Canadian public. That is, how is it you folks can deal with these matters on your own without some other input, and how is it that it can happen regardless of the merits?

• (1710)

Mr. Summerville in his ads of course does not point out that the scheme has been in place since 1952 and in its present form since 1972. He seems to indicate it is something that has been foisted recently upon the Canadian public.

Regardless of those facts, the review will begin and all of us, regardless of party and regardless of our approach to the issue, will welcome that review.

The debate is proceeding rather well and I do not propose to intervene much longer other than to move:

That the question be now put.

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the government is at it again. We now have a motion that the question now be put. That prevents any amendment from anyone in this House to be put once this is adopted. The government is imposing closure on pension plans. That is what it is doing. It is trying to prevent the democratic expression of this House on matters of great importance to many of us. I find that absolutely abhorrent.

I see the government Whip laughing. Maybe he will want to speak in this debate. He knows a lot about pension plans and I would like to hear him defend the government on this issue. I know him to be a fair man and being a fair man he will have a hard time defending this legislation.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary a simple question. Why does this government—and he represents government—exclude itself, exempt itself, from the standards established by the government under the pension benefits standards legislation passed five years ago?

What has the government got against fairness? Why is the government saying to Canadians: Do as I say, not as I do? Why is this parliamentary secretary at this time cutting off debate—he knows he is doing it—to prevent his own members from explaining, defending, and possibly even convincing some people as to the merits of the government continuing its unfair campaign against the pension plans of public servants? What has the government got against Canadians?

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, may I have an opportunity to respond to the question?

An hon. member: On a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I will recognize the hon. member on a point of order after the parliamentary secretary finishes his comment.

Mr. Edwards: It is my understanding we are now debating the motion which I just moved.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): This is just the questions and comments on the speech. I have not put the question.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, to respond to my hon. friend's question and his comment and for the benefit of the public which is watching, the motion I moved does not cut off debate. The debate proceeds. There will be a great many opportunities for contributions to the debate. The hon. member has just made a worth-while one himself, one with which I do not agree, but one which is nonetheless worth while.

He asked why the government excludes itself from the Pension Benefits Standards Act? My friend will find the provisions of Public Service pensions stand up well against those within the federal domain, which are outside the Public Service, and any fair and any disinterested test would bear that out.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I have been here all afternoon and I certainly share the quite proper indignation of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

The hon. parliamentary secretary has come into a new job and has been doing very well. He had very diplomatic language at the start as he led to the blunderbuss that he just loaded on to the floor of this House with that type of motion after four speakers, knowing full well there are many other members with a great constituency of federal public servants who want to contribute to this debate. He also knows full well that on the main issues of this thing he is trying to sugar-coat the issue that these are simply amendments to the Income Tax Act, which is part of the problem.

The hon. member is not a stupid man although he has done a very stupid thing for his own credibility in trying to cut off debate now because of the interest of summer recess or whatever. He is a very intelligent man ordinarily. When there are serious questions to raise on this, how can the parliamentary suggest—I think his discipline was broadcasting—with all the best intentions of letters from the President of the Treasury Board, that there is going to be this type of discussion or there is going to be this type of study?

We already heard from the member from Kootenay East that it has been seven years since the advisory committee on the superannuation fund met. In first-year law I found out, and I defy the parliamentary secretary to challenge this, that regardless of the best intention, a ministerial statement, even in the House, is not worth the price of the paper in a legal sense until it is put into some form of regulation or legislation.

As the parliamentary secretary well knew, I had a motion on the two things that interested me fundamentally. The member from Ottawa West canvassed the history of this legislation in a most inclusive and objective manner, pointing out the pluses and the minuses. The hon. member for Kootenay East pointed out some pluses. There are two fundamental things.

I know the parliamentary secretary wants to do well in his new job and is going to try to uplift the standards of the public about this institution, but by cutting off debate with that motion he has stopped any further amendments from being put forward. The fact of the matter is that one of the serious things in this bill referring to the income tax amendments are the legal opinions from the legal counsel which create a real uncertainty—that is a kind word.

When you really interpret these two letters of June 3 and 4 presented before the committee and debated in the committee, amendments by regulation on the Income Tax Act can affect the indexation of these Public Service pensions. That is something that should be properly reviewed now before this bill becomes law. It is not good enough to say there is going to be commitment to understand and have further consultations about these matters or have the stakeholders get together when we have already heard the history that they have not got together for six or seven years.

In conclusion, because other members may want to comment, and this may not make me too popular with all members, I was away last week and I apologize for being away when this thing came up because I know things speed up here very much in the latter stages as we see the midnight sun and as summer seems to beckon. I understand that and I apologize because I knew when C-55 came that it would move fairly quickly normally. With all the tools of the government under new procedures it does move well normally. This debate should move pretty normally tonight and have the full expression of members.

I got my ire up when I read Hansard on Friday. This great House of Commons is exposed to public odium. We have the courage and intestinal fortitude to do so many things affecting so many other people. This bill affects all the public servants. It is the bible for the Public Service from coast to coast. It may seem pretty dry and pedantic but not to the RCMP, the armed services and the federal Public Services from coast to coast. I wanted to participate in this debate to show that it is just not the Public Service around the Ottawa area but that there are public servants from coast to coast affected by this bill. I have not received so much mail on an issue as this bill which is 159 pages. You are going to cut off debate after three speakers here in report stage.

I apologize to my constituents that I was away on Friday, but I was not prepared to accept what happened on Friday, after Private Members' Hour at three o'clock, when the House was even more empty than it is right now.

• (1720)

Under extended hours the House continued and I compliment the government for its Machiavellian delight and success in coming to some of the controversial issues in this bill, particularly members' salaries and pensions. It only takes five members to force a vote. We had five members stand to extend rights to the gay community. For those interested in that, it is a controversial subject and I give full credit to the member for Burnaby—Kingsway for having the honesty and the persistence in the things he believes in to force a vote for the provisions for the gay community. We had other amendments on which we forced a vote on things affecting members, Parliament and the Public Service.

I got my ire up and decided I was going to participate in this debate and do anything I could procedurally to force a vote. I really am beyond it because of time and because of age and the years I have been here. I felt that this House of Commons had to stand up for once and face the issue the hon. parliamentary secretary talks about. I do not care how well-intentioned the President of Privy Council is, whomever he may be. I accept the word of my hon. parliamentary secretary.

I could not believe how the leader of the NDP got seduced by these letters of intent from the President of the Treasury Board saying that Treasury Board was going to look after members' salaries and vesting and double-dipping later in the day.

We could not get five members to force a vote on some very good amendments by the member for Don Valley East and Edmonton Southeast. I was not here and for that I apologize.

On Monday night when we had all those votes at least it would have pin-pointed where members stood.

I can argue about pensions. Frankly, there has been a lot of misinformation on pensions. I am a person from a family in which a man put 40 years in public life and thank God Prime Minister Pearson got widows involved in the pensions for members. Therefore my mother got a pension of $104. In my riding there has not been a pension for members for 47 years.

There is a Liberal member who sits pretty close to me from a riding in which there has not been a member's pension for 50 years because the members keep getting defeated.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have an opportunity to debate.

An hon. member: Debate, not put motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that is not possible. I would like to allow the hon. parliamentary secretary to rebut the hon. member's statement and then carry on with debate because we have now passed the time.

Mr. Nowlan: I would like the opportunity for an important debate in this Chamber for the next few hours because the government is going to move amendments and force the issue and we know the government has the numbers and all government members have stood. You cannot accept double-dipping. You can make an argument for pensions.

With all seriousness, I really am disappointed that the parliamentary secretary has moved this motion. He was quite right, the debate was moving along. It was not going to get hung up. If I had made a motion which was going to be in order, we would have voted some time. Members could have chosen how to vote. You would not have cut the thing off.

Is the parliamentary secretary prepared to stake his parliamentary seat on the commitment in the letter I have not read yet between the President of the Treasury Board and the leader of the NDP that this enquiry into member's salaries, be it vesting or double-dipping and all the other ramifications, will start? There is no criteria set for the enquiry by the way; no time limit, no notice of who will be on the enquiry. Will he stake his seat that it is going to start by Labour Day?

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, to respond to the last question put by my friend, I do not believe that the President of the Treasury Board did stipulate a date but he has made a commitment. He is an honourable man and I believe that commitment will be carried out. I am sure my friend would agree that the commitment will be carried out.

With regard to the question of amendments before us, it is not true that amendments have been choked off in this debate. There have been more than 100 amendments put forward and debated during the course of the study of this bill at report stage and I am not sure how many dozens of amendments at committee stage.

The debate is not being cut off. It is important that the public of Canada realize that this debate can continue until 10 o'clock tonight. There is no question of that. In fact, because of the motion that I put, it frees up members who have spoken to speak again. That is a marvellous liberty which has now been extended to the House. I just wanted to set the record straight.

I am sure my friend, who had a distinguished career in the law—I knew him in Vancouver when he was in the pursuit of that profession—and has served in this House for 27 years now with great distinction, would not want to leave an incorrect impression with the public of Canada.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I have a point of order. Because of the exchange that took place I wonder if I could have the consent of the House to ask a short question. I did not have a chance for a question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will have a lot of speakers here today and we had pretty close to 15 minutes in questions and comments. I had better just say no at this stage but I will ask for unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no unanimous consent.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that debate is continuing and that I will have an opportunity to speak at third reading of Bill C-55 which is the Public Service pension reform bill. For a few minutes I must admit it looked very tenuous as to whether I was going to be able to achieve this.

Bill C-55 is a very large, technical omnibus bill that will amend five pieces of federal legislation which deal with federal pensions. The first one is the Public Service Superannuation Act which is the pension plan that currently covers approximately 312,000 federal government employees from every province and territory in this country; the Canadian Armed Forces Superannuation Act which covers nearly 88,000 Armed Forces members; the RCMP Superannuation Act which covers some 20,000 RCMP members; the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act which covers the pension plan for members and senators and the Pensions Division Benefits Act which provides for the division of benefits if a marriage or common law relationship breaks down.

This bill would also enact two new acts, the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act.

There are two main thrusts to this legislation, the first being the technical changes to ensure that federal pension plans comply with the new Income Tax Act; second, long-standing fairness issues such as pension credit splitting on marriage breakdown, allowing part-time employees to contribute to the pension plan, improving the leave without pay provision vis-à-vis pension contributions and an early retirement program for correctional service officers.

We have long recognized that this legislation would bring a few minor improvements to the Public Service plan. We cautiously supported it at second reading in February in order that a detailed study in committee could be undertaken. However, we in opposition have realized after close study that there is far more that is negative than positive and that Bill C–55 contains major flaws.

I might add at this point that this bill probably has created more letter writing and more phone calls to my office than any bill that has come before us for quite a number of months. Obviously it is of great concern to many people.

I have received dozens of phone calls and letters from constituents in Nepean and not one person, I might add, supported this bill. Many were concerned that this legislation as it now stands would give the government the power to change critical financial aspects of pension management by regulation instead of legislation.

Does the government understand the significance of this? Does it think that Canadians will not know the difference? It means that major policy decisions will now be removed from the realm of this Parliament. It means that the government will not be accountable to the people of Canada and that secret deals can very well be made, but I would certainly hope not. It is an infringement on one's democratic rights.

The government says we should just trust it and it will look out for the rights of pensioners. Well, I think we have all seen too many things in this House and therefore a great number of Canadians no longer trust this government.

• (1730)

If it were really going to do what is right, it would enshrine the management of pensions in legislation. Yet it refuses to do this.

During committee stage, opposition members listened to countless witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee. All proposed reasonable changes to the legislation, and yet the government has chosen not to listen to any of them.

I just wish that I had the opportunity or the time allocation to comment on all the wonderful changes, reasonable changes, that many people had requested. One of the most often requested changes, and I will quote from one person's letter, is this:

> I do wish to stress that the benefits provided for in Bill C–55 should be preserved so that all financial management of it be delayed with current financial benefits being protected until a proper management board is established. This will ensure that amendments receive fair and complete review by all parties.
>
> Furthermore, the bill should be amended to include all the provisions of the Pension Benefits Standards Act as is required of other pension funds in the civilian sector.

That is from a resident of my riding, Mr. Robert Black. Many, many other people said something similar along that line.

The government has hardly moved on the legislation at all since it was tabled in February. There has been slight movement, but very very slight. It is more interested in pushing through a bill, any bill, than it is in ensuring good governance.

The reality of Bill C–55 is that it is flawed, and the portions that may be beneficial are too little and too late.

Over the past decade two parliamentary committees have examined pension reform from the point of view of the adequacy of public and private sector plans, to meet the retirement needs of Canadians, and from the perspective of equality rights established in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Legislative changes arising from the reports of these committees have been made to the Canada and Quebec pension plans and to the Pension Benefits Standards Act, which defines minimum standards for federally–regulated employers.

Bill C–55 addresses to some degree the following outstanding equality issues:

It provides for splitting of pension credits on the breakdown of a marriage or common–law relationship.

Current legislation does not allow for the splitting of pension credits, so the new bill would permit the division of a plan member's pension benefits at source. That obviously is a good move.

A spousal agreement or court order would be required providing for the division of the benefits. Up to 50 per cent of the credits would be transferred to a retirement savings vehicle for the spouse, and the plan member's benefits would be adjusted accordingly.

CPP provides for the automatic splitting of pension benefits at source. The government has a report in hand in 1983 entitled Report of the Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform. It recommended that this be extended to Public Service pensions.

While the provisions in Bill C–55 are an improvement over the current legislation, a number of problems are not resolved by this bill.

It places a portion of the pension benefit under the direct control of the ex–spouse, rather than having to rely on the good will of the former spouse to make pension payments every month. For example, the pension is split by valuing the contributions at the time of the divorce. The ex–spouse receives the value of the plan at that time. As a result, the only increase in value from the time of the divorce to the time of retirement will be what interest it earns in a retirement savings vehicle, such as an RRSP.

As pensions are based on the best six years of service, the final value of the pension benefit payable to the ex–spouse on retirement will likely not even come close to the value that the contributor spouse will receive.

Moreover, the value of the ex–spouse's pension benefit will not benefit from continued government contributions over the years. Whatever the value of the benefit at the time of the divorce is, it will not increase in those years.

With regard to survivor pensions in the private sector, a pension benefit standards bill introduced in 1985 ensured that widows would be provided with 60 per cent of pension benefits. This minimum standard is observed in the MPs' pension plan but not in plans that apply to members in the civilian Public Service, the Armed Forces, and the RCMP. These plans only provide 50 per cent widows pensions as they have over the last 40 years.

This government has tried to sell this bill as legislation which addresses several longstanding fairness issues. If ever there was such an issue, the survivors benefits should be considered so.

This provision has existed in the Canada Pension Plan for over 25 years. It now exists in the MPs' pension plan and was made a mandatory requirement for private sector pension plans over five years ago. Survivors of public servants should be afforded the same treatment as those in the private sector.

Bill C–55 also addresses the issue of pension coverage for part–time employees. Currently employees who work less than 30 hours a week cannot pay into a pension plan and therefore cannot draw a pension when they retire. Bill C–55 changes this. Employees will now have the option of buying back previous years of part–time service as far back as 1980. All current and future part–time employees will be required to pay into the pension plan.

Coverage for part–time employees was recommended in Equality for All, and the report of the parliamentary task force on pension reform. In short, it is an item whose time has come. However, there is concern that forcing part–timers into buying in could cause financial hardship for some. It should be optional.

There are several areas this bill does not cover: the rate of return of pension plan investments comparable to private sector plans; the future security of inflation protection arrangements, or indexing; plan management; increasing survivor benefits from 50 per cent to 60 per cent as in CPP and MPs pension benefits and consistent with recommendation 6.9 of the parliamentary task force on pension reform in 1983; several outstanding issues surrounding pension entitlements of divorced and separated spouses; disclosure of information relevant to the member's plan.

In 1991 the government announced its intention to conduct a review in 1992 which it claimed would address most of the above issues not covered in the current legislation. Further legislation would likely follow the review. The government has been promising a review since 1987, yet its pension advisory committee has not met since 1987, and that is disgraceful. This Bill C–55 was tabled without consultation and the government has made every effort to push it through with the minimum of discussion. I think all members on this side of the House have spoken of this disgraceful action.

The process has been shrouded in secrecy and confusion. The government would like to see major policy decisions removed from the realm of Parliament and placed in the backrooms of the Treasury Board with its push for regulatory powers.

In my last few minutes I would like to add that this bill is probably going to create more of what I would call pork–barreling, patronage, call it whatever nice word you want to call it, than we have seen in a good many years within the Public Service.

I think that we have been fortunate in Canada to have had probably one of the best public services in the world and we should all be very proud of that.

It is a shame that the merit system is going to be pushed aside and that managers will have the right to appoint whomever they wish to appoint. This concerns a great number of people in this area and it is a very regressive step.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am a little calmer after the motion of the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader to have the question put which in effect lets us continue to debate until time runs out at 10 p.m. but no motions can be made, even at third reading.

• (1740)

I just want to dwell on that very briefly because now it is done, and I compliment him in a back-handed way because he certainly cut me off at the pass. I certainly intended to move a motion that I think would have been acceptable to the Chair.

I had some assistance with the motion to recommit Bill C-55 to the committee and reconstitute the committee for many of the same reasons that members who have already spoken on the bill have mentioned.

One of the reasons is this very question of indexation of pensions. Bill C-55, 159 pages with schedules, is in effect the bible for federal public servants, RCMP officers, and people in the military. It makes for a very dry and pedantic discussion here in the House of Commons, but it affects the monthly cheque that goes out to thousands and thousands of Canadians.

The parliamentary secretary to the government House leader came into this House with a suspicion that some of us were going to move an amendment, and he asked me if I was going to move an amendment, and within two minutes he caught the eye of the Speaker. After a nice little address for three minutes he put his motion, which procedurally cuts off any possibility of moving an amendment, a reasoned amendment or a recommital to a committee, which was what I was going to do. It should be done for the reasons mentioned here already by members who know more about the bill than I.

In terms of cutting off debate on third reading he said that the debate was proceeding nicely. Yes, there was a legislative committee that worked on it for a few days. It just came from the legislative committee last week and last Friday afternoon Bill C-55 came onto the floor.

We are under extended hours and on Friday afternoon, after private members' hour at 3 p.m., the debate started to peter out. Questions were put on a lot of the motions at report stage. On Monday of this week we voted. We were going to vote for many hours, and we did vote on many amendments. I think there were 37.

On something so complicated as a pension bill affecting all federal public servants, military and the police, to debate it in this House, after committee, on Friday and Monday, with the votes on Monday night, have third reading today, and then after four speakers move to put the question is really unfortunate.

In effect it means the guillotine is going to drop at 10 p.m.

I said earlier that I have been surprised at how many letters I have received from concerned public servants. The public servant has not been worried about the members' pensions, it is the public that wonders about the members' pensions.

This great institution, the House of Commons, could not even get five members last Friday to stand to force a vote on several reasonable amendments on members' pensions, whether vested too soon or double-dipping.

We can argue about vesting too soon, but there is not any plausible explanation and excuse for the double-dipping that we all know about. I am not going to mention names but I could mention many people who have sat in this House with distinction.

Let us leave the House. My amendment and the amendments from the hon. members for Don Valley East and Edmonton Southeast just affected members of Parliament, not the whole Public Service.

Let us leave the House of Commons, this odious place where everyone thinks we are the bad boys, and let us examine the next ex-president of the Privy Council who is evidently going to become the president of Canadian National. We all know roughly what the president of Canadian National gets, $200,000 or $300,000-plus dollars.

I am sure that the pension the president of the Privy Council has earned is very substantial.

If we are going to get into double-dipping—and that is more than what the President of the Treasury Board said in a letter that was swallowed by the leader of the NDP about reviewing members' pensions, then get into it for all public servants.

Whether we are talking about Erik Nielsen, Ed Broadbent or Ian Deans, we are talking about Canadians who have served with distinction in the House of Commons, but they have all double-dipped. We have judges in the Federal Court who have double-dipped.

That is completely unacceptable because members get good pensions now. Therefore, they should not be getting pensions and full salaries from jobs taken with the federal government after they retire from here. That is completely wrong.

If there had been a vote on those amendments, it would have given some direction to this unnamed committee which had no criteria set up, no dates for holding hearings. Yet this was the plausible thing that put all members who were nervous about the issue off the issue. We could not even get five members to stand and force a vote on the amendments that were properly moved by members.

I compliment my friend and colleague, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway. He quite properly had amendments to extend pension benefits to the gay community. He has been honest and persistent in that and he has the human rights legislation very much on his side in many ways and there were five members to stand for that. There were five members to stand for a lot of other amendments.

It was a sad commentary on this House of Commons when we had amendments on our own pensions, which were in order, moved by a couple of members of Parliament. With all the discussion and all the nervousness that invoked and all the embarrassment that it may have caused and certainly the scorn that it could create in the public domain, we could not get five timorous mice to stand in their places. They scurried away as though the old Hallowe'en were over.

I give full credit to the government. It knows the rules. I confess, I was not here. I confess my absence, not that it would have made much of a difference. It would have made a difference in that at least I would have asked a couple of members to stay around.

After Private Members' Hour on Friday at three o'clock, most members know that is the end of the sitting, but not in extended hours. The Speaker was in the Chair doing his duty and it was done very well. That is all I can say about that.

I am sorry, my amendment would have been to recommit that issue along with the whole question of indexation, which is the main question concerning the public servants. It would have recommitted it to the committee. Certainly, a strong vote from the House would have given direction to this vague inquiry that the President of the Treasury Board says he is going to commit someone to.

I say this kindly because I believe the minister is most likely sincere. I believe the parliamentary secretary is sincere. But we deal in realities here in this world of hard knocks in politics and government. The reality is a letter from a minister which is not worth the paper it is written on in a legal sense. It does not bind anybody. That is learned in the first year of the legislation. Do not take anything by print or by word unless it is put in the regulations or in the law.

Who knows who will be the next President of the Treasury Board? Certainly after an election there will be a change and there could be changes even before then. Then we will go through the hocus-pocus again.

It was a great way to take off. I just could not believe listening to the debate here on Monday and having friends on my left praise their leader for accepting this letter and for getting all members off the hook on something that has caused a little concern in the country about the fat cat members and their own pensions. We can always talk about and solve other people's problems but we do not want to touch our own.

That is enough on pensions. I have been forestalled on my motion. I do not know how much more time I have.

The member for Ottawa West, in her review of this bill on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition made one of the better speeches on a complicated bill that I have heard in this House in the years I have been a member. Who knows about pensions? Who knows about indexing, payments and interest? She went through it very well in an even manner, pointing out some pluses and also raising some questions.

My concern and my constituents' concerns are not funny. It is not funny. It is rather horrible that in effect through this bill there can be regulations under the Income Tax Act about special benefits and by changing those regulations the indexation of members' pensions under the Public Service Act can be changed because that is a special benefit.

• (1750)

This caused great concern in the committee, as it should have. This is why Daryl Bean and the Public Service Alliance and many other Public Service associations said: "Hey, this bill is going to attack the indexation feature of Public Service pensions". Certainly, if the indexation of members' pensions were being attacked we certainly would be a little more concerned.

I know the member for Kootenay East was a very able and consistent member on the committee. I read much of the testimony of the committee. If there is any question about this indexation and why the Public Service should be concerned, it is that the committee came up with the question there were some amendments that were turned down by the government, again with assurances. I understand from the committee evidence that the government was going to take a look to see if there was an amendment from government to clarify this issue of whether indexation could be affected by a change in regulations of the Income Tax Act.

Without getting too rhetorical in the time I have left I just want to read into the record some letters I have read as a lawyer and I must say I reread the first one because I could not fully understand it. The man who wrote the first one wrote another the day after, trying to give his opinion to the committee on the implications of clause 50 of the bill involving indexation.

In a letter dated June 3, 1992, R. R. Walsh, the general legislative counsel of the House of Commons, wrote about Bill C-55 to Mr. Farrell as follows:

> At its last meeting on May 21, 1992, the Committee asked that I provide an opinion in respect of the Government's motion No. G2A amending the proposed section 71 found in clause 30 of Bill C-55. Similar amendments are proposed for clause 58 (motion No. G3A) and clause 80 (Motion No. G4A). The Public Service Alliance of Canada has criticized the proposed amendments and I was asked to consider PSAC's concerns as well.
>
> At committee, Mr. Macdonald explained that the proposed amendment clarifies that the power to make compliance regulations under section 71, PSSA, would be limited to prospective changes and would not allow retrospective changes in relation to what employees had already earned. It seems to me Mr. Macdonald is correct in his view that the proposed amendment would prevent "retrospective" compliance regulations.

Those are regulations that might affect the past.

> In his letter of April 14th, however, the Minister assured committee members—

Another assurance by the minister, I guess by verbal commitment or by letter.

> —that the Government's amendment to the proposed section 71, PSSA, would make it "absolutely clear" that there will be no change to the indexing of benefits "except by statute" (statutory amendment). To this end, the proposed section 71 as amended by motion No. G2 allows compliance regulations only in relation to section 147.1 of the Income Tax Act and Part LXXXV of the Income Tax Regulations, as they read on January 15, 1992.
>
> Subsection 147.1(2) of the Income Tax Act sets out the rules applicable for registration of pension plans, one of which is that a plan comply with prescribed conditions for registration. Part LXXXV of the Income Tax Regulations allows as "permissible benefits" periodic cost of living adjustments based on increases in the Consumer Price Index. If, after January 15, 1992, the Income Tax Regulations were amended to remove indexation as a permissible benefit, the amendment could not be carried over to PSSA/CFSA/RCMPSA by means of a compliance regulation because a compliance regulation could only be made in respect of the Income Tax Regulations as they read on January 15, 1992.

That is the guts of it but I am going to continue to read the letter because my time is almost over.

> According to its news release of May 11, 1992, PSAC says the Government's amendments do not make it "absolutely clear" that there will be no change to the indexing provisions "except by statute" (statutory amendment). PSAC suggests that motion No. G2A be worded to read as applicable to any pension, annual allowance, etc., that is payable to any person to whom PSSA applies. [PSAC also suggests a new subsection (6) requiring consultation with the Advisory Committee.]
>
> It is not clear that amendment of the PSSA/CFSA/RCMPSA would be required to reduce or remove indexation as a permissible benefit, notwithstanding motions No. G2 and No. G2A. An amendment of the Income Tax Regulations by the Governor in Council (without the involvement of Parliament), made applicable to all pension plans, might be sufficient to reduce or remove indexation without amendment of the statutes governing the plans.

I am going to conclude this letter:

> Perhaps Government legal experts in the areas of income tax and pensions could shed some light on whether or not this is possible under the Income Tax Act or PSSA/CFSA/RCMPSA. It seems to me that it would be, but I stand to be corrected should legal counsel having expertise in these areas demonstrate the contrary.

That is the letter of June 3 trying to advise the committee on this very technical and important point affecting indexing of pensions of public servants and cannot be affected by regulations in the Income Tax Act changing special benefits.

As I read that, the legal counsel advising the court, which was discussed by the members of the committee, could very well affect the indexation.

The interesting thing, and I would like to be able to file this, the very next day, June 4, the same legal counsel wrote a clarifying letter which was a little shorter but I guess I do not have time to read it.

In effect it clarifies it. But then it says it may not do it for the pension plans already in place but it could very well affect pension plans in the future. It is a shorter letter and is not so technical, so I will read it.

It was written June 4, the day after the first one, trying to help the committee. It pin-points the confusion of something that is so fundamental and important:

> Dear Mr. Farrell:
>
> I write to clarify my letter of June 3, 1992 in respect of Clause 30. A Justice lawyer acting for the Treasury Board spoke with me earlier today and it would appear that some clarification is required in respect of the last paragraph of my earlier letter.
>
> When I said in my earlier letter that it is not clear that amendment of PSSA/CFSA/RCMPSA would be required to reduce or remove indexation as a permissible benefit, I was referring to permissible benefits as they are known under the Income Tax Regulations for purposes of the Income Tax Act. The amendment that I suggested could be made to the Income Tax Regulations, applicable to all pension plans, would only be applicable for income tax purposes. Such amendment would not and could not have the effect of removing or reducing indexation as a benefit under PSSA/CFSA/RCMPSA.
>
> Indexation benefits have been placed in PSSA (proposed s.69 in cl. 30), CFSA (proposed s.78 in cl. 58) and RCMPSA (proposed s.39 in cl.80) and a regulation under the proposed section 71 in Clause 30 could not remove or reduce the benefits available under these Acts. Removal or reduction of indexation as provided under PSSA/CFSA/RCMPSA could only be effected by amendment of the relevant statute by Parliament.
>
> My earlier opinion meant to indicate that the removal or reduction of indexation as a permissible benefit under the Income Tax Regulations for purposes of the Income Tax Act could possibly be effected by an amendment to the Income Tax Regulations. This amendment, however, would only affect the income tax position of the pension plan and would not directly remove or reduce the indexation benefits as benefits under the pension plans.
>
> I trust this further clarification will assist the Committee in its consideration of the relevant clauses of the Bill.

We can see the problem of something so fundamental as indexation. As I read the committee, it was supposed to get further clarification from an amendment from the government on this important subject but it did not get it. That is another good reason why we should vote—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions or comments, the hon. member for Halifax West and then I will recognize the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I listened with some interest to the remarks made by my good friend and colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants.

I hope he will not lose sight of the general principle involved in this bill. I know he has dealt in the course of his speech with a number of details. I want to hear him comment on the general principle of pensions and pensions as deferred income.

The rule in Canada for many years now, over 30 years, has been that the basic pension benefits should be 70 per cent approximately of a person's income. That would allow them at the end of their working careers to maintain the standard of living for themselves and their families that they had earned over the course of their careers.

There are difficulties with time frames, whether it takes 35 years to earn that kind of benefit or some lesser period of time. The case can easily be made for a member of Parliament or an elected person that they do not have the opportunity to serve for that normal career period of 35 years. They go from one career to another career.

It is not only members of the House of Commons, it is members of the legislatures; provincial magistrates in the province of Nova Scotia earn a full pension after 15 years.

I want to ask my colleague if he thinks it is fair that members of Parliament after a period of service or any other person during their working career should not be able to earn a pension which will more or less allow them to maintain the standard of living they have enjoyed through their careers for themselves and for the benefit of their families.

I know he is interested and concerned about indexing and I have no disagreement with what he said.

• (1800)

However, I want him to focus on some of the remarks and comments that have been made by organizations like the National Citizens Coalition that focus on the most difficult of the cases and use those cases to detract from the basic idea that people, by way of deferred income, are entitled to some kind of benefit as they terminate their career and go into retirement.

I wonder if the hon. member and my good colleague is in any disagreement with the basic idea of the pension program.

Mr. Nowlan: I thank my hon. friend from Halifax West for his questions.

Earlier, in reply to the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader when he moved the order to put the question so we could not put any amendments, I offered a dicta, my thoughts about the pension.

It is academic to me, in view of my time and years here, therefore I feel the same embarrassment as other members in talking about our own pensions. So I certainly am glad that the President of the Privy Council has given some indication—I wish it was a tighter and more committed indication—about just what type of inquiry, when it was going to happen and who was going to do it, rather than just a letter that was easily accepted, because we are all nervous about the issue.

Two points on members' pensions. On the question of double-dipping, there is absolutely no justifiable reason why that should be allowed to continue.

The question then is do we grandfather it? There are good people who served under certain rules, and then we retroactively try to do something. I guess this is what the inquiry is going to find out about. But certainly for future situations I think that all members who are elected should appreciate that if they get a government job after they serve in this House of Commons they are not getting their pension from the government for their House of Commons service and also a pension from whatever Crown corporation or court they may be appointed to.

I cannot find anything to justify double-dipping in pensions. I was hoping that one of the amendments that was moved by the hon. member for Don Valley East might have been put so it would have been a clear indication to this inquiry not to fool around much with that because that can be disposed of.

In terms of pensions, I said earlier that there is an argument to be made for pensions to members vesting earlier than normal pension plans. As I said, my mother was very glad that Prime Minister Pearson was around to even include widows of members, because otherwise they would not have had a pension. After 40 years of public service my mother got the grand pension of $104 a month.

I am fully aware of the concern with pensions. I think the public has been so bombarded by a lot of extreme situations, more in theory than in practice, that it automatically thinks all members are receiving pensions after six years and there are a great quantity of members out there who are drawing full pensions, which is not the reality at all. There are many ridings in which there has not been a member's pension paid for 40 to 50 years because members have been getting defeated all the time and/or they have been re-elected for quite a while and therefore pensions do not click in.

On the pension issue, that is something that certainly must be looked at. It is healthy in view of the public focus on this, the bad odium that we are all in about it, and perhaps the defensive attitude that we have about it that in effect some outside agency—I cannot think why a vote in the House of Commons would have hurt at all.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief. I do want to question the member for Annapolis Valley—Hants because I can understand how frustrated he is with regard to the procedure of what happened here. However at the same time, as a member of that committee, I want to say to this member very clearly that if he had been at that committee and had seen the activity that took place and how the government conducted themselves there he would understand what happened in this House.

There were over 40 or 50 amendments put forward in committee, and each time the government's hands went up and they were defeated. There were 112 amendments that came back to this House to be debated, which we tried to get through in committee. At the same time not one government member was getting up in the House. I understand the hon. member was not here Friday because of commitments in his riding. He should take into consideration what took place in the committee and the kinds of frustrations we were going through and what went on in this House when we were debating the amendments. The government was simply not listening.

With regard to MPs' pensions, I am very proud and I take no exception to the remarks of the leader of our party. When this bill was introduced, she identified the very problems the hon. member is talking about. We called for an independent study and our leader got that in a letter from the minister. That is more than we got in all the amendments that we put forward. At least we have a letter stating that he is going to prepare an ad hoc committee and start putting the process in place.

I just want to say to the member that I understand his frustration and I fully understand the concerns that he has. I have those same concerns. I only wish the government would have listened to us, but it was not in a listening mood.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has a minute to wind up.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I did not read all the evidence of the committee, but I did read the last few days of it when committee members were moving amendments and talking about the indexing problem which produced those two letters that I read into the record. The member was there and very active in that. I also noticed the amendments that did not find favour.

As a lawyer, in terms of legislation, letters are not law or regulations so I will be a lot happier when I see the letter fleshed out giving the criteria and a time.

The NDP leader did make a speech and it ruffled a lot of feathers. It even ruffled a few feathers in their caucus. It certainly ruffled a lot of feathers around here because she was the first leader to come out very directly on this issue which has caused a lot of concern in the public domain. I do give his leader credit for that, but I felt members should have forced the issue a little more. I was away so I am guilty, but it would have taken five of us only to force the issue a little more. That still would not have impeded the commitment for the ad hoc inquiry if some of those amendments had carried on Friday.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, it is actually quite interesting to rise in this House and speak after the hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants. He was referring to MP's pensions and spoke about his father being a member of this House.

My father was also a member of this House. He retired in 1979 with a pension of $12,000 to $13,000 a year, I think it was, after 17 years of service. He had been a lawyer. He came here at about age 55. He was at the most productive period of his law practice when he gave it up to become a member of Parliament. He died a few years later so my mother's pension is half of what his was. It is not exactly a princely sum. There are other stories than the ones that David Somerville peddles across this country for his own profit.

This inquiry we are going to have hopefully will reveal to the country as a whole the full story of the issue of pensions.

It is long overdue that we have this inquiry. It is important that trust be developed in this place and that we are dealing at arm's length with these issues. It is a step forward that we are getting the inquiry referred to earlier. We, as members of Parliament, have to be prepared, along with everyone else in the country, to take a look at our working conditions. We also have to be prepared to have those undergo public scrutiny.

When I had a chance to look into the issue of members' pensions I was surprised to find two facts which you do not see in the Somerville ads: that the pensions paid out so far are more than covered by the MPs' contributions and the interest on the funds. In other words, the government's matching contributions have not so far been touched. While he tries to claim that the MPs' pension fund is unfunded, in practical terms it has not been unfunded.

The second fact that is interesting is that there are only 500 to 700 people who have received pensions under the plan, most of whom are widows or spouses as well as retired MPs. The suggestion that somehow this is a terribly rich privilege, upon examination is probably not correct.

• (1810)

The concerns about double-dipping do need to be looked at. Examples need to be reviewed, but I also think we should keep in mind the kind of pensions the private sector pays. Some of those should be put in perspective. Not that pensions for MPs should reach those levels, but the reverse should be so; those who control private wealth in this country should not be able to vote themselves the kind of pensions they do at the expense of the consumer.

Having spoken on that issue, let me deal with the substantive issues included in this pension act and the amendments to that act. Apart from a brief reference to pensions for MPs the bill effectively deals with two or three main areas.

The first is to make substantial changes in the administration of public sector pension funds. Initially, some of those changes look to be not half bad. But on further consideration and further examination it has become clear that this government has been sold a bill of goods by Treasury Board public servants.

Government has not done its own homework in protecting the prerogative of Parliament and effectively is turning over to the government and to Treasury Board all kinds of powers which it ought not to have, given Treasury Board is not just the administrator of public funds but is also the employer of public servants. In that dual function conflict of interest is built in in respect of its duties.

It is therefore critically important that any tinkering with public sector pensions comes before Parliament so that all sides of this House and therefore the general public can have some input into those changes. Those changes should not be made behind closed doors merely by a matter of regulation without public hearing, without input.

The more we studied this bill and the more we reviewed it, we reluctantly came to the conclusion that in public policy terms we will have to vote against the bill. We will do so reluctantly because there are some good elements in the bill.

For the first time, federal part-time workers are covered in a pension plan, although the cut-off date is arbitrary and unfair. In the post office, for example, and in other areas of the public sector there have been those working part-time for years and years. Their service in that capacity is not counted toward a part-time pension. I think the cut-off date is 1980.

Similarly, the early retirement for correction workers is evidently and clearly a good thing and needs to be adopted. On the other hand, what the government has given with one hand it has taken away with the other. It imposed a power over that early retirement plan through regulation that it ought not to have.

We clearly support the thrust of the pension splitting provisions in Schedule II of the act. I would like to use most of my remaining time on that issue.

I represent a constituency that has many military and other government retirees, many ex-spouses of those who worked in the service of Canada. Many of them have come to me and we drafted petitions which have been presented throughout the community and have been tabled in this House from time to time over the last number of months. They have come to me with letters, with accounts of the impact on their lives of the failure of this Parliament to deal fairly with ex-spouses of Public Service personnel and particularly members of the military.

Many of them have clearly given a service beyond the usual to our country. When they married someone in the military service, they undertook to travel across Canada and in fact, to many parts of the world. They tried to raise their families in two, three and four-year segments in different communities. They have suffered through the difficulties, tensions, trials and tribulations of that kind of life. Then at some point along the way, the marriage breaks down. They have been often left destitute or in difficult circumstances.

One of the difficulties they have had to face is that the pension they contributed to, which in the case of the military, the RCMP and others becomes payable on retirement, often when they are in their early 40s, mid 40s or 50s, that pension has not been available to them except occasionally through a court battle as supporter maintenance.

Yet it is a pension which the law for years has recognized that they have earned and have contributed to. In 1986, this Parliament agreed that in the case of Canada pensions, the right to a split in the pension contributions should be recognized. Now, belatedly, we are recognizing that in the case of military and other public sector pensions.

We are recognizing that in the case of a marriage breakdown, where the courts of the provincial and territorial levels have recognized the contribution, as invariably they will now do, or a separation agreement that takes that contribution into account, the minister is obliged to recognize it and to split the pension according to the contribution made during the course of the marriage.

I do not know what it is about the government that when it begins to do something right, it only does it half right. In this case, it has encumbered the pension splitting with all kinds of unnecessary difficulties. We are going to see over the months ahead case after case of unfairness because this government has simply not listened to those who have come before it and raised specific questions about the complexity of this bill.

The government has listened to the officials in Treasury Board and it has not listened to those who have lived with the problem. Amendment after amendment has been moved. The hon. member for Kootenay East has worked very very hard on this bill. Members in the Liberal Caucus have also worked on this bill. The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby has introduced a private members' bill on this issue and has spoken across the length and breadth of this country on this issue. The government has not listened to a series of very practical improvements that could have been made to make this bill more fair.

For example, there will those who have separation agreements or court orders that pre-date this bill. Because no pension splitting was possible, they may not have included pension split in the separation agreement or had it included in the court order. If they cannot persuade their ex-spouse to change the separation agreement or if they are not allowed to go back to a court because of the passage of time and the issue is closed, they will not have what this Parliament says they have earned, which is a fair share of the pension.

It is all because the government has refused to listen. In committee it accepted a handful of amendments. Basically, it even said to one of its own ministers: "Go see Treasury Board. If you can talk Treasury Board into it then we will do it".

It is an interesting commentary on how the arteries begin closing when a government stays in office too long. This government has been in office for eight years.

Mr. Edwards: Just getting started.

Mr. Brewin: That is what the people of Canada are terrified about. The hon. member says that they are just getting started. Let me say to the hon. parliamentary secretary that Parliament ought to be a place where when there is a complicated bill like this, a thick bill with section after section, 159 pages of very detailed changes in pension legislation, or when members of the opposition and some members of the government themselves, including the hon. member for Don Valley East, have gone to the trouble, after consultation with Canadians who have taken an interest to this bill, to produce amendments, it is an arrogant and thoughtless government that will not stand up and at least give the Canadian people a moment's explanation as to the difficulty of the amendment. The government should explain why it cannot accept the amendments.

• (1820)

I think the reason the government did not stand up and try to defend its reasons for turning down the amendments is because it could not. It did not understand the amendments. It did not take the trouble to try to understand the amendments.

Mr. Kempling: We accepted 28.

Mr. Brewin: Out of more than 150 amendments the government says it accepted 28. That means there were over 100 amendments the government did not accept. Not once did the government do the Canadian people the courtesy of explaining its reasons for not accepting even a single one of those amendments, either in committee or at report stage.

I submit again that it is because the government members responsible for this bill simply did not understand the amendments. They did not take the trouble to understand whether or not the amendments should be introduced.

This is a complicated place. We all have areas of responsibility but those members who were on duty on these bills, who stand up and vote on these bills, have at least some responsibility to try to grasp what the amendment is about and to have someone in their caucus do Parliament and the people the courtesy of trying to deal with the substance of the amendment.

It is not just us who stand here and move these amendments. There are people who have worked days upon days on these amendments and the ideas contained within them. They reflect genuine concerns.

For example, why is it that the government has left in this bill the power of Treasury Board to deem an ex-spouse deceased when she or he is obviously very much alive and kicking? There is an iniquitous turn of phrase in this legislation, an iniquitous power that the government should have the right to deem someone dead to do them out of a survivor benefit.

That is just the language. Look at the substance of the issue on survivor's benefits. The way the law works and the government has refused to address it in this bill is that when a marriage breaks down and the member of the plan enters a new relationship and then dies, the entire survivor benefit goes to the second spouse or second partner. The original partner, who may have been with the member of the plan for years upon years upon years, who in the other parts of the bill is understood to have contributed to the pension, is given nothing by way of contribution to the survivor's benefits and often is left in destitute circumstances.

The government has refused to speak on why it will not address this deep concern of ex-spouses expressed to individual members of Parliament, expressed to committees of this House and expressed through us in the opposition in amendments and speeches we have given. The government remains silent. It is an arrogance on the part of the government that it will not speak to these concerns of the Canadian people.

We are at the final stages of this debate. This bill was introduced in March. It was moved quickly through the House and through committee and the government is moving quickly to have it given third reading.

It has refused to engage in debating the issues. It has become a captive of Treasury Board. I ask any member of the government to pick up any one of those amendments and see if he or she can see some justice or justification in the amendment. Then ask those who are responsible for pushing this bill through Parliament why they did not respond. You can count on the fact that we will be back with further amendments and further legislation to correct the errors in this bill.

This bill is going through. It will go to the Senate in the next few days and become law. It contains much that is good but it is also a flawed bill. It is flawed in the way in which it turns over to Treasury Board and to cabinet responsibilities which should properly be those of Parliament.

It is flawed in the way it has responded to the justice and the claim of those whose rights are dealt with under the bill. It is therefore a bill we will be voting against, with some reluctance because of the good that it contains.

However I say to those who have worked hard on this bill that we will be with them in keeping an eye on the administration of the bill, and see how it works out. We will ask them to keep in touch with us so that we can begin building a file for amendments and changes down the road, because as surely as we are here today the failure of the government to listen to those who came before the committee, the failure of the government to listen to those who applied their minds to this bill and spoke to the people of Canada on it, will come back to haunt this House and we will be obliged within a very short period of time to once again deal with it.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the hon. member for Victoria on his review of the bill and some of its problems. His little vignette of history was interesting. I happened to be sitting here when his father was here, Andrew Brewin from Toronto Greenwood I believe. He was from the heartland, the core, the queen city or whatever you call Toronto. I do not know how the son got out to Victoria, but certainly having been there and practised law myself in Vancouver—he certainly saw a better way in the west and I welcome him back here to the central part.

The hon. member reviewed many sections of the bill. He mentioned how the bill had moved rather quickly and came off the platter in March. Does the member really think that a bill that has 159 pages, that is so complex, and involves the pensions of all the public servants, the RCMP and the armed services personnel of this land—it came out of committee on Friday at report stage when the Speaker gave his ruling. As a result of extended hours it continued after 3 p.m. on Friday until 5 p.m. and it picked up again on Monday. We had all the votes on Monday night, 37-some votes. Despite all those amendments we debated just part of Friday and Monday, and we are in third reading today.

Does the hon. member, with his experience and his knowledge as a lawyer, think that is a very lengthy time to consider something that is so complex?

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question.

It gives me the opportunity to elaborate on one particular point. The short answer to his question is that the time for debate in the House itself was probably reasonable enough if the government had chosen to participate in the debate itself, although it is a long and complicated bill.

It was in committee over a few months and there were a number of hearings from interested groups, including the Public Service Alliance of Canada, the ex-spouses group and so forth. They tended to be hurried along. I attended a couple of the committee hearings and they packed in a lot of witnesses. They tended to be fairly cursory. They asked a few questions of the government, not very many. There was a sense that it was a treadmill that the government was trying to get through.

The larger flaw in the process, and the one the government ought to take another look at for next time and for any future bills, is that the government seems to have gotten away from the practice of producing a draft bill; maybe even turning over to a parliamentary committee at first the responsibility of drafting a bill, or at least the outlines of a bill or writing a memo to the drafters on the kinds of issues that should be covered by a bill and the positions that should be taken.

Instead, it was all done internally. The first thing that surfaced in March was this big fat bill. At that point the government was already in a defensive mode on the bill. The Treasury Board officials who had overseen the drafting of it were in a defensive mode. They had to justify what they had done to their political masters. There was very little flexibility, notwithstanding the earlier intervention from the parliamentary secretary. Instead of doing what was sometimes done before of circulating a bill in the general community so that lawyers and others who had a capacity to work with the legal language, and it is very technical legal language in this bill, could work with client groups and try to work through: "This is what it means and this is what it does not mean", and then almost to engage in a process of negotiation with the drafters, that process was missed entirely.

• (1830)

I had a chance on one clause of the bill to try to do a subversion of that exercise. I worked a bit with one of the ministers, the parliamentary secretary and the Treasury Board officials and the drafters. We tried to work around it, but it was very hit and miss. I say the government member himself did not understand what we were talking about and was really not involved in the process. He just basically said: "Go deal with Treasury Board". The process was very flawed.

I think what the government should look at in future, when it comes up with a complicated bill like this that will have an effect on a lot of people, is circulating a draft bill and giving the community a real chance to take a look at it before it introduces it in Parliament. That would help in the process.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): I rise to speak on Bill C-55. As you know, Mr. Speaker, when this bill was initially introduced, our caucus voted in support of the bill in order to let it go to a committee so that members of the different pension plans could come forward and make their case known. Today we will not be supporting the bill for a variety of reasons.

Before I start putting forward some of the argument on why we will not support the bill, I want to talk a little bit about the idea of a pension plan. The first thing that comes to mind when we talk about pensions is our senior citizens who have built this country, who have stood by this country during the good times and bad times, those who have been loyal Canadians throughout the years, those who lived during the Depression, those who know what hard work is all about, those who are not complainers, those who have given us this great country of ours.

Reading through the legislation as proposed, there are a number of good things that deal with their pensions, but simply put, not enough. The vast majority of our senior citizens nowadays still live below the poverty line. A lot of our senior citizens still are deprived of the many good things that other members of our community enjoy. To that extent, I believe that we still have a lot of work to do. We have to do more in order to deal with the question of unfairness.

Having said that, there are some good things in the proposal. I would like to glance through them very quickly. The members of Parliament review question is good. It will put this issue to rest. It will deal with a lot of the concerns that have been raised by those who have legitimate concerns and those who do not have legitimate concerns.

The second issue, which is combining the superannuation and the supplementary benefits for the Public Service pensions account, is a very good move on the part of the government. It ought to be commended on that.

There are other issues in the bill which are good to a large extent, for example, providing for the splitting of pension credits on the breakdown of a marriage or a common law relationship. As you know, Mr. Speaker, the current legislation does not allow for the splitting of pension credits. However, the new legislation would permit the division of a plan member's pension at source. That is not bad, with the exception of the fact that the bill will not make it automatic. If there is a disagreement of some sort, the different parties will still have to go to court. You know, Mr. Speaker, as well as I do how costly our justice system is.

Pension coverage for part-time employees is an excellent move. This is an excellent move. Currently part-timers are not covered. Anybody who works less than 30 hours a week cannot pay into the pension plan.

However, there are those who are on contract, those people who are hired as casuals, and there are thousands of those people in our constituencies, especially here in the national capital region and perhaps other parts of the country. Those people have been working for the government for the past seven or eight years on a contract basis. They have absolutely no protection whatsoever. To a large extent, while all of them are thankful for the fact they are getting those ad hoc positions for a short period of time here and there for up to six months at a time, they have absolutely no protection.

Extending the option of survivor benefits to pensioners who marry after the age of 60 is also a good move. However, one would suggest that we have to look at it a little more closely to make sure it is in compliance with the charter of rights.

Another point in the legislation which is excellent is an early retirement program for correctional services officers. This is a very good initiative and it is supported by members of the plans.

Creating a supplementary death benefit is as well a good move and the government has to be commended for coming forward with it finally. Unfortunately, in a lot of cases when we talk about the legislation and what is in that particular legislation, we do not really talk about what is not in the legislation; in other words, the issues that were not covered by given legislation.

In the case of Bill C-55, I am not sure that this legislation is in compliance with the charter of rights in many aspects of it. I am not sure about the way we manage the plan, if it is really a clear-cut case where you have the government which is the employer managing the plan without the full participation of the employee. Even if there is an indirect participation of the employees in the plan, it is not done in a fashion where it is managed without government interference. In fact, many things that are under the present legislation would make any kinds of changes, any manoeuvring, done through Treasury Board and through the regulatory body rather than being done through the House of Commons. This is the highest court of the land. If the House of Commons introduced and passed legislation it should have at all times the final say in terms of what can happen to different parts and different segments of that legislation.

Future security from inflation is a protection arrangement in terms of indexing. While the bill addresses the issue, there is really no mechanism in place where one would be assured that in future all of those issues are addressed.

Also, while the bill itself has a lot of good things, it really fails to address some of the concerns of those who appeared before the committee. In particular, is managementable to ensure that employees and those who are benefiting from the plan are getting the maximum benefit?

Our pensioners, particularly our seniors, deserve a lot more than what we have given them in the past. We have to do our utmost to ensure that we have a program and a plan that deals with our senior citizen population's needs. By the year 2010 we are going to have a lot of seniors around. Many of us in this House will be seniors. If not we will be post-seniors. We have a program in place that addresses their concerns and their needs. It meets what they are looking for, that is to live in dignity, to have access to food and shelter, and not to be worried about what will happen to them tomorrow or the day after.

• (1840)

As I indicated earlier, my colleagues and I supported this bill at second reading, but we will not be supporting it at third reading. It is not because we do not support the different components of the bill but, simply put, because the government did not really do enough to address the many concerns of pensioners vis-à-vis Bill C-55.

[Translation]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I only have a few brief comments to make on this bill. First, I have to say that I agree with the comments the hon. member for Ottawa West made in her excellent speech on all the problems civil servants and former armed forces members are facing in terms of pensions.

[English]

The points the member made with respect to fairness are worthy of being noted. I am very pleased to associate myself with them.

I want to make just a few comments, therefore, on Bill C-55. It has been the subject of a great deal of correspondence received from constituents of mine who have concerns about it either because they are presently employed in the Public Service or the Armed Forces or the RCMP, or because they have been married or are married to such a person, or because they have been retired themselves.

I will make just a few comments on those points. First, I would like to point out to the House of Commons that the 1991 report of the Auditor General of Canada had some comments to make on the federal superannuation plan. What many Canadians do not understand is that our enormous debt and deficit problems which are continual burdens on taxpayers are likewise a burden on the pension plans of the employees of the federal government. In fact the pension funds that are put aside by federal government employees are borrowed as part of the government's requirement to meet its obligations as they come due.

In his 1991 report the Auditor General made that comment by stating:

> A substantial portion of the federal annual budgetary deficit is financed through internal borrowing from accounts that the government administers on behalf of third parties. The largest internal borrowing is from federal employee pension accounts. As a result, $71 billion, or about 18 per cent of the $399 billion gross public debt, was owed to employee pension accounts at the end of 1989-90.

We all know how reliable are the projections of the Department of Finance. He continued by stating:

> If the Department of Finance's projections that external financing will be reduced to zero by 1994-95 are achieved, it is estimated that the amount owing to employee pension accounts will represent 23 per cent of the total public debt.

That is a very important source of funds for the federal government.

What does that mean for the owners, the employees and the future pensioners of those funds? This is the observation of the Auditor General:

> Interest—credited to the pension accounts is based on the government's long-term borrowing rates. It is widely agreed that these rates are between 1 and 2 per cent lower, on average over the long term, than the rates of return earned by pension plans with marketable assets.

The result of that is the government's requirement in the future to be able to fund the pension obligations under these plans is put at risk and may result in various things: It may result in a higher government deficit in future years; it may result in a future government saying we are going to have to reduce the amount of pension benefits payable to these pensioners because the return on the plan has not been sufficient to fund it fully. I think this is scandalous.

The government ought to be moving forward into reliance on private sector investments to ensure that a properly managed and balanced portfolio of investments would provide Public Service pension plans as profitable as they should be to ensure their future adequate funding.

The second thing I would like to point out, especially for the benefit of Canadians who are not fully informed about the nature of the Public Service pension plan, is that it is indexed. There is a cost of living indexation to the pension benefits that are payable.

What many Canadians fail to realize is that the indexation has been contracted, paid for, by public servants. They pay an extra 1 per cent of their salaries into a supplementary benefits fund, which is the fund to provide the assets available to fund indexing of their pension plans.

Indexing is not some kind of gift from Canadians to retired public servants. Indexing is something that has been bought and paid for by public servants making additional contributions under their plans.

That being the case, it is of great concern that the regulation making authority given to the government under this bill is so broad that in fact the government can even pass regulations that are inconsistent with the act being passed by Parliament itself.

This occurs in a number of provisions of the act. One of them is on page 59 of the bill as reported. I think it is section 80 of the Canadian Armed Forces Superannuation Act. I am referring to subsection (3) as it would read if this act were passed in its present form: "In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) and the provisions of this act or any other regulations made under this act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency".

In other words, the Governor in Council, the cabinet, can enact regulations without coming to Parliament that are inconsistent with the law being passed tonight, or whenever it is voted on, under Bill C-55. They can pass those regulations without further consultation with Parliament and even if they are inconsistent they prevail as the law.

I practised law for a reasonably long time before I came to this place. I must say I had not been aware of any other statutes that had that kind of regulation making authority built into them.

The ability to pass regulations known as subordinate legislation, subordinate because it is subordinate to the main law, normally is required to be consistent with the act or the law passed by Parliament.

I did a little research to find out whether in fact this was appropriate and legal. I discovered in an old book an old report of a British parliamentary committee on minister's powers dated April 1932 that this kind of regulation making authority has been granted in the past. It's called a Henry VIII clause, and I am quoting from the British parliamentary committee:

• (1850)

> —because that King is regarded popularly as the impersonation of executive autocracy. Indeed it may be considered to resemble the famous Statute of Proclamations, 1539 which gave the King power to legislate by proclamation until it was repealed on Henry's death in 1547. The comparison is certainly far-fetched.
>
> The purpose of Henry VIII was to enlarge his powers to make proclamations having the force of law. The sole purpose of Parliament on the nine occasions when it passed modern enactments was to enable minor adjustments of its own handiwork to be made for the purpose of fitting its principles into the fabric of existing legislation—

The comments of the British committee on this are quite telling. The committee says as follows:

> Even though it may be admitted that Parliament itself has conferred these powers upon ministers and must be presumed to have done so with the knowledge of what it was doing, it cannot but be regarded as inconsistent with the principles of parliamentary government that the subordinate law-making authority should be given by the superior law-making authority power to amend the statute which has been passed by the superior authority.

In referring to this dusty old text of this British parliamentary committee, I want to make this point; that in modern 1992 Canada the government has no more right, in my opinion, to put forward a law that would enable cabinet to pass laws inconsistent with what Parliament has done than did Henry VIII back in the 16th century.

The fact that the President of the Treasury Board fancies himself a 20th century Henry VIII is very cold comfort to the thousands of public servants and pensioners who concern themselves with whether this government, which has done so many things behind closed doors without full consultation, which has proven itself in so many ways to be less than fully trustworthy in its administration of public issues, to trust that it is not going to turn around and put forward regulations that will end the right to indexed pensions that public servants through their own contributions have already paid for. It should not be tolerated in a modern democracy.

We are spending a great deal of money ensuring that our democratic institutions survive. We spend a great deal of money ensuring that democracy functions in a reasonable way through the holding of elections to choose members of Parliament to come into this place to pass laws. Surely in the face of that, the government ought not to be bringing forward laws which we all know mean that a faceless bureaucrat in the offices of the Treasury Board, a few blocks away from this Chamber, will enact laws different from what the elected representatives have passed and have them prevail over Parliament's own laws. It should not be tolerated in this day and age.

There are many other issues that arise that I will not deal with; the issue of survivors' benefits being 50 per cent rather than that which is prescribed in the Pension Benefits Standards Act having been well commented on by my colleague from Ottawa—Vanier. This government has a pension plan for its employees that does not meet its own standards.

On the matter of MPs' pensions, I have been on the record as saying I favour reform of them. I do not think this is the appropriate vehicle for doing that and the study that has been announced at least gets us started on the road to it. As a younger member of Parliament, I feel free to say that I do not feel that any of us should be comfortable with the payment of pensions at an early age. Rather than the view taken by my colleague from Annapolis Valley—Hants earlier this evening which focused on the so-called double-dipping issue, the focus should be on the time at which pension payments are receivable. If it were changed it would address the issue of double-dipping as well.

These are things that need to be dealt with in an independent review and that is the only way with which they can be dealt with any real integrity on the part of members of Parliament who, after all, are in a very apparent and real conflict of interest in trying to deal with their own packages of payments and benefits. We need the assistance of outside experts in reviewing that.

I do not need to say anything more about that or about this bill. I am pleased that we will be voting against it. Despite the fact that it contains many good things, this is a bill that should not be passed by this Parliament.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to rise and make a couple of points.

First of all I want to ask the hon. member to clarify the position of the Liberal Party with respect to the issue of the pensions of members of Parliament. I recall well in this House when the Leader of the New Democratic Party raised this issue during the course of debate on Bill C-55 that she met with considerable resistance, both from the Official Opposition and from the government.

She raised concerns about a number of aspects of the pension plan, including in particular double-dipping and the age at which the pensions vest.

I am very pleased that the Leader of the New Democratic Party was able to obtain an assurance from the President of the Treasury Board that there will be a full independent review of all aspects of the pensions of members of Parliament.

In December last year I tabled a motion in this House which called for a non-partisan independent commission to review all salaries, pensions and benefits of members of Parliament and particularly to identify inequities in the pension plan by holding public hearings and examining other jurisdictions within and outside Canada. The commission was to report within six months of its establishment.

I am very pleased that at last it seems that, under some pressure, there is movement in this regard toward an independent review.

I would like to get some clarification from the hon. member with respect to the issue of an independent review. I know my colleague from Kootenay East in particular has been lobbying for this for some time now.

Our representative on the committee, my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby, and many others have been calling for this independent review and I would hope that we would have the full support of the Official Opposition as well in calling for this.

I also want to take this opportunity to highlight the provisions in the bill with respect to correctional workers. In my previous role as spokesperson for the New Democratic Party on Justice and the Solicitor General I had the opportunity to meet with many correctional officers. For many years these men and women who work in many cases under very difficult conditions have been seeking the opportunity for an early retirement package. For years they have been promised the possibility of an early retirement package. Finally, at long last, we see movement toward an early retirement act for correctional workers.

I want to take this opportunity in the House to pay tribute to those men and women who do serve in the prisons of this country.

• (1900)

Certainly they have highly stressful jobs and they deserve the kind of early retirement plan that a number of other occupations have succeeded in obtaining, including air traffic controllers.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling 7 o'clock. Perhaps the hon. member will want to return after private member's hour to respond to my comments.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but I have to interrupt the proceedings because being 7 o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 36, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

THE DISABLED

PROVISION OF SERVICES

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should convene a conference of the appropriate provincial ministers to promote the adoptions of programs that will ensure that disabled adults across Canada receive the comprehensive services they need to function in society.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. It is always very unfortunate when the rules interfere with the give and take in the question and comment time. It would be hoped that in a circumstance like this in which a member has raised questions and the reply needs to be delayed for an hour, the member would ensure he was there in order to hear the response.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The hon. member would also need to be there for me to revert to the question and comment period.

[English]

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I feel privileged to be able to speak to my private member's motion which has been adopted for debate this evening. Rather than repeat it, the fact that you have read the motion is sufficient.

I was motivated to bring this matter before Parliament by parents of handicapped adults, particularly the parents of a particular friend of mine by the name of John, who are faced with a bleak future for their children once they as parents are gone. It is worth pointing out that the mothers are often the remaining parent left to cope with the resulting extreme hardships of caring for their handicapped children. I wish to acknowledge that many services are provided for children and youth and for some younger adults. However, we quickly find that the services wane as the individual gets older.

As well, there remain certain biases against handicapped people no matter how hard we try as government to try to overcome the biases that exist in the work place. I believe the solution to this problem lies in the continued and on-going efforts that will be required by governments of all levels to ensure the rightful place of handicapped adults in our society. It likely goes without saying that in times of fiscal restraint governments of all levels cut spending. While there is a need for this, we need to ensure that those who need our help continue to receive it. Disabled adults across Canada have been experiencing a reduction in the delivery of services such as transportation and home care.

Disabled adults are an important sector of our society. They are productive and able to contribute in many ways. Unfortunately some of what we believe to be life's easiest tasks are not so easy for them. As a federal government we need to set examples for other levels of government to follow and we need to urge all governments to honour their commitments to every member of their communities. As technology advances, life can become easier for many disabled adults across this country. As the federal government it is our moral obligation to ensure that each and every Canadian has access to this technology.

One way this can be done is by urging provincial ministers and their governments to work with disabled groups and those they represent to find a consensus on services that are needed and wanted. In a strategy by the Secretary of State called "National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities", there are some statistics of interest. In the area of employment it states that in 1986 nearly three out of every five persons with a disability made less than $10,000. Women with disabilities experience an employment rate of 62 per cent to the rate of men with disabilities. Only 40 per cent of the adults with disabilities are in the paid labour force, compared to 70 per cent of the general population.

In the area of transportation, approximately 50 per cent of the people with disabilities who need specialized transportation services have access to them and only one province in Canada has any specialized vehicles for province-wide travel.

In education, only 56 per cent of the disabled population has eight or more years of schooling, compared to 83 per cent of the general population.

In communicating with groups that have a special interest in this area, I have received a response from the Regina and District Association for Community Living. In its communication to me it makes a statement that I feel bears some contemplation.

> Creating a segregated and restricting environment for the person with a mental handicap is like planting and cultivating a garden in such a way that primarily the weeds flourish. So you spend most of your time and energy trying to come to terms with the weeds without fundamentally altering your approach to gardening.

It goes on to say that there appears to be very little comprehension of the magnitude of the issues affecting and preventing people with disabilities from leading more normal, productive and less dependent lives in our society. It further comments that it is its vision, and one that I share, that all individuals will be accepted as valuable and contributing members of our families, communities and society, regardless of the level of support required to do so, and the association offers to work together with us in the resolve of these goals.

It is its feeling that personal empowerment must be the goal, while economic and social changes are the vehicles that must take place if individuals with a mental handicap are going to consistently achieve their potential. Our society now invests 19 to 21 years of mandatory educational services in these individuals, only to watch dishearteningly as they deteriorate after leaving school because of lack of opportunities, support and assistance.

There are two major themes that any significant social or economic change to services to individuals with a disability must address. One is consumer choice, power. The second is community commitment. The collective vision that has begun to emerge is that individual consumers or their guardians with their own purchasing power are deciding what services they need or want and are purchasing these services in a community setting of their choice.

We see the next four components as the framework from which social and economic changes will have a significant impact on personal empowerment. They are disability pension plans, employment equity with long-term support services, enriched/innovative housing that has CMHC support, and addressing the issues of poverty both from a financial as well as from an experiential perspective.

Let us talk about the disability pension plan for just a moment. There are already a number of disability pension and compensation plans available to some citizens. These are limited almost exclusively to people who have been in the work force. The same benefits should apply to people who are or become disabled before entering the labour force. Further, most provincial government assistance programs for adults such SAP are not intended for long-term sustenance for people who are disabled and dependent on the state. Most have serious and substantial disincentives, including employment, built into them.

In the second area of employment equity and day program continuum, more than 70 per cent of adults with a mental handicap are not gainfully employed. If you cannot access employment, you cannot therefore access unemployment insurance benefits or the wide range of employment initiatives through Canada manpower. Regular employment opportunities are seen as a critical part of the process of integration of people with a disability into everyday community life.

As we approach the final decade of the 20th century, a person's disability is becoming the least important factor in preventing them from becoming fully integrated into the labour market. Instead, the real factors denying persons with disabilities full access to employment are elements that are external to the individual. Specifically, some of these key issues are education structures, hiring practices and employment disincentives.

We have the knowledge base and the skills to put the vast majority of people with a mental handicap to work. We lack the commitment to employment initiatives to put them in practice.

On the third initiative, enriched/innovative housing, there is a serious lack of residential services both in spaces and options available in most, if not all, provinces. There has been very little attention to innovative options and/or enriched housing that would address the needs of people with disabilities. There have been some, admittedly, but we believe there is much more. Ghettoizing and/or living on the street is the present reality for far too many of these adults.

As a service to communities, support to adults with disabilities and boost to economies, CMHC should become more responsive to the housing needs of this vulnerable population.

• (1910)

The fourth area is the issue of poverty. The effect of long–term, severe poverty on an individual is more than just economic. There are physical and psychological consequences that are far more difficult to fix than to prevent.

We are talking about people with little or no disposable income, somewhere in the order of about $60 per month. Their basic needs do not include adequate clothing, food or social recreational allowances. Transportation, if available, is extremely limited, the RDACL continues.

The loss of parental support through death or a fight to gain more independence results in a dramatic and drastic lifestyle change for most disabled adults. One of the first visible signs is frequently the use of second–hand clothing in place of the newer more stylish clothing they grew up with and are used to.

Apathy and depression quickly follow with corresponding loss of ability at work or at home. This is in part due to the grieving of this loss, but the ongoing long–term impact has more to do with the change of diet.

Another indicator is the loss of opportunity. Without a strong personal support network and with a lack of purchasing power, most individuals are unable to challenge the service system to do more than basic maintenance support. They actually end up relying on few services with less potential to access and utilize the more generic service system.

Helplessness and hopelessness are the characteristics to best describe the individuals who experience significant and long–term poverty and are unable to challenge service systems or society to understand or address their needs.

There certainly is the willingness of groups to work with government agencies, as can be expressed in the following motion which was adopted by the Saskatchewan Association for Community Living. It reads as follows:

> Be it resolved that the Saskatchewan Association for Community Living meet with other groups of advocates for disabling conditions to discuss suggestions for the Saskatchewan government to establish a non–means disability pension plan which can then be augmented by either work or family help so that our people may lead lives of dignity without the need to go without the basic comforts.

All of this is not to say that nothing is being done, for there are some efforts being undertaken to address this issue. However, my concern is that this matter remain uppermost in the minds of those preparing the agenda for the various health ministers across Canada.

From the Vocational Rehabilitation of Disabled Persons Act Annual Report of 1989–90, one can see the level to which some effort is being made. As an example, during the 1989–90 fiscal year, the federal government contributed $106.5 million to the various provinces for expenditures for the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons.

Since the federal government pays half the provincial costs for vocational rehabilitation staff services and special equipment for disabled persons, the total annual expenditure on vocational rehabilitation in goods and services averages between $200 to $250 million per year.

If I just may quote some local figures, the province of Saskatchewan received a total of $5,884,407 or nearly $6 million for a figure that made up the total payments for the year 1989–90. Another way of putting it is it amounts to about $6 for every man, woman and child living in the province of Saskatchewan. This was a contribution toward the vocational rehabilitation of disabled persons.

In all of Canada, this figure was $106,515,667 for the same period of time or about $4 for every man, woman and child living in Canada. It is clear, therefore, that the will and the financial resources seem to be committed to this direction. Whether or not there has been enough consultation with those affected and whether or not this continues to be a matter of significant priority is a moot point at the present time.

Solutions to these problems will come about only through legislative initiatives. Financial assistance programs must be altered in a way that will remove existing disincentives. Employment equity legislation must become broader in scope and include a strong enforcement mechanism. We must address the impact of poverty from a proactive, preventative perspective.

Through these changes supports must be built into the system that will ensure people with disabilities have full access to programs and services and that they are able to receive the same quality of services available to the non-disabled population.

I will therefore stress once again that these matters must remain uppermost in the minds of those preparing the agenda for the provincial health ministers across Canada. I truly hope that John has a better future instore for himself.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for bringing forth this private member's motion. It is a good initiative and we agree with it. There are a couple of things I would question him on in reference to his motion.

The motion says "disabled adults". Perhaps that was an oversight. I think perhaps it should just be "the disabled". I do not know why the motion would distinguish them, but I think that could be sorted out.

The motion says "convene a conference". I assume those attending such a conference would be the ministers of health. Now that may not be the case in all provinces, but most of us would accept that is likely to be the case.

One difficulty we have is in the definition of a disabled person. The one that I would like to see is one that I got from this pamphlet prepared by the Library of Parliament. It was updated in 1990 from the original of 1986. It defines disability as "the loss or reduction of functional ability and activity caused by impairment".

That is a pretty broad definition, but it is a good one. Most people would accept it. The difficulty sometimes is that the definition varies, sometimes with the economic times, sometimes from country to country, but basically speaking most of us could accept that one as being general enough to live with.

I had the privilege of travelling across Canada last summer. I visited seven different cities in Canada to have dialogue with the disabled and those who represent the disabled. I found it to be a very enlightening process.

There is a lot of misconception. Disabled people prefer to work. It is a misconception to think that the disabled are always looking for additional benefits. The biggest dissatisfaction they have is when they cannot go to work. Sometimes it is for a very simple reason. For the most part, they prefer to work. They do not necessarily want more protection from society. What they would like society to do for them is to remove the impediments preventing them from going to work or finding a job and staying at it. They want to compete.

In my background I have had some experience with the disabled. They can be very competitive and very good employees, if they are given the chance.

It seems to me what my colleague is trying to bring forth here would be the right thing to do in a civilized society such as ours. This is the right time to do it.

It used to be said that the advancement of any mature society could be measured by the number of libraries or the number of worn out books it had. A good correlation though would be the advancement of a mature society that could be measured on how it reacts, how it looks, how it treats and how it provides for disabled people. That could very well be a definition of a mature and advanced society.

Canada has made tremendous progress. The people I associated with last summer in our task force would admit that. There are all kinds of examples where great progress has been made. However, we seem to back off every once in a while too.

The year 1981 was a great one. Some of my colleagues who were in the House will remember the International Year of the Disabled. Everybody's hopes, I suppose, were elevated to some degree. In 1988 the government introduced National Access Awareness Week. It is a positive development and usually happens in the spring. It has been in place for four or five years.

I was really disappointed when the government backed off on the Court Challenges Program. If the discussion there is not finished yet, and I hope it is not, I really think it is an indication that we are not too sincere about it. The Court Challenges Program provided a way in which the disabled could challenge some of the legal provisions that are there and not being addressed. That was a bit of a disappointment for me.

• (1920)

The biggest offender in many cases is the federal government itself. Some of the studies that have been done have left us looking pretty miserable as policy-makers if we are not prepared to carry out those same policies to which we seem to think others should adhere.

A commission found that 32 federal government offices that they visited randomly did not meet the national standards for building access, for example. They were missing basic things, structural things, ramps and the like.

Out of 48 government agencies reviewed, 28 agencies did not offer even one publication in any alternate form other than regular print. There were no cassettes, which are not expensive, no Braille, no large print.

The government itself should examine its own motives. It is okay to make laws and determine what you think the practice should be, but surely the first one to abide by that should be the government itself. I do not think you can expect too much positive reaction from private enterprise or private industry if the government is one of the worst offenders. They are pretty discouraging statistics.

If the only thing the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is going to do is to be an outlet for somebody who has a complaint, and if all it does is address complaints, we will make even slower progress than we are making now because that body will not be in the position to address all the complaints.

Disabled people whom I have been associated with have told me they do get shuffled around. They get moved from office to office to office and sometimes they think that all we are trying to do is waste their time and everybody else's time because we do not know what to do with them. It seems to me some kind of a national clearing house would solve a lot of the problems if we really wanted to address those problems because they do get shuffled around and they know that.

There are a couple of things happening in Canada which I think would be in keeping with my colleague's motion. We had an opportunity to examine the Premiers' Council in two provinces, Alberta and New Brunswick. I think the Alberta one was based on the New Brunswick one; I think it was in that order.

This is a very positive thing but there is nothing comparable to it at the federal level. The Premiers' Council brought people with disabilities on track when there was new legislation being planned. The legislation would to some extent be tested by disabled people themselves. They would improve on it, add to it, or delete from it.

In this country right now there are about 550,000 visually impaired Canadians. These are people who would have to wear extraordinarily strong glasses all the time. They cannot read ordinary print. Of that number, 46,000 people would be declared legally blind, for whom glasses or print would not be enough and they would have to move to Braille.

This is interesting and a fascinating statistic: 45 per cent of Canadians with disabilities have grade eight or eight years of formal schooling or less, whereas in the general population in Canada it is about 17 per cent.

The disability someone has reflects on their whole way of life. They do not get the opportunity to go to school because schools are not equipped to accommodate them, and the thing sort of feeds on itself.

There are 195,000 hearing impaired people in this country living in poverty. There are 134,000 visually impaired people living in poverty. There are 493,000 who are mobility impaired, cannot move freely and live in poverty.

What I am pointing out is that there is a connection between being impaired, having a lack of opportunity and being destined to a life of poverty. Those are rather alarming statistics and we should address this problem on a very broad scale. It should not be narrowed down to where we think all we have to do is provide a few more ramps or something. It has to be looked at in a much broader context.

Mr. Speaker, I know my time is running out. But the best model that I have found for legislation is in the United States, where two years ago it passed what is called the ADA, the American Disability Act. It is a model which I think Canada should look at. It is a model for the world and the world's strongest protection for disabled people is in the United States right now.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the hon. member for Regina—Wascana gave us the opportunity to debate the concerns of disabled Canadians in the House of Commons. Unfortunately, we are not presented with that opportunity often enough.

The motion that has been put forward by the hon. member, and I want to read it for the record, says:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should convene a conference of the appropriate provincial ministers to promote the adoption of programs that will ensure that disabled adults across Canada receive the comprehensive services they need to function in society.

This is not a new notion. The previous speaker referred to the work of the then Standing Committee on the Status of Disabled Persons in preparation for the International Year of the Disabled. That committee, of which I was a member, tabled its report in the House of Commons in 1981 and that report was named The Obstacles report.

I want to say that the Obstacles report was considered internationally as the Magna Carta for the disabled into the next century, it was thought of so highly.

In that report there were 130 recommendations, one of which emphasized the need for the provincial governments and the federal government to co-ordinate their activities, on not only services for disabled persons but also employment needs, transportation needs, education needs, recreational needs, all those areas of society that able-bodied persons take for granted but which are denied to many persons with disabilities.

That is not a new recommendation. If the government decided in its wisdom to act on this motion, I would strongly urge it not to do it through convening a meeting of health ministers. That has been the problem over the years. There has been this view of people who may have a disability somehow or other being in need of medical services. There could be nothing further from the truth, in my experience. In fact, if there were anything to be convened, it should be among ministers of justice, both at the provincial and federal levels.

What is really required from legislators and policy-makers in this country is to view disabled issues as matters of justice, economic justice, just plain old-fashioned justice. It has nothing to do with medical needs. Some people may need medical assistance to allow them to participate in the mainstream of Canadian society, but some able-bodied Canadians need that.

What is sorely missing over the period from 1980 until 1992 is a serious commitment to that principle. It is not that anyone says the wrong thing about issues of concern to disabled Canadians. That is not the problem. You can find all kinds of statements over the years where all kinds of people say the right things about what should happen. The problem is that no one does the right things.

It is action that is required, Mr. Speaker, rather than promises. The member who moved the motion made reference to the five-year strategy that was announced by the government last year, a five-year strategy for the integration of disabled persons into the mainstream of Canadian society.

• (1930)

Under that strategy, to make sure that the strategy worked and was implemented, it was proposed that a committee of deputy ministers meet on a regular basis to take a look at laws where they discriminate against the disabled population, to take a look at services that discriminate against persons with disability, to take a look at areas of government policy where we have control to ensure that anything that was of a discriminatory nature that affected persons with disabilities in Canada would be removed.

That was last summer.

I asked in the committee on the human rights and status of disabled persons of which I am a member how many times had that subcommittee of deputy ministers met. They have met twice. I received the written answer last week. There have been two meetings with one deputy minister in attendance and one person assigned by a deputy minister in attendance.

If that is their strategy, it is one I do not want. If their strategy is not to do anything then I would rather not have the darn strategy.

The problem with the strategy is that no one has sat down and worked out timetables of when these things are supposed to happen, when they will come into place. The strategy itself as announced is not a bad strategy but it is only going to be a good strategy if somebody does something about it.

I will repeat what I said a few minutes ago. It is not that anyone says the wrong things about the need for assistance if you happen to be disabled. The problem is getting them to do the right thing. That is the problem.

I will give another example, a very simple matter in my view. We recommended in the Obstacles report that the Canadian Human Rights Act be amended to include a section that said people had a duty to accommodate persons with disabilities. Simple.

The United States, which in my view was a very regressive society, way behind Canada on issues affecting disabled people up until about a year ago, finally did that. It adopted the Americans with disabilities act which recognizes that society has a duty to accommodate persons with disabilities.

I do not recall what was in the calculations. I see the very able chairman of our committee sitting over there. He may remember. It was calculated in the United States that by society continuing to ignore its disabled population it was costing that society in the range of billions and billions of tax dollars in the year. It was calculated that the total population of disabled persons who were not employed in regular work and were not making contributions to American society was costing billions of dollars in American tax money to support them.

That was an incentive. They came forward with a piece of legislation that may not fit in Canada but at least it established some principles. The principles were that a disabled person in American society, and I would argue the same should be in existence in Canada, should have the same access to services as every other person who is able-bodied.

That is why I say it is a matter and a question of justice. It is not a question of hand-outs to someone who is disabled. They do not want that. Disabled people that I know are quite capable of looking after themselves in the main with some assistance.

It seems to me that our society would be much further ahead. In fact, we have to ask ourselves what kind of society we want to live in. Do we want to live in a society where we exclude millions of Canadians because they happen to be disabled, or do we want a society that includes every Canadian and allows every Canadian to live within the mainstream of Canadian society?

I can see that my time has expired, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say at the outset that we should be grateful to the hon. member for Regina—Wascana for raising this subject in Parliament. The issue of providing benefits and services to persons with disabilities is one that hon. members know first hand has been in the minds of many, both here and in the other place.

Hon. members will recall that during debate last year on Bill C-38, an act to amend the Canada Pension Plan, many of the issues raised and concerns expressed, both by hon. members and by witnesses appearing before the legislative committee, had to do with the disability pension provisions of the Canada Pension Plan.

Hon. members are no doubt aware that in addition to providing retirement, survivor's and children's benefits, the Canada Pension Plan also provides a monthly disability pension to contributors with a severe and prolonged disability. The maximum monthly benefit is currently $784 per month.

The fact that disability issues were the focus of so much discussion during debate on Bill C-39 was quite remarkable, given that the bill was addressing the financing of the Canada Pension Plan and an increase in children's benefits.

In response to these concerns and those expressed about other provisions of the Canada Pension Plan, the Minister of National Health and Welfare made a commitment to Parliament to raise these issues with his provincial counterparts. Hon. members will recall that although the Canada Pension Plan is administered by the federal government, it is in essence a federal-provincial program.

Major amendments to the plan require the approval of not only the Parliament of Canada but also two thirds of the provinces having two thirds of the Canadian population.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has formally proposed to his provincial counterparts of social services the formation of a federal-provincial committee of income security and social service officials. This committee will review issues relating to the Canada Pension Plan other than financing which will remain the purview of the federal and provincial ministers.

The provinces have agreed and it is expected that the first meeting will be held early in the fall. As the hon. member can see, the federal government is actively working with the provinces to establish a mechanism to ensure that our national pension plan, the Canada Pension Plan, meets the needs of all Canadians. This new process is in keeping with the spirit of the hon. member's motion and should encourage both him and persons with disabilities that their concerns as they relate to the CPP will be addressed.

The other aspect of the hon. member's motion that I would like to speak to is the idea of programs that enable persons with disabilities to function in society. In this regard, the Canada Pension Plan is examining its role in the vocational rehabilitation of persons receiving a CPP disability pension. The CPP's involvement in the rehabilitation area is relatively recent. Previously, it had been viewed that the plan's clientele were not likely candidates for rehabilitation because of their severe and prolonged disabilities.

However, times and attitudes change and disabled people are indicating that what they want most of all is to work. They view this as the only sure-fire way out of the poverty that so many persons with disabilities currently live in. That was certainly the message that came out loud and clear at Independence '92, the International Congress and Exposition on Disability held last month in Vancouver.

In the fall of 1990, a pilot project was started to see if vocational rehabilitation was feasible for the Canada Pension Plan. The goal of the pilot project was to provide 100 CPP disability pensioners with the training, skills and/or education needed to return to suitable employment. This effort was expanded when last year, as part of the national strategy on the integration of persons with disabilities, an additional $6 million over five years was allocated from the CPP fund to the development of rehabilitation initiatives within the CPP.

The results of the initial pilot project which wound up this spring have been encouraging from both the client's point of view and the impact on plan expenditures. The pilot project also provided valuable insights into how an expansion of rehabilitation should take place. The Department of National Health and Welfare is currently in the process of designing the next phase of rehabilitation in the Canada Pension Plan. It is expected to be operational shortly.

• (1940)

In closing, I hope my remarks have provided some information as to the achievements of the federal government in conjunction with the provinces in the area of the Canada Pension Plan.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I too want to take the opportunity to thank the hon. member for Regina—Wascana for bringing forward this motion on a very important issue. The issue really is the value and worth of every human being in our society and how we can ensure that every individual has the opportunity to participate as fully as they are able to in society.

We have just completed National Access Awareness Week. I spent some time at various places in my own riding that are providing those kinds of services. St. Stevens residence has just opened up to provide community living for people with in some cases mental disabilities, in some cases physical disabilities and in some cases a combination of both. It is a great tribute to the people who conceived this project that a number of young people and older people who have spent the largest part of their lives in institutions are now living in the community, participating with others, participating in worship, participating in education and in work experiences for a number of them. They are now able to live more fully complete lives as members of society.

Another facility, the Ottawa-Carleton Independent Learning Centre, is devoted to assisting people with fully independent living, as determined by themselves. I think that is the important thing. For far too long society, families, friends, people who care for persons with disabilities have assumed that we know best and have not allowed them the independence to choose and have not allowed them to have that independence to choose by ensuring that the services are there to give them the fullest possible range of choices.

Also in Ottawa West we have the Disabled Persons Community Resources which again brings together all the resources of this region and ensures that people have access to services. It is not enough that the services are there, that the people know about them, that there are not barriers based on mobility, knowledge, economic ability, language; if the services are there they have to be accessible to people in all the many ways we can think of accessibility.

Perhaps the most important service in that comprehensive package of services that the motion mentions and in the ability to function in society that the motion mentions is the ability to be employed. It is interesting that this motion comes forward for debate tonight, sandwiched between two bills, both of which are relevant to the motion, the bill we were dealing with before this hour on pensions for Public Service employees and the bill we will be dealing with later this evening on reform of the Public Service. It is not enough to bring forward issues in isolation.

What we have to learn to do in this House is to look at every piece of legislation, every government program and say among the other things we say in analysing a bill, does this bill assist or further hinder the ability of persons with disabilities to function fully in society? Both of these bills we are dealing with this evening are relevant, both of them continue or in fact increase impediments to persons with disabilities functioning in society.

I say that because the federal government is the largest employer in this country. As the largest employer in the country it has the obligation and it has the capacity to demonstrate that persons with disabilities can be fully integrated in employment by proper accommodation in recognition of the disability and, more importantly, in recognition of the inherent abilities of that person.

The federal government does not do that very well as an employer, and it is certainly something we in this House have an obligation to pay attention to.

For instance, we just dealt with Bill C-55, which allows some limited access, not full access, to pension plans for part-time employees. Many disabled people cannot work full time, or in order to remain as fully employed as they can with their disability they may be able to work full time for a while and then shift to part-time work for a while if their condition worsens, and then they may return to full-time work when they are able to.

Up until now, and even now, with the very limited provisions for part-timers to contribute to a pension plan, part-time employees in the Public Service have not had full access to a pension plan. Therefore their ability to work and have financial stability, not only during their working years but after they are no longer able to work, is limited by a bill that we are dealing with right now.

We will be dealing later this evening with Bill C-26, which deals with employment practices in the Public Service. That bill again continues some barriers to employment for persons with disabilities.

There is great concern among groups in society who are traditionally disadvantaged in employment—women, aboriginal peoples, people of colour, and people with a range of disabilities. There is great concern with regard to this bill that the Public Service is shifting away from the concept of hiring somebody on the basis of what they can do and giving managers more discretion so that they do not to have to meet that standard of "who has the ability to do this job".

Right now there are programs within the Public Service Commission that allow the Commission to place a disabled person in a job in a department by providing funding for that job for a period of time. The intention is that they will get trained and the employer, the department, will have the experience of having a disabled person working in their department or in their branch, and will discover what this person can do rather than seeing only the disability. Hopefully that will lead to a full-time permanent job for them.

In fact, what happens is that people continually get hired on term because they are disabled and they are never quite good enough to be hired permanently. Rather than facilitating the employment of persons with a disability, we are exploiting them.

What happens is that under the access program they get referred to a position and as soon as the special money that is provided runs out the department finds for some reason that it cannot keep this person on. So they get shuffled around. Now they are working and now they are not working.

It is not enough, and later this evening members will hear amendments to the act that we will be dealing with that would place additional responsibilities on the Public Service Commission.

Mr. Edwards: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

I have been listening with care to what my hon. friend has been injecting into this debate. I understand that she has an interest in bills that will be before us later this evening. However I would ask you, sir, to invoke the rules of relevancy and ask her to stay on the subject of this private members' hour.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please! I would remind all hon. members that the rule of relevancy is one of the most difficult that the Chair has to enforce. Therefore, I would call upon the co-operation of both sides of this House. I think it is always useful to keep this in mind.

I recognize the hon. member for Ottawa West again, for 30 seconds.

[English]

Mrs. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I really do resent the interruption.

The employment of persons with disabilities is one of the most crucial issues that persons with disabilities face.

• (1950)

I simply call upon the government, and all of us as parliamentarians, every time we are dealing with legislation, but particularly as an employer, to put into practice those principles that the hon. member's motion tonight talks about.

It is not enough to talk about these things in principle. We must put them into practice at every opportunity. As an employer we, the federal government, can do more for the disabled and their equality of access than anyone else in this country.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for External Relations and Minister of State (Indian Affairs and Northern Development)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity today to respond to the motion by the hon. member for Regina—Wascana dated May 15, 1991, in which the hon. member suggests convening a conference of provincial ministers. The purpose of the conference would be to promote the adoption of programs that will ensure that disabled persons across Canada receive the comprehensive services they need to function in society.

I want to thank the hon. member for his concern for the integration of disabled persons into society. This concern is indeed more than legitimate since, as we know, disabled persons represent 13 per cent of the Canadian population and, in too many cases, remain an untapped resource, both socially and economically.

I would first like to give a brief overview of the past twelve years which I believe will justify the position taken by our government.

In 1991 the United Nations proclaimed the International Year of the Disabled. This was the kick start for a world awareness campaign.

In 1982 the government enshrined in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms a clause on disabled persons which gave them the right to the same protection and benefits of the law, irrespective of any discrimination including discrimination on the basis of mental or physical disabilities.

This first step toward equality was to open the door to a whole series of measures and projects which, over the past decade have helped the disabled community to start taking its place in Canadian society.

In 1983 the United Nations proclaimed the decade of the disabled, an opportunity to insist on their rights as citizens. In 1985 our Prime Minister published a statement on the decade of the disabled, stressing the need to encourage the disabled to become fully involved in society and to be part of social change, in order to develop their potential and accept their duties as citizens. That same year, the Secretary of State was designated Minister responsible for the Status of the Disabled.

In 1986 the Employment Equity Act was adopted, obliging federally regulated employers to file reports on the measures they take to recruit disabled persons. The following year, the government proclaimed a national access week for the disabled, urging municipalities to improve access levels in transportation, the work place, recreation facilities, education and housing.

Between 1988 and 1991 the government pursued its initiatives with federal-provincial agreements on social housing, a policy ensuring that properties purchased or leased by the government include no physical barriers, and the start of a complete review of federal statutes affecting the disabled, to name only a few of these projects.

I am not trying to make the government look good. I simply want to make it clear that we have made progress and, above all, that we have paved the way for future action. We realize that being disabled does not in any way diminish a person's value or, and this is very important, the contribution that person can make to society.

We understood that political action and legislation to change the system would be effective only if we were able to change attitudes. In the past year, much has been done to implement the government's commitment on this issue.

First, in the fall of 1991 the government launched its National Strategy for the Integration of Persons with Disabilities, a five-year project co-ordinated by the Department of the Secretary of State and involving ten federal departments and agencies. The strategy, which is meant to ensure equal access for the disabled, their integration into economic life and full participation in society, appeals to the spirit of partnership and calls on all levels of government to take part.

Since last fall, several departments and agencies have begun to make changes, many in close co-operation with the provinces and territories.

For example, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation (CMHC) set up a program of financial assistance for disabled and low-income seniors who wish to make minor changes to their home. Several provinces and territories have agreed to participate in the program, which will start in July.

The Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport provides another excellent example of partnership. To ensure the commitment and support of the whole community, the department decided to share information on its program with all prospective partners. Fitness Canada thus held information meetings with representatives of the provincial and territorial governments and the voluntary and private sectors. Meetings were held in every province and territory between December 1991 and February 1992, and the results of these meetings are now being distributed to all participants.

Fitness Canada has also shown initiative in the field of education. Working in close co-operation with nine sports organizations and recreation centres for the disabled, the department is developing educational material to help teachers better integrate handicapped students in their physical education classes. In March, it established a steering committee to liaise with the Department of Education in every province.

Finally, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development as well is always consulting with the provinces and territories. In the province of my distinguished colleague, Saskatchewan, for example, the provincial departments and organizations that provide services to the disabled participated in information meetings culminating in a conference this past January where they developed a strategy and defined some common goals. Similarly, consultations with provincial representatives were held and will be held in Alberta and British Columbia.

I could continue giving examples of consultation and partnership between the federal government and the provinces. I think that everyone has understood that no government or organization alone can eliminate the obstacles preventing 3.3 million disabled Canadians from having full access to all areas of our society.

I will conclude by thanking the hon. member who presented the motion and gave me the opportunity to discuss this subject in the House of Commons. I trust that I have clearly shown the consultation that exists between the federal government and the provinces. Above all, I had this chance to highlight all that is being done at all levels to give the disabled more opportunity for real control over their lives and to let them take their rightful place in their own provinces and in Canada.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise with pleasure to speak on Bill C-55. It is a piece of legislation that I have looked over very carefully. It is in fact almost an omnibus bill. It deals with so many different aspects of pension legislation. I listened to the parliamentary—

• (2000)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Order, please. We are on Private Members' Business. It has not expired. I gave the floor to the hon. member expecting that she would speak about the private member's motion.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the item is dropped from the Order Paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, be read the third time and passed, and the amendment of Mr. Edwards (p. 12268).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): At the suspension of the debate there were seven minutes remaining in the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa South.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, as we reached seven o'clock, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway had posed a question to me with respect to MPs' pension plans and noted that he hoped I would be here at eight o'clock in order to give the reply.

Regrettably, the hon. member does not seem to have been able to make it back in order to hear my reply. However, I would like to make a few comments, particularly in view of the fact that he seemed to be, in his comments, claiming some kind of victory on behalf of his leader for the fact that the President of the Treasury Board announced that an independent committee would be reviewing MPs' pensions. He talked a great deal about how this had been called for and how it had been promised, which is all very well.

What is unclear is exactly what the position of NDP members is on the issue. One would have thought part of that letter having been given that if they did indeed feel as strongly as their leader claimed to feel in her initial speech, that perhaps in the context of the parliamentary committee they might have moved a few amendments on the issue. Were there any amendments by the NDP?

An hon. member: No.

Mr. Manley: No amendments were moved. We have to guess what their position really is. We have to read the rumours that appear here and there about the reaction of their caucus. What we do know is that members of the NDP have succeeded very well in achieving some excellence in the art of double-dipping. We have some very good examples of former NDP members who have accepted very good positions with the federal government on top of their government pensions, including their former leader.

It is very hard to take seriously the question from the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway. He inquires at seven o'clock to run out the clock and then he is not really able to make clear what position it is that his party is trying to defend.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway is at a special dinner on foreign affairs. He is our foreign affairs critic. Maybe I could put the question again since the member did not answer it.

The question was quite simple. What was the Liberal position? The Liberals are famous for being mugwumps. Do you know what mugwumps are, Mr. Speaker? They are people who sit on a fence. They have their mug on one side and their wump on the other.

The Liberals are famous for this—on the trade deal, on the GST, on pensions, on everything. They try to be everything to everybody. At some point the mugwump starts to hurt a little bit, sitting as he does in the middle. So I will put the question again. What is the position of the hon. member's party, the Liberal Party? Or is he going to continue the tradition of mugwumpry among the Liberals.

Mr. Manley: Mr. Speaker, I certainly made my position clear in my speech. I do not think this member was present for that part. Maybe if we could get the NDP caucus all together at once we could have a discussion about it. What clearly has not been stated is what the NDP position is. I do not think we are accomplishing anything by this, Mr. Speaker.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that when I looked at the clock a few moments ago I thought we were back on Bill C-55, so I apologize to you. I do want to speak on Bill C-55.

It is, as I said earlier, legislation which I have examined very carefully. It is, in fact, almost an omnibus bill. It deals with so many components of federal pensions that it really would have been better, I feel, if the government had split this bill into its different components so we could deal with it in those components.

There are a number of features in this bill that I support and I know that other members of my caucus support. Finally, after years and years of lobbying, federal part-time workers, if this bill becomes law, will be able to become part of the federal superannuation plans. I am sure most of us in this House are aware this is a benefit which will proportionately mean more to women than it does to men because a larger number of women are working on a part-time basis and not in full-time jobs.

This bill also provides for an early retirement act for correctional workers. That is another suggestion that has been made in this House for at least 10 years, another situation for which we have lobbied for a long time. Correctional workers have very stressful jobs and they deserve the kind of unreduced early retirement plan that air traffic controllers have had for some time now.

Another provision in this bill that I support is the new Pension Benefits Division Act which instructs the federal government to enforce court ordered divisions of federal pension credits upon marital breakdown. This idea was also a very long time coming. In fact, since I was elected in 1988 I have been working on this issue. I have received representations from a number of women who have been married to plan holders and have lost totally the benefits they should be entitled to because of the way the previous act was written.

I am afraid there is still a number of problems with the method the government has chosen in its attempt to address this inequality for women in this very large bill. I heard the parliamentary secretary saying earlier today that this is a simple bill that brings pension legislation in line with the Income Tax Act. I would ask the parliamentary secretary why on earth do we have a bill with 153 pages dealing with so many aspects of pension legislation, including the pensions of members of Parliament, which it seems to have just kind of snuck in there?

I would respond also to the Liberal member who was speaking a moment ago that the leader of the New Democratic Party made the position of the New Democratic Party straight and clear when she spoke in the House at second reading. That is the position of the New Democratic Party. There are concerns in this caucus, and within this party, around the provisions of double-dipping and triple-dipping that we know has gone on. We know that the public shares those concerns. There are concerns around the age at which a member is entitled to start to receive pension benefits. Those are the concerns she articulated. She articulated them clearly and this is the position of the New Democratic Party.

I said a few moments ago that I had some concerns with the bill in relation to the pension splitting provisions. Women are living in poverty unnecessarily because of this government's policy on pensions. This bill will only ensure that women who can jump through a number of bureaucratic hoops from now on will get a part of the pension to which they are entitled. It does not do anything for the many women who are retired or approaching retirement after a lifetime of work in their homes. They remain, in fact, doomed to poverty under this new legislation.

What I am talking about here is spouses of contributors to the government's own pension plan, from Public Service employees, Armed Forces personnel, diplomatic service, et cetera. Since 1987, the federal government has required federally-regulated industries to adopt certain pension standards which include pension credit splitting on marriage breakdown. The federal government has exempted itself from the Pension Benefit Standards Act and continues to set a lower standard for itself than for federally regulated industries.

• (2010)

My New Democrat colleagues and I have proposed a number of amendments, contrary to what was just said in the House. I think we have proposed around 30 amendments to this legislation. One of those amendments would have provided for retroactivity so that women who were cheated out of their pensions by government policy would now be able to get that pension. That amendment was defeated by the government majority in the House of Commons.

Another New Democrat amendment moved in the committee studying this bill would have provided for spousal representation on pension advisory committees. That was also defeated by the Conservative majority.

Other amendments that were drafted in consultation with spouses concerning the imposition of a trust on the pension plan, the amount of the pension to be transferred, and so on, were also defeated by the Conservative majority.

I am, however, pleased that the government took some of the New Democrat amendments and proposed them itself, such as the valuation of pensions, the disclosure of pension information to the spouse and a determination of the length of the period of cohabitation.

As I said earlier, this is an issue I have been working on since only months after I was elected to this House of Commons. I have received letters from a number of women in every region of this country who have been very badly treated by the current legislation.

I have written to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women who is also the Associate Minister for National Defence a number of times over the years asking for relief for particular women, married women who had devoted their lives to a husband's career and children and then found themselves living in poverty. I also wrote to the President of the Treasury Board. I asked the ministers to urge their government to support our amendment on retroactivity. Sadly that was to no avail.

The government's record on women and pension is extremely poor and unfortunately so are these women who have been caught in this squeeze. They are also extremely poor. In the area of the Canada Pension Plan the government has failed the women of Canada.

I have been corresponding for years on the case of Helen Marie Davis. This woman was married for several decades to a man and underwent great personal hardship with him. She bore and raised eight children. She left him—she had to leave him later in life—and obtained a divorce. Because of his failing health she resumed living with him and he died within the year that they resumed living together.

Do members know how much she receives from her husband's Canada pension credit? Do they know how much she gets in a pension from the Canada Pension Plan? Zero, not one penny, because according to this government's policy she had been living with him less than a year even though she had actually lived with him for decades. She went through a humiliating and unexpected cross-examination at the appeal hearings and again she walked out with nothing, zero. This policy is cruel and nonsensical and must be changed.

As an example of the federal employment pension, which is the subject matter at hand, I have been working on the case of a woman who was married to a foreign service employee for 38 years. As a consular spouse she was not allowed by government regulation to take employment despite her own two university degrees. She was 63 years old by the time the regulations changed and too old to re-enter her own profession.

In some ways this woman is more fortunate than others I have dealt with in that her ex-husband has agreed to provide her voluntarily with half his pension. But because he is in a higher tax bracket than she, she must pay higher taxes than she would if the pension had been divided at source and provided directly to her.

A woman's right to her share of a pension should not have to rely on the good will of the divorced husband or on tricks provincial courts sometimes use to get around the federal legislation. I have heard so many problems with Revenue Canada's treatment of pension splitting that I urge this government to review the situation as quickly as possible and to take action.

Many divorced women live in poverty and many are saddled with huge legal bills. The government is not making sure that they get their half of the pensions regularly, nor is Revenue Canada sensitive to the situation these women find themselves in. Another woman wrote to me, and I will quote:

I feel that in spite of all the changes for the better in a women's status in this country, we are still in the Dark Ages in many ways. After nearly 30 years of marriage my husband left me after losing everything we had worked for over most of my lifetime.

The court awarded this woman a part of her husband's RCMP pension, but if he dies the pension dies with him and the woman he has been living with gets the survivor's pension. There is nothing for the woman who has raised his three children and had been with him for most of his life. She will get nothing at all.

This woman is now in her later years and loses out for the time that she helped him to earn that pension. The issue of survivor's benefits, which is among the most important of all pension issues, is not really addressed in this bill. It is not addressed at all.

It is appalling that a person can be deemed dead when their ex-partner dies and then they lose any benefits. This is what this legislation does.

I have heard particularly from women whose spouses are in the Armed Forces. They tell me this is a very stressful life which does contribute to marriage breakdown. The woman is sometimes left alone to raise children for long periods of time. Why is there so little recognition of this role that women play, this work that women do for many years in their lives?

More and more women these days have paid jobs outside the home. Yet when a woman follows her husband throughout the world, in many countries it is difficult for her to find a job. The women who suffer most are those of the older generation, many of whom did no paid work and have no pension in their own names. These older women are the ones who will not benefit at all from this new legislation.

I have also been told by women of problems with the Garnishment, Attachment and Pension Diversion Act. One woman was abused by her husband for 23 years. She left him but she has been unable to collect her support under that bill. She receives half of her husband's pension whenever he feels like sending it. What limited money she receives will stop when he dies.

One of the New Democrat amendments would have remedied this situation by imposing a trust on the pension plan so that when it is split, half of the pension is paid out to the spouse directly from the pension plan on time and until her death, not his if he predeceases her. The government again used its majority to defeat this amendment.

The many women who have written to me and to the ministers are forced to open up every detail of their own personal lives in the hope this government will show them some compassion. I sometimes feel like I am banging my head against a brick wall when trying to deal with the government. I get letters and I have conversations with these women and they share the pain, agony, and humiliation they feel. I know the government side gets the same letters, because often the letters I receive have been carbon copied to me that have gone to a minister. Not one of these women who have talked of their divorces or their abuse or other aspects of their personal situations to complete strangers who have power over them will benefit from this bill.

I think that is a travesty. This lack of attention to this matter in the bill certainly does figure prominently in my decision about whether or not to support it.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague on an especially excellent speech in that she dealt with specific cases of real people who are affected by this legislation or actually have not been helped by the legislation.

• (2020)

I noticed she referred to an act concerning garnisheed wages. I thought maybe I would just expand on that a little bit. I used to prosecute some of these cases in the courts where money would have to be collected, usually from the husband, so I am somewhat familiar with this matter.

I will translate this into the actual facts. What happens, and it happened more in the past but it is still happening, the husband was out working and the wife stayed home looking after the children. They would get divorced, the assets would be split and she would get half of his pension and that was a big fight.

An hon. member: Not here, not in this bill.

Mr. Waddell: Well, not in this bill but often in some agreements in court or as part of the divorce settlement. The only problem is that the pension, as I understand it, still goes to one person, usually to the man. Then the man does not live up to his obligations under the court order.

What has to happen then is the woman has to go to court. She has to hire a lawyer or line up to get a prosecutor and the man's bank account or wages are garnisheed. It takes time, it is expensive and often times the woman does not get anything. The husband of course sometimes resists. She may get money, but would it not be better if we just split that up and the bill dealt with that and the modern situation and made it easier for the woman? I think that was the principle behind our amendments.

As the hon. member said, suppose the man dies. Suddenly the pension is gone and it is not even—

An hon. member: She is deemed dead.

Mr. Waddell: And she is deemed dead. I am laughing, but it is not a laughing matter. That is what we tried to do on our amendments and I am sorry the government did not accept them.

Before I sit down, I wanted to tell the hon. member that I received a letter today from a woman in Port Moody who is a widow. She wrote saying that she has an 18–year old son. He is six foot six and weighs well over 200 pounds. She was getting a child allowance from the government and then it was cut back. She said that her pension was increased but it was not enough to pay for all the clawbacks and the cutbacks.

We have a government that is not totally reforming the pension system and is out there clawing back different allowances. Here is this poor woman who has to feed this giant of a kid on less money from this government. That really is not justice.

I do not know if the hon. member wants to comment on that. It is another example of a difficult situation for people living in the real world in Canada.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the comments of my colleague from Port Moody—Coquitlam, a neighbouring riding of mine. We are very close in the lower mainland of Vancouver.

I want to expand on the pension splitting provisions of this bill. The method of division proposed in this bill is flawed because it does not provide for consistent treatment of federally regulated employees in the Public Service. The government in fact had models to choose from, models that work quite well. There is the Canada Pension Plan with automatic division of credits or the flexible provisions of the Pension Benefits Standards Act. The government chose neither of those two models.

Instead, the government decided to limit the benefit distribution to one method only, the much more restrictive, cumbersome and less fair lump sum transfer. This method is not easily acceptable and it has a lot of built–in time delays and court costs. The evaluation of these lump sum amounts fails to take into account many factors.

There were a number of options presented at committee stage that would have improved the bill. Unfortunately the government did not accept them.

The key thing to remember in this legislation is that it does in fact make some small measure of improvement because it does allow for pension splitting, even though it is an imperfect model.

My concern which I tried to articulate in the comments I made is that it will not benefit those women who have been cheated out of a fair share of the pensions they, in fact, worked for over the many years they may have been married.

I gave the example of the woman who was the spouse of a diplomat. She was married for some 30 years and was not allowed to work by conditions of her husband's employment. By this government's own conditions, she was not allowed to have employment. When that marriage split up she had no provision to access part of the pension she had helped her husband earn.

Now this bill does nothing to remedy that situation for those women who have been cheated out of a lifetime of earnings and a share in the pension plan.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to speak to Bill C–55, which concerns changes in the superannuation plan for the Public Service, the RCMP and the Armed Forces. I estimate that in my own riding of Carleton—Gloucester the majority of my constituents are employed either by the Public Service, the RCMP or the Armed Forces.

These employees have all contributed to the plan, as they would in the private sector. Some people, especially on the government benches, claim that public servants are getting a free ride. I can assure you that public servants, like their colleagues in the private sector, have contributed their fair share to their pension plan.

Public servants are professionals who dedicate their lives, and do so very conscientiously, to serving Canada's communities. They are paid to do this, but they have to consider the future. Public servants must have a pension plan that is fair. It is up to us as parliamentarians to ensure that public servants have a pension plan that is both fair and equitable, so that it can meet the needs of public servants when they are retired.

The superannuation fund now contains almost $75 billion, or it will in a matter of months or, to be more specific, towards the end of the year.

Surprisingly, the government is the self-appointed administrator, comptroller, trustee and manager of the fund. The government has a monopoly. It is the official trustee of this pension plan, so it should be honest and fair in dealing with its employees. It is not a matter of handouts but of being fair.

We all know the government uses this money for its own purposes, either to pay off the deficit or the national debt. Contrary to the provisions of the Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985, employees and retired employees are not included on the Board. The Pension Benefits Standards Act, 1985 is an act respecting pension plans organized and administered for the benefit of persons employed in connection with certain federal works, undertakings and businesses. This act was assented to on June 27, 1986. The administration of pension plans will, according to the act, include at least one member of the pension committee chosen by plan members.

• (2030)

Let me ask you this, Mr. Speaker: Do employees have a representative on the pension fund advisory committee? Do retired civil servants have one? The answer is no, unlike other programs in various provinces.

This bill also provides for retired contributors to be represented on the management committee by a person appointed by them. "The employer, says the law, will ensure that the amounts deducted are accounted separately from its own." He must keep them in trust. I ask you this: Does government use the money for its own purposes? Does government put it in a trust fund? Does government use it to reduce its deficit or the public debt? The Auditor General has already tabled a report in which he advised Parliament that the rate of return on the Public Service superannuation account was between 1 and 2 per cent under the current rate on the investment market. Pensions are not negotiable, Mr. Speaker. Therefore, there is a need to be fair to these employees in the legislation.

On the death of the contributor, the surviving spouse is entitled to 50 per cent of the benefits. Why is there no provision to allow surviving spouses, generally women, to receive 60 per cent, as provided for in other pension plans across the country? What government did with this 50 per cent entitlement is contrary to the terms of its own 1985 Pension Benefits Standards Act, which calls for 60 per cent. Is government truly committed to the well-being of its employees who, day after day, provide services and see to it that government legislation is enforced?

Why, discriminate against part-time employees, term employees, contract employees? It is unfair to women in particular. Why could part-time and term employees not contribute to the pension fund too? As you know, Public Service 2000 is now being implemented. This government's agenda is apparently to keep shrinking the Public Service indefinitely. It seems to have no respect for the Public Service and to want to privatize it all. Are we to understand that government is not really trying to provide its employees with a fair pension plan?

Then, there is this amendment about indexing. Why did the government vote against this amendment designed to maintain indexing? What is it up to? Does it have unpleasant surprises in store for its employees? Let us not forget that employees pay to get this protection. It is no gift or giveaway.

[English]

What does this government have against fairness? Why does it exempt itself from the standards established by the Pension Benefits Standards legislation? Why does it have to use regulations that leave distrust in the minds of public servants?

We are still not sure that these regulations would not be used to change the benefits received even from de-indexed pensions.

I would like to refer to Bill C-55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act. Subsection 80(3) says:

> (3) In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) and the provisions of this act or any other regulations made under this act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

Surely, the government could have done much better in making the Public Service pension regime fairer. It has lost an important opportunity to show the public that it values public servants' contribution to our country and that it believes in fairness and justice.

Why has this clause been put in? Is it for justice? I doubt it very much. Is this a new road we are taking in Parliament where it is not Parliament and the laws that are going to prevail but rather the regulations prepared by——senior officials who prepare the regulations for the ministers? I think that in future we can expect to have some serious problems in this country if we are governed by senior officials instead of by acts of Parliament.

[Translation]

The government blithely ignored the recommendations of witnesses who appeared before the Legislative Committee. Public servants are treated with contempt and ignored by this government. It has no respect for public servants, whose morale is very low. It is difficult to achieve professionalism. And of course, there is the government's tendency to favour contracting out. As in the private sector, public servants contribute their fair share to the pension fund, and they are entitled to it. They have made a lifetime investment. The government, the self-appointed sole trustee of the plan, must be fair and frank with its employees in every respect.

[English]

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address an aspect of this bill that I consider extremely important to the affairs of Parliament.

I suppose the area I am concerned with does not directly relate to the matter of pensions. The bill, as described here tonight, is almost an omnibus bill that directs its attention to a number of different types of amendments in pension legislation.

The area I want to highlight has already been referred to by other members here this evening, but I feel I have a very special interest in this area of the law of Parliament. It is an area I work in at the committee level for Parliament. I feel it is essential that the records of Parliament reflect my views, at least. I may be, along with a few other small voices, crying in the wilderness but there is a serious problem here and I want to describe it now.

In clauses 30 and 58 of this bill there are provisions that delegate to the Governor in Council, and therefore the bureaucracy, the right and power to make regulations. That happens in almost every bill we pass here.

It also says in both clauses:

> In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) and the provisions of this act or any other regulations made under this act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency.

That means that when this House passes this law it is at the same time giving the Governor in Council and the bureaucracy the right to make a regulation that is inconsistent with this act, that flies in the face of this act. This Parliament is stating that regulation will prevail over the law that is passed in this House.

I was shocked when I read that and I went to the effort of taking some legal counsel on the issue. I said that surely this House cannot delegate to someone outside of Parliament the right to pass laws and change the law of Parliament. The answer that I got was that it has been dealt with before in history a few times. It is in fact not unconstitutional. The concept has been universally condemned and is regarded as a constitutional impropriety. I am telling this House now that the concept that it is about to adopt in this bill is regarded by constitutional experts in the western world as a constitutional impropriety.

• (2040)

What I as a member see it as is a situation where the government is continually chipping away at the rights and authority of this Parliament. At the very least, I must make reference to it.

I want to do it because I want to caution this House and Canadians to not take the current equilibrium of checks and balances, constitutional and political, as they exist in this country, for granted. It has been gained at a constitutional history cost over several hundred years beginning with the Magna Carta and going on through the Bill of Rights in the 1800s, the Bill of Rights in Canada under the British North America Act in 1867, the Bill of Rights in 1960, the Constitution Act and the Charter of Rights. Here we are in 1992 doing something that, as I have said, has been universally condemned. It was so condemned in the year 1930 when the Donoughmore committee clearly stated on the record for the British Parliament whose system we have adopted here in the following words describing the situation: "It cannot but be regarded as inconsistent with the principles of parliamentary government that the subordinate law-making authority should be given the superior law-making authority power to amend a statute which has been passed by the superior authority".

That is fairly wordy, but what I want to ask here is: do members opposite realize that they are on behalf of their electors delegating to the bureaucracy and the Governor in Council the right to make a law that is inconsistent with the law we are passing here tonight? I do not think they know it. I want the record to show very clearly that when I vote against this bill, this is the principal reason I vote against it. To be sure, there are others, but this is the principal reason I vote against it.

This concept of delegating in this manner has not been seen in a previous statute to the best of my knowledge. There was one occasion in this House last year when in adopting the new copyright law this House in a provision in the statute stated that in implementing an international copyright convention the Governor in Council could make changes to adapt to the international convention; the same principle, but at least tied to an international convention.

In this case there is no parameter, no limit, no guidance, no strictures, no measuring stick, but simply a statement that if the Governor in Council passes a regulation inconsistent with this act the regulation prevails. That is law-making overriding the law of Parliament by an Order in Council. That is a tyranny of the majority on the other side of this House because once given it will be bloody hard to get it back.

I have made reference to the previous constitutional history, what it has been called. My colleagues on this side of the House have already described it as a Henry VIII clause. The concept has been around for 400 years. It has been recognized as I have said as a constitutional impropriety. The only way the British Parliament managed to get rid of the Henry VIII clause was when the guy died. When Henry VIII died they removed the law that let the king make a proclamation that could override the rights and the law of Parliament.

This government is following in the same footsteps as Henry VIII. There is no other way to describe it. There are smiles around, Mr. Speaker. It sounds cute but it is very important. It is a very important principle. I cannot help but allude to the President of the Treasury Board as walking in the footsteps or wearing the mantle of or with the crown of Henry VIII. He might even do it well.

Let me put a scenario so that the record can show some of my real concerns. If there were an inadvertent conflict, inadvertent inconsistency, between the rights that will be passed under this statute and the statute itself, one could understand in some cases where you would want to settle the difference. I think it should be settled. The law of the land says that Parliament's law governs. That is what the law says now.

But what happens over time if the Public Service, the Governor in Council, says to heck with this, we have a provision that lets us make a regulation that overrides it. The member shakes his head, "not in your lifetime". We are talking 400 years of constitutional history here.

What if that happens? I am saying that Parliament has just given the government and the Governor in Council the right to make a law that overrides the law we cast in this House. They are incredulous over there. They do not believe that would really happen.

It is not going to happen tomorrow. I will take their word on that. We have seen it in this one statute, just this one. What happens if this fall we have another statute with the same provision, and another one next year, and the year after that, because the bureaucrats draft these bills; the minister does not. Soon we have dozens of statutes with the same kind of provision. What if there is a problem in this House some day, a constitutional problem? The government can simply decide to go right ahead and run this country by passing regulations that are inconsistent with the statutes because the concept has been accepted if we pass this bill here in June 1992. They will look back and say that it was okay in June 1992, it must be okay now in 1993, in 1994. That is a great danger. Trying to roll this stuff back is very difficult.

Just two years ago there were Standing Orders that governed procedures in this House. Those Standing Orders were significantly, materially, amended over the objections of the opposition. The reason they passed was because the government had a majority. That incident itself showed how the majority could override the rights of the minority in this House. We are not talking about passage of laws. We are talking about the Standing Orders that determine how Parliament works on a day-to-day basis.

The government that did it was insensitive to the issue. This section is a reflection of that same insensitivity, an insensitivity to the law of Parliament, an insensitivity to our constitutional history, and an insensitivity to what I referred to as the equilibrium of the checks and balances in our constitutional law.

I regret that this is going to be law within a few days or weeks. I want the record to show that and I object to it strongly.

• (2050)

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): I welcome the opportunity to present a few comments on this bill.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, the New Democrats are opposing this bill. There are, I would suggest, two main reasons why we oppose this bill and certainly two reasons why I am opposing this bill. The first reason has to do with the fact that for some time now superannuates at the FSNA have been calling for a joint management board to manage the funds of this pension plan.

Mr. Speaker, as you also will be well aware, there is something in the order of $75 billion or $80 billion sitting in this account somewhere that is being managed solely by the Treasury Board and for some time the superannuates have been asking for some say in how this is being managed.

To be fair, there is an advisory board around, but I am of the understanding that this board has not been consulted for some five years. What they have been asking for is something that has some real power, a joint management board that would be made up of the government as employer, the employees, superannuates and of course a representative of a spouse, all of whom would actually manage those funds.

The Auditor General in his report this year said that this fund is losing something like a billion dollars a year in interest alone. It is losing that money because of the way the government has invested it. It is very difficult to get answers from the government. The government has been very, very hush-hush and very reluctant to make any comments with respect to investments, but certainly this $75 billion is not sitting in an account in the Bank of Montreal or a credit union somewhere. It has been borrowed by this government. In fact it is part of this $400 billion debt that exists in this country.

That is all very well and fine if in fact there was a joint management board that decided in its wisdom that it wanted to lend the government x millions or billions of dollars on certain terms, but to simply have the government investing and using this money as it sees fit with these promises leaves many superannuates unsure and in fact very frustrated. When you get a report such as the Auditor General's report saying that this account is losing a billion dollars a year in interest and you have the superannuates saying that they cannot find out exactly where these accounts are being invested, in what form and in what fashion and what the plan is for these accounts, it is very frustrating. The government refusing to set up that management board sets a very bad precedent in this country.

In my riding there are a lot of seniors who are CPR pensioners on CPR pension funds and they have a lot of concerns over what has happened with their account. There is a lot of secrecy concerning that fund. It would certainly be important for this government to take some lead in dealing with pension funds in this country. When this baby boom generation reaches retirement there is going to be a lot of need for those funds and by God there had better be some accounting for them and they had better be there and available. Therefore, the fact of a joint management board makes very good sense and would certainly ensure that these pension funds are being spent and being used properly.

The other disappointing thing is that with the amount of interest and growth that is happening with this fund, I am led to believe that something like only one-half of the interest that is being accrued in this account goes to benefits. That means that the other half of the interest is being accrued to the account itself as well as the employer and employee benefits that are being paid into it. This is a huge fund that is growing at a huge rate. It is paying benefits to superannuates and their death benefits have not risen in I do not know how many years. They have been asking for an increase in death benefits and survival benefits, but this government has been very reluctant and in fact stonewalled them time after time.

The fact that the government has refused to put in this joint management board is one of the key reasons why I cannot support this bill. I know that it is something that pensioners have been calling for and the government has simply ignored them.

The other matter is this business of the regulatory authority that has been given to this government under this bill. I have watched in this House for the last four years and have seen this government show disrespect for this House time and time and time again.

I was involved in a bill called the At and East which had to do with grain being moved by rail cars to eastern Canada. It was announced that this subsidy would be cut in the 1989 budget and it was cut but the law was never changed.

I raised it in the House at the end February in 1990. Within two days the bill was introduced in the House. The government was violating its own law in total disregard for Parliament, in total disregard for this country—no debate in the House; make an announcement and the provision is gone. That is showing complete disrespect for this House, complete disrespect for this country and complete disrespect for Canadian citizens.

We have seen enabling legislation that has come forth and there is a place for enabling legislation. This government has used it time and again to meet its own purposes.

I was involved in the debate on GRIP and we had this enabling legislation in front of us. We never did see the program and we were not getting details that the government knew were going to be in the program. The government pushed the bill through and then implemented the program.

Under the gun control legislation huge control has been given to the minister and to the Cabinet with respect to regulations in areas in which they can make changes to the bill via the regulations. Very important areas in all propriety should be dealt with by this House. The government has again ignored the House.

I never thought I would see the day when the government would put this section in this bill. Others have raised it. It is unbelievable and I am going to read it again into the record. It is amazing. Clause 80(3) says: "In the event of any inconsistency between the provisions of any regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) of the provisions of this act or any other regulations made under this act, the provisions of the regulations made under subsection (1) or (2) prevail to the extent of the inconsistency".

In other words, regulations can be made by the Cabinet that are contrary to statutes that this House passes.

I am not sure why we are debating a bill. We are debating a bill here that presumably is going to put into law certain legislation regarding pensions. The government can turn around at its will and through the Cabinet make changes to the regulations. If they are contrary to this statute it does not matter and they will not be debated in this House. That is unbelievable. It is actually unbelievable.

What the hell am I doing here on this bill? If this is what Parliament is coming to we should let the Governor General hold little councils somewhere and pass rules, send us out a letter and let us know what the law is. That is what this amounts to.

It is an insult. It is an insult to every member in the House and it is an insult to every Canadian in this country that this type of garbage is going into legislation and yet the government is doing it. It is very upsetting.

I have a lot of seniors in my riding who have been following this bill quite closely. It is amazing, it is dumbfounding, it is a shock. This bill should not be supported. It should be voted against by every single member of this House.

I want to close if I could by making some comments on MPs' pensions. I have gone on record as saying MPs' pensions should be reviewed.

• (2100)

It is very important the way that our leader has handled this area of the bill, calling for an independent inquiry. The government has agreed to at some point set up an independent committee, independent of this House and of the Senate, to review MPs' pensions. That is what our leader called for, that is what we have been calling for. That is appropriate.

I am a new member in this House. I have not reached my pensionable age and I certainly think it is appropriate that there be some changes. If I had the opportunity to be here long enough I would receive a pension at a relatively young age. Certainly it would be appropriate to have an independent committee make binding recommendations to this House that should be implemented with respect to MPs' pensions.

It is important and I only hope that the government sets that committee up soon. There is no date for this committee, it is somewhere in the future. I do hope that the government will get that committee up and running very soon.

In closing, certainly I cannot support this bill nor can any of my party colleagues support it. I would be surprised at any member in the House who could stand up in full honesty and support this bill.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make some comments with respect to the hon. member's speech. I congratulate him, especially on his last comments on the pensions of members of Parliament. I agree that we have to look at it. We should be careful of the National Citizens Coalition. It has a different agenda. It wants to raise money for its own right wing causes and it will do it on the back of this issue. MPs would be wise not to give it the issue to ride. As I understand it, the House is proceeding to an independent committee outside the House on the suggestion of the leader of my party. I am pleased with that.

I wanted to comment about pensions in general. I had raised this before with the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby when she spoke and I raised it with my hon. friend who just spoke. These things are very intertwined; the Canada Pension, the notion of divorced and widowed women concerning pensions and the difficulties that arise.

My concern is that we have not really dealt with a lot of things in this bill when we had the chance. I found the letter I was referring to before and I want to read it and get my friend to comment.

"I am a single mom, widowed since 1977. This year my son, who is 18 now—six feet, six inches and 250 pounds—is out of school and not yet able to find work. He is now disqualified from both family allowance payments and orphans' benefits. I still have to feed him", and at that size you can imagine he eats a lot, "but I have to do so on $150 less a month than I did in January.

I did receive an increase in my Canada Pension in January but because it was directly deposited I have no idea why. I was not sent any explanation, which probably I would have received if it had been mailed to me as previous ones were. I am therefore only out of disposable income by $80. If my son returns to school in September he can reapply for orphan's benefits".

She points out that she has increased taxes as well. She continues:

"Ian, I know I am slightly better off than most single working mothers. I went back to college on life insurance funds and have been able to earn an income in the $20,000 plus range and CPP. However, I own my own house and even though I have had a hard time repairing it, putting it in good repair, I wonder how on earth other single moms even survive.

An article in a Vancouver newspaper recently said that single parenting was not the cause of troubled teens and children as much as poverty was the underlying cause. A friend of mine who is a guard at a juvenile jail agreed her observations there would tend to say that is indeed the case.

Single, impoverished heads of households with children under their roof need immense tax benefits to break the cycle of poverty.

I know I have never hit the average family income. I pay medical insurance, house taxes and income tax as well as car and house insurance at the same rate as everyone else. These amounts come out of my over-strained disposable income. I often feel I have to pay these amounts and maintenance of household amounts only.

As a caring nation we can and should do better for our children".

I thought that was a very interesting letter. It opens up what I would suggest to the hon. member and I ask him, do we not really have to do more than a bill like this? We have to deal with the whole notion of the Canada Pension Plan and how it relates to a whole variety of people.

Mrs. Catterall: This bill has nothing to do with the Canada Pension Plan.

Mr. Waddell: It has to do with pensions generally.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I suppose the hon. member and other people expect the previous speaker's answer.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my friend's comments.

It is quite embarrassing to stand here and discuss the pensions that we as parliamentarians have. We have this pension plan that people drool over and yet look at situations such as the hon. member has raised in which there is a single mother who is trying to find enough to get by on. It shows the inequities that exist in this country.

The United Nations named this country the best country in the world in which to live. I think it depends on who you are and where you live in this country.

An hon. member: Until it came to women and then we were eighth.

Mr. Laporte: Single parents, often mothers, find themselves in very difficult financial situations. There has to be a review of pension legislation and our whole social welfare system and income levels of lower income Canadians. Many of them are there, not because they want to be but because they were forced there. They are victims of circumstance.

My friend has pointed out to me that when the UN looked at women, instead of Canada being number one were were suddenly eighth in the world.

There is a huge need for pension reform and a huge need for income reform in this country. There is a need for programs to help these people who are less fortunate than we are, sitting in this Chamber with our benefits and our pension plans.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the last member who spoke referred again to the words of his leader concerning MPs' pension plans. I must say that I am as mystified now as I was the morning I listened to his leader. We in Ontario are getting used to the idea that the NDP knows how to talk when it is not in office but when it has the opportunity to do something it seems to hit a stage of paralysis.

I am wondering if the member could explain to us clearly what the position of his party is on MPs' pensions. The Leader of the NDP spoke on this matter when this bill was first introduced in the House and made all kinds of comments and then failed totally to make any of the many appropriate motions she could have at that time to demonstrate that she meant what she was saying.

Since that time I have sat in committee for nearly three months with a member of the NDP and I have not heard one motion to the effect of the speech his leader gave in the House or that he just gave.

I heard about a letter from the government but we are here as members of Parliament if we truly want to do something. The member and his leader have had ample opportunity to do so. I wonder if he could explain why he has not and why his leader has not.

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, the member has a lot of nerve to stand in her place and make those comments. She has never made any comments about her position on MPs' pensions. The Liberal Party has not made its position clear on MPs' pensions. It is the New Democratic Party that has taken the lead in this area. Our leader has stated our position on this pension plan. We have called for a committee to look at MPs' pensions and benefits and bring some binding recommendations into this House.

• (2110)

In fact the reason this independent inquiry is happening now is because of our leader. It is not because of what the Liberal Party has done. The Liberal Party has done nothing.

I come from a province that happens to have an NDP government. We have had an NDP government for most of the last 50 years. Under the NDP government we have brought in all kinds of legislation that has helped average Canadians, average residents in Saskatchewan, far more than this hon. member has done either as the federal Liberal Party in power or in the province of Ontario, or anywhere else in this country.

The member need not stand in place and hurl comments at this party. It is the New Democratic Party that has done more for social programs for the average Canadian than any other party in this country.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my few words to this debate on Bill C–55 and speak to some very specific provisions in response to representations which I received from numerous constituents concerning this legislation.

Most constituents are concerned with one thing. They see this bill as a serious threat to their indexed pensions. My constituents are worried and confused about what is in the bill. Although it is thick and complex, they all recognize that it is an obvious attempt by this government to bury its attack on indexation deep within the bill, hoping that no one will notice.

Everyone has noticed, Mr. Speaker; civil servants, the armed forces, and veterans. They have all noticed what this government is doing and they are not going to let it get away with it.

The bill amends four pension acts, public servants, Canadian forces, RCMP, and members of Parliament. This bill could very well be several bills and by all rights should have been separated.

The most controversial element of the bill falls on page 32. It is here that clause 71(3) states that should any of the regulations made under this bill conflict with the act itself that the regulations would prevail.

That is exactly what has caused all the concern. This clause leaves the door open for the government to sneakily enact a regulation affecting indexation, thereby avoiding having to go to Parliament with it.

I know well how much this government hates going to Parliament. The fisheries minister has avoided Parliament for over a year now with his individual transferable quotas and his dockside monitoring program.

Pensioners across the country protested and groups which appeared before the legislative committee spelled out their concerns.

At first the Treasury Board president dismissed these concerns as irrelevant and unfounded but he finally gave in and proposed an amendment in committee. Its text is on page 34, clause 71(5). It protects against a reduction in benefits at the hands of any regulation but it only offers protection for benefits which have accrued before the day on which the regulation is made. Any and all future benefits are unprotected and up for grabs.

Keith Pickering is a constituent of mine from Inverness. He is an armed forces retiree with over 21 years of service in Canada. I would like to quote a section of his letter to me:

> We believed the government, our employer, would look after our pension fund the same as they looked after their own pension fund. I find out now that the government does not really care about their employees or their welfare, as Bill C–55 has shown.

Mr. Pickering and other armed forces retirees recognize that there are some good things in the bill for them such as increasing the supplementary death benefits for armed forces' survivors. But these good things pale in comparison to the potential for disaster should indexation be left vulnerable.

These positive elements in the bill also include pension splitting, coverage for part–time workers, and early retirement for correctional services employees. Because these are long overdue, their presence in Bill C–55 makes it more difficult to oppose the bill as a whole. Their presence pits pensioner against pensioner and is, I believe, all part of the government's "divide and conquer" mentality.

Another constituent called yesterday morning concerned about the pension splitting provisions of the bill. She is worried that this element of the bill will not come into effect in time to help her. She and thousands of other Canadians have been waiting for years for this government to act on this issue. This government has coupled in this bill positive provisions like pension splitting with something as dangerously wrong as deindexation. This is cheating Canadians. It plays political games with their security and livelihood.

All Canadians are realizing that Bill C–55 is just a sneakier version of Bill C–33 in 1985. The government has not learned from its mistake. Indeed, it is pushing ahead with its deindexation agenda despite figures like the following examples: The 1989 poverty line for one person was just over $1,100 per month and for two people, just over $1,500 per month; in 1989 pension amounts were indexed pensions, just over $1,000; unindexed pensions, just over $700. For surviving spouses the amounts are dreadfully less. Indexation is fundamental to people's livelihood following retirement, and these figures clearly illustrate that.

The population of Canada is quickly aging with fewer young people entering the labour force to support them. It provides a real social dilemma and pension reform is long overdue. This is what is necessary and the government can no longer continue to avoid it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The question is on the motion of Mr. Edwards. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Pursuant to Standing Order 46(5)(a), I have been requested by the parliamentary secretary to defer the division until a later time.

[Translation]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the division on the motion now before the House stands deferred until 10.45 a.m. tomorrow, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

* * *

[English]

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): There are 82 motions in amendment to Bill C–26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 1 and 3, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be grouped for debate and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 2 and 4, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, are identical to motions Nos. 1 and 3. Accordingly, the Chair will not select them.

[English]

Motions Nos. 5 and 7, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 5 applying to Motion No. 7.

Motions Nos. 6 and 8, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, are identical to Motions Nos. 5 and 7. Consequently the Chair will not select them.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 9, 11 and 13, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be grouped for debate and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 10, 12 and 14, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, are identical to motions No. 9, 11 and 13 respectively. Accordingly, the Chair will not select them.

• (2120)

[English]

Motions Nos. 16, 19, 21 and 23, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, together with Motions Nos. 15 and 18, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, will be grouped for debate and voted upon as follows: (a) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 15 obviates the necessity for a vote on Motions Nos. 16 and 18; (b) a negative vote on Motion No. 15 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 16; (c) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 16 obviates the necessity of a vote on Motion No. 18; (d) a negative vote on Motion No. 16 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 18; (e) Motion No. 19 will be voted upon separately; (f) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 21 obviates the need for a vote on Motion No. 23; (g) a negative vote on Motion No. 21 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 23.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 17, 20, 22 and 24 are identical to motions No. 16, 19, 21 and 23 respectively. Accordingly, the Chair will not select them.

Motion No. 25, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 26, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, is identical to motion No. 25. Accordingly, the Chair will not select it.

[English]

Motions Nos. 27 and 31, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, and Motion No. 29, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Motion No. 30, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops was moved, debated and negatived in committee. Consequently the Chair will not select it.

Motions Nos. 28 and 32, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, are identical to Motions Nos. 27 and 31 respectively. Consequently the Chair will not select them.

Motion No. 33, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, Motions Nos. 34, 36, 38, 40 and 43, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, together with Motion No. 42, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, will be grouped for debate and voted upon as follows: (a) Motion No. 33 will be voted on separately; (b) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 34 obviates the need for a vote on Motion No. 36; (c) a negative vote on Motion No. 34 requires the question being put on Motion No. 36; (d) Motions Nos. 38, 40, 42 and 43 will be voted upon separately.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 35, 37, 39, 41 and 44, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, are identical to Motions Nos. 34, 36, 38, 40 and 43 respectively. Accordingly, the Chair will not select them.

Motion No. 45, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 46, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, is identical to motion No. 45. Accordingly, the Chair will not select it.

[English]

Motions Nos. 47, 49 and 75, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be grouped for debate with a vote on Motion No. 47 applying to Motions Nos. 49 and 75.

Motions Nos. 48, 50 and 76, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, are identical to Motions Nos. 47, 49 and 75 respectively. Consequently the Chair will not select them.

Motions Nos. 51 and 53, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 52 and 54, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, are identical to motions Nos. 51 and 53 and respectively. Accordingly, the Chair will not select them.

Motion No. 55, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, and motion No. 56, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be grouped for debate and voted upon as follows: (a) if motion No. 55 is carried, it will not be necessary to put motion No. 56; (b) if motion No. 55 is rejected, motion No. 56 will have to be put.

[English]

Motion No. 57, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester is identical to Motion No. 56. Consequently the Chair will not select it.

Motions Nos. 58 and 59, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, together with Motions Nos. 60, 62 and 64, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 61, 63 and 65, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester are identical to Motions Nos. 60, 62 and 64 respectively. Consequently the Chair will not select them.

[Translation]

Motion No. 66, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motions Nos. 67 and 68 standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, will be grouped for debate and voted upon separately.

[English]

Motion No. 69, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops was moved, debated and negatived in committee. For this reason, the Chair will not select it.

Motion No. 70, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 71, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester is identical to Motion No. 70. Consequently the Chair will not select it.

[Translation]

Motion No. 72, standing in the name of the hon. member for Kamloops, and motion No. 73, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be grouped for debate and voted upon as follows: (a) if motion No. 72 is carried, it will not be necessary to put motion No. 73; (b) if motion No. 72 is rejected, motion No. 73 will have to be put.

[English]

Motion No. 74, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester is identical to Motion No. 73. Consequently the Chair will not select it.

Motion No. 77, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West will be debated and voted on separately.

[Translation]

Motion No. 78, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, is identical to motion No. 77. Accordingly, the Chair will not select it.

Motion No. 79, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 80, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester, is identical to motion No. 79. Accordingly, the Chair will not select it.

[English]

Motion No. 81, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West will be debated and voted upon separately.

Motion No. 82, standing in the name of the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester is identical to Motion No. 81. Consequently the Chair will not select it.

I shall now propose Motions No. 1 and 3 to the House.

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out line 13 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"employee from one position to another position at the same level of responsibility for which the employee has already been qualified by the Commission;"

Motion No. 3.

That Bill C-26 be amended in Clause 2 by striking out lines 14 and 15 at page 1 and substituting the following therefore:

" "promotion" means the movement of an employee from one position to another position at a higher level of responsibility or at a higher maximum rate of pay than the level of responsibility or the maximum rate of pay of the position the employee previously occupied;".

* * *

• (2130)

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-73

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3) I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stage.

* * *

PUBLIC SERVICE REFORM ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee; and on Motions Nos. 1 and 3 (p. 12268).

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, these two motions quite properly have been grouped because they are changes to definitions in the act that are very much related one to the other.

One of the major changes in this bill is a move away from the long-standing principle, long-standing to the tune of 70 years since the first Civil Service Act was passed by this Parliament, that the person best qualified for a job gets the job. We will be discussing that particular aspect of this bill in several clauses throughout the bill to demonstrate that is, in fact, the case.

One of the fundamental changes that happens here is that people can now be deployed. Up until now, people have been appointed in the Public Service. That means they are hired into a position for the first time, they are promoted to another position, or they move to another position. In all cases whether they are or are not appointed is based on some method for determining who is the best qualified among those who want that position.

In Bill C-26, we now have a thing called deployment. Members of Parliament may remember over a year ago changes were made, not through legislation but through Orders in Council, that people could be transferred from one position to another without the right of appeal and without any reference to the Public Service Employment Act which for many years has ensured we have a Public Service that is fairly and impartially appointed.

The ability to transfer people without paying any attention to the act that has protected those principles for seven decades was challenged in court. It was thrown out by the courts because the court said very clearly the ability to transfer people was contrary to the merit principle.

With that court decision in hand, the government in this bill is now trying to make legal what the courts have thrown out. The bill says that somebody may be deployed, i.e., transferred from one position to another. Again, the bill very clearly spells out that those deployments have to pay no attention whatsoever to merit or to bilingualism. They are unappealable and an employee who feels unjustly treated has no recourse against the deployment. It is totally within the arbitrary discretion of a manager.

Unfortunately, what the provisions of the act also do is allow deployments to be used for promotions. That is clearly contrary to the merit principle where people move up in the Public Service according to ability, not according to whether the manager likes them or not.

The distinction between a lateral transfer and a promotion becomes blurred in this legislation. What I have attempted to do with these motions is to get rid of that blurring.

Deployments will now be able to be made within very broad categories with very broad salary ranges and with no accountability. The government will group employees, in one case in groups of up to 110,000 employees, obviously with very many salary levels, very many layers of responsibility and a manager is free to move somebody up that scale or down that scale without any reference to the requirements of the act and without any appeal.

These two motions attempt to clearly define what is a deployment i.e., a lateral transfer, and what is a promotion. The bill now says simply that a deployment is the movement of an employee from one position to another. The government has tried to persuade us that these are not promotions or demotions but simply sideways moves. They are not.

What I have done in Motion No. 1 is to clearly specify that a deployment is at the same level of responsibility and that the person has already qualified on merit to be transferred within that level of responsibility. I have used the precise words the commission gave to the legislative committee in describing what a deployment was going to be used for.

I have difficulty understanding why the government would not accept this amendment to clarify that deployments will not be used as a guise for promotions or demotions. In other words, any movement within the Public Service could become a deployment that is unaccountable and unappealable.

For the same reason, promotion is defined. In the legislation a promotion will from henceforth, if the legislation stays unamended, mean whatever the commission says it means. That is quite simply what the legislation says. A promotion is as defined in the regulations of the commission.

Employees will no longer have a clear definition of what is a promotion, where somebody was improperly awarded without going through competition, and therefore they will have no grounds on which to appeal a promotion they think was unjustly made.

Putting in these amendments is only one small part of what is necessary to ensure that there is still some accountability, still some attention to fair hiring and promotion practices in the Public Service but they are a starting point.

They put words on what the government has said it means in this legislation, on what the Public Service Commission says deployment will be used for. Since we have these motions out for debate, I look forward to hearing why the government does not want to accept, if it does not want to accept, wording that reflects what it says are its stated intentions.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague on the motions she presented. The important point here concerns the definition of what a promotion is, but the issue is the merit principle.

Will public servants really be able to have confidence in a future where their promotions and working life will be regulated fairly and equitably, with clear definitions of what is meant by promotion, transfer and demotion? To whom will they appeal? That is the big question. I can well understand that the minister wants to give managers more power so that decisions can be made much more quickly.

• (2140)

However, I do not think that he put in place the mechanisms needed to protect public servants who might be abused by some managers. Generally speaking, we know that managers and senior officials are conscientious and think of serving the Canadian public in the best possible way and are very honest.

Nevertheless, it would be very difficult to correct any abuses that may occur. A senior official might have racial prejudices or prefer men over women or vice versa. It would be rather difficult if he discriminated discreetly, not to say hypocritically, by forming teams from his old boys' network around him. He could surround himself with his friends and relatives and like-minded people and keep others out of his circle. He would have the power to transfer some employees outside or inside his section or service and these employees would not be subject to competitions to determine the best candidate for promotion.

We know very well that the number of public service occupational categories will be greatly reduced, from 75 now to possibly 24 or 25. This means that in general, for every three categories now there would be only one.

Say that someone works in category 1, the lowest level, and an employer or senior official wants to transfer him. He could easily move from level 1 to level 3. Who could appeal? Who could discuss the good and bad points of this transfer? There will be various gradations between level 1 and level 3, between level 4 and level 6 and between level 7 and level 9. Managers will be able to transfer employees as they like and also, unfortunately, according to their prejudices.

So the important point to keep in mind is that with a quarter of a million employees, there must be transfers, promotions and even demotions and it is very important to have mechanisms so that employees who feel wronged, overlooked, mistreated or discriminated against in the decision can appeal.

It is true that appeals can now take a long time. I would have preferred the minister to deal with the length of appeals instead of reducing the opportunity to appeal.

So, Mr. Speaker, with great regret, having participated in many meetings of the legislative committee that studied the new public service bill, I realized that the merit principle will no longer exist in the Public Service of Canada, one of the best, if not the best, public service in the world.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I would like to very briefly concur with the words spoken by my two colleagues from Ottawa West and Carleton—Gloucester.

The essence of these motions is to try to address one of the fundamental concerns that we have about Bill C-26 and the amendments that it brings about to the management of the Public Service system in Canada. These changes undermine the principle that promotion and appointment are based on the principle of merit, first and foremost.

This principle, which has been the bedrock of the Public Service management over the last number of decades in Canada, is fundamental to having the kind of capable, competent, independent and non-partisan Public Service that Canadians have the right to expect and require.

In particular, the merit principle manages to eliminate the political patronage that at one time characterized appointments to the Public Service and also is the method of ensuring that bureaucratic patronage, which in some ways is even more insidious and more difficult to deal with than political patronage, does not become the order of the day in making appointments or promotions.

It is crucial that we in the House of Commons restate again the importance we place on this principle and the concern we have that this legislation is likely to undermine it.

As an example of the criticisms that we have, allow me to quote from Hugh Winsor's commentary that appeared on May 23 in The Globe and Mail. He wrote: "Civil service managers would also be given leeway to redeploy people within categories without competitions, something the Treasury Board attempted to do under the existing Public Service Employment Act and was rapped on the knuckles for it by a federal court judge. The Public Service Commission has delegated much of the responsibility for hiring to the deputy ministers in individual departments and admitted in its most recent annual report there has been too much abuse of the system. Too many deputy ministers and assistant deputy ministers are appointing their cronies and redeploying people they do not like or putting people in allegedly temporary acting positions without going through the competition process, the commission said".

This is really what we are trying to get at here. We are not saying that the Public Service administration needs to be burdened down with red tape and bureaucracy or that managers should be hamstrung in their ability to manage, none of that is appropriate to these criticisms.

It is crucial that the integrity of the merit principle be preserved, not only for the benefit of the people who labour daily within the Public Service and have hope of promotion and career advancement but also for the benefit of the people of Canada who deserve to be served by a Public Service that continues to understand and implement this principle of meritorious reward for effort.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to take part in this debate I find what I see taking place here very disturbing.

The other members who spoke discussed promotion on the merit principle. What we are also seeing happen is a loss of morale within the Public Service. There are people in CEIC centres and other places telling the unemployed: "Don't bother to come here, there are no jobs. We cannot find you any jobs".

Prior to these changes, and the proposed changes in this bill, the people in these centres would go out of their way, they would go that extra mile, to try to help the unemployed. This is lowering the morale of these people. They do not know where they are going to be. They do not know that if they do their job well they are going to be the people who are selected for promotion.

I am scared at what I see happening here, because we are taking this away. This is something where the Public Service says yes, there have been a lot of problems with it over the years. There has been quite a bureaucratic nightmare in a lot of cases. I hesitate to warn the government that we cannot change these things this drastically, to give this power to managers and just to throw out the merit principle. I find this bothers me and I know it bothers the Public Service of this country. It certainly bothers the public of this country because you have people coming to you. You know the old saying: "If you don't know somebody, you are not going to get that promotion". This is an area that certainly the public is very concerned about. I am sure that if we allow this amendment that has been put forward, it will make this bill that much more palatable.

• (2150)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I do not understand this approach on the part of members opposite. They say "here it comes". I do not understand why they would think "here it comes". I suppose the President of the Treasury Board is a little antsy. He knows he is moving a bad bill and he is afraid that he is going to get roasted for it. I recall roasting him one time before. It drove him to prayer.

I think what he would want to do is reconsider his view. I ask him to seriously reconsider his view of clause 2 of this bill because my very hon. and distinguished colleague from Ottawa West has moved an amendment that makes great sense and will save us from the difficulties envisaged by the hon. member for Hillsborough.

I listened to the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa South. I did not have the benefit of hearing all of the speech of the hon. member for Carleton—Glouces-ter, so I was not able to say that he dwelt on quite the same terrors that were outlined by the other members in relation to what would happen with this bill if it is passed in its existing form. The President of the Treasury Board, who has a significant responsibility for the Public Service in this country, should know better than to introduce a bill such as this with this kind of change in the House.

I know what is going on and I think the public of Canada knows what is going on. It is a power grab by senior public servants. The minister is being used as their tool for the purpose of getting this power grab. They are taking over the question of promotion and transfer in the Public Service in a way as well as demotion—promotion, demotion and transfer in the Public Service—in a way that is totally unprecedented in our system. Ultimately the responsibility for that is going to fall on the minister's head, so that when an incompetent gets shifted or moved into a higher position without competition in the face of—

An hon. member: The Peter principle.

Mr. Milliken: No, no, no. The hon. member for Hillsborough would not want to call it the Peter principle. If someone of lesser competence gets transferred to a position for which there were better applicants, there is going to be a problem. It is going to create problems for ministers. It is going to create problems for deputy ministers and worse, it is going to create problems for the public of Canada who have reason to expect a reasonable level of service from their Public Service.

What this bill is doing is taking away any sense of responsibility for these appointments from the independent Public Service Commission. Far be it from me to stand here today to defend the Public Service Commission. I have moved amendments to this bill which we will be discussing another day that would restrict its powers. In my view it has not shown itself to be responsive to the wishes of Parliament to which it is responsible. The hon. member for Burlington perhaps disagrees. If so, I invite him to rise and make a speech. I would be glad to hear from him on this subject.

I think generally the Public Service Commission has not been responsive to Parliament to which it is responsible. It is not responsible to the government. It is responsible to this Parliament, this House and the other place. In my submission, based on past evidence that I have seen, it has been very unresponsive to the demands of this House. As a result, I introduced a private member's bill which would have brought it to heel. It would have created for it in the statute things that it should have done by regulation as recommended by a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons and which report it ignored. Many of the amendments that I have proposed to Bill C-26 are based on that refusal or ignorance, if you wish to call it that, on the part of the Public Service Commission to deal with amendments that I put forward.

The hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River is on the committee that has studied this again and has made a report similar to the one originally proposed by the predecessor committee in I believe 1987. That report was ignored by the Public Service Commission.

I have no particular desire to stand here today and defend that commission. What I do defend very vigorously is the importance of the independence of the Public Service and the importance of a lack of political interference in the promotion, transfer and demotion process in the Public Service.

If the merit principle is removed, what is replacing it? That is the question that is not answered by this legislation. A blanket power is given to promote, demote or transfer without regard to merit. If merit is taken out, what is the regard for? What is the promotion, demotion or transfer to be based on? The minister's whim? Surely the President of the Treasury Board does not want to have to take personal responsibility for every transfer, promotion or demotion in the Public Service of Canada.

An hon. member: I suspect you are right.

Mr. Milliken: He says he suspects I am right. Then let us fix this bill so that the minister does not have to take that responsibility. Let us make an objective judgment that somebody can look at.

I know the minister perhaps would prefer a subjective judgment but his answer indicated he would not.

Let us have an objective measure by which promotions, demotions and transfers can be judged and let us base it on the merit principle. What could be simpler than that? It has worked for us in the past. It can continue to work for us.

What the hon. member for Ottawa West has proposed is that clause 2 of the bill be amended so that deployment means the transfer of an employee from one position to another position at the same level of responsibility for which the employee has already been qualified by the commission. In other words, it can only be a lateral transfer if it is a deployment. It cannot be a demotion and it cannot be a promotion.

Second, on the term promotion, which is left wide open in the minister's bill—the minister points his finger at me—let me read his definition to him. I find it hard to believe a minister with the intelligence and the ability of the President of the Treasury Board would propose such a ridiculous bill to the House; a distinguished man. The Minister of Justice sitting beside him is a well educated individual as well. One would have thought she might have read this bill and said, "We cannot have this. As a government we could not introduce anything so silly". She sits silent in her seat. I do not think she has spoken yet on this bill. I would have thought she might.

Promotion says the bill "has the meaning assigned by the regulations of the commission". Talk about a carte blanche for the commission. The commission can do whatever it wants. It does not listen to Parliament. We have evidence of that already.

What the hon. member for Ottawa West proposed is that promotion means the movement of an employee from one position to another position at a higher level of responsibility or at a higher maximum rate of pay than the level of responsibility or the maximum rate of pay of the position the employee previously occupied. What is wrong with that definition?

I say to the President of the Treasury Board, come back to the House and tell us what is wrong. Never mind running for comfort to the Chair. Come and speak in the House and tell us what is wrong with this bill. This amendment makes sense. This amendment is reasonable. This amendment upholds the principles on which the Public Service has functioned lo these many, many, many years.

The hon. member for Burlington probably cannot even remember when it was different. Certainly I cannot. I am sure the youthful member for Ottawa West cannot.

The hon. member is sounding as though he is a violin. I am sorry he feels that way about this speech. Perhaps he has heard it all before. If so, surely he should change his tune and get up and object to this bill.

If he had objected in caucus, if the hon. member for Burlington had raised this issue in caucus, he might have got somewhere with this bill. As it is, it is left to us in opposition in this House to publicly condemn the government for its action in proposing this kind of amendment in the House.

I see the hon. member for Cambridge getting into the act as well. He must know this is wrong. He has heard my very reasonable arguments. Perhaps the President of the Treasury Board is getting some advice as to whether this amendment should not be accepted and if it could be done without defeating the government.

Certainly we would not regard it as a question of confidence if this amendment were to carry tonight, Mr. Speaker, and I invite you to put the question to the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry but it being 10 o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made on Tuesday, June 9, 1992, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 10 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, June 18, 1992

The House met at 10 a.m.

Prayers

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS BY MINISTER

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I may have inadvertently misinformed the House in reply to a question from the member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

I was asked if the names of CSIS informers are now routinely given to politicians. I replied that the names of CSIS sources are not, in the course of my tenure in the position of Solicitor General, revealed to the Solicitor General.

I have since been advised, and I wish to advise the House, that there have been a very small number of exceptional occasions when the director of the service found it necessary to advise me of the name of a human source.

To the best of my knowledge, based on a review with my officials, no person who is a Canadian citizen or a permanent resident has ever been named to me as a source.

I would also like to assure the House that I have never asked the director of CSIS for the name of a CSIS source.

In the very few cases when the director has found it necessary to provide me with the name of a source, those cases were related to instances of sources who had provided valuable service to Canada and my being informed of their names was necessary for administrative reasons.

I regret the inconvenience to the House but I want to reassure the House that names of CSIS sources are not routinely provided to the Solicitor General or to politicians.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HEALTH AND WELFARE, SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SENIORS AND THE STATUS OF WOMEN

FIFTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Health and Welfare, Social Affairs, Seniors and the Status of Women entitled Foetal Alcohol Syndrome, Preventable Tragedy.

Your committee requests that the government table a comprehensive response to this report in accordance with the provisions of Standing Order 109.

* * *

[Translation]

NATIONAL DEFENCE AND VETERANS AFFAIRS

PRESENTATION OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Marc Ferland (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs on Canada and security in Europe.

During both world wars and throughout the cold war, Canadian servicemen were actively involved in protecting freedom and democracy in Europe. Now that the cold war is over, it is only normal that Canadians continue to care about security in Europe.

The collapse of the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact totally disrupted the political and military scene in Europe and offers the prospect of sustainable peace. However, the tragic situation in Yugoslavia as well as ethnic tensions in the former Soviet republics show that the Soviet threat having disappeared does not in itself preserve peace.

Governments and people are increasingly aware of the fact that security is not a military matter any more and that attention must be paid to economic development and environmental management.

While recognizing that Canada must maintain its active membership within NATO, we recommend that Canada continue to take an active part in the CSCE process and to help build up its conflict prevention centre. We also recommend that Canada join forces with other members of the international community to help the former Soviet republics and eastern European countries dismantle their nuclear arsenal and rebuild their economies. If there is to be sustainable peace in Europe, Canada and the international community as a whole must support these young democracies not only in word, but with positive actions.

[English]

Mr. Brewin: Point of order, Mr. Speaker. Standing Order 35(2) reads:

> (2) Upon presentation of a report accompanied by supplementary or dissenting opinions or recommendations pursuant to Standing Order 108(1), a committee member of the Official Opposition representing those who supported the opinion or opinions expressed in the appended material may also rise to give a succinct explanation thereof.

I have spoken to the parliamentary secretary, to the House leader for the government and to the official critic for the Official Opposition. I have a brief dissenting opinion and I understood—

• (1010)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order, please. I must ask for unanimous consent.

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret there is not unanimous consent.

* * *

HUMAN RIGHTS AND THE STATUS OF DISABLED PERSONS

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons.

The committee is presenting an interim report on some of the issues considered during recent hearings on the subject of aboriginal people with disabilities.

This report is also available in audio cassette format from the clerk of the committee.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS AND INTERNATIONAL TRADE

SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the second report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade.

In accordance with its general mandate under Standing Order 108(2), your committee has considered the question of conditions in the former republics of the Soviet Union and reports its findings and recommendations.

THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and International Trade, in accordance with its general mandate under Standing Order 108(2).

The Subcommittee on Development and Human Rights of the standing committee has considered the question of South and southern Africa and the Canadian policy post apartheid. It reports its findings and recommendations to the government and asks for a report within 150 days.

* * *

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

SIXTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Felix Holtmann (Portage—Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

The report deals with conflicts between provincially registered trade names and federally registered trademarks. The committee hopes its recommendations will serve to reduce and eventually eliminate such conflicts so that small and medium sized businesses will be free to use their business and corporate names without fearing the possibility of an action for trademark infringement.

The committee requests that the government table a response in accordance with Standing Order 109.

* * *

BILL C-42

REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-42, an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants and the regulation of international and interprovincial trade in those species.

The title was changed from an act respecting the protection of certain species of wild animals and plants, with amendments.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

COPYRIGHT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-88, an act to amend the Copyright Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, this is a technical bill seeking to amend the Copyright Act. It will modernize the outdated definition of a musical work.

This amendment is necessary in order to clarify the new transmission rights created at the same time as the implementation of the free trade agreement. It is urgent that the clarification be made through the wording of the act that any musical composition, with or without words, is a musical work regardless of its physical attributes.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Beatty moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

INVESTMENT CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-89, an act to amend the Investment Canada Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted with recommendations.

Mr. Loiselle moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

* * *

[Translation]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE RENAMING ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-353, an act to rename unemployment insurance.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Robitaille: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to change the term unemployment insurance by replacing it with the more positive term employment insurance in all federal statutes and regulations or other texts made thereunder. Using of this new terminology would be more in line with recent trends in government policy and should be seen as reflecting a more progressive and positive approach.

Mr. Speaker, I may add that this change does not in any way affect the tenor or substance of existing statutes but will stress the use of a term that is more positive than the one in current use.

In concluding, I would like to point out that this bill reflects the views and expectations expressed by many Canadians in the course of prosperity consultations held in my own riding and elsewhere in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mr. Robitaille moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

* * *

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-354, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mrs. Sparrow: Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased today to rise and table my private members' bill, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act, which has been seconded by the hon. member for Calgary North and has been co-sponsored by 15 members of the Alberta caucus.

The bill amends the Young Offenders Act to reduce the maximum age for a person to be considered a young offender to 15 and by providing that young offenders who have been twice convicted of indictable offences be tried in adult court.

I truly look forward to the second reading of this bill when many of the concerns of Albertans and all Canadians can be brought forward. Only by working together can solutions be found.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Mrs. Sparrow moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S-11, an act to amend the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act, be read the first time.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

* * *

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

SHOP CANADA DAY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to seek unanimous consent today for the following motion:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should proclaim Saturday, July 4, 1992, Shop Canada Day to keep consumer dollars in Canada and to support Canadian retailers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to move the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is no agreement.

* * *

• (1020)

PETITIONS

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition today from many Albertans residing in several communities of southern Alberta petitioning the House of Commons on the question of the Young Offenders Act. They are requesting the Young Offenders Act be updated with a lowered minimum age.

OLD AGE SECURITY PENSIONS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition with hundreds of names from Lévis and Mascouche, Quebec; Trenton, Nova Scotia; Beaton, Ontario; Medicine Hat, Alberta; Moncton, New Brunswick and many other areas.

The petition draws the attention of the House to the following: That thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line; that over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 years of age live in poverty; that the 37 cent increase in old age security pensions in 1992 is inadequate to meet the needs of many Canadian seniors; that it is desirable for all Canadians to provide senior citizens with the necessary support to live their lives as independently as possible.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to urge the government to ensure that Canadian old age security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition certified pursuant to Standing Order 36 and it is signed by many residents of Calgary and other areas of Alberta.

These petitioners, in memory of Ryan Garrioch, draw to the attention of Parliament the following: That the majority of Canadians support equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislated age shelters from criminal law for very young adolescents and that chapter 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees equality rights.

Therefore the petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13.

BREAST CANCER

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to have the opportunity pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present a petition on behalf of many people from my riding.

They make the statement that every day 12 Canadian women die of breast cancer and this year 5,000 women will die of it. They expect the numbers to increase.

They are asking for new research dollars to find the cause and cure for breast cancer. They are asking the government to develop partnerships with health care industries, university researchers, service providers and government agencies.

They are asking that the government put this as a policy priority and are hoping this will advance soon.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present petitions which are signed by over 500 people from my riding of New Westminster—Burnaby, from the lower mainland area of Vancouver, Ontario, Montreal, Winnipeg, Saskatoon, from virtually every region of the country.

This petition says that since the goods and services tax is applied to feminine sanitary products such as tampons and pads, and since these products are necessities for women between puberty and menopause, and since the government has decided that the goods and services tax should not apply to certain foods because they are necessities, the petitioners call on Parliament to consider removing the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products.

JANA AND LEONARD ZRNIC

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36.

This petition is of particular concern to me for the following reasons. Two Canadian citizens have been held in prison in San José, Costa Rica for the past 40 months without trial.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to make a formal request of the Government of Costa Rica to act within the boundaries of its constitution and as a member of the International Human Rights Commission to proceed with the trial for the Canadian citizens, Jana Zrnic and Leonard Zrnic. Jana Zrnic's sister, Roni Arseneault, is a constituent of mine. I am pleased and ask Parliament to follow up with this petition.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): The second petition I wish to present pursuant to Standing Order 36 is in relation to the prospect of a referendum.

The 36 petitioners call upon Parliament to accept a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments with two stipulations, a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority vote in the majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of 83 constituents from the city of Calgary who petition this House in memory of Ryan Garrioch, the 13-year old who was stabbed to death in my riding some few weeks ago.

His parents are with us today. They have circulated a petition across the country that already has 150,000 signatures requesting that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I have two petitions today, pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition is from residents of the province of Ontario. They are petitioning the Government of Canada to rescind its decision with regard to the Court Challenges Program and call upon the Government of Canada to reinstate this program forthwith, thereby giving Canadians the opportunity to make legal interventions on behalf of minority groups and disability groups across this country.

The second petition pursuant to Standing Order 36, is signed by residents from the great province of Nova Scotia, in particular from Sydney and Church Point, Nova Scotia. They too call upon the Government of Canada to rescind its decision with regard to the Court Challenges Program, thereby reinstating this very worthwhile program which has enabled Canadians, particularly disabled Canadians and minority groups to petition and to make legal interventions.

RURAL POST OFFICES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of 175 residents in the town of Sheho in my riding of Yorkton—Melville who are facing the closure of their post office.

The petition reads: "Whereas our national postal service is an essential link between rural residents and our friends, our families and business contacts; and whereas rural post offices are not only the heart of rural communities, but often the only federal presence; and whereas Canada Post and the federal government are closing rural post offices across the country; and whereas this is unfair to rural communities and unnecessary given Canada Post's annual profit statements; wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament"—and this is the key part—"to ensure that the Canada Post Office in Sheho, Saskatchewan, remains intact with a permanent postmaster or postmistress and staff and appropriate personnel".

This is a very important issue to 175 people in a small village in my riding.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Al Horning (Okanagan Centre): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is an honour to present a petition with 63 names from constituents of my riding of Okanagan Centre.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government and also to enact legislation providing for the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by the majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority vote in the majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of a single province.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join my colleagues in offering signatures in support of a petition that was explained earlier today, that the majority of Canadians support equal treatment of criminal offenders, but with legislated age shelters from criminal law for very young offenders.

• (1030)

I am pleased to have been asked to present these petitions to the House of Commons today. They are totalling up in the hundreds of thousands and are at 150,000 already. I am sure there will be support from all members of Parliament in seeing something done about this.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my first petition deals with petitioners from Nova Scotia who ask that the goods and services tax on books and reading materials be removed. They point out that there has been no such tax on books and reading materials since the founding of the nation. They believe it is contrary to democratic principles and objectives such as enhanced competitiveness and increased productivity.

SOCIAL SCIENCES AND HUMANITIES RESEARCH COUNCIL

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my second petition represents petitioners from Alberta who point out that the merging of the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council with the Canada Council is dysfunctional at this particular point in time. They note that Canada's greatest challenges are really in the social sciences area. They identify domestic violence, environmental problems and problems of abuse as those that are best dealt with by the council.

The petitioners ask that this decision be deferred, that there be consultation and then a decision made.

RADIO AND TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my final petition is from petitioners from Manitoba who ask that Parliament monitor very closely the work of the CRTC with respect to the use of foul language on radio and television. They point out it is not necessary for informing or entertaining and that it is often contrary to the basic efforts on the part of the family to raise the children.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition, containing several dozen names, stating the following: "We the undersigned residents of Canada, in memory of Ryan Garrioch, draw to the attention of Parliament the following: That the majority of Canadians support equal treatment of criminal offenders but with legislated age shelters from criminal law for very young adolescents. Therefore, the petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years."

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present three petitions. The first petition is signed by some 106 petitioners mostly from my constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke, including all of the cities and many of the villages.

The petition draws attention to an application to divert Canadian waters from the North Thompson River near Belmont to sell in San Diego, California. It points out that under the provisions of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement the export of bulk water from Canada to the U.S. would enshrine Canada's obligation to maintain such exports even in the event of domestic water shortages.

The petitioners urge the Government of Canada to state categorically that it will not permit our freshwater rivers to be dammed and diverted into the U.S.A. and to state that our Canadian rivers are not for sale.

I should just add those feelings are exacerbated by the recent draw-downs of the Kootenay and Arrow Lakes to make up for water shortfalls south of the border.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): The second petition is signed by 58 signatories from communities throughout my constituency. The petitioners point out that the goods and services tax is applied to feminine sanitary products.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to consider removing the goods and services tax from women's sanitary products.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PREMIUMS

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, my third petition is from 56 petitioners from communities throughout my riding, including Rossland, Edgewood, Nelson and Argenta.

The undersigned residents draw the attention of the House to the following: that there has been a promise from the government to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for three years; that the recent cumulative increases to UI premiums are unfair and insensitive to small business during hard economic times; that further job losses due to business closures would further impair the chances for a full economic recovery.

Therefore, the petitioners call upon Parliament to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for one year.

* * *

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been some consultations. As you are aware, the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte also put in an application. Our preference would be that the hon. member be allowed to put his first.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I can assist the House. Yesterday, the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte gave me notice of an application for an emergency debate. I have received today an application from another member on the same issue. I will hear the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, if he wishes to be heard.

I understand the courtesy of the hon. member for inviting the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte to speak first, but under the rules of this place I am bound to hear the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

Mr. Dingwall: Mr. Speaker, I thought I heard the hon. member indicate to the House that he was relinquishing his place to my colleague from Newfoundland. Is that not acceptable to the Chair? I seek the guidance of the Chair on that. Perhaps we need the—

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. House leader and I could discuss the matter privately, but I have made the decision and I am afraid we have to stick to it.

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, as you said, yesterday I gave notice that I wished to seek leave to adjourn the House for the purpose of debating an urgent issue, namely the failure of the northern cod fishery.

The collapse of this economic mainstay of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia represents an economic crisis for dozens of communities and thousands of people. These Canadians urgently require an indication of the kind of short and long-term strategies the government will employ to deal with this crisis. The imminent summer recess will diminish the ability of these Canadians to speak to government through their representatives, therefore I request that we adjourn the House to debate this important issue.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan has raised essentially the same question that was raised yesterday by the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. I know—and I want to say this to the House—that the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte today supports the position of the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan.

As I said yesterday, it seems to me obvious to all hon. members that this matter is a very serious one. Yesterday I advised that I had listened very carefully to the exchange in the House in Question Period with respect to this. I am going to do that again today.

I am not prepared at this time to order the proceedings of the House be adjourned for an emergency debate, but I am saying both to the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan and the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, and to other members who come from Newfoundland and Labrador and other members who are very concerned about this, that I am paying very close attention to the exchanges in the House on this very serious matter.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

• (1040)

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-73

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 78(3), I move:

That in relation to Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the bill, and that 15 minutes before the expiry of time provided for government business on the allotted day of the second reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted if required for the purpose of this order and in turn every question necessary in order to dispose of this stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

Some hon. members: Shame.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 219)

YEAS

Members

Andre
Atkinson
Beatty
Belsher
Bertrand
Bird
Bjornson
Blackburn (Jonquière)
Blais
Blenkarn
Bosley
Boyer
Brightwell
Browes
Cadieux
Cardiff
Chadwick
Champagne (Champlain)
Chartrand
Clark (Brandon—Souris)
Cole
Corbeil
Corbett
Couture
Crosby (Halifax West)
Danis
DeBlois
de Cotret
Della Noce
Desjardins
Domm
Dorin
Duplessis
Edwards
Epp
Feltham
Ferland
Fontaine
Greene
Guilbault
Gustafson
Halliday
Harvey (Chicoutimi)
Hawkes
Hicks
Hockin
Hogue
Holtmann
Horner
Horning
Hudon
Hughes
Jacques
James
Jelinek
Johnson
Joncas
Jourdenais
Kempling
Koury
Landry
Langlois
Larrivée
Layton
Lewis
Loiselle
Lopez
MacKay
Martin (Lincoln)
Mayer
McCreath
McDougall (St. Paul's)
McKnight
McLean
Merrithew
Monteith
Moore
Nicholson
Oberle
O'Kurley
Plourde
Porter
Pronovost
Redway
Reimer
Robitaille
Roy-Arcelin
Schneider
Scott (Victoria—Haliburton)
Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)
Siddon
Sobeski
Soetens
Sparrow
Tardif
Thacker
Thompson
Thorkelson
Tremblay (Québec-Est)
Tremblay (Lotbinière)
Turner (Halton—Peel)
Valcourt
Van De Walle
Vankoughnet
Vézina
Vien
Vincent
Weiner
White
Wilbee
Winegard
Worthy—112

NAYS

Members

Angus
Assad
Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing)
Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre)
Baker
Bélair
Bellemare
Berger
Bevilacqua
Black
Boudria
Brewin
Caccia
Catterall
Comuzzi
Dingwall
Dionne
Duhamel
Ferguson
Finestone
Foster
Fulton
Gaffney
Gagliano
Gauthier
Grey (Beaver River)
Harvard
Heap
Hovdebo
Hunter
Karpoff
Kristiansen
Langdon (Essex—Windsor)
LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso)
Leblanc (Longueuil)
Lee
MacAulay
MacLellan
Manley
Marchi
Marleau
Martin (Lasalle—Émard)
McLaughlin
Mifflin
Milliken
Mills
Nowlan
Nystrom
Parker
Proud Prud'homme
Rideout
Riis
Robinson
Rompkey
Samson

Simmons
Stupich
Vanclief
Waddell
Young (Acadie—Bathurst)—65

Stewart
Tobin
Volpe
Walker

PAIRED MEMBERS

nil/aucun

• (1120)

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I would just like to indicate that I was unable to be on time for the vote. Had I been here when you put the question, I would have voted with my party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the previous question at third reading stage of Bill C–55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and Pension Benefits Division Act.

* * *

PUBLIC SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Loiselle that Bill C–55, an act to amend certain acts in relation to pensions and to enact the Special Retirement Arrangements Act and the Pension Benefits Division Act, be read the third time and passed, and the amendment of Mr. Edwards.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall I dispense with calling in the members?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, we are clearly ready to proceed immediately but I am wondering, as there were noes, we might go a little quicker than normal and not have the full 15 minute bell. Is that agreeable? As soon as those who are required are here we can proceed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The answer is no. Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 220)

YEAS

Members

Anderson
Atkinson
Belsher
Bird
Blackburn (Jonquière)
Blenkarn
Boyer
Browes
Cardiff
Champagne (Champlain)
Clark (Brandon—Souris)
Corbeil
Couture
Danis
de Cotret
Desjardins
Dorin
Edwards
Feltham
Fontaine
Guilbault
Halliday
Hawkes
Hockin
Holtmann
Horning
Hughes
James
Johnson
Jourdenais
Koury
Langlois
Layton
Loiselle
MacKay
Mayer
McDougall (St. Paul's)
Merrithew
Moore
Oberle
Plourde
Pronovost
Reimer
Roy-Arcelin
Scott (Victoria—Haliburton)
Siddon
Soetens
Tardif
Thompson
Tremblay (Québec-Est)
Turner (Halton—Peel)
Van De Walle
Vézina
Vincent
White
Winegard

Andre
Beatty
Bertrand
Bjornson
Blais
Bosley
Brightwell
Cadieux
Chadwick
Chartrand
Cole
Corbett
Crosby (Halifax West)
DeBlois
Della Noce
Domm
Duplessis
Epp
Ferland
Greene
Gustafson
Harvey (Chicoutimi)
Hicks
Hogue
Horner
Hudon
Jacques
Jelinek
Joncas
Kempling
Landry
Larrivée
Lewis
Lopez
Martin (Lincoln)
McCreath
McKnight
Monteith
Nicholson
O'Kurley
Porter
Redway
Robitaille
Schneider
Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)
Sobeski
Sparrow
Thacker
Thorkelson
Tremblay (Lotbinière)
Valcourt
Vankoughnet
Vien
Weiner
Wilbee
Worthy—112

NAYS

Members

Angus
Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing)
Bélair

Assad
Baker
Bellemare

Berger	Bevilacqua
Black	Boudria
Brewin	Caccia
Catterall	Comuzzi
Dingwall	Dionne
Duhamel	Ferguson
Finestone	Fulton
Gaffney	Gagliano
Gauthier	Grey (Beaver River)
Harvard	Harvey (Edmonton East)
Heap	Hovdebo
Hunter	Kristiansen
Langdon (Essex—Windsor)	LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso)
Leblanc (Longueuil)	Lee
MacAulay	MacLellan
Manley	Marchi
Marleau	Martin (Lasalle—Émard)
McLaughlin	Mifflin
Milliken	Mills
Nowlan	Nunziata
Nystrom	Ouellet
Pagtakhan	Peterson
Proud	Prud'homme
Rideout	Riis
Rocheleau	Rodriguez
Rompkey	Samson
Simmons	Stewart
Stupich	Tobin
Vanclief	Volpe
Walker	Young (Acadie—Bathurst)—66

PAIRED MEMBERS

nil/aucun

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the amendment carried.

Amendment agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The next question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour will please rise. On a point of order, the hon. government Whip.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the House might be disposed to take the vote that we have just taken and apply it to this.

An hon. member: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am afraid I heard a no.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 221)

YEAS

Members

Anderson	Andre
Atkinson	Beatty
Belsher	Bertrand
Bird	Bjornson
Blackburn (Jonquière)	Blais
Blenkarn	Bosley
Boyer	Brightwell
Browes	Cadieux
Cardiff	Chadwick
Champagne (Champlain)	Chartrand
Clark (Brandon—Souris)	Cole
Corbeil	Corbett
Couture	Crosby (Halifax West)
Danis	DeBlois
de Cotret	Della Noce
Desjardins	Domm
Dorin	Duplessis
Edwards	Epp
Feltham	Ferland
Fontaine	Greene
Guilbault	Gustafson
Halliday	Harvey (Chicoutimi)
Hawkes	Hicks
Hockin	Hogue
Holtmann	Horner
Horning	Hudon
Hughes	Jacques
James	Jelinek
Johnson	Joncas
Jourdenais	Kempling
Koury	Landry
Langlois	Larrivée
Layton	Lewis
Loiselle	Lopez
MacKay	Martin (Lincoln)
Mayer	McCreath
McDougall (St. Paul's)	McKnight
Merrithew	Monteith
Moore	Nicholson
Oberle	O'Kurley
Plourde	Porter
Pronovost	Redway
Reimer	Robitaille
Roy-Arcelin	Schneider
Scott (Victoria—Haliburton)	Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)
Siddon	Sobeski
Soetens	Sparrow
Tardif	Thacker
Thompson	Thorkelson
Tremblay (Québec-Est)	Tremblay (Lotbinière)
Turner (Halton—Peel)	Valcourt
Van De Walle	Vankoughnet
Vézina	Vien
Vincent	Weiner
White	Wilbee
Winegard	Worthy—112

NAYS

Members

Angus	Assad
Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing)	Bélair
Bellemare	Berger
Bevilacqua	Boudria
Brewin	Caccia
Catterall	Comuzzi
Dingwall	Dionne
Duhamel	Ferguson
Finestone	Fulton
Gaffney	Gagliano
Gauthier	Grey (Beaver River)
Harvard	Harvey (Edmonton East)
Heap	Hovdebo
Hunter	Langdon (Essex—Windsor)
LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso)	Leblanc (Longueuil)
Lee	MacLellan
Manley	Marchi
Marleau	Martin (Lasalle—Émard)
McLaughlin	Mifflin
Milliken	Mills
Nowlan	Nunziata
Nystrom	Ouellet
Pagtakhan	Peterson
Proud	Prud'homme
Rideout	Riis
Rocheleau	Rodriguez
Rompkey	Simmons
Stewart	Stupich
Tobin	Vanclief
Volpe	Waddell
Walker	Young (Acadie—Bathurst)—62

PAIRED MEMBERS

nil/aucun

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

* * *

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, May 15, consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and on the amendment of Mr. Boudria (p. 10744).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When Bill C–73 was last before the House there were seven minutes remaining in the question and comment period following the speech of the hon. member for Ottawa Centre.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, I want to say just a few words concerning this particular legislation before the House. Of course it is an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act in the name of the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons.

The motion made by the official critic for the opposition is that this bill be read six months hence. In other words, that it just simply be thrown into the garbage can for this particular session. The actual wording "six months hence" is the wording that has been adopted under the British parliamentary system going back to Westminster in Erskine May and repeated in Beauchesne and then in the Standing Orders, a custom I believe that goes back to 1622, which says you would not look at the bill again, that it be ripped up and discarded by members of the House of Commons.

I have had an opportunity in the last couple of moments to examine very carefully the wording of this legislation. Nowhere in the legislation before the Chamber dealing with Canada Post does it talk about service to Canadians. Nowhere in the bill does it talk about the time it takes for a letter or a parcel to get from point A to point B in Canada or internationally. Nowhere in the bill does it talk about lost mail. We have an incredible number of cases. We have seen a substantial increase in the number of complaints from people who mail letters in this country that are never received at the other end.

We have had a substantial increase in the number of students who complain that their applications to university, their registration for university and their requests for the syllabus and entrance information are being lost in the mail.

We have a lot of complaints from senior citizens who say that their letters never reach the destination written on the front of the envelope. Of course, we see Canada Post then coming back and saying: "Oh, no, we have got all these statistics that say we have a better service in Canada than we ever had before" and within two days a letter will go to its destination in another part of this country.

• (1200)

Of course Canada Post forgets to point out that is for letters that have a typewritten front, exactly in the middle of the envelope, done by machine, certainly not written by some senior citizen or some person in a very rural area of Canada who does not have a computer in their front living room to address their envelopes.

None of these subjects are addressed in this bill. Here we are in the House of Commons debating Canada Post and nowhere in the bill does it talk about service to Canadians. In fact, it does not talk about letters at all, it does not talk about parcels, does not talk about stamps, does not talk about the closed post offices. Once upon a time in our rural areas in Canada we had the one public building in a community which was the post office, and that is where all the business was transacted. That was the centre of activity for the community. In fact, that is the place in a lot of communities where the cheques were changed. It was the banking centre, it was the community centre, it was the place with the Canadian flag on the pole.

That has changed drastically since this government was elected, because there has been an intentional effort, of course, to close post offices and to replace them with these supermailboxes where you have to dig your way into it in the snow. It did, I must admit, provide de-icing fluid for some of the locks a couple of years ago.

Nowhere in this bill that the House of Commons is debating today, and the government just brought in a motion of closure, nowhere in this bill that has been dealt with by a committee of the House of Commons, nowhere in this bill that will now be dealt with by the Senate, is there one word about those matters which affect Canadians when they think about Canada Post. In fact, there is nothing in this bill that any ordinary Canadian would even talk about if you brought up the words Canada Post or if you brought up anything.

Words in this bill deal with such things as redeemable shares, beneficial ownership, security interest, and so on. This bill deals with shares of corporations. This bill deals with the kind of language that Canadians have come to expect from the Canadian House of Commons since this government was elected. This deals with the kinds of things that cause the Government of Canada in dealing with corporations and corporate shares to change the law in Canada in December, just before Christmas, and now it is a law in Canada today that all of the shares that are held in private trusts that are capital assets will not be taxable for another 30 years. That bill, which meant for the richest of Canadians, the biggest corporations in Canada with tens of billions of dollars held, escaping the capital gains tax, that will be able to be deferred for another 30 years while ordinary Canadians have to pay the GST.

That is the kind of language in this bill. The kind of language in this bill of corporate shares and corporate interests was the same language as was in the bill that defined corporate entertainment under the Income Tax Act, which means that now escort services in Canada are tax deductible. That is the kind of language you would see in this bill, the kind of language that the Government of Canada is interested in, and that is corporate shares, corporate policies.

Do not forget all of these corporate people who receive their $15,000 and $20,000 Christmas bonuses, what they call productivity bonuses, approved by this Government of Canada. That is the type of thing you would see, the types of phrases that are used in this legislation.

What is the government doing bringing in this legislation dealing with the post office? It is a good question. Why tie up the House of Commons, the Senate, printing, and everybody else talking about Canada Post when all you are doing is talking about shares and assets? You are not talking about letters, parcels, post offices, service to Canadians, people or anything like hat.

What is the government doing tying up the House with a bill like this? You would not understand half of this bill if you tried to read it. As a former law clerk of a provincial legislature, I must say I have difficulty following the blooming thing.

As I finish reading it, I still do not understand the purpose of this bill. You can read the speeches of the Government of Canada and they say nothing. What it says is "we are going to give shares of Canada Post"—the post office—"to employees".

It sounds okay on the surface of it. It is the thing to do in corporations in Canada today. Give shares to employees. Sounds like an admirable thing to do, a great thing to do I suppose until you look at what they are doing. The shares are not defined.

I will tell you one thing that is defined that I found rather interesting. I will have to read it out to put it on the record. It says here: that the shares are non-voting shares.

Why on earth would you give shares to people if they are non-voting shares? What are you afraid of? The hon. member says dividends from a corporation that lost $100 million dollars last year. Ha, ha, ha. Funny. Very interesting. Oh boy, what a rationale that is. Dividends.

I will tell you why they are non-voting shares. The Government of Canada is afraid that ordinary people, employees, would actually have a say in the running of the corporation. That is the real reason for this definition of non-voting shares.

I would suggest that when the minister stands up on third reading of this bill, he tells us how many similar situations there are where employees have shares of a company which are non-voting shares. I would bet that it would be about 1 in 10. Then, of course, there is the restriction. They can only own up to 10 per cent of the corporation in question.

I support the motion tabled in this Chamber to have this bill read six months hence. In six years, says the hon. member for Miramichi. Let us make it six decades. How about that? That would even be better because I have never ever read such a lot of language that means absolutely nothing.

Of course I cannot at second reading go into some of this exact language, but I can assure members that it means nothing. The actual decisions under this bill will be made by future ministers and the Minister of Finance on the approval of the President of the Treasury Board on the establishment of bylaws by the board of the corporation; if you can figure that one out.

That is what Canada Post is now spending its time on, an act to amend the the Canada Post Corporation Act. It is not spending its time looking at the numbers of letters that are lost in the mail, not spending its time looking at the needs of rural Canadians, not spending its time paying attention to the closing of the post office in Joe Batt's Arm.

• (1210)

Oh, no, it is spending its time on redeemable shares, security interests, and beneficial ownerships. In all of it Canada Post says that the employees could only own 10 per cent of the total amount of shares available. The shares will be non-votable shares and under this bill there will not be a dollar value placed on the shares. What a bill.

An hon. member: And they are in the hole any way.

Mr. Baker: They are in the hole any way. I hope all members of this Chamber will support the motion put forward by the Official Opposition, meaning the Liberals, soon to be the government of this country after the next federal election. I hope everybody will support this motion, shelve this bill, and say to the Government of Canada: "Look, for goodness' sake, get back and sign a deal with your employees. They haven't had a contract in three years, come next month", instead of dealing with shares, with capital ownership and with corporate dividends.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of my colleague on this shemozzle that is now called the post office. In his area of the country were the rural post offices torn out and thrown away? Were the people who went to meetings given any kind of rational approach to what the post office is doing? Did they send out these PR people with packaged information, or disinformation I should say, and try to come up with a scheme whereby they would have the people completely confused? I know that is what has happened in my own riding. It made no difference what we said, what kind of argument we put. They were programmed and that was the only answer we could get from them.

Mr. Baker: Mr. Speaker, the truth of the matter is that I should have dealt with it. I want to thank the hon. member from Miramichi who has sat in the House, I can recall, since 1974. He knows the post office inside out. He knows the basic requirements of the rural areas of Canada. Once upon a time we had a railway in those rural areas. We had Air Canada in those rural areas. We certainly do not have them landing. We have lost the federal presence in the air. We have lost it on the ground. We have lost the post offices in our rural areas.

The truth of the matter is that before Canada Post makes a decision on the closure of post offices it gives a list of those closures to the Government of Canada and the Government of Canada approves the list. The government can say it does not approve of the list but it certainly does not disapprove of the list. What is on that list is finished. It is gone. We can go through all the procedures we want; it is gone. The post office is closed. The building is gone. The flag is gone. The job is gone, in many cases several jobs. In some cases it is more than one job; it is several jobs that are gone from a rural area. One other thing that is gone is service. The service is gone.

I do not care how many surveys they come up with, the government and Canada Post Corporation, which say that it takes x number of days for a letter to get from point a to point b. I can assure the House that is not the case.

I do not know how those figures are compiled. We had better service in Newfoundland when we had the mail on the Newfie bullet. When the Newfie bullet was operating and stopped at every little settlement, we could put our mail on the Newfie bullet one day in St. John's and have it taken off the same day in Gander, Newfoundland. In fact I believe the service was better even before the Newfie bullet when we had the dog team. I can remember when we had a dog team service in the community that I was living in. There was better service for Newfoundlanders at that time. I imagine we could go back to the pony express.

An hon. member: The government has gone to the dogs.

Mr. Baker: The service has gone to the dogs, I can tell you that.

It does not make any difference how we send a letter. I have had cases recently of students who have run out of time to register at university because the money they sent in the mail, the mail order, was lost or the letter of registration was lost. We have had countless numbers of cases of this.

People have come to the conclusion that it is just not safe to put a letter in the mail any more and count on it getting to the place it is being sent to on time. Instead of two days between provinces in actual fact it is over a week.

In answer to the hon. member's question, our service has deteriorated, and what does Canada Post do? It gets the Government of Canada to come up with this bill that talks about giving shares in the corporation to employees as a good PR gesture and saying: "Boys and girls, look, we are going to allow you to get 10 per cent of this corporation, but we won't make it voting shares because you might have a say in the corporation. We won't give you a contract. You haven't had a contract for three years. We are going to give you 10 per cent of the shares. Actually we are not going to give it to you. We are going to sell it to you and we are going to come up with the amount of money you are going to have to pay later".

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is always a great pleasure to follow the member from Gander—Grand Falls, one of the more expressive and dramatic members of the House. However I did not know the Liberal Party wanted the postal service to go back to the dogs. He was saying it was much more efficient when the dogs did it back in Newfoundland many years ago. I also did not realize that the member was that old, unless I am mistaken about when dogs were used in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador.

In any event I support the motion before the House to give this a six-month hoist. It is not a good bill. I am sure my rural colleagues in the Conservative Party agree as well. Even my friend from Etobicoke—Lakeshore probably agrees it is not a great bill. Therefore let us give it a hoist. Let us give it a study.

The government wants to sell off up to 10 per cent of the shares in the post office to the employees. I think that would be the first step toward privatization of the post office. I do not really want to set up a modern-day version of the pony express in this country.

The post office is in place to act as a service to all Canadians regardless of where we live. I know you, Mr. Speaker, as a very distinguished Chair of this House would agree, coming from rural Alberta, that we cannot privatize the post office in this country. It must remain a Crown corporation. It has been a Crown corporation ever since it began, supported by a number of Conservative governments over the years.

To open the door, to start to privatize the post office of this country, is a mistake. We have seen it happen with Air Canada. We have seen it happen with other Crown corporations. The government now is trying to do the same thing in Bill C-73, the bill that is before the House today.

I appeal to the backbenchers of the Conservative Party to stand up and speak out on behalf of their constituents. I even know the government Whip from Calgary probably in his heart of hearts is very upset—and he has a big heart—that his government would open the door to privatizing the post office. I do not know why he supports the bill. Maybe it is the Reform Party in Calgary giving him the nudge. It wants to privatize absolutely everything.

• (1220)

I hope he will get up and speak his mind on this bill and help those of us in the opposition fight for the ordinary Canadians to keep the post office as a service to all of Canada.

I rise mainly because I wanted to put on the record the facts regarding the post office as it pertains to my riding of Yorkton—Melville in rural Saskatchewan. We have recently had the closure of rural post office after rural post office. In fact since 1984, when the government across the way took office, we have had 174 post offices close in the province of Saskatchewan. In less than eight years of Conservative government 174 post offices have closed their doors. Another 37 are being reviewed.

In many of those cases the people of the local towns have rebelled; they have petitioned, they have called meetings, they have lobbied to have their post office remain open. However, we have had a government which has not been receptive, which has not listened to what the people in those communities have said.

The post offices closed in my riding since the Conservatives came to power are in the following centres: in the small community of Arran, which serves the northeastern part of my riding; the small community of Danbury, which is now the home of the newly elected MLA, Ron Harper, from the riding of Pelly; the small community of Okla; the community of Togo; the community of Orkney; the village of Runneymede; the village of Waldron; and again to a larger centre, the town of Saltcoats, where several hundred people live in a thriving community, the post office has closed down; the village of Stornoway; the small town of Dubuc.

Some members across the way will remember the campaign by the people in the village of Dubuc. About two years ago a delegation came down to Ottawa. They came before a parliamentary committee and made their case. They got national news stories and a lot of stories in Saskatchewan about their fight for the preservation of the Dubuc post office, in that case a very well-kept building. People wanted unanimously to keep it open. They did not want a retail postal outlet, a RPO, but the government failed to listen, they failed to respond.

The towns of Tantallon, Lintlaw, Spy Hill, Whitespruce and Mikado have all lost their post offices since 1984. Those are the towns in my riding that have lost their post offices.

In addition to closures, we now have a number of post offices being reviewed in terms of whether or not they should remain open: the towns of Gerald, Bredenbury, MacNutt, Springside, and the large town of Kamsack, which has a population of about 3,000 people. The government is now reviewing the post office with the possibility of closing it down.

I mentioned Sheho. Just today in the House I tabled a petition signed by 174 people from the town of Sheho. That is roughly the same number of people who are patrons of the post office and they are asking the federal government to keep the post office open. I hope that the postmaster general will do something quite extraordinary, listen to the people of these small communities and keep the post offices open.

In addition to that, roughly a year ago the city of Yorkton, a city of 18,000 people, lost its post office. It is one of the largest centres in the country to lose a post office: a city the size of Yorkton with around 18,000. In my riding, we have had a reduction of hours in the town of Churchbridge, the town of Langenburg, the town of Theodore; in all cases causing concern to the local people who are served by the post offices in these towns.

Members across the way will say, what about the RPOs, the retail postal outlets? If they were to go around in rural Saskatchewan in my riding, they would find that the residents are pretty well unanimous in wanting to keep the post office, and are speaking out to keep that facility.

I will give members three examples of letters I received recently. A person who is the postmaster in the town of Goodeve, Mrs. Evelyn Lutz, writes: "Our community has many elderly people and to take away the post office from this village would be devastating". Mrs. Lutz makes a very good point.

As you go around the prairies, and you are from the prairies, Mr. Speaker, you know that in the small towns and in the villages of prairie Canada, we have a lot of senior citizens. The average age of some of these small hamlets, towns and villages would be up in the upper fifties or sixties or perhaps even older. You can sometimes go down a street and you think that the only people living in a small village are people that are on retirement. There is the occasional family with small children. It is these older people that need the postal service.

That postal service is a very important aspect of culture in this country in terms of popular culture. People gather at the post office. They meet their neighbours at the post office. It is the centre of communication and the centre of activity in the community. It knits together and holds together these small communities.

I remember when the people of Dubuc were fighting for their post office. They made the point and it is still true. Often in small towns, the only place you will see the Canadian flag flying is over the post office. That is the only federal presence in a small town or a small village. When they closed down the Dubuc post office a couple of years ago, down came the Canadian flag, the only explicit federal presence that we had.

Now with the crisis facing this country, we need more flags flying. We need more of a federal presence. We need more of Canada in all parts of Canada. Instead, the federal government is tearing it down, piece by piece, flag by flag, post office by post office. The people out there notice and they are worried about it.

In terms of the cost, a lot of these post offices are very efficient: city of Yorkton, 18,000 people; Kamsack under review, 3,000 people. Many towns of 500, 600 people have a good, efficient post office. When I say 500 or 600 people I mean in the town or the village there are 500 or 600 people but the surrounding farms will add maybe another 100 or 200 people. The community is one that is large enough to service a post office economically and efficiently.

The second constituent that has written to me recently is Jean Barteski, from the town of Invermay. I hope the member from Toronto who is concerned about retail postal outlets, the RPOs, who is sitting in the back bench, will listen. Ms. Barteski says: "The switch to retail outlets is helping destroy rural Canada. Let us put a stop to—"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Hughes): On a point of order, the hon. member for Halton—Peel.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not wish to be identified as the member from Toronto.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Hughes): Perhaps the member from Saskatchewan can carry on with his speech.

Mr. Nystrom: The member from Ontario, let us say. What Jean Barteski was saying was that the switch to retail outlets is helping destroy rural Canada. Let us put a stop to post office closures.

Finally, I have a letter from Mr. Glen Smith of Saltcoats. He says in his letter: "Quite a number have been closed in our riding and one supposes the rest are at risk in Saskatchewan. Rural Canada needs these jobs and this federal presence".

• (1230)

Once again, here is a gentleman talking about the federal presence disappearing because of the closure of the post office. The flag is gone, the federal presence is gone, the community gathering point is gone, the service is deteriorating, the consistency of the hours is not necessarily there. The fact that we will lose jobs is also a key point.

All of these rural post offices have a postmaster or a postmistress. They all need a back-up person, part-time help, and it is a real asset to a small village, town or hamlet to have a few extra part-time jobs in terms of the economics of the community.

Often it is one family with children who go to school. It provides extra economic input into a small community. With the closure of the post offices it is gone.

Finally I want to say that if one looks at the statistics we find that in this country since 1984 there have been 1,239 post offices closed. One hundred and seventy-four of those have been in the province of Saskatchewan, roughly 15 per cent for a province that has around 4 per cent of the population of Canada.

If we add the number of post offices closed and those under review, there are now 1,595 closed or under review across this country. Two hundred and thirty-one of those are in my province of Saskatchewan, again a much greater share than we should have in accordance with our proportion of the population in Canada.

I cannot agree to support this bill. It is a bad bill. The post office has failed miserably in providing a decent and reliable service to the people of this country.

The whole objective of the post office is to run at a profit. It is the wrong priority, the wrong objective. First and foremost the post office should be a service to all people in this country, regardless of whether we come from a large city, a small town, a farm or a fishing village in Newfoundland, it must be a service to the people of this country, provided at the same cost for every citizen of Canada. That is the whole philosophy behind the post office and behind a postal stamp.

With those words I want to encourage the House to hoist and defeat this bill. It is not good for Canada. Hopefully the Conservative Party will join us in making sure this bill is done away with. It is a bad bill for the country.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the member for Yorkton—Melville for his remarks here today. Quite frankly, I have not heard him talk so passionately about a federal presence. I am not saying he has not done so before, but this is something I share his views on, from the flag to the Canada word mark, and all the points he made about how the government has dismantled these symbols. I cannot argue with that.

My concern is that this approach to privatization or this approach to earnings per quarter versus public service is absolutely wrong. I am concerned that it is moving beyond things like Air Canada, VIA Rail and the post office into almost every department in this government.

I think specifically of the direction our constitutional debate is taking, where we are starting to take the federal presence out of some of our other areas of responsibility like tourism and housing. We are pushing it away, retreating from national governments. One of the things that has galvanized the will of this country over many, many years is the fact that we have had a national postal service and an airline service, the fact that it was not just Tourism Ontario or Tourism B.C., it was Tourism Canada, soon to be abolished or pushed off again to the provinces.

My question is does the member not see that this dismantling of national services, national departments, is really going to mean that those regions of our country, smaller provinces or smaller regions, rural Canada, et cetera, are going to be the big losers in this government's thrust?

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, it really tears the country apart. We have had a dismantling of several national institutions: Canada Post, VIA Rail, the railway across this country, the down-scaling of CBC, other national institutions as well, and the privatization of Air Canada. All of these things have led to the dismantling of this country and to the alienation of Canadians from a central government, from the country of Canada itself. This really concerns me.

I mentioned today a whole series of post offices in my riding of Yorkton—Melville. The same is true of the abandonment of railways, the CNR and the CPR, which served all kinds of small towns. There used to be a connection there of the country east and west and that is disappearing very rapidly. It also ties into the trade deal where the east-west links are no longer as relevant, where again it is north and south. I am afraid the same thing will be happening with the signing of the NAFTA agreement, the free trade agreement with Mexico in terms of giving up a lot of of our sovereignty.

What we are seeing here is less of Canada pulling together. We seem to have more of a feeling in this country that we should have 10 little fiefdoms or kingdoms of provinces doing more and more things by themselves.

The point I make, and maybe people in the bigger cities have not thought of this before, but often the post office—and my friend from Nova Scotia knows because he has small towns in his riding—is the only building in town with the Canadian flag. The older people in particular are really proud of the presence of that flag. Mr. Speaker, on your right you have a Canadian flag. I was here on the day about 15 years ago when we decided to put the flag in the House of Commons. When you go to Dubuc and Springside and all those little towns in my riding, that flag is gone. What is left? You have a few garages, a cafe, a few stores, a service station, a Saskatchewan government insurance office and a school that flies the Saskatchewan flag, but where is the Canadian flag? It is gone.

The other thing I said that I want to repeat is that for these small towns and communities, particularly on a Saturday morning, the post office is a centre of activity. Farmers and villagers come in and meet their friends, neighbours and family. Often, as a member of Parliament, not just in campaigns but other times as well, when I want to meet people and get a sounding and a feeling for the community, I go on a Saturday morning or any other morning of the week and stand in front of the local post office and meet the people. It is amazing how in a couple of hours you can meet just dozens and dozens if not hundreds of people. It is an activity they look forward to.

My father and mother live in the small town of Wynyard, Saskatchewan with a population of about 2,700. My father is now just a bit over 80 years old and he still enjoys going down every single day to the post office. That is where he meets most of his friends, gets most of the news, exchanges points of view and keeps in touch. It is an activity and a thing to do. It is like a community centre where people can meet. That is gone. It is gone and if this government gets its way it will be gone and gone, not just for 1,200 or 1,400 communities I have mentioned in this country, in fact there are 1,239 that have had their post offices closed since 1984, but it will be gone for the other hundreds of rural communities that are still hanging on in a very fragile way to the post office that is serving them.

• (1240)

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I was chairman of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs during the period of time that we conducted about a six–month study into pretty well all the facets of Canada Post. We wrestled with a great number of the issues which have been raised during this debate. We heard from delegations from places like Dubuc, Saskatchewan, from corporate competitors of Canada Post, from labour people, from virtually anyone who has anything to do with Canada Post. We issued a series of recommendations as a result of that.

Having gone through that whole process, I can see through the rhetoric of a lot of what has been said in this House, particularly by the last two speakers. There is a lot of rhetoric surrounding the culture and the mythology of Canada Post. There are the absolute statements which are made in this House that service has been diminished, that there are fewer points of service for individual Canadians to access the postal service.

I would like to put on the record that in fact there are more points of service because of the move to retail postal outlets from corporate outlets than there were prior to that program starting. There are actually more places today than before where Canadians can access postal service, just as there are more addresses now being serviced by Canada Post in total. The level of service has actually gone up. Statistically we can prove that.

As far as the rural post office fulfilling a role as a community drop–in centre, I am not sure that as a Canadian taxpayer that is necessarily how I want my tax dollars spent, providing a community drop–in centre in x number of thousands of communities across this country. I thought we were talking about postal service, delivering letters, the cost and efficiency of dispatching our mail. That is what Canada Post is supposed to do, not provide drop–in centres.

In terms of the federal presence, I will grant members opposite that the diminution of the federal post office presence in small communities does, in fact, remove some of the national elements, the national fabric, the national presence. There is some validity to that argument and I will accept that. However, I am not sure at what price that needs to be maintained. I am not sure that the gross inefficiencies of a lot of rural post offices are really worth making the whole system less efficient simply to have a Canadian flag in that community. Maybe there are better ways we can do it, more effective ways.

My feeling is if we have to force nationalism, if the Government of Canada has to go into Dubuc, Saskatchewan to put up a Canadian flag, and if there will not be a Canadian flag flying in that community unless Ottawa goes and does it, then our country is in a lot worse trouble than maybe a lot of us even think.

I would like to have the member's thoughts on that.

Mr. Nystrom: I suppose our country is in a fair amount of trouble. It is going through a real crisis right now in terms of unity.

The point that I made is it is not just the flag. The post office is the only federal institution, the only federal presence in a small community, and once that is gone it is gone. I think that is a point we should take into consideration.

In terms of efficiency, a lot of these post offices are efficient. Some are in very small hamlets and very, very small villages where they have to be subsidized. Again, should people be penalized because they live in a small village or a small hamlet or on a farm that is serviced by a small village or a small hamlet? I do not think they should be penalized. I think they should be subsidized to get the same kind of service people are getting in the rest of the country.

That being said, a lot of these post offices are efficient, are making money, are in larger communities, have modern facilities and are being run in a very competent way. In my own riding, for example, as I said already, the town of Kamsack with over 3,000 people plus in a large rural community, has many, many, many hundreds of patrons. It is an operation that is efficient or should be efficient because the economy of scale is there. There is no reason to close that. The people of the town want that particular post office. The same is true of many other communities in my riding and right across the country, communities that are large enough to have efficient operations that are a service to the community.

In terms of the member from across the way from Ontario, when he talks about the drop-in centre or the community centre aspect of the post office, if he understood rural Canada he would realize how important that is, a place where people can come together on a Saturday morning or come together every day and meet their neighbours and converse and compare notes and just be part of the community.

It is a bit different in a large urban centre. There is a different psychology altogether. One of the problems of this country is we do not realize what the popular culture is in terms of its differences from one part of the country to the other. The post office is a very near and dear thing to the people of rural Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Comments are now terminated. Under Standing Order 74, the 39 minutes of debate are now concluded, and we are going to commence 10 minute maximum speeches.

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to offer some comments on this particular bill and to respond to some of the comments that have been made earlier as well. Bill C-73 will enable Canada Post Corporation to create an employee share ownership plan for all of its 57,000 employees.

This legislation will allow the Crown corporation to do several things. It will allow it to continue to improve its service to the people of Canada and to do so at reasonable and competitive rates.

Second, it puts its present and future employees on an even footing with the employees of other enterprises in the communications and distribution industry, particularly those of competitors who offer employees a piece of the action as a way of building an esprit de corps and thereby providing the incentive for increasing profitability.

Third, hopefully this will help set the stage for improved employee-management relations and thereby reduce the likelihood of disruptions in the postal service. We all find it very frustrating when some major important services like the postal service are disrupted by labour-management disputes.

All members of the House and indeed all Canadians are aware that there have been in the past labour-management conflicts at Canada Post. Despite many years and millions of dollars spent in contract negotiations with its union leadership, Canadians are still from time to time the unfortunate victims of these kinds of strikes.

Those disruptions have not only caused untold hardship to individual Canadians, they have also meant a dramatic loss of business to Canada Post. What is worse is a lot of that business does not come back to Canada Post once the strike is over. A lot of it stays with Canada Post competitors.

That means that even after the corporation weathers a strike, it comes back with a smaller share of the market. A smaller share of the market means that smaller profits or even a loss, as will be recorded by Canada Post for the year just completed, will occur and that occurred largely as a result of the strike last fall.

If Canada Post does not make a profit it cannot employ as many people, it cannot continue to expand into new areas, and sadly, it cannot provide the high level of service which Canadians have the right to expect. It becomes a vicious circle.

We believe this legislation will put an end to that vicious circle from the start. Our ultimate goal is to get away from the outdated notion that Canada Post exists only as a battleground for the classic labour–management struggle for philosophical and operational control. Unfortunately some people are still locked into that mindset and that is not particularly constructive for society.

Most of our major competitors around the world are getting away from that kind of a mindset. Canada Post is in the business to deliver the mail and to do so on a profitable basis. Labour disruptions jeopardize that business both nationally and in world-wide markets. Unlike manufacturers, service industries like Canada Post cannot build up big inventories and continue selling during a labour dispute.

Let me hasten to add that employee share ownership does not mean doing away with unions or that people are going to work for half their wages. Far from it. We are going to continue to have strong unions at Canada Post. Canada Post will continue to offer competitive wages to all of its employees. The corporation successfully negotiated fair and generous settlements with five of its unions in the year preceding the strike and had difficulty with only one, CUPE, which resulted in disruptions in postal service.

• (1250)

I move:

That the House continue to sit through lunch for the purpose of continuing consideration of Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation.

I know there are many members very interested in speaking on this motion.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, in the 10 minutes I have under the rules I am happy to speak on Bill C–73. I must say one could use a lot more than 10 minutes when you start talking about the postal corporation and especially from my perspective. I have been a member of this august Chamber while we still had a postal service in a department of government. It has gone from a department of government in which members did have a little input, to say the least, in postal service to their constituents.

Then the great panacea came and we took it out of a department and made it a postal corporation, a Crown corporation. That was going to be a new day for labour relations, a new day for service to Canadians and a new day for postal service in Canada.

I was here in the Chamber when those bills by the then Liberal government were debated and I was in the opposition. I can even remember who the critic was for the Official Opposition of the day who sometimes sits in the chair in which Your Honour sits. There was a general agreement, because there had been dissatisfaction with postal service as a department of government, that perhaps a postal corporation, a Crown corporation, would remedy many of the complaints people had.

We now have the postal corporation and Bill C–73, following the remarks of a lot of members who have spoken before me, seems to be another extension of a Crown corporation to now giving shares to employees and perhaps beginning and will complete the road to privatization of a post office.

Having not seen the improvement in postal service from a department to a postal corporation, I have very real apprehension if we are going down the slippery slope, as we say in the jargon, of the privatization of a postal service in this country. This country will not be able to provide the service to Canadians from coast to coast if we get in that line.

Before I continue I want to thank my colleague from Nova Scotia, the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, for having the courtesy of letting me take the floor before he took the floor because we all know we have a certain rotation here. I had been here a little earlier and I was getting a little hungry for lunch but he is younger than I am and he can wait for lunch if he has not already eaten. I do appreciate that courtesy to say these few remarks.

I am sorry the member for Halton—Peel has left. He was the chairman of the committee for consumer and corporate affairs. He was a very active chairman. He was a very active columnist before he came to Parliament on many issues Parliament has spoken about. I say philosophically, in a general way at this stage in the debate, the question he put to the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville had some merit in that perhaps factually there were more points of service.

The answer of the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville to that question illustrates in graphic degree the dichotomy that you have in a bill dealing with postal services between the rural and the urban member. Quite frankly, the postal corporation and the whole background of the postal corporation and its service or problems of service to the Canadian people really illustrate the differences between a bureaucratic approach to service and a departmental approach through which you can help service the people you are supposed to represent.

Ten minutes go very quickly and I want to get into basically this whole business of post office closures. There are perhaps more points covered. In a lot of the new areas of the country, with suburbia, I do believe with all the concern that we have with closure of post offices that some of the retail outlets, because of the difference in hours some cases, even in my own riding, are providing a better service than was provided when the post office was closed.

The real problem in this whole issue is it is one thing to put a retail outlet into a growing area of Canada and a new area of Canada and a suburban area of Canada where there are lots of people and the retail outlet can be put in a shopping centre in which there is no history of a previous post office. This is the total difference between retail outlets, which in many cases provide a very good service to the people they are supposed to serve. That is totally different than the present postal corporation policy of post office closures.

It has a policy that when a postmaster or postmistress retires or there is a vacancy because of death or sickness, the operation of that individual post office is reviewed. What has happened is that the so-called review of the post office really becomes the beginning of a closure of that post office in established areas, towns, villages, in which they have had post offices for years and eons.

I agree completely with other members who have spoken here today, especially with the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville who spoke in very glowing terms about the very real psychological function, let alone the service function.

My hon. friend from Macleod is a very fine member from a rural area. I have been in Macleod. His speech was written by the postal corporation. It was perhaps an interesting contribution to debate. In his heart of hearts I would be very surprised if he has not run into the same problems that I have run into, that the hon. member from Peterborough has run into, in trying to intercede with the postal corporation about the closure of a local post office that has had a history in a community and is the only federal presence in that community.

It is a staged procedure by these PR people who go out doing their job. Admittedly they are doing their job. They have their instructions to have local hearings, talk to the people. Mabou, which is in the riding of the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, is one of the only post offices that I have heard about in all the closures in Canada which in effect the people have on their own initiative taken over from the postal people, as I understand it, and are going to run a post office that was set for closure.

That is the situation of having the rhetoric that we have an input into post office closures as members of Parliament. The reality unfortunately reminds us of Mr. Trudeau's admonition about members being nobodies. You can argue whether he meant in the House or 50 yards from the House. That is an interesting debate. In terms of post office closures, as far as I know from my experience and the experience of most other members here, once a post office is set for closure, even if it has been providing service for years, that post office has been closed and members do not have an input.

The point is that there has to be a balance. I am not hidebound to the realities of growing areas and retail outlets. As I said earlier, some of that has provided a very necessary service. I have no hesitation in voting for the amendment to put this bill off to another day or voting against the bill which talks about corporate shares and dividends and is more worried about the corporate world than about the people world.

• (1300)

I sat in this House during the debate on the postal corporation bill. The public has great reservations about what the devil members do and how well we do it, how poorly we do it or how we do ourselves good and bad. The horrible thing is, and there is not a member who can deny this, in terms of one of the basic services a government is supposed to give to its people, a postal service, members are basically nobodies because we created this postal corporation and set it up on a pedestal.

You can write letters to the minister responsible for the postal corporation and you will get your official answer from his assistant and they will look into it. You may get a letter from someone in the postal corporation but onward the wheels turn and pretty soon the doors close and another post office is terminated. All the psychological negatives that have been mentioned here before about keeping a little presence of this country, let alone having a little purpose in being a member, have been eroded and that has been very unhealthy.

I cannot get on to all the things I would like to say, but I will have another chance after we get rid of this motion for second reading. I was here also when a fellow called Mr. Kiearns was the first Minister of Communications in 1966. He started a little policy of rationalization of existing post offices in the then postal department.

Why is the government in a lot of trouble today across the country? Some months ago I looked it up and Mr. Kiearns rationalized a total of 26 post offices in Canada from coast to coast. One was in my riding at the time. There was hue and cry from coast to coast about what he was doing to these social centres.

Now, as my friend from Yorkton—Melville says, and I think the figures are even more, we have already closed over 1,300 to 1,400 post offices. Is it any wonder that this government is in a rather poor state in the polls?. Along with many other things, without repeating them all, I suggest that in terms of service to the constituents, this whole post office closure policy has been about equal to several other misguided policies of this government which justify the low state of the polls. Unless this somnolent caucus of the government wakes up and tries to make an input on post office closures there will not be any dramatic change in the polls, nor should there be.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate and to remind the House that what we are debating is not second reading of Bill C-73 but the amendment put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, that the further debate on this bill be considered six months hence; in other words, that this bill be withdrawn by the government.

There is a very good reason for putting forward that amendment. At this point in its mandate, a six month hoist, as this motion is often called, perhaps if this government had the good sense to call an election there would be a Liberal government in place to put forward legislation to amend the Canada Post Corporation which would make more sense and would be more contemporary than this little bill which the government put forward on April 30 for our consideration.

When all of the problems and all of the concerns are considered that Canadians across this country have expressed to members in this House about the bad service, the bad employee relations, the closure of rural post offices and the litany of complaints which we have heard over the last seven or eight years concerning Canada Post, the government seems to be on some other planet when it puts forward this legislation which it purports will resolve all those ills.

The minister in charge of Canada Post on May 14, when he spoke at second reading of this bill, argued that the legislation would allow the Crown corporation to do several things. Let me cite from his speech.

> One, it will build a stronger partnership between management and employees, thereby resulting in more harmonious labour relations in Canada's postal system.
>
> Two, more harmonious labour relations will better position the corporation as it invests in new technologies and expertise it needs to expand in new areas of business activity at home and abroad.
>
> Three, it will put its present and future employees on an even footing with the employees of other enterprises in the communications and distribution industry—
>
> Four, it will continue to improve its service to the people of Canada and will do so with reasonable competitive rates.

Everybody knows about the desperate state of employee-management relations at Canada Post. I wonder about the paradox of having introduced this legislation, which is strongly opposed by the two major unions that deal with Canada Post; the Union of Postal Employees, which is opposed to this legislation—and some of its representatives have even spoken to me about it in my constituency—and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers.

If this legislation is supposed to improve labour–management relations and lead to a more harmonious working environment in Canada Post, you would think that this government would have sought, through Canada Post, to negotiate the kind of share savings plan which it has proposed as a centrepiece of this bill.

What it is trying to do in typical Tory fashion is impose this share savings plan on the workers of Canada Post, a share savings plan which is very faulty to begin with, a small concession to the workers. It is a faulty small concession because, as other members who have spoken earlier have said, it provides non–voting shares. A small fraction of the dividends Canada Post can generate through profits that it has accumulated, very often by cutting service across the country and laying off its workers, would be returned to the employees.

To offer that to the employees who are being laid off at Canada Post or to those communities which are losing their rural post offices and which are being provided with very inferior substitutes is a bit like offering a condemned man one last meal. The meal may be tasty but when he considers his future prospects he loses his appetite for the meal.

That is essentially what is happening with this bill. It is a very paltry and insignificant contribution or attempt by this government to deal with the myriad of problems that Canada Post has perpetrated on Canadians through its reckless attempts to become profitable at the expense of service to many parts of Canada, particularly the rural parts of Canada where I live and where many other members of this House also live.

As well, it has generated the climate of labour–management relations which is legendary in the degree to which it is acrimonious and poisonous and which is characterized by endless grievances. I really do not see that this legislation is actually going to change very much. It really needs to improve the kind of treatment it gives to its employees.

I would like to cite an example of that kind of management style which is so counterproductive. For example, in the community of St. Peters in my constituency, very recently a woman who had been working as a part–time employee with the post office was led to believe she was going to lose her job. Canada Post wanted to change her job classification to one that is bilingual even though she was a unilingual employee.

The community is overwhelmingly unilingual. She was told that she would not be able to continue in her job. This caused a great consternation among all of the community members who supported the service she was providing to the community and they wanted to keep her there. Although Canada Post led her to believe for weeks that she was going to lose her job, it finally had to recant and keep her in the job, after she had gone through all of the anxiety of thinking she was losing her job.

• (1310)

The whole community had to rise up and defend this person's job record and argue for keeping her in that position. That kind of case shows that Canada Post has certainly a long way to go in terms of developing its relations with its workers. It is instances like this and others that have poisoned the relationships among workers in Canada Post.

The rumours are right across Canada of the minister's intentions and the application of the minister's intentions to privatize Canada Post.

I realize I only have one minute left. I hope I will be back later on when we consider second reading of Bill C–73 if we fail to do what we should do in this House which is to reject further consideration of this bill.

I would like to speak to this issue of privatization and the effect that it will have on rural communities. I also want to relate the experiences of communities such as Mabou, which my hon. friend from Annapolis Valley—Hants mentioned earlier. Last year, this community valiantly attempted to maintain postal services after a vigorous battle with Canada Post. It wanted to close down and terminate Mabou's rural post offices. Last night the community of Judique was faced with an ultimatum from Canada Post to close its rural post office. The residents of Judique are strongly opposed to this decision but they realize that dealing with this corporation is like dealing with a steamroller in that it does not listen. All Canada Post wants to do is to privatize at all costs.

I hope to get back up again on this important issue.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to stand in the House today and address this particular matter.

As many people will know, this bill seeks to make shares of the Canada Post Corporation available to its employees. One of the actions of government that I find difficult to accept is the closure that has been imposed on this particular debate on a fundamental question; namely, whether this particular corporation in a sense is going to be privatized.

I find that alarming and unfortunate because we are talking about the future of several thousands of Canadians in a climate of recession and a climate in which people are really concerned about their futures and their jobs. I want it noted that this government has done this on several occasions. Some people say it always does it whenever it is dealing with a delicate issue and particularly when it thinks it is going to get into difficulty.

One of my colleagues has described this particular move by government as one which seeks to place another nail in the privatization coffin of Canada Post. I want to make it perfectly clear that I am not, in principle, opposed to privatization of certain sectors. I think we have to examine under what conditions this might take place.

For those who are enthralled with this whole notion of privatization, I urge you to go out in front of the House of Commons today and talk to the employees of Air Canada and ask them a number of questions. Ask them what they think of privatization, because they have been privatized. Ask them how many people they have lost since they were privatized. Ask them how many more employees will lose their jobs in the very near future. There are alarming comments that have been made with respect to losses of jobs that are going to affect many, many men and women. They are going to be announced very, very shortly. I hope that is just a rumour and an unfounded one, but I am extremely suspicious.

While you are out there in front of the House of Commons where there are roughly 400 people from Air Canada who are demonstrating, ask them how successful they have been in having a level playing field in the private sector and how difficult it has been to try to get access to the Japanese market.

The reason for my bringing those to the attention of my colleagues is that a lot of people look at privatization as some sort of a panacea, that all of a sudden all of the problems that existed are going to be gone. This is an example of privatization and it is not all rosy. If you were to go to the employees today and ask them what they think about it, you would be extremely surprised and certainly there is real concern out there, a legitimate concern.

I want to point out, as have a number of my colleagues, that this bill is an extremely general one. Why is there no value in shares? Why is there no identification of the number of shares? Why do we not talk about the net worth of the corporation? Why is there no definition of an employee who will be able to buy those shares? Why is the amount of shares individual employees would be able to purchase not announced?

Once again the government has left to regulation by cabinet and Treasury Board the powers to establish the terms of the share offering. Why cabinet? Why Treasury Board?

As I mentioned, the bill does not provide specifics on share offering. The bill does not place value on assets, on the value of shares. The bill even permits shares to be given away. The first reaction that one has is to whom would they be given away? It might be very attractive for some high-placed friends of the government in executive positions in the corporation. I would hope that would never come to be but certainly some people suspect that.

The other element that needs to be noticed is that the shares are non-voting shares. If they are non-voting shares then you cannot take part in the decision making and you cannot be on the board. How useful is that?

The bill does not protect employees. Those employees have not had a contract for three years. It has gone through mediation, it has gone through all kinds of hoops and hurdles and still today—and my colleague raised it the day before yesterday—we do not have an agreement for our postal employees. I find that shocking. I find that most unfortunate.

How would this bill help that kind of situation? I should point out that there has been no effective communication or consultation with the employees with respect to that—none whatsoever.

It does not address the basic essential question, which is service to Canadians. It is important to make profits. It is important to make money if you can. It is also important to respond to the needs of Canadians in a number of sectors, certainly in this sector.

People talk about making the corporation a more efficient one, one which is responsive to the needs of Canadians. Let me give you a few examples of how this is going about right now and how it has impacted upon my riding.

There have been a number of closures of postal outlets. For example, the Marion Pharmacy in August of 1989, a full postal outlet in the Norwood area, closed despite numerous letters and petitions from local residents. Canada Post had offered the proprietors at that time some postal services but never followed through. This is not responsive to the needs of Canadians.

Metro Drugs on Autumnwood Drive closed in the fall of 1990. I am told that the business closed this spring. This is not good for business.

There are other examples. McCullough Drugs (Tache and Marion) closed within the last two years, as did the Drake pharmacy outlet which closed in 1991 despite thousands of petitioners and concerned residents, including a seniors' home on Elizabeth Road, very close to that facility.

We have to realize that the closing of those outlets and the changing of the services in those outlets affect all residents of the area, particularly those who are seniors and those who may have a physical or other disability limiting their ability to get about.

How will the offering of shares to employees help these people who until recently were able to use those facilities I have mentioned? It will not. It simply will not, not one little bit. How will this bill address the concerns of millions of rural Canadians whose post offices have been closed?

That is a serious issue. It is a serious concern for those smaller, more isolated communities. It is one that it will do nothing about. I suspect it will exacerbate it.

I have not even mentioned supermailboxes. We have not talked about those recently. I am sure that my colleagues would like to be reminded that they are still not very popular. I get stories, I get calls from residents still. Very often older people find it difficult because if placed on the wrong side of the street it can be extremely slippery. We have adverse weather conditions in a number of areas in Canada, such as Winnipeg. They are still extremely angry. They do not see this as an improvement. On the contrary, they feel as if they have not been treated fairly and have not been consulted.

• (1320)

I am going to tell you a little incident about a lady who called my office. She sent a watch to Calgary in an envelope that was properly addressed and that had a return address on it. It had the whole works. Unknown to her, though, was that the company was no longer operating. What happened since then is that the post office did not return the envelope. They have been unable to locate it. What is worse is that they are unwilling to compensate her for the lost item. We shall continue to pursue that. We are not going to give up.

[Translation]

As I just said, this bill is not at all specific; it is very vague. We do not know exactly what it is talking about. In fact, it overlooks basic issues affecting services to Canadians. It provides no protection at all for employees. Where is the bill going with all that? Canada Post wants to privatize, but why? What will it achieve with all that? How could it improve the services to Canadians? Will people in small and remote communities benefit from such a measure? Will this bill give anything more to those in my riding whose post offices have been closed and services altered drastically? Will those who are older or disabled have to go from one place to another? Will they benefit from such a bill? Absolutely not. I know that privatization can be good in some cases but very harmful in others; it can be most unfortunate. Ask the Air Canada employees who are in front of the House of Commons today how many jobs have been lost since Air Canada was privatized. How many jobs will still be lost? These questions should also be raised here and answered. Also consider all the difficulties they had in getting access to the private sector so that they could have healthy competition with the other sectors that interest them.

I conclude by saying that I absolutely cannot support such a bill, because I do not believe that we are giving priority to the Canadians who receive services from that corporation.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C-73 today, a bill to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

I have heard many speakers today talk about the act itself and make reference and comment on Canada Post. The one thing I have not heard either from the minister or from the government is really the basic tenet of the Canada Post Corporation Act.

The act clearly states that what we should be doing is providing service to Canadians. This service is really paramount in this country. Each time I hear a comment it concerns how we can save money, generate profits and make this an efficient business.

I find that in each move that has been made by the government over the last several years, we see the price of postage stamps rising dramatically and we see the loss on the Canada Post side rising dramatically. As a matter of fact, this year there is rumour of a projected loss of $130 million. There seems to be a loss of efficiency and yet the price of those stamps keeps soaring up by hundreds of millions of dollars to Canadian consumers.

Now today we face a change in the act which would bring in a change in the legislation which would provide or allow Canada Post to sell 10 per cent of its ownership to employees through a sharing proposition.

The minister in charge of Canada Post stated that the plan is a common sense next step to ensure that improvement continues. I fail to see where there has been any improvement at all. There is an increased cost in postage, much dissension about loss of service and an increase in losses in that company. Where are those improvements that the minister suggests are continuing?

Canada Post claims it would improve customer service. In my mind it is making a proposition to employees who are saying they do not want to buy those shares. How does that improve customer service and reliability? How will it improve the financial sufficiency of Canada Post?

I have some real problems with why the government has stated that there will be improvements. As a matter of fact, I wonder why the government put this on the table at all because I cannot see how any group is satisfied. This is outside of the fact that it seems to be the first step toward the privatization of Canada Post. This is certainly taking it in a direction that the act would not allow it to go. I guess this is a major concern that is being stated by all of my colleagues.

The government claims are quite difficult to follow through as we talk about it, but despite the claims noted, a closer review of the legislation reveals there are some major problems. The shares are to be offered to employees yet there is no definition of an employee in this. Is it full-time employees who are being laid off by the thousands? Is it part-time employees who are losing their jobs? Is it casual employees? Can this be used as a bonus to supervisors? I am not certain but I have my concerns.

The government wants employees to feel that they are more a part of the corporation and yet shares for employees are to be non-voting shares. The only shares retained by the government are going to be the voting shares. Any shares that are turned over to the employees will give the employees no say. Therefore you are not involving the employees in the operation of the corporation. You are asking them to take money out of their pockets to buy something for which they have no power to use with any votes in the future.

The bill suggests the selling of 10 per cent of Canada Post Corporation. What exactly is 10 per cent made up of? There is no value or indication of the make-up of the corporation, no description of what the corporate assets are and therefore there is no idea of what that 10 per cent represents.

Canada Post continues to claim there are improved services and financial self-sufficiency. However, I continually receive letters and complaints from Canadians across Canada about Canada Post closures, conversions or rationalization plans. These Canadians do not see the so-called improvements as better, but rather they see it as a dismantling of a national institution.

The government, referring to the share offering, maintains that a price for these shares will be established in the future. However, the bill itself indicates that shares may be offered for consideration or for no consideration. Therefore, shares could be given away. The bill permits the giving away of shares. Could this then be a move to corporate bonuses in Canada Post? We see the huge, huge salaries that are being paid at the present time. Are we then starting to look at giving some of the corporation to those executives within Canada Post?

• (1330)

How are issues such as the value and the number of shares and assets to be determined? Should these important matters be dealt with by the Governor in Council or cabinet? No, they should not be dealt with there. They should be dealt with here in the House of Commons. The Canadian people have the right to know how the government will decide what the value of the shares are, what the corporate value is and if people are being treated in some reasonable way. Do not give it to the minister and Treasury Board to make those decisions.

In addition, Bill C–73 would permit bylaws of Canada Post Corporation to be inconsistent with any provision of the bill. The government would have Canadians believe that it intends to improve situations at Canada Post because of Bill C–73, yet the bill does not adequately address the issues. Authority would be vested with the board and cabinet to be inconsistent with the act itself.

The government realizes that there are very serious and complicated issues in dispute at Canada Post Corporation. CUPW management has been unable to achieve a contract for the last three years. For three years there has been negotiation, mediation, conciliation, arbitration and back to work legislation. There is still no settlement.

Now the government wants to do something to make the employees feel more a part of the corporation itself and less a part of working together. The answer they have is Bill C–73. This bill will not solve the problem. It does nothing to improve employee–employer relations. In fact, the bill is opposed by the postal workers.

How can the government state that there will be improved co–operation when there is no co–operation of any kind put forward in this bill? How does Bill C–73 address the concerns of Canadians on Canada Post? Will Bill C–73 reopen the post office that was closed in the village of Erieau in my riding? Will it reopen post offices in many small communities in P.E.I., Nova Scotia, Quebec, in the west and across this country? We have seen some 1,200 post offices axed in the last six years. This bill will do nothing to help that situation.

Will Bill C–73 compel retail postal outlets to provide the same service for the price that Canada Post offices provide? Certainly not. Will Bill C–73 save the postal identities of Winona, Fruitland, Vineland, which they will wipe out according to the bill? No.

I see my time has run out and I hope I will have the opportunity to speak to this later. However, my concern is that this bill creates more animosity, more tension and more problems in Canada. It certainly does nothing to enhance or improve our service to Canadians.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the motion on the six–month hoist and to oppose Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

There is not a single subject that is more akin to waving a red flag in front of a bull than a bill that has to do with Canada Post Corporation coming before members of Parliament who have any memory of Canadian history regarding Canadian postal services. I cannot think of a greater horror story or a worse example than this institution. Back in the 1960s and 1970s, it had a terrible labour relations record, but at least it delivered the mail on time.

It was turned into a Crown corporation in the early 1980s and at that time, under the presidency of Michael Warren and under its new mandate, it managed to bring back mail services from a period in which it took over two weeks to get across this country back down to a position of only two or three days. It improved some services. It reduced the labour relation grievances within the post office from over 100,000 down to virtually nil. It gave postal workers who for years had been out on strike, one after another because of terrible labour relations in the old Canada Post system, some feeling of pride.

In 1984, with the election of this government, the whole clock was turned back again. The only thing worse than having a service which is in disarray is having a service that having been in disarray is drastically improved and then turned back and thrown on the scrap heap again.

It is no wonder that Canadians from coast to coast, especially those in rural communities who have been specifically victimized by this corporation, are up in arms and have absolutely no faith in the credibility of this government, especially when it comes to delivering basic services like the mail.

This government is swallowing some outdated concept from mini-WAC, old Bill Bennett in British Columbia who privatized the B.C. Resources Investment Corporation and saw shares go from $6 almost down to zero in his attempt at privatization. It was the same kind of policy that the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs in that government espoused when he was Prime Minister for a short period of nine months. He wanted to do it to Petro-Canada and the people turfed him out, especially the people in British Columbia who could remember what the Socreds did to their resource corporation and turned an effective corporation into a scrap heap that was worthless.

How they think they can adopt that same kind of policy and that somehow it is going to improve morale among postal workers and do anything to turn around the attitudes of Canadians to have a more positive outlook on their postal services really boggles the mind. It is beyond imagination.

When the Crown corporation was first created in 1981-82, my colleague for Kootenay East was the postal critic for our party. I was postal critic for the next two or three years following that. Michael Warren had a mandate which he pursued very effectively. He met on a regular basis, at least two and sometimes three or four times a year, with postal critics from all caucuses in the House. If you had a problem you had an answer back in writing directly from Mr. Warren, often within 24 or 48 hours. Attention was paid to the problems that were raised, specific local problems as well as national problems. The attitude totally changed in the work force.

If the government really wants to do something about improving labour relations, one of things it ought to do is get a collective agreement, an honest collective agreement, because it is now two or three years that postal workers have not had one, between the employees of Canada Post and the corporation.

One of the other things it could do is restore what we had when the corporation was first set up when there were two representatives of labour, not necessarily directly from postal employees but on the board of that Crown corporation, so they had some direct or indirect input into the corporation. Those directors were kept on when the government changed to the Tories. Slowly but surely they were frozen out. Resignations were virtually forced upon them.

• (1340)

Once again the bridge that connected the employees to the management of that corporation and gave them some feeling of participation in it was dissolved.

Some of us in this place have had some experience working within Crown corporations that have had employee representatives sitting on boards. You do not need ownership for that to be effective. You need a partnership in which the employees of the corporation believe that their opinions on non-labour relations matters—let us not confuse it with a bargaining relationship—are listened to, from the implementation of new technology, funnelling through engineers' reports to see how they actually work on the floor of an industry, to delivering a product. In a myriad of ways you can begin to develop some meaningful relationships between the ideas employees have and the day to day operations of that corporation.

Giving 10 per cent ownership of non-voting shares is not going to accomplish a damn thing. It means nothing. It is seen as cosmetic by the employees. It is certainly seen as cosmetic by any one who has had any past experience with that kind of marginalized employee participation and ownership because it is not participation. They are non-voting shares.

How can the government think for a moment that simply because 10 per cent of its shares belong to some of the employees who have no voice it is going to make a difference in attitude among 99 per cent of the corporation's employees? They have no vested interest even from a straight economic point of view in what is going on in the corporation.

At the same time the corporation goes out and hires scabs, provokes violence on the picket lines. I use the term provokes violence not lets it happen, advisedly, having seen it first hand on a number of occasions over the last couple of years. How it thinks that is going to turn attitudes around I do not know.

A lot needs to be done with the Canada Post Corporation. How the government thinks it can get away with closing down our rural Canada outlets, wiping out rural post office box delivery and replacing it with group boxes and the whole host of measures that it has taken to alienate the Canadian people, the consumers, from the one corporation they ought to be able to count on to deliver a decent service is beyond me and I think beyond any rational Canadian. It is a cosmetic performance.

I support the motion for the hoist. This is bad law. It will accomplish nothing. It will accomplish less than nothing. It will move us even further backwards than we are today.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on Bill C-73, which is so important because it concerns the privatization of a Crown corporation that provides a vital service to Canadians: our postal service.

The government claims this bill would enable employees to acquire 10 per cent—one wonders 10 per cent of what— of Canada Post's net assets. How would this be done? What are the details? That information is not available, and that is why I agree wholeheartedly with the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, who moved for a six months' hoist to give the government and the minister responsible for Canada Post a chance to do their homework and come back with a detailed piece of legislation and a business plan. When a company decides to go to the public, to go to the stock market to sell shares, it goes with a business plan and written instructions indicating which shares will be voting, which non-voting, and so forth. There is nothing in this bill, Mr. Speaker.

I wonder, considering the opinion Canadians have of Canada Post and the misadventures that have befallen our postal services over the years, who would be prepared to invest in this kind of business, even as an employee of Canada Post. I think we should be realistic. We are a little—I don't want to use the words, but suspicious says it more or less. Why is the government taking this approach? We are told it wants to give employees a chance to participate in the corporation, but there are no details.

The government claims that when employees realize they can have a 10 per cent interest in the corporation, they will become more responsible and that this will make for peaceful labour-management relations within the corporation. As you know, Canada Post did have a quiet time for several years after it was incorporated, because it had been given a clear and specific mandate, consisting of three components.

The three components included providing a better service for Canadians as the first objective; second, better labour management relations; and third, they had to stop asking the government for money because the government was too busy dealing with the deficit. During the first few years, until 1984-85, objectives were met satisfactorily. In fact, from the time the corporation was created and up to 1986, if I am not mistaken, there were no strikes.

However, the strikes started again as soon as the Conservative government tabled its management plan, which included setting up supermailboxes in urban areas. Gradually, home delivery, something most Canadians were used to, was phased out. New homes would not have home delivery.

That is what happened, and I remember, because I was the critic at the time. I went across the country. I went to British Columbia and to the east, and some untenable situations had been created. On the same street, some residents were getting home delivery, while across the street, they had to get their mail from the green boxes, later called superboxes which, despite the name, were hard to open because keys tended to rust and the boxes froze, and so forth.

The other part of this plan, in 1986, was to privatize rural post offices or close them down altogether. Previous critics as well as the present critic for Canada Post, are still very much aware of this problem throughout Canada.

There was a board of directors on which the employer was represented, the union and consumers. All the ingredients for maintaining harmony were right there in the the Crown corporation's board of directors, which represented a good cross-section of our society. The potential was there to have good labour-management relations and to meet the all-important objective: to serve Canadians and have the best postal service in the world.

However, in its first budget after the 1984 election, the government, through the Minister of Finance, said that from now on the corporation would have to absorb its own deficit. That is the kind of measure the minister took. That is what the privatization issue was all about. We know how disastrous that has been.

• (1350)

Since then I do not think that the postal services have improved, even though the government claims they have. A greater number of Canadians receive their mail in green boxes or superboxes, and many others no longer get postal services in rural areas. Mr. Speaker, this is very serious.

Now the government wants us to believe that Bill C-73, which would give 10 per cent of the net worth of Canada Post to its employees, could promote harmony and peace in the labour relations within that Corporation.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think that Bill C-73 can solve the problem that exists within Canada Post.

The corporation is an essential service for all Canadians. The moment you start privatizing everything— We saw what happened with the railways and with Air Canada. Mr. Speaker, everything that was created to help us identify as Canadians is being destroyed.

It is certainly easy to privatize postal services in Montreal and Toronto, given the volume in those large cities. But what happens to Canadians living in sparsely populated regions such as the north or the east? Do you think the private sector will keep providing equal services for everybody? Should we not, as Canadians, at least have access to the same postal services? I have nothing against the private businesses; they are there to make profits and pay dividends to their shareholders. This is how it works in the business world. The government would privatize Canada Post Corporation tomorrow if it had the support of Canadians. Just think of the symbolism of the post office in a small community. In some areas, it is the only federal symbol; yet, the government wants to close it down.

It even removed the words "Canada Post" on the boxes, at this crucial time for our country. My colleagues and I will support the motion of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell asking that this bill be read a second time in six months, in the hope that the minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation will change his mind, come to his senses, withdraw this bill, and give Canada Post the necessary leeway to improve its relations with its employees and the consumers, in order to try to provide a better service to Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, to add to what my colleague just said, if this amendment is adopted by the House, we could have an election almost immediately, since it would indicate a lack of confidence in Her Majesty's government. We could therefore have an election that would give Canadians the opportunity to choose a new government that would do a much better job than this one.

[English]

What I wanted to talk about today are the problems this bill has posed for Canadians and they are serious problems because the bill is trying to create false expectations out of the post office.

I do not know who could have thought up this scheme.

An hon. member: Harvie Andre.

Mr. Milliken: No doubt it was the government House leader who is, after all, responsible for Canada Post in this House. This is probably one of his privatization brainwaves that he picked up along with the Minister of State for Finance and Privatization who is running this privatization department.

The person they should privatize and get out of public life is the minister responsible for Canada Post, the government House leader. If he could be privatized that would be very good. We could have an election and he could be privatized by the votes of the people of his constituency in Calgary and we would not have to go through a share offering.

What the government is proposing in this case, the minister has put this forward in a serious way apparently, is to privatize part of Canada Post.

The way it is proposing it is quite bizarre because it is going to allow the sale of up to 10 per cent of the shares, none of which will have votes, and the government will retain 90 per cent of the shares, the only voting shares. Therefore, the government in effect will control this corporation, at the same time allowing some ownership by others in the corporation.

I want to make perfectly clear what is being foisted on the Canadian public here. The government speaks about Canada Post as though it were something different from the government. It is 100 per cent government owned. It is just like another government department except it has a board of directors and operates something close to arm's length from the government, although one does not know how close that is unless one is in government.

Assuming it is at arm's length, here is a corporation wholly owned by the government carrying on business in Canada with one very important power that other corporations do not have; namely, a monopoly on the right to distribute mail in Canada. With that right goes a right to apply to the government and the government has the power to increase postal rates and to charge for the service it provides.

In other words, there is no commission like the CRTC to oversee its rates. There is no other body that can control those rates except the Government of Canada. Even the House of Commons has lost its control over the rate increases imposed by Canada Post.

My recollection was that in the old days when Canada Post wanted to raise rates it had to come to Parliament and it was an act of Parliament that dealt with the issue. Now that it is no longer a government department that process is gone. Therefore, as parliamentarians we have no control over the rates of Canada Post except for possibly the government caucus which, if it would flex its muscles once in a while and tell the cabinet what to do, could tell the cabinet not to approve another rate increase and Canada Post would not get a rate increase.

Rate increases at Canada Post are nothing more than a tax on Canadians. You would think to hear the minister speak that a rate increase is just a cost of doing business. It is nothing more than a tax because if the rate increase makes profit for the government it reduces the general tax burden on the rest of us, and if it does not then we increase the general tax burden.

Postal rates are in effect a tax.

An hon. member: It charges the GST as well.

Mr. Milliken: It charges the GST as well. It is a tax on a tax. If the post office were still a government department it would have a little more trouble justifying charging the GST on postage rates. I am glad my colleague from Montreal reminded me of this fact. It is an important one. Canadians are paying a tax on a tax when they buy postage stamps or pay for postage. They are being bled white by this government and its Draconian policies. Now to make it look as though it is softening the blow, the government is proposing to privatize Canada Post and put it up for sale, at least in a limited way, to some undefined members of the public.

This bill should not be proceeded with. The fact is Canadians are sick and tired of the way Canada Post is being run by this government and privatization of it is not going to make it any better. The fear is that it will make it worse.

Supermailboxes have been a cause of real concern. People living in new subdivisions cannot get door to door mail delivery. They get their mail from a supermailbox. I get constant complaints in my constituency office from the electors of Kingston and the Islands who are served by supermailboxes. The supermailboxes freeze up in winter. These people are unable to get the keys into the locks because they are jammed up with ice. They are unable to get access to the boxes when it is too cold because they will not open properly. In terrible weather senior citizens in my riding who live in these subdivisions served by supermailboxes are forced to walk in treacherous conditions to the supermailbox to get their mail. They are not paid to do that. Post office employees who deliver the mail are.

If the mail were delivered to homes the way it is in other parts of the riding that are not so new, we would not have this double standard, this second-class service, that some people are forced to endure because of the changes in policy of Canada Post brought about as a direct result of this government's policies.

The minister responsible for Canada Post in this House, the government House leader, and all his colleagues have flown. Here we are discussing a government bill and not one of them is here to listen to the criticisms of the bill and they have put closure on the debate. It shows a complete unwillingness to listen to the views of Canadians who are appalled by the government's actions.

Then we have labour relations in the post office. I can recall about two years ago having a public meeting in my riding for post office employees who were disgruntled with the way they were being treated in the post office at Kingston. Just recently one of the substations in Kingston closed down and all the post office boxes that had operated in that facility had to be moved to some drugstore or other private facility located in the riding.

Why close a good postal facility, Mr. Speaker? Because Canada Post claims it loses money. Well, I can tell you how it makes that claim stick. It raised the rates on the post office boxes, doubling and tripling the rates a couple of years before in some instances, and then wondered why customers were lost. Then the argument is "we have no customers using the service so we had better close it down".

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being two o'clock, we now proceed to Statements by Members.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[Translation]

TURBOCRISTAL

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride that I pay tribute to a deserving company in my riding.

Turbocristal, a maker of artificial snow, has successfully broken into the international market. This young company holds more than 40 per cent of the world market, thanks to two major assets: the superior design and quality of its artificial snow-making equipment.

Turbocristal's equipment is state of the art. For example, the guns are computer controlled and adjusted to produce the most snow, regardless of fluctuations in temperature or humidity.

Turbocristal, which is only seven years old, is an example for tomorrow's entrepreneurs who want to provide consumers and business people with a quality product.

[English]

THE TORONTO STAR STRIKE

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, in these tough economic times, every Canadian knows the value of working together for prosperity and success. Every Canadian knows that if we are to beat this made-in-Canada recession, a recession our Prime Minister induced, labour and management must work together and not at cross purposes.

The labour dispute at The Toronto Star is a good case in point. Since June 8 members of the Southern Ontario Newspaper Guild have been on strike. Since that date, management has continued to put out a drastically reduced version of the Star. The Star is one of the best English language newspapers in the world. Its writers and editors have won countless awards for their excellence, and it saddens everyone to see this institution of 100 years locked in such a dispute.

I call on representatives of management and labour to work together to come up with a mutually acceptable resolution, and I call on this government to take whatever steps it can, within the jurisdiction that it has, to ensure that this dispute is resolved to the equity and for the betterment of all.

* * *

CANADA'S 125TH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATIONS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, last Sunday in Fredericton the citizens of my riding celebrated Canada's 125th anniversary with a warm and enthusiastic expression of the unified spirit of pride and patriotism which our country so badly needs at this time in our history.

More than 10,000 people turned out to share friendship and to demonstrate citizenship on the banks of the Saint John River, and the results were inspiring to behold. Truly it was a display of the broad and rich fabric of diversity which characterizes Canada. English and French languages were being spoken; a host of multicultural costumes and cooking was on display; native cultural participation was evident; and volunteer contributions from one and all. It was an all-Canadian event to remember.

My appreciation and congratulations go to all who made it happen, and in particular to those organizers called the Fredericton Civic Pride who took the initiative.

The toast was to Canada, this magnificent country we all adore.

* * *

LUBICON CREE NATION

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in 1984 the Canadian Council of Churches sent an observer delegation to Little Buffalo Lake in north–central Alberta. Their mission was to investigate and report on the living conditions and treatment by Canadian governments of the people of the Lubicon Cree Nation.

It was this delegation that first applied the term genocidal to the situation they found. It was this delegation that first drew the attention of the world to the destruction of the Lubicon people's traditional way of life and the ongoing refusal of Canadian governments to deal fairly with them.

Last Thursday, eight years later, a second Canadian Council of Churches delegation travelled to Little Buffalo Lake. Their conclusions? If anything, things have become worse and government intransigence more calamitous. Death and disease run rampant. The very spirit of the people is being ground to dust.

This ugly stain on Canada's record must be removed. The Canadian government must begin real negotiations with the Lubicon Nation, in good faith and starting with a detailed point–by–point response to the Lubicon's 1989 draft settlement offer.

* * *

NATIONAL PUBLIC SERVICE WEEK

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, this week, June 14 to 20, is the first ever National Public Service Week in Canada. I want to take this opportunity to pay particular tribute to the outstanding team of men and women who were Canada's negotiating team for the earth summit on environment and development in Rio.

The tireless dedication of these Public Service employees over two years has earned Canada the respect and admiration of the entire world in the struggle to stop the devastation of our environment. But behind our team stood an army supporting them every step of the way on the road to Rio. Just as important, every day hundreds of thousands of Public Service employees work without recognition to provide us with clean air, clean water, safe food, good health care, help for the needy and all the qualities of life that we call Canadian.

I pay tribute to them all, recognized or not, in public and thank them all for their contribution to Canada.

* * *

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, the subcommittee on health issues tabled its report today on the very serious issue of foetal alcohol syndrome and its effects. The report contained numerous recommendations for better education and better preventive measures in order that the people of Canada might become increasingly aware of the danger involved in consuming alcohol during pregnancy.

I stood in this House on several occasions and discussed the gruesome details of the possible results for Canadian children who are born with this disability. The key is in prevention. This disease is fully preventable yet completely incurable.

That is why I congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare for his quick reaction to the report's recommendations. Two hours after the report was released, the minister announced a four–part plan to implement some of the committee's recommendations immediately. One step that the minister is prepared to take now is a pilot program to label alcohol beverage containers in several Canadian provinces.

While I am extremely pleased with the minister's quick response, I would also encourage him to study the committee's report in depth and take further steps to see that Canadian children can be spared the tragic effects of foetal alcohol disabilities.

* * *

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, Nibin Amik is a First Nation community of 310 residents and is located in my riding of Cochrane—Superior approximately 450 miles northeast of Thunder Bay. The community is accessible by air only.

On May 7 of this year, Summer Beaver suffered a serious setback when their log school burned to the ground. The fire occurred during the school day and fortunately most of the 85 children were outside at recess. No one was injured, but all teaching supplies were burned.

Summer Beaver is in desperate need of a wide range of supplies that could be used in their temporary school. The school is an elementary school up to grade six. The community will also require adequate facilities for the students in September when school begins again.

I urge the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to address this crisis situation at Summer Beaver and assure the residents that there will be a school facility for their children in September.

* * *

[Translation]

YUGOSLAVIA

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, families of Yugoslavian origin in my riding, like John Plesac's family in Val d'Or, have been worried about the situation in Yugoslavia for months.

A battalion of Canadian peacekeeping forces in Croatia should be at Sarajevo airport to help send humanitarian aid through.

Our people are proud of what our Canadian soldiers are doing with the United Nations in trying to establish and maintain peace in Yugoslavia.

Yugoslavian families in Abitibi and I want to thank our Canadian soldiers today and assure them of our gratitude.

S. O. 31

CONSTITUTIONAL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional negotiations have failed. The federal government has not been able to obtain a consensus from the English speaking provinces on offers acceptable to Quebec. Let us be up front about it: it is a failure, plain and simple.

There is just one thing left to do: Quebec must hold a referendum on Quebec sovereignty, nothing else. That is why I ask the federal government to stop negotiating under the table with Mr. Bourassa, because he does not represent what Quebecers want.

If the federal government wants to know Quebec's position, it should let the people of Quebec hold a referendum on sovereignty. I know what Quebecers want: they want to be masters in their own house, so that they can develop properly.

* * *

[English]

POLICE

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, over the past several weeks there have been many negative comments about police men and women.

• (1410)

I call upon all members of Parliament and society at large to thank and praise our police men and women from municipal, to provincial, to our RCMP officers. Under increasingly complex and sometimes terrifying conditions they deserve our understanding and full support.

When they pursue a known drug dealer, order him to stop, fire a warning shot, and then are attacked with a knife, I want them to know that I fully support them if they deem it necessary to use their revolver to protect themselves and thereby society at large.

I urge the government not to concentrate its attention exclusively on individual rights and freedoms and the defence of those accused of, or suspected of, criminal activity, but rather to focus on protecting law-abiding citizens and particularly police officers, as they serve us, seek to protect us, and uphold law and order.

Tributes

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, in February of this year the municipal council of Belcarra, a beautiful village in my riding, passed a resolution on national unity. It is intended simply to convey support to those in Quebec favouring a renewed federalism. The resolution was passed on to other municipalities and over 70 municipalities in British Columbia have endorsed it.

Last week acting mayor Jamie Ross of Belcarra, presented it to Claude Ryan on the steps of the Quebec National Assembly. I am pleased to read it in the presence of a group of young Voyageurs here from my riding and from the Montreal riding of Notre-Dame-de-Grâce who are in the gallery now.

The resolution says this:

> That the Municipality of Belcarra, in the Province of British Columbia:
>
> (1) Encourages all citizens to remember all that we have already accomplished and what we can accomplish in the future;

[Translation]

> (2) Expresses the sincere desire that the Province of Quebec choose to remain a valued partner in this great nation that we share.

[English]

> (3) Conveys its best wishes and best regards to its counterparts in Quebec.

That is a powerful message on national unity. Come on Canadian politicians, listen and get on with the job.

* * *

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION REFORM

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to commend the minister of immigration for the immigration reform initiative presented this week.

First of all, this bill is good news for all Canadians, since it will enable the government to better manage immigration and achieve our economic objectives.

Furthermore, while preserving our country's humanitarian tradition, this reform will give us a more efficient, less costly system that will process applications more quickly and above all discourage fraud.

Ours is a welcoming country and will continue to be so. With this reform, we will be able to unclog the system and eliminate abuses, as the Canadian people want.

Even more important, this reform will give us the ability to control our immigration so that it works in the interest of all Canadians, as well as all those who benefit from it.

* * *

ASSOCIATION FRANCO-YUKONNAISE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the Association franco-yukonnaise plays a vital role in preserving and promoting the French language and culture in the Yukon.

Last week, the federal government reduced its financial assistance to this organization by $80,000. This cut forced the association to stop publishing the Yukon's only French language newspaper, L'aurore boréale, eliminating two jobs and ending its cultural promotion programs.

At a time when promoting Canadian unity is so important, francophone communities throughout the country see the funds allocated to them reduced.

Therefore I urge the Secretary of State to restore the funding to the Association franco-yukonnaise so that it can continue its work in the Yukon's French speaking community.

* * *

[English]

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, many people in my riding over the years have expressed their concerns regarding the immigration process.

They are concerned about the expense incurred by Canadians when people are allowed to enter Canada illegally and remain here through a lengthy deportation process.

I would like to take this opportunity to express appreciation to the Minister of Employment and Immigration for taking the views and concerns of the people of Canada into consideration with his latest initiative and proposals for change.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, today hundreds of Air Canada employees marched on Parliament Hill to show their disapproval with the government's handling of the airline industry.

Their presence here today is a vivid illustration of the complete failure of this government to provide policy leadership in one of Canada's most strategically important industries.

As a result of the government's inaction the airlines, their employees, and Canada's ability to compete globally have been put at risk. No other national government would be content to sit on its hands if its airline industry was going through the turmoil now happening in Canada.

Rather than waiting, the government should provide some much needed policy direction about the future of our airline industry. If the government does not know what to do, at least let the transport committee of this House proceed with an investigation into the state of our airline industry.

The chairman of this committee refuses to call a meeting to deal with this issue while Canada's airline industry is at peril.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mr. Manley: Like a group of Neros, this government and its members play their fiddles while vital Canadian interests are at risk.

* * *

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada must be taken to task for its weak response in Rio de Janeiro to climate change.

Yes, a commitment was made two years ago to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000. But today, Canada has yet to produce a plan spelling out how we will reach that goal.

Canada also lost the opportunity to play a constructive role by not supporting the initiative of numerous nations including Germany, the Netherlands, Denmark, and Australia and commit to a carbon dioxide reduction program beyond the year 2000.

Tributes

Canada holds the dubious distinction of emitting per capita more carbon dioxide than virtually any other nation. The Government of Canada has a responsibility to the global community and must prove it can match its rhetoric with meaningful action.

* * *

HON. HERB GRAY

THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION TO HOUSE OF COMMONS

Mr. Speaker: This is an unusual event but one that I think will meet with your acceptance and appreciation.

Since my election as your Speaker in 1986, I have thankfully not been obliged to have recourse to what is probably the most severe procedural measure available to a presiding officer, that of naming an hon. member. Yet there was bound, some day, to be an occasion when such a step would become inevitable. Today is such a day. It is my duty, therefore, to name an hon. member.

[Translation]

By this, I do not mean that I intend to use the disciplinary powers provided to the Chair by Standing Order 11 of the House of Commons. Quite the contrary. I want, on behalf of all the members of this House, to honour one of our colleagues on the day that marks the 30th anniversary of his loyal services to our institution.

[English]

I name you Herbert Gray.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Herb, Herb, Herb.

Mr. Speaker: You have served your country, notre pays, avec distinction, as a member of this House for 30 years.

You have successfully fought 10 consecutive general elections, in itself a remarkable tribute from the people you represent. Having been the member of Parliament for Essex West since 1962, you were sworn in as a minister in 1969, thus becoming the first Canadian federal cabinet minister of the Jewish faith. Your service in several senior cabinet posts and, more recently, in senior critics' roles in opposition, including the high office of Leader of the Opposition, is testimony to your devotion to this institution and to the country.

• (1420)

Your achievements do you great honour. We, your fellow Commoners, can only hope that we will continue to benefit from your wisdom and dedication for many years to come.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, one does not have to think long and hard to find the words to pay tribute to the hon. member for Windsor West. We met when I arrived in the House the year after he was elected, and althought I took a sabbatical for a couple of years, I sat on the Liberal benches with the hon. member for Windsor–West for nearly a quarter of a century.

[English]

As you said, Mr. Speaker, he served this House very well in many capacities. He has always been a very hard working member of Parliament, a very dedicated minister, and an excellent interim Leader of the Opposition, but there is one thing that has to be an example to all members of this House. He has always been a fantastic member of Parliament for the people he has represented.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: It is an example for all of us that every time the member for Windsor West got up, whatever his duty, we always knew that he was from Windsor, Ontario and that the interests of his constituents were always reflected in his policy stance. He has always been a very good supporter of the party. He was an example in terms of discipline, but he served his people first and foremost. For that he has to be an example to all members of this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I want to say that he is re–establishing something that seems to have disappeared from Canadian politics. After we have served for many years in very important positions, the press, the media and public opinion seem to say that perhaps we should go elsewhere. In Europe people serve after they have been Prime Minister and minister for years, keeping their seat in the House, offering advice, example, and participating in the debate for a long, long time in their lives because experience and judgment are very important.

That is why we on the Liberal side do not want to make too much about 30 years. It is not enough. We want him for many more years.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Chrétien: I am sure that despite the differences between the parties, all members of this House wish that Herb, Herb, Herb will be around for a long, long, long time.

Some hon. members: Herb, Herb, Herb.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my party, I wish to pay tribute to the hon. member for Windsor West.

[English]

Thirty years in politics is indeed a very long time. It is a testament to the stamina of our colleague that he has successfully steered his way through 10 elections and the vagaries of political life. Fewer than 27 members in the history of Canada have served in this House for 30 years.

There is a former member sitting here today, Mr. Stanley Knowles. I would like to say to the hon. member for Windsor West that he has about 20 more years to catch up on Mr. Knowles who will have been here for 50 years and today is celebrating his 84th birthday.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: I would like to say, Mr. Speaker, that it is a grand acknowledgement to the member for Windsor West that he has served this House well. He has served his country well. He has been a leading spokesperson for his party and a very able cabinet minister.

[Translation]

He always conducted himself with great dignity and showed great respect for others. The entire House has benefited from his wisdom.

[English]

There is much made, I might add, of the member's penchant for rock music, something that may be little known to the public. One can tell just by looking at the member for Windsor West that he certainly is a fan of the Kentucky Headhunters. However, as someone who has spent 30 years in the House of Commons, we know that the member for Windsor West is no Rolling Stone.

He is respected. We do appreciate the work he has done for his party and for this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. William Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today on behalf of the Government of Canada to recognize the 30th anniversary of the election of the hon. member for Windsor West to the House of Commons. He is the longest continuous serving member of Parliament.

When I came here as a rookie in 1965, he was already a fixture as the hon. member for Essex West. Only the hon. member for Saint-Denis can claim to have sat in Parliament with the hon. member for Windsor West before then, having been elected in a by-election in 1964.

Over the years we have seen many changes in the House of Commons. Good friends have come and gone and been replaced by new good friends. What has never changed is the dedication of the hon. member for Windsor West to the process that is exemplified by the House of Commons.

Today we find ourselves in the middle of yet another discussion on the future of our country. The hon. member for Windsor West can no doubt recall many instances over the past 30 years when the future of our country was at stake. Each time he rose above the partisanship that existed here to make a valiant defence of the virtues of our country.

The hon. member for Windsor West has worn many hats in the last 30 years. He has been Minister of National Revenue, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, Minister of Regional and Economic Expansion, President of the Treasury Board, Opposition House Leader and Leader of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in 1990. He was a royal pain in the side of our government at that time.

Thirty years of service to the people of Canada as a federal member of Parliament is something to be very proud of. I join with his family and friends and hon. members from all sides of this House in wishing the hon. member for Windsor West a very happy 30th anniversary.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I take this special opportunity to stand in celebration of Herb Gray's 30th anniversary in this place as one who can claim to have contributed to his first victory by being a part of the sacrifice then made by the New Democratic Party in the first federal election in which it ran. I have to say that in spite of the chagrin at the time, I knew then that Herb Gray would be a charismatic luminary for almost ever in the Liberal Party as he is today. I share with him the struggle that we from Windsor have undergone in order to ensure that our city is considered to be part of the map of Canada and not its periphery.

I take great pleasure in congratulating my friend and colleague on this his 30th anniversary. I do not know whether I can agree with my leader that he should have another 20 years. I cannot give up the struggle, but I do respect this man.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, at the risk of being named again, I hope you will permit me to take a few minutes to respond to the words of tribute just paid me.

I do want to express my deep and sincere appreciation for these kind words. Listening to them makes me believe that perhaps I have not got off to such a bad start after all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1430)

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): As I have been reminded here and on the Hill recently, this is the 30th anniversary of my first election to the House of Commons. It is not something I think about a lot because I am not the type of person much given to reminiscence. I prefer to deal with things as they are and as I would like them to be.

Mr. Speaker, you will be relieved to know that I do not intend to depart from that habit today. However, perhaps you will allow me to share with you and the members of the House one anecdote relating to my first election to this House of Commons.

Some months after that election, I came to Ottawa on what was to be the first day, the opening of the new session. That morning before the House opened, I decided it would be a good idea if I took a look inside the House of Commons Chamber, where I had never been before. I walked up to the door of the opposition lobby and before I could go in a guard came up to me and very gently but firmly took hold of my arm and said: "Young man, just where do you think you are going?" He was most apologetic when he learned that the guy with the brushcut and the horn rimmed glasses was, in fact, a member of Parliament and was entitled to go into the Chamber to see where his seat was to be, before the House opened that afternoon.

The question the guard asked me at that time is still relevant: Just where did I think I was going? On that fall day, for some so long ago but for me only yesterday, I must say I did not enter the Chamber with a complete game plan for the next 30 years. I did not anticipate the possibility that this occasion would arise. I must say that I did go in expecting to speak and work for my city and my country, to work to implement the program of the party for which I campaigned and also, since I entered through the opposition lobby, to work so that after the next election I would not only come back, but I would be seated on the other side of the House. Well, I guess things have not changed that much after all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, today is above all a day for me to state my thanks but not just for the warm words that have been expressed. I want to state my thanks for the marvellous opportunities I have had to work with the great leaders of my party. I especially thank my current leader for his words of tribute. I want to express my thanks for having been able to work with the wonderful people of our Liberal caucus.

It is also a time to thank my family, my parents of blessed memory, my wife and children who mean so much to me, for their encouragement and understanding. I also want to thank the Almighty and my constituents for having helped me reach this day.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I express my appreciation to the people of my community who have supported me and demonstrated their faith in me. Because of this they are sharing with me in whatever words of tribute are being expressed today. Their support has enabled me to spend these years working for them and for our country.

My city of Windsor with its rainbow of peoples, its ability to fight back against difficulty and adversity, its openness and its tolerance, represent for me what is the best and what must continue to be the best about our country, a country of understanding and openness, a country which celebrates its unity through its diversity.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, as you know I am proud to be the son of immigrants, Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe. The principles of social justice in my heritage are very important to me.

Looking at the story of my parents and their hopes and aspirations, and looking at my part in that story, makes me want to say to the members of this House that it is only a small part of the larger story of the Canadian dream which is being told and retold every day in this country by the strivings of tens of thousands of people who are working to create better lives for themselves and their families and thereby to build a better country for all of us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This is the 125th anniversary of the creation of our country. I want to commit myself again as should we all to continuing to work to preserve and strengthen its unity and strengthen its well-being as the foundation for a better life for all its people.

[Translation]

We must all stand together to fight for the unity of our country and for all Canadians.

[English]

I have been privileged to serve as a member of Parliament, not just in this Chamber, but in its committees, in our party caucus, in the cabinet, in my community and across this country.

Our system today is subject to a lot of criticism. That is healthy. Let us, however, paraphrase the words of Churchill who said that our system of government has its problems but when we look at all the other systems then we will decide ours is not so bad after all.

What comes next? I should tell you that I have already begun to plan with my riding executive for my next election campaign, but—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): I know that this depends on the Almighty and of course my constituents, but I want to tell you about the spirit in which I make these plans. That spirit is reflected in the words of Wilfrid Laurier in his classic speech to the young Liberals of Quebec in 1877 when he said:

> I am a Liberal. I am one of those who thinks that always and everywhere in human things there are abuses to be reformed, new horizons to be opened up and new forces to be developed.

Many of you are familiar with those words but very few are familiar with the words that came after in that classic speech. Laurier said:

> Our means are limited but our nature is perfectible and we have the infinite as our arena. Thus there is always room for the improvement of our conditions, for the perfecting of our nature and for the attainment by a larger number of an easier life.

These words are as relevant today as when they were spoken over 115 years ago.

When I walked in the door of the House of Commons that fall day in 1962, after that altercation with the guard, the next thing that happened was I found myself standing here speaking to you, responding to words of tribute I appreciate very much. Standing here speaking in this marvellous place, in spite of its problems, is still the focal point to which Canadians look when it comes to the protection and enhancement of their liberties and well-being. May it always be such.

Looking out from this Chamber and all across this great country, surely I can conclude by saying as did—

[Translation]

—George Étienne Cartier, when he wrote the following as a student 158 years ago: "Comme le dit un vieil adage, rien n'est si beau que son pays. À son aspect, le Canadien s'écrie: Ô Canada, mon pays! mes amours!"

[English]

Mr. Speaker, I have been able to serve and work for my country and its people for what George Etienne Cartier called "Canada, my own beloved land" and hope to be able to continue to do so for some time yet. I say to all those who have helped me to do this, merci, thank you very much. I am eternally grateful.

[Editor's Note: All hon. members rose and applauded.]

ORAL QUESTION

• (1440)

[Translation]

THE CONSTITUTION

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister, if I can find one. My question is directed to whoever is the spokesperson for the government at this time.

We read in the media that confusion reigns in the current constitutional debate. Formal talks ended a week ago, and the country is still in the dark. I would like to know from the government whether someone will soon report to the House on his matter. We would like to know whether the Prime Minister will convene a First Ministers' Conference soon, so that Canada will know exactly where we are on this question. People are fed up, and they want these issues to be settled as soon as possible.

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, discussions are ongoing between the federal government and the provinces. If it would be useful to have a First Ministers' Conference the Prime Minister is prepared to do so, but he is awaiting a report from the Minister Responsible for Federal-Provincial Relations.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, we read in the papers and we hear on radio and television that the government is planning to have a referendum only in the provinces where the premiers do not want to agree with the government.

I want to ask the minister if it is true. I would like to say to this minister that we proposed a referendum, not as a club to try to put some discipline on some premiers, but to give a voice to the Canadian people and give the Constitution to all the citizens of Canada. We want every Canadian to be consulted. We do not want the government to use it as a political tool, but as an instrument of unity in this country.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, we could not agree more. The referendum should not be used as a political tool or for showboating or for dividing Canadians. The only basis on which a referendum should be held is if it will unite Canadians.

Our goal is to see an agreement between the federal government and the provinces for constitutional renewal. All of us on all sides of the House should be working for that.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is exactly what we are asking for. I am happy that the minister said the Conservatives do not want to use the referendum as a tool against the premiers of Alberta, Newfoundland or Manitoba, but to give a voice to the Canadian people.

I would like to know from the minister if this government will take that stance and make sure that the Constitution really belongs to the people of Canada and not to the backroom boys who are back in the back rooms against the will of the people at this time?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I may have missed something here but I fully remember the last time that constitutional change was made. The hon. member at that time was back in the kitchen doing deals. There will be none of that under this government.

Mr. Chrétien: And you voted for it.

Mr. Beatty: The hon. member is terribly proud to say that after he cooked up the deal in the kitchen we voted for it. What we want is an arrangement where all the premiers work together with the federal government, where there is an agreement between the provinces and the federal government which will unite Canadians.

We do not need showboating, we do not need divisive comments and we do not need partisanship.

* * *

BALTIC STATES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Prime Minister or the Acting Secretary of State for External Affairs or somebody.

Last weekend, 90 per cent of the people of Lithuania voted for the unconditional withdrawal of the over 200,000 Russian troops that are presently occupying the Baltic states. As the external affairs committee reported this morning, there are enormous difficulties in sending these troops back in terms of shortages of housing, training and employment.

I want to ask whichever minister is responsible these days: Will this matter be raised with President Boris Yeltsin in the visit tomorrow? Will we gain a commitment for the withdrawal of Russian troops from the Baltic states? Will the government be offering, as recommended by the external affairs committee, direct assistance for housing and for employment so that the Russian troops can return to their homeland?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, regrettably the Secretary of State for External Affairs has become ill and is unable to be here at the moment. I would certainly take the hon. member's representation as that and communicate it.

I am sure, as he well understands, there will be a long agenda of items under discussion. This will undoubtedly be a part of it, but I will ensure that his representation is made on the broader question of aid to Russia and the kind of commercial relations we might have.

Obviously we are interested in the issues the hon. member raised. I am sure they will be part of the discussions the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State for External Affairs have.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the minister who will be speaking on behalf of the government if, in that meeting with the President of Russia, the question of a demilitarized zone in the Arctic will be raised, if we will gain agreement from the President to go ahead immediately with the establishment of an Arctic council, and if we will establish joint programs to clean up Arctic waters, especially those that have been polluted by nuclear waste.

Will the government agree to the recommendation of the committee that there be an ambassador for circumpolar affairs so that we can give real priority to the common border that we hold with Russia in the hope that it will become a fully peaceful, denuclearized, demilitarized border in the basis of the relations of our two countries?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, in exactly the same way I answered the first question, I think that is a valid point the hon. member raises and is something that ought to be discussed.

In respect to the first question, I have subsequently been informed that Canada's view is that Russia should establish a timetable for the swift removal of its forces from that area. We will be making that representation and asking Mr. Yeltsin what the timetable is and encouraging it to be as short as possible.

* * *

MEME BREAST IMPLANTS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

[Translation]

Today it was reported that in January 1989, a senior official of the Department of National Health and Welfare wanted to take the Meme implant off the market for further testing. Mr. Speaker, this was in 1989, it was a senior official, and he felt it was urgent at the time. Women's health was at stake but the government did nothing. Why did the government decide to ignore these warnings at the time?

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the report to which the hon. member is referring from the health protection branch is not the whole story.

The Meme implant was reviewed both intensively and very much had the total research and investigation done. The whole department was included. Indeed I can tell the member that there was a conclusive report with regard to the Meme implant.

I would also like to say that the CMA back in 1991 did a specific review that was arm's length from the government. It did not come forward with any scientific evidence to prove it was not safe.

The health of women—the health of all Canadians—in this specific issue comes first and foremost. We will always stand behind that.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, with a government that says it really, truly believes that the health of women should come first and foremost, I would like to ask why it took three years to act on the advice of a senior bureaucrat that the Meme implant should be removed until further study.

Furthermore, I would like to ask the spokesperson for the department why a senior member of that department would dismiss today, as quoted in the newspapers, women's health issues and the Meme transplant controversy by saying: "It sells papers. It is a women's issue". It is a women's issue. It is a women's health issue.

I want to ask this government why it did not take it seriously in the past? Why in fact did the chair of its own panel in 1992 say today that she had not received all of that information? How can this country and Canadian women have any faith that this government is going to put women's health issues first?

• (1450)

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, Dr. Baines has received and has full access to all the documentation within the department. Women's health and women's safety do come first.

With regard to the remarks that the hon. leader of the NDP quoted from the paper, "it sells, it is a women's issue", I absolutely apologize. If what that department person said is true, I apologize on behalf of the minister, myself and everybody on this side of the House. It is unacceptable.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, there are many issues concerning women's health that I am sure are of concern to the parliamentary secretary responding and to all of us.

Recently this week there was a report released entitled Breast Cancer, Unanswered Questions, a report that made 49 recommendations about the kind of leadership role the federal government could take basically in research, in education, and indeed in consultation with the provinces and territories.

I would like to ask the spokesperson for the minister whether the minister, at the meetings this week with the provincial and territorial ministers of health, is raising this urgent issue of health concerns for women. It is clear that when we have something like breast cancer from which one woman every two hours dies in Canada, this is urgent.

Has the minister of health raised it with provincial and territorial ministers, and what plan of action is contemplated?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased that the hon. leader brought forward the health cancer research document that was tabled in the House the other day. It does stipulate 49 recommendations in this area, specifically education, research and working together, the federal department along with the provincial departments of health and welfare, and I would say with the public and with the medical fraternity.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare is at the Canada health meetings today. He was there yesterday and last night. He will be reviewing the total act. I can assure my colleague that the issue of breast cancer will be brought forward. I hope that he will be able to report directly to her in the next few days.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House would like to say that we appreciate the unequivocal apology of the parliamentary secretary for the statements made. We would also like to tell her that an apology is not going to set the record straight. The parliamentary secretary herself cited Dr. Cornelia Baines as one of the key players in the panel which finally determined that in fact the Meme implant was not a risk factor for women.

In the same article that same doctor who participated on the panel said that the conclusions of the panel might have been different had they known about the internal minutes. We are talking about internal minutes that have been hidden by someone from the eyes of the panel and the public about this very serious issue.

I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary to go one step beyond an apology and to order a review of all the material, throw out the panel findings because they were based on inaccurate information, and bring forward legitimate information including the information from her own department that the Meme implant was putting women at risk.

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, there have been no hidden minutes from the panel or indeed anyone. Dr. Baines did go on to be appointed to an independent review of the breast implants.

As my colleague does know, the Meme implant was withdrawn well over a year ago by the manufacturers, and the silicone gel breast implants have been put into a moratorium for some months now. There will be no breast implants taking place within Canada until further review.

[Translation]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): With all due respect for the parliamentary secretary, she was not telling the truth, Mr. Speaker, since it was revealed today that the department of health has been withholding information on this for three years. I think that Canadian women are entitled to know why a memo from a professor in her department who spoke of possible risks was hidden both from the public and from physicians interested in this matter. What are they doing in her department?

[English]

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Mr. Speaker, Canadian women do have the right to all the information. Their health is foremost for each and every one of us. There is no hidden information.

The department did an intensive scientific review, the research and the development with regard to implants, both Meme and silicone gel breast implants. I can say right here in the House there is no specific scientific evidence proving that they are unsafe for women.

GRAIN INDUSTRY

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the individual answering for the Minister of Finance. It pertains to wheat shipments to Russia.

The wheat is moving at only half capacity. In the seaway only 20 ships out of 47 are moving. Only 1.7 million tonnes of wheat have been ordered. That is less than 50 per cent of normal. Despite the government's assurances that the Wheat Board can handle the situation, the tie-up continues.

As I understand it there is a problem in the finance department. It is not giving the right signals to the Canadian Wheat Board.

I want to know what the hold-up is in the Department of Finance.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of my colleague, the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board, I will tell the hon. member that the figures we have here indicate that initial payments were made in light of the information available and based on the figures we had. I do not believe that there is a problem. The news report is untrue, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister knows what he is talking about, because we get a very different story from the industry.

There are 27 ships idle in the seaway. The shipping industry has laid off over 3,000 employees and only 1,000 cars have been allotted to the railways. Normally that figure is 4,000 cars. Farmers soon will not be able to move any grain at all. In other words it is a mess out there.

There is a problem in the finance department. I want to know from this individual if he can say explicitly whether the Minister of Finance has given the go-ahead to the Wheat Board to apply credits to cover shipping charges. Yes or no.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why, but there are still people on that side of the House who get up and complain about the way this government deals with western Canadian farmers. Never has a government defended farmers in the west and throughout Canada so much.

The money made available to western farmers has increased more than 500 per cent over the years, Mr. Speaker. The initial payments were made and are still being made in accordance with the rules. I think that the hon. member should instead thank us for the way we have acted in recent years, rather than complain and simply report complaints from the newspapers.

* * *

[English]

BENZOYL PEROXIDE

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to whomever is speaking on behalf of the minister of health.

The U.S. Food and Drug Administration has now imposed a requirement for safety labels on acne medicines which contain benzoyl peroxide. Benzoyl peroxide is both a cancer initiator and promoter. Some years ago an external committee recommended that all sales of medicines containing benzoyl peroxide, which is used largely by teenagers for the treatment of acne, be banned for over the counter sales.

Is it now time, now that the Americans have acted, for the Canadian government and health and welfare to act in Canada to protect those teenagers and young people who are using a potential carcinogen on their skin twice daily?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, with regard to benzoyl peroxide, yes, this has come forward in the news in the last couple of days.

I must say with regard to the concentration in the ointments and salves sold in Canada versus that in the United States, that ours is about a 50 per cent concentration of what theirs is.

Also the ingredients are listed very explicitly and very carefully on all these salves and ointments sold within the retail business or indeed the wholesale business throughout Canada. There is not the cause for alarm in Canada, as indeed there might be south of the border.

• (1500)

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely outrageous. We are talking about medicines used by teenagers for treating acne. They are supposed to understand that benzoyl peroxide means something.

In fact, the concentrations the hon. member is talking about are the concentrations used for eliciting cancer in animals, the same concentration as used in mice.

I repeat my question to the minister, is this government prepared to re-examine recommendations made by its scientists and an external advisory committee that this stuff be banned from over the counter sales to kids?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is very serious and I take the member's question very seriously. I assure him that the health and welfare department will be monitoring this situation very closely.

I have to say the concentration strength of that product in any of the ointments and salves sold within Canada is less than 50 per cent of that of the United States. We will watch this very closely. With regard to labelling, it will become as specific as possible. If there are any further changes I will notify him.

* * *

GIANT YELLOWKNIFE MINES LIMITED

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Giant Yellowknife Mines Limited in Yellowknife has been involved in a very serious labour dispute for the past several weeks. This is a very ugly strike.

It has all the ingredients that ugliness makes. Replacement workers are being flown in by the company. I really question the wisdom of replacement workers in the safety sensitive position of working underground. Guards are being flown in by the company. Vicious dogs are being flown in to protect the guards.

Violence is happening on the streets of the town every day. Feelings are seething throughout this community reminiscent and analogous to what we have seen recently in large urban centres in this country.

I want to ask the Minister of Labour if he would intervene directly before any more violence happens in this community, to take active participation and bring those parties together?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am active in this dispute. I have contacted the parties. I am in daily contact with the Government of the Northwest Territories.

For the information of my hon. friend, I have received a request from the Minister of Justice and the Government of the Northwest Territories to impose back to work legislation in this legal strike. I should tell the hon. member this has never been done to my knowledge in the history of this country by any Parliament on a dispute which is private and local in nature.

Nonetheless, because the request comes from the Government of the Northwest Territories, I will consider it very seriously and I will get back to the Minister of Justice of the territories very shortly.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, for the same minister, I appreciate the answer and I realize that he too takes this situation very seriously.

I respect what he has just said concerning trying to bring in legislation, but that certainly takes a great deal of time. The situation, I do not think, will allow for that time.

I ask the minister if he will convene a meeting here in Ottawa, bring in representatives of labour and management into a neutrally acceptable area of Ottawa and try and resolve this tragedy so that no further violence takes place?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, of course we deplore the acts of violence that have taken place in Yellowknife.

As I said in my earlier answer we are in contact with the parties and my hon. friend knows that in these types of disputes the best settlements that can be achieved are settlements that the parties achieve by themselves. However, I have been in touch with the parties and I am hopeful they will be back at the table.

I think it would also be helpful if people would try to stay out of this dispute. I am not referring to my hon. friend but I am referring to a number of politicians around the country who try to get involved. I have been told by the parties that it is hurting the situation instead of providing for a settlement.

Mr. Speaker: I wonder if I could assist the House. Because of the interventions earlier, I think which we all enjoyed taking a part in, I hope this will be acceptable to the House to extend Question Period to 3.15 p.m.

I must say though I have already had representations that some ministers may have to leave for other obligations and I am sure we understand that. I hope the House will accept that.

* * *

HENRIETTE HADDAD

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. There are widespread reports that Henriette Haddad, who was taken hostage in Lebanon in 1985, is still alive, was recently hospitalized in Iran and has now returned to Lebanon. There are also strong indications that her captors are now willing to negotiate her release on humanitarian grounds.

When Mrs. Haddad's son and I met with the Prime Minister in April, he promised to actively pursue this case. I want to ask if the minister will now make a commitment to pursue these new developments and seek the release of Mrs. Haddad as soon as possible?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, there are approaches being made at the ambassadorial level, both in Ottawa and Tehran, in order to obtain confirmation of this newest information on Mrs. Haddad's fate.

As you may know, Mr. Speaker, the Iranian Embassy in Paris today asserted that it had no information on Mrs. Haddad's whereabouts. The Iranian Embassy in Paris also denied that any of its staff had been in touch with the Haddad family representatives or intermediaries. That same message was communicated to the Canadian Embassy in Paris.

While embassy officials in Paris say they have no information and they have not contacted the family and they communicated that to the Canadian Embassy, we are, nevertheless, following up whatever leads are available. We are in contact both in Tehran and here with Iranian officials. We will certainly search out every lead in an effort to determine Mrs. Haddad's fate.

[Translation]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the government itself must take an active part in the negotiations, which until now have been carried on by the committee to free Mrs. Haddad. The government must also insist on calling Mrs. Haddad a hostage and not just a missing person. This is absolutely necessary to obtain her release. Is the government prepared to make that commitment, which is very important for Mrs. Haddad?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, of course, that is precisely what I just indicated we are doing, contacting the Iranian officials in Tehran through our embassy and the Iranian Embassy here.

I have to repeat, the news story which came out saying that the Iranian Embassy in Paris confirms she is alive is being denied publicly by the Iranian Embassy in Paris and it has communicated this denial to our embassy in Paris. Nevertheless, we are still following up with Iran in an effort to establish whether we can discover the fate of Mrs. Haddad.

* * *

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister of health.

There are reports today that the minister of health says he will act on the unanimous recommendation made by the Sub–Committee on Health Issues in its report on foetal alcohol syndrome by entering into pilot projects on warning labels with interested provinces.

While this is a partial victory for those who have worked for several years on foetal alcohol syndrome, it is not a partial problem but is the leading cause of mental retardation in Canada.

Will the government meet its federal responsibility and begin a national label warning program that deals with this serious national health problem?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the foetal alcohol syndrome report was tabled in the House. Indeed, it was very well done and I want to congratulate the committee and its members.

Various recommendations were put forward, one of which was alcohol warning labels. We do get into research and also education. Although the minister has quickly reviewed this report, he will do an intensive study of it and will respond within the 150 days. Warning labels is one area in which he would be most interested. We will certainly be talking to all provincial governments in relation to this.

• (1510)

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental is for the same minister. On April 1, in answer to my question concerning warning labels, the minister of health replied: "If there is a unanimous position by the ministers of health to do something about it, we will certainly consider their recommendation."

Is the minister taking this unanimous report to the provincial ministers of health at their meeting in Ottawa today? Is he actively seeking their approval to get effective warning labels and effective signage in all drinking establishments adopted in all provinces and all territories in Canada?

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, in all fairness, the report was tabled I believe between 10 and 10.30 this morning. I am not quite sure if the minister has had a chance to review every recommendation specifically. I know he is most interested in the warning labels, not only on the bottles or the cans of the substance itself, but also with regard to drinking establishments.

I have to say that only by working together with our provincial counterparts and the public will we be able to resolve this very serious issue.

* * *

FIREARMS

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the minister answering for the Minister of Justice.

The Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General has for the past several weeks been hearing representations with respect to the regulations pertaining to the firearms legislation, Bill C–17.

Virtually all of those representations have called for a less violent society and yet there are some very significant ironies revealed. For example, the new legislation contains special arrangements for the use of fully automatic firearms in theatre and movie productions which will indirectly incite far more violence than will ownership of those weapons by legitimate gun collectors.

Will the government await the report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General before implementing the new regulations? Will it heed the recommendations of the standing committee based on the representations which it has had from across Canada?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for his question.

There have been extensive consultations with user groups before, during and after the legislative process. The minister set up an advisory group in which the user groups had representations as to the firearms regulations. The firearms regulations were published with plenty of time for input from the public and the user groups. That input is now before the justice committee, as are the regulations.

I can assure my hon. friend the government has every intention of treating the report of the justice committee seriously in order that we can get the best regime possible to have safety for the public and at the same time to allow the user groups that use firearms legitimately to go about their business.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The fishermen of Newfoundland and Labrador are running out of restraint because they have run out of funds as of May 15 when their unemployment insurance ran out. There is desperation growing in our province and it is growing to crisis proportions.

I want to ask the government why it is that instead of talking about long-term plans for stock regeneration, it refuses to talk about immediate compensation for fishermen and their families who need the basic necessities of life? Why not announce a compensation program and take its responsibilities not tomorrow but today?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I can appreciate the great concern of my colleague opposite and other members from Newfoundland and Labrador, indeed all of us here in the House.

However, I think the member was present yesterday and heard the Prime Minister indicate in very specific terms how concerned this government has been about the situation. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has also given similar undertakings, as has the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

I can assure my hon. friend that this government is very seriously considering any interim measures that may be necessary. I think he would agree that today would not be an appropriate time to make an announcement without further information.

* * *

FOETAL ALCOHOL SYNDROME

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health. The health and welfare subcommittee has tabled its report today on foetal alcohol syndrome, the greatest cause of mental retardation in Canada. It is a preventable tragedy and the minister is the person who can do much to prevent it.

Why has this minister failed to introduce warning labels on alcohol as recommended by the same committee five years ago?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I apologize to the hon. member. The spokesman for the department of health has just left Question Period. I am very sorry for that. She will answer the question tomorrow.

* * *

THE TORONTO STAR STRIKE

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Supply and Services, who just ducked out. The question for the government—

Mr. Speaker: Just a minute. We had interventions in which we all took part for a very significant event. We are running late. I am trying to do the best I can. I do not think we need any comments. I made it quite clear that ministers would probably have to leave.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I did not mean he did it on purpose.

My question is for the Minister of Supply and Services. The employees of the The Toronto Star have struck that company. The Government of Ontario, the city of Toronto, have all cancelled their government advertising. I would ask this government if they would be prepared to do the same thing.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member very much for the proposal and I will take a look at it.

* * *

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question for the government House leader is in regard to the business of the House for today.

Should debate on Bill C-73 collapse later this day, could he indicate to the House what he intends to call for the remaining part of this sitting day?

We have a special session of Parliament tomorrow. Could he also indicate what the business of the House will be commencing after Question Period at 3 p.m. tomorrow, and of course the business for Monday and Tuesday of next week?

While the minister is on his feet, perhaps he could indicate to the House, that if rumour become reality in the sense that the House is called back in mid-summer session, whether or not he would be prepared to give reasonable notice to Opposition House leaders on the business which will be taking place? We may assume what it might be, but I ask concerning reasonable notice.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, in terms of today, unfortunately we had to time allocate second reading of Bill C-73. If that debate collapses, if time permits and if there is agreement among the parties, I hope we might consider Bill S-11, the Airport Transfer Act, which is fairly routine, to get that passed and allow the airport authorities the confidence of knowing what the rules will be as they assume responsibility for the airports in Vancouver, Montreal, Edmonton and Calgary.

There is also Bill C-46, on which I also understand there is general agreement. This is a bill that would permit federal law enforcement officers to issue fines in appropriate circumstances, as opposed to having to issue a summons, which is now the case.

This bill is particularly important to members in recreational vacation areas, since police enforcing boating laws and so on will be able to do so by virtue of fines rather than having to summons the offenders, should that be the case.

Tomorrow and Monday, it would be my intention to call Bill C-86, the Immigration Act, and on Tuesday the government will call Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act, for report stage.

In terms of the potential of the House of Commons coming back, I would like the opportunity to pass the usual motion that the House can be called into session for the purpose of Royal Assent, because the Senate will be carrying on with some business, I understand, after we leave.

If for any other reason the House is called back, certainly I give the House leaders of the Opposition and the New Democratic Party, and indeed all members, assurances that adequate notice will be given. I am sure they share with me the hope that in fact such notice is unnecessary and that we are not called back. Nevertheless, if the country is at stake, I am sure we would willingly come back and help to keep it together.

* * *

• (1520)

POINT OF ORDER

84TH BIRTHDAY OF HON. STANLEY KNOWLES

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, I would like to note officially that today is the 84th birthday of Stanley Knowles.

On behalf of all members I would like to pay tribute to a gentleman who first came to this place in the fall of 1942. It will be 50 years this November since Mr. Knowles was first elected to the House in a by-election in Winnipeg North Centre where he took over from the late Mr. Woodsworth who was the founding leader of the CCF party.

I think we owe Mr. Knowles an awful lot of gratitude for the contribution he has made to this country and to this House.

I was first elected in 1968. When I came down here at that time Mr. Knowles was recognized as the father of Parliament, Mr. Rules of this place, a very kind and very courteous gentleman who treated all members of the House of Commons with great respect.

I remember a regular routine around this place. About 3.30 in the afternoon a messenger would come in with a cup of tea and some Arrowroot biscuits. Mr. Knowles would go behind the curtain; he was the only member of the House who never went up to the coffee shop or up to his office, or even out to the lobby, for his tea and biscuit break. He used to sit right there in the back and make sure he kept his ears alert to every word that was spoken in the House of Commons.

We owe him a great tribute and a tremendous amount of respect.

I remember the first year I was here, Madam Speaker, I was 22 years old at the time. The only time he became annoyed with me was one day when I leaned over to him and asked him, because he was the House leader, what Sir John A. Macdonald was really like. Mr. Knowles had been here for a long time but he quickly informed me he had not been here in those days.

Anyway, I pay tribute to Mr. Knowles and we hope he is here for many, many more years to come.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In the name of the House I am delighted to join with the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville in offering our best wishes to the hon. gentleman on his birthday.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Boudria (p. 10744).

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands had three minutes left.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I was addressing my remarks concerning Bill C–73 and I hope I will get an opportunity to make another 10–minute speech after the vote on the amendment is concluded so I can go into greater detail of my criticisms of this bill.

What this bill is seeking to do, as I indicated earlier, is privatize the post office to a very limited extent. I submit this is really the thin edge of the wedge.

There is no protection whatever for the employees who purchase these shares in Canada Post Corporation. The corporation is supposed to be, according to its current mandate, a self–sustaining operation. It is supposed to conduct its operations on a self–sustaining financial basis. In other words, it is not supposed to turn a profit. It is supposed to be self–sustaining. It is to pay its own way at best.

What this government is trying to do is turn it into come kind of profit machine that I presume will be eligible to make donations to the Progressive Conservative fund of Canada or whatever, the PC Fund, their big money machine, for election campaigns.

That is not the purpose of Canada Post. Canada Post Corporation is to provide a service for the public of Canada, to deliver the mail across our country. It is to operate according to its mandate on a self–sustaining basis. So how is the purchase of shares by anybody going to be of interest? Why does anybody want to buy shares in a corporation that is supposed to break even. The purpose of buying shares is to generate some profits and share in the profitability of the corporation.

This corporation is not supposed to be a profitable operation, Madam Speaker. It is supposed to be a public service for Canadians.

What we are doing is inviting these employees to buy shares in a corporation that should not make money. Therefore, the shares should not go up in value. Why are these being offered? The shares are being offered to induce people to buy and then later the government will say: "To help these people out, having sold them this bill of goods in the first place, we now have to do something that will allow their shares to go up in value or will give them some return on their investment".

I do not know what the government is planning to do. It has not come clean with this House. It has not come clean with Canadians. In fact, this bill is some kind of deceitful exercise, designed again to hoodwink the employees of Canada Post into believing that the government is serious about doing something, but without saying what it is serious about doing.

It is an excuse for inaction. It should be rejected out of hand. The government should withdraw the bill. It should be voted down in the House.

If any of the members who support the government would read this bill and see how stupid it is, they would stand up and vote against it at the end of the day as well and get rid of it. It is not a worth–while project to proceed with. It is not a reasonable way to deal with a Crown corporation that has over the years served Canadians reasonably well. It is only in the last few years that we have had these constant cutbacks in service that I alluded to earlier.

This bill does not address those issues. Those are the ones that concern Canadians, not who owns shares in Canada Post. For that reason, I urge all members of the House to look at this bill carefully, study its provisions and say: "Really, is this in the best interests of Canada? Is this something we should be even discussing in this House?" The government has brought it forward as a serious legislative proposal. I suggest it is not worthy of serious consideration and ought to be rejected.

I see my time has expired, Madam Speaker. I will save my further remarks until later on.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I want to enter this debate for historical reasons which I will explain, but first I want to meet the challenge of the member who just spoke and answer the question: "Is this bill in the best interests of Canada?" As I will explain, the bill is suited to the ongoing benefits of Canada Post, the workers of Canada Post and the citizens of Canada.

Let me go back in time to 1980 when the Canada Post Corporation Act was dealt with in the Parliament of Canada. It was of great concern to me at the time. The postal service was in turmoil, deficits had mounted to $600 million a year, people were complaining across the country about the level of postal service and Parliament was asked to act. The Liberal government of the day brought in a bill to make Canada Post a separate Crown corporation.

I had for many years served as a legal officer in the province of Nova Scotia. I was well aware of the distinction between various emanations of government called Crown corporations, commissions and departments. I knew that basically there was no real difference. The differences were cosmetic in many cases. Those kinds of differentiations did allow for different perspectives and allowed for change and reform. That is what I thought was involved in the bill that was brought forward to make the Canadian postal service a Crown corporation under the name Canada Post.

What I said at the time in the Parliament of Canada on November 20, 1980 was that the bill gave the opportunity for change and more important, the opportunity for a new beginning. I described it then and I will describe it again today, almost 12 years later, as a leap of faith. The Parliament of Canada gave the Canadian postal service a new start, not knowing what the result would be.

What we did know was that the postal service was inadequate. There were complaints broadly, as I said, across the nation. There was an enormous deficit. Labour-management relations had been reduced to the lowest level possible and to put it in simplistic terms, the postal service was a shambles.

Whether the move to a Crown corporation called Canada Post was the solution or not, history will judge. It was an action that needed to be taken at the time. Even though I and my colleagues in the Progressive Conservative Party were in opposition, we supported the new arrangement.

• (1530)

We could call on the opposition—I suppose we have a right—to support new arrangements that have as their motive and their goal the improvement of the postal service across Canada.

That brings me to the challenge put forward by the opposition. It is to answer the question of whether this change is in the best interest of Canada.

Anybody who has looked at the postal service over the last decade and more and looked particularly at Canada Post since its statutory inception, will realize that at the heart of the difficulty is labour-management relations. That is the relationship of the management of Canada Post and the approximately 60,000 people who work for Canada Post. They have over the years distinguished themselves, both on the management side and on the labour side, as being unable to resolve their internal problems.

As a result, everybody in Canada suffers. If there is any technique or any action that can be taken to reverse this process which has been ongoing for several decades, then I believe that we should take that leap of faith and support that process.

I have no hesitancy in supporting Bill C-73 which brings a new breath of life into Canada Post by involving, in a very important and vital way, the labour force of Canada Post. It gives each person who works for Canada Post the opportunity to benefit by improvements.

What kind of benefits could arise from the new arrangement? We do not have to look inside Canada Post. We can look anywhere in Canada at the enormous growth in other areas of postal services. The companies that were instituted and established in Canada in the past decade were really substitutes for Canada Post. All of the services that are a day-to-day occurrence in business offices, commercial offices and professional offices across Canada really avoid the use of Canada Post. There are courier services and parcel post deliveries. The magnitude of these developments is tremendous.

There are billions of dollars being spent by Canadians. There are billions of dollars in revenue being lost to Canada Post for the simple reason that the Canadian public does not trust the services of Canada Post. They do not trust the services of Canada Post because of the internal friction, in part.

Any initiative that can be seen as a potential for resolving some of those difficulties that occur internally in Canada Post is going to benefit the employees of Canada Post in the long run. That will lead to the improvement of the internal relations of Canada Post so that it can become more productive and more competitive. This will bring in some of that revenue that is being lost to other persons who are providing the services that Canada Post can provide.

Job security has been, for a number of years, the number one concern among the unions representing the workers of Canada Post. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the former Letter Carriers Union always talked about job security.

It is very strange to me that in an industry that is expanding across this country every day that the courier services are providing increased services and hiring people. Given that situation, why would an organization already in the field of providing delivery services be concerned about job security? The reason is that it is not attracting the business. If it attracted the business, it would have the job security.

The Parliament of Canada has to help Canada Post and its employees overcome these difficulties. That, hopefully, is the purpose of this bill.

I am willing to ask my colleagues to take another leap of faith to benefit Canada Post for all of Canada, but especially for the employees of Canada Post. I could, in the time remaining to me, chart all my complaints about Canada Post. I could talk about the closure of the post office at the Head of St. Margarets Bay that became a national event recorded by the CBC. It was complete with cameras and reporters. It was the funeral that was instituted to mark the closure of the Head of St. Margarets Bay post office in the federal constituency of Halifax West. I am concerned more recently at the closure of the post office in the town of Bedford. It is one of the most enterprising and progressive towns in Nova Scotia and it lost its postal service. However it was replaced by a more efficient service, I hope. Again we take that leap of faith.

I accept these things and I hope people accept these things as part of the leap of faith that in the end we will have an effective postal service in Canada that will provide each and every Canadian with the services that they demand and are entitled to at reasonable cost. I believe that Canada Post has the capacity and the potential ability to provide effective services to all Canadians at a reasonable cost to the taxpayers. As far as I am concerned this means no deficit.

What is our role in all this process? It is to make sure that Canada Post has the statutory instruments to allow reaching that goal. It is not for the benefit of the management of Canada Post or for the edification of the president of Canada Post and the staff he gathers around him, but for the benefit primarily of the people who are involved in the operation of Canada Post whose careers depend upon the success of Canada Post. They literally feed and take care of the welfare of their families because of the employment income they receive. In broader terms this is for the benefit of all Canadians.

Anything that we can do to enhance the efforts of Canada Post in making it an organization that functions effectively and efficiently will be well received by all Canadians who will get the benefit in the end.

We have to put aside those difficulties that have been caused in the past, whether it is in Halifax West, the Head of St. Margarets Bay, the town of Bedford, Kingston or wherever. We must hope that we can come up with some initiative or policy that will enhance Canada Post for the benefit of all Canadians.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I see the hon. member rising but he has already spoken on the bill. We are now in the period where there are only 10-minute speeches and no questions or comments.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, if the 10 minutes have not been used up then surely a question can be put to the hon. member in the course of his speech. I did not hear you say that the member had finished his time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member had concluded his 10 minutes and there is no period of question or comment after that. I am sorry. The hon. member for Annapolis Valley—Hants has already spoken on the bill.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I am rising today to speak to the amendment to Bill C-73 of the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I cannot help but look at the intent of his amendment and realize that what he is trying to do here is to ensure that if Canada Post is privatized, and the employees are allowed to own shares, that they will have the ability to sit on that board of directors.

Canadians, particularly across rural Canada, have a lot of apprehension about the dictatorial policies being exercised by Canada Post and by the government itself on this issue.

We have seen post office after post office across this country closed down. In some cases there is a call for community consultation, but the consultations are meaningless. In fact, I only know of one place in my constituency where Canada Post Corporation had to back down. I am speaking here about the village of Newbury. It was only by the tenacity of the reeve, Diane Brewer, and her council that they were made to back down. Some of the information that Canada Post was giving out was not true. She was told that Canada Post would not allow a municipality to operate the post office, but today that is happening and they are operating it extremely well.

• (1540)

I have to give credit to Diane Brewer and the council of Newbury for having stuck to their guns in forcing Canada Post to back down. We have seen a whole host of closings since that.

I attended one of those meetings and I had other representatives attend other meetings. Canada Post is not there to negotiate with the people of the town. It is there to tell them what is going to happen whether they like it or not.

There is one particular case that I want to speak about. It is the case of the heavy-handed tactics of Canada Post and its insensitivity to history and to those who served their country in time of war. This concerns the village of Watford and the local cenotaph that was erected in the village by the Royal Canadian Legion. I am an honorary member of Branch 172 of the Legion. It maintained this site for 59 years. Then, when the post office was closed down, Canada Post was going to tender the property for sale. Whether or not Canada Post intended the cenotaph to go with it, I cannot say at this point.

I want to just read into the record part of a letter from the Royal Canadian Legion to Mr. Craig of Canada Post Corporation. It quotes him as saying that Canada Post indicates that the property on which the cenotaph stands is maintained by Public Works Canada. The statement is absolutely incorrect. The letter goes on to say: "We, the Royal Canadian Legion, have maintained the property and the monument in every way since the erection of the monument in 1933". That was for 59 years, and yet Canada Post, that did not have the property in its name, claimed that it had maintained it and owned the property and the cenotaph.

I quote again from the letter: "We believe the cenotaph, as well as the fenced property on which it stands, is owned by the Watford branch of the Royal Canadian Legion. If you have documents to substantiate other ownership or maintenance, please send me a copy within 21 days or by March 28, 1991".

The village would like to buy the property and they still have not got it. The village would buy the property and the building and here we have Canada Post playing games with the monument that recognizes and honours those who fought and died for this nation in the two world wars and in Korea. It is playing games for what reason, I do not know, but it is a shame that this sort of thing is allowed to happen.

The village submitted a request to purchase the building and cenotaph, as I mentioned earlier, but then Canada Post responded that it would lease it to the town. It did not want to sell the building. What is it waiting for, a better offer or until the spirit is broken as we have seen in so many cases? The town then responded that it would agree and it would submit a request to lease with the option to purchase after so many years. That would be negotiated. Do you know that Canada Post has not responded as of this date to this submission or this request? This request was made last fall.

What kind of trust do we have in an operation like that? What kind of an example does this set for other parts of society to completely ignore a cenotaph in a village centre that has been maintained by the Watford branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, Branch 172, for 59 years? Surely there has to be some responsibility here to respond not only to the request of the Royal Canadian Legion but also to the town itself.

This amendment will make sure that employees buying into Canada Post will be on the board of directors to ensure that these heavy-handed tactics are changed to and there is recognition of those who serve this country. Then we will have no more of those instances ever being allowed to happen again.

I had a phone call just a few minutes ago. The village asked Canada Post again this spring and there has still been no answer.

I hope someone on the government side will recognize the folly of what is happening here and will recognize the Canadian people deserve to be treated better than to have all these institutions closed down and privatized.

I am very well aware of the fact that over the years, many of the people who fought for this country overseas were given priority to serve as postmasters in these communities on their return. Of course, in order to achieve that position they had to be bonded and they were. Now there is no need to be bonded. One can be a tremendous credit risk and still get the job if one is willing to work for next to nothing.

Canada Post completely ignored the fact that these post offices were usually the centre of activity in towns and villages. That is where the old people would come every day to converse with each other, to pick up their cheques and so on. They would ensure that somebody check on someone who was sick and needed help. If someone's mail had not been picked up for a couple of days, the postmaster himself as a concerned citizen would look into it.

As Canadians, we have a sense of obligation to small communities across rural Canada to maintain these post offices and to maintain the institutions in our villages. Above all, we must ensure that cenotaphs, such as the one in the village of Watford standing on property maintained by Royal Canadian Legion Branch 172 for 59 years, have a claim on that property. They deserve better than to be treated the way they are at the present time.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Madam Speaker, this is an important debate we are having here today. It is a debate that really should not have to take place but because of the penchant of this government for trying to destroy rural communities, I am going to speak in this debate today.

Canada Post, aided and abetted by the government of the day, has set out to destroy rural Canada. In virtually all of the small communities in Canada the post offices have been removed.

In some cases the post offices are now in community stores. Some are efficient because the people are efficient but there is nothing efficient about Canada Post. We have heard a lot about the necessity for Canada Post to pay its way and to be a profit centre.

• (1550)

For a couple of years it was a profit centre for the government. Now, after bragging about how efficient it was and having destroyed the postal networks at least in rural Canada, we find that Canada Post now has a deficit.

This is certainly not the first time there has been a strike. I would point out when there is a strike, it is not just the employees who are at fault. I am sure in this case there is probably enough blame to go around but if the employees of Canada Post are treated the way that members of Parliament are and in the manner that small communities are treated by Canada Post, I have absolutely no sympathy for Canada Post at all.

I have never been able to get a straight answer out of Canada Post. Of course, the president of Canada Post is obviously too busy to talk to a member of Parliament. Instead, public relations people are sent to our offices or call us on the telephone when we have a problem. All you get from them is a bunch of gobbledegook. These people have no power to make a decision. They have no power to correct a wrong. They are simply there to make the boss look good.

We have lost our rural post offices in areas where they had been for a hundred years. We have also seen extreme increases in prices for services. I can give you one example in the community of Doaktown, a small community by Ottawa standards. The lock boxes in the post office used to have a fee of $5 a year. When Canada Post took over from the post office that fee went from $5 to $50. That is one of the reasons Canada Post was able to make believe it was making a profit.

I attended numerous meetings in my riding with representatives of Canada Post when they were there to tell their good news to the people. The news was that they were going to lose their post office and they would be much better off. I tried at several of these meetings to get through to these PR people that the sovereignty of this nation resides in the people of the nation. It does not reside in Canada Post.

One might as well have been talking to the wall because these automatons were programmed. They were not allowed to say anything they had not been told in their little booklet to say. Naturally, the people were seized with a great deal of anger.

In one situation, in the little village of Loggieville, the community wanted to take over the post office and run it. They were not even allowed to do that. It would have cost Canada Post nothing. But somebody in Ottawa had decided that rural Canada was not worth what the postal service was giving. It has been destroyed in my opinion and it will take a long time for the people in these rural areas to forgive this government for what it has done.

I repeat that the sovereignty of the nation resides in the people of this country. It does not reside in cabinet. It does not reside in this Chamber. It resides in the people. It is time for this government to stop trying to be the dictator of Canada, start listening to what the people have to say and give the people as much as possible the benefits and services they need.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, it is an honour for me to participate in this debate on behalf of the constituents of Cardigan, Prince Edward Island.

Bill C-73 is an act to amend the Canada Post Act. It should be called the selling out the post office act. The bill is just another example of the government trying to do things through the back door. The government should come clean with the people of Canada and call a spade a spade. This bill is going to privatize the post office.

The government says it only wants to improve productivity and service to the public. Let us take a look at the record of service this government has had when handling Canada Post.

Since the Tories came to power hundreds of post offices have closed down. Many small towns across the country have lost the only government presence they had. People do not mind paying taxes if they see some benefit for paying them. What is the benefit in going to a drugstore miles down the road to get your mail? For most rural Canadians, the post office was the only place where they regularly saw the Canadian flag. By closing down the post office, the government has removed that.

Two years ago on Prince Edward Island, Saturday rural mail delivery was eliminated. The government said the move was to rationalize the service. In 1982, when the post office was made a Crown corporation, it was felt that Prince Edward Island had special needs requiring mail to be delivered on Saturday.

From 1982 to 1990 there have not been all that many changes on Prince Edward Island but the government no longer felt we needed Saturday rural mail service. That move has inconvenienced many people, particularly senior citizens. For older people living a number of miles out in the country, it means that most likely they will not get a daily paper. As a result of the cuts, the post office lost a huge contract for delivering the newspapers. Instead of improving the service, it has gone down in Prince Edward Island. Canada Post actually lost dollars at the time by removing Saturday mail delivery, just for efficiency.

• (1600)

The last slap in the face to islanders came last December. That is when the post office decided it would no longer sort in Charlottetown the mail from communities in Prince Edward Island to places off the island. Off-mail now gets processed in Halifax. This has caused delays in the mail system, especially UI cheques which must be mailed on specific days to be processed properly.

I wonder if the members and the government realize what it really is to be on a low fixed income and to be waiting for your unemployment insurance cheque. The people need these cheques. They do not have another account to go to if the cheque does not come on Thursday and instead it comes on Monday. That hurts. It hurts the people in Prince Edward Island. That is about all that this service has done.

Mail from Prince Edward Island to places elsewhere in Canada or the U.S. now receives a Halifax postmark. Imagine receiving a piece of literature from the tourism department of Prince Edward Island with a big Halifax, Nova Scotia postmark. It is an insult to islanders. It is as if we do not exist. This should not be tolerated.

I would also like to mention a very special case in my riding of Cardigan where it has been impossible to get any action from Canada Post. In a part of Webster's Corner, the people wanted the route extended down the road because a number of people had moved into this area. Canada Post said no but gave the people a roadside lockbox which they said was good enough for them. The box constantly fell over in the mud.

I asked Canada Post, since it would not do any more, to put a concrete slab under the box. Canada Post said no. The people on the road to Webster's Corner have to deal with a box that falls over in the mud in the spring and freezes in the winter. It is very difficult as a member of Parliament to go to Webster's Corner and describe the efficiencies of Canada Post. This is a problem.

The legislation proposes to sell up to 10 per cent of the value of Canada Post to postal employees. The government says the measure is meant to improve employee performance by giving them a stake in the company. In any dealings I have had with business, you have to satisfy your customers too. This is one fact that seems to be eliminated. The theory goes that if you own something you will take better care of it.

The government believes that improving morale will help services to Canadians. I believe the government has this backwards. If the government wants to improve the labour relations at Canada Post, it should really start by improving the services to the customers, to the Canadians they are actually working for.

The only thing this government is concerned about is turning the post office into a profit-making machine and making it more attractive to sell. That is the Conservatives true objective, to sell the post office. The government has done its level best to destroy almost every important national institution. It sold Air Canada, which is now run by a couple of Americans; Petro-Canada; it almost destroyed VIA Rail by eliminating routes especially in Atlantic Canada. It certainly does not exist very much where I live. It cut the budget of the CBC, forcing the corporation to shut down television stations and to cancel very popular programs like Land and Sea; and now the government has taken aim at the post office.

Over the last little while we have seen government-sponsored ads on how great it is to be a Canadian and how we should concentrate on the things that keep us together. The very purpose of the post office is letting Canadians communicate. In rural Canada the post office is the only place where people see the Canadian flag. We need to see the Canadian flag more and I think that rural Canadians wish to feel a sense of being Canadian. Rural Canadians are Canadians as well as urban Canadians and central Canadians.

I just hope, and I call upon the government, to not sell the post office. It is an important institution. It is important to Canadians and it is important to this country.

* * *

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that messages have been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed the following bills without amendment: Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act; Bill C-67, an act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act;

[Translation]

Bill C-71, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and other acts in consequence thereof; and Bill C-84, an act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

* * *

[English]

ROYAL ASSENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member, I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received which is as follows:

Rideau Hall
Ottawa

June 18, 1992

Mr. Speaker,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. Peter deC. Cory, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 18th day of June, 1992, at 4.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain bills.

Yours Sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

Government Orders

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and on the amendment of Mr. Boudria (p. 10744).

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to be able to speak on this bill, but I am not pleased with the content of what I have to say. It is very negative. It is not as optimistic as my general notes are when I got up to speak in this House.

Mr. Tobin: And your nature.

Mr. Mifflin: And my nature.

Mr. Milliken: Optimistic.

Mr. Mifflin: Or indeed the nature of my riding. I represent a group of people who like to be optimistic, who like to toe the line. They work hard. They like to belong to a system in which they work hard and the government is responsive in turn to the way they look at a democratic system. But I have to tell you that right now they are beginning to wonder what sort of a system they live in.

There have been three issue since I have been elected that have haunted the people of my riding. There is no other word for it. One was the goods and services tax, which they could not afford. Another one was Bill C-21, which mucked up their unemployment insurance. They are still trying to come to grips with that.

We have a situation right now where the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte had attended a demonstration in his riding two days ago, a thousand people from St. Anthony, people who normally do not demonstrate. I have been to St. Anthony many times, fine people, excellent people.

As I stand in front of the House today, I have a demonstration being organized in Clarenville by the plant workers of the Bonavista peninsula. They are not just livid with the government. They are not mad with just the fact that something is not being done. They are worried, they are anxious. They have to show that they are concerned and nobody is listening to them, not a soul. We are listening to them. I am listening to them. This side of the House, I know, is listening to them because we met this morning to discuss the subject of fishing. However, this bill relates to the post office. That is the third thing that has got not only the people in my riding upset, but throughout Newfoundland and rural Canada, as much as these other two major issues that have put off Canadians with this government.

• (1610)

Why are they put off with it? I have to slow down, Madam Speaker, because it is a very, very upsetting subject. They are put off with it because it is part of the business of closing down Atlantic Canada. My constituents wonder where it is all going to end. They are not going to be very pleased today when they see Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation, which permits the sale of 10 per cent of the corporation to employees. They will ask "Where does it go from here?"

To my mind this is nothing more nor less than the first step to privatize the Canada Post Corporation. Why bother going through this step? Why not be straightforward with the bill? Why not be up front with Canadians and tell them that we want to privatize Canada Post, instead of going through these diversionary methods?

I am delighted that the member on the other side of the House, the government side, nods his head. I do admire his courage because he is obviously in the same situation that I am in my riding, and others on this side.

I want to give the facts here. I want to state what the numbers are. In the last two weeks alone I have been involved with the shutdown of the Shearstown post office, the whole community, and Bay Roberts and Bareneed and Port de Grave. They are all upset. That is just in the last two weeks.

I have another one from Hare Bay, which is in my riding. Let me read what a gentleman from Hare Bay said. He wrote me on June 7, a Mr. Saunders. He said: "Mr. Mifflin, I am very disturbed about the way Canada Post is treating rural Canadians with regard to the closing of small post offices. I would appreciate you taking a firm stand against this action on my behalf".

That is one letter. I have received over a hundred of these, from a hundred communities. I have 260 communities in my riding and they are all rural communities.

With respect to Canada Post and rural communities, let me say what has happened.

In 1986 Canada Post had a 10-year corporate plan and the development of that would close, amalgamate or privatize 5,221 rural post offices employing 10,000 people across this country. This is a time when we are looking for jobs. In my riding a steady job is a status symbol, not many people have one. The last time I checked the figures, over 900 post offices were closed, with a corresponding loss of over 3,000 jobs.

We talk about equity here; 83 per cent of the rural post office positions belong to women, and the job losses have hurt them the most. In addition, closing a post office in a rural area removes in many cases, as the hon. member for Cardigan just said, the only federal presence in the community, and it terminates an essential ingredient in their social fabric, not the least of which is the consideration for our senior citizens who now have to go out in the rain and in the wind and in the snow. Again, the example that my hon. colleague from Cardigan used. I have many examples of them, Madam Speaker.

The name of the game is service to the public. Canada Post is trying to make profits. In the fiscal year of 1988-89 it made a profit of $96 million. The next year, $149 million. It is like charging for national defence. Do we have to make money because we need to have a defence department? No. The name of the game is to defend our country. You do not expect to get money back from it. The name of the game for Canada Post should be service to the Canadian public.

Judging from the information that I am getting, this service is anything but good. Why? The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources had to resort to a private company outside the country so that he could get reliable service. He said so last Friday. That is an awful state of affairs.

There are other initiatives that this government has announced that this policy of what it is doing now is totally against the Affirmative Action for Women and Youth. I just stated that 83 per cent of the rural post office jobs are held by women.

Conditions for seniors for autonomous living. This does not help seniors who live alone, or to live without help. What does this do to regional economic development? Not very much.

To really put this in perspective, these are the words of Prime Minister Mulroney who made this promise in 1984: "Restoring the quality of service will become top priority with Canada Post".

An hon. member: Another sacred trust.

Mr. Mifflin: That is a sacred trust. It has gone the way of other sacred trusts. Therefore, I believe that this post office bill is inconsistent with government policies in other areas and the government admits it.

Second, this bill results in the loss of badly needed jobs, especially for women. Third, and we have ample evidence here today and even from the government side of the House, it degrades the quality of service for the public. Fourth, it trades off profit for poorer service and it represents the breaking of another sacred trust by the Prime Minister.

Is there any wonder that constituents are concerned about what their future holds? Is there any wonder that anywhere from 500 to 1,000 people will demonstrate in Random Square Mall in Clarenville tomorrow? I do not think there has ever been a demonstration there since the mall was built. Is it any wonder why they are going there to cry out to get some attention from the media and from anybody who will listen when they say: "Our voices are not being heard". The voices of the people from St. Anthony are not being heard so they turn to their members of Parliament to say: "Help us. Pay attention to us. Come down and watch this".

I would be down tomorrow but I feel that I can do better here with my colleagues trying to talk some sense into this government to at least hear what the fishermen and plant workers have to say. They have the prospect of their industry being closed down for five years—

An hon. member: Waiting for the emergency debate.

Mr. Mifflin: —waiting for the emergency debate to take place.

An hon. member: Fifty members have asked for it.

Mr. Mifflin: There have been 50 members today who have asked for this. In my case, since February 21, some people have not had any compensation because they were not qualified in time when the plant in Port Union closed down. That plant holds 1,200 workers. There are 500 workers in the town of Charleston, which is a small town not far from my home town. They were told that their plant will not open and as of May they have no money or compensation and no hope of getting any.

Is it any wonder that the people are marching off to protest? Is it any wonder that they have no faith in the government? Is it any wonder that they want me to get up and talk about post offices and all the other actions that have been taken by this government that shut down Atlantic Canada, and Newfoundland and Labrador in particular.

I am fed up to the teeth with this and I hope the government takes some notice of the speeches that it is going to hear in this House on this despicable bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles A. Langlois (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I have been listening to members opposite make their contribution to the debate on the bill before the House today which provides for the sale of part of the shares of the Canada Post Corporation to its own employees. I must say I am very surprised that opposition members decided to criticize this legislation on every possible ground but failed to focus on the purpose of the bill.

I heard some extremely critical remarks about Canada Post earlier today, but perhaps we should go back a few years to the time when members opposite formed the government and Canada Post was a government agency. For many years, political interference by the party in power in Canada Post was so strong that the agency was unable to run its operations effectively. It was a hot bed of Liberal patronage and politicians regularly interfered with this government agency at the time. We saw the results. Costs went up year after year, and when we came to power in 1984, the Canadian postal service was one of the most costly and least efficient in the world.

• (1620)

Canadians across this country complained about postal services, because the post office was managed from this House, from the government benches at the time. Our government did some housecleaning by making the agency a Crown corporation, operated at arm's length and administered by a group of competent managers with a specific mandate.

Our government gave Canada Post a specific mandate: to provide Canadians with adequate postal services at reasonable cost, and to implement a cost recovery plan. The result was two consecutive years of profits for Canada Post. This had been unheard of before, simply because politicians on this side of the House—our government—decided not to interfere with the managing of Canada Post. That is a well-known fact. That is why Canada Post booked the results we see today.

The hon. member for Miramichi spoke earlier of a deficit this year for Canada Post, which should come as no surprise. The corporation experienced some very serious labour relations problems which led to a strike, and any company that experiences a strike inevitably suffers a loss of income that will turn up as a loss on its books. This is only temporary, and I am convinced that current management at the corporation will put Canada Post back into the black in a matter of months.

I heard opposition members question the government's motives for allowing Canada Post to sell 10 per cent of its shares to its employees. What's wrong with that? I ask members opposite: What's wrong with that?

[English]

What is wrong with allowing the corporation to sell 10 per cent of its stock to the employees? There is nothing wrong with that.

[Translation]

This measure will simply give Canada Post employees a say in their jobs and how the corporation is run. If, as members opposite are claiming, the government did have the privatization of Canada Post in mind, what is wrong with letting Canadians become shareholders in the corporation and thus real owners of the corporation? This kind of system will give Canada Post shareholders the right to say what they think of management, as shareholders.

In any company, shareholders have the right to insist that management and the board of directors manage the company so as to provide services on a profitable basis and, as I see it, far more effectively than the corporation does at the present time, although there have been many improvements and it now operates at arm's length.

The Liberals are critical of the government because of this arm's length policy. It is a policy that we have been applying systematically. Politicians no longer interfere with Canada Post, and that is as it should be. That is how we managed to set up an efficient and viable system that is making a profit.

Today, I challenge members opposite to tell us why they are so afraid to see Canada Post develop a more modern approach. Is it because they realize that, in the event they get back into power, they will no longer be able to interfere with Canada Post? I think that is the question we should be asking, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker—

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are no questions at this point in the debate. Resuming debate.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the 10 minutes have not expired.

Madam Deputy Speaker: No questions at this point in the debate. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is well aware of the Standing Orders. The Chair cannot entertain any questions without the unanimous consent of the House.

[English]

Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have some no's.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, there was a practice in this House for years—

An hon. member: Generations.

Mr. Milliken: —or generations. It goes back to the beginning of time that when a member was making a speech another member could get up and ask the member a question if the member making the speech permitted it.

I realize that we have these time rules. The practice has developed in the last few years that because of the question and comment period that is allowed after 20 minute speeches, it is rare for a member to be interrupted.

Members who have been in this House for some years know the practice. Back in the days when the time limit was 40 minutes it was very common for members to stand up and say to a member who was speaking: "Might I ask the hon. member a question? Will the hon. member permit a question?" That was the way it was put. If the member permitted a question, then a question was asked and answered during the 40 minutes.

All I was asking is that since the hon. member had not used his 10 minutes, would he permit a question during his 10-minute speech? He is about to finish. His time is still running. Will he permit a question?

If he will not, that is fine. However, it seems to me that it is not a question of unanimous consent, but whether the hon. member will permit a question in his speech.

Mr. Clark (Brandon—Souris): Madam Speaker, I was going to make the observation to you, as indeed you are well aware, that the rules have changed since the time of the practice to which the hon. member has referred. Consequently, what he is asking of the individual now is not appropriate.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I think the member for Kingston and the Islands is something of a scholar of the standing orders—

An hon. member: He is a new member.

Mr. Edwards: —in spite of being a new member. He has been accused of being the reincarnation of Mackenzie King who was something of a master of House rules. I think he will find, if he examines Standing Order 74, that it is very clear that Your Honour was absolutely right. A question and comment period is not available during 10-minute speeches.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, I would absolutely concur with the words of the member who has just spoken that indeed there is, as the Speaker quite rightly points out, no formal question and answer period or informal question and answer period after a 10-minute speech. That is not at all being suggested by my colleague and friend.

I have been here for a few years, but not as long as the member for Windsor West, obviously. It is a dozen years. My colleague across the way for Mississauga South has been here for a similar period of time and perhaps a little longer. Asking a member whether that member would permit a question has fallen out of practice, but it has been quite normal. I recall a number of occasions when my friend did exactly as the member for Kingston and the Islands has suggested.

Sometimes the member will say yes and cede his place for a moment for a question. Sometimes the member has said—and this has been the practice—"I will permit questions at the end. I would like to finish my thoughts first". It is quite normal, particularly when a member has not used his full time, as a courtesy, for a member to put exactly that request. That is all the member for Kingston and Islands has said. I submit that it is a worth while practice in this place.

I recall my friend for Mississauga South questioning, for example, some of the statistics I was quoting out of the last budget document. We had quite an interesting—for some people I might say amusing—exchange of statistics in the budget document. We both quoted them in rather interesting ways. However, that is the purpose. It is to hold members accountable so that when they speak in this place they understand and realize that they may be held accountable.

I submit that it makes for a much better debate when there is the possibility that what you say may be challenged or questioned. It would be a great shame if the Speaker's ruling is misinterpreted. I hope it is not improper or wrong or not allowed for a member to ask another member on his or her feet whether or not that member would permit a question. I hope the Speaker's ruling would not be misinterpreted that way. Parliament would be poorer.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I would like to start by apologizing to the hon. member for naming the former name of his riding. Somehow the name has stuck in my mind and occasionally I will be looking for the word "Humber" and "St. Barbe—Port au Port—Baie Verte" will come back to my mind. I guess I have been sitting here for quite a while too.

• (1630)

I agree with the hon. member that if there is consent of the House we can always go outside our rules. But there must be unanimous consent. The House is its own master and I am here as a servant of the House.

If we look at the Standing Order under which we are now proceeding, after the part of debate where there are only 10-minute speeches, they are not followed by a period of questions and answers.

The only thing that I can do is ask if there is unanimous consent that the hon. member—

Mr. Milliken: He hadn't used his 10 minutes.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Once the hon. member sits down he has completed his speech, whether he has used the 10 minutes or not. That is my understanding of the rules. I am quite prepared to be corrected, that his time expired the moment he sat down.

For questions to be asked we would need consent of the House, which was not given.

I think we should now go on with debate and I am ready to recognize anyone who will rise on debate.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I am quite pleased to have this opportunity to speak right after the member for Manicouagan because during the course of comments by my colleague previously the member for Manicouagan responded to a statement that this was one step on the way to privatization by saying "that's right".

I am looking back at the records of the Commons debate, Hansard of April 30, 1992, page 9920. I am looking at a very direct question that was put to the minister responsible for Canada Post by my colleague from Essex—Kent who said to the minister very specifically:

> Earlier today the minister introduced measures to allow employees of Canada Post to buy shares in the Crown corporation.
>
> Will the minister take this opportunity to admit to Canadians that he was embarking on the first steps of privatization of Canada Post?

That is exactly the point made previously, Madam Speaker.

I would like to read the reply from the Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, the minister responsible for Canada Post. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, I do not know why I would admit that. It would not be the truth if I were to do that.

He made it quite clear that this bill was not intended as a step toward privatization and yet we have a member of the government sitting on the other side of the House not 10 minutes ago, in response to a comment from this side of the House that this is the first step toward privatization saying "that's right".

Is it any wonder that Canadians have a lot of trouble trusting this government? When the minister in April said "that is wrong, that would not be the truth, if I were to admit we were taking the first steps toward privatization" and now in the heat of June another member of that same government sits there and says that that is exactly what the government is doing.

If Canadians right here in this Chamber can hear completely opposite stories from two members of the same government, is there any wonder that the popularity level of the Prime Minister and his government is at the stage it is? Is it any wonder that Canadians can hardly wait to get rid of this government? Really, is it any wonder that they hold the government and this institution in such disrespect when from that side of the House we hear contradictory statements constantly. We hear denials one day and the accusations become reality weeks or months later.

The member opposite seems to want to debate the free trade agreement. I would love to debate the free trade agreement, the past one and the future one, and point out all the failings of that agreement if he would have the courtesy to put that item on the agenda of the House rather than trying to interrupt a member who has some important issues and points to say on behalf of her constituents on the bill that is before the House on Canada Post.

As well, I note today that the Liberal Party is alone in fighting against this abomination of a bill, the first step in getting rid of a service that has served this country well since Confederation. The socialists are not here. The NDP, which speaks out against privatization, which would like the state to own and operate everything, is not here to say one word in defence of Canada Post. It is not here to say one word in defence of maintaining in the public domain an essential public service to a country like Canada that is so far and so widespread, with such a scattered population, that the ability to communicate with one another is fundamental to national unity. It is fundamental to our sense of being Canadian.

The Liberals stand alone here today defending the continuation of that service in the public domain and in the public interest, not in the interest of profits.

I want to make a few points about the treatment of employees in Canada Post. The minister has made the point that this is to try and get employees more involved in Canada Post, to let them feel a little more a part of the corporation and to make them a little more productive.

There are many ways in which Canada Post has shown that it does not care one whit for its employees. Its treatment of women is abominable. In the interests of profits it is contracting out work, putting on more part-time people, taking people who worked for it for a decade or more and suddenly putting them back on night shift.

It is entirely refusing to pay women equal pay for work of equal value. It has taken provisions out its contract that requires its contractors to pay women decent wages. It talks about shared decision making. Its day to day operations are a total denial of any respect for its employees or any attempt to let them feel proud of their work and to feel that they have a employer that they can work in partnership with.

Labour relations at the post office are no secret to anybody in this country. They are in an abysmal state. One can only question them since this bill before us is a shell. It gives us absolutely no details. It tells us not one thing about what is really going to happen here, what the shares are going to be worth, what they are going to mean to employees or which employees are going to be able to buy them. One can only speculate that if there is any value to the shares at all, they will go to senior managers and if there is no value to the shares at all, then the employees at the lower level might have some access to them.

I want to go back and let people recall the privatization of Air Canada. There is a pattern to privatization. Senior managers and corporations always love to push for privatization because they always seem to manage to set up privatization deals that give them a good hunk of shares, a good stake in the company which means the loss of jobs and less income for those who actually do the work that produces the profits.

I want to go back to Air Canada because I remember with great chagrin the night I heard Claude Taylor, just before the privatization of Air Canada, on Cross Country Check-Up saying that if only he were free of all these fetters of government ownership, of government direction, he could run Air Canada much better, much more profitably. I suspect that the privatization of Air Canada benefited Claude Taylor and a lot of other senior executives in Air Canada.

It has meant the loss of thousands of jobs. It has meant the loss of service to northern and remote communities in this country. It has meant increased costs. It has meant reduced service and it is a classic demonstration of why privatization in an industry like transportation or communication, that is so essential to keeping this country together, is not in the public interest.

The public interest is something that does not seem to matter a lot to this government or to Canada Post.

• (1640)

I can only mention small postal outlets in my riding, 10 to 20 feet from a senior citizens' building, being closed down and moved a mile away. These older people who are trying to live on their own, 190 of them in one apartment building, who want to be able to communicate with family and friends who have now moved all over Canada, cannot even get out in the winter to mail a letter, to pick up some stamps, to mail a parcel at Christmas time.

This is happening all over my riding. I have in my riding the second highest proportion of seniors in the country and so I worry about these things. I wish Canada Post worried about people who have to rely on the mail simply to remain in touch with their loved ones. It does not. It does not even make sensible decisions.

I have a branch of the post office that has been out on Richmond Road in Ottawa West for many years, since I moved out to that part of the city. Lo and behold, 100 feet down the road it opened up a private outlet. What does that mean? Better service to me? No. Now I have to go to two places.

Our time is short today but the bottom line is we want a postal service that delivers service to Canadians, one whose purpose is not profits, not exploitation of its workers but service to Canadians. We want the honest truth for once from this government on its intentions. Do not give us a shell of a bill that does not tell us what its real plans are.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I too want to participate in the debate on Bill C-73. As I do, let me say the speech by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa West, was an absolutely outstanding speech because it embraced what is important about Canada Post for the whole country.

The member pointed out that Canada Post is not only an essential ingredient to nation building, holding the country together in so far as rural Canada is concerned, but is important for those citizens who have made their contribution to this country, those senior citizens, particularly in urban Canada, who now find for economic reasons that they must live in senior citizens' complexes. Canada Post is a way of staying in touch with their loved ones no matter where they have gone.

I thought the member demonstrated why Canada Post is an ingredient of national unity at a time when the country is being tested, when the stresses and strains on the fabric of this nation are more pronounced than perhaps at any other time in our history.

As my colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception said a few moments ago, thousands of people gathered in various communities of Newfoundland and perhaps elsewhere in this country, demanding that their voices be heard, demanding that there be an opportunity for their voices to echo across this Chamber, demanding that their fears, their anger, their frustrations and their hopes be reflected in the voices of their members of this place by way of an emergency debate in the case of Newfoundland on the fishery.

Even as this place cannot find the time to allow that voice to be heard, in the dying days of the session, as this place gets ready to close, perhaps until September, even as we deny that voice a chance to be heard in this place, what does the government do with those precious few remaining hours that are left for the elected representatives of the people to meet and to discuss and to debate and to exchange ideas? What does it do with those remaining minutes? It puts forward this bill, Bill C-73, a blank cheque, a loaded gun pointed right at the head of Canada Post, at the postal service, and I put the emphasis on service.

It is a bill, it is a piece of enabling legislation. It transfers to a minister unchecked, undefined and unbridled powers to do with the post office as he sees fit.

What are we being asked to do with this bill? We are being asked to transfer in a blind arrangement the future of the post office and the role the post office plays in Canadian society into the hands of a minister who will not share with Parliament what he intends to do with that power being transferred to him.

If you look at the bill it does not tell us what the value of the shares are going to be in privatization. It does not tell us what the number of shares are going to be in privatization. It does not tell us the net worth of the corporation. It does not tell us that if employees can buy shares how they shall be defined. It does not tell us the amount of shares every individual employee will be allowed to purchase. It tells us nothing save that the government intends to privatize the post office and it would like Parliament, with blinders on, completely blind and disoriented and confused, to transfer authority to the minister and that the minister functioning in the back room with his advisors will make all the decisions.

We are being interrupted by a greater power.

* * *

[Translation]

ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Madam Speaker, the Honourable Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Madam Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

And being returned:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate Chamber, the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the Royal Assent to the following bills:

Bill C-21, an act relating to the accounting of certain payments for the servicing and reduction of the debt of Canada—Chapter 18.

Bill C-56, an act respecting the control of government expenditures—Chapter 19.

Bill C-36, an act respecting corrections and the conditional release and detention of offenders and to establish the office of Correctional Investigator—Chapter 20.

Bill C-78, an act to amend certain acts with respect to persons with disabilities—Chapter 21.

Bill C-71, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and other acts in consequence thereof—Chapter 22.

Bill C-59, an act to amend the National Parks Act—Chapter 23.

Bill C-84, an act to amend the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act, the War Veterans Allowance Act and the Pension Act and to amend other acts in consequence thereof—Chapter 24.

Bill C-67, an act to suspend the operation of the Electoral Boundaries Readjustment Act—Chapter 25.

* * *

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Boudria (p.10744).

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, as I was saying before we were interrupted by the requirements of the Governor General, this bill that is being proposed by the government in the dying minutes and hours and days of this session of Parliament before we adjourn for the summer break is a blank cheque. The government is asking for a blank cheque. The minister in charge of the post office is asking for a loaded gun.

He is asking for the authority to dramatically alter the size, shape and purpose of Canada's post office. He is asking for the authority and enabling legislation that will allow him to do it behind closed doors in consultation with senior managers of the post office and in consultation with senior bureaucrats. However, there will be no consultation with the people of Canada and no consultation with the elected members of the House of Commons. That is why I object to the bill.

If the government has a plan to reshape the post office, to change the post office and to alter the post office, then tell us what it is. Do not ask for authority to tinker or to alter or to make unrecognizable Canada's post office without telling us how you intend to do it, tell us up front. However, the government will not do that.

One of my colleagues, the member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception suggested that this is nothing but a Trojan horse. This is a plan to privatize the post office, to break it down, to turn it over to the private sector and to run it on the same principle as McDonald's sells hamburgers.

• (1700)

The member opposite said: "Yes, correct". Even as I say it now—and the cameras do not show it—the member looks at me and with grim determination nods his head yes. All of the witnesses of Canada in this Chamber who can see the hon. member, see him nod his head yes with a grin on his face. He looks like the latest franchise owner of McDonald's hamburgers. He looks like he just had a big mac attack.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I must interrupt the hon. member and ask him to show me indulgence at this time. I promise I will recognize him later.

It being five o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(6), the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

GREEN SHIELD CANADA ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved that Bill S–10, an act to incorporate Green Shield Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Madam Speaker, after the consultations we have had on both sides of the House I would suggest that you would find unanimous consent for the motion that this bill proceed today through consideration at second reading, in Committee of the Whole and at third reading.

I would like to speak very briefly to this bill. It is a very simple matter. It is to straighten the corporate affairs of Green Shield Prepaid Services and to incorporate a new corporation called Green Shield Canada Prepaid Services Association.

The current Green Shield company originated in Windsor, Ontario as a prepaid drug plan service. It has since expanded dramatically throughout Ontario, serving a number of organizations with prepaid drug payment plans and with prepaid legal plans, that class of service. It is a non–profit company.

The company is incorporated provincially in Ontario and it seeks to become a national company. Unfortunately there is no provision either in Ontario law or federal law for it to transfer from one corporation to another corporation, being that it is a non–profit corporation, a not for profit corporation.

The consequence of this bill has been vetted by the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and of course the Minister of Finance. The bill has had a hearing before the Senate.

It is a very regular type of bill. All it really does is take the company that presently operates in this health care field, selling prepaid services to Ontarians, and moves it to a federal corporation so that it will be able to operate and offer its services on a non-profit basis right across Canada.

Madam Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent to treat this as a completed bill with three readings, to treat it on that basis.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to consent to the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Mississauga South. I do not know whether he wants to deal with that by motion now, or whether he is prepared that we make our speeches and then at the conclusion of the second reading speeches we could go into Committee of the Whole and deal with the bill at that point.

I am pleased to consent to that, but I would like to address some remarks on second reading of the bill. If that is satisfactory, I will proceed to that now.

The hon. member for Windsor West, who today is celebrating the 30th anniversary of his election, has asked me to substitute for him in dealing with this bill since he is unable to be here this afternoon. He was here earlier, as Your Honour knows. Unfortunately a meeting in his constituency this evening has taken him away from Ottawa for the time being. He asked me to speak on his behalf in respect of this important bill.

Green Shield has carried on business for some time as incorporated under the Business Corporations Act of the province of Ontario. It has been a company with which many members are familiar, at least Ontario members, because the acquisition of health insurance coverage has been common place, particularly as I recall—and I am going from recollection—on items not covered under OHIP or for persons who are travelling.

I understand the business has been a successful one. It is desired to extend the business of the corporation across Canada so that other Canadians in other provinces are able to take advantage of these services. I presume this will lead some additional service being provided or at least competitive services being provided elsewhere.

I am glad to see the Solicitor General has joined us. I expect he will also be speaking in support of this bill too.

As a result the company has determined that the most effective means of achieving the objective is to apply for incorporation by act of Parliament rather than under the Canadian Business Corporations Act. I note that this bill is intended to incorporate the company on that basis, as incorporated directly by act of Parliament. It is a fairly unusual step to be taken today for new companies. Usually private members' bills that come before us amend incorporating acts of corporations that were incorporated many years ago. However in this case apparently Green Shield has decided to proceed in this way, and that is quite satisfactory.

In addition, as I understand it there was some discussion in the other place when this bill was debated as to what happened to the profits of this corporation. My understanding is that there is a foundation of a similar name which has received these profits over the course of the years Green Shield has been in operation and uses the profits for various charitable purposes.

Also my understanding is that the foundation was incorporated under the laws of the province of Ontario. Therefore, in the event of dissolution of the foundation its moneys would be payable to charitable objects only in Ontario. To resolve that problem, I understand that Green Shield has now incorporated a new foundation under the laws of Canada so that, again in the event of dissolution of the foundation, the profits could be distributed to other charitable objects throughout Canada. I understand that has solved a possible problem with this bill that might have met with some objection as it proceeded through the other place.

I note that my colleague, Senator Frith, made an excellent speech in the other place on this bill in the course of the debate there.

Having dealt with these minor problems of incorporation in various jurisdictions, having dealt with the matter of the disposition of the profits through the charitable foundation, I think the about to become a company, Green Shield Canada, has met the possible objections that could have been raised to the procedure it has chosen to adopt. It has come before Parliament.

We recently passed a resolution waiving the normal notice provisions in respect of the petition, its lateness in any event. That has happened with respect to the three bills we may end up dealing with during private members' hour today.

We are now in a position where the bill can proceed through this House, following which it will receive royal assent. If that happens the company will then be incorporated and everything will move along smoothly.

This procedure is unusual. I think it is the first time an incorporation has been done in this House since I was elected. I am interested that this procedure is still available to corporations or groups of individuals that seek to incorporate in this way. It is an ancient procedure, one that dates back many, many hundreds of years. Certainly many of the early English corporations were established by act of the British Parliament.

• (1710)

The power to carry out this incorporation went on here for some time. There were two principal means. One was the granting of a charter by the Crown such as the Hudson's Bay Company got in our early corporate history. Then as Parliaments got busy passing these private acts incorporating companies, it was decided to proceed with easier techniques by passing things like the Business Corporations Act which allows incorporation without recourse to the legislature. That is the usual way of incorporation in Canada today. This is quite an unusual procedure but nevertheless entirely proper and quite interesting.

For legal students who study corporation law this particular precedent will be an interesting one because of the fact that this corporation clearly carried on business previously in the province of Ontario as a business corporation and through its foundation incorporated in the same province, I am not sure under which act but I expect under the corporations act of Ontario. I suspect there were two different provincial acts involved in the operation of the company.

Having said that, I am pleased to support this bill. I commend the hon. member for Mississauga South for sponsoring it in this House and for his efforts in ensuring all-party support for the bill and the co-operation of members on all sides of the House on its speedy passage. I hope that will be forthcoming a little later this afternoon.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Madam Speaker, I rise to support Bill S-10 which, as has been cited, is an act to incorporate Green Shield Canada at the federal level. As has been pointed out too, it is a rather unusual process that we deal with in looking at this Senate bill.

Of course, as I said, I support it. I should tell the House something about Green Shield. Green Shield is a not for profit company that provides among other things prepaid dental, medical and hospital insurance and has a considerable tradition in this country.

I point out with some pride that it originates in Windsor. It in fact administers some 750 plans with 500 participants and processes nearly five million claims.

Groups served by Green Shield range from as small as six to 35,000 including GM, Ford and Chrysler. Its annual revenue exceeded $200 million in 1991. Its 1992 fiscal plan calls for revenue to exceed $230 million. It is, like the city of its location, a socially useful and dynamic company.

This bill permits the transfer of jurisdiction from Ontario to Canada on terms that provide for appropriate regulatory authority by the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

An incorporation by a special act of Parliament is the only viable option that Green Shield has so that it may realize the goals of federal incorporation and achieve a national scope within a single regulatory framework. Otherwise the process would be exceedingly and excessively complicated.

There has been a thorough review of the bill at both the policy and the regulatory levels. Green Shield representatives have worked closely with the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions and the Department of Finance to ensure that this legislation would be appropriate.

I would only summarize by saying that it is a bill made necessary by a series of complicated circumstances.

The outcome will not only benefit the company, but I can assure you that having Green Shield converted to Green Shield Canada can only accrue to the benefits of Canada and to those who need the kind of services that Green Shield has so effectively provided in the past.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to support this proposal and second reading of Bill S-10.

As has been explained in the Senate and earlier today in the House, the purpose of this legislation is to allow Green Shield Prepaid Services Association to transfer its jurisdiction from Ontario to Canada. Its new name will be Green Shield Canada Prepaid Services Association.

Since Green Shield is a not for profit association, one with no share capital, it is not a simple matter for it to incorporate federally. Under the Canada Business Corporations Act, entities that wish to incorporate must have share capital. Green Shield Prepaid Services Association has no share capital. It has no shares or shareholders.

Similarly, the Ontario Business Corporations Act requires share capital in order to incorporate. In Ontario, Green Shield was incorporated under Part III of the Ontario Corporations Act, and is registered or licensed under the Prepaid Hospital and Medical Services Act.

Because of a defect in the Canada Corporations Act, Green Shield cannot be continued federally. Furthermore, if it did try to incorporate under Part II of the Canada Corporations Act, the statute which deals with the incorporation of not for profit associations without share capital, it could not register or license federally to carry on prepayment plans because there is no federal statute equivalent to the Prepaid Hospital and Medical Services Act.

The remedy, therefore, is incorporation through an act of Parliament and licensing under the provisions of the Insurance Companies Act. This is what is provided for in Bill S-10. I have been assured that this approach has been taken only after extensive consultations with the Ministry of Finance and the Office of the Superintendent of Insurance.

In the Senate it was mentioned that Green Shield introduced the first North American prepayment prescription drug program in the 1950s. Since then, it has extended its coverage from pharmaceuticals to dental, legal and other services, and covers workers in most Canadian provinces.

Though it contracts with employers headquartered in Ontario, the employees who may reside and work outside of Ontario are nevertheless covered by their employer's plan with Green Shield. By incorporating federally, Green Shield will be able to contract with companies that are headquartered outside of Ontario and with individuals who reside outside of Ontario. This is the underlying purpose of Bill S-10.

Turning to the bill itself, I refer members to clause 4, subclause (1) which reads:

> The objects of the Association are to provide, operate and administer prepayment plans throughout Canada.

Prepayment plan as defined earlier in the bill refers to the prepayment of the costs of specified services. The term specified services is itself defined as follows:

> such social, health, dental, legal, pharmaceutical or other services as are specified in a prepayment plan

These are the endeavours that Green Shield is interested in pursuing nationally.

Subclause 4(2) of the bill reads:

> The Association shall carry out its objects as a non-profit organization and for socially beneficial purposes, without purpose of gain for its members, and any profits or other accretions to the Association shall, subject to section 10, be used in promoting its objects.

We have a non-profit organization which will operate prepayment plans for "socially beneficial purposes". If there are any profits, they will be funneled back into the promotion of its objects, namely, the operation and administration of prepayment plans throughout Canada. If they wish to get into other business activities or operate prepayment plans other than those concerning health, dental, legal or pharmaceutical services, subclauses 7(2) and 7(3)d require the consent of the Minister of Finance.

Clause 8 provides that if the directors wish to wind down the company by transferring its prepayment plans to another entity or by selling all or substantially all of its assets, approval must be obtained from its members and the Minister of Finance. If the association is dissolved or wound up, an obvious question is what happens to the assets. After all, there are no shareholders.

• (1720)

Subclause 10(2) provides that following the payment of all obligations the balance is distributed not to the members of the association, but to "such charitable or non-profit corporations as are designated for that purpose in the by-laws". Where there is no designated recipient, subclause 10(3) provides that the Green Shield Foundation will receive the remaining assets.

This non-profit foundation incorporated under Part III of the corporations act of Ontario in the 1970s is not now active. It was established in order to prevent the reoccurrence of the Windsor Medical Services Inc. incident, where, with the introduction of the Ontario Health Insurance Plan in 1969, Windsor Medical Services was wound up and following lengthy litigation, its surplus distributed to the doctors who were members of the corporation.

If Green Shield Canada Prepaid Services Association were to wind up, the surplus would go to a non-profit entity and not to individuals. I also note that clauses 16 and 17 of the bill specify that the Winding-Up Act and the Insurance Companies Act apply to the association. In the case of an involuntary dissolution, both statutes apply. Where there is a voluntary dissolution, only the Insurance Companies Act applies. In either case, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions will play a leading role.

The Superintendent of Financial Institutions also has a role to play if the association wishes from time to time to distribute any surplus it has accumulated. Subclause 10(1) of the Bill S-10 reads:

> When the Association has, in the opinion of its directors, unappropriated surplus in excess of the requirements of the Association, it may, with the approval of the Superintendent distribute all or part of the excess to such charitable or non-profit corporations as are designated therefor in the by-laws.

I assume that the charitable or non-profit corporation that would be the logical candidate for the surplus is the Green Shield Foundation. As for the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, his role would be limited to ensuring that the distribution of a surplus would not endanger the continued viability of Green Shield Canada Prepaid Services Association. The Superintendent would not be concerned with where that surplus went, as long as its distribution was not imprudent.

There are of course certain advantages in activating the Green Shield Foundation. As I mentioned earlier, the association is limited as to the types of activities it may pursue. If it wishes to step outside its authorized activities, permission of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions must be obtained.

The Green Shield Foundation, however, apparently has a greater range of permitted activities. Green Shield could launch initiatives through its foundation that it could not pursue through its association.

There is one aspect of this relationship that intrigues me. If Bill S-10 passes, we will have a federally incorporated association that eventually could be operating throughout the country in every province and territory. It receives payments from individuals and corporations in every region of the country, accumulates a surplus which it then transfers to its foundation under subclause 10(1) of this bill. The foundation then uses this surplus to fund a new scheme. The foundation, however, is incorporated in Ontario, and like the present day association, is limited in its dealings outside the province. The end result is that the foundation launches a new scheme of benefit primarily to individuals and companies resident in Ontario, funded at least in part from the nation-wide operations of the association.

If the foundation as well as the association were incorporated federally, I would not be raising this scenario. In any event, it is difficult to speculate about this without knowing more about the foundation. Perhaps we can pursue that another time.

I suggest that we give this bill second reading and refer it to committee where this issue can be discussed along with other issues. I look forward to hearing from members who are supportive of this and wish it speedy passage.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I understand there is unanimous consent for this motion to be brought to a vote at second reading at this time.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill S-10, an act to incorporate Green Shield Canada.

Clauses 2 and 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Objects of Association

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Chairman, I wonder if the hon. member for Mississauga South could tell us whether the terms of clause 4 are normal for this kind of corporation in Canada. Has he had any opportunity to review any other acts of incorporation?

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Chairman, this is a very standard clause that provides the objects to operate the corporation. I would not think there should be any particular difficulty. The objects speak for themselves.

Clause 4 agreed to.

Clauses 5, 6 and 7 agreed to.

On Clause 8—Transfer of Plans, etc.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member for Mississauga South has inquired whether there would be any tax consequences on the transfer of assets under this bill.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, it is a not to profit corporation so the corporation files are not for profit return as a charity. The consequence is that there are no tax complications that arise as a result of the transfer of the assets of the Ontario corporation and the conversion of the Ontario corporation, as it presently is, to the Green Shield Canada not for profit corporation.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Chairman, could the member tell us whether there is any GST on the transaction?

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, I do not believe there is any GST because it is not selling anything. All it is really doing is transferring a corporation from one jurisdiction to another so that the entity remains the same. It changes its names and its jurisdiction but it remains the same and consequently being no sale, there is no goods and services tax.

Clause 8 agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 16 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 17—Application of the Insurance Companies Act

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Chairman, has the hon. member for Mississauga South checked all these sections of the Insurance Companies Act that may apply to this particular company to make sure that they are all the correct ones?

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Yes, Madam Chairman. The provisions I think the member is speaking about are the Winding Up Act, the Bankruptcy Act and the provisions are particularly eliminated with respect to the transfer and the new association created.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Chairman, the hon. member misunderstood my question. It was in regard to clause 17 of the bill. The provisions of the Insurance Companies Act, there are quite a large number of them, are said to apply to this association. I wonder if the hon. member has had a chance to review all those sections of the Insurance Companies Act and could give us his assurance that these are all the ones that ought reasonably to apply.

• (1730)

Mr. Blenkarn: I have and these indeed are the sections of the insurance act that apply. They are incorporated into this bill because that is the easiest way to put them into this act.

Clause 17 agreed to.

On Clause 18—Amendment to OSFI Act

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): This clause has to do with the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. I wonder if the member from Mississauga could inform the House of discussions with the office of the superintendent and if he believes this is a good piece of legislation.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): To acquaint the House, Green Shield had a series of meetings with the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions on the organization of this bill. The way the bill is presented was the result of those discussions. This legislation is really the creation of the solicitors for Green Shield, together with the office of the superintendent, working through the Minister of Finance, on the incorporation of this bill to transfer from Ontario jurisdiction to federal jurisdiction in the manner of this bill.

Clause 18 agreed to.

Clauses 19 and 20 agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Blenkarn moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to say how pleased I have been to be able to participate in this legislative process this afternoon and I thank the hon. member from Mississauga South for his thorough research in preparation for today's dealings in Committee of the Whole and for his explanation, very succinct and concise, of the purposes of the bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am told that the hon. member might ask for unanimous consent of the House so the House would deal with another bill at this time.

Mr. Porter: Madam Chairman, I rise on a point of order. There have been some consultations across the floor of the House and there may be unanimous consent to deal expeditiously with all three readings of this private member's bill, which has proceeded through the Senate. Bill S–9 is an act to amend the incorporation of the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church. I would seek permission to speak briefly to the bill if I may.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the hon. member to present the bill at this time?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I am prepared to give unanimous consent to proceed with the bill through all stages, but I want to tell the hon. member that I would like an explanation of the purposes of the bill in the course of his remarks. He does not need to keep it short. I would like to hear a good explanation.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is unanimous consent.

* * *

NORTHWEST CANADA CONFERENCE EVANGELICAL CHURCH

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat) moved that Bill S–9, an act to amend an act to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to a Committee of the Whole.

He said: Madam Speaker, Bill S–9 is a very short bill. It contains only two clauses.

The purpose of clause 1 is to remove the present limitation on the value of property that may be held by the church.

Subsection 7(2) of chapter 79 of the Statutes of Canada 1928 at present reads as follows: "The aggregate value of the real estate held by or in trust for the corporation in Canada shall not exceed at any one time the sum of $1 million".

This clause would remove the limitation of the church to hold more than $1 million worth of assets. It does not put any new limitations, it simply removes that particular limitation.

Clause 2 would provide the church with a French name. The French name of the corporation incorporated by the said act is Conseil de l'Église évangélique pour le Nord–Ouest du Canada. I am sure that will come out a lot better in the translation.

The member opposite suggested a detailed explanation. It is basically to reflect the changes in today's society, the real estate values that may have implicated this as it has many other churches in expanding and developing assets across the country.

The second section of the bill recognizes the cultural diversity of Canada and places it within communities in which the second language may be required for those people who are involved. It would assist the church in meeting today's challenges in continuing to serve the spiritual needs of thousands of Canadians.

That is basically what is being asked for, the changes that are requested, and I would respectfully submit that bill today.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went in committee thereon, Mrs. Champagne in the Chair.

The Chairman: House in Committee of the Whole on Bill S-9, an act to amend an act to incorporate the Northwest Canada Conference Evangelical Church.

• (1740)

[English]

Shall clause 1 carry?

On Clause 1—

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Chairman, could the hon. member tell us where this church is incorporated and where its principal assets are?

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Madam Chairman, I believe the church is incorporated in western Canada, in Medicine Hat. The assets would be involved within some of the church organizations that it may have. It has churches in various communities throughout Canada.

I would assume that over the years as they have grown the value and the assets of those properties have probably reached the point where the $1 million limit that was in place in 1928 is irrelevant today. I think that is reason it is being requested.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I was given to understand that there might be a third bill to be dealt with today, Bill S-7. It is on the Order Paper. I wonder if the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader could tell us anything about discussions that may have taken place in respect of that bill?

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, it had been our hope that the three bills, including the one my hon. friend has just mentioned, might be dealt with during private members' hour this day.

The difficulty, as I understand it, is that one of the parties has not had a full opportunity to consult on the bill. The proposal is that Bill S-7, if unanimous consent exists later, not this day but at some other day, might be brought forward.

I believe the examination is nothing more than due diligence and there had not been an opportunity to do so earlier.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I wonder if the parliamentary secretary, in the course of his discussions with the other parties, might also look at Bill C-306, standing in the name of on. member for Restigouche—Chaleur. That bill has been reported from a standing committee. It is back from the committee at the report stage. It is an act to amend to the Department of Forestry Act. I believe it changes the name of the department and does nothing else.

It received full support from all sides of the House when the bill was debated at second reading. I see that it has been reported from the committee with amendments. It strikes me that it might be one that could be adopted before the end of the sitting on June 23 if there was again consent to proceed with the bill.

Given the apparent unanimous agreement in respect of it, I wonder if that could be explored with a view to possibly clearing the item off the Order Paper. Certainly if it were brought forward later, possibly we would have debate in the fall and it would take up one full hour of private members' hour. If called without any opposition, it could be cleared up without taking up the full hour and it would help in the disposition of other business before the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may help both the member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. parliamentary secretary, the bill to which the hon. member refers, in the name of the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur, is on the Order Paper for Monday.

If there are no amendments, the third reading could be given on the same day. I am just saying it as a question of information.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I raised the issue because given my interest in Private Members' Business as a member of the subcommittee of the House management committee on Private Members' Business, I hate to see the hour taken up on Monday if the bill is going to pass without debate.

It is the same as getting two through today. We could have stuck with the rules and only dealt with Bill S-10. We managed to clear off another one, Bill S-9 I believe. We may do Bill S-7 another day.

All I am suggesting is that perhaps we could dispose of the bill at this time without taking up the entire hour. We could then move on to another item of Private Members' Business such as Motion No. 3 on the Order Paper, the motion in the name of Mr. Caccia and have a debate on that instead.

I realize that there are procedural impediments but clearly we have solved a problem for another week by dealing with Bill S-9 today. That is why I was hoping the parliamentary secretary might be able to assist.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the alternate doses of carborundum and grease that we are getting from opposite today.

It is a very constructive suggestion. My friend is not only an expert in parliamentary matters, in procedural matters, he is also a helpful individual. I suspect that he may have been a logger in a previous incarnation because I expect he will be an expert in forest matters when we get to Bill C-306 on Monday.

I think that we are falling into a bit of difficulty here. What my friend has said is helpful but I do not think that it is appropriate to further negotiate the business of the House on the floor of the House. Those discussions, I assure my friend, can take place. I am willing to participate in them behind the curtain.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will now suspend the House until six o'clock. On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, perhaps you will find that there is consent to proceed with Orders of the Day.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that we call it six o'clock and proceed with Government Orders?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CANADA POST CORPORATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Andre that Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Boudria (p. 10744).

Madam Deputy Speaker: There were three and one half minutes left in the speech of the hon. member Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte. I will now recognize the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon.

• (1750)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member who still has three and a half minutes left is in the back, I would be willing to relinquish the floor and begin my speech later.

I appreciate the opportunity to add to the debate we have had for most of this day with respect to the proposed changes in the Canada Post Corporation and what the changes in section 27 of the Canada Post Corporation Act are trying to accomplish.

I should say at the outset that since I have been in the House of Commons, I have followed the issues concerning Canada Post as a critic. I have been very impressed with the majority of things they have been doing in the last three or four years. Their management and their people have tried to bring the delivery of mail and parcels into the 20th century.

I am particularly impressed with Canada Post when I visit their facilities across the country. Members on my side of the House are glaring at me because I am complimenting Canada Post. I will get their comments after I am finished with mine.

Canada Post has the ability to adapt to the manufacturing processes of the 20th century. They take a parcel or a letter or whatever it may be, which they call a unit of production, and figure out the best way to facilitate it. When you take a look at what Canada Post has been doing with respect to management and employee responsibility in such a tiered process, there is a tremendous responsibility at every level of the operation. Many businesses in this country can learn some very important lessons from the way Canada Post handles its operation today.

I also see that in the merchandising and the services it provides. If I recall correctly, at one time it had relinquished the field of delivering parcels and especially letters on time. We find now its merchandising policies and its dedication to providing a service on time is truly a credit not only to those who serve in the management of this Crown corporation, but every person who is responsible for every step of the process for getting a letter or parcel posted in one part of the country and delivered in another in fairly good time. The employees and the management should truly be complimented.

That is why I have some difficulty today trying to understand what Canada Post is attempting to do with the legislation that is before this house. There are many more pieces of legislation that we have to discuss. There is the Immigration Act tomorrow that requires at least 10 days or two weeks of debate and yet we are going to try and cram it into two days and here we are talking about a piece of legislation with respect to changing Canada Post which really makes no absolutely no sense at all.

I will comment in a few moments on why I do not think this legislation should really be here and be discussed and debated in the House today.

Let me say that although Canada Post is truly impressive in a great many areas today, in my judgment it forgot some of the fundamentals of what the Canada Post Corporation truly is.

I come from a mid-sized community, Thunder Bay. I also represent many areas of a rural nature. Nipigon has its own little post office, Red Rock has its own post office, Armstrong has its own post office, Gull Bay is serviced by Armstrong, Dorion just recently closed down its local office and has its facilities handled by good friends of mine, the Atkinson family.

What we find is that in many small rural communities, not only in the area I represent but throughout this country, perhaps the only federal presence we have in that community that is representative or symbolic of Canada is the local post office.

It is the only facility that carries the Canadian flag, that has the Canadian colours, that has the Canadian symbols. This is where Canada Post truly has gone astray. When Canada Post started closing down these rural post offices under the guise of offering better services—it may be offering better services but I am not prepared to make that admission right now—what it is doing is closing down institutions which have been part of rural Canada for the last 100, 115 or 120 years. What is catastrophic is that with the closure of those rural post offices in those small communities it has removed all vestiges of a federal presence.

I do think that given the history of Canada Post and given its background and the services that it provided to this country, not only to large urban centres but throughout the country into small communities, more than anything else is the knowledge of all Canadians that there is a national presence in those small communities. Canada Post provided more than just the delivery of mail, the reception of mail and the forwarding of mail.

That small rural post office has been almost a social net, where people as they get elderly and have lived in a community for years and have had the opportunity to go down and pick up their mail in the morning, meet and discuss items of mutual interest, the post office has become a meeting point. I agree that that is not the responsibility of Canada Post but it is the responsibility of the Canadian government and a responsibility that we have inherited and we should not do away with.

Canada Post in its rural settings not only provides a national presence but it has the ability to assist those people. We all know today that if you do not have some legal training I doubt whether anyone in this country, even with legal training—I have some legal training—can fill out and complete all the forms that most citizens have to do in order to carry on with their day-to-day living.

The forms they have to fill out for their citizenship, to begin with, the forms that they have to fill out for getting their driver's licence, the forms they have to fill out to get their old age security, their old age pension, and the myriad of problems that arise when we have such a social net within our country, Canada Post in its rural setting and through the very fine people who work in those rural post offices, provided that service, provided that advice, provided that assistance to those small communities.

I wonder, when these small rural post offices close down, how those people who before had been able to get that type of assistance through their small rural post office, are going to go to get that assistance now.

Having said what I said at the outset about Canada Post, I think their management has gone just a step too far, and has developed perhaps too intense a business concept. It has forgotten the genesis of Canada Post, its beginnings, what it truly provided for a community. I think Canada Post has lost its way.

The other area that I would like to mention, Madam Speaker, in addition to the closure of so many small rural post offices is this new concept where mailboxes are put at the ends of streets in new developments. That may work in a climate where the sun shines and it only rains once in a while, but it does not work here.

I look at my friend from one of our rural ridings in British Columbia. I know my time is getting short, Madam Speaker, but let me just make the point that his constituents are the same as mine. We all grow older and with the seasonal differences in climate and so on, it is just not as good as it once was.

• (1800)

If we were to do anything in this country that would be beneficial to providing better services for all Canadians, it would be to completely remove those ugly post office boxes at the end of every street and to start delivering mail to every home in this country, as it should be.

I oppose this legislation. I do not know why it is here in this House. I do not think anyone knows why it is here in this House. It makes absolutely no sense that 10 per cent of a corporation would be sold to its employees who do not want to buy it. It provides no security for them. It provides no profit. It provides no gain. I do not know what the purpose of the legislation is.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Madam Speaker, it had not been my intention to speak this afternoon on this particular bill or on the amendment. However, the hon. member for Ottawa West motivated me to do so.

When that member was speaking, she said that the socialists were absent from the debate, socialists who believe in socializing everything, and where were they, why were they not taking part in this debate on this particular bill and on the amendment. She effectively said that we were not taking part in the debate and we were in favour of socializing everything.

She is wrong on both counts. I believe she knows that. I cannot accuse her of telling a falsehood, but I can certainly say that she was exaggerating to say the least.

The socialists of Canada as represented by the CCF and the NDP have never been in favour of socializing everything. However, a service like the post office is a natural candidate for remaining as a government-owned organization. Apart from being a service, it is a monopoly and that is another good reason for it remaining totally under public ownership.

This move by the government to sell off some shares in it is an obvious move to totally privatize it. The socialists who have spoken in this debate—I am not sure how many but two of them today and others on previous occasions—have all opposed the legislation and have supported the amendment to hoist it for six months which of course is killing the bill. We want to do that.

We can all relate our own stories about the post office. I was listening to the member who preceded me and I have some of my own.

I was raised in a relatively small community in British Columbia, South Wellington on Vancouver Island. At that time it had a population of around 500. The post office was a service organization there.

The member talked about various government forms and the assistance that would be given by the postmaster or postmistress in filling them out. Passport applications and old age pension applications, the many forms that one needs in dealing with government which are now picked up by going to a special office in a city could then be picked up at the local post office. Help was available if needed so it was not just forms.

In South Wellington in those days there was one telephone in the community. It was in the post office. Beside the post office was a family-owned grocery store. It was in the same building as the post office but separated by a door that could be locked on occasion. If the telephone rang in the post office and there was a genuine emergency, then it was not beyond members of that family to go and get the person who was required to answer the phone. On other occasions, the phone could be used by people coming into the post office for that purpose.

The post office itself, as well as providing forms, was also the nearest thing to a bank that was available to many people. It provided services which are currently available only in banks, a savings organization that was available to the post office. Postal money orders could be purchased in the post office. It really was something that tied Canada together.

If the mail was piling up for one individual, then the postmistress would advise a neighbour. She would perhaps say to the neighbour: "Would you like to deliver this mail to that person?" That is, if it was not registered mail. Or alternatively ask: "Have you seen that person lately? Is he or she well? Is there some problem? Would you like to look in on that person?" With messages like that people looked after each other in those days. The post office was the place that brought them together, the common place where people called, where they met each other and talked. It was a social centre.

It was more than a social centre. It served the people of that community of South Wellington as it did many other communities all across Canada. Today it is not a service organization, it is profit driven. We have lost something in that.

The post office boasts of its success when it makes a profit. In this particular year, I understand it is not making a profit. It is experiencing a loss of some tens of millions of dollars. It mismanaged employer-employee relations to the extent there was a very serious work stoppage, a result of an argument between employers and employees, which cost a lot of money to give something less than proper service to the people.

Whenever there is that kind of stoppage it cannot be blamed on one group or the other. One can certainly say that Canada Post has to take more than its share of the blame for that work stoppage.

It resulted in the loss of service and resulted also in the tens of millions of dollars of losses the corporation will be reporting this year. But that is not so important. It is the service that was lost. Losing money is important, particularly at this period in the history of Canada, but more important is the loss of service.

Loss of service not just because of that work stoppage but loss of service because Canada Post is retreating from its previous policy of taking its service to the people. Instead it is saying: "You come to us. We are not here to serve you. We are here to offer something if you wish, but you have to come to us. Look for us, find us somewhere, and you can then make use of our services."

It is cutting back on the variety of services, the things that used to be available in post offices, making it more difficult for people generally to get whatever service they want from that post office, by having to go further, by having to drive.

In the days I was talking about there was one car in the area of the community in which I lived, one automobile. Now, of course, everyone drives. They go much shorter distances than we had to go to pick up our mail. But in those days we walked to get the mail.

In those days the post office was a service. I do not think it was losing money in those days either, but it offered services far beyond those offered today. It helped to keep Canada together as a nation. It helped maintain contact between people who now find it difficult to maintain contact.

We should be trying to improve that as a service. We should maintain it as a publicly owned organization, an organization that because it is a monopoly and because it is a service, should be a service oriented organization, should be publicly owned and not privatized as this legislation provides.

We have no hesitation. All of the New Democrats when this bill comes up for a vote will be voting in favour of the motion to hoist, recognizing that what we are doing is killing the bill.

We are hoping that we can achieve that and kill it at least until after the election. Hopefully then the new government will turn the clock back and start improving Canada Post, start improving it from the point of view of providing and maintaining a service to people rather than boasting about profits that it makes from not providing an efficient service.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, I join in this debate on Bill C–73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act, to register my disagreement with the government strategy dealing with Canada Post.

Members on this side of the House have found it very difficult dealing with Canada Post on any grounds. Rather than look at the questions of service and responsiveness to Canadians this government is looking at changes in ownership patterns. It is avoiding the major issue it is supposed to be facing.

I was happy to hear that the previous speaker from the NDP was quick to praise the operations of Canada Post in the old days under the Liberal Party. It is not very often we hear such complimentary comments. We all know that even in those days there were a few problems, but I thank him very much for his support and we hope to be able to return it to the fine levels of service in the next few months and years.

• (1810)

What has struck me, as a member of Parliament, is when looking at which departments are easy to deal with and which departments are totally incompetent, totally unable to respond and totally unable to answer a basic question, on a scale of negatives, Canada Post is front and centre.

Never in all my time as a member of Parliament have I ever been treated so poorly as I have in dealing with Canada Post. The only other organization to treat me so poorly was General Motors but that is another story for another time.

In dealing with Canada Post, I am struck by the fact it is unable to understand that its strategy may be wrong, it may in fact be making a mistake, that it should make changes.

When dealing with the Department of Employment and Immigration for example, the regional director will sit down and talk with a member of Parliament and say: "Well we only have so much money. We think we are going to do it this way. What do you think?" Do you know what? Its officials respond. They talk and they come up with a strategy. It may not always be the one wanted but you know it is the lack of questions dealing with the regional public administration in this House concerning employment and immigration. It is because of that level that these people seek out members of Parliament and try to develop a consensus.

On the other hand, Canada Post sends what can only be described as God–awful notices at the last minute on a Friday afternoon to indicate that on Monday something is being closed down. Its officials will meet you, under duress, but normally speaking they will not. If they do meet you under duress, it is to explain why things cannot be changed, and they always look so sad.

There was a period two years ago where I had a number of changes in the organization of mail services in Winnipeg North Centre. One of the key points of survival of an older community and older neighbourhood like Winnipeg North Centre is as it goes through a period of decline everyone wants out.

Businesses want out because they are insecure. They have older buildings or the streets are insecure or there is a poor traffic pattern. People living in older homes decide not to fix them up. So it is really up to public institutions to maintain an infrastructure, to make it easy for those who stay there to maintain a life in an older neighbourhood.

Let us take the matter of pulling out the services of mailing parcels, a very simple thing. Older Europeans living in Winnipeg North Centre send parcels back home. All of a sudden, they have to go far away to be able to do it.

Canada Post pulls out a map and says: "This is not far away, Mr. Walker, it is close by. Look at it." I say: "Have you ever got on a bus with those parcels? Do you know that the bus turns that way and the post office is that way? Do you know that you have to walk across seven lanes of Main Street, the worst street in urban Canada and wait for the bus and then get off and walk back across the street?" "Well, Mr. Walker, we have research," they say. I say: "Well that is great, is it market research?" They say: "It is great market research." I say: "Well I spent a couple of years doing market research." They say: "Great, we will get the guy to call you. You will have a great conversation."

It is now 24 months and counting and I am sure one day he will call me and have that meeting. If Canada Post is not willing to sit down and have this basic discussion about the information in which it is changing around communities then why should it be allowed to develop a corporate plan independent of parliamentary scrutiny? The answer is that it should not be allowed to. This government should take responsibility for what it is doing because it is withdrawing basic services.

Back to that famous postal station where these people have to go down Selkirk Avenue, across the street, up on the bus route, and across the street to do their services. Well the post office is now making it more convenient for them. It has closed that post office so they do not have to worry about trying to go there, they can try to find somewhere else.

The frustration that we have is not in dealing with change, because no one in the House of Commons believes that there are not some changes in the service, but in dealing with the quality of the change process. If I phone up public relations in Ottawa and say: "This is what has happened to me in Winnipeg," they reply: "I cannot believe how bad the guys in Winnipeg are. They should not treat you that way, Mr. Walker. We will look right into it." He is right there beside the market researcher and returning phone calls. If phone calls to members of Parliament are not returned, my basic question is to whom do they return them? The answer is that they do not return them to anybody. The frustration with such a basic thing as the postal service is incredible when it should not be that way because you have to manage change.

A few minutes ago the member from Thunder Bay was up talking about what was going on in Red Rock and Nipigon and communities in his constituency. Three years ago, he and I were involved with a non-partisan tour reviewing the cutbacks of VIA Rail. We invited, in good faith, the Solicitor General who was the Minister of Transport. He was offered the opportunity, but VIA Rail was so busy that there was no seat available for the minister. He could only watch us from CTV and CBC.

We asked what the backbone of federal presence was in a town like Red Rock. There were two things. They were VIA Rail and Canada Post.

The government has taken out VIA Rail and that leaves Canada Post. You just heard the member talk about the quality of service as a result of recent decisions. We could go across the country, community by community, and make suggestions to the government as to how to look at issues as they are. One issue is ownership by employees when employees through their unions have made it quite clear that they do not want that strategy. It is trying to dump on to the employees, something they do not want. You have to ask what it is doing.

You say to yourself that perhaps there is a certain class of employees that is more interested than others. That is not ever spoken about and perhaps we should talk about that. Perhaps it is the first stage of getting the public used to thinking of Canada Post as shares and shareholders. Perhaps the next step after that is privatization.

If privatization is the issue, then put it on the table fellow members of Parliament. Put it on the table, Mr. Minister. Let us see the privatization strategy of this government. Let us not see this piecemeal strategy from one community to the next. Let us have a strategy for dealing with postal service in this country that makes sense. Let us see if this organization can manage change.

It was very boastful two years ago, but now we hear it is going to lose money.

When is that going to be announced? It will probably be late Friday afternoon when no one is paying attention.

Mr. Lewis: No, Wednesday.

Mr. Walker: Wednesday? It will be after we have gone home. Oh, that's brilliant. Tuesday? Wednesday? This is it. This is like drawing straws. These guys cannot figure which day is the most convenient for them.

I am sure that at the last possible moment we will hear the bad news. I am sure it will be lost because there has been nothing but bad news from this government. That is perhaps another question.

I stand up to oppose what is a very poor piece of legislation. Our critic has had a detailed explanation of our position. He gave it several says ago. Many members from this side have stood up to make the same arguments. We in this particular party have led the charge for the modernization of Canada Post, but in a responsible way that improves communities.

The government makes light of the fact that changes have to be brought in a responsible fashion. It will pay the price for that.

Madam Speaker, I call upon the government to withdraw this piece of legislation and start over again with building a more responsible postal service.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in this debate and urge the House to support the motion that would cause consideration of this bill to be postponed for six months.

This debate on second reading gives us all an opportunity to bring before the House the problems that each of us get from day to day with Canada Post and to look at the administration of Canada Post.

I would first like to focus on the larger issue of Canada Post's labour relations. I practised labour law and they used to talk a lot about labour problems. Most of the time when there are labour problems, the real issue is management problems. Good corporations which have good labour relations have properly dealt with those relations.

Canada Post has, without question, the worst labour relations of any company in Canada over any extended period of time. There can be no doubt that it is the experience of all of us that the source of the problem is the management policy of Canada Post. The Conservatives seem to consistently endorse these policies.

Here is a company which still has over 100,000 grievances outstanding. I have personal experience from arbitrators who have been asked to deal with this. The inability of management in this case to get its act together has been completely beyond their experience. There is no doubt where the responsibility lies for this mountain of grievances that remain unresolved. It is with the management of Canada Post. They are unable to deal with the simplest of grievances. They allow them to build up, issue after issue after issue, so that the employees are effectively deprived of what they are entitled to under the law, which is a reasonable disposition of their grievance. That right has evaporated.

• (1820)

The Canada Labour Code has an essential bargain with the labour movement that falls within its jurisdiction. The bargain is this. If one gives up one's right to strike, except at the end of a contract, then the Parliament of Canada will assure an individual an efficient system of disposition of grievances. There is a system set up in legislation to do that. It is reinforced by the collective agreement.

However, here we have a management which has intentionally gone out to destroy the system by failing to deal with it. If anyone argues about the intention of Canada Post management in this regard, you first have the principle that their intention is judged by the effect of their acts. The effect is clearly to destroy the collective bargaining system and the grievance system. Second, it is clearly consistent with everything else that Canada Post management has done. It also spills over into the way in which they deal with the general public.

Let me say that in addition to the pile of grievances which have created an intense morale problem within Canada Post from coast to coast to coast, we see their other work—if it can be called that—with their employees through the rest of the collective bargaining process.

The employees of Canada Post—and I ask those from across the country who are listening to compare it to their own circumstance—have been three years without a collective agreement. Their management has not had the will or the ability to reach a collective agreement for three years. Only with the intervention of this Parliament was there any wage increase voted and that was after Canada Post broke its word to this Parliament and to its employees during the strike last year.

Canada Post, at that time, agreed on certain terms and conditions about the arbitration under which back-to-work legislation would be voted on. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers kept its side of the bargain and withdrew the picket lines. However, the moment the legislation was adopted and the workers went back to work, Canada Post took its part of the bargain off the table. It left the employees and the arbitrator without the agreement they had had from Canada Post.

We have an arbitrator now working on a collective agreement that is going into its fourth year. We have the grievances, the failure to have a collective agreement and a persistent pattern of management which seems designed to bring the whole post office machinery to a halt.

I will conclude with a reference to the other aspects of this "management" that the government wants its employees to buy into.

Each of us in our ridings have different problems, but let me refer to a couple in my riding. First, in Victoria, if you want to complain about the service of Canada Post you end up phoning somebody in Vancouver who has no idea where anything is in Victoria in any event and is usually not well trained to deal with the issue. This is a matter of intense frustration—and that is after you have had to take a long time trying to get through on the phone—to the people of Victoria.

The capacity for the public to make complaints or even ask questions about what is happening in Canada Post has been removed from our community which, after all, is the capital of British Columbia, a city of over 300,000 people. It has further taken the ability to actually confront a human being on a person to person basis. All you get is a disembodied voice on a telephone that does not know the nature of the problem in any event.

However, when you can get through that bureaucracy and you can get someone to respond, you get bafflegab. The best example I have is a problem we had in our constituency with condominium apartments. Canada Post decided it was going to compete with those companies that hand out flyers and it was going to offer a service to the companies that wanted the flyers delivered. It provided its own delivery system and hired workers who were non-union, non-bonded.

Mr. Lewis: Good.

Mr. Brewin: The Solicitor General says good, which tells you something about this government's attitude toward the rights of employees to collective bargaining.

It hired non-union employees to go around and deliver these on the weekend. It turned over the keys to apartment buildings which it had entrusted to the letter carriers, to these young kids who go out without a uniform on a Saturday or a Sunday. They were allowed into the building from dawn until late at night. They had complete access to the post boxes of all those who lived in the building. There are many, many seniors who live in these buildings who are very concerned about security. It created a great fear within many people about the lack of security this involved.

When we started talking to Canada Post about this, we discovered the heart of corporate mentality. It said the customers want this and that. It dawned on us, a group of seniors from these condominiums and me, listening to this official from Canada Post talk, that the customer to Canada Post is no longer the general public. It is no longer the individual member of this community. It is no longer the Canadian citizen and resident who established Canada Post through Parliament in the first place. It is now the commercial venture that wants to peddle its junk mail on the weekends.

I submit that what we have seen is the privatization of the mentality of Canada Post and this bill represents the first step toward the legal privatization of Canada Post because the bill provides for the establishment of shares which in this first instance will be available to the employees. However, it will merely take a stroke of the pen to extend them to those who wish to buy up our postal service and complete the process of privatization which has already begun.

It is a great tragedy for this country that what was an important public service has been destroyed by this government and its predecessor over a period of time. No longer can we say we have a confident Public Service designed to serve the people of Canada. We have an increasingly private company designed to serve the corporate sector in this country. It is a tragedy and a sad day for Canada that this has happened.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address this issue, Bill C-73, an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act.

I find it a little strange that we are debating a bill called the Canada Post bill. It seems to me that the first principle is that the bill should reflect the reality that is out there. As far as I can recall, we have removed that reality. The name Canada Post, Postes Canada, is now called Mail/Postes. We have removed the name Canada.

• (1830)

Why are we calling this bill the amendment to same when it is no longer a reality?

Second, and more sadly I guess, is the implication behind the changes that have taken place to Canada Post. I cannot help but call it Canada Post because that is what it is in my memory bank and that is what it has meant to me as a citizen living in a major city but one who has also lived in the country and been part of that small constituency that appreciates and enjoys and recognizes the importance of a rural post office.

I know that when we go to the country in the summertime the first thing we look forward to is going to visit our local little post office. We walk the several miles. It is actually three and a half miles from our home in La Macaza. You go and chat, you meet all the locals, you catch up on the winter stories, what has gone on with everybody, who is well and who is sick, who has graduated from school, where they have a new job, meeting the new children and so on. It is really the centre of communal life in the small rural communities. One of the unfortunate realities of what has happened to Canada Post is the closing down of much of rural Canada.

Mr. Lewis: Rural Canada is alive and well.

Mrs. Finestone: I would suggest that the Solicitor General can make his observations. He is entitled to his point of view. I will respect the difference in his point of view. I hope he has at least the decency to respect and listen to what I have to say.

One of the other things that I would find as I went to Canada Post and to my local post office is that I could pick up forms, I could get information, I could send a money order or a money cheque because there was nothing available, no banking services. It was an important institution in the life of the community.

It seems rather a sad critique on this country and how we are looking to building a sense of Canadian unity, a sense of Canadian identity, when we would first of all remove, certainly in rural Quebec, one of the few places where you would see a Canadian flag in every little town through which one would travel. You would have the sense that you are a part of Canada because of the name Canada Post, Poste Canada.

It also would seem to be that if you move from the country area where it serves that important link, you move back into the city area and think about what Canada Post did on a national scale. Canada Post was a vital element in the supplementation and the subvention of our communication links through our magazines and our community newspapers and our books. Canada Post provided an important subsidy to the delivery of magazines and books and community newspapers and the little church newspapers that kept everybody in the countryside and in the community district well informed of what was going on at the local level.

The government has seen fit to cut more than half the kinds of money used to support our community newspapers. It is a very sad day if you add up all the factors that are cutting down the identifications that represent Canada and that make us feel there is a sense of nationhood. After all, we are more than just the reception and the delivery of service as a postal service. We are also the centre of much business activity.

That business activity which we subsidize in the way of books and literature and community news had a vital role to play. You come from an area where you had a community newspaper, you wrote articles in your community newspaper and members of your constituency have been deprived in many cases of your wise counsel occasionally, some that I would agree with and some that I would not agree with.

On the other hand, you had subsidized air freight and that has been reduced to the Northwest Territories and northern Quebec. If you have seen the price of a loaf of bread and meat and general food up in the north you would know how important that postal subsidy was.

Another thing came to my attention and it is just of recent date that I have noticed this. I do not know about you but as a young person I used to collect stamps and I used to collect the little identifications where the stamp came from. I remember being excited when it came from Europe and what little town it came from in France or England or Israel.

I used to know where it came from and they knew it came from Montreal and they knew that it was perhaps from one of their other friends in the city of Montreal. No longer. It says Canada and the date. That is all it says. Look at the cancellation stamps on your envelopes and see if you do not feel there is a loss of a sense of identity across this country because of a silly little thing like that.

I know this is all in the interest of business and certainly I do not agree that one should stay frozen in time. This is a changing society. It is certainly one in which we have moved to the electronic era, to instant communication of all kinds. The fax machine is a perfect example. I do not know now what we would do without the fax and without the car phone. I know life would not be as easy to get along with and we certainly could not cope with lots of things.

I am not saying we should not move forward but I am saying there may be lots of important business principles that are fundamental and changes are needed in our country. A country is not just a business. It is something we seem to have forgotten and I think that is a sad commentary and maybe it is part and parcel of the reason why we are all so cranky out there. We forgot there is something special about a country that is not bottom line business management.

City names have been removed from the cancellation stamps and now you only have a postal code, so you lose your local and regional identity. If you remove "Canada" from Canada Post and if you remove the flag from the rural and urban towns you have a loss of sense of unity. You have something rather strange going on in this particular bill in which the government feels that it should privatize—I should suggest not privatize, although I think that is what is in its mind as you look down the road. Rather, that it is going to sell 10 per cent of the shares to the workers at Canada Post.

I would like to know what kind of a gift package that really is. Canada Post last year lost something in the order of $100 million. You tell me as an enlightened person, are you going to go out and buy shares in a company that is losing $100 million? I do not know about you but I would not do that and I do not know that many of my friends or family would do that. I do not know why the minister thinks this is the greatest thing since sliced bread, that he is offering the workers of Canada Post who, by the way, have the worst record in the world as workers. I do not know if it is their fault or that of the inside organization or the management but they certainly do not have the best reputation in the world.

This minister tells us that this is a great scheme. He is going to sell of 10 per cent of the shares of Canada Post to its employees. As I said, I did not think it was such a great idea and then I come across the fact that the Conservative majority on the committee that was studying some of the proposals around what to do with the Canadian post office said in its recommendation number 36 that the Government of Canada should privatize Canada Post once adequate financial performance comparable to the private sector levels has been attained and once the industrial relations climate has been improved.

I do not think we have reached the financial well-being of the country, nor does it seem to me that the total industrial relations have been straightened away so that it would seem that even the opposite side of this House would agree that this would be a good idea.

It is our sense that Canada Post should remain a Crown corporation. It should remain a Crown corporation because it should serve us and serve the individual in our society. That is the whole point of having a postal service for anyone.

I do want to talk about one particular problem in my riding that I hope whatever happens will be addressed. That is the question of the supermailboxes. In my riding, in the new areas and in some of the older areas, the giant green supermailboxes are out there. I do not know if the postal service thought you should have one answer for anywhere across this land but in this city, in Mount Royal riding, in the kinds of streets and the type of people we have with the rough ice and snow that piles up, the cold and the sleet and the rain, and particularly the seasons of the year which are very difficult, the senior citizens in my riding cannot get to those boxes. They have difficulty opening the boxes. I would think that service to every home and every door in the metropolitan areas is an absolute must. I would like to see that extended to all the urban areas.

• (1840)

I can understand where that would be difficult in small towns, although I must say that there was a delivery by car and a lovely postman who used to drive up and drop the mail in your little box. It was a really important part of catching up on the news and gossip.

In the major cities in a northern country like Canada, we cannot afford to allow people to go out in the inclement weather and not be able to pick up their cheques.

Mr. Sobeski: It is healthy for them.

Mrs. Finestone: You think it is healthy for them. Well, not all these people are as healthy as you are and may you keep your good health.

Mr. Lewis: Come to a small town and find out.

Mrs. Finestone: All I can tell you is that it is not the best way. I object, Mr. Speaker. I would like to finish by saying that I really object to this legislation. It is not in the best interest of Canada. It is not in the best interest of the workers. There are a lot of things we can do to improve it, but this is not the right route. I would like it reconsidered.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, as I commence my remarks on Bill C–73, a bill to make changes to the post office act, what could I possibly say about the post office that has not already been said in this House over the last 100 or so years. I venture to suggest that everything that could possibly be said about the economies of scale, the cost of postage, the efficiencies of service, the hirings and firings and the patronage and the locations and closings of post offices around the country has all been said 100 times or more.

This particular bill has been described by our critics as the thin edge of the wedge in a privatization. While it in fact is not a privatization, they view it as a precursor piece of legislation. To say the least, they are very cautious about it.

Canada Post is by all measurements a large corporation in significant transition. It has had to move from the age of the hard copy, the hand-written letter, into the age of electronics. It now has competition in terms of communication from other couriers who handle niche markets from the fax machine and from parcel deliveries. In fact, if you think about it, what has really occurred is that the post office this country set up many years ago to handle the mail was to do its job then working with virtually the only medium that existed at that time for communication. In a sense the post office then had a monopoly on the totality of communication beyond the spoken word and that was the written word put in a letter, stamped and delivered by hand to somebody in another location.

Since we gave the post office that monopoly, copying many other countries around the world, we now communicate in many different ways. The simple radio was a means of communication. We have television and other electronic devices I made reference to. This means that no longer do we have to rely on the post office as a monopoly conveyer of communications. That has changed the role of the post office. That is why in some quarters the post office is looked upon as a candidate for privatization. It is not a monopoly, it is not an essential service the way it was 100 years ago, therefore, it may be a role that government does not have to play anymore. That has been suggested and our critics are very cautious about that.

The first thing I want to say about privatization is that our party is not prepared to accept half a privatization, a tentative or a punitive privatization or a little bit or a trial privatization. You cannot have half a privatization. Therefore, we are not prepared to support this initiative because it looks good.

I recall earlier in the day when someone asked the same question: Is this a privatization? There was one member opposite who was nodding his head. I know he does not speak for the government, or nod his head for the government, but there is a real sense in this House that the post office is a candidate and this bill is a precursor of that.

Other privatizations this House has looked at and accomplished by legislation over the last few years have made us aware of potential problems, challenges in the process of privatization, and none of that has been addressed as we look at the post office. It is totally premature to look upon this as a possible entry point to privatization.

One of those problems, of course, in privatizing is to get a handle on the value of the assets. In this case I recall in the early 1980s the process by which all of the lands which were used by post offices and owned by Public Works on behalf of Canada and its taxpayers were simply transferred to Canada Post. Millions and millions of dollars worth of real estate in large cities, small towns, villages all over the place was simply transferred to Canada Post without reference to its asset value. We have not begun to assess that asset value in Canada Post.

We on this side of the House are not in the business of giving blank cheques to the government. That is conceptually why we do not want to support this legislation here today.

I noted earlier today what for me was a very sad event. I am not so sure all members had noted it, but we gave third reading to a bill, Bill C–55, governing pensions here earlier today. Within that bill there were two clauses whereby this House gave the Governor in Council the right to make regulations which would override the provisions of the very statute we were passing. That is the first time I am aware this happened in this House.

Some members spoke to it last night but the government did not want to listen. That was called a Henry VIII clause. It is a reference to the last time in history when this really happened in a big way. It was when Henry VIII back in the 1500s decided he wanted that power over Parliament. He wanted the right to override by proclamation provisions of statutes that were passed by the House of Commons, by the Parliament in England.

He got that power, he forced it on Parliament, and the only time Parliament was able to get rid of that was when Henry VIII died, and they did get rid of it. I just want to point out that we in this House gave a blank cheque today to the Governor in Council to make regulations to override what was in our statute.

An hon. member: That was the most ridiculous thing.

Mr. Lee: That is not just a blank cheque, that is an abdication of our parliamentary responsibilities. If there ever was a thin edge of the wedge that is it. I am cautioning Parliament in that regard.

This bill is purporting to offer a form of employee participation in the profits of Canada Post. There was a time when Canada Post did not look for profits but in this case the corporation has modernized itself and it is pursuing improving economies, better management, more efficiency, and lo and behold, profit.

It has managed to derive a profit based in part I might add by the fact that it is not in a position where it has to write off or depreciate all of these assets of real estate and buildings that were given to it by the taxpayer about 10 years ago. That is water under the bridge. It is potentially a very healthy corporation and there is no reason in the world why it cannot break even and make a profit.

In any event the goal as I understand it from this legislation is to permit employees of Canada Post to participate in those profits, a form of profit-sharing by letting them acquire by purchase—although it does not say purchase—maybe the shares will be given as gifts, we do not know, with a limit of 10 per cent on the number of shares. They would be non-voting shares and they would be sold, given, transferred or rewarded to employees. In principle, one does not see much wrong with that unless you stop and look at the fact that we have a Crown corporation. I am not comfortable mucking around with the capital structure of a Crown corporation until we in this House have decided what we are going to do with the Crown corporation.

• (1850)

If this House had decided that it was going to be split seven ways or privatized or restructured in any way, then we could talk about all of these other things and business principles.

Right now I think the government is just trying to slide in a little bell and whistle here that is premature because this House has not decided what it wants to do with Canada Post. I know the government has not. If it has, it had better come clean and tell us and not try to slide the thing through with a bill like this.

Let me wrap up and indicate non-support of the bill. I caution about embarking on a quasi-pseudo privatization without fully endorsing the concept and thinking it through and valuing the assets. I caution also about the kind of clause that was contained in the bill earlier today.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

The amendment is negatived on division.

Amendment (Mr. Boudria) negatived.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to continue this debate, focusing on one of the points that my colleague from the town of Mount Royal made about federal presence.

Before I get into the point of federal presence, I want to say up front that I am a fan of the post office of Canada. I know that the post office is probably one of the most efficient companies in Canada.

I remember back in 1981 when we were having difficulties with the post office. There was a major strike on at that time. The efficiency experts went into the post office. They were the types of people who used the same sort of measurement and standards they used in all corporations across Canada. When the study was finished, they discovered that the post office was one of the most efficient companies in all of Canada. It was running at about 97 per cent or 98 per cent efficiency.

When we got these numbers we were absolutely flabbergasted at how the post office could be this efficient and why so many people were upset with the post office. We focused on the area of metropolitan Toronto, which had a very high level of productivity and efficiency. This was even before it was in this mode of privatization.

The problem is that when 20 million pieces of mail are handled in a day, if 2 per cent of that mail does not get delivered within a cycle, which I think at that time was about 48 or 72 hours, then all of a sudden people start complaining; oh, I didn't get my mail on time, et cetera. But 2 per cent or 400,000 pieces out of 20 million pieces is really, by industry standards, not that bad.

As Canadians we do not really appreciate the post office as much as we should. But I take the government to task on this issue of dismantling the post office. When the member from Saskatchewan was talking earlier today, he talked about the fact that in his province close to 100 rural post offices had been closed down. In the country within the last seven years over 1,000 post offices had been closed. When the member for Halton—Peel said earlier today that he did not want to spend taxpayers' money subsidizing post offices, that is not the way to look at it.

We should realize that these post offices are instruments for pulling the country together, that they are a federal presence. Do not just think of the post office as delivering mail, think of what other supplemental services can be added to the post office so that the federal presence in the community can be enhanced. If there is one thing that we need in this country today it is national instruments that will pull us together. We need the federal presence in this country more than we have ever needed it before.

We know, for example, in some provinces in this country that they do not even fly the Canadian flag. One thing for sure about the post office; you could always count on the Canada word mark, that is the word Canada with the little flag over the a. Remember when that first space arm was opened up in outer space and that Canada word mark was on the side of that Spar Aerospace arm? That Canada with the flag over it gave everybody in this country a great sense of pride, a great sense of appreciation for the talent and the technology of Canadians. It was a patriotic feeling.

The post offices in this country, especially in rural areas, provide that same kind of feeling. They are not just delivery systems, they are symbols of the Government of Canada.

I was approached in my riding office about three weeks ago by a group called the Falcon Group of Canada. In fact, one of their offices is based here in Ottawa. These people have developed a very special technology and they have sold this technology to the United States postal system. It is called the "Postal Buddy Corporation". This postal system, which is like a computerized technology, allows postal patrons to file changes of address, notification for publications of their new address, it prints postage-paid change of address cards, it will organize information on travel trips across Canada. It is very exclusive technology and was developed here in Canada. Interestingly enough, it has been sold to the U.S. postal service before it has been sold to ours. I find that interesting. Mind you, I think that the postal service is going to be seeing them in the next week or so.

• (1900)

Here is an example of a Canadian technology, designed and made in this country, which allows the post office to be more than a place where you buy your stamps and get your money orders. It allows the postal service to have new opportunities for generating more revenue and to make it more profitable. That is where the post office should be heading.

If the revenue was there to make it a self-sustaining unit, especially in the rural areas, then surely to goodness the government would not be so preoccupied with closing all of these places which are instruments of national unity.

This debate tonight, where we are focusing on this 10 per cent employee equity participation bill, really should not be a front burner item right now. We should be using the post office to pull us together, to put the federal presence right across this country, especially when it is so inexpensive to set up and operate a post office.

When we get in this bill to where we are talking about this share distribution for employees, I say to myself that first of all there is absolutely no share rights in this share distribution. There is no definition as to how we are going to put a value on this. Just think of the massive amounts of land that the post office owns from coast to coast. How is that going to be factored into the value of the company? Quite frankly, I have never seen a real evaluation for the postal service in this country. I have never seen an evaluation for the land of the post office. How can we going to put a value on these shares?

We know the mistake that was made when we did the share offering on Air Canada. We put it out at almost $2.50 less than what the analysts said it was worth.

Mr. Soetens: What is it trading for now?

Mr. Mills: The member for Ontario asks what is it trading for now. That is another reason why we should not be in such haste to put out equity in the post office at this moment because the value of those shares is very low, especially property values.

Mr. Soetens: We made the right decision with Air Canada.

Mr. Mills: Well, you did not really make the right decision in the long-term and I will tell you why you did not make the right decision. The Government of Canada has now lost its ability to use Air Canada as an instrument of public policy.

That is the one major difference I have with many members on the government side. I really believe that there are times when these instruments like VIA Rail, Air Canada and the post office are instruments of public policy-making and the most important thing that we could be using them for today is pulling the country together.

Look at some of the tremendous difficulties that we are having, not every one but a lot of us, with the Voyageur Program, which is a fabulous program. I salute the Secretary of State for that program, but if we do not follow the programming of Air Canada then there are a lot of youth in this country who are going to miss the boat on the Voyageur Program.

Getting back to the post office, I have always been a big fan of the post office. I am not against equity participation, but at this moment in time when we have so little real definition to give for the value of these shares I just do not think it is a priority issue and it should be put on the back burner.

Let us go back to using the post office of Canada as an instrument to pull this country together. Let us also start looking at some of the alternative ideas out there for rural post offices so that they can provide more sophisticated services like the ones that this Falcon group provides.

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to speak to the House today about Bill C-73 which will enable Canada Post Corporation to create an employee share ownership plan to allow employees to invest in their company.

Canada Post has changed to better serve Canadians and to meet the challenges of the globally competitive world evolving around us. The participation of employees through the share plan is a common sense next step to ensure that improvement continues.

Over the last 10 years this corporation has learned a lot about corporate reshaping. Its management took the government department it inherited, stripped it down to the basics and rebuilt it. That modern post office began in 1981 when Parliament took some 63,000 employees, fully one-quarter of the Canadian Public Service and said: "Okay, you are a business. Act like a commercial corporation".

Back in 1981 the mail had become increasingly irregular. Strikes denied Canadians their postal service for weeks at a time. Annual deficits reached $600 million at that time and to try and equate that, it worked out that probably 5 cents on every letter that was mailed was a subsidy that the taxpayers paid.

The plants of Canada Post 10 years ago were inefficient. They were outdated and contained obsolete equipment. Previous governments had always found more pressing needs for their limited resources than investing in the capital assets for the post office.

This new Crown corporation had annual revenues of more than $1.5 billion but it had no accounting system. It operated from one end of the country to the other but no one knew where the money was going at any given time.

In order to meet the enormous task that lay ahead Canada Post had to begin thinking like a business. By asking Canada Post to prepare and submit annually for approval a five-year corporate plan the government recognized and encouraged this needed change in attitude. As a result Canada Post began to emphasize a corporate culture stressing such values as customer sensitivity, quality, and reliability.

These values are not easily instilled but the corporation has worked over the years to ensure that these will be the values which their employees live day to day.

It is no exaggeration to say that changes the corporation had undergone are staggering. They stood everything on its head, examined every process, questioned every assumption. They had to challenge their people every day. They demanded their creativity and their complete commitment. In other words they said to the employees: "Don't leave your brains hanging on the outside door".

The process was a tough one on every one from the executive offices to the plant floors. Some left but many soldiered on and this is a tribute to the quality of these people who have indeed done a fine job.

The purpose of this legislation is to permit these employees who have contributed so much to acquire a piece of Canada Post and enhance their success. Clear evidence that their efforts were beginning to bear fruit appeared in 1988-1989 when the corporation turned a profit for the first time. This point bears repeating as taxpayers are no longer forced to pay for their postal service twice, once when they pay their taxes, and again when they buy their stamps.

Canada Post has made progress over the last 10 years but it can feel its competitors breathing down its neck every day, not just in Canada, but from around the world.

The sales force is slugging it out with the courier and parcel business and the advertising delivery companies such as newspapers.

Even the basic letter mail is under threat from facsimile machines and new technology such as electronic data transfer. If you have paid your bills lately through an automated teller bank machine then you know what I am talking about.

The corporation's development of new technology and new markets means employees will be fundamental to building on that achievement as the corporation expands its courier, postal, and mail information transfer business. Employee participation as proposed in this legislation will contribute to a new sense of partnership between management and employees. The whole point of the plan is to form a partnership whereby employees feel more on the inside than on the outside in order to meet the competitive challenges that business faces.

• (1910)

I am pleased that it has discovered a growing market out there for its systems that can be put into place to get its operation under control. I am talking about these new technologies that have been developed through Canada Post. Indeed it is already close to a multimillion deal with the New Zealand postal service and is implementing control systems there.

Canada Post's international reputation is such that it was recently recommended by the World Bank to Venezuela which approached the bank seeking assistance in upgrading its postal system. This sort of recognition by a major multilateral organization like the World Bank sends a clear message of the high regard in which Canada Post is held internationally.

The opposition would have the government return Canada Post to the days of the pony express. I would urge members opposite to take a close look at the new Canada Post.

What we have here is a made-in-Canada success story. Canada Post has won international acclaim and respect for what it has achieved over the last decade. The new Canada Post is providing Canadians with postal service for the 21st century. The members opposite should accept once and for all what all Canadians and Canada Post know, that Canada Post has become a world leader in its field. The government knows that and that is why I will be supporting Bill C-73.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I want to just follow up. I am actually a great believer in employee involvement in the ownership and management of companies because I think it furthers the idea of partnership in making progress. There is also the concept that employees—not just management and not just executives—create the success of any corporation and any endeavour.

However, I do not think that is what this bill is all about. If this is what Canada Post wanted to accomplish with this bill, it would have worked with its employees to see what kind of greater partnership they would be interested in in running the mail service in this country. It would have been a mutual deal. It is not. That is the reason you have had the comments from this side of the House, Mr. Speaker. It is quite clear that the government is following a matter of political ideology and launching the way to privatization of postal service in this country, just as it has with a number of other areas of public enterprise that still serve major public policy purposes.

I want to talk about CN Express, for instance. Again, the government went through a two-stage process of hiving off the trucking operation of Canadian National. A short time later it privatized it. With Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, it hived off and separated the two operations of Nordion and Theratronics. A short time later, it privatized them.

We know perfectly well that the public never finds out in these privatizations the worth of the property that was invested in and nurtured over many decades. They do not know what it was sold for and what special deals were made behind closed doors to the benefit of the purchasers.

Let me give just one example of CN Express, which became CN Route Canada and then Transport Route Canada and then went bankrupt. That deal included $60 million worth of real estate bought and paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. It was transferred to private ownership and then bled off to other companies before the company went bankrupt. It left hundreds of employees across this country without jobs and in jeopardy for their pension plans and other benefits that they were entitled to.

The same problems have occurred in other privatizations. We have to remember that this is not something that just appeared out of thin air, whether it is Canada Post or CN Express or Air Canada. This is something that Canadians have invested in because they believe it is something that is good for Canada.

The two most essential public services that Canadians have invested in are communications and transportation. We put a lot of money into those public services because we believed that there is a cost to being Canadian. We pay that cost so that people in the far reaches and in the smallest communities of this country can be part of the community of Canada.

However, it has cost us money. When you have invested in a property, you expect to know that you are getting value for it when you sell it. That information is never available to Canadians. There is never an evaluation, as my friend for Broadview—Greenwood has said, of what we have invested, what it is now worth, what the purchaser is getting and what the taxpayer should get back in the public coffers as the price of that product.

The employees are getting nothing. It is a shell game. They get shares that they cannot vote on and do not know the value of. They do not know whether there will ever be any dividends on or any profit on these shares. Come on. Make me an offer that I cannot refuse. This is not it.

I do think that we are headed down the road of privatization, so I want to talk about some of the ways in which Canada Post has achieved what the member for Cambridge called efficiencies and profit. For one thing, it has jacked up the price of a postage stamp and virtually every service that it provides. It simply transferred the burden on taxpayers from general revenues to the price they pay for the service.

There is no cost saving. It is the same cost. It just means that those who are dependent on mail service to communicate with the rest of Canada are paying more and we collectively are paying less for a service that we think is important to national unity.

I referred earlier, when I spoke today, to the large numbers of seniors in my riding who have seen their access to postal services gradually shrink. These are the kinds of things we have to look at as a nation knowing that we are going to have an increasingly older population. How do public services adjust to allow older citizens to continue to be fully involved in their community?

Taking away services and asking them to go a mile to a post office or a mile to pick up a registered letter instead of across the street is not progress for society. It is a diminution of services. It is a reduction in the quality of life for Canadians. Yet I can tell you from numerous experiences in my own riding that Canada Post does not pay attention to these issues. This is because, as the member for Cambridge has said, its main drive is to save money to make profits and not to provide service.

With its ideology that the private sector can do it better, it makes absolutely stupid decisions like duplicating services within 100 metres of each other. Where there is a perfectly good postal station that is capable of delivering full services, Canada Post has to say: "Oh, no. That is not good enough. We need to privatize part of that service".

So 100 metres away it opens up a private sector outlet. Now, instead of the convenience of going to one location to buy stamps, weigh a package and pick up registered mail, you go to one location to do some of those things and then you go to another location to do others. In the meantime, you have spent 10 minutes pulling out into traffic and parking again to accomplish what you used to accomplish in two minutes in one location. That is why I say that what we are talking about here is a pattern of ideology and not better service and not less cost.

• (1920)

We have a post office that is saving money at a time when our trucking industry is in trouble in Canada. We also have a post office that says: "We will go where the best bucks are and if that means transporting the bulk of our mail by American truckers then we will use American truckers". Forget completely that the Canadian trucking industry is bleeding to death.

Does that make any sense in the public interest of this country for a public corporation to be seeking only the best price and not the public good? Of course it does not make any sense.

Anybody can make money by cutting services, by sticking up community post boxes and by doing crazy little things like having a group of homes in the middle a built-up area where everybody else gets door-to-door mail delivery and a handful of homes do not. Is that what we believe in in this country?

I always thought that we believe that wherever you live in Canada you are entitled to be treated equally by your public institutions or at least fairly. Is it fair that I get door-to-door mail service five days a week and my neighbour, not five minutes away, has to bundle up her two little kids in the cold and truck off down the street to get her mail? Of course that is not fair and that is not Canadian.

Anybody can make money if they are willing to mistreat people, to cut out jobs, to abuse people and to have them working in abusive working conditions.

The Solicitor General is sitting over there acting as if none of this is important and none of this matters.

Mr. Lewis: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since this is for the record, was that 600 feet? I just want to make sure for the record that this long trek with the kids was 600 feet.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to say to the hon. member for Ottawa West that her time now has expired. I will let her finish in 30 seconds.

Mrs. Catterall: Simply in order to respond, it is obvious that the Solicitor General has never bundled two kids in the middle of winter and trekked them anywhere. I made no reference to any number of feet.

I resent the interruption and the lack of concern of the Solicitor General for the diminution and the degradation of service to Canadians.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I want to raise a number of questions and attempt to address them with respect to the government's attempt to amend this particular act.

The first question I want to ask is how will it improve mail service for Canadians? No one has addressed that. There is an assumption that if this were going to happen then that would follow. I am not sure that is true.

Before I get into that and give you specifics as to what has happened in my own constituency, I want to talk about the efficiency factor. Everyone knows that we are spending roughly $155 billion, we are collecting $125 billion in revenue and there is approximately a $30 billion shortfall. We have to be sensitive to losing money in whatever sector. However, when we talk of efficiency, we have to talk about it in terms of the impact it has on citizens.

We know that as a result of some of the changes that have occurred recently in Canada Post the last few months and years, there are in fact fewer services available to Canadians. We know that in some instance the quality has improved, but there are instances where the quality has not improved. If we want to be fair we have to acknowledge that.

We know as well that the prices have gone up rather dramatically. I am not even talking about the goods and services tax that has been added to stamps and a number of other products.

Efficiency is important but at what cost?

The basic premise here is Canada Post is supposed to provide a service to all Canadians in a fair, equitable, sensitive kind of way. This is what has happened in my constituency. I want to give a few examples.

There have been many changes to postal outlets. There have been some closures, but in many instances it is really the amount of service. The number of services available has changed.

For example, in 1989 Marion Pharmacy was changed. A full postal outlet in this area closed despite numerous letters and petitions and Canada Post was supposed to offer certain services but never followed up.

Metro Drugs on Autumnwood Drive closed in the fall of 1990. There are other examples as well. McCullogh Drugs (Tache and Marion) closed within the last two years, as did the Drake pharmacy outlet in 1991, despite all the comments that were made by senior citizens from the area.

In all of these areas the people who have been most affected are seniors, people with disabilities, particularly if they happen to be physical disabilities. I think we have to recognize that.

I want to tell you about another recent change. Roughly a month ago I was at a meeting in St. Germain which is in the southern part of my riding, a small little community. Canada Post was there. It was a really fine meeting. It was explaining to the citizens exactly what was going to change.

It would appear at first glance that it is going to replace what the citizens had with something that is perhaps roughly of the same quality and I hope so because I want Canada Post to know we are watching very carefully.

How will this particular bill improve the service of millions of rural Canadians whose post offices have been closed? It will not. How will this particular bill improve, for example, the supermailboxes?

We know that they freeze up, you cannot get them open, and we know people are inconvenienced because they are not always easily accessible. How will it improve these kinds of services? There is no way it will improve them. I am told as well there has not been a significant amount of consultation with respect to these changes.

I want to tell you a little anecdote. A woman called my office. She had addressed correctly in a package a watch she was sending to Calgary with her return address. Lo and behold that company had closed. Lo and behold the watch never came back. It cannot be found and Canada Post will not make up the loss.

When I ask the question of how will the service be improved, no one has bothered answering me and I am not at all convinced, if I look at the record of Canada Post over the last few years, that the service will be improved.

[Translation]

On the contrary, I believe that it will continue to deteriorate and I am very sad about that because, as I just said, most Canadians in my riding and elsewhere in Canada will be affected, and especially seniors, people whose mobility is reduced, who find it difficult to go from place to place. I do not like that.

[English]

The other major question I wanted to ask is how will this help employees? Many of you will know there are a number of employees of Canada Post who have not had a contract for a number of months. It is more accurate to say in a number of years. They have been through the various steps of conciliation, arbitration, who knows what else, and still nothing has been done.

For example, I had a postal worker, a delivery person, who asked me a couple of months ago what is happening. Why is nothing being done? How will this improve the plight of the worker? I cannot see it.

When we look at the offer that has been made we are talking about 10 per cent of the shares but they are non-voting shares so the employees cannot be part of the decision making. They cannot be part of the board. What is it you are really getting?

Of course this is the first step toward privatization. Let us not kid ourselves.

I am one of the people who believes that under certain circumstances and certain conditions it can be extremely helpful.

I was visiting with 400 plus employees of Air Canada at the front today. I asked how many jobs had been lost since they have been privatized. I asked whether they expect more jobs to be lost. They do. Lo and behold, they are very suspicious. I suspect they are even more suspicious than politicians on the opposition side. They believe that there are going to be announcements just a few days after the House rises. It will be very interesting to see whether this prediction comes true. I hope not. I really and sincerely hope not.

• (1930)

Ask Air Canada, which is now privatized, how successful it has been in trying to find a level playing field. Ask how successful it has been in persuading the government that it should have access to the Japanese transportation lines. Ask and you will be told it has had no success at all; none whatsoever.

I would not be surprised that once the Canadian Airlines deal is completed with one the American airlines, it may give Air Canada access to the Japanese market in order to tell it to be quiet. We will see whether that prediction comes true.

I hear the hon. minister making all kinds of comments. I hope they are recorded in Hansard so we can follow them up later on.

Finally, I ask all members what happened to Route Canada. Do you remember that? It was going to be excellent for everyone. It persuaded long-term employees to leave CN to join this new corporation. What happened to those long-term employees? To make a long story short, my colleague referred to it, it went bankrupt and lost virtually everything. Some of you will know that it is in the courts today. Some people never got paid all of their wages, I am told. Some people have lost their pensions. Some people have lost pensionable years because they could not continue to work. Many of these people were not able to find jobs subsequent to that. In other words, the workers got shafted royally.

Anyone who thinks that privatization is the panacea, I think we have to look at both sides. In some cases it works because the conditions are appropriate, the commitment is there, there is some protection for the workers, some long-term planning, some adjustment programs for those who have to leave. However, in many instances it has been a dismal failure. We still have to see how it is going to work out with Air Canada. Certainly we have a lot of proof when we talk about Route Canada.

[Translation]

I also asked a second question: What does this bill provide for the workers? Many of them have been without a contract for three years, I believe. They went through several stages in the hope of reaching an agreement, but nothing, absolutely nothing, has come of it. They become frustrated and offended, and who wouldn't? Anyone who is without a contract for three years, after going through all those stages in the hope of coming to a solution, would be frustrated by less than that.

I do not believe that the employees will be well served by this bill, especially in view of the agreement allowing the sale of 10 per cent of the shares, since, as I just mentioned, they have no say in the corporation's future.

I see that my time has now expired.

[English]

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say a few words in connection with this piece of legislation. It appears that from the opposition side we are talking about just about everything other than the piece of legislation. It is saying that Canada Post should keep every post office open everywhere and at the same time it is running Canada Post down.

I would like to speak from the side I came from of being raised in the country. I noticed my friend from Prince Edward Island mentioned the farmer who liked the idea of going 600 feet. We have been doing that all our lives to find that the mailboxes are frozen shut. The farmers have had to deal with that all their lives. They take the children out bundled up or bundle up themselves to go out and get the mail. There are a great number of people who have never experienced this business of having the mail dropped off at their door while they sit inside.

I am not a total advocate of Canada Post. I have had my concerns about its operation.

It is almost like a bank. Everybody loves to hate it, it seems.

In deference to it, certainly it is getting better at the business of attempting to make itself more productive and efficient and I would like to give it some credit for that. We are moving to have an independent or free enterprise retail space, initially in my area, but not the kind of co-ordinated phase-in that we probably should have had. In my riding it has gone from a small post office in a very small municipal gathering to retail free enterprise and is working out very well with more service hours, longer hours and more service hours on the weekends and so on. It has worked reasonably well.

I want to say that initially when it did it, it certainly was not handled in the best manner. It is getting on to it now. It is getting better organized and knows how to handle the phase-in so that the service is franchised into many outlets with longer hours, into shopping centres and this sort of thing and people appear to like that. We have to go with change. It is certainly not necessarily right that everybody trucks to the post office for their mail. The bill does not have too much connection with it.

The legislation is to allow for a stock purchase. People who work for organizations get a lot from that. That will have them develop more interest in their organization as Canada Post employees. That is an important aspect of this legislation.

I want to take a few minutes to say that as a person who has not always lauded Canada Post for its operation, and I still at times feel it could operate much better, it is certainly improving to a great extent. The delivery time is up to a very respectable level these days.

Also, as we are making the changes to a more private enterprise, that is retail wise, that sort of phase-in is being done in a planned way. It has been done in a way in which it communicates with me as a member of Parliament. We know what it is planning on doing. When that happens it is also communicating with the community. It is communicating with the business community, with its workers, those who use Canada Post, the clients. It is certainly doing a much better job.

I wanted to take a minute in the midst of all this condemnation of Canada Post to stand up and thank it for its drastic improvements in the delivery of mail and also for its improved productivity and efficiency as it moves into 2000 in mail delivery.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak again on Bill C-73. Because the post office is so important to rural Prince Edward Island and so important in the federal district of Cardigan, I take this opportunity.

We have all heard the government's song and dance that the bill is going to improve service for Canadians. After almost eight years we know what the Tories mean when they talk about improving services. The government is closing post offices in rural Canada. That is hardly improving services. It is eliminating Saturday rural mail in Prince Edward Island. Improving service? I doubt it. It is removing the identity of the province. Improving service? I doubt it.

• (1940)

As my hon. friend from across the way indicated, the government did this everywhere else in 1982, but Canada Post realized how important this was for rural Prince Edward Island. It was financially profitable for Canada Post to continue delivering mail on Saturday but, for no reason at all, the government has now decided to eliminate it. This has caused a lot of problems for the older people in particular who live out in the country. There is certainly no way that they will ever get a newspaper on Saturday. This is just some of the unfairness of this government. If this was a financial move that would save dollars for Canada Post there would be some sense to it, but it has lost dollars doing it.

Along with this is delay in unemployment insurance cheques. Is that what we call improving service? To the vast majority of my constituents the answers to these questions would be no.

The government is trying to pass the bill off as the best way to improve postal services across the country. It says the post office employees will be able to buy shares in the company and have a stake in its operations. The Tories are saying that by having union members take a cut of the profits, the productivity of the post office will improve. To be honest, I do not think Canadians believe the government.

If you ask me the only people who will benefit from this plan are the people at the top, people like Donald Lander who makes hundreds of thousands of dollars a year, not counting these great Christmas bonuses the government likes to give to its patronage appointees. It is the managers making over $100,000 a year who will buy the shares in the post office. It will not be the letter carriers who make $3,500 a year. Who is the government trying to fool?

As I said earlier today, this bill is an act to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act. If government was truly honest it would call the bill the sell-out of the post office act. The Tories say that only employees of the post office will be able to buy shares. Most Canadians know a little bit about stocks and they know that a stock is only worth something if you can sell it to somebody else. The unions representing the employees say they do not even want to own the post office. What is the point? The point is that the Conservative government is only creating the foundation for completing the privatization of Canada Post.

Let us look at the situation. Hundreds of rural post offices have been closed over the last few years, reducing services but improving profits. Processing stations have been closed, reducing services and increasing profits. Door-to-door delivery in new subdivisions has been eliminated in favour of the so-called supermailbox, reducing services and increasing profits. Literally thousands of semi-post offices, half drug store half post office, have been opened across the country. All of these things have reduced services to Canadians in the interest of profit.

The government is fattening the young calf for the slaughter. The true objective of the Conservative government is to sell the post office, and this bill is just the first step. The post office is the latest addition to the obituary of national institutions. Air Canada was privatized a number of years ago. At the time the government said it was to improve services. Today Air Canada is run by a couple of Americans who have destroyed airlines in the U.S. The service is now so good that you cannot get a direct flight from Charlottetown, a provincial capital, to the national capital. That is what we call service.

Petro-Canada is on the list as well. The government privatized that one not so long ago. It said it was to improve services to Canadians and allow for more oil and gas exploration. Today Petro-Canada is floating in a sea of red ink. The company is being forced to close thousands of stations across Canada. On the good side, Petro-Canada has recently opened its first gas station in Vermont. That is improving services for Canadians.

I certainly do not want to sound too harsh but it seems to me that everything the government touches goes wrong. The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation has been suffering from budget cuts for a number of years. The government is so committed to serving Canadians that it forced the CBC to fire 1,700 people, close 11 stations, and cancel one of the most popular programs in Atlantic Canada, Land and Sea. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, if you were to see that program you would understand how informative it is. It is an indication of how unconcerned the government is.

Back in 1985 the Deputy Prime Minister, then Minister of Transport, commissioned a study that said VIA Rail needed to be improved. It needed to improve its services to Canadians. In January 1990 Canadians finally saw the improved service when VIA Rail cut a third of its routes and cancelled "The Atlantic" out of Halifax, not to say what it did on Prince Edward Island. If that is what we call service, it must be Tory service.

The bill has nothing to do with improving services. If the government wanted to improve services, it could have stopped closing rural post offices. The government is only interested in its own business agenda to the detriment of the Canadian people.

I have said before and I will say again in most parts of rural Canada the post office is the only place that we see the Canadian flag flying. In these difficult days of constitutional negotiations and concerns about national unity, rural Canadians need to feel that they belong to this country.

If the post office is privatized you will see two levels of service, one for the large urban centre where the post office can make a profit, and a lower service for the people in rural Canada.

People in all parts of this country need to feel that they belong to this country and they certainly do not feel they belong to this country when they pay taxes, see their services removed, see their post offices closed, have their unemployment cheques delayed three or four days—

Mr. James: And farmers' cheques.

Mr. MacAulay: And farmers' cheques, too. I am a farmer and I am well aware how bad I needed cheques, or how bad the bank needs it through me. I am well aware.

I believe my hon. friends across the way do not understand what it truly feels like to be waiting for an unemployment cheque on Wednesday or Thursday, but just because of a little blip in the service it does not come until Monday. Possibly they needed something and were not able to buy it. Our hon. friends across the way seem to forget that. I deal with that every day. It is so unfortunate that the government seems to forget.

As I mentioned before, it is impossible to understand why a government would discontinue Saturday rural mail everywhere across the country. Is that why it was discontinued in Prince Edward Island? It was making a profit. When it cancelled Saturday mail delivery it meant that it was not circulating the local papers. It lost the contracts. In fact Canada Post lost dollars by eliminating Saturday rural mail. But as the hon. minister indicated, it was that way across the country. Sometimes things have to be done differently.

I urge the government not to sell Canada Post.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity for the second time today to speak to the principle of this legislation, which is an act to amend Canada Post Corporation.

This morning I spoke to the amendment by our party to have this legislation considered six months' hence or, preferably, never.

• (1950)

My main arguments this morning had to do with the question of why this government was proceeding to amend the Canada Post Corporation Act in the way it has chosen to when there are so many other concerns across the country, particularly in rural Canada, about the operation of Canada Post.

I would like to speak tonight to some of the problems concerning Canada Post and the direction in which this government would want to move that corporation.

This morning when I addressed this issue, I closed by referring to the communities in my riding that have seen their rural post office closed and their postal services systematically reduced. I was mentioning the case of Judique which was recently notified that its rural post office would close and which last night confronted the minions of Canada Post Corporation that were sent to lay out the community's options and calling this a consultation.

I might have mentioned the case of Petit de Grat, St. Joseph du Moine, Monastery, or Orangedale which lost its post office a year or so ago. The Canada Post building which used to be in Orangedale is a pizza parlour and the local residents get their mail from a green box which is located next to the Kwik Mart store.

One community which did not take the closure of its rural post office lying down was the village of Mabou. Under the leadership of Tom Kent, Pauline MacDonald, Herbert Jeromel, Father Bob Neville and many others, this village rallied to fight Canada Post and make the closure of this post office a national issue.

In the process they managed to shame Canada Post into making a small concession in its rigid rural conversion agenda and to allow this community to set up a community corporation, Mabou Communications Limited, to operate the Canada Post office in Mabou and to sell out of that building a range of ancillary services such as computer services, fax services, stationery supplies and other related services in an attempt to make that building a communications centre serving the village of Mabou and all of the surrounding communities which come to Mabou to do their postal service and also many of the other related services they have need for.

I might say that under the very able managership of Pauline MacDonald at Mabou Communications Limited, if it is possible to make a go of it, it will be successful. It is not going to be easy because they have not been given very much co-operation by Canada Post in being forward looking and seeing how we could make this rural post office work and working with the communities to that end.

The Mabou post office and what they are doing with the Mabou post office I think is a sign of what what Canada Post Corporation could be doing to enhance and extend, instead of reducing the services, which it provides to the rural part of Canada.

What Mabou is doing could be a real pilot, could be showing the way for the future, if Canada Post and this government are willing to look and see what they are attempting in that very proud and very innovative community.

Many on this side of the House have expressed a concern about what will happen if Canada Post is privatized. That is something which the minister in charge of Canada Post and many other members on the opposite side of this House have acknowledged is not only desirable but in fact is really the ultimate aim of this government.

Indeed, we are seeing evidence of this in practice with the decision that is before us in this bill which begins the road toward privatization. It makes it easier to accomplish. We are also seeing it with some of the service reductions which are taking place in the rural communities, for example, the end of subsidies to weekly community newspapers. The Oran, for example, out of Inverness in my constituency sells its papers across western Cape Breton, and has many subscribers all across Canada, indeed all across North America. But given the distances involved, it cannot really operate unless it has some assistance with the mail distribution costs.

Canada Post, in ending the subsidies to these community newspapers like The Oran, The Casket, and others in my riding and in other ridings in rural Canada, makes it harder for these newspapers to do their worthy job of communicating to the communities that they serve.

Another example is the dramatic increases in the costs of rental for post office boxes. The people who live just outside the fringe of communities that have still their rural post offices, have to rent boxes. It is another example of a reduction in service or an increase in price and a movement toward this cost recovery philosophy of Canada Post, and very likely making Canada Post ready for privatization.

Another example, of course, is the centralized sorting which we are beginning to see increasingly with Canada Post. If a resident is mailing a letter in Antigonish to St. Andrews or Lower South River, which is five or six miles away, very soon that letter will take the long trip to Halifax before coming back to the community where it could almost be delivered faster by hand. That is supposed to be improved service.

What these trends mean and show us is the inevitable logic of privatization, what will happen if privatization of Canada Post occurs in the kind of country that we live in. What will it mean? It will mean essentially that we will move to two classes of mail service; one service for urban, densely populated Canada, and the other a lower level of service for the rural, less populated parts of this country. What we will see will be higher prices for all categories of Canada Post service, or a much reduced service.

I realize I have very little time left so I want to close with a suggestion for Canada Post and for this government. They have taken a road that the only way for Canada Post to make a profit is to streamline, rationalize, cut costs. That has meant all of those activities and all of those decisions which I have described earlier. But that is one way of ensuring the profitability of Canada Post. If it withdraws itself to the urban core of Canada and eliminates all the unprofitable parts of the country, then it will probably be able to make a profit because of the higher cost of servicing the rural parts of the country.

Has this government ever considered something like this? It could use the facilities of the rural post offices that it has built and maintained for so many years to deliver government services which are currently offered by the various departments, such as Canada Employment Centres, unemployment insurance, the income security programs, which are also being centralized. Why not create itinerant offices on a part-time basis in some of those rural post offices which Canada Post is now trying to unload? Why not use these facilities to deliver federal government services directly to the people where they are, rather than having the people who live in rural Canada travel miles and miles to get government services?

That is the thinking we on this side of the House would like to see adopted in changes to the Canada Post Corporation and in modernizing and making contemporary this very fine and very important institution.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, in listening to the member opposite describe what he would like to see done with Canada Post, as he addresses what is in Bill C–73 before us tonight, it sounds as if he wants Canada Post to be run the same way it was being run 25 years ago.

• (2000)

We know that we had a corporation then that had a lot of complaints. When I came into this House in 1984, over half the complaints I received were all related to Canada Post. I can tell my hon. friend those complaints have diminished to maybe no more than a couple in a month now.

An hon. member: They have given up on the government.

Mr. Belsher: No, they have not given up on the government.

Some members have mentioned the community mailboxes that have been used. They were tested and one of the test areas from 1983–1984 was in my riding at Sardis, British Columbia. I can tell you they were reasonably well received because it was not a case of the post office expanding to door to door delivery to all the new urban areas that were coming in. This was an experiment and it has proven to be very successful.

There have been times when things have not gone that smoothly, such as the replacement of the green boxes with the new superbox. It was just a couple of weeks ago I found out that the corporation had not communicated well enough with some of the citizens involved and I had to intercede on their behalf. I must say that the corporation did respond and is coming to an amicable solution to the problem we identified a couple of weeks ago.

When we come to the closure problems we have encountered in many of the rural areas, I can give examples of where it has gone very smoothly and I can give examples of where it was planned and where Canada Post Corporation has had to change their mind.

One that has gone very smoothly is at Huntingdon, British Columbia in my riding. I did not receive a single complaint from the people who were getting their mail from the Huntingdon post office because Canada Post came and communicated with them and they came to an amicable solution about how they would get their mail service and it is an ongoing thing today.

Three or four years ago when the closure of the Cultus Lake post office was announced, we did not agree with it nor did the citizens there. I felt they were using the wrong reasons for closing it. The building had burned down. The post office was using a disaster as its reason for closing it down. That decision was changed and the post office has been rebuilt and to this day is servicing that area.

I can think of no better way to make sure that the employees feel a kinship to the corporation they work for than if they own a piece of the action. That is what this legislation is all about. It allows the corporation to put up to 10 per cent of the value of its assets in shares that can be sold to the employees of Canada Post. That is what is permitted in this legislation we have before us this evening.

I feel that Canada Post has made great strides in the last half dozen years that I have been closely watching them from here in Ottawa. I see how the people are reacting to Canada Post as I go back and forth to my riding. Is the corporation loved by all the citizens? No, it is not. However, I can tell hon. members that the mail is certainly coming through on a more consistent basis than it did in the past and the service is improving. We also have more outlets for people to buy their stamps, mail their parcels and get their money orders than we had when I started here.

I will be supporting this bill when it is time to vote on it.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–73 is a phoney piece of legislation. It is bogus. It provides for the sale of 10 per cent of Canada Post to its employees.

I guess the first question Canadians should be asking is, exactly what is the government trying to achieve? What is the hidden agenda here? What prompted this move on the part of the Government of Canada? Is it simply being magnanimous on its death bed? Is it trying to redeem itself in the eyes of the 57,000 or 60,000 loyal employees of Canada Post? Exactly what is the agenda of the Conservative government?

Bill C–73 will allow in a very general way the Government of Canada to sell 10 per cent of the corporation to its employees. Bill C–73 does not define employee, it does not quantify the assets and liabilities of Canada Post, it does not indicate whether these shares will be transferable and if so under what conditions.

The government claims that with the sale of these shares to Canada Post employees, somehow morale will improve, somehow the post office will become more efficient, somehow services will improve to the Canadian taxpayers but it fails to explain how.

If this government was serious about making peace with Canada Post employees, it would ensure that the workers who are presently working would be working with a contract. As I understand it, the employees have been without a contract for almost three years. Canadians suffered through a very serious postal strike last summer. We all recall the images of senior citizens waiting out in the heat of summer to pick up their pension cheques. We are reminded of how people were unable to receive mail for an extended period of time.

This government ought to make peace with its employees rather than trying to hoodwink them and Canadians into believing that somehow this legislation will improve service and morale.

As I indicated, this bill does not provide specifics. One thing is clear. This government is trying in a very surreptitious fashion to privatize completely Canada Post. We on this side of the House, the Liberal Party, vehemently oppose the privatization of Canada Post. It is a public service and therefore it should be in public hands. One should not make a profit, we believe, in providing service to Canadians. It would be easy for Canada Post to make significant profits. It made profits in a few years. Last year it lost $100 million. It blames that loss on the strike. Yes, it is possible for Canada Post to make profit but at what expense, at what cost?

Post offices are being closed. A significant number of Canadians have to walk to supermailboxes in order to collect their mail when a great number of others are able to get door to door delivery. It is possible to create a profit at the end of the year but one could only do so by either increasing the cost of sending a letter or a parcel or by cutting back services.

We believe that this is a first step toward privatization. It gives the government the authority to privatize 10 per cent of the corporation for now. One should point out that even though "selling shares of Canada Post", those who purchase those shares would have no voting rights at all. They would have no say in the running of the corporation.

Surely if the government was sincere and honest and desirous of having its Canada Post employees work closely with management in improving Canada Post, it would be selling these shares with the right to vote and the right to participate in the decision–making of the corporation.

Thank God we are on the eve of a general election campaign because if we gave that bunch across the way any more time, they would even sell this building here, the House of Commons, to the highest bidder. They have proceeded in the last eight years to privatize all kinds of different institutions. If given the opportunity, they would privatize Canada Post. That is their agenda. In fact there was a Conservative report that was brought forward a number of years ago that indicated quite clearly the intention of the government to privatize. Why would someone want to buy Canada Post? Why would a group of individuals with a lot of money want to buy Canada Post? They would want to buy Canada Post if they were able to turn a profit.

• (2010)

The question then becomes should the delivery of mail, should postal service in Canada create profit? It seems to me that providing a service and making a profit at times are diametrically opposed. If you are interested in keeping the price of a postage stamp as low as possible and keeping service as high as possible, then you are not going to make wheelbarrows full of money at the end of the road. It does not make sense. If you privatize, if that is the intent of the government, which I believe it is, at the end of road the buyers of Canada Post will want to increase profit. We believe on this side of the House that can only be achieved by hiking up the price of a stamp or cutting back on service.

So it is conceivable that in the not too distant future there will be no such thing as door-to-door mail delivery. Not just people living in new subdivisions, but everyone in Canada will have to walk to the end of the street, key in hand, to collect their mail from a supermailbox.

I do not believe that Canadians want that. I do not believe that senior citizens want to or will be prepared to walk to the end of the street or walk a number of blocks to a supermailbox. I am afraid if the government continues on the path it has embarked upon, the inevitable result will be a cutback in service.

I do not know when we are going to have that debate. Perhaps it will take place during the general election campaign in the not too distant future, the debate over whether Canada Post ought to be privatized. We know the position of the government and it will have to justify and argue its position in the general election campaign. It will have to explain to Canadians why it wants to diminish the postal service, why it wants to privatize the postal service in Canada.

I believe that Canadians will send a very clear message to this government that they will not accept the privatization of this very essential instrument and institution in Canada that has served to unite this country from one coast to the other.

This government, as I indicated previously, during the course of its two mandates has proceeded to privatize a number of Crown corporations. It will be recalled that one of the first moves of the 1984 Conservative government was to do away with the Foreign Investment Review Agency. The government made it clear back then that there was a huge for sale sign out on the front lawn of Parliament Hill.

Again this is part of that agenda which the government has been discharging over the last number of years. We know, if given the opportunity, it would bring in legislation for the complete privatization of Canada Post.

In closing, might I again say that the Liberal Party opposes this bill. We opposed it at first reading; we will oppose it here at second reading; we will oppose it at committee. We believe it is a fraudulent piece of legislation. It is dishonest legislation because the government really has not indicated what the purpose of it is in a straightforward manner.

We know that the employees of Canada Post have seen right through it from the moment the minister made his announcement that he was going to sell 10 per cent of the corporation to the employees. The first reaction of the employees was to ask: "Who in the heck are you trying to kid?"

I urge hon. members opposite to realize the writing is on the wall, to realize that they have a few short months left of political life here in the House of Commons of Canada, to come to their senses and to vote against this nonsensical piece of legislation.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to speak long. I will be very brief. I only want to make about five points.

The first point I want to make is that Canada Post is totally mismanaged. It is full of neo-Conservative ideologues who think they are running some sort of modern corporation and have no idea how to run it.

Mr. Lewis: Based on your background in business?

Mr. Waddell: No, based on my understanding of humanity and based on seeing what is happening in this country. I invite the Solicitor General to listen to this. The Conservative government could fall not on free trade and all the other big issues such as the Constitution, which it should fall on, but it is going to fall on an issue like the post office and I will tell you why.

The post office is a symbol to Canadians. When you go to a small town on the prairies or a small town in my riding, you see a Canada Post office and it means something to people. It was a symbol of Canada. This Conservative government has taken this symbol and destroyed it. People understand that, especially the people in the small rural areas where it has been devastating to these towns.

In my area it has moved from a perfectly good post office where there was good service and good wages for people to this low-wage clerk, Mac's Milk, 7-Eleven stuff in which mail is sometimes thrown around or lost. There is very little security. People try and do their best but they are $5 an hour clerks rather than people who really wanted to do that job and their priority job was the post office.

I said bad management. The government missed the boat. Look over in Europe and in Britain specifically where Canada Post could have got into the area of telecommunications. It is into courier services, but not really into it the way it could have been. It could have built a modern communications system building on the basis of the Canada post office which was a symbol and a great institution in Canada and a government organization. Instead, it threw it away.

Canada Post has terrible labour relations. It is 19th century labour relations in this outfit. It deals badly with other people. It deals badly when I deal with it as a member of Parliament.

We have a situation in this country where everybody pays the same for a stamp. We all pay taxes equally and yet some people have door-to-door delivery of mail and other people do not. That is not fair and that is not equality.

New subdivisions have these post boxes. I spent months trying to get one of these post boxes moved from the front of a person's house who was getting all kinds of people coming by his house to pick up the mail. I had a lot of trouble with Canada Post.

Canada Post has bad labour relations, poor management and very little view of the future. It has this kind of blinding neo-Conservative philosophy.

Do you know something? This government will spend millions of dollars on the 125th anniversary of Canada and all the propaganda about what a great country it is. We do have a great country but look what makes it a great country: good medicare, good social services, national radio and television like the CBC. We used to have a railway system in this country and we had a post office that we could be proud of. It was a symbol in every little town in Canada.

The government could have modernized by keeping the structure of what was known as the post office. I say to this government that it is going to be defeated on issues like this.

Government has dismantled the Canadian postal system. It has this terrible system now with increased costs for stamps, with very little good delivery. The result is a national institution has been destroyed. It has the gall to come to this Parliament and bring in this bill to do this phoney privatization of share scheme.

If you want to deal with your workers go and have good labour relations. Be honest and straightforward with the workers and restore the post office to the Canadian institution that it once was.

• (2020)

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the main motion. While I did speak earlier today it was on the amendment and I spoke having recently discussed some difficulties we have in the business of compensation for fisher persons and plant workers in my riding and indeed this is going to be endemic in Newfoundland and Labrador within a matter of days.

I want to get back to the issue of the post office. I want to go back to 1988 when I was first elected. I have said this many times. I have 260 communities in my riding. Not one is even semi-urban; they are all rural. The largest is a town of about 6,500 to 7,000 people. I have about 10 towns that range in population from 3,000 to 6,000. In the remaining, the populations vary from about 100 to 500, basically no large populations, so essentially it is a totally rural district.

When I was campaigning, you could leave one of these communities and travel across the island of Newfoundland, not on a passenger train but on a CN system. You could ship freight by train that ran across the island. You could visit any of these communities. In each of those communities there was a fabric of this country which the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam talked about as did my friend from Toronto, the hon. member for York South—Weston. In practically every one of these 260 communities there was a small building with a red sign on it that gave the name of the town, gave the postal code and flew a Canadian flag.

In each of those buildings people would gather to pick up their mail and to talk. Senior citizens used to go and get assistance with applications for various pensions. The postmaster or the postmistress in each of these small post offices—in fact, in one case it was in the basement of a house—were always receptive to people in trouble.

Often it had very little to do with the postal system or any difficulties with anything to do with the post office. It had to do with it being the building with the Canadian flag that was a representation of the fabric of the country and the presence of the federal government. It was where people could go if all else failed and talk to the person in charge of that postal unit. They knew they would get help.

In times of trouble and in times of great anxiety like we are going through right now particularly in my province, particularly in my riding, I cannot begin to describe what a source of relief that is, just to go and communicate or commiserate with somebody having the same problem.

Members on the opposite side would say: "That's not the purpose of the post office". I would have to agree. I could not sell the post office changes or my reluctance to accept these changes and the reluctance of my constituents on the basis of what I have just talked about. I can on the basis of the service that it gives to the individuals.

Bill C-21 tremendously altered the unemployment insurance system to the point where it was not in the favour of those people I represent in this House. With the exception of that bill and the very unpopular move to introduce the goods and services tax at the time when the economy was about to break into a recession and the government knew it but went ahead anyway, this is the third most despicable, trouble-creating and troublesome move the government has made.

Why has it been that way? Because it causes jobs to be lost.

The facts are very stark. In 1986 Canada Post had a 10-year plan that was to close 5,221 rural post offices, 10,000 jobs, 83 per cent of those belonged to women, and this government talks about jobs for women, fair play for women.

As I stand in this House tonight, over 1,000 of those rural post offices have been closed and the plan proceeds to continue until I suppose the last of the 5,221 doors is shut.

Now we cannot travel across Newfoundland. We cannot go to Sydney and get a train and travel to the rest of the country because the train system is gone. We cannot go to the post office with the little red sign and the Canadian flag because that is being shut down. Practically every other institution that people knew and cherished and lived by is being shut down. Jobs are being lost.

So when I hear there is a bill to do with Canada Post I get very excited and think this is a bill to change all this around. This is a bill to right all these wrongs for the people in Hare Bay, Shearstown, countless communities in my riding. I thought it was great. I was going to have a good look at this bill because everything was going to be made right.

I look at Bill C-73 and what do I see? I do not see anything that makes me happy at all. I am not about to sit down tonight, write all my constituents and tell them that all the problems of the post office are about to be solved. In fact it is going to make the situation a little worse.

In the middle of this gigantic and enormous close-down of 5,221 rural post offices and 10,000 jobs, we are now told that the government wants to sell 10 per cent of Canada Post Corporation to the employees.

That in itself sounds pretty harmless I guess, but the problem is the employees do not think this is a good idea. Why would one want to sell something to somebody when they do not want to buy it? Why would one want to do that? It is bad enough to sell something to somebody who wants to buy it, but when they not want to buy it there must be a reason for doing it.

The head of the union himself asked why post office workers want to support the efforts of Don Lander to eliminate their jobs and attack their union. Why would they buy into an organization that was doing in their jobs? It does not make a lot of sense to me.

The bill itself does not talk at all about any of the problems of Canada Post Corporation. To read the bill one would think that everything was rosy, everybody was fine, all the post offices were operating and all the customers were happy. Turning to customers, I thought Canada Post existed to give service to the customers. But now I find out it is for another reason. If they are going to sell something eventually—I suppose this is the first step to privatizing Canada Post—somebody who is going to buy it is going to want to make a profit.

I am not going to buy a business just for the sake of buying it. I want to make a profit. Is the name of the game for Canada Post to make a profit, or is it to service the public? I would suggest it is to service the public.

It is like saying that we have a great armed force but we want to make money on it. We want it to defend the country but we want to make money on it. How ridiculous a statement that is. I would submit to the House that the same pertains to wanting to make a profit out of service to the customers of Canada Post.

When you confuse your aim in doing something in this world you always end up mucking it up. I think this is what has happened to Canada Post, and this bill is going to make it even foggier.

No matter how much my colleagues and I try—and we have discussed this—we cannot find anything in this bill that makes us happy. We cannot find anything in this bill that builds up any kind of warmth in our stomachs and in our hearts.

• (2030)

Before I sit down I have to say that I am sure some hon. members on the government side must find some of the detail in this bill somewhat difficult to take sitting down. I suppose they will be standing up pretty soon, but I will feel sorry for them when they get up vote. Some of them might think of the constituents they have and the complaints they have had about closing down and tinkering with rural post offices. Some of them may not even be around when we vote on this subject. I would not blame them.

We have a bill that does not address the problems with Canada Post that people have realized since 1986. It exacerbates them. On that basis alone my party cannot support this bill. Certainly when my time comes the bill will not be getting my vote.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I intend to speak for only a couple of minutes because I already made, I hope, an eloquent denunciation of the bill during consideration of the hoist motion.

I want to add information that has come to me in the last half hour from those who have been watching this debate on television. It demonstrates the arrogance of Canada Post that has conned the government into introducing this legislation as a further step toward privatization.

The very day we are debating second reading and approving in principle this bill, Canada Post is taking yet another step to devalue Canada Post and the service it is providing Canadians. Starting this weekend, right across Canada, Canada Post is going to stop processing the mails on the weekend. It is going to a five-day week so a letter mailed on Friday will not be processed until the following Monday or Tuesday, adding yet a further delay to the service in Canada. Even if the employees turn up for work on the weekend they will be put to other tasks than the processing of the mail.

There are problem after problem after problem with Canada Post. Each of us in our own constituencies have heard them: lack of personalized response, an attitude in favour of the corporate customers that want to mail junk mail, not the individual homeowners who receive the mail, the citizens of this country. There are impenetrable labour relations' problems.

Rather than try to go along with the government's ambitions of privatizing Canada Post, the time has come that there be in every constituency in Canada an effort to develop virtually a royal commission at the constituency level.

In my riding starting next week we are going to pull together those who have come forward with various complaints about the service of Canada Post, those who have complained about having to go to Vancouver to talk to anybody about a complaint, those who complain and quite properly about the kind of service they have been receiving from Canada Post, the employees, and the union. We will pull them together to begin to see if we can develop an alternative to the kind of service we have been getting from Canada Post so that after the next election there will be in place a whole new approach to providing service in Canada, and not just the privatization of this once vital service in this country.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to speak but the very careful suggestion that the hon. member for Victoria, which I thought was an excellent suggestion about Canada Post, brought a thought to my mind that I felt I had to share with the government. Perhaps the Solicitor General in assisting his colleague, the minister responsible for Canada Post, the government House leader, who I think spends very little time frankly on his Canada Post responsibilities—

Mrs. Sparrow: Come on, Peter. Leave him alone.

Mr. Milliken: He is busy doing his House leadership job and I recognize that. It is tough for him to get time so perhaps the Solicitor General could help him out on that.

I want to make a suggestion on how Canada Post could save money. Maybe it has already implemented this but I am not sure. It used to produce an audit. It hired an auditing firm. I think it was Peat Marwick Thorne, but I do not want to damage the name of this good firm. I am not suggesting that there is anything wrong with Peat Marwick Thorne, but it used to provide this audit. If that is not the firm that did it, then my memory has slipped. Members on all sides of the House I am sure received this audit which said that 98 per cent of the mail was delivered on time. It was one of the great things because it did not give the parameters. They said they would check mail that was postmarked on such and such a date to see if it was delivered within two days. If it got there within two days, which was the designated deadline, then it was delivered 98 per cent of the time. Their figures were very impressive.

I have not seen one of these audits lately. Either the figures have gone sour or else the auditors realized they were being set up for a con job by Canada Post. This is what happened. I discovered this myself after a bit of investigating. If you mail your letter after 3 p.m. on any day it doesn't get postmarked until the next day even if you mail it at the post office.

Go and check it out. Go to the post office and try to register a letter and get it postmarked after 3 p.m. It cannot be done. Registered or postmarked, they will not stamp for the day it is mailed if you mail it after 3 p.m.

Mr. Lewis: Get up earlier in the morning.

Mr. Milliken: The Solicitor General says to get up earlier in the morning. That is the way he treats Canadians. Get up earlier and then your mail will get postmarked in time. If you do not mail it before 3 p.m. then it is postmarked the next day.

What does the auditor do? He looks at the postmark and says: "Oh, this wasn't mailed today on June 18 because it is postmarked June 19". If I mail my letter tonight it will be postmarked tomorrow. If I mailed it at 3.01 p.m. it would be postmarked tomorrow. You put the mail in the mailbox down the street on the corner at 10 a.m. Collection is at 2 p.m. and it does not get to the post office till after 3 p.m. It is considered as having been mailed the next day.

It may take three or four days to get delivered, but according to the audit it has taken from the date of the postmark, so it is counted as having been mailed that day. What a con job. That is management. That is Tory mismanagement of the post office in this country. It is a disgrace. They are trying to hoodwink Canadians by this policy.

The hon. member can wag her finger to her heart's content. I will not be intimidated by this kind of tactic. I know what is going on and so do Canadians. They are being hoodwinked by this government into believing that Canada Post is providing superb service. Look at the ads they used to run. Does the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception remember these ads?

Mr. Mifflin: Yes, I do. Who paid for them?

Mr. Milliken: You would get them in the weekly newspapers. Who paid for the ads? It was Canada Post. Canada Post must have taken a loss that year. It ran full page ads with the results of this phoney audit. I have no doubt the audit was correct as far as it went, but then it excluded all this evidence of the non-postmarking of the envelopes. It was unbelievable.

That is the kind of thing that causes Canadians to lose confidence in the government because they feel they are being hoodwinked and bamboozled at every turn.

That is exactly what this bill will do. I fear for the employees of Canada Post who somehow think it is a good investment to buy these shares. These are non-voting shares in a company which is 90 per cent controlled by the Government of Canada that is trying to squeeze every cent it can out of this company.

It is a sad commentary when a government introduces a bill like this. I am pleased that the Liberal members in this House are going to be able to condemn this bill and oppose it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

* * *

CONTRAVENTIONS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–46, an act respecting contraventions of federal enactments, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. There have been discussions among the parties prior to the move that I am about to make, so it shall not come as a surprise to anybody.

• (2040)

On behalf of the government I wish to point out that clause 66 of Bill C–46 would abolish the right of the Crown to refuse to issue a passport or to revoke it as a consequence of a charge or conviction under the Contraventions Act. This clause would affect Her Majesty's prerogatives.

His Excellency the Governor General has been informed of the purport of this bill and has given his consent, as far as Her Majesty's prerogatives are affected, to the consideration by Parliament of the bill, that Parliament may do therein as it thinks fit.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have a ruling to make on Bill C–46.

There are two motions in amendment set down on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–46, an act respecting contraventions of federal enactments, both in the name of the hon. member for Niagara Falls.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2 are grouped for debate and a vote on Motion No. 1 will apply to Motion No. 2.

I will now proceed with Motions Nos. 1 and 2 in the House.

Mr. Thacker: Mr. Speaker, I am seeking unanimous consent to put the motions in the place of the hon. member for Niagara Falls because of his annual meeting this evening. I believe there were discussions and it was agreed that I could stand in his place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. MacLellan: As far as our party is concerned, we would agree.

Mr. Waddell: I agree.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (for Mr. Nicholson) moved:

Motion No. 1.

That Bill C–46 be amended in Clause 8

(a) by striking out, in the English version, line 16 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:
"purposes of this Act;"
(b) by striking out line 18 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:
"ceedings under this Act; and (f) providing for subparagraph 18(b)(iii), section 20, subsection 21(2) and sections 24 and 27 to have effect or to cease to have effect as if they had come into force or been repealed, as the case may be, in the parts of Canada that are specified in the regulations.";
(c) by adding, immediately after line 4 at page 5, the following:
"(8) Subsection (1) is amended by striking out the word "and" at the end of paragraph (e) thereof, by adding the word "and" at the end of paragraph (d) thereof and by repealing paragraph (f) thereof."

Motion No. 2.

That Bill C–46 be amended in Clause 86

(a) by striking out line 34 at page 39 and substituting the following therefor:

"86.(1) This Act, other than subsection 8(8), subparagraph";

(b) by striking out line 40 at page 39 and substituting the following therefor:

"(2) Subsection 8(8), subparagraph 18(b)(iii), section 20,".

He said: Mr. Speaker, these technical amendments flow from the legislative committee hearings and would allow a pilot project to be undertaken regarding the non-resident defendant provisions of the legislation.

Clause 27 permits the non-resident defendant to plead not guilty by mailing in submissions. Clause 24 permits the non-resident defendant to plead not guilty with representations by mail.

Several jurisdictions have expressed concerns about the administrative difficulty which could be encountered in bringing these into operation. Some jurisdictions would like to see the results of a pilot project before the non-resident defendant provisions are implemented more broadly across the country.

The proposed amendment would allow this aspect of the ticketing program to be tested in specific locations, thus giving us the flexibility to determine whether these sections can be reasonably affected.

The principle of pilot projects to test these provisions was put forward and accepted at the committee hearings, and the proposed motions seek to ensure that pilot projects can be set up in particular locations which have been identified in co-operation with the provinces as suitable areas for proper program testing.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the member for Lethbridge has made a good point. While I think it would be our hope that such a process could be done, it is fair to say that we really do not know the results.

Whereas the various jurisdictions have expressed concern as to this process and the concept is relatively new, a pilot project is a very prudent way to go.

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I would agree to this amendment as well. We did discuss it in committee but not at great length. I was not really aware that there would be a pilot project. However I must say—and I will say this in my speech at third reading—I was impressed by the public servants that came before the committee. They were very straightforward with us.

I am going to give them the benefit of the doubt. They need a pilot project. I think we should give them that leeway.

My friend, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, would agree with me that we had a very good legislative committee, a very straightforward group of civil servants who presented things and did not duck any of the questions. When they did not know the answer they told us so. It was a real pleasure.

On behalf of the New Democratic Party, as our party's justice critic, I would agree to these amendments. We can deal with them tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion No. 1 agreed to.

Hon. Charles Mayer (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read a third time. By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Mayer (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about this bill. My colleague, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, said that he was very impressed by the public servants on this and I was as well. I do not know if it was because they had all the answers or because they were so calm. I knew they really believed in the bill. They were speaking so effortlessly and had all of the answers and I felt my first instincts on this were correct, that this is a good bill and that there is nothing here of great substance with which to find fault.

There are two aims in this bill. One is to decriminalize approximately 3,500 offences by creating the option for the enforcement officer to issue a ticket to an offender rather than pursuing a summary conviction or an indictment and to free up the court's time by eliminating the need to hear these minor offences.

That is not to say that in the regulations right now, 12 departments, agencies or groups in the federal service everyone has to plead guilty. What it does mean is that if someone is charged and ticketed, under the regulations designated under this bill, they can plead guilty and pay their fine. They do not have to appear in court. They can send in their money as is the case in other instances in which this is being used in the provinces.

That is not to say that the ticketing officer or the officer making the charge has to instigate the charge with a ticket. The officer can still bring a charge through a summary conviction or an indictable offence.

• (2050)

That is the choice of the officer. That does not mean that the person so charged has to plead guilty or does not get a chance to plead his case. He can and has that opportunity. What it does do is free up a good deal of the court's time. The process of having to come to court to pay these fines is no longer necessary. It makes considerable sense. It makes a great deal of sense.

The government has said that this bill will be revenue neutral. It will be better than revenue neutral because although the process will be revenue neutral, we will save a lot of the court's time. This will be a financial benefit to the justice system.

I feel that there is a possibility in this bill that we can expand to other regulations. We must be very careful to state here that this deals with regulatory offences. It does not deal with offences under the Criminal Code. That is very important. Proceedings under the Criminal Code will proceed as they have in the past. This deals with regulatory offences.

There has been some suggestion by gun owners that this is an attempt to perhaps circumvent their rights and that is not true. This has nothing to do with gun control. It has nothing to do with the Criminal Code. It has to do with straightforward, regulatory offences.

The one concern that people could have is that the regulations to be designated under this bill are through Order in Council. That is, the Parliament of Canada or the committees do not designate what regulations are to apply. The regulations to apply are designated by Order in Council. That means the government designates.

The concern is that what will happen is that very important and weighty regulations will be brought under this bill such as strong environmental regulations to stop the pollution of our streams and of our air. What will happen is that these companies will lobby the government to include these offences under this bill. The reason is that the maximum fine under this bill is $1,000. You can have any regulation apply but the maximum fine is $1,000. You cannot fine anyone more than $1,000. If you are a young offender, the maximum is $100.

You could see that a corporation which had polluted a river or severely polluted the atmosphere or otherwise caused environmental problems would be very pleased to have its offence handled under this act as a regulatory offence with a maximum fine of $1,000.

This is maybe a little exaggerated. It may be going too far to say that the government would do a thing like this. I think that may be true but it is going to mean that we as members of Parliament are going to have to watch this very carefully.

This bill does have the support of all of the attorneys general in Canada. They seem quite content that this is going to be a major step forward. As I have mentioned, the Department of Justice is only administering this bill. There are no Criminal Code offences and the regulations apply to other departments and agencies.

I would also like to point out that this bill is not a new idea. It is an idea that has been promoted in the past. The Law Reform Commission in 1976 came forward with a document which set out this idea and promoted it strongly. That was 16 years ago. It took 10 years for this government to adopt the thinking that this may be a good way to proceed with offences such as speeding in your boat out on the lake for instance. We have it now, six years later, as proposed legislation.

I want to point out that here is a tremendous example of the value of the Law Reform Commission of Canada. This government doing away with the Law Reform Commmission as a result of its recent budget makes Canada the only country in the British Commonwealth, other than Zimbabwe and Bangladesh, without a Law Reform Commission. It is the only government in Canada that does not have a Law Reform Commission. Now that Quebec is instituting legislation to set up a Law Reform Commission, all the provinces have Law Reform Commissions. A federal country with a federal system of government depriving the provinces of access to this creative legal thinking without the federal government having this is just preposterous to say the least.

I would like to end this very important point of doing away with the Law Reform Commission by suggesting that this is not the only idea that the Law Reform Commission germinated. We have read citings in various court cases. I think 44 cases of the Supreme Court of Canada cite the documentation and the legal thinking of the Law Reform Commission, not to mention considerable articles and legal books on various points of law. Most recently in the legislative committee on this bill doing away with the Law Reform Commission, various groups came before the committee to plead with the government to change its mind in doing away with this very important organization.

If you could say that one group was more effective than another, it was the multicultural groups in Canada. There has been some very good work done by the Law Reform Commission on multiculturalism and the law which finished its first draft and was supposed to be the subject of meetings with the multicultural community four days after the budget was tabled. However, the budget was tabled and those meetings were cancelled. We do not know what is going to happen to that very good piece of legal thinking. Whether it will ever see the light of day no one knows. The thinking among the members of the multicultural community is no. This whole effort and this very important document will go to waste which is in itself a very unfortunate thing.

I also want to say that this has been a very important project on behalf of the member for Parry Sound—Muskoka who has been very instrumental in pushing the government to bring this legislation forward. I feel he should be credited for the work he has done.

This is, as I say, a step forward. I think we are going to have to watch the way matters proceed with respect to this legislation. One of the ways is certainly with respect to the pilot project which my colleague, the member for Lethbridge, has mentioned, and also with respect to what regulations are brought forward under this bill.

As my colleague, the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, has stated as well, I think it might be important to bring the new regulations that may be applied under this bill before the House of Commons before they are actually included under this legislation.

I want to say that I think this bill should pass. In my opinion, it is a step forward and it is going to be a benefit.

• (2100)

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise as the NDP justice critic to speak on this bill, one in a long series of justice bills that we have been debating in this House.

This is a ticketing scheme for minor regulatory offences. Currently, just to explain how the law works, a person wishing to plead guilty to an offence, even one as minor as picking flowers on federal property or speeding in an inlet or lake, must appear in court. Even in that person's absence, if the person does not appear, a trial must be held and witnesses must be heard. It is an expensive and time-consuming process.

We have an alternative method of doing things. We have ticketing offences in the provinces, traffic tickets for example. Bill C-46 proposes a ticketing scheme for minor regulatory offences and was designed primarily for the following reasons.

First of all, it decriminalizes minor offences against federal laws and regulations. As my friend pointed out, not the Criminal Code but other federal laws and regulations. Second, it avoids the need for a court appearance when a ticket is not contested. Third, it encourages improved enforcement. I might add as a Scotsman it is probably going to end up a little cheaper.

Bill C-46 does not create new offences. It only changes procedures that deal with existing minor federal offences. We are told that the government expects there will be over 400,000 tickets issued in the first year this scheme comes into effect. These fines will be paid. They will go into general revenue and so they will not be an additional means of raising funds, say for Agriculture Canada or Environment Canada. Savings will be realized as a result of a decrease in demand placed upon our courts. It seems like a good idea financially.

I spoke on the bill in the House at second reading and I will not repeat that speech. It was on Monday, April 6, 1992. In case members want some bedtime reading tonight, they can get Hansard and have a look at it.

One point I did make in the speech and I will reiterate was that this idea which we all agree now is a good idea and is going to save the government money and streamline the judicial process was first introduced in 1976 by the Law Reform Commission of Canada. That is the same Law Reform Commission the member previously said the government is going to abolish.

It was doing good things. This is another argument to buttress the opposition's point of view that it really was not too intelligent to get rid of the Law Reform Commission of Canada because it advanced some of these ideas that ultimately became law. Here is a perfect example.

I should say also that I was impressed with the way the civil service and the committee brought forward the bill in a straightforward way and said when they did not know the answers that they did not know the answers. That is why I am prepared to agree. I was prepared and did agree to a pilot project in this matter.

Mark Berlin of the justice department notes that all provinces have a similar program in place. It is probably a result of provincial representations that the federal department is taking the initiative.

They did hint at a few things like using credit cards, Visa cards, and various ways to pay fines. I do not know how that is going to work. I told them not to get too fancy. Look at how the provincial traffic schemes work and try to follow that. Do not get too fancy or you will end up like the post office.

I will end with two wishes. As the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys pointed out, a lot of this law, as many laws, is in the regulations. I hope the regulations will see the light of day. I hope the department will publish them, show them widely, so that we can change them and make them better.

Finally, my last wish is this. I know it is a bit late to do this now but I have a bill in front of the House called the Plain Language Act in which I have asked that the government draft bills in plain language, plain English or plain French. It is too much to expect us to speak in plain language in the House but the government could draft in plain language. The government might want to have a look at future bills, especially the regulations under this bill, and draft them in plain language so Canadians can understand exactly what is meant by the regulations. This would be a good bill to begin with.

I have talked about plain language, about open and competent regulations and about how important it is that this bill pass because it is overdue. It will make a better process and I hope a cheaper process for Canadians. Having finally got to the end of a long series of justice bills, I am pleased to sit down and to shut up. In plain English I say I am finished speaking and I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I will not repeat everything that has been said vis-à-vis the bill, but I want to stand on behalf of the Minister of Justice and the parliamentary secretary to express their deep appreciation for the co-operation that they have received and the very good scrutiny that this bill received by the justice committee.

I must say with respect to the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys and the member for Port Moody—Coquitlam, I feel like we almost live together, because we have done so many bills over the last while. We have become almost like brothers in a way, not to say that there are not some very sharp differences, as you might guess in a family, Mr. Speaker.

Having been through Bill C-49, the sexual offences bill; Bill C-17, the gun control bill, and then the gun control regulations that we just finished off today, as well as bills that the others have done on terrorism, jury trials, and then acting for the distinguished Solicitor General on Bill C-36 the Parole Act, these have all been huge bills.

It is too bad in a way that our constituents could not see the enormous good work that is done by members on all sides of the House at the committee level. Once the television lights are turned off and we can put ourselves around a problem, we can usually come up with some very sensible solutions. We only go mad, Mr. Speaker, when the television goes on us and we have to put on a show it seems. I guess that is just the way it always will be.

I also I want to express on the record to our long-time colleague, the distinguished member for Parry Sound—Muskoka, who has been a member in this House for many years that this bill was pushed by him over all of those years and he deserves a lot of credit for it.

Mr. Speaker, this is good public law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise to present Bill S–11, an act to amend the Airport Transfers (Miscellaneous Matters) Act.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I must receive unanimous consent to propose Bill S–11. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

AIRPORT TRANSFER (MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS) ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Doug Lewis (for Minister of Transport) moved that Bill S–11, an act to amend the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act, be read the second time and by unanimous consent referred to the Committee of the Whole.

• (2110)

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, having consulted with the gracious and hon. members opposite, I think you will find there is unanimous consent to move all stages of this bill tonight.

Mr. Milliken: Oh yes, Mr. Speaker, we are happy to assist in passing this but I cannot let the occasion pass without making a speech.

I am sorry to disappoint the Solicitor General but there are some important points that have to be made in respect of this bill. If the parliamentary secretary wants to go first and make a speech I would be happy to hear him, otherwise I will proceed. We are giving our consent to put this bill through all stages tonight after the appropriate comments have been made.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I thank hon. members for that consent.

It was not long ago we discussed the predecessor bill, Bill C–15, which essentially set the basis for employee protection benefits associated with any lease or sale of federal airports. Bill S–11 is really a fine–tuning bill.

As the House will be aware, the process of devolution to the local airport authority has been long and involved for the first group of airports. Along the way we learned quite a few things.

Since we last discussed this issue, we have signed transfer agreements with four local airport authorities in Montreal, Vancouver, Edmonton, and Calgary. This bill represents some additional legislative requirements to complete the process.

Essentially it maintains the status quo regarding federal income tax; it sets out the local airport authority's powers for seizure and detention of aircraft in the event of non–payment of fees with due reference to the courts.

As well the bill addresses the qualification of investments and the connection with the transfer of the airports to local airport authorities.

Finally the bill makes it mandatory for the local airport authorities to respect additional provisions of the Official Languages Act, namely Part V, the language of work, and Part VI, equal participation of English or French speaking Canadians for leased airports within the designated areas as defined by the Official Languages Act.

It came to our attention after Bill C–15 was already in process that in order to ensure the continuation of the status quo with regard to payment of income tax, a legislative amendment was necessary and hence the clause in this bill.

I should perhaps also expand on why clause 11 is required. Prior to June 1, 1992 federal trust, loan and insurance companies as well as federal pension funds were permitted to make investments accordingly to the legal for life rules. One investment described by the rules was a mortgage on a leasehold interest.

Since the concept of leasehold does not exist under Quebec civil law, mortgages on airport land would not be eligible investments. This could have made it difficult for the Montreal local airport authority to obtain long–term financing.

As of June 1, 1992 the date of the coming into force of the new financial institution statutes, the legal for life rules were removed. Now any investment can be subject to a "prudent portfolio requirement". However federally regulated pension funds continue to be subject to the legal for life rules, but will be moved to the prudent portfolio concept in the future.

Therefore, the proposed clause 11 will ensure that there are no obstacles for pension fund investments in mortgages on airport land.

I believe the bill is pretty well self-explanatory, and I would like to close my remarks now by recommending it to you, and asking that Bill S-11 be given your consideration in as expeditious a manner as possible.

I thank my hon. colleagues on both sides of the House for their great co-operation in this matter in particular and for the their support of the local airport authorities in general.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am not a member who likes to rise and say I told you so, but of course the Solicitor General, who I believe was Minister of Transport when this bill was originally introduced in the House, the divestiture bill as we called it, I think it was Bill C-15 might want to learn something from this little exercise because this is a case where unfortunately it shows up the problems that occur when the government does not listen to the opposition in this House.

The government would not have to introduce this bill tonight if it had listened to the opposition when Bill C-15 was before the House. I do not want to unfairly malign the Solicitor General but I suspect he was Minister of Transport at the time. Perhaps we will have true confessions later tonight.

What happened on that occasion and I am sure you, Mr. Speaker, will remember it because you I expect were listening to the debate and probably noticing how right we were when this bill was discussed in June 1991.

Time and again, members of the opposition rose and said that they could not understand why the government was not having the Official Languages Act apply in certain particulars to this bill. I have a string of members who rose and spoke on this issue. They were the hon. members for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, Hamilton West, Gander—Grand Falls and Ottawa—Vanier. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier was particularly explicit in his explanation as to why Parts V, VI and VII of the Official Languages Act ought to apply to this particular bill.

He spoke eloquently and at length pleading with the government. Let me quote his words from page 998 of Hansard: "I intend to explain to the House the impact of this oversight or this government decision not to include Parts V, VI and VII". He gave a lengthy explanation and he went on to say:

> Mr. Speaker, I simply want to say that Parts V and VI are important to us because in our opinion they deal with the most fundamental issues. That is the right of individuals, the right of Canadians to equal employment opportunities but also the right to work in federal institutions in the language of their choice. If this policy applies to Air Canada, which we know must follow all of the provisions of the Official Languages Act, I fail to see why an employee of Air Canada would be entitled to equal employment opportunities and would also be entitled to work in the language of his choice whereas an employee of a local regional or municipal authority in charge of an airport would not enjoy the same protection.

This was all said in a desperate effort to help this government out of a mess that it created. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier moved a motion to amend the bill. He moved:

> That the motion be amended by deleting the words "be read for the third time and passed" and substituting the following therefor:
>
> "be not now read a third time but be referred back to the legislative committee for the purpose of reconsidering clause 4 of the bill by striking out line 17 of page 2 and substituting—"

I do not need to read the rest of it, but he wanted to put the act in.

I may have maligned the former Minister of Transport because I see he spoke right after and he was Solicitor General. One can only assume that he opposed this very sensible amendment moved by my colleague the distinguished and very capable member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Here we are, almost one year later, and the government is coming back to Parliament on bended knee asking the opposition to pass the amendment we wanted the government to pass one year ago. Indeed, it wants more amendments. Many of them were the ones that were mentioned at the time.

Tax exemption has been included in this bill. My friend, the government House leader disparages the other place and speaks in uncomplimentary terms from time to time about the other place. Yet the Senate had hearings on Bill C-15. The question was asked, apparently by an officer of Transport Canada why this tax exemption was included in this bill and not in the original bill.

The answer was: "At the time we came forward with Bill C-15 there was no definitive decision from Revenue Canada whether or not under existing law they would qualify". Subsequent to the tabling of the bill, it became clear that they would not qualify under the existing legislation because authorities were a unique corporate institution". If it became evident after the tabling, why did it not fix it up?

It shows the indecent haste with which this government tries to force bills through this House. It ignores throughout the strong advice of the members of the opposition who try to correct the blunders that the government so obviously made in introducing the legislation.

The hon. member laughs. It would be a laughing matter if it did not cost so much money to run this House. We have a reasonable opposition here which speaks for such a brief time on almost every bill anyway. Instead of listening, the ministers flit off and go elsewhere. The members sit and laugh and ignore the remarks of the opposition, thinking they are a waste of time. It shows that our remarks are not a waste of time. If only somebody had paid attention government members would not be here today with this other bill. It would not have taken weeks getting it through the other place. This is an expensive process. Hon. members opposite laugh about it and think it is a joke. I do not think it is a joke.

• (2120)

Then there were the sections on seizure of aircraft. Sections 4(5) and 4(6) of the Aeronautics Act give the transport minister the power to seize and detain aircraft for non-payment of landing fees or terminal fees. Sections 9 and 10 of this new bill give the local authorities similar power.

Why was it not in the original bill? An officer of Transport Canada said: "We did not know at the time the first bill was introduced. We discovered after we did work with lawyers on the other side that it would be prudent to put it in." If we had spent a little bit of time thinking about it, there might have been some lawyers in this House who might have thought it was prudent to put it in.

Mr. Comuzzi: You and I.

Mr. Milliken: As the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon says, maybe we would have thought of it if we had gone to the committee.

Maybe the government should hire us on in the government departments. That would be a disappointment though. Then we would not get to speak in this House. We could give them some advice on how to fix these bills up, but we give them that advice freely in this House and it is freely ignored by the government.

I have to say I find it sad that in spite of the very serious efforts of at least four members during the debate in June 1991 on this bill, I believe all at third reading, and the amendment moved by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier to rectify the blunder, the government ignored all that advice. Now, as I say, it is back here on bended knee asking us to pass this bill tonight.

Of course, having put these amendments forward on a previous occasion, we are happy to support the bill tonight and to facilitate its speedy passage in the House. I am sorry that kind of co-operation is necessary given the complete absence of co-operation when the government voted down our amendment a year ago and refused to listen to the very reasoned and sensible arguments put forward by so many of our members at that time.

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I know we are all anxious to get this over with this evening especially on a matter where we find ourselves to be in so much agreement.

I want to add to the comments of my colleague from Kingston and the Islands. Again, it is nice that the Solicitor General is here, who was Minister of Transport at the time. The same as my colleague, we always hate to say we told you so, but in all humility, we told you so, we told you so, we told you so.

I would just like to comment on the bill itself before getting down to the particular amendments that we moved and supported in committee in March 1991. I want to comment very briefly on the purpose of the bill before us which is to amend the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act, the main provisions of the bill being to continue the existing status under the new local airport authorities recognizing that this does not represent any change in moneys paid to the government; to extend to local airport authorities the same powers, procedure and detention of aircraft as currently exists in relation to major non-payment of fees; to regularize the status of various financial investments for the purposes of security; and the one I want to add a few comments on, to extend Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act, namely language of work and equal participation provisions to airports that are leased by the federal government to local airport authorities. This particular provision, Parts V and VI, does not apply to airports that would be sold in the future.

In committee on March 13, 1991 my colleague, the transport critic for the New Democratic Party, the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan, supported at that time by the Liberal member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon and the Liberal member for York West attempted to correct the language aspect of the bill.

In committee on the date I referred to, my colleague from Thunder Bay—Atikokan in reference to the amendments which he moved at that time which now appear before us as Parts V and VI said: "The purpose of the amendment is to have all aspects of the Official Languages Act apply to these airports".

I recognized that we had testimony from all local airport authorities involved to date indicating they did not feel it was appropriate. On the other hand, yesterday we also heard testimony from the union that indicated it felt it would be important for its members. Certainly in talking with it after the meeting about this particular clause, I understand that even though its members would no longer be part of the federal Public Service, because of the expertise they will have developed whether it is in Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Montreal, or any of the other areas, they will be prime candidates for open competition within the federal Public Service.

As they move up the ladder within the local airport authority their expertise will be something that will be sought. It is to the benefit of the union's members and I think also to the local airport authorities to have staff appropriately trained in both official languages based on the existing legislation.

I realize that at this time it may only affect the local airport authority from Montreal and Mirabel but over time it may affect others. Until then it will not be an onerous condition on the western airports.

Montreal was very clear that it will have the most highly qualified bilingual staff of any place in the country and so I do not think it would be an onerous burden on it.

Following the member's comments, the member for York West said: "I would like to support the motion of Mr. Angus which is analogous to the very same amendment that we put forward as our fifth amendment".

Following that intervention, the member for Manicouagan said: "I listened carefully to what Mr. Angus had to say. I was concerned about the same points during our public hearings. I do not believe that including Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act would add anything at all to this bill. Only the Montreal airport authority would be bound by these sections since Montreal is at present the only bilingual district recognized by the Official Languages Act. The people of Montreal have made it very clear that they will be competing with airports on the east coast of the United States, Toronto, and elsewhere. They want to be free to conduct their affairs in the language best suited to the circumstances.

It seems to me that by including Parts V and VI of the Official Languages Act in Bill C-85 we would be putting the Montreal airport authority at a disadvantage because Montreal is the only place where these sections would apply. They would not apply to Edmonton, Calgary or Vancouver because these cities are not recognized as bilingual districts by the Official Languages Act and therefore their airport authorities would not have to comply with these conditions. I would ask the committee to consider this point. By including these two sections in Bill C-85, we would be putting Montreal's airport administration at a disadvantage".

The government side did not listen to the amendments or suggestions put forward by both representatives of the Liberal Party and of the New Democratic Party, in particular the member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan. It did not listen in committee. It did not listen to the amendments and the arguments and suggestions later put forward in the House. Now, as my colleague from Kingston and the Islands has pointed out, we have had to go through the lengthy and costly exercise of having it come back through the other place with significant argument and study there, and back to the House here.

We, along with the Official Opposition, are granting every co-operation we can to see this matter is dealt with as expeditiously as possible in this House tonight. We are happy to do that but we do state again that we wish the government would be more sympathetic and open in future to hearing reasoned arguments based on study of the legislation and its real implications rather than simply ignoring advice coming from the opposition because it is the opposition side.

We are happy to support these amendments and hope that we do not have to do this kind of particular exercise too much more often in the future.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, very succinctly. I was not going to intervene in this discussion after my colleague from Kootenay had expressed those thoughts, along with my colleague from Kingston and the Islands. We on this side of the House right from the inception—I am glad that the former Minister of Transport is here—of the transfer of jurisdiction to local airport authorities supported that legislation with great enthusiasm. Many of us on this side of the House felt that the local airport authority was the only way we could compete in a global economy in so far as airport business was concerned. We were then in the process of an open skies debate. As a result, we felt that the local airport authority was a very good idea and supported it fully.

Since that time though, I have been very disappointed with the speed with which we have been able to proceed with the local airport authority in getting these airports in Canada transferred over to the proper jurisdictions. I can say, having been on that committee that my former colleague discussed, having visited with the local airport authorities in Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver and Mirabel in the Province of Quebec, they were all enthusiastic about going along with the legislation for the local airport authority, but for some reason or other it was constantly delayed.

My concern, and the reason for getting up, Mr. Speaker, is that I know there is a very active local airport authority in my riding of Thunder Bay which wants to look after and take over the airport facility. They are very keen, they are very knowledgeable. I would not want to let this opportunity go by without impressing upon our colleagues across the aisle how important it is that they proceed with this proposal with all dispatch.

I just make that message and thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity of saying that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in committee on Bill S-11, an act to amend the Airport Transfer (Miscellaneous Matters) Act.

Clause 1 agreed to.

On Clause 2—

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Chairman, could the parliamentary secretary advise the committee whether the words in clause 2 amending the original bill in so far as it deals with the Official Languages Act are the same as those contained in the amendment moved at third reading by my colleague, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, on June 3, 1991.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I'm sorry, I do not have that old amendment before me. I am sure that if it was prepared and drafted by my hon. friend, the member for Ottawa—Vanier, the intent at least, if not the exact wording, would be very similar.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Hon. Doug Lewis (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the third time? By unanimous consent, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Lewis (for the Minister of Transport) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): By unanimous consent may I call it 10 o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 10 o'clock, the House stands adjourned until 2 p.m. Friday, June 19, 1992, pursuant to a special order adopted earlier.

The House adjourned at 9.34 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, June 19, 1992

The House met at 2 p.m.

Prayers

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Madam Speaker, many people would have us believe that you cannot have good environmental policy without drastically affecting industry or, conversely, have effective economic policy without destroying the environment. Sarnia—Lambton is an exception to the rule.

That is because the petrochemical refining companies in my riding are making a positive commitment to the environment. Specifically, their initiatives deal with separating themselves from our beautiful St. Clair River.

Polysar Rubber Corporation has committed $50 million over the next three years toward a target of 100 per cent reduction in spills. Dow Canada spent $5 million in 1991 and will spend another $8 million this year for its river separation project.

Novacor Chemicals has pledged $3 million a year over the next three years for capital programs, new monitoring equipment, containment basins, and environmental training for its employees. Shell Canada will also be spending millions at its local refinery and chemical plant.

We can all be proud of these companies in Sarnia—Lambton which are making environment a number one priority—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but the time has expired.

ALEXANDRA, P.E.I.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, this year the community of Alexandra, Prince Edward Island, is celebrating its 200th anniversary. Over the last 200 years many things have changed in Alexandra, but one thing has stayed the same. There is a great sense of community pride among the people, especially this year. Since the spring, events have been held commemorating the last 200 years of accomplishment. Very special events will be held on Canada Day, including the dedication of a conservation area and a reforestation project.

This year, as we celebrate the 125th anniversary of Confederation, we should also give special recognition to communities like Alexandra that are a great part of our history.

I congratulate the organizing committee for its efforts and urge everybody to come out on Canada Day and help Alexandra celebrate.

* * *

[Translation]

CANADIAN UNITY

Mr. Marcel Tremblay (Québec-Est): Madam Speaker, two reports stressing the negative impact of the constitutional crisis appeared on June 9. A comment in Marie Tison's article for Canadian Press reads as follows: "The Quebec question continues to have a negative impact on the Canadian dollar, according to the analysts."

I want to urge Canadians to be united on reaching a consensus that meets their needs and expectations, so that we can continue to benefit from the excellent trade relations we have been able to establish throughout the world.

Madam Speaker, I would also ask all members of this House to continue to express their confidence in this country of ours, a source of untold riches for this generation as well as a magnificent legacy for the next.

S. O. 31

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I rise in regard to a provincial housing project in the Bluehaven neighbourhood of my riding. The residents have been extremely concerned about the impact on already high levels of density and anxious over environmental hazards since the project sits adjacent to a closed landfill site.

Last year I wrote the provincial ministers of housing and environment about both fears and on the latter the minister informed me and residents that no environmental risks existed and the government therefore gave the green light.

Last month, however, environmental officials clearly contradicted the minister on two different occasions by pointing to elevated levels of methane gas which may "represent a hazard to the people".

According to residents, the ministry has not undertaken any serious or ongoing testing to date, which is both dangerous and irresponsible. I call upon the provincial government and its local representative to order environmental officials to immediately investigate and initiate the necessary testing and monitoring so that the community's public safety on this can be fully satisfied. The onus is clearly on the provincial Government of Ontario which approved the project—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I regret the time has expired.

* * *

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, it is only 400 weeks until the end of this century. The earth summit is over but the urgency of population, poverty, climate change, species lost and environmental degradation remain.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of the Environment would have Canadians believe that they fought a vigorous battle on these issues in Rio. In fact they did not. There were no efforts to lead and Canada lost a great opportunity.

We like all nations must face the population tsunami that is heading our way. Three children are now born every second while 40,000 children under the age of 15 die every day from malnutrition and preventable disease. One acre of tropical rain forest is lost every second while one acre of Canadian forest is lost every five seconds. The level and rate of greenhouse gas emissions is rising.

The conventions on climate change and biodiversity will only work if we turn these words into action.

Today Canadians are the largest per capita producers of garbage on earth and the largest per capita emitters of greenhouse gas in the developed world. We must change if we are to survive and pass to future generations a habitable planet. That was the message of the earth summit.

* * *

MERCHANT MARINERS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, June 18 was a red letter day for our merchant mariners. Bill C–84 was given Royal Assent and as a result these brave seamen will at last be able to receive the same benefits as those enjoyed by wartime veterans of the Armed Forces.

The new benefits become available on July 1. Members of the House should know that applications for benefits will be available at all 32 district offices of Veterans Affairs. The Minister of Veterans Affairs tells me that any of our constituents who fall into the new category of merchant navy veteran should get in touch with the nearest district office.

Our wartime merchant mariners have been waiting for something like Bill C–84 for over 45 years. We can be proud that it was this Parliament that finally heard their pleas.

* * *

SUDAN

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, the military government of Sudan, controlled by Islamic fundamentalists, seized power from a democratically elected government in 1989. This government is notorious for human rights abuses and continued prosecution of the brutal civil war against non–Muslims of the south.

• (1410)

Amnesty International and Africa Watch tell of house arrests, torture houses, disappearances, amputations, summary executions, and crucifixions.

Last month, Hassan Al-Turabi, leader of the National Islamic Front and considered to be Sudan's real leader, was granted entry to Canada. He met with external affairs officials and meetings were arranged with Conservative members of this House.

Canadians and Sudanese have a right to know: Why was he allowed into Canada? When will Canada's welcome end? Why would members of this government meet with Al-Turabi, the de facto leader and author of the present tyranny imposed upon the people of Sudan? Will Canada's government now pledge all its efforts to support Sudanese human rights and end its civil war?

* * *

PROPERTY RIGHTS

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, a few hours ago in this Chamber Russian President Boris Yeltsin said his country is giving priority status to property rights. It is ironic Russia thinks this is a cornerstone of democratic freedom when Canada so far has not given its citizens the same right.

So it is we get bad laws which trample property rights like the one Ontario is now contemplating which would allow homeowners anywhere in the province to open up apartments in their homes even if that is in clear contravention of municipal zoning laws.

Imagine the possibility of rooming houses or bachelor apartments mushrooming in neighbourhoods where it would affect the enjoyment and value of properties that others worked lifetimes for.

Zoning laws are there for a reason, to protect the integrity of neighbourhoods. I denounce this law as a flagrant betrayal of fundamental human rights. It could only spring from the minds of socialists who believe the state should always lord it over the individual. Even the Russians do not buy that one anymore. Is comrade Bob Rae listening?

S. O. 31

BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the parliamentary secretary to the minister of health said in the House yesterday that the health department was unanimous in defending the Meme breast implant. In fact, health and welfare listed breast implants as high-risk devices in 1983 and health and welfare scientists recommended the Meme be removed from the market in 1989.

The parliamentary secretary said the CMA did an arm's length review and did not find evidence to prove silicone gel implants unsafe. In fact, it was a government financed study, published in the CMA journal at the government's expense and request, which the CMA has said is not its policy.

The deadliest inaccuracy of it all was when she said "there was no evidence proving that breast implants are unsafe for women". The director of the USFDA said recently, after extensive review, "we know more about the life span of automobile tires than we do about the longevity of breast implants"; that women are at risk and the risk is unacceptable.

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader. If there is something that should be withdrawn, it can be withdrawn during the member's statement. I will listen briefly to the hon. member.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I will be brief and I thank you. The hon. member said the parliamentary secretary to the minister of health and welfare had said the report in question was unanimous. If she would check—

Madam Deputy Speaker: This is a point of debate. The hon. member can correct the record later. It is not a point of order at this time and the hon. parliamentary secretary knows it.

* * *

TELEPHONE SERVICE

Mr. Dave Worthy (Cariboo—Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, the recent decision by the CRTC to move from a monopoly telephone service to a competitive one sounds goods. In fact, for many businesses across Canada it is good, and for many others who live in the urban belt of Canada. However, there will be a price to be paid. Most Canadians will probably see that in increased local service charges.

My concern is that the greatest price will probably be paid by the constituents I represent and others like them in rural areas of Canada. You cannot take away the lucrative long distance service and not expect some fallout. Where will the axe fall? In all likelihood on the most costly and least profitable areas of services; rural Canadian telephone service.

I predict the results will be increasingly exorbitant costs for those Canadians who do not yet have any telephone service, and a slowdown and deterioration of needed service upgrades.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

* * *

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, the annual report of Canada Post Corporation was tabled today by the government House leader. It gives us the sad news for all of Canada.

It tells us what most of us had predicted all along, that the loss at Canada Post Corporation is $128 million. In fact that loss was quite predictable. Had it not been for a $32 million profit from the sale of assets, in other words selling the furniture to pay the rent, the real loss would have been $160 million.

I have to wonder as a Canadian why it is Canada Post, which is losing money, still saw fit to spend $32 million to buy a share in an Australian company that delivers mail in Europe, namely G. D. Net.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEME BREAST IMPLANTS

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, first of all I would just like to thank President Boris Yeltsin personally. He has agreed to intervene in looking for a prisoner of war of the Korean war who has been missing since 1951. I wanted to thank both President Yeltsin and the Prime Minister for agreeing to intervene in this case personally.

My question is for the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare. In the absence of the minister, the acting minister, the parliamentary secretary and most other ministers, I will direct it to whichever minister wants to answer.

Yesterday the parliamentary secretary, when asked about Meme breast implants, told the House that "there is no specific scientific evidence...that they are unsafe for women".

According to the official minutes which I have in my hand, of a meeting of the research and standards division of the department of health of the federal government on January 6, 1989, "the risk and severity of complications seemed to outweigh the possible advantages of the Meme implants". According to these minutes, "the complications include severe persistent infections; the foam can elicit a marked foreign body reaction".

Why did the former minister, the current Minister of Communications, put the health of women at risk by ignoring the official minutes of his own department?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, first it was the elderly, and now they would have women believe the government does not protect them.

We took appropriate action. We are now analysing what we have and waiting for more information. The moratorium is still in place and is supported by the manufacturers. Above all, Canadian women should be told, not once but repeatedly, that the government's foremost concern is their health, which is their responsibility as well. We will maintain the moratorium, and we are waiting for all the information to be in before taking further action.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): I think it is particularly unfortunate that the women in this government are defending an indefensible position on the breast implant.

My question is directed to the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare. In fact, the minister himself should have been here today to answer these questions.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Ms. Copps: His predecessor, since January 6—

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member does know that making a point of noticing the presence or absence of anybody in the House is not possible. The hon. member does know that ministers have other functions that they must attend and that sometimes they cannot be present.

I would appreciate it if she would put her question right now.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, my question was directed to the Acting Minister of National Health and Welfare, because this is an issue that concerns all Canadian women, and the minister should be here to reply.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unless the hon. member for Hamilton East puts her question immediately, the Chair will have to recognize another member.

• (1420)

Ms. Copps: Madam Speaker, my question is this. Considering that specific and unanimous information against the use of breast implants was available to the government since January 6, 1989, why did the minister and his predecessor continue to ignore the facts and thus put the health of women at risk?

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I remind the hon. member that if we want to defend women's rights, we should start by showing some solidarity as women.

I am here to answer questions directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who was called away from Ottawa, for humanitarian reasons, I may add.

I maintain that this government's foremost concern is to protect women's health. I want to ask the women opposite to stop trying to alarm their peers, and I repeat that no action will be taken by the government until all the results are in.

There is a moratorium, the manufacturers are abiding by that moratorium, and we will continue to protect women's health.

[English]

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, solidarity means protecting the health of women, not falling behind a government position which is clearly wrong.

I would like to ask the acting minister of health, and we would certainly like to ask the minister if he ever sees fit to come back to the House—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Nepean.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the acting minister of health. I am concerned that maybe the minister was not listening so I will redirect the question.

A senior health and welfare official clearly documented the health risk associated with the Meme breast implant. I quote: "The risk and severity of the complications seem to outweigh the possible advantages".

Fourteen months later the former Minister of National Health and Welfare said in this House, in response to a question by me: "We are confident in the success and the safety of these devices. Let us not create false fears among women".

I ask the minister carefully: Would she please explain once again why her government ignored for so long the urgent warnings provided by her senior officials concerning the safety of the Meme breast implant?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): The Minister of National Health and Welfare is carefully monitoring all the recommendations and information coming in, Madam Speaker. In English or French, the answer is the same, and I maintain that we are taking care of the health of Canadian women. We are maintaining the moratorium, and as soon as we have enough relevant information, we will take appropriate action.

I repeat that health is also women's responsibility, and I urge them to see their doctor and get the information that applies to their specific case.

[English]

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I will put my supplementary question through you to the acting minister of health.

It was three and a half years ago that these same government officials recommended to government that distributors be asked to voluntarily stop selling the Meme implant.

How could the minister inform the women of Canada for years that the Meme was a safe product when senior officials of the department had called for a ban as early as 1989?

This boggles my mind. Why did the government not act immediately in 1989?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I prefer to concentrate on the present, not on the past or the future, and we are now analysing the situation. Meanwhile, research continues because we are concerned about women's health. Major funding has been allocated to breast cancer research, and that is what we, as a government, are doing.

We must speed up the pace of research, and we must set women's concerns at rest by giving them appropriate information and especially by avoiding alarmist statements.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, in fact the Department of Health and Welfare Canada listed breast implants as high risk devices in 1983. Then its scientists recommended that the Meme be removed in 1989.

I want to ask the minister who is responding today: Why did the minister of health at that time not take the very serious advice of his own scientists and immediately remove the Meme implant from the market and save the disfigurement and the terrible health costs numerous Canadian women have suffered since 1989?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, we must have complete information before taking concrete action. I maintain that there is no consensus or unanimity, either among the patients or in the various reports.

As a responsible government that cares about women's health, we are compiling complete data so that we can then take the required action. In the meantime, the moratorium is still in effect and we are respecting it, in co-operation with the manufacturers.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, in fact the health protection branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare grandfathered the Meme implant. It did not do studies on it itself. It did not take the health of Canadian women seriously.

There is a track record on thalidomide, on the IUD, on DES, on Depo-Provero and on breast implants. There is a long litany of women's health concerns that were not taken seriously.

Therefore I want to ask the minister: Will the government now agree, after questioning many times from this side of the House, to an inquiry into the actions of the health and welfare medical protection branch, a complete public inquiry so that these questions can be answered once and for all?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): If I understand correctly, Madam Speaker, we are being asked to do more research so that we can make decisions—

Ms. Black: No, no, an inquiry.

Mrs. Vézina:—or investigate to find out what happened in the past. That is just what we are working on. We are collecting the information so that we can give women that assurance.

Madam Speaker, I am a woman too and I understand that women are torn and worried about the present situation. As women, whatever my colleague opposite thinks, we are trying our very best to defend women in a government that we have trouble running financially. We want to secure the health of Canadian women.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the same minister.

The minister has stated now in the House two reasons to explain the negligence of this government. The first is that we should forget the past and the second is that there were budget constraints. That is very poor solace for all the women who have been affected for over the past three years by the Meme implant.

I want to ask the minister very clearly: Is there not a clear ministerial responsibility to take action for the negligence of the past three and a half years? When is the government going to act on that negligence and ask the minister responsible at that time to resign?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I have just been given a list of the steps taken to ensure that this government made the right decisions for women's health. We did the required research. We had to obtain information from outside. I maintain that this government in the past eight years has done all it could to ensure the health and safety of women in Canada.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Madam Speaker, the minister has said that she has just received news about government actions, about what it is doing.

Three and a half years ago the government had a report from its own officials which said the consensus of the meeting was that the net result of this review was significantly negative. We did not have to wait till today. The government had the information three and a half years ago.

We on this side of the House want to know when this government will take responsibility for the negligence that took place. What actions is it going to take now to ensure that all women who were affected during that period of negligence will get proper treatment, proper compensation and proper care from this government?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I asked the people opposite to show some common sense. With his political experience, the hon. member knows very well that a minister who is replacing another does not know in detail all the information that has been reported.

• (1430)

It was a briefing note to remind me of all the measures and steps taken in the past five years on this breast implant issue. It shows our concern to find the right solutions. I maintain that women's safety is a priority for this department.

* * *

CANADIAN AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Yesterday, 500 Air Canada employees gathered in front of Parliament to protest the government's inaction on the unstable Canadian aviation industry.

The only way to save this important industry is solid leadership from the government. What does the government intend to do to ensure the survival of an aviation industry that is controlled by Canadians and maintains good jobs in Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the government intends to maintain the present legislation limiting foreign ownership of Canadian airlines to 25 per cent and requiring that effective control remain in Canadian hands.

[English]

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, despite widespread turmoil in this industry, the government has had nothing specific to say about the future of the Canadian airline industry.

Today the open skies negotiations have been resumed and given the many public indications, which surely the minister cannot have failed to notice, both Canadian air carriers are looking to establish strong links with U.S. carriers.

How is the government proposing to ensure that Canadian air carriers will not become mere regional feeders for U.S. megacarriers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, this is precisely why my predecessor has instituted the open skies negotiations with the U.S. These negotiations are ongoing with success and we hope to have a new agreement signed by the end of this year.

* * *

[Translation]

NUCLEAR TESTS

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment and has to do with the Russian President's visit. Our two countries share all sorts of concerns about the economy, the environment and international policy. However, the international community is worried because President Yeltsin has decided to end his moratorium on nuclear tests; they are to start again this fall.

Has the Government of Canada encouraged Russia to restore this moratorium and redouble its efforts to achieve an international moratorium?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I know that today and yesterday, the Prime Minister had discussions with Mr. Yeltsin on co-operation in various fields. The issue of co-operation on nuclear matters also came up. He no doubt knows that some concern has been expressed publicly for several months now on the nuclear installations in the former Soviet Union, among other things.

I am waiting for a report on those discussions and I will be pleased to provide my colleague with the part on nuclear tests, the subject which concerns him, once we have an opportunity to find out what was said in the discussions between the two leaders.

[English]

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the various treaties and accords with Mr. Yeltsin which have been announced today do not include, so far as I can tell from the information which has been given us, any information or suggestion that we are trying to persuade the people of Russia to take action to ensure the moratorium on nuclear tests which is due to end this October will be continued. This is a crucial issue for all Canadians and all people throughout the world.

Will the Canadian government take advantage of this important visit and push for this moratorium to continue in the future and for it to be extended to all countries throughout the world?

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, as I just indicated there have been discussions between Mr. Yeltsin and the Prime Minister on a range of issues. Some of them pertain to nuclear safety. A nuclear safety initiative was made public today.

As the member might know there has also been some concern, probably more of it voiced in Europe and Germany, around nuclear safety power generating stations which is also related to this issue.

On the issue of testing I will have to await, as he will, an opportunity to hear what the contents of the discussions were. I will be happy to inform him as soon as I get that information.

* * *

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is also on the Yeltsin visit and is directed to the government House leader.

The government House leader, who is from the prairies, is fully aware that three-quarters of Canadian aid to the former Soviet Union was in the form of grain credits. The Prime Minister signed a treaty with President Yeltsin in February for a five-year contract for 25 million tonnes of grain.

My question is very important to the prairies. There are now some stories and rumours that the port of Churchill may be about to close. In view of the importance of that port to prairie Canada, can the government House leader tell the House today whether or not the Prime Minister had a chance to raise the issue of grain shipments to the Soviet Union with President Yeltsin? Was the suggestion made that some of that grain should go through the port of Churchill so that all Canadian ports can benefit from increased trade with the federation of Russia?

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, we know how important the market to Russia is for Canadian farmers.

The Canadian Wheat Board has always maintained and tried to ship wheat at the preferred customer location destination and we will continue to do that. I would expect this was likely raised with Mr. Yeltsin this morning. The main thing is that we maintain those sales and keep the sales moving to Russia.

There are no plans to change anything at the port of Churchill. We hope there will be an opportunity for some of those grain products to go through that port. That is a decision the Canadian Wheat Board and the buyer will have to make.

* * *

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment.

On Tuesday in St. Anthony, Newfoundland, a thousand fishermen and plant workers organized a demonstration calling upon the government to pay attention to the fact that they have been without income since May 15 and asking it for assistance.

On Wednesday in the House the Prime Minister committed his government to bring in a program of short-term, medium-term, and long-term assistance. We applaud that on this side of the House.

Given that there are only a couple of House sitting days left and given that no information has yet been communicated to fishermen and to plant workers who are looking at a moratorium on the fishery for the first time in 500 years, can the minister, through the House, tell the people of Newfoundland and Labrador what proposals and programs he will be bringing forward to provide immediate short-term assistance for those who have been without income for the last five or six weeks?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the Prime Minister indicated on June 17 in this House, the government is well aware of the situation in Newfoundland and Labrador, for that matter, all of Atlantic Canada and the state of the fishery.

He indicated then that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who is in Newfoundland today would be coming back with proposals for the government to consider.

I would like to be able to inform the hon. member of more details today but it is not possible. I would not want him to leave the impression that because the House will adjourn it will be impossible for the government to take the necessary action. If it is not possible to make an announcement or state the government's intention before the House rises, the government will still have the ability to do that after and as soon as possible.

• (1440)

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): A supplementary, Madam Speaker.

More than 60 members of Parliament from a variety of political parties, including independent members, have officially asked for a proper emergency debate on this issue.

For the first time in 500 years we are talking about a formal moratorium, a close down of an industry that is the backbone of the economy of Newfoundland and Labrador and certainly in similar straits in other parts of Atlantic Canada.

Will the minister tell the House today that before the House adjourns for the summer recess he, as minister of employment, together with the minister of fisheries, is prepared to come before Parliament and through Parliament tell the people of Atlantic Canada what their program will be? What measures are going to be introduced to ensure that people are able to maintain the basics of life and certainly the dignity to exist during the interim period until those cod stocks are rebuilt?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the government has already had occasion to act to protect the fishing families in Newfoundland and Labrador and in all of Atlantic Canada.

The Prime Minister indicated quite clearly that we were looking at options and ways of trying to address their concerns. He is talking about a moratorium that has not been announced. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is there consulting with stakeholders in Newfoundland and Labrador and with the provincial governments. As soon as the government is capable of making known how we can contribute to help those people in Newfoundland and Labrador, we will.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

In addition to the 1,000 people in St. Anthony who demonstrated on Tuesday, just a few hours ago there was a demonstration in Clarenville in my riding representing two of the 57 plants, about 9,000 people involved in the fishing industry and fish plant operators.

These people are very worried. They do not have unemployment insurance or their unemployment insurance has run out. They have no fish and they have no idea what the short-term, long-term or interim plans are.

These people are crying out. They are asking for help. In view of the crisis situation, could the minister share with this House some indication of what his action plan is for the compensation for these people?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is too bad for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador that it takes a demonstration to wake up the member.

On March 23, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I announced a task force to deal with that very problem. The member talks about the long-term problem of those fishermen in Newfoundland and Labrador. I do not think that by inviting people to hold demonstrations it will address the problem. We have to find a way to solve the long-term problems of the fishery in all of Atlantic Canada and we have a task force doing that.

The Prime Minister, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and I have been quite clear. We are committed to help those people. We are in the process of analysing and trying to find out how we can best help them. The people of Newfoundland and Labrador have our commitment that we will do that.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, this government including that minister, is responsible for mismanaging the fishery for the last eight years. I do not need lessons from him.

He tells me to wake up. I have made 25 interventions in the last three months. I think I have been awake for a hell of a long time.

This House is going to shut down on Tuesday. The Atlantic fishermen are afraid they are going to be forgotten. The Prime Minister stood in this House and gave a commitment to these people two days ago. For those people, the circumstances they are in, a day is like a year.

I ask the minister one more time and I do not want any smart remarks.

I want him to tell me that the Prime Minister has made a commitment. Will he take this commitment and turn the promise of the Prime Minister into reality and do it now?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, I want to assure members opposite that we on this side do recognize the serious problem that is evolving on the east coast.

The member need only to look back to 1990 and 1991 to what this government did to be assured that there will be a program in place should we have to announce a moratorium.

* * *

AIRPORTS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Madam Speaker, I would like to put a question for the Minister of Transport.

As the minister knows, a significant part of the air transport side of his department is to check and maintain navigational aids at airports across Canada.

It has been brought to my attention that the private sector can provide a more economical and more technologically advanced system to check and maintain these navigational aids.

I would like to ask the minister if he is considering improving the method of checking these devices and at the same time saving the taxpayers' dollars?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the hon. member knows that Transport Canada uses the most advanced technology in the testing and calibrating of navigational aids and that our main concern is the safety of the aviation industry.

At the same time, we are examining proposals that have been made to us to maintain the safety at a lower cost and of course we are interested in it.

NORTH AMERICAN FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, two days ago in the Manitoba legislature, the Conservative minister of trade raised his concerns about the NAFTA negotiations relative to the apparel industry.

It appears that the Conservative trade minister is concerned that under NAFTA, this government is going to force the apparel industry in Canada to buy all of its textiles either from Mexico or the United States. If that takes place, over 109,000 jobs will be at peril in Canada.

I want to ask whoever is the acting minister of trade today whether or not the concerns of the minister in Manitoba are valid? If not, will the government speak out today and say that no such deal will be signed to put those jobs at risk here in Canada.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that negotiations are ongoing. One of the areas on which there is considerable discussion is the textile industry.

Canada of course is at the table to protect the textile and the garment industries in this country because they are both creators of employment and very important to the economy of this country.

My hon. friend did not want us at the table. He did not want the Government of Canada to be at the table to protect the interests of the textile and garment workers.

Well we are there and we are doing that.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Madam Speaker, I would like to have thanked the minister for his answer but there is nothing there to be thankful for.

I am going to move now on the NAFTA issue to another minister and that is the Minister of Transport, Madam Speaker.

President Bush has just signed a presidential order that will permit Mexican truck drivers to drive their rigs right into the United States through California and perhaps other states. President Bush, signing on behalf of Canada, may have done the same thing.

The reality is that under this presidential order Mexican truck drivers will be permitted to drive rigs that normally would have been driven by American truck drivers. As a consequence, jobs will be lost and wages will be lowered.

I want an assurance from the Minister of Transport here today that no such waiver will be given to Mexican trucks crossing through the United States and up into Canada. I want that assurance.

• (1450)

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am not sure I understand the geography of the hon. member, but I can assure him that I attended the convention recently of the Canadian Trucking Association with the American Truckers Association and the Mexican Truckers Association. All of these players were very much in favour of free trade among the three countries in trucking.

* * *

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister of employment. The minister will know that the unemployment rate on Cape Breton Island is now over 22 per cent. Yet there is no increase, probably there is a decrease, in the amount of job creation funding available.

For example, for the North Sydney–Sydney Mines area there remains only $35,000 in the job creation fund and no more money will be forthcoming until April 1993.

When will the minister add some funds to the job creation program for Cape Breton Island?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I do not have the numbers for the region that the hon. member talks about but I can look into it.

What I can say is that last year the province of Nova Scotia, under the programming of my department, received over $110 million and that figure is not going down. I can look at the specific area that the hon. member has raised and can advise him accordingly.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, I am sure the minister would acknowledge that Cape Bretoners, like all Canadians, want steady jobs. They are doing everything possible to find them and to save the jobs that are left. Yet the bankruptcy rates continue to increase.

I would hope that the minister would recognize that this is a very critical situation on Cape Breton Island. Will he acknowledge this crisis and do what he can to provide some assistance for the people of Cape Breton Island?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am ready to look at how we can ensure that all the programs we have at CEIC relevant to the area are being utilized. The hon. member, to help those people back home, could also give them hope. Interest rates have gone down again. We have the lowest rate of interest in some 20 years. We have the lowest rate of inflation in 20 years.

It may be funny to other members, but in a region like Cape Breton, because I am from Atlantic Canada, I know that this will be helpful. We will build on this with the programs we have in order to help the people in that part of the country.

* * *

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. The notion of low interest rate loans to small business is a sham. The fact of the matter is that the Canadian financial institutions in this country are not giving credit to businesses that want to expand.

What will the minister do to wake up the banking institutions in this country to the importance of small business to our economy?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. Banks have been very difficult with their credit. There is no question about that.

I, like the hon. member and I am sure others in this House, am getting complaints from the small and medium sized business community that the banks have tightened up with their credit and it is non-existent for some businesses.

We have encouraged, through my constant contact with the Canadian Bankers' Association, that this is the time that it should be supporting small businesses to encourage them to expand and grow at this particular time because the economy is improving. That is number one.

Number two is that with the changes we have brought to the Financial Institutions Act, trust and insurance companies can now make commercial loans. That will take a little time to get in place, I am sure, but it will provide competition for the banks and will provide commercial moneys to businesses which heretofore they have been unable to obtain.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

There are 1.7 million entrepreneurs in this country and they are looking for some very specific leadership from the Minister of Finance.

Would the minister be willing to write to the presidents of the financial institutions of this country, as well as their directors, asking them to give much more care and, therefore, ultimately more credit to this sector of the economy? Would the minister be willing to write a direct letter to the leaders of these institutions?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I will pass that on to the Minister of Finance as a suggestion, a representation from my hon. friend, who does come up with many positive ideas.

I might say that the entrepreneurs that the hon. member is talking about have asked for low inflation and low interest rates. They have asked for that and they have that now. They have a good, steady economic base from which to operate and that is very important. They also asked for that.

I might remind the hon. member that we are helping small businesses out that are having financial difficulties at this time through the small business bond program, which I will—

An hon. member: Nobody knows about it.

Mr. McDermid: The hon. member says nobody knows about it. I will rely on him to help us spread the good word about that.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, I would like to keep the same minister on his feet for a minute.

The government has a lot of credibility riding on its ability to achieve its deficit targets. After years of spending cuts, the GST, and sometimes painful restructuring so our trade can increase, Canadians want to know if the government is on track with the deficit or not.

I would like to ask the minister if he can give a report on Canada's fiscal position to this House.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that we have set goals for deficit reduction and we feel very confident that we can reach the $27.5 billion deficit figure for 1992–93.

There are so many encouraging signs in the economy today.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDermid: Well, I listen to my friends on the Liberal benches who are guffawing about trade figures. In the month of April we had a record export figure of $12.8 billion. This is the fifth month in a row of increase. And I might say that of that amount, $10.8 billion went to the United States, which is also a record. The free trade agreement is working. We are going to reach our deficit figures because the economy is improving, interest rates are falling. We are pleased with the signs that we see.

* * *

WATER

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, my question is for the minister answering on behalf of the Minister for International Trade.

In Kootenay East my constituents face dangerously low water levels in the Columbia River reservoirs and they are suffering serious economic, recreational and environmental damage.

In 1961 the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker signed the controversial Columbia River Treaty which gave the Americans the right to drain fresh water out of B.C. regardless of local needs. In 1988 the Tory government signed the free trade agreement which further erodes Canadian control over our fresh water resources.

Now the government threatens disaster by completely giving in on Canadian control over our water resources to the U.S. and Mexico in the North America free trade agreement.

Will this government pull out of the current NAFTA negotiations in order to ensure that Canada can regain control of our precious fresh water supply?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, the short answer to that question is no, we will not withdraw from the NAFTA negotiations. That would be foolish. The hon. member's colleague just said that we should be there to assure that textile workers and garment workers are protected. So you can't have it both ways.

Second, Canadians have control over their water resources. It was proven during the free trade agreement debate time and time again. We still have control, and we are not going to negotiate anything away at all. The hon. member knows that.

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East): Madam Speaker, the minister may say that, but the reality is that the flow was increased a month ago from 8,000 cubic feet per second to 22,000 cubic feet per second. That is the kind of control that the free trade agreement has brought in. Now they are not going to be able to cut back because you cannot cut back on areas where you have made commitments in the past.

My question is this. Will the minister at least assure Canadians that he will specifically exclude fresh water as a commodity in the NAFTA negotiations?

• (1500)

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, I know the free trade agreement inside out. I do not know where it says anything about river flows or fresh water exports or anything else to the United States.

It has absolutely nothing to do with the free trade agreement or the North American free trade agreement. The NDP is putting up another red herring in front of the Canadian people.

STUDENT EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, Statistics Canada reported that 166,000 students were out of work in May, an increase of 60,000 since 1990.

Why does the Minister of Employment and Immigration continue to reduce funding for student employment programs when unemployment in this group is at crisis proportions?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Minister of State (Youth) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, as the hon. member should know because the question has been answered a number of times in the House, contrary to what he is trying to suggest today the budget for summer employment was increased, not decreased.

* * *

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Madam Speaker, in the course of Question Period I commented on the absence of the minister of health. It has since come to my attention that he was delivering the eulogy at a funeral. Of course I would not want it to be left on the record that I in any way expected him not to fulfil his responsibilities in that area.

I apologize for commenting on his absence when he was obviously doing something very important.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for her apology.

Something for all of us to remember is that before we accuse someone of not being present sometimes we should inquire or simply not mention it, as that is what our rules say.

* * *

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is another point I would also like to bring to the attention of the House. I made a mistake earlier this day when I recognized the hon. parliamentary secretary to the government House leader on a point of order during statements by members.

The only reason why a point of order would be recognizable at that time would be if there was really something unparliamentary. As I had been speaking to someone who was at the chair with me, I thought maybe there was something serious I had not heard, which is why I recognized the hon. member. I should not have done so. The hon. member has other opportunities of putting something on the record. I am sure he would find the reason. I should not have recognized him on a point of order at that point.

I do apologize for the House. I guess it is a learning process for all of us.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I hope I did not inconvenience the House or the Chair with that intervention.

What I had intended to say at that time was that I thought the hon. member would find the record would show that the parliamentary secretary said yesterday the report was conclusive not unanimous, as the hon. member had suggested.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The point has been made. The hon. member knows that this a question of debate and not really a question of order itself.

I thought the hon. member was going to apologize for raising a point of order in the middle of the statement by members. This is why I recognized him.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I did.

* * *

[Translation]

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I have the honour to lay upon the table a Notice of Ways and Means motion to amend the Income Tax Act, the Pension Plan, the Income Tax Conventions Interpretation Act, the Tax Rebate Discounting Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act and certain related Acts. Madam Speaker, I ask that you designate an Order of the Day for the consideration of the said motion.

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, further to the point of order, I must say for the parliamentary secretary to rise during statements and to engage in debate is something I have never seen happen in the House.

I appreciate the Speaker getting up to indicate her unhappiness with the way things went. On the other hand, the parliamentary secretary has continued to put motives to remarks that I made.

I must say I reviewed Hansard very carefully before I made my statement in the House. The parliamentary secretary had said there was conclusive evidence and that gave the impression the health department was unanimous.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must interrupt the hon. member. We are getting into a point of debate. I did admonish the hon. member for getting back into a debate on this very subject and if I have not accepted what the parliament secretary was saying about debating this subject at this time, I cannot accept what the hon. member is doing either. I do suggest we go to tabling of documents.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I wish to indicate my appreciation for your ruling with respect to your apology to the House. That was the point I wanted to make.

I do want to raise a point about the fact that the person who caused that apology to have to be made was then permitted to stand up and make his entire point. It seems to me at the very least it should be possible for the member for New Westminster—Burnaby to be able to make hers back.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, it seems clear. The Speaker has ruled and has clarified the matter.

The parliamentary secretary having intervened a second time, the last time he spoke he apologized. The member has quite legitimately and quite properly made her point. Can we get on with the business of the House?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do agree.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

THE STATE OF CANADA'S FORESTS

TABLING OF SECOND ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, I have the honour today to table, in both official languages, the second annual report to Parliament on The State of Canada's Forests.

Last year you would recall our report was called The State of Forestry in Canada. I believe the new name, The State of Canada's Forests, much better reflects the government's recognition of the public sensitivities to the multiple use we make of our forests, our dependence on our forests, our international obligations as the owners of 10 per cent of the planet's forest resources.

Public expectations related to the use and restoration of our forests are indeed very high. The issues covered in this year's report present a balanced picture of forestry in Canada reflecting society's demands for both a healthy and strong economy, as well as a healthy and pristine environment.

I trust the information presented in this report will provide a useful basis for facilitating dialogue and decision–making on the future of our forests.

* * *

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 13 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

Mr. Fulton: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. Is it not in order for members on this side to say something about the report the minister has just tabled?

Madam Deputy Speaker: No. The hon. member knows this was not a statement by a minister but a very brief explanation while he was tabling the report.

• (1510)

[Translation]

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

REPORT OF CANADIAN SECTION OF INTERNATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FRENCH-SPEAKING PARLIAMENTARIANS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the activity report of the Canadian section of the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians on the meeting of the Executive Committee of the Parliamentary Affairs Commission in Paris on April 14, 1992.

* * *

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

PRESENTATION OF 46TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): I have the honour to present the 46th report of the Standing Committee on House Management. Pursuant to Standing Order 113(a), this report is deemed adopted when laid upon the Table.

* * *

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

PRESENTATION OF 47TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, I also have the 47th report of the Standing Committee on House Management. With unanimous consent, I intend to move for concurrence in this report later this day.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[English]

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West) moved for leave to introduce bill C-355, an act to amend the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Wappel: Madam Speaker, I have a very short explanation. This bill would amend section 52 of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act. That is the section which permits the Security Intelligence Review Committee to make certain recommendations in connection with decisions that have been made by, for example, senior bureaucrats.

As a result of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada and a decision by the Chief of the Defence Staff, it has become obvious that those recommendations are toothless.

This private member's bill is an attempt to give some teeth to the recommendations of SIRC and to provide an opportunity for the minister in Parliament to explain why SIRC's recommendations will not be followed in a particular case.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mr. Wappel moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

* * *

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

AUTHORIZATION FOR STANDING COMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

> That four members and two staff of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts be authorized to travel to London, England, from October 31 to November 5, 1992, to study the British comprehensive auditing system and information to Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

CONCURRENCE IN 47TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Madam Speaker, with unanimous consent, I move that the 47th report of the Standing Committee on House Management presented in the House today be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

* * *

[English]

CROSS-BORDER SHOPPING

SHOP CANADA DAY

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for this motion:

That in the opinion of the House the government will proclaim Saturday, July 4, 1992, as Shop Canada Day to keep consumer dollars in Canada and to support Canadian industry.

Motion agreed to.

* * *

PETITIONS

HEALTH CARE

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to table a petition signed by over 15,000 Canadians from British Columbia to Newfoundland that calls upon Parliament to withhold approval of the drug RU-486 and prevent the marketing and/or testing of this drug to induce abortions in Canada.

These petitioners state that the said drug RU-486 has been used to cause the abortion of the human foetus in the early stages of pregnancy and has also been shown in some cases to have caused serious injury and even death in one case to the mother when taken with prostagladins.

[Translation]

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, today I have eight petitions concerning the Court Challenges Program. Your petitioners, who now number in the thousands, would like to see Parliament review the government's decision which abolished this program last February.

The Court Challenges Program has made it possible for the courts to hand down a number of important decisions aimed at clarifying the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The courts have been able to rule on a broad range of human rights issues, including the rights of inmates, Canadians of native origin and disabled Canadians, as well as on issues concerning discrimination on the basis of age, sex, sexual orientation, citizenship, race, ethnic origin, marital status and family circumstances.

The petitioners ask that the program be reinstated so that all Canadians can have access to this federal assistance which helps protect the rights of all Canadians.

[English]

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present 10 petitions containing approximately 637 signatures from citizens of Burlington, Hamilton, Stoney Creek, Dundas, Mississauga, Oakville, Scarborough, Kitchener, Guelph, Toronto and all over southern Ontario.

The petitioners urge the government to stiffen the penalties for violent crime and points in particular to the death of Miss Nina de Villiers who was brutally murdered on August 9, 1991.

The petitioners ask the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General to continue to review all legislation that deals with public safety and to negotiate, where necessary, with the provincial authorities to ensure that the laws are amended to reflect the concerns expressed by the petitioners on public safety.

ILLEGAL DRUGS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure of presenting to the House a petition collected by the Finch—Weston Multicultural Seniors Committee urging the government to amend the drug laws in this country that permit the Government of Canada, when it seizes profits from drug seizures, to put them solely and totally in the federal revenues of the federal government rather than trying to share those proceeds with local police authorities, local organizations and municipalities so that those groups which are on the front lines of battling drugs in our society may in fact have the equipment and the financial wherewithal to try to combat those forces in a successful way.

I present that petition and hopefully the Solicitor General will amend the Narcotics Control Act to do just that.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I have the duty and the honour today to present a petition in memory of Ryan Garrioch. These are petitioners from the province of Alberta and the province of British Columbia who petition this Parliament to revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lowered maximum age of 13 years.

IRAQ

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present two petitions. The first one has been signed by some 314 persons from the cities of Castlegar, Nelson and Trail and some 13 other communities throughout my constituency of Kootenay West—Revelstoke.

The petitioners state as Canadians, we have a deep concern for the suffering of Iraqi children. The United Nations and NGO reports tell of a million children at risk from malnutrition and diseases for which there is no medicine.

• (1520)

Therefore, your petitioners request that Parliament instruct the government to take an initiative at the UN to have the sanctions imposed on Iraq modified sufficiently to both allow the necessary amounts of food and medicine to reach these children in an unrestricted fashion and also allow for the reconstruction of those elements of Iraq's infrastructure crucial to meeting the human needs of that country's suffering civilian population.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, the second petition, under the provisions of Standing Order 36, is signed by a number of signatories from 12 communities throughout my constituency. The undersigned residents of Canada draw to the attention of the House that there has been a promise from the government to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for three years and that the recent cumulative increases to UI premiums are unfair and insensitive to small businesses during hard economic times. Further, job losses due to business closures would further impair the chances for a full economic recovery in Canada. Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to freeze unemployment insurance premium rates for one year.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and duty under Standing Order 36 to present a petition to the House today from a number of residents of Calgary in memory of Ryan Garrioch and these petitioners request that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lower minimum age of 13 years.

AIRPORT NOISE

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Madam Speaker, I also present a second petition on a different issue. This is from hundreds of my constituents who ask that the Minister of Transport change the flight direction from runway 28 back to its original line of flight to prevent noise in their area.

I presented a petition previously on the other side of this issue. I would simply ask the Minister of Transport to try to develop a sensitive solution that protects all of my constituents from airport noise.

HOUSING

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, as you see, my colleagues here are all concerned about the co–operative housing program cut.

On December 17, 1991 the government stated in a news release an increase in the budget pf $6.1 million for 1992. However, on February 25, 1992 the co–operative housing program was cancelled altogether by the government. The co–operative housing program was highly successful in creating healthy, mixed income communities.

I join with my constituents in calling on Parliament to urge the government to immediately reinstate the federal co–operative housing program and to commit the $6.1 million that it already committed previously and cancelled to the program which had been planned for 1992 to permit approximately 2,000 co-operative housing units to be sponsored in 1992.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Would the hon. member agree with me that was very close to a speech and not presenting a petition?

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Madam Speaker, I have three petitions today and I will be very brief with them.

The first one I would like to present on behalf of my colleague, the hon. member for Yellowhead. It has been signed by 150 residents of Drayton Valley and they are supporting a binding referendum on the Constitution.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): The second petition I would like to present is from people associated with the Kids First Organization. They call upon the government to amend the Income Tax Act such that child related benefits and deductions for child care are fair and equitable to all family structures based on financial need and irrespective of child care choice.

POSTAL FRANCHISES

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): The third petition I would like to present is a petition from well over 1,000 of my constituents. This petition calls upon Parliament to influence the government to award a postal franchise to the Heritage I.D.A. in Edmonton, Alberta.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): It is my pleasure to present a petition requesting that Parliament revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lower minimum age of 13 years.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present today. The first is one calling upon the Government of Canada to hold a national referendum in order to determine the wishes of the people of Canada on the issue of the amendment to the Constitution of Canada.

HOUSING

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): This petition, supported by my colleague from Ottawa Centre, deals with the cancellation of the federal co-op housing program and asks the government to reinstate funding for this important, low-cost housing program.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I have the privilege of presenting a petition from residents of Calgary, De Winton, Claresholm and Okotoks, Alberta calling upon Parliament to revise the laws of Canada to replace the Young Offenders Act with an updated juvenile delinquents act with a lower maximum age of 13 years.

* * *

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

EMPLOYMENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received an application pursuant to Standing Order 52 and I will recognize the hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 52 I wish to give notice of my intention to move the adjournment of the House for an emergency debate on the crisis in the fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador. Fishermen and plant workers on the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland, in particular, and along the northeast coast and in other regions have been without income now since May 15 and have no prospect of any income because of a combination of reasons; no fish, various fisheries have been closed, ice conditions and a pending moratorium.

I ask Madam Speaker to give consideration to this petition for an emergency debate, that it be held as soon as possible and practically. I will conclude very quickly but I would remind the House that more than 60 members over the last two days of Parliament from this side of the House, in two opposition parties, from almost every province of Canada, including independent members—and this is unprecedented in my 13 years here—are supporting this petition for an emergency debate because they recognize that it would be improper for Parliament to close for the summer, close until September, without giving a proper opportunity for a debate on this crisis situation and without giving an opportunity for ministers opposite and for the government opposite to present their program on how they intend to deal with this crisis.

With that in mind, I ask the Chair to consider this petition and to grant an emergency debate to give an opportunity for the voice of fishermen and plant workers to be heard as soon as possible.

[Translation]

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not think anyone in this House is ignorant of the problems now facing people in Labrador, Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces in general, and I am referring to people who work in the fisheries.

The Chair has carefully examined the requests that were filed this week, even and especially today, for an emergency debate on the subject. I do not think it would be reasonable to allow this type of debate today. In fact the Speaker with whom I discussed the matter earlier tends to agree, it is unlikely we could get the answers people are entitled to expect, and I think it would be wiser to wait, but only for a short while, before having this kind of debate.

• (1530)

I do not want the hon. member to see this as a lack of interest on the part of the Chair or failure to recognize the seriousness of the situation, but as an attempt to ensure that the purpose of the debate is served as well as possible. We do not think having this debate today would provide that kind of assurance.

Consequently, I cannot give permission for this debate today. However, I can assure the hon. member, and all members who asked the Chair to consider their requests, that the matter will be considered again during the weekend, and we will be able to resume our discussion when the House meets again.

[English]

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk)

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 310 and 350.

[Text]

Question No. 310—Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East):

Will the government direct the management of Canada Post (a) to respond favourably to any requests received from any of its employee union locals to mark the April 28 Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace where such requests are for (i) the lowering to half-staff of flags flown on or at corporation facilities (ii) the observation of one minute of silence at corporation facilities in each of the major shifts of workers present during the 24 hours of the day (iii) permission for employees so wishing to wear black arm bands (b) to consider seriously any other requests for the marking of the day received from any of its employee union locals?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons: (a) During a 1991 meeting between the parties at the national level on the April 28 Day of Mourning for Persons Killed or Injured in the Workplace, the corporation expressed a willingness and remains willing to meet with the CUPW to endeavour to find a mutually acceptable solution to the union's request. No request was received from the union at the national level for consultation on this issue this year.

(i) The corporation is of the opinion that the lowering of the flag is not appropriate for this occasion.

(ii) The corporation workforce is located in facilities all over Canada with operations being conducted on an around the clock basis. Such request would result in a disruption of mail processing and counter activities.

(iii) The corporation has no objection to employees wearing black arm bands in any non-public areas; but employees who have any person to person contact with customers or the public are not allowed to wear these arm bands.

(b) The corporation continues to improve accident prevention Programs which strive to educate and encourage employees to work safely and ensures that employees are provided with and utilize the necessary protective clothing and equipment. The corporation and the union also meet on a regular basis to discuss health and safety matters. It is through these efforts, throughout the year, that the corporation expects to reduce the frequency of accidents on the job.

Question No. 350—Mr. Fee:

For the period May 1, 1992 to June 12 1992, what has been the (a) total cost (b) cost per question (c) cost for this question, to the government for answering Order Paper Questions?

Mr. James Stewart Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): (a) & (b) Questions answered during the period of May 1, 1992 to June 12, 1992:

Question No.	Approximate Cost	Question No.	Approximate Cost
164	$5,930	277	$ 55
228	6,605	278	79
235	75	279	111
236	195	280	95
240	49	281	86
241	541	287	447
244	18	288	55
249	4,576	290	84
252	300	292	10
255	179	293	35
258	154	299	327
262	344	301	164
263	452	302	43
266	63	305	88
268	43	306	64
269	310	308	620
272	36	309	36
275	275	316	30
276	144	321	59

Total Cost: $22,777

c) $30

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Routine Proceedings

HOUSE OF COMMONS

BILL C–86

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent for the following motion:

That, in relation to Bill C–86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, when the order for second reading is called, the Speaker shall recognize one speaker per party and immediately following, the debate shall be deemed adjourned and the Speaker shall adjourn the House forthwith until the next sitting day.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order on this particular motion. Being a member from Toronto, as you know, this bill is very important to my community as it is to other members from Toronto. I need to get an assurance from the House that we are going to have sufficient time on Monday to examine this bill in detail.

Mr. Edwards: Madam Speaker, I believe that Monday will be devoted entirely to debate on this bill.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the motion as presented by the hon. parliamentary secretary. Does he have the permission of the House to present the motion?

Mr. Heap: Madam Speaker, in the name of the NDP caucus I present our agreement with this motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

* * *

[Translation]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S–12, an act to amalgamate The Montreal Board of Trade and The Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 135(2), the bill is deemed to have been read a first time and ordered for second reading at the next sitting of the House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C–86, an act to amend the Immigration act and other Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope.

He said: Mr. Speaker, hon. members, a few days ago I proposed to Parliament a number of important changes to the Immigration Act.

These changes will give us the means to more effectively manage the immigration program, to better respond to the changes which have taken place since the current act was passed in 1976 and to position ourselves to meet the immigration challenges of the future.

[English]

However, before I address the substance of the proposed amendments, it is important to establish the context for change. Why now? What perspectives do we bring to bear when proposing these changes?

We begin this debate at a time when two issues of great importance dominate the national agenda and preoccupy the minds of Canadians. At kitchen tables, in coffee shops, in cafeterias, on buses, and in church halls across this nation, Canadians are talking about the unity of their country and about Canadian economic prosperity. These are bedrock issues for this country.

Canadians instinctively understand that you cannot have one without the other and yet incredibly we find ourselves debating that very possibility. I raise these issues because they are both inextricably linked to the issue of immigration.

This is a point I made in my presentation to the standing committee last month. It is a point that is well worth restating here on the floor of the House of Commons as we begin this debate on these important amendments to our immigration program.

In many ways, Canada's immigration policy is symbolic of the country itself and of the challenges that we face as a people. When Canadians are asked to describe themselves, to identify what makes them different from others, we often speak with pride about our compassionate and tolerant nature as a people.

We describe Canada as a welcoming nation. Whether we know it or not, we are talking about the values which underpin our immigration and refugee policies. Those policies are part of the face we present to the world. They are a calling card and observers judge us on the basis of what those policies tell them about Canada. The message is one of generosity and openness.

At the same time, these policies that we have shaped as a nation have in turn shaped us. They have helped us understand who we are as a people. They provide us with a mirror to look into our soul as a nation and while the reflection is far from perfect, it does represent a face that the world has come to trust. It is an honest face, one which conveys a compassion and pragmatism of an immigration policy that has served this nation well.

[Translation]

Like immigration, our unity debate is about who we are and who we trust. It is my belief, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians will demonstrate the same compassion and tolerance toward each other as we have had the wisdom to adopt in welcoming newcomers to our shores. It may be our newest citizens who are best able to see Canada as it is.

Nineteen years ago, writer Neil Bissoondath moved here from Trinidad. He was 15 at the time. Today he writes: "Canada is a grand country, and it is that grandeur that I wish to leave to my daughter; its beauties, its immensities, its incomparable diversities. Those diversities include the duality that is her heritage from both her parents, for in her are blended white and brown, francophone and anglophone, native born and immigrant. To accept the division of this country is to betray decades of vision and effort. It is to betray generations, those of yesterday and those of tomorrow."

• (1540)

[English]

In a similar way immigration policy addresses public concerns about prosperity, a central objective of that policy. The objective over our 125 years as a nation is to attract to Canada people with the skills and talents we require to build a prosperous country.

At different times in our history the economic rationale for immigration has been more obvious than at other times. For example, at the turn of the century we deliberately recruited immigrants to open the west and less than 50 years later a new wave of builders arrived to participate in the post–war industrialization of Canada.

The bottom line today is the same as the bottom line of more than a century ago. Immigration is essential to prosperity. Immigration contributes to both the soul and sinew of Canada. Responding to the social and humanitarian concerns of Canadians and meeting our economic needs are central objectives of the policy. Managing the balance between these two faces of immigration is the key to a successful program that best serves the interest of all Canadians. We cannot have one without the other. The program would be incomplete.

The same logic holds true for the great debate that engages us today as a nation. Unity and prosperity are inseparable. I am confident that Canadians understand this logic. I am equally certain that immigration will continue to contribute to our unity and prosperity.

Like Canada itself, our country's immigration and refugee programs face important challenges as we move through the nineties. The world is changing around us and that change is placing new and mounting pressure on our programs.

Just a few weeks The Toronto Star ran two news stories side by side. They were prominently displayed. The stories touched a nerve which many of us will recognize. The first story described in typically dramatic fashion the recent United Nations report on global population. In big, dark letters the headline read: "Immigrant tide to grow higher. Throngs to flee poverty and turmoil of Third World".

The second story, the headline not quite so big, said: "Toronto woman faces 20 charges in immigrant scam". In 40 column inches of space The Toronto Star managed to capture the scope of our immigration challenge and the nature of some of the obstacles we face in meeting that challenge.

Those headlines were also typically provocative. They transmitted a sense of anxiety about the value and effectiveness of immigration. They represent yet another dimension of the challenge we face in sustaining the public's confidence in these essential programs for Canada.

[Translation]

This Chamber of elected representatives, this government whose role as steward is dependent upon the will of the Canadian public, has an obligation, indeed a fundamental responsibility to preserve and improve a vital national program in the face of increasing international and domestic pressures.

What are these pressures? How do they exhibit themselves?

We do not have to look too far to see evidence of change. The 1980s mark the start of a period of great migration.

Today, some experts suggest that as many as 80 million people are on the move throughout the world. Prompted by political and economic instability, environmental disasters or the simple desire for a new beginning, individuals and families have uprooted themselves in search of new homes.

Other factors contribute to that movement. Modern communication technologies spread images of the affluent west around the world. The growth of an international labour market has opened up opportunities for those with the special skills sought after by developed and developing countries. The scale of that movement can be startling to consider. For example, in 1983, approximately 95,000 people sought refugee status in all OECD countries. By last year, that number was more than 700,000 individuals, an increase of approximately 800 per cent. In 1983, Canada received 1,500 claims for refugee status; last year, it received 30,000.

In Europe this year, the Germans alone expect some 400,000 people to claim refugee status in their country. This large scale, unpredictable movement of people is a phenomenon to which industrialized nations like Canada have been required to respond. It is a phenomenon that is not going to disappear soon. A recent United Nations report on global population predicts an explosive rate of growth in the next decade. Most of those births will take place in the Third World, the primary source of today's immigration.

[English]

At home Canadians are concerned about the growing costs of immigration and about backlogs in applications which result in extended delays and increased frustrations. They are concerned about the fairness of the program for applicants tangled in backlogs. They want to be assured that immigration is being managed to bring the greatest possible social and economic benefits to Canada. They want to know that the laws which govern the program will be enforced, that we will deal firmly with those who have used our generosity.

All this adds up to increasing pressures on a legislative framework built to manage the demands of a simpler time.

The world is awash in a sea of change, but Canada has not been standing still waiting for events to overtake us. Since 1984 this government has pursued an approach of steady growth and adjustment of our immigration program. That approach is based on the recognition of immigration as an integral element of Canada's economic and social agenda.

The annual level of immigration has increased gradually over the last eight years. This year Canada will welcome 250,000 immigrants, almost three times the number we welcomed in 1983.

During those eight years we have either reinforced existing programs or established new programs to help immigrants adjust to life in Canada. From language training to community relations programs which breach barriers between newcomers and native born Canadians, work goes on to introduce new immigrants to their rights and responsibilities as new citizens.

In 1988 Parliament passed Bill C-55 creating the Immigration and Refugee Board. This was a response to the unprecedented level of refugee applications which had choked and overwhelmed the previous management structure.

Today the IRB and my department have virtually eliminated the enormous case backlog which built up in the late 1980s. The board is now processing and making decisions on all claims it receives annually.

• (1550)

We introduced the five-year plan for immigration in December of 1990. The plan was the result of more than a year of extensive consultations with governments and interested parties across Canada. We reached broad consensus on the numbers and categories of immigrants Canada requires in the coming years. Our objective was also to introduce a level of certainty to our collective planning to improve our management of immigrant and refugee programs.

Today we are taking another step in meeting the challenges posed for Canada by a changing world environment. The amendments we have proposed will give us the tools to adapt our immigration program to the realities of the 1990s and ensure that we have a program that is fair, balanced and effective.

The changes we have proposed involve improvements in three general areas. They will give us the means to more effectively select and process those who come to Canada by improving the way in which we manage the categories and numbers of immigrants and by improving the service we provide to them. They will give us the means to better protect Canadian society by tightening up enforcement and control measures to defend the integrity of the system and protect Canadians from those who abuse our generosity and break our laws. We will further streamline the refugee determination system in order to improve the effectiveness of an excellent program with fair decisions rendered quickly.

What about effective selection? To be effective Canada's immigration policy must balance our compassionate character as a people with our pragmatic requirements as a nation. This balance is reflected in the three fundamental policy objectives which underpin the program. We have a social obligation to reunite families, a humanitarian responsibility to protect refugees and an economic requirement to attract newcomers whose particular skills and talents contribute to our prosperity. The proposed changes will help ensure that we maintain a constructive balance between these three policy pillars.

At the present time we have the authority, Mr. Speaker, to set over-all levels of immigration; however, we lack the means to actually deliver on those targets.

For example, if 50,000 people, 50,000 eligible individuals, apply in a particular category during a specific year, the government must consider each of those obligations even though the annual plan may only have room for 25,000 applications. That is the law, and that is why we have backlogs.

The proposed changes will give us the means to more effectively control those numbers. It will introduce greater certainty to our planning. Greater certainty means fewer delays, it means more predictable processing times and greater fairness for applicants.

Specifically, I have proposed the introduction of three management streams for selecting immigrants. Stream one will have no fixed limit on applications for its various categories. The stream could include, for example, spouses and dependent children, convention refugees and immigrant investors. Applicants will be processed according to specific time standards. For example, our objective will be to process routine immediate-family applicants within six months regardless of whether the application is made in Germany or in India. Stream two will operate on a first-come-first served basis. There will be a ceiling for applications from each group within this stream. Parents and grandparents, refugees processed abroad, and immigrants with arranged employment could be included in stream two.

For some groups, once the ceiling was reached no more applications would be processed. Others would be able to reapply in the next planning period. These changes would stop backlogs from accumulating.

In the third stream, we select for excellence, accepting only the most highly qualified individuals. This stream could be composed largely of individuals from the independent categories or entrepreneurs, or people qualified in designated occupations.

Again, there will be a ceiling for each group within the stream. Only the allotted number of applications will be accepted. This approach to managing the program will give us the means to eliminate the build-up of backlogs which drain our resources and reduce our flexibility to help others.

[Translation]

The House should also be aware, Mr. Speaker, that these proposals do not change the decision-making authority for the selection of immigrants contained in federal-provincial agreements. In particular, the changes will be consistent with the Canada-Quebec Accord on Immigration. The hon. member for Joliette was concerned about that at some point. These provisions will be fully respected.

We are also proposing a measure to further extend the economic and social benefits of immigration to the regions. Not every area of the country currently benefits from the program. Some regions find it difficult to attract newcomers.

In 1991, 3.5 per cent of immigrants went to communities of less than 100,000 people and only 1 per cent went to communities of less than 50,000 people. However, 68 per cent of immigrants went to cities of over 500,000 people.

To encourage a better distribution of this pool of talent, some skilled immigrants will be offered a contract-like arrangement. As a condition of their acceptance to Canada, they will be required to settle in a community where the number of people having their specific skills would otherwise be insufficient to meet the needs of that region. They would be required to live in the community for a limited period of time.

Individuals who choose to participate in this program will do so fully aware that their application has earned additional consideration as a consequence of their willingness to settle in a designated location. There is nothing coercive about this measure.

Our hope is that individuals will want to stay in a particular community once they are settled. But ultimately, that hope is dependent on a number of things, including the ability of the community to create the type of welcoming environment which will cause individuals to set down roots.

[English]

Canada has been ranked as the best place in the world in which to live. Surely those who prepared that assessment must have considered the generosity and openness of our immigration and refugee programs when they made their decisions. On a per capita basis, we accept more immigrants than any other nation in the world. Today about one in six Canadians was born somewhere other than in Canada. This year we will welcome as many as 250,000 newcomers, or almost three times as many people as we welcomed a decade ago.

Even with the highest immigration rate in the world, we cannot meet the demand of all those who want in. Because there is a finite number of people we can accommodate each year, an increasing number of people are seeking ways to bypass the regular immigration process.

Canada is not alone in facing this problem; the Germans, the Australians, the British, the French, the Americans, indeed most developed nations, are faced with the same problem. It is an issue that cannot be ignored because it ultimately threatens the very viability of established immigration programs.

• (1600)

The federal government has an obligation to protect the integrity of these vital programs. We will respond to that need by taking a number of steps to protect these programs, at home, at our borders and overseas.

Overseas we will provide further training and technological assistance to our own staff and to airline personnel to help them identify fraudulent documents and intercept illegal migrants before they reach Canada. We will also extend the rule governing criminal inadmissibility. This will allow us to keep out individuals who may have a criminal record but who are known members of criminal or terrorist organizations.

At our borders, we will give immigration staff the authority to search individuals and to seize documents and vehicles used in smuggling people into Canada.

We will also expand an authority the current law already gives the department and that is the department's authority to use fingerprints and photographs to establish the identity of people seeking admission to Canada. These procedures will be extended to cover all individuals who make refugee claims.

Canadians want their country to provide protection to those fleeing persecution. They insist that we leave a light in the window for those hounded from their homelands. But Canadians have a right to know whom we are welcoming to this country on their behalf. They have a right to know who is entering their home.

When the generosity of Canada's immigration program is abused, the public's confidence in the value and effectiveness of immigration is shaken. Abuse of the program upsets everyone, newcomers and native born alike.

The problem of multiple refugee claims is a good example of an issue where the actions of a few people erode the confidence and trust of the broader community.

Yet we cannot effectively control this type of limited but costly abuse, largely because we lack the tools to monitor the identity of people. The fragility of the system became patently obvious when a single individual is capable of successfully making 17 refugee claims.

Expanding the use of photographs and fingerprints, with the appropriate safeguards for the individual in place, will help us eliminate a problem which hurts everyone.

At home, we are proposing a number of new measures, including legislative amendments to prevent criminals from using our refugee system to avoid justice in their own countries.

By defending the integrity of these programs, we achieve two things. First, we preserve the social and economic benefits of these vital national programs. Second, we maintain public confidence in our immigration and refugee systems.

Canadians have earned a special position in the world for our work on behalf of refugees. In fact these efforts earned the people of Canada the Nansen Medal in 1986. It was the first time the United Nations has recognized an entire nation for its work.

The plain fact is that Canada has the highest refugee acceptance rate of any nation in the world and it has occupied that position for some time now.

But despite our international reputation, we now have a refugee determination system that is working at maximum capacity and showing signs of strain. While we are able to process as many claims as we receive at some stages in the process, other components of the system, particularly the Federal Court, are experiencing large backlogs.

In addition, it is quite clear that we could not meet a sustained surge in the number of claims. The time required to process claims is still too long and that is not fair to claimants.

The speed with which we can remove rejected claimants remains slow and that erodes the effectiveness of the system. The consequence of this delay is the need for costly support programs, and that is certainly not fair to taxpayers.

It is our intention to further improve the decision-making process at the Immigration and Refugee Board. We will eliminate the first level hearing. This step will accelerate the processing times, cut administrative costs, and allow the IRB to direct its resources where they are needed most.

This is a change recommended by the Auditor General and the Law Reform Commission, and supported by the chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Genuine refugees should be able to get on with their lives as quickly as possible. The sooner decisions are made on the status of a claimant, the sooner a refugee can get off social support programs and become a fully contributing member of the community.

New procedures will allow convention refugees to be landed more quickly and take up employment sooner. The proposals will permit the spouse and dependent children of the applicant to be processed at the same time as the claimant. We expect to cut the waiting period for landed status after the IRB decision to six months.

It is worth noting that the office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees has lent its support to the changes we are proposing.

In a recent press release the UNHCR said:

> We expect that the new legislation will continue to work in the best interest of all those asylum seekers needing protection—UNHCR supports the fine-tuning of the legislation, insofar as it concerns asylum seekers in Canada.

It is an important endorsement because it lends perspective to the debate we are having and to the course of action we are following. This comment is particularly helpful because it may allow us to have a more reasoned debate devoid of the predictable hysteria of some of the government's more vehement critics.

We have also proposed a series of additional measures to help achieve better control over access to the refugee determination system. For example, in straightforward cases senior immigration officers will be given the authority to decide whether an individual is eligible to claim refugee status.

The dramatic increase in the number of people now claiming refugee status throughout the world has made it clear that ultimately the management and resolution of refugee issues require international co-operation.

European countries have perhaps been the first to understand this, and as a result they have recently signed agreements to share responsibility for examining refugee claims. The purpose of these agreements is to eliminate asylum shopping while ensuring that refugee claimants receive a full hearing in one of the states that is a signatory to these conventions.

Last year about one-third of all refugee claimants came to Canada through the United States and a further one-tenth through Europe.

It is important that the government has the legislative authority to enter into agreements with other refugee receiving countries similar to those that have been reached in Europe. This will help ensure that we can provide better and faster protection for those who choose Canada as their first country of refuge.

Without the ability to enter into these agreements Canada may be receiving large numbers of claimants from countries that, while party to the Geneva Convention on the Status of Refugees, would prefer to see another state provide the protection offered by the convention.

• (1610)

We are currently negotiating such an agreement with the United States in order to better share the responsibilities for the determination of refugee status between our two countries. We are also talking to the Europeans.

A fair and effective determination system must include the authority to remove people whose claims have been rejected. International authorities, including the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees, clearly recognize that fact. As a result we will also be taking additional steps to improve the timeliness and effectiveness of our removal procedures.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I am sure you are aware, as are other members of the House, of the efforts my department has undertaken to improve our service to the public through our offices in Canada and overseas.

Those efforts will continue. Centralized information centres will provide people with quicker access to information on the status of applications. The department will increase the use of mail-in and drop-off services and we will introduce more user-friendly application and information forms.

We have also proposed a number of changes to make more flexible the way in which we handle documents for visitors, students and returning residents.

On a per capita basis, Canada receives more immigrants and accepts more refugees than any other country in the world. Our current Immigration Act dates back to 1976. It was not designed to handle the numbers of people now trying to enter Canada. The system is showing signs of strain. It is important that we act now to bring the system in line with the realities of the 1990s.

A failure to respond now will have significant consequences. Backlogs in applications will lead to longer processing delays and ever escalating costs. Illegal immigration will only continue to grow and our ability to control its impact on our programs will diminish. None of these results is fair to the prospective immigrant, the refugee and the Canadian taxpayer.

[English]

More important, our ability to respond to the needs of Canadians will be undermined if we do not act now. Without effective control over the number and categories of immigrants coming to Canada we cannot ensure that immigration continues to serve the best interests of Canada.

At the outset of this debate let us be very clear about whom these amendments are meant to serve. They are not meant to satisfy those who would have no room in their small world for the contribution of yet another generation of immigrants. They are not meant to satisfy those who deny their own immigrant roots or who fail to see the reality of a global community that grows closer together by the minute. Nor are they meant to satisfy those who feel Canadian resources are limitless, that there is no need for rules and that national borders are meaningless concepts.

These amendments to our Immigration Act will not satisfy those who want to slam the door and they will not satisfy those who want us to give away the store.

However, I am confident that the vast majority of Canadians will understand these amendments for what they are: pragmatic and sensible changes that will preserve the integrity of an immigration program that has contributed to our sense of identity and served as a source of prosperity for more than 125 years.

That is what these changes are about.

In closing, I would like to quote Neil Bissoondath one last time. He said:

> In the end I am as at home in Montreal as I am in Vancouver, in Toronto as in Quebec City, in English as in French. Nowhere have I felt myself a stranger. The immigrant who, 19 years ago, gratefully embraced Toronto has become the citizen who has gratefully embraced Canada. While I am abroad and miss home, it is this country—its air, its sounds, its smells—that I long for. It is here, everywhere, that I find the comforts of home.

All of us, no matter where we were born or where our parents and ancestors came from, can endorse such words, for they ring true. We have a great and wonderful country, the envy of the world, and let us get on with our work of keeping Canada unified, prosperous and generous.

As an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, and under the provision of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stage.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder, since we are only going to have one speaker from each party today, if I could get consent of the House to put a couple of short questions to the minister as we have him here in the House today and he may not be here for the debate on Monday.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Hon. members have heard the suggestion. Is there unanimous consent for the member to ask a question?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The minister just gave notice that an agreement could not be reached pursuant to Standing Order 78(3). I have spoken with the opposition House leader, the opposition Whip, and there was no consultation whatever in respect of Standing Order 78(3). No request was made for an agreement, I am so instructed. I am the assistant House leader on our side. No request has been made through me or with me for any time allocation arrangement in respect of Bill C–73. This notice in my view is improper.

While I recognize Your Honour may do nothing this afternoon, I expect that on Monday this point will be argued in the House.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, my understanding of the facts differs from that of my friend opposite. There have been consultations with the House leadership of the Official Opposition and with the House leadership of the New Democratic Party and avenues, therefore, under Standing Order 78(1) and (2) have been explored.

I referred briefly and clearly to that situation in a discussion that I had with my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands within the past hour.

Mr. Milliken: I agree that the hon. member indicated to me that it was the minister's intention to give the notice that he has given. That does not constitute consultation. That may be notice that the government is going to give notice.

Standing Order 78(3) is quite specific. He must state that an agreement could not be reached. A request must be made for an agreement. Some consultation must take place.

The House leader has told me that there was no consultation with him. The Whip has told me that he has not been consulted on this matter either. I have not been consulted on this matter. I do not know if some other member on this side was consulted.

• (1620)

I know it was not the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce who is the critic on this bill and I know it was not the deputy Leader of the Opposition. I would like to know who it was. If the hon. member thinks that consultation with various staff members of the members of this House is sufficient, the precedents in this House indicate it is not. The consultation must be with members. There has been no consultation and no request for an agreement with these members. If there has been, I would like to know with whom the consultation took place because there must be an attempt to reach an agreement with the members.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to understand what my hon. friend is saying. If he is offering agreement then we accept the agreement.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The Chair will take the question raised by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands under advisement and has duly noted what was said by members on all sides of the House. On Monday, the Chair will probably be in a position to rule whether the time allocation notice given by the Minister of Employment and Immigration was in order.

Pursuant to order adopted earlier, I will now allow a period for questions to be put to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

The hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I thank the House and specifically the minister for giving me this opportunity.

I listened to the minister carefully and being a member in downtown Toronto we must listen to him carefully because 90 per cent of our time as members of Parliament in downtown Toronto is taken up on matters related to immigration.

I have not had enough time to read thoroughly and analyse the immigration amendments in total, and therefore I do not want to get into the substance of the bill. Our critic, the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, will begin that debate for us.

Many of the things that the minister said today I have good feeling for. There is one thing that I did not hear him talk about and that is additional support staff, additional man–years in order to make sure these changes, these transitions and this streamlining, can really be done.

I do not want to stand up here in the Parliament of Canada and sound like I am complaining, but I can honestly tell the minister I have no problem with the spirit or the caring or the attitude of the officials in the Department of Employment and Immigration. However, quite frankly, I find that their workload is just crushing. It is crushing to the point at which it is inevitable that the quality of their work from time to time suffers. It is crushing to the point at which at times members of Parliament, who have constituents coming at them and begging them to respond, end up yelling in a minister's office and to your staff. It seems to me that we are trying to do a lot of good things and yet we do not have sufficient man-years, whether they be in the embassies abroad or in our houses or in your department here.

My question to the minister is, in this amendment package has he arranged with the President of the Treasury Board or whoever is responsible for man-years in this place to give the necessary resources so that those positive parts of this process that we are obviously going to adapt in the next little while can be implemented in a way that everybody wins?

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, I think this is a fair question. I guess I could have asked my colleague, the Minister of Finance, or the Treasury Board to borrow more money on behalf of Canadians or to tax the people more to pay for increased resources.

What we have done here is look at the over-all situation and made conclusions on things such as our staff's having the tools it needs to competently manage immigration and our doing away with make-work provisions of the act. For example, if a student on a student visa in Canada changes his course of study he must go and reapply for another visa to keep a bureaucrat busy. Nothing is being accomplished.

We have done away with a lot of make-work provisions. We are giving ourselves tools that will result in a massive saving allowing us to reallocate these resources within the immigration envelope to better serve the public, to better serve our members of Parliament, and to better serve those people around the world who want to immigrate to Canada.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a brief question of the minister. It concerns the consultation that will be held on June 29 and 30 in Niagara-on-the-Lake and will be hosted by senior Canadian immigration officials. They have invited their counterparts from western Europe, the United States, New Zealand and Australia to attend.

The purpose will principally be to further consider the regulations relating to the movement of refugees into these countries, largely from countries of non-white populations, largely from countries that used to be parts of the empires of western Europe or North America.

This consultation is one in a series that has gone on for several years now.

I have two questions of the minister. First, why is the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees not represented in these meetings as a full participant? I understand that an observer from the UNHCR will be there but not as a full participant, yet this is part of the very essence of the work of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees.

Second, is the reason for the time allocation, which the minister has moved, that it is a goal of the government to have the provisions of this act—especially relating to the port of entry, fingerprinting, the safe third country provision, increased fines for people who bring undocumented persons to the country and so on—in place so it can present it as a model to the other countries—western Europe, the United States, New Zealand and Australia? Or is it because it wishes to show those countries that we are just as tough as they are?

Is that the reason for the deadline? Second, what is the reason for excluding full participation by the United Nations?

Mr. Valcourt: The reason we are moving for time allocation is because this will ensure that the bill will get to a standing committee because there is a window of opportunity in late summer. This bill is not the result of any green paper or white paper. We have consulted, but we want the Canadian public, NGOs, lawyers and stakeholders to have the chance to appear before this committee and give their input to it.

That is why I insist that we complete second reading and send it to committee before we adjourn. That is the reason for the time allocation. It is important that by January 1, 1993 the real refugee person who is admitted to Canada and recognized as such benefits from the provisions in this act.

The hon. member has made many representations to me concerning the delay before refugees in Canada can reunite with their families. We got him to wait a year or two. Before he was landed, he could not. We are changing that.

• (1630)

There are many beneficial provisions here that will result in a more humane, more compassionate immigration program in Canada. The quicker we can get the legislative committee to do its job, I think Canada will be better for it.

As for his first question, the issue of the informal consultations at Niagara–on–the–Lake to be held at the end of the month, I can only tell the hon. member that this undertaking is one of national governments that have similar problems. These are informal consultations.

Officials of all these governments will be trying to learn from one another and see whether or not the mass movement of asylum seekers in the world is one that could benefit from a concerted approach. That is the reason why the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees is there as an observer, to contribute however he can to this informal process.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, this year in Canada we are celebrating 125 years of Confederation. In those 125 years there has never been a government so abusive and disrespectful to Parliament than this present Conservative government.

We have before us today another example in Bill C–86 on immigration, a very long, very complex bill of 113 pages, 128 sections, tabled in Parliament and revealed to us for the first time on Tuesday of this week and then put to this House today for debate three days later.

We in the opposition have only had this bill, this very long, complex bill, for three days. The minister, with his officials who drafted the bill, who wrote the bill, who developed the bill, have had it for months, and are very familiar with it. We are today being asked to debate the principle of the bill, to debate the many complex issues in the bill, without having had the opportunity, because it is so complex, of analysing it properly.

I spent the entire afternoon yesterday and into the evening, from 3 p.m. until about 8 p.m., calling practitioners throughout the country, experts that deal in immigration, to get their views on the bill. They stated they have not had the opportunity to review the bill.

The minister stands before us today and much of what he said we could all agree with, very soothing words. A lot of the printed material sounded very good, but I have come not to trust the written material that is put out by this government.

There are some good parts to this bill and there are some parts that are obviously not good, but there are many other parts that can be interpreted either way and have to be examined and analysed, that will have to be examined in relationship to the present act and the regulations and practice. The impact on those sections could fall either way.

It is not enough for us to accept the words of the minister or the publicity that is put out by his department. The editorials are on both sides up to this point. Some have praised the minister's bill, some have condemned it. In either case, I do not know how they can come to such a conclusion unless they have more expertise with their newspapers than the practitioners and the immigration lawyers have.

I am amazed that the United Nations High Commission on Refugees should give a pat of approval to the bill. I wonder whether it simply read the minister's press releases or whether it examined the bill in great detail.

I talk about the fact that the government comes to us with such a complex bill within three days of presenting it, asking us to give informed comment on the bill. Worse still, the minister, having just initiated the debate a few minutes ago and without even hearing from the opposition, moves for closure on the debate by Monday evening. He does not even wait for the debate to get going but moves for closure on the debate before any of us in the opposition have said a word.

I said that this is probably the worst government in 125 years of Confederation with respect to Parliament, and I mean it. This government has introduced closure in the eight years it has been in power more than any other government since Confederation. It has used closure in the last eight years more than closure was ever used from 1867 up until 1984.

The government has restricted the sittings of the House, has virtually ruined the committee system so that members of Parliament can no longer properly scrutinize the legislation that comes before Parliament.

The people of Canada expect Parliament to scrutinize clearly and thoroughly the government's legislation, but when you have the kind of farce that is being presented to us today, that cannot be done. There is no way that members of Parliament, even those who have become experts in the field of immigration, can deal with a bill like this within three days of its being presented to the House, without consultation and without analysis.

The government's soothing words with respect to reform of Parliament and respect of Parliament are just what they seem, they are part of the politics of rhetoric. It says one thing and does another thing.

Canadians deserve better from Parliament, especially when we are dealing with important matters. It is not only important that members of Parliament be given an opportunity to fully examine such bills, but the many NGOs in the field should be given an opportunity so they can consult with us and give us their opinions; the churches, the ethnocultural communities which are very concerned about immigration, and the immigration bar.

This bill impacts quite heavily on the transportation carriers. They should have an opportunity to examine the bill in detail too and to give us their views.

The bill makes changes with respect to the impact on health and social services. We would like to hear from the health and social services to see whether they confirm that immigrants are impacting in a very severe way on their health and social services. The bill talks a lot about terrorism and criminality. We should be able to hear from the police, from CSIS, and the RCMP.

It is very difficult at this stage to evaluate many parts of this bill. I can say to the minister that some parts, some clauses, are good, are positive. They are things that were requested and I give him credit for that. Others, in my opinion, immediately seem quite bad. Perhaps he has a good explanation for them, perhaps he can convince us they are good but they appear at first glance to be quite bad.

There are a large number of sections where we have not yet had a chance to evaluate their effectiveness, their impact, and consequently we condemn the fact this bill is being debated today and the government is trying to close the debate by Monday evening.

Immigration has played and will continue to play a very important role in Canada. Nearly all of us, except the aboriginal people, come from immigrant families; even the British and the French come from immigrant families. Immigration has built Canada into a great nation as it has built other countries, such as the United States. Like Canada, the United States is the great country it is today because of the immigrants that went to that country.

• (1640)

Every great new wave of immigration has brought new riches to Canada, riches economically and culturally. Consequently, we must have an immigration policy that is fair, humane and generous.

The Immigration Act that is presently the law of this land, which was passed in 1976 by a Liberal government and proclaimed in 1978, sets out the goals for immigration policy in Canada. Those goals remain in force today. They have not been changed and there is no attempt to change those goals by the bill that the minister has tabled.

I think I should put on the record some of those goals, not all of them, to remind the House and Canada of the purposes of our immigration law.

To begin with, it starts by saying that the purpose of our immigration law is to promote the domestic and international interests of Canada so our immigration policy or immigration laws are to promote the interests of Canada.

It goes on to say the bill will enrich and strengthen the cultural and social fabric of Canada taking into account its bilingual character.

Further, the purpose of our immigration policy is to facilitate the reunion in Canada of Canadian citizens with their relatives from abroad so as to promote family reunification.

It goes on to say that to ensure that any person who seeks admission to Canada is not discriminated against in a manner which is inconsistent with our charter of rights. Immigration policy is to be non-discriminatory based on objective criteria which are aimed at the ability of the immigrant to adapt in Canada and to settle in Canada.

It goes on to say in those goals of our immigration policy that Canada has a legal obligation with respect to refugees and to uphold its humanitarian tradition, a great tradition which we have had. The minister mentioned that we won the Nansen Medal a few years ago for our record with respect to refugees.

It is also the purpose of our immigration policy to foster a strong and vibrant economy in Canada to maintain and protect the health, safety and good order of Canadian society and to promote international order and justice by denying the use of Canadian territory to criminals, terrorists, and so on.

Those are the goals of our immigration policy as set out in the law. Those have not been changed and it will be our job, our task, in this debate to evaluate the amendments that the government has put before us to see whether they correspond with those goals.

The bill before us contains very significant changes. In fact I would say that this bill sets out a series of amendments which are the most extensive we have had since the present act was enacted in 1976. We had Bill C–55 a few years ago, but these amendments are the most extensive amendments to the law up until this time. I would like to go through some of those more significant amendments in the bill.

In the bill the government proposes ending the so–called first stage hearings for refugees, the credible basis hearing, and we think that is a good thing. We congratulate the government for doing that.

Those first stage hearings were for the most part in recent months a waste of time and resources. The large majority of cases were being accepted. Consequently, those first stage hearings did not serve any great purpose.

On the other hand, the government in terminating the first stage hearings, the credibility stage hearings, has now given some of the authority that tribunal had at the first stage hearing to officers at ports of entry. It appears it has given them that authority without providing for due process of law.

What we have now is power being given to immigration officers and senior immigration officers at the border to refuse refugees who present themselves and make a claim for refugee status.

In some of the cases the matter will be sent on to an inquiry under an adjudicator. In other cases, the individual will be sent back from the country. In some cases, the refugee will be sent back to a so–called safe third country, and I will discuss that in a minute, in other cases sent back to the United States, and in other cases simply turned down without any hearing by an inquiry or an adjudicator.

With respect to the safe third country, we in this party have not accepted that concept. We did not accept it when it was proposed with respect to Bill C–55 a few years ago and we continued to reject it. We believe the International Convention on Refugees, which we have signed, and the protocol give those who claim refugee status universal access to a fair hearing to determine whether or not they are really a refugee.

We know that the United States which is a democratic country for many purposes has not been as democratic with respect to its refugee policy. As a matter of fact, for the last number of years the refugee policy of the United States has been tied to its foreign policy and has been politically motivated.

If the refugee came from a country which was more or less a right wing dictatorship and was being opposed by left wing freedom fighters, the United States was not favourable to those individuals fleeing those right wing dictatorships. I have in mind in particular Guatemala, El Salvador and other Latin American countries.

On the other hand, if the refugee claimant going to the United States came from a left wing dictatorship, such as some of the communist countries in Europe, the refugee was received very openly and warmly in the United States.

In other words, in our opinion, the refugee convention was not applied evenly to all types of refugees who appeared in the United States. Therefore, for Canada to return refugee claimants to the United States because we considered it a safe third country and the refugee claimant had to come through the United States by plane, truck, train, boat, or whatever, and to say to them that they do not belong here, they belong in the United States because it was a safe third country, we do not think this is a proper way to deal with legitimate refugee applicants.

Another change in the bill is the fact that the government is proposing that the refugee panel of the Immigrant and Refugee Board now requires the agreement of two members in certain cases to recognize the applicant as a refugee. Up until now, the recognition of only one of the two was necessary for the applicant to be considered a refugee.

While it is true that the two are only required in certain cases, one of those cases is related to the possession of legitimate documents by the claimant. Anyone who deals with refugees knows it is very often natural that the refugee who flees his country as a political opponent of a regime, or who was being persecuted because of his religion, ethnic background, or colour will flee in the middle of the night, sometimes over mountains, through forests and whatever to escape that country and he will not have his documentation. As a matter of fact, in many of those countries he is refused documentation.

For us to insist in this country that every refugee applicant must have proper documents from his country, passports, travel documents and identification documents, because he is applying as a refugee and to turn him back or to make it more difficult for him I believe is not fair.

• (1650)

This morning I spoke to a Jewish man who fled Nazi Germany at the beginning of World War II. He got to Denmark and swam to a Swedish island in nothing but shorts and a T-shirt in order to get away from Nazi Germany and get to a country that would respect his religion and give him freedom. He was a Jewish refugee from Nazi Germany and had no documents. Many people fleeing those sorts of conditions have no documents. We will want answers on that.

The bill provides for a better system of family reunification, and we give credit to the government for doing that, but I return to the question that was just asked by my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood. If you are going to do what the government says in its proposal with respect to family reunification, you are going to need the resources in the department to make that work. We would hope that will be the case.

Right now refugees have been without their families for up to five years. There are cases in my office where the individual is here and has not seen his family for five years because of the slowness in our process. Many of the NGOs have asked that the minister use ministerial permits to deal with these cases which are excessively cruel, but he has refused to do that. We still ask him to use his ministerial permits because that would be a way of dealing with these cases that are between three and five years, which is really inhumane when you come to think of it. A man is here and his wife and children are still in a country which is in turmoil and he has not been able to get them into the country with him even though he has been recognized as a refugee.

The measures in the bill to provide a system of discipline for those members of the board who misbehave and who are negligent is a good thing and we support it. There were cases last winter where members of the Refugee Board were rude to refugee claimants, slept during the hearings, laughed at their stories and even tried to use pressure, one to the other, to come to certain decisions. When this was raised with the chairman of the board, he said that there was not too much he could do because the members of the board were Order in Council appointments which, by the way, makes us wonder about the judgment in appointing some of these people. Nevertheless we believe that this is a positive step to put a measure in the bill to allow the government and the board to deal with members who are misbehaving or who are negligent in their duties.

Another major change in the bill is the increased authority given to the government, to the minister and to his officials to do things by way of regulation. There is quite a massive shift of authority from Parliament to the minister and to his officials in this bill. He referred to some of them. He looks on it as a more effective way of managing the immigration system and the refugee system. However, some of those decisions which are being transferred from Parliament to the minister and to the officials are ones that are open to abuse. While this minister might be a democratic-minded minister and may be fair, although some people might disagree with that description from time to time, we do not know what minister will be in that position. We do not know what government will be in power. We could have a minority government after the next election with the balance of power with the Reform Party which has been, for the most part, speaking against immigration.

We will want to examine very closely the many measures in the bill which will transfer authority to the minister and to the officials in the government to make regulations on these matters. For example, to make changes in the streams of immigrants, to decide which streams have priority over other streams, to decide that they will suspend the list for a period of time and wait for others that they consider to be of better quality.

I use those words, but the minister in the publicity material that he sent out used these terms to choose those that he would consider to be the best.

We all want the best immigrants, but we all know as well that the term the best can be interpreted in many ways. It can be interpreted in a very subjective way and in a political way. We do not want that. We want people to be chosen based on fair criteria. We want the best but we want them chosen against rules and criteria which are fair and which correspond to the goals of our immigration policy that I referred to at the beginning of my remarks.

Among those increased powers that are being given to the minister and his officials, one would require the immigrant to settle in certain regions and provinces. This is one of those measures that requires much more analysis. It appears that it will be made a total obligation, a condition attached to the immigration visa or the immigration residency.

For two years, let us say a dentist, would have to live in northern town A or B no matter what happened. While it has always been the policy to encourage immigrants to go to certain regions and to encourage certain professions, trades and occupations which were in demand and to try and promote those in our immigration policy, it has not been made an absolute condition and obligation. One wonders again if this requires further examination and analysis and whether this is not against article 6 of our charter of rights which says that Canadians and residents of Canada can travel to any part of Canada, live in any part of Canada and work in any part of Canada that they wish.

The bill makes some important changes. Again it is hard to assess whether they are good or bad. There will be changes to the health provisions of admissibility. In November 1991 the minister and his officials told us that they were conducting a review with respect to medical admissibility in Canada. When the officials were before the standing committee a few weeks ago, I asked about that review. They told me it was not completed. Here we are, making changes to the law with respect to the admissibility clause with respect to health and social services with a statement that they will by regulation clarify whether or not certain individuals with health problems will impact excessively on the health and social service system.

We have always had laws to that effect but again I have to ask the question: What is really meant by that? To what extent are they going to exclude certain individuals with health problems from Canada if they impact excessively on the health and social service system? I give notice now that we will want to hear evidence on that before the legislative committee. If it is true that there is evidence to back that up, we will have to do something about it.

As I say, it says in the immigration policy that was passed in 1976 for which I voted at the time, that we have to protect our health and social service system, that we have to protect our communities and so on. On the other hand, we have a tradition of being generous and humane. We will have to see how this proposal balances off against those rules.

Again, I am asked to vote on this bill today and I do not know the answers to those questions. There will also be changes with respect to the ability to support oneself in the country based on welfare as a means of support. The provision may be a good one or may be a bad one. I am asked to vote on a bill that I do not have all the details about or on which I do not have enough information.

• (1700)

The government is transferring an additional burden to the transport carriers that bring people to this country. I do not know what the transport carriers will have to say about that.

I am also concerned about how we are going to keep these carriers accountable and under our control. They are going to be acting more or less as an extended arm of the Department of Employment and Immigration, of the Government of Canada, but they are not really employees who are responsible to Parliament or the Government of Canada. We are going to need testimony with respect to that matter.

With respect to the provisions for fingerprinting, photos and greater search and seizure at ports of entry, of course we have fingerprinting in this country but it is associated with criminality for the most part. It is the sort of procedure we do not use unless there are good and very sound reasons that it is required.

As a matter of fact, under the Privacy Act of Canada, which is a statute, a law of this Parliament, fingerprinting is considered to be a matter of personal privacy and must be treated in very restricted ways. Fingerprints are considered to be something that cannot be used in a loose fashion and cannot be used for any reason whatsoever. There are certain provisions in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms that put limits on the use of fingerprinting.

I understand that there are also international human rights treaties that Canada has signed that set out limits on the use of fingerprinting.

In the material that was distributed by the minister and his department there is an implication that refugees and immigrants are for the most part out to defraud the government. While there are some who are, there is no doubt about that, it is a bad rap against the great majority of our refugees and our immigrants.

Another good measure in the bill is the one that would extend visitors' visas from three to six months as a general rule. I have to inform the minister that a lot of people who should be getting visitors' visas these days are not getting them. These people's families are ending up in the offices of members of Parliament and we are not getting good explanations as to why visitors' visas are not given.

These are cases in which there has been a death in the family in Canada and a person who lives in India, for example, and has a business there, has a home there, has other members of his family there, applies for a visitor's visa to come to a funeral but is not given the visitor's visa. He has all that evidence that he will return, and a return ticket as well. I have many examples of this happening.

While I welcome the extension of the visitor's visa something must be done to make the granting of visitors' visas more fair.

One of the provisions in the bill that I think is bad and do not understand at all is the greater use of detention. We are not talking about detention for people charged with crimes. We are talking about detaining potential immigrants and refugee claimants because there may be some doubt with respect to their claims. We are afraid that they will disappear so we put them in detention.

Under the present law there must be a review of that placement in detention within 48 hours and then every seven days. Most of these refugees and immigrants, many of whom cannot speak English or French, are not able to organize themselves properly to get a review within the first 48 hours but a great number of them do manage it in the first seven-day review. A great number are released at that review after seven days.

In this legislation we are changing the seven-day review to a 30-day review. That will mean that a lot of people will be kept in detention for 30 days without good cause, and at a great additional cost.

There is one of those detention centres in my constituency. They are going to have to triple the size. If we are going to keep these people in for 30 days and only review their cases every 30 days there is going to be a lot of injustice at a great cost to the taxpayers of this country.

As well, the bill provides for a greater use of deportation orders, as opposed to exclusion orders and departure notices. Again, I do not understand why that is necessary. That is another thing which I have serious doubts about, especially some of the cases mentioned in the bill and in the material. I am asked to vote on such things as a greater use of deportation orders and I am not convinced. We will have to get evidence on that as well.

In the moments that remain I would like to discuss some serious matters that are not dealt with in the bill. Probably the most serious is that there is still no appeal on the merits for refugee applicants turned down by the board. There is an appeal in law, but even that appeal in law is more limited in this bill than in the present law.

For years now the practitioners in immigration, the churches, the NGOs, have pleaded for an appeal process. The minister referred to the UN High Commissioner for Refugees. It has also recommended that we should have an internal review or appeal process.

An appeal process is necessary because no matter how good this refugee board is it is going to make mistakes. It is composed of human beings. There have been some terrible mistakes. There is inconsistency in the board's decisions and there is no appropriate review or appeal process. The result is that some people have been deported from this country to areas of conflict, where their lives are going to be in danger, where they are going to be put in prison, while other people in the very same situation are admitted. There is great imbalance.

The way to deal with that is through an appropriate appeal process.

It could also be dealt with through a proper use of the provisions of section 114, which allows the minister to admit people for humanitarian and compassionate reasons. However, unfortunately this minister—and I still have not got a good answer from him—has virtually closed down the use of that provision to admit people on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. It is now more limited under his ministry than it was under the two former Conservative ministers, the hon. member for St. Paul's and the hon. member for Roberval. They used those provisions to a greater extent than he has. Now people turned down by the refugee board who, because their case is deserving, should be admitted under the humanitarian compassionate clause are not being admitted at all. Nothing is being done about that at all.

Last year only 23 out of 3,485 cases in Ontario and Quebec were accepted under those provisions. That is very, very few.

Another major matter that is not being dealt with, and it may be dealt with in the future but the minister has not taken steps to deal with it yet, concerns the many individuals and families who have gone before the refugee board and been turned down as refugees because the conditions in their countries have changed. A lot of them are from eastern Europe, from Poland, Czechoslovakia, East Germany and the Soviet Union.

They have waited for two to three years to get their case before the board. They were legitimate refugees when they fled. They severed their ties in the countries which they left and came here. As a result of the slowness and the inefficiency of our system they have had to wait. Finally, they get before the board and are told: "No, you are not a refugee, your country, Poland, is now a democracy". Many of these people have established themselves in this country, have had children here, have married here, and yet they are being forced back to those countries.

The NGOs and many other people have asked the minister and the government to do something about that, to have more fairness and humanity. These people, many of them, have severed their ties in their countries of origin and were refugees when they came. It is not their fault they were not admitted as refugees. It is our fault as a country for having such a poor system.

The minister in the bill takes steps to regulate and place a greater burden on the transport companies, but he has done nothing yet to control, regulate and monitor immigration consultants and agents, and they do require regulation and monitoring.

• (1710)

While there are some good ones in the field there have been a lot of bad ones and that has been admitted. They have exploited many immigrants.

Again, I do not understand why the minister did not take this opportunity since he is opening up the act to do something about these consultants and agents.

Mr. Speaker, you indicate to me my time is coming to and end. There is much more that could have been said. In the last few minutes I would like to simply say again this is a very complex bill. I think to call the debate today is premature and it is worse still to close down the debate by closure on Monday night.

I want to tell the government that although there are some good things in the bill and there are some bad things, because there are so many things we have not had a chance to analyse and consult on what may be bad or good, we do not know, we refuse to vote favourably for this bill at second reading.

Not only will we vote against the bill at second reading but we will move that consideration of the bill be put off until a later time.

I also want to say to the minister that I hope if the bill is rammed through at second reading and sent to a committee he will have some fair consideration of the NGOs in the field. They, unlike the minister and his staff, will not be ready to appear before any committee within two or three weeks. They need to consult, to analyse. Many of them have volunteers. I am thinking of the ethnocultural communities, the voluntary refugee assist and support groups. They will not be able to come before us that quickly. You have to give them time to prepare themselves.

I would like to move, supported by the hon. member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys:

> That the motion before us be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "that" and by substituting the following therefore:
>
> Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

Mr. Valcourt: Mr. Speaker, an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Orders 78(1) or 78(2) with respect to report stage and third reading of Bill C-26, an act to amend the Public Service Employment Act, the Public Service Staff Relations Act and other acts in relation to the Public Service of Canada.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move the time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stage.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the member, I would like to make it clear that once the Chair has recognized the minister on a notice of this kind, it cannot interrupt, and I will now first recognize the hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: I think that under the rules of the House it is not possible to move a motion when you have been recognized on a point of order. I think that this motion is, therefore, out of order at this stage.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I respectfully differ with my hon. friend from Essex—Windsor.

A notice of time allocation under Standing Order 78(3) is in order, either by rising in debate or by rising on a point of order.

Your Honour did recognize the hon. minister and I believe that his notice is completely in order.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when the government members immediately prior to my intervention attempted to make a similar motion, our deputy House leader appeared in the House and pointed out that no attempt had been made in accordance with the Standing Orders to get agreement on a proposed allocation of time which is required before you make the said motion.

At that time you promised to take that point under deliberation and decide on it at a later time, I presume on Monday.

As far as I know, there has been no proposal for allocation of time put to us for which agreement was sought, and consequently I think the point of order that was raised by the hon. member from Kingston some minutes ago is still a valid objection to this motion at this time. We ask the Chair to take that under consideration.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Before recognizing the parliamentary secretary, I would like to recall that the notice given by the minister concerns Bill C-26, the Public Service Reform Act, and not Bill C-86, the Immigration Act.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: You are absolutely correct, Mr. Speaker.

On the general point that my friend from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce was making, I can assure him that were he to consult with his House leader or his deputy House leader and were the New Democratic Party to do the same they would find that consultation has taken place and that it is completely in order. I can assure my friend of that.

I do apologize to my friend from Spadina for the point of order's coming after his speech had begun. It was not our intention and it was intended that it be made between the speeches. We did not wish to be rude.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I wish to apologize. I thought the minister had said Bill C-86 and I apologize. My remarks were directed to the C-86 situation.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, independent members were not consulted on this motion. Therefore, we cannot give our consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I think it is important to recall two aspects of the Standing Orders. First, it is a notice that does not require unanimous consent. It may be given by a minister of the Crown in the course of debate. Consequently, unanimous consent is unnecessary.

Second, raising a point of order becomes a technicality. In the past, I have had occasion to recognize a minister on a point of order, but any minister of the Crown may rise to give this kind of notice within normal sitting hours.

So the minister may raise a point of order to give this kind of notice, and I have on occasion recognized a member on a point of order that was not really a point of order. I stand corrected if I am wrong, but I think the Standing Orders allow any minister of the Crown to give this notice at any time, within normal sitting hours.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to challenge your decision, but I would appreciate some clarification. Standing Order 78(3)(a) says:

> A Minister of the Crown who from his place in the House has stated—

Whatever the Standing Order provides with respect to time allocation.

• (1720)

From his place in the House infers that the minister had the floor. However, on a point of order, the minister does not have the floor in debate. Rising on a point of order means the minister wishes to make some kind of comment on how Standing Orders should be applied in the House.

Perhaps the Chair could tell me if the words from his place in this particular Standing Order mean or confirm that the minister has the floor whenever he rises in the House? The Chair just said that often a minister may rise to make a statement or comment.

As I see it, the minister is a member just like any other, and to speak in the House, we must be recognized by the Chair, either in debate or for a specific procedure. Sometimes parliamentary procedure says that with the Speaker in the Chair, a minister may do such and such a thing. Sometimes it says when a minister rises in his place, he may move such and such, but I always infer from that that he has the floor.

In this case, the minister did not have the floor. He rose on a point of order. I asked on what point of order, and the Chair answered: "Standing Order 87(3)." Well, Standing Order 78(3) says, and quite clearly, that the minister in question, from his place in the House, has stated at a previous sitting that an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of sections (1) and (2), after the appropriate consultations.

My question is this: Did the minister have the floor to move the motion? I maintain that he may have been recognized on a point of order, but he did not have the floor in debate and could not do what he did without having the floor. If the minister wanted to do this, he should have been recognized in debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I certainly would not dismiss the opinion of a member as experienced as the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, but I can say that since I became Assistant Deputy Chairman two years ago, I have often given a minister the floor, without any objections from members or the clerks at the Table. I even saw the government House leader rise before the debate on the adjournment motion.

Finally, to ensure I am not mistaken, I will take the comments made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier under advisement, to avoid creating a precedent and to ensure that the Chair is acting in accordance with the Standing Orders and the traditions of this House.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, because the bill as it stands has too many faults and too few virtues.

One fault which has been mentioned already by the previous speaker is that it takes too much of the power of debate and decision from the House of Commons. It asks the House of Commons to surrender too much power to the cabinet, to the minister, and to immigration officials such as the senior immigration officer at the port of entry.

Another fault is that it threatens to reject retroactively some of the over 300,000 applications for immigrant visas completed or in progress.

Another fault is that it opens the immigration process to what would in effect be planned discrimination. No matter what the intent was it would be not accidental but would be by order of the cabinet. That is by allowing rules of admission to be radically changed from time to time by the cabinet without adequate notice to the public or to Parliament and with no serious possibility of debate in Parliament, let alone a vote to stop or amend any discriminatory aspects.

Fourth, by illusion or implication, it slanders refugee claimants, implying that there is a serious number of them who are fraudulent or criminally intending or even terrorist intending, whereas I believe there is either little or no evidence of terrorist activity. I know that when Bill C-55 was considered there was, according to the RCMP then, no evidence of danger to Canada from undocumented aliens. It also restricts the refugees' access to the refugee determination system and further restricts their right of appeal.

Fifth, the bill, which is over 113 pages long, is very complicated. It is being pushed at second reading before the parliamentary Library staff have had time to study and analyse it.

Sixth, because of these reasons this bill will intensify conflict and disunity and racial tension among Canadians.

The bill has some virtues. Some of them, as the minister has said, are on points that many of us have been asking to have amendment. First, I want to say that I agree with the minister that it is a good thing that the rate of immigration has been raised to 250,000 per year. I have supported any governmental initiatives that increased up to this point and I believe the proposal of the Canada Ethnocultural Council that immigration be roughly at the level of 1 per cent of the Canadian population is a very reasonable proposal. This government's policy roughly follows that. I have always supported that.

I also agree with the principle that he imposes no numerical limit on in-Canada landings, whether it be refugee landings in Canada or other landings for humanitarian cause, such as the alien spouse of a Canadian married in Canada. There is to be no limit by number of those.

I welcome also and I know the chairman of the Immigration and Refugee Board welcomes the provision of a means of discipline of board members. I do not believe that all the troubles that we have heard about were to be attributed simply to lack of discipline. I think there were deeper troubles in that board, as I have said before in this House.

I am also quite content with extending the visitor's visa normally to six months. I wish, as my colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce has mentioned, that it would be possible—I do not know why it is not possible—to enact a provision for bond. That is if a Canadian wants a relative to come over to a wedding, to a funeral or something like that, and offers a bond of so much money for performance by the visitor. I have been told by officials that the law will not make that bond enforceable. Yet such bonds are normally taken in a matter of bail of a prisoner or for that matter for the release of a person detained by the immigration department at the port of entry.

If bonds are usable in those cases, I do not understand why they are not usable in the case of visitors. I think every member of Parliament must have cases where we are quite sure that a visitor was bona fide but was refused a permit.

I also agree with the proposal to give permanent residents some sort of proof, a card to carry as permanent proof of residence, so they do not have to make special arrangements every time they leave Canada to make sure they will get back.

• (1730)

I welcome the abandoning of the credible basis part of the preliminary hearing in immigration and refugee board work. I do not welcome the handing over of other aspects of the board to the senior immigration officer at the port of entry, but I will come back to that later. To get rid of that very foolish legislation of five years ago on credible basis was really long overdue and I am glad that it will be done.

It will certainly be good news if the convention refugees, so determined in Canada, can be landed within six months, along with their spouses and children, but I wait to see whether that will happen. I have heard promises similar to that regarding spouses from other countries and certainly it has not in all cases been carried out. I do not have the complete list, but that is only a promise and there is nothing in the bill that I can see that gives the convention refugee the right to have that promise enforced. If the government says: "Well I am sorry, we are too busy, you will have to wait a year", I believe he has no recourse. It is shaky.

I also believe, as my colleague from Notre–Dame–de–Grâce does, that much more debate is needed before this bill is accepted even in principle. I know that the government plans to force the vote on Monday. Our party will be voting against it because there is simply too much that is either unclear or outright wrong in the bill as it stands.

There was no broad consultation with the non–governmental organizations: the churches, the refugee support committees, the ethnocultural groups, many of whom are very active in this matter, and the ethnocultural council. There was very little consultation even with the experienced members of the bar or with individuals whose profession is to work with immigrants and with refugees.

That must be done in the next three months or so, but also with that there should be consideration of withdrawing the bill, as the government has done in some cases, in order to bring in an amended form after the public has had a chance to discuss it. I hope to return to that if there is time.

One question that some of us will want to examine in some detail is the one the minister raised of the UNHCR, United Nations High Commission for Refugees' statement of approval of the bill. It is well know that the UNHCR works within very close limits. It can operate in any country, such as Canada, only as a guest, and only with the goodwill of a government. It has no right to act against a government or in opposition to a government.

Furthermore it depends on voluntary financing. It is true that Canada is a generous donor to the cost of the UNHCR. It is equally true that the UNHCR in the past has always followed the practice of never biting the hand that feeds it. The fact that it has approved of this bill really just means that the UNHCR, as usual, publicly agrees with the Government of Canada. It is not a serious endorsation and whether anyone read the bill or not is open to question.

I want to begin with what I have been able to do in a hasty study and hasty consultation with some people with experience. I want to give a few examples. One would be an example of the anti–democratic taking of power from Parliament in the transitional provisions.

Section 107 of the bill on page 106 states:

> Subject to sections 108 to 116, every provision of the Immigration Act as enacted by this Act shall, on the coming into force of that provision, apply in respect of every application, proceeding or matter under that Act or the regulations made thereunder that is pending or in progress immediately before the coming into force of that provision.

This appears to people such as the newly claimed chairman of the immigration bar in Ontario to be retroactivity. This means that of the 300,000 or 400,000 immigrant applications that have been made or are in progress, perhaps some of them even completed, the fees have been paid, plans may have been made, some can be cancelled. They have acted according to the law and have been found acceptable according to the law but it can be cancelled by a decision of the cabinet or indirectly by a decision of the cabinet.

No Canadian citizen, no would–be immigrant even if he has paid his fee, no members of Parliament or Parliament itself will have any power to correct that sort of injustice. It is a very serious matter to introduce massive retroactivity into the proceedings of a government. It is generally considered to be quite un–Canadian.

Along with that section, on page 6 there is section 6(5) of the act. This one gives the cabinet wide powers to change the landing requirements for any country or any class of would–be immigrants. It reads:

> 6(5) Subject to subsection (8) but notwithstanding any other provision of this Act or any regulation made under paragraph 114(1)(a), an immigrant and all dependants, if any, may be granted landing for reasons of public policy or compassionate or humanitarian considerations if the immigrant is a member of a class of immigrants prescribed by regulations made under paragraph 114(1)(e) and the immigrant meets the landing requirements prescribed under that paragraph.

In other words, as it was explained to us informally in dealing with eastern Europe, we might give certain countries a waiver releasing immigrant applicants from those countries from having to meet the normal requirements of independent immigrants to Canada.

We are told that it does not apply to family members and it does not apply to refugees but it would apply to those this government is most interested in, to the independent immigrants. There could be a rule set up for this group, a different rule set up for that group and a different rule set up for the other group with no control by Parliament and no real accountability to the public.

These designated class of people will not have to meet the provisions of the act except the landing requirements specified by their particular regulations. The designation for the classes for the relaxed requirements has the possibility of discriminating positively or negatively with regard to people's race, nationality, religion, national origin.

The government is particularly interested in using this for what it calls excellence. That is the third stream that the government wants to create as compared with family reunification or refugee. It wants to create within the independent immigrant stream the class of excellence. There is no indication of how it is to be judged.

Mr. Carter Hoppe, chairman of the immigration section of the Canadian Bar Association in Ontario says: "The immigration officials seem to want to have this retroactivity provision to clean up bureaucratic nightmares created by whom? Not only are the retroactivity provisions unfair from an applicant's perspective, but suddenly the rug could be pulled out from under her or him. It will not help us to attract immigrants and will send the wrong message."

This kind of change will engender rivalry and bitterness among Canadians and among immigrants of different nationalities, races, religions or skills and occupations which is my third point.

My fourth point is that by innuendo this act slanders refugee claimants in general.

• (1740)

Undoubtedly this act is intended particularly to target refugee claimants and when the amendments were first proposed or discussed with me was in connection with refugees.

The government keeps reiterating its emphasis on abuse although it has not shown that the refugees commit any more abuse than other people in proportion to their numbers. They are being made to suffer unfair restrictions on the rights of refugees both to entry and to appeal.

This is an attempt to curry favour with the powerful people we were mentioned earlier such as the powerful Conservatives who are more conservative than the Conservatives.

My next example of the flaws in this bill is that it seriously restricts access by genuine refugees to the Canadian refugee determination system. Section 46.01(1) seriously reduces the right recognized by the Supreme Court of Canada in the same decision of 1985 of everyone physically present in Canada who claims refugee status to have an oral hearing. This it does by shifting the responsibility for certain decisions to the senior immigration officer who would not be told to hear the substance of the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I see you are signalling me that the time is short but I thought I had five minutes left. Are you saying only two? The last speaker went on for about 50 minutes. I think the clock moves at different speeds.

The government claims that it has eliminated the first step of the RID but it has put important parts of it into the hands of the senior immigration officers such as, for example, the decision to send a person back to a so-called safe third country. The country most often talked about is the United States, which is nakedly violating its obligations under international law not to refoule refugees who are trying to get its protection.

The judge who acted in one of these cases, district Judge Johnson, said as follows: "It is unconscionable that the United States should accede to the protocol and later claim that it is not bound by it. This court is astonished that the United States would return Haitian refugees to the jaws of political persecution, terror, death and uncertainty when it has contracted not to do so. The government's conduct is particularly hypocritical given its condemnation of other countries which have refused to abide by the principle of non-refoulement. As it stands now, article 33 is a cruel hoax and not worth the paper it is printed on". That is referring to the UN convention on refugees.

Our government is negotiating to send refugee claimants back to the United States by the perhaps tens of thousands and without having given them a chance of a hearing without any guarantee whatsoever they would get a fair hearing in the United States. The evidence against that is that the United States sent 98 per cent of Salvadorans back to Salvador, clearly an unjust practice by the United States.

I want to say it is essential that there be time allowed to the public to study this bill and to make interventions. Until then I and my caucus will be voting against this bill.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the hon. member who is a very experienced member in this field had more to say on some points and I would like to have his views.

In my speech I had commented on the fact that the government in the bill is moving to a greater use of deportation orders as opposed to exclusion orders and removal notices. The hon. member knows that the deportation order is a much harsher measure. I am not convinced that we have to move more extensively to a deportation order.

Very often with the use of the exclusion order or the removal notice, the individual obeys, leaves and his rights are not as restricted as with deportation orders.

I am wondering if the member would mind commenting on that and also on the other point that I find quite hard. I do not understand it at all.

Is the government now imposing a 30–day review on detention as opposed to a seven–day review? I would like to know what his experience is. In the detention centre in Montreal they find that the great majority of those who are in detention get released at the end of the seven–day review. If you keep them there for 30 days, people who should not be there are going to be kept there fore 30 days, I think it is an unnecessary burden on the system financially and extremely unfair to the person that should not be there.

I am wondering if he would mind commenting on those matters.

Mr. Heap: I thank the hon. member for those relevant questions.

On the matter of the deportation system, I believe that it is very unfortunate that under the new orders even a person who has been given a departure order and is planning voluntarily to leave can be arrested and deported before the date on which the person had been asked to leave.

It is also true that in Toronto—I do not have direct experience, but the lawyers who work on this tell me—as in Montreal, most of the claimants are released on proper recognizance by about the seventh day, but very few of them by the second day, for the reasons the hon. member gave. The fact that these two changes of the law are put in reflects what a former director of refugee affairs, Raphael Girard, called "humane deterrents". In other words, we do not shoot them at the border, we make them wish they had not come. We make them write to their friends saying: do not come to Canada, you will be locked up for a month whether you have done anything wrong or not or you may be kicked out without any notice even when you were planning to leave. This is a form of harassment, punitive harassment of refugee claimants, that is a disgrace to Canada.

NOTICE OF ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C–86

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand that consultations have now taken place between the relevant persons and an agreement could not be reached under the provisions of Standing Order 78(1) or (2) with respect to second reading of Bill C–86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Under the provisions of Standing Order 78(3), I give notice of my intention to move a time allocation motion at the next sitting of the House for the purpose of allotting a specified number of days or hours for the consideration and disposal of proceedings at the said stage.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that consultations have now taken place on the question of allocating time to end this debate by Monday night, and it is correct that we have refused to give consent to that because we think on a bill of this nature it is indecent to impose the allocation of time after such a short debate and in such a manner. It is totally indecent.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): It being 5.49 p.m., pursuant to Order adopted earlier today, this House stands adjourned until Monday, 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 5.49 p.m.

ADDRESS

of

HIS EXCELLENCY BORIS YELTSIN

PRESIDENT OF THE FEDERATION OF RUSSIA

to

Both Houses of Parliament

in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

Friday, June 19, 1992

APPENDIX

ADDRESS

of

HIS EXCELLENCY BORIS YELTSIN

PRESIDENT OF THE FEDERATION OF RUSSIA

to

Both Houses of Parliament

in the

HOUSE OF COMMONS CHAMBER, OTTAWA

on

Friday, June 19, 1992

His Excellency Boris Yeltsin was welcomed by the Right Honourable Brian Mulroney, Prime Minister of Canada, and thanked by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate and the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons.

[English]

Hon. John A. Fraser (Speaker of the House of Commons): Order, please. The Right Honourable the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, chers collègues, mesdames et messieurs. We are here today to celebrate the state visit to Canada by the President of the Russian Federation, His Excellency Boris Yeltsin. We are here, as well, to launch a new era of peace and partnership between peoples too long divided.

Fifty years ago this month, diplomatic relations were opened between Ottawa and Moscow. Diplomatic relations between us were born, as it turns out, of absolute necessity during the darkest days of the Second World War. Europe then lay in subjugation and Russia lay under the darkest siege.

I have stood before the War Memorial in St. Petersburg in the brutal cold of winter and I have listened to the winds whisper silently of great tragedy and enormous human loss in Russia. I have visited cemeteries from Dieppe to Sai Wan Bay and I have heard courageous veterans mourn fallen comrades sacrificed in the defence of liberty and democracy against the very same enemy.

[Translation]

The establishment of diplomatic relations at that time was both an act of defiance toward those who wanted to destroy us and an act of hope for better days. We indeed finally defeated our common enemy, but our relations drifted into the great desolation of the cold war. We found ourselves facing each other in a new struggle, a war waged not on the plains of central Europe or in the jungles of Asia but in the hearts and minds of men and women throughout the world.

This war as well is now over; the victory was won not by one army over another but by fundamental values and powerful ideas to which all can adhere.

[English]

Obviously, Mr. Speaker and fellow Canadians, the largest measure of the credit for this unique opportunity that now opens down the vistas of years must be given to President Yeltsin.

Courage is an abstraction to those at a relatively safe distance. But as it turns out, President Yeltsin was given no such latitude.

In the crucial days of last August on the top of a tank, at immediate risk to his own life, he dispatched the tyranny that had held Russia in the grip of fear and arbitrary power for 70 years.

The image of Boris Yeltsin last summer and his defiant message to the enemies of democracy everywhere, particularly in his own country, will remain as an historic symbol of courage and purpose so long as men and women gather in free Parliaments to defend the cause of liberty. And I tell you, Mr. President, all Canadians salute you for the extraordinary courage that you have demonstrated.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: President Yeltsin's success was the success fundamentally of the human spirit. His beneficiaries are us all.

Mr. President, you have offered us friendship and you have challenged us to join with you in bringing your country into the community of free nations. I know that I speak for every member of this House and that, sir, is a most rare occurrence.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: As I told you, sir, on both sides of the House, all of them are active supporters of mine.

I speak for every member of this House irrespective of political party because every Canadian believes fundamentally in liberty and democracy. I speak for all Canadians, Canadians across this land, when I say that all Canadians reciprocate your friendship and today we accept your challenge.

[Translation]

The ancient Greeks taught us that democracy is government by the free. The people of Russia are not yet fully free of the dead hand of debilitating ideology and the victory of values is not yet complete.

Mr. President, we understand that the way ahead is fraught with serious difficulties, even perils, and that there will be setbacks and course corrections along the way. Here in this House of Canadian democracy, I give you the firm assurance of our understanding and support. So long as your compass is set for democracy, Canadians will be at your side, Canadians of all regions, of all political parties, of all parts of society.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. President, on behalf of all members of Parliament and on behalf of all Canadians, it is with respect and admiration that I invite you today to address the Parliament and the people of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1120)

[Editor's Note: Mr. Yeltsin spoke in Russian.]

[Translation]

His Excellency Boris Yeltsin (President of the Russian Federation): Respected Speaker of the House of Commons, respected Speaker of the Senate, respected members of the House of Commons, respected senators, ladies and gentlemen, respected citizens of a free Canada.

First of all, Prime Minister Mulroney, I thank you for your kind words addressed to a free, democratic Russia and to its President.

Thank you for the warm reception. Like you, Mr. Mulroney, I do not always enjoy such a favourable reception in my own Parliament.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: It is a great honour for me, the President of Russia, the first to be elected to the highest position of a great state, to address you from the rostrum of the highest legislative body in Canada.

The moment has arrived when two peoples who have much in common can take a decisive step toward one another. Official relations between our countries, as you said, Mr. Prime Minister, were re-established 50 years ago. But today, unfortunately, one can see how little has been achieved, how many opportunities have been missed. Now we have a rare opportunity to make up for lost time.

When people speak about Russia and Canada, they generally comment on how similar our countries are. Canada is probably the only place where a Russian could forget that he is in a different country. The amazing similarity of the nature, climate and even the wide-open spaces of our countries has left an imprint on the character of Canadians and Russians.

I continually ask myself: given such similar circumstances, why have our countries developed so differently? Why do our peoples live so differently?

Canada is a recognized world leader in terms of quality of life. Life today in Russia is extremely disrupted, with conditions as tense as a taut string. It is easy to see the enormous damage wreaked on Russia by the 70-year dominance of the Communist totalitarian system. Here in Canada there are no echoes of the arguments with which party ideologues formerly explained the terribly low quality of life which Russians experience. Neither its northern position, nor its harsh climate, nor the alleged nationalistic narrow-mindedness of the Russian people, nor malicious neighbours are to blame for Russia's failure to develop. The main cause lies in the anti-popular stance of the former regime, in the ideology that was forced on the country. For years, the foundations that support life were systematically destroyed. But the citizens of today's Russia do not simply mourn over lost opportunities. Your country is an especially visible and attractive example of the goals which we are now pursuing.

Last August, when we faced the coup-plotters, a very dark cloud loomed not only over Russia, but over the whole world. But the collapse of the totalitarian system was total. The collapse of communistic ideology was total. Once and forever.

As the first president in the thousand-year history of Russia to be elected by all the people, I triumphantly announce this to you. Once and forever.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: The first thing we want to do now is re-establish a normal country, with a normal economy and a normal life. Not a super life, but a normal human way of life. Our tragic past has convinced us that one of the highest treasures that any human community can have is a normal way of life.

Russia knows revolution only too well. That is why I say today on behalf of all Russians that Communist revolution is an evil. We have opted for normal evolution. Russia knows arbitrariness and lawlessness all too well. That is why we have chosen a state based on the rule of law. We are more familiar than other peoples with the nightmare of totalitarianism. That is why we have chosen democracy and why we defended it in those days of last August.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: We know better than others what it is like to be everyone's enemy. That is why we have chosen openness and co-operation with the world community. Russia has opted for freedom, and no force can take it away from us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: "We don't need any more great upheavals. We need a great Russia." These words, spoken a century ago by Russian patriot and reformer Stolypin, have not lost their relevance. On the contrary, they are full of deep, immediate meaning for us. We want our people to raise children and work peacefully. We want them to be governed not by base social instincts or ideological delusions, but by just motives and thoughts. Today, we turn to your rich experience so that we can once and forever say no to all ideological delusions that demand human sacrifices and reject morality.

Borrowing the words of poetess Anna Akhmatova, I pledge to you as President that I will do everything to ensure that Russia never again lapses into the insanity of upheaval.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Broad new horizons have opened for Russian-Canadian co-operation. Half a century ago, our countries were allies in the anti-Hitler coalition. Today, when I visited the memorial to those who died in the First and Second World Wars and in other conflicts, I thought of the fact that Russia and Canada have never fought against one another. This is a great achievement. There is a firm conviction today that we are closer to world peace than ever before. Today, when I passed the peace monument being built, it struck me that you have chosen the most appropriate moment possible to build it, when this confidence in peace is at its peak.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Half a century ago, our countries were allies in the anti-Hitler coalition. Today, we have every reason to speak of a new alliance between us. I am convinced that the need for this alliance has long been felt by those prepared to become direct participants in diverse Russian-Canadian contacts.

• (1130)

Both sides have no shortage of plans for co-operation. It is time we gave them the green light. From this point onward, there are no limits to co-operation between Russia and Canada in world affairs. We can pool our efforts in many different areas in order to strengthen international security, to withstand potential aggressors through collective action, to ensure that all the nations of the world observe the rules of civilized behaviour, including in their behaviour toward their own citizens and national minorities, and to solve global problems.

We applaud your policies of constructive internationalism. We ourselves have already begun to co-operate in working toward the goals identified by the international community. Your country's longstanding commitment to the United Nations organization and to institutions of multilateral diplomacy in general is well known. As is the role played by such outstanding Canadians as Mr. Pearson in working out ways to use the United Nations apparatus in peacekeeping.

This area of United Nations activity and preventive diplomacy aimed at averting conflict could become an ideal domain for applying our joint efforts. The importance of such international mechanisms is regrettably increasing, even in Europe. We have no intention of declaring Russia or any of the states that made up the former union off limits to necessary measures taken by the international community, whether through the United Nations organization or the CSCE. We want peace and calm in our house, in each family. We therefore have a stake in ensuring peace and calm outside it.

The opportunities for co-operation between Russia and Canada in world affairs are greater now than ever before. We must not let them slip by at this of all times.

Ladies and gentlemen, throughout history merchants have preceded diplomats. Such was the case in Russia before 1917. The first treaties were trade treaties. And economic co-operation occupies centre stage in Russian-Canadian relations. Our people have goods to trade, and there are areas for co-operation. Russia is rich. All that is needed is an unbiased approach unhindered by preconceptions. Given such an approach, Russian-Canadian co-operation offers substantial benefits to both parties.

For three hours yesterday and an hour today, Prime Minister Mulroney and I took part in discussions. The Government of Canada proposed a very interesting idea for developing our relations, an idea that could serve as an example for other countries as well. We particularly appreciate this, knowing that Canada too is experiencing difficulties at present. I feel that the high degree of mutual trust which characterizes our personal relations with the Prime Minister allows us to feel confident that this co-operation, these new ideas will be realized.

Russia has set a firm course toward economic reform. We realize that every last market mechanism was eradicated over a period of more than 70 years. After three generations, we have lost the historical instincts we once had for business and private ownership. No one remembers what they mean. We introduced private ownership only half a year ago, including private ownership of land and ownership by foreign private investors.

Practically no one is left who remembers life before the revolution. We realize that the economy is being overhauled during a serious economic crisis, and consequently at a time when the civil peace is highly vulnerable. But it cannot be denied that substantial progress has been achieved in half a year. There have been real changes both in the economy itself and, more important, in people's consciousness.

The people are gradually rediscovering the creativity that was crushed by Communist ideas and ideologies.

Of course, we are currently going through the most painful period, especially this year. This is bitter medicine. Unpopular measures, including price increases, must be adopted in order to shift from a planned economy to a market economy. However difficult this may be, we will not retreat.

Russians are a patient, stubborn people. With gritted teeth, they will overcome these temporary difficulties. They trust their President. They trust their government. They trust their Parliament. And that is very important.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Every month, I find myself in various districts, regions and republics of Russia. There are 20 republics in Russia. And we have succeeded in signing a federative treaty. Blood is being spilled on Russia's doorstep, but inside Russia we have signed a treaty and preserved the civil peace without spilling a single drop of blood. Russia has remained united and indivisible throughout this period. That is very important to us.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Russia's young government of reformers the President of the Russian Federation will support to the end. And it is practically impossible now to force him into retirement. I will not resign until my term expires in 1996. You will never catch me sick. I am extremely healthy. I will therefore support this government of reformers to the end.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: We took our first steps toward a market economy on January 1 of this year. The main one was the freeing of prices, and the government is prepared to take the reforms further. You know that before leaving on this official visit, I asked Parliament to confirm Mr. Gaidar, who is currently acting in my place, as Prime Minister of the Head of State of the Russian Federation. And he is only 36 years old. He is a bold, young reformer.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: One of the main principles for choosing people to serve in the government, as ministers or vice-president, besides considering their professional or business skills, is to select democrats and ensure that none of them is older than the President.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: We call for full co-operation with other countries. I am confident that a revival of the Russian economy will be beneficial not only to us, but to our partners as well. If you invite our specialists, talented young people, to come and study, after studying in Canada for a year, they will return to Russia to advocate Canadian experience, the Canadian market and the Canadian economy. And this co-operation will develop still further.

• (1140)

I believe that one of these people, who will number approximately 150 over five years, as the Prime Minister and I agreed today, may very well develop into a new and talented President of Russia to follow me.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Of course, I am sure that new president will be more talented and more intelligent. That is understandable. Such is history. Today, Russia attaches special importance to western investment and co-operation in the technical field. Today, we agreed on technical co-operation aimed at ensuring the safety of nuclear power plants. We have a program drawn up. The fact that it will be implemented through joint efforts is a complete guarantee that all nuclear power plants will be absolutely free of danger and under the control of the IAEA.

We are not asking for any special injections of money or materials. I want to be quite forthright about that. If Canada did find an opportunity of this kind then, of course, it would help us overcome our problems in this very painful period.

It is true that Russia does not yet offer all of the conditions necessary for accepting private capital from abroad. But before this visit, a series of laws were adopted and decrees promulgated that clear the way for private capital, mainly by making it possible to own property and land, thus facilitating the construction or privatization of factories, buildings, and so on. It is our firm intention to promote this process energetically and to complete it in the very near future.

To achieve this, there is no need to invent anything new. Our course, our norms and standards are those accepted throughout the world. I realize that many Canadian firms are not waiting for an ideal investment climate to develop in Russia. That is how one must act: without being afraid of taking a risk. I do not doubt that this risk is worth taking. Any western investor who fails to enter this unique Russian market this year or next should keep in mind that 1994 will be too late: there will be no room left in the market.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: There is no other way open to us, no alternative to normal economic development. When Russia is rich and flourishing, as I am certain that it will be, we will surely not forget those who were the first to take a risk, a warranted risk.

We have an area for bilateral co-operation that has always attracted much attention: the Arctic. We are much concerned about the situation in the far north of Russia and Canada. The spectrum of problems ranges from the status of aboriginal peoples to environment protection.

Of course, our problems differ in scale. The entire population of the Canadian Arctic is around 100,000. You have no major industrial centres above the Arctic Circle. But I think that I am not mistaken in saying that only together can we solve all of the problems involving the Arctic. Only by working together. Of this I am convinced.

The prosperity of the countries in this region, and above all of Canada and Russia, depend in large measure on conditions in the Arctic. Experience has shown that co-operation between us in this area cannot develop exclusively through dialogue between our capitals. We must therefore emphasize immediate links between the direct participants in co-operation, and above all between the people who actually live in these Arctic regions. They are more interested than anyone in seeing prosperity and the well-being that follows come to their extremely forbidding land.

• (1150)

There is another area of mutual interest in the Russian-Canadian dialogue that might be opened up for further avenues of bilateral co-operation. I wanted to begin my address by congratulating the people of Canada on the 125th birthday of the Canadian federation. From my heart and on behalf of the entire Russian people, I sincerely congratulate everyone in Canada on this anniversary.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Our states are federative in nature. This creates unique opportunities for making the ties between our states better reflect the needs and aspirations of our people. Russia is very interested in studying Canada's experience in managing relations within a federation. We will learn from you how to solve problems in a civilized way through negotiations.

And now a few words about the problems facing the Commonwealth of Independent States of the former union, which are causing many people around the world to worry. This unique intergovernmental organization is currently in the building stage. But it has already proved itself to be a working mechanism for finding the most acceptable form of mutual relations between the republics. At the same time, a process is under way in the Commonwealth whereby republics are both falling apart and coming together. However difficult it may be for us to ensure that this highly complex process remains governable, the seventh and most recent meeting of the heads of government of these countries can be considered the most productive meeting in terms of results.

Respected parliamentarians of Canada, you have considerable opportunities for positively influencing the development of Russian–Canadian co–operation. As I have said before, the advantages to be derived from co–operating with Russia may not all be immediately apparent. They must be explained, but this will not be difficult in the new atmosphere characterizing our relations. I urge you to make active use of your opportunities in Parliament and in the ridings when speaking with the Canadians who elected you to actively promote the dialogue between Russia and Canada, between our peoples.

There is every reason to speak of fundamental national interests shared by Russia and Canada and of human aspirations shared by the ordinary people in our countries. This is what has enabled us, after decades of isolation, to base Russian–Canadian relations on a solid legal foundation: the Treaty on Concord and Co–operation which will be signed today. The community of interests of which I speak cannot be built on thin air. As you know, much is being done in both countries to ensure that it becomes a constant theme of the domestic and foreign policies of our countries.

Speaking from this lofty rostrum, I would especially like to mention Canada's active contribution to the development of the dialogue between us. We are grateful for the solidarity which the people and political leaders of your country showed for a democratic Russia in August. I remember the telephone conversation I had at that time with Prime Minister Mulroney. It had enormous significance, and Russians will never forget it. Russians know about it. Russians remember it, and will continue to remember it for the rest of their history.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Yeltsin: Your solidarity has continued in the form of Canadian economic and humanitarian assistance to Russia. We value highly the heroism of individual citizens and organizations, including the Salvation Army's renewed activity in our country.

Today it is no less important or urgent that we learn the language of mutually advantageous co–operation and partnership in business.

We have a clear vision of what we are striving toward in our country, in the world and in our relations with Canada. And many would do well to study the development of our relations.

Our intentions are not secret. We are prepared for hard work, which is the very essence of any partnership. We have a long and difficult road ahead of us. I am convinced that our peoples must travel together if they are to attain the best results.

I want to wish Russians and Canadians a happy journey and success in developing peaceful areas of mutual co–operation. Thank you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Guy Charbonneau (Speaker of the Senate): Mr. President, Mrs. Yeltsin, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Prime Minister, honorables collègues du Sénat et de la Chambre des communes, distinguished guests:

[Editor's Note: Mr. Charbonneau spoke in Russian.]

We are honoured by your visit and very grateful that you have shared with us as parliamentary colleagues your international preoccupations and your determination to carry through the program of reform and restructuring upon which your country has launched itself.

Your presence in these precincts testifies to your faith in the solid basis of the friendly relations between our two countries and to our confidence in your courageous leadership.

We are all the more touched by your presence here today in that we know very well that you are required to be ubiquitous in order to respond to the exigencies of your post on the national and international levels.

As president of the young Russian federation, your leadership has been and remains preponderant to your people, as it does for the collectivity of nations.

Your remarks to us today confirm your indefatigable will to succeed in attaining your goals.

[Translation]

Mr. President, we are all aware of the balancing act you have to perform, caught as you are between attraction for the West and respect for the Russian soul.

Your great writers of the last century made us keenly aware of these differences between the two societies, both so rich in virtues and so laden with an uncounted heritage.

We remember Dostoyevsky, in particular, who in search of a fair balance between the pro-Western and pro-Slavic forces agreed to modernization for Russia if it respected the nation's traditions.

Like you, he worked for understanding of different cultures. In his tribute to Pushkin, he wrote, "Our vocation is European and universal. Is not being Russian, perfectly Russian, the same perhaps as being a brother to all men?"

[English]

In a historical continuity, Tolstoy and Chekov both called for the rejection of a completed past but on the condition that the characteristics of their ancestral customs be preserved. Then, as in our own century, it was the political system in place that was seen as bearing the blame for stagnation and frustrated hopes.

You, Mr. President, have had the courage to confront and repudiate the doctrinaires who were so mistaken about the nature of man.

Without renouncing for the people of your federation their rooted national traditions, you are bringing them into a universal current of liberty.

All the world remembers how you stood up (in every sense of the word) in front of the White House in Moscow, not quite a year ago, to defend liberty and democracy when they were threatened. We are convinced that the same democratic and courageous spirit will carry you forward in the future.

To borrow the language of a sport at which you excel, tennis, we want to wish you, in all your battles with adversity, a final score of game, set, and match.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker Charbonneau: Once more, Mr. President, we congratulate you on the eminent and challenging role to which you dedicate yourself in these critical years and we are grateful to you for sharing with us your main concerns and your intention to continue your work in space and time. We thank you and wish you good luck.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Speaker Fraser: Mr. President, Madam Yeltsina, Mr. Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker of the Senate, members of the Senate and the House of Commons, honoured and distinguished guests:

On behalf of all members of the House of Commons I take great pleasure in welcoming you today to this august Chamber.

[Translation]

The momentous changes which have reshaped the global political landscape over the last several years have left us facing new and daunting challenges. Perhaps no country is more acutely aware of this than the Russian Federation.

[English]

We are seeing today in Russia and the other new republics of the former Soviet Union one of the most remarkable transformations in history.

Communism is now a fading memory, and in its place have been planted the seeds of democracy. Among the new republics, Russia is taking the lead in sowing these seeds.

You have shown tremendous courage, Mr. President, in introducing bold economic reforms.

Russia possesses enormous economic potential, blessed as it is with immense natural and human resources; however, only a continued commitment to economic reform will ensure that these resources are effectively tapped.

We are a sensitive people, Mr. President, and we are aware that the transition to a market economy brings with it unavoidable hardship; the Russian people have displayed patience and courage in the face of economic adversity, and in so doing they have earned the respect and admiration of all Canadians.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Fraser: We feel certain that, despite the many obstacles that remain, the historic spirit of the Russian people will ultimately prevail.

Canada will do all it can to help. As one of the G–7 countries we helped assemble the recent $24 billion assistance package to Russia which will be tied to an economic reform program devised by the International Monetary Fund.

• (1200)

On a bilateral level, Canada has pledged considerable assistance, and, as you mentioned during your last trip to Ottawa, Mr. President, we have fulfilled all our promises.

We have provided your country with substantial grain and other credits, as well as a wide variety of technical and humanitarian assistance.

We hope that trade and investment ties are also growing.

Clearly, we are in a special position with relation to Russia, a position which we understand, a position that brings a responsibility to us which we want to accept.

Both countries now have an unprecedented opportunity to build on what should be a natural friendship. The last 50 years have perhaps blinded people to the striking similarities and unique ties that exist between our countries.

You mentioned that being here from your country you could feel at home. Canada's vast expanse of land, our northern geography, our climate, our abundant natural resources, our multicultural tradition, even our hockey tradition—all these we share in common with Russia.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Fraser: We have taken steps to strengthen these ties.

Part of our technical assistance is aimed at upgrading Russian resource industries such as oil and gas.

As northern neighbours, both countries support the creation of an International Arctic Council which would deal with environmental and security concerns in the region.

Also on the environmental front, which you mentioned, sir, Canada recently pledged to help Russia ensure the safety of its nuclear reactors.

We need to cultivate these bilateral ties.

Perhaps the best way to do it is to encourage people–to–people contact.

[Translation]

In May, the House of Commons held a week–long seminar on the theme of "Canada's Federal System of Government", which attracted delegations from the newly emerging democracies of central and eastern Europe, including one from Russia.

We look forward to more such parliamentary co–operation in the future.

[English]

Finally, our countries share a common concern over security. The Cold War is over, and a new era in international politics has emerged.

Canada supports and encourages you, Mr. President, in your continued efforts to preserve regional and international security.

Your recent agreement with President Bush to slash strategic nuclear weapons represents an historic breakthrough, and we trust that relations with your neighbours in the Commonwealth of Independent States will show similar goodwill and co–operation.

Your leadership on this matter, Mr. President, is well known in this country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker Fraser: In closing, Mr. President, let me say on behalf of all who are here today what enormous respect we have for your achievements as President of the Russian Federation during a difficult period. Your courage has been mentioned.

Perhaps it is appropriate to remind ourselves of what Mr. Churchill said once when asked: "What is the greatest quality a person may have?" He said: "Courage, because it secures all others".

Sir, you are an example of that and we are very proud of you.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker Fraser: We value our growing friendship with your country, and look forward with great eagerness to increasing our ties in the future and helping you in whatever way we can.

[English]

Thank you very much, Mr. President, for being with us. You will be welcome again. To you and madam, we wish you good luck and Godspeed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, June 22, 1992

The House met at 11 a.m.

Prayers

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[Translation]

DEPARTMENT OF FORESTRY ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-306, an act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur) moved that Bill C-306, an act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other Acts, be concurred in at the report stage, as amended.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Arseneault moved that Bill C-306, an act to amend the Department of Forestry Act and to make related amendments to other acts, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Debate. The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the purpose of this bill is to substitute, in the English version, the name "Department of Forests" for the name "Department of Forestry".

I would like to quote recommendation No. 3 of the report entitled Canada's Forests: The Federal Role, a report tabled by the Standing Committee on Forestry and Fisheries in November 1990. I will therefore read recommendation No. 3 on page 39: "The Committee recommends that in the context of its mission and to fully embrace a comprehensive vision of Canada's forest resources, the new Department of Forestry should be renamed the Federal Department of Forests or Forests Canada".

The explanation is on page 39, and the report goes on to say: "It should be noted that this change would only be applicable in the English language as the new department is now called Forêts Canada in the French language and Bill C-29 is entitled Loi sur le ministère des Forêts. In fact, the English and French names for the department will be closer in meaning as a result of this recommendation. For the purposes of consistency and so as not to anticipate any further decisions by the government in this respect, we will continue to use, throughout this report. After defining the mission of Forestry Canada, which consists in seeking appropriate processes and structures for promoting sustainable development, we must define the mandate the new Department of Forestry will need to fulfil that mission and the type of action that will be necessary."

[English]

It is quite obvious the report recommends there be a change and there are a number of reasons for that.

First, the federal government has embraced the concept of sustainable development and has talked about that throughout its forestry committee report.

With regard to the name itself I will give a brief explanation about that. In French the name is already Forest Canada and we want to make sure the translation is proper.

To give you some background on that and to my colleagues who are here today, we have support for this bill. Members from all parties have supported it. The minister responsible for forestry is supporting the bill. We hope after the bill passes that it will be Minister of Forest. The parliamentary secretary is supporting it.

The bill went to committee. At that time, the committee members reviewed the bill clause by clause. There were some amendments made proposed by the parliamentary secretary and myself in discussion. Those were accepted by the committee and the bill has been reported back to the House.

I do not want to prolong the debate here today. The idea here is to pass it at third reading, get it out of the House and go to the next step.

The only thing I would like to say is I would ask the parliamentary secretary who is going to make a few comments a little later to possibly explain the reasons behind the amendments.

[Translation]

Perhaps we will get an explanation of those reasons. I would also like to thank the minister for his support.

[English]

I would like to mention the members who were involved here, not by name, but to say the minister has supported the bill from the beginning, the parliamentary secretary and my colleagues from all parties in the House. I hope they continue to support that. I thank them personally.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I also rise today to support passage of this bill, tabled by my colleague from Restigouche—Chaleur.

Of course, some will think that this is a minor change, but in fact, it has deep significance, because the Department of Forestry is a full-fledged department of government that has been established and Canadians have high expectations of it. It is true that there was some discrepancy between the meaning of the English and French names of the department. The hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur talked about it to the minister, the committee, the Official Opposition and of course the New Democratic Party and I think that hon. members agreed to make the necessary changes.

The Department of Forestry is growing rapidly. We see the increasing role that forests play, both in Canada and internationally. The recent summit in Rio was living proof of what I am saying.

We agreed on this bill in a non-partisan way, in a spirit of consensus, but as the hon. member for Restigouche—Chaleur pointed out, there were some minor technical problems with some amendments. We wanted the change of name from "Department of Forestry" to "Department of Forests" to be gradual and not expensive for the department in changing its stationery and so on.

In answer to my colleague's question, the two proposed amendments can be summarized thus: first, as I mentioned, to ensure a transfer from "Department of Forestry" to "Department of Forests" in terms of identifiable costs within the department.

The purpose of the second amendment, is to ensure that wherever the words "Department of Forests" will be used, it will be done. These minor technical amendments in no way affect the non-partisan spirit and purpose of the bill. That is why, on behalf of the minister and my colleagues, we are pleased to support such a bill.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am going to make only a short remark to the House and our constituents because people looking in may not understand the importance of making a name change like this.

It is important for Canadians to know that my colleague from Restigouche, ever since he came to this House, has had a very tight focus on the area relating to the forests of our nation. He was the member of Parliament who had the definition of sustainable development put right into the interpretive section of Bill C-29, which went through the House.

By having the definition of sustainable development right in the body of the bill, the guidelines for all policy related to the forests of this country are crystal clear.

I think that his constituents and the people of Canada should realize that sometimes even though it may be perceived to be a minor amendment, in actual fact it can have quite a substantive and profound influence on policy development in this country.

I salute my colleague for his work in this particular sector of our economy. It is so important to all of us.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

• (1120)

Mr. Layton: Mr. Speaker, I believe there have been consultations among the parties of the House and there may be unanimous consent for the following motion:

[Translation]

That, notwithstanding Standing Orders 132 and 140, the petition for a private bill on the Montreal Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal, tabled on Thursday, June 18, 1992 and reported by the Clerk of Petitions on Friday, June 19, 1992, be deemed to have been produced within the required time limit and received by the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Does the hon. member have the unanimous consent of the House to move this motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

[English]

Mr. Layton: There may also be unanimous consent to deal expeditiously at this time with Bill S-12 at all stages.

[Translation]

Mr. Gagliano: Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that we fully agree with this motion and we would like to proceed immediately, after a few remarks, with the passage of Bill S-12.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

[English]

MONTREAL BOARD OF TRADE ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis) moved that Bill S-12, an act to amalgamate the Montreal Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to Committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, we are asked to approve this historic legislation giving effect to the merger of the Montreal Board of Trade with la Chambre de commerce du Montréal métropolitain. Both groups have been closely associated with the social, cultural and economic development of Montreal and its regions, including the province of Quebec and Canada as a whole, for over a century.

The decision to combine their strengths by respecting the traditions and heritages of both founding associations sends out a positive signal as to the attitude currently prevailing in Montreal's business community. In fact, the merger decision was unanimously approved by the members of both groups on March 23 of this year.

[Translation]

One aspect of this merger that should be pointed out is that under the official by-laws contained in the enabling legislation, this new structure will operate in Canada's two official languages. At this crucial time in our history, I think that is worth mentioning and worthy of our hearty commendation.

[English]

With the adoption of this legislation the officers, members and staff of both groups will then have in hand the legal means to give full effect to the merger decision. There will be a great deal of work but the results will be well worth it.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words about Bill S-12. As a resident of Montreal, a Quebecer and a Canadian, I am extremely proud. This legislation is one of the instruments Montreal needs as it prepares to enter the 2lst century. It was of course necessary, after more than 100 years, to have a second Chamber. A great deal has changed after 100 years. Today, people are delighted to see that at last a merger is taking place. The process is an indication of how Montreal is getting ready and how Montreal feels. The two organizations are to be commended for taking this step, and I hope many others will follow suit, because we are all Montrealers, we are all Quebecers, we are all Canadians, and we all have to work together.

In keeping with this spirit of co-operation, the Chamber, as the hon. member just said, will continue to provide services in our country's two official languages, and will provide those services to business people in the Montreal area, whether they are English or Italian or belong to any other group. The important thing is that we are working together at this crucial moment in our country's history.

Therefore, on behalf of the Official Opposition and on behalf of my party, the Liberal Party, I want to congratulate these organizations and wish them the best of luck. Once the two Chambers have merged, there will be a powerful incentive for the business community, and in fact all Montrealers, not just those who are in business, but those who would like to get into business, to work together to get Montreal's economy going again.

The best of luck, and of course we will continue our support of the legislative process so that Bill S-12 will become law.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a very brief intervention on behalf of the New Democratic Party caucus in our support of the merger. It is probably one of the few times we have ever been on record as supporting any merger in the business community.

It is an excellent move and perhaps, one would say, long overdue. I am pleased it is happening, particularly this year of our 125th anniversary as a nation.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. DeBlois in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill S-12, an act to amalgamate The Montreal Board of Trade and the Chamber of Commerce of Metropolitan Montreal.

• (1130)

On Clause 2—Definition

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): I have a question which I think most people would want to ask. Why did this have to come before Parliament?

Hon. Bob Layton (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis): I believe, but without full knowledge, that an original charter has been granted to The Montreal Board of Trade. In order to allow it to join now with la Chambre de commerce du Montréal métropolitain, which is a federal charter, there needs to be the passage of a law here.

It has been through the Senate in these last few days. I know it is causing great rejoicing in Montreal.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova) Mr. Chairman, I had a feeling that was the reason, but I thought Canadians would want to know why two very good institutions in Montreal were before the House in this piece of legislation. There are some old legal steps that have to be taken, and I thought it should be clarified.

Mr. Layton: Mr. Chairman, I will take advantage of my colleague's comment and question simply to add that this is a year when so much good is coming from the great old city of Montreal in its 350th anniversary.

There are all kinds of social and positive activities to reunite Montreal and the country. As all of us know, we are also celebrating the 125th anniversary of Canada. The symbolism in that the two business communities have worked closely together and have now gone to full fusion is very appropriate.

[Translation]

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): I just want to wish Montreal the best of luck, and I am sure that everyone can see that in the future, Montreal will still be in Canada, and we all have an appreciation of what Montreal has given all Canadians in the past. I am sure that the merger of these two organizations will have a positive impact on Montreal and its residents.

Clauses 2 to 14 inclusive agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Layton moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): When shall the bill be read the third time?

Some hon. members: Now.

Mr. Layton moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

[English]

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I believe that you would find it in order and you would find approval to now suspend the House until twelve o'clock.

[Translation]

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker I rise on a point of order. I need your advice on a problem I want to raise.

[English]

On June 9, 1992, there was unanimous consent given to a motion by the parliamentary secretary to the House leader of the government in Hansard on page 11622. Contained in that motion was an agreement by the House as to the time and date of the address of Mr. Yeltsin, President of Russia, to both the members of the Senate and House of Commons.

The motion also ordered that:

—all introductory and related speeches, be printed as an appendix to House of Commons Debates of that day and form part of the records of this House;

The terms and conditions of this motion have not been adhered to. I have a copy of Hansard dated June 19, 1992, the date of Mr. Yeltsin's address. It does not include the text or related speeches in an appendix. The only thing that appears is a corrigendum stating that the text of Mr. Yeltsin's speech along with all introductory related speeches will be published at a later date as an Appendix to the House of Commons Debates.

I do not know whether there has been an error in the production of the Debates of the House or whether Hansard cannot record the speech in the official record because of the fact that strangers, people other than MPs, were in the House at that time.

I recognize there are no provisions in the Standing Orders either for the invitation of guest speakers or for procedures regarding the actual delivery of the speech, but because of the significance and nature of such speeches, protocol should be strictly adhered to.

I note that on all previous occasions beginning in 1941 when heads of state or governments have addressed this House the speeches have been printed in Hansard. For example, the speech by Mr. Herzog, President of the State of Israel, to both Houses of Parliament on June 27, 1989 was printed as an Appendix in the Commons Debates of that day.

I will table the list of these dignitaries, their speeches and relevant page numbers in Hansard.

I believe we have two problems. First, an order of the House has not been adhered to. Second, for the first time a head of state or foreign dignitary has addressed members of Parliament and senators in the House and the text of his address does not appear in the official record of the House of Commons as an Appendix.

• (1140)

I wonder if the Speaker could rectify this very serious problem.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, and because it was my motion my hon. friend is referring to, I believe you will find that the official record of the House is the Hansard which comes forth in a week to 10 days' time. The Hansard we have had distributed to us today is in effect a preliminary record.

I believe the explanatory note at the beginning of today's publication does indicate when the daily Hansard is published, Mr. Yeltsin's speech and the introductory and thank you speeches will be published with it.

If I am not mistaken that is a practice which has been followed in the past. It is not being departed from in this instance.

Mr. Kindy: Mr. Speaker, on June 27, 1989, the House of Commons Debates show that the speech of Mr. Herzog, President of Israel, was included in the first edition of Hansard. I am surprised that President Yeltsin's is not.

My second point was whether this did not happen because there were strangers in the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I want to thank the hon. member for Calgary Northeast for calling the attention of the House to this situation. On checking, I am told that it is only due to technical reasons that the text of Mr. Yeltsin's address was not included in the draft edition of last Friday's Debates. It will indeed be included in a later edition to June 19, 1992.

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Now, I would ask for the unanimous consent of the House to suspend the sitting until 12 noon. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

At 11.42 a.m. the sitting of the House was suspended.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 12 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT

ALLOCATION OF TIME TO CONSIDER SECOND READING STAGE OF BILL C-86

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I move pursuant to Standing Order 78(3):

> That in relation to Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, not more than one further sitting day shall be allotted to the consideration of the second reading stage of the bill, and that 15 minutes before the expiry of the time provided for government business on the allotted day of the second reading stage consideration of the said bill, any proceedings before the House shall be interrupted if required for the purpose of this order, and in turn every question necessary in order to dispose of the second reading stage of the bill then under consideration shall be put forthwith and successively without further debate or amendment.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Knowing how important this issue is to members from Toronto, I find this motion strange coming from a Toronto member. We should be taking more time to go through all aspects of this debate.

Mr. McDermid: Mr. Speaker, yes, it is true I come from the Toronto area, from Brampton, where this bill is urgently needed, urgently required. The regional and local governments have asked that it be passed expeditiously and that is what we are doing. We are getting it into committee so we can have witnesses and get this bill through as soon as possible so we can take the necessary action.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

(Division No. 222)

YEAS

Members

Anderson	Andre
Atkinson	Beatty
Belsher	Bernier
Bird	Bjornson
Blais	Blenkarn
Bosley	Bouchard (Roberval)
Bourgault	Brightwell
Browes	Campbell (Vancouver Centre)
Chadwick	Champagne (Champlain)
Charest	Cole
Collins	Corbeil
Corbett	Couture
Crosbie (St. John's West)	Darling
de Cotret	Desjardins
Dick	Dobbie
Dorin	Duplessis
Edwards	Epp
Fee	Feltham
Ferland	Fontaine
Greene	Guilbault
Harvey (Chicoutimi)	Hawkes
Hicks	Horner
Horning	Hudon
James	Johnson
Joncas	Kempling
Koury	Landry
Larrivée	Layton
Lewis	Loiselle
Lopez	Marin
Martin (Lincoln)	Mazankowski
McCreath	McDermid
McKnight	McLean
Monteith	Moore
Nicholson	Plourde
Porter	Redway
Reid	Ricard
Richardson	Robitaille
Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth)	Shields
Siddon	Sobeski
Soetens	Tardif
Tétreault	Thacker
Tremblay (Québec-Est)	Tremblay (Lotbinière)
Valcourt	Van De Walle
Vankoughnet	Vézina
Vien	Vincent
Winegard	Worthy—92

NAYS

Members

Allmand	Anawak
Angus	Arseneault
Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing)	Black
Blaikie	Boudria
Butland	Campbell (South West Nova)
Catterall	Dingwall
Dionne	Edmonston
Finestone	Fisher
Fontana	Foster
Fulton	Gagliano
Grey (Beaver River)	Heap
Jordan	Kaplan
Karpoff	Keyes
Kilger (Stormont—Dundas)	Kindy
Kristiansen	Langdon (Essex—Windsor)
MacAulay	Maheu
Marchi	McCurdy
McGuire	Milliken
Mills	Mitchell
Nystrom	Pagtakhan
Peterson	Proud
Rideout	Riis
Rocheleau	Skelly (North Island—Powell River)
Stewart	Stupich
Tobin	Walker—50

PAIRED MEMBERS

nil/aucun

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I declare the motion carried.

* * *

[Translation]

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Friday, June 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope, and on the amendment of Mr. Allmand:

That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:

Bill C-86, an Act to amend the Immigration Act and other Acts In consequence thereof, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Resuming debate. The Hon. Minister of Transport.

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address this House today in support of the amendments that my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, recently proposed to the Immigration Act.

These are changes which will ensure that Canada continues to prosper from the skills and talents new Canadians have always brought to this land and benefit from their unifying spirit of commitment to Canada.

I believe that immigration is the cornerstone of our national heritage. It has made an invaluable contribution to Canada's social and economic well-being and to our success in nation building.

Three core objectives lie at the heart of our immigration policy. The reunification of families and the protection of refugees are central elements.

Equally important is the concern that immigration contribute to our national prosperity by attracting those with the particular skills and talents Canada requires. Balancing these three objectives is what effective management of our immigration program is all about.

Canadians—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for a few moments, but I ask for the co-operation of both sides of the House so that those listening to us, and also the Chair, can follow the speeches attentively. I again recognize the hon. Minister of Transport.

Mr. Corbeil: Canadians are naturally drawn to an immigration system that balances our compassionate instincts as a people with our pragmatic requirements as a nation. However, much has changed in the 16 years since the Immigration Act was passed in 1976.

Global political and economic conditions are far from stable. Regional conflicts, environmental disasters, economic collapse have all spurred on unpredictable, large-scale movements of people. Some estimate that as many as 80 million people are on the move world-wide. This all adds up to ever increasing pressures and stresses on the immigration programs of virtually every industrialized nation.

How will the world community respond to the rising tide of migrants? How will Canada respond? Canada has not been standing still. A little over two years ago, the federal government consulted widely with a broad cross-section of Canadians. Our discussions then were about what would be required to meet the challenge. We asked ourselves a number of questions.

• (1250)

How many people does Canada need to meet its economic needs and its international obligations to refugees? Which individuals with which backgrounds, education and skills does Canada want to attract? What steps must be taken to ensure that the needs of new immigrants do not outstrip our ability to provide for them? What tools do we need to help immigrants integrate into our society?

The result of those consultations with different individuals was a five-year immigration plan. We are now in the second year of that plan, which has been approved by the great majority of Canadians. Today, Canada has the highest immigration rate per capita of any nation in the world. One in six Canadians was born outside Canada.

We now accept 250,000 immigrants and refugees each year, three times the number we accepted in 1984. The combined cost to deliver immigration programs across all federal government departments is about $900 million per year; almost a billion dollars.

At the same time, we have maintained our strong commitment to the world's refugee community. Canada's Immigration and Refugee Board is a model of fairness and operational effectiveness that other countries come to study.

The Canadian acceptance rate for those claiming refugee status is the highest in the world. It is more than double the next most generous nation and ten times that of a country like Sweden. Even so, this combined immigration and refugee effort is not enough to satisfy a world awash in a sea of change. Hundreds of thousands, if not millions more would like to come to Canada, far more than we can possibly accommodate.

We have gone a long way with our planning but it is obvious today that new management tools are required. Our current legislative framework or the "rules and regulations" governing the Immigration Act were developed in 1976, in a world very different from today. The system was not designed to withstand the pressures exerted on it by the realities of the 1990s. Those pressures hamper the effectiveness of the program and leave people dissatisfied.

As waiting lists grow longer and the time to process legitimate applicants drags on, the temptation to abuse the system also grows. Our very openness and generosity make the system vulnerable to abuse. Abuse which erodes confidence in the system ultimately threatens the very integrity of the program. Without the tools to manage the program effectively in the 1990s, we run the risk of losing the support of the public and the economic and social benefits which immigration brings to Canada.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has proposed a series of changes which will ensure a healthy balance among those traditional cornerstone groups of our immigration program.

While the program will continue to favour the family class and provide strong support for refugees fleeing persecution, we will also place a renewed emphasis on the independent and business class immigrant whose skills, talents and acumen are so necessary to our economic prosperity.

What the changes will do is allow us to control the categories and numbers of new immigrants more effectively. We will achieve more certainty in our planning. Greater certainty means fewer delays in processing, more predictable processing times and greater fairness for newcomers.

Specifically, we are proposing the introduction of three management streams for selecting immigrants. Our objective is to eliminate backlogs which drain our resources and reduce our flexibility to assist others.

Stream one would be open–ended, with no fixed limit on the number of applicants. The department would be committed to processing individuals according to specific time frames. Spouses and dependent children will benefit most from this change.

Streams two and three would have established ceilings for groups within each stream and have limited commitments to processing times. Once ceilings were reached, no more applications would be accepted.

We also intend to take steps which will accelerate the refugee status determination process. A single–stage hearing process will reduce processing times, cut administrative costs and allow the independent Immigration and Refugee Board to target its resources more effectively. This is a change recommended by Canada's Auditor General and supported by the chairman of the IRB.

Genuine refugees should be able to get on with their lives as quickly as possible. The sooner decisions are made on claimants' status, the sooner refugees can get off social assistance programs and become fully contributing members of their community.

The new procedures will allow convention refugees to be "landed" more quickly and take up employment sooner. The proposals would permit the spouse and dependent children of the applicant to be processed at the same time as the successful claimant.

The department hopes to cut the processing time for landed status to an average of six months.

The changes we are proposing will ensure that we have a fair, balanced and effective immigration system attuned to the realities of the 1990s, which continues to satisfy our compassionate instincts as a people and meets our pragmatic requirements as a nation.

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce): Mr. Speaker, I listened very attentively to the minister. In his speech nowhere did he deal with any of the major, specific issues in the bill. He is supporting the bill.

For example, I would like to ask him, in the bill authority is given to the government to impose a place of residence on an immigrant coming to this country as a condition in the immigration visa. We have always had incentives to encourage immigrants to go to certain parts of the country where their trades and professions were needed and that is acceptable.

I ask the minister, how can he support a clause in the bill which would impose on the immigrant that he or she must live in a certain city or district of Canada when the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in article 6 says that a citizen or a permanent resident can live in any part of Canada, can work in any part of Canada, can move to any part of Canada?

I ask him that question and I hope that he can give us a good answer.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned earlier, the purpose of the amendments to our immigration legislation proposed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration is to change certain aspects which over the years have created problems and also to adjust the number of immigrants we receive now and whom we welcome with warmth and generosity, so as to meet Canada's economic and social concerns, in the 1990s.

I think it is entirely in order to respond to certain questions and comments that have been raised regularly by Canadians to the effect that we should try to direct immigrants towards locations where they are more likely to adjust to prevailing economic and social conditions and to meet specific needs.

I think the Minister of Employment and Immigration made an excellent suggestion in his draft amendment, because once again, the purpose of all these new measures is to adjust our immigration program to changing political, economic and social realities.

• (1300)

[English]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I would like to follow up on the question of my hon. colleague.

The government is saying essentially that it is willing to entertain all sorts of challenges, that charter challenges are something which could very successfully be challenged. At the same time, just barely a few weeks ago we dealt with the question of a referendum where the government said: "Whoa, hands off. We are very reluctant to move in this direction with a referendum bill because we do not want to have a challenge under the charter."

Now either it is soliciting challenges or it is not. The government is not concerned about challenges under the charter as far as immigrants are concerned but it is concerned when it comes to citizens of this country who are not immigrants. Government cannot have it both ways.

Either government is fully aware this is going to lead to a number of charter challenges and is going to bog down the system even more, or the legal advisor of the government said this would not create charter challenges. Quite frankly, I would like to see the government table any of this legal advice or opinion where it says this type of activity or legislation on the part of the government would not engender charter challenges because I think the lawyers would be wrong.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, Canada has always been a welcoming nation. I said earlier that we must adapt our immigration laws to the new realities of the 1990s. When it has been explained to prospective immigrants that there will be certain limitations regarding their place of residence for a certain time, we are firmly convinced that once they are here, they will accept those conditions. In fact, these changes were proposed following wide-ranging consultations among various groups in this country and were welcomed by a large number of Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister and first I want to say to him and to the people of Canada that we are not opposed to improving, streamlining or making the Immigration Act of this country better than what it is. We have difficulty with the fact that a very complex bill is being jammed through the system so quickly. It is tough to comprehend all aspects of this.

My question is with respect to the part of the minister's speech where he said that we are going to be able to better control the movement of new immigrants. Under the proposed amendments to the new Constitution we are basically giving immigration to the provinces. That means there will be provincial immigration operations right across the country. The provinces will all be doing their own thing. What mechanism will we have as a national government to correct any abuses to the immigration system once we pass on this immigration responsibility to each of the provinces? Is there any part of this amendment or this act which covers that?

[Translation]

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, since as yet there has been no agreement on a new distribution of powers in a renewed Canada, these problems will be dealt with under our current immigration legislation, on the basis of the distribution of powers as it exist today. As soon as these powers are to be transferred in some way or another to the provinces, we will deal with the problem at that time and make the appropriate arrangements.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): For a short question, the hon. member for Mount Royal.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, being aware of the fact that a short question is all that is allowed, let me ask the minister if there is a potential for a challenge under the charter with respect to mobility rights. If I do not necessarily accept to go or if I do accept to go and I do not like it, do I have the right to leave before the two years you are imposing? Yes or no.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbeil: Mr. Speaker, we do not think there could be a challenge under the charter, since these conditions would be freely accepted and freely contracted by people who would agree to enter Canada under this new system.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in the second reading of Bill C–86, which is the very extensive and elaborate immigration legislation, a fact our critic certainly pointed out quite articulately on Friday. The bill is 113 pages long and comprises some 128 sections. Simply from a process viewpoint, having nothing to say about substance, from a clearly procedural point it is highly offensive that we are approaching such a sensitive area in such a callous manner.

Additionally, we are moving from first reading to second reading without even taking a breath because this morning the government imposed closure. It gives parliamentarians little or no chance to even begin to digest the essence of Bill C–86. More important, it does not give enough time at the second reading stage for Canadians to become partners in the equation rather than dealing with them as abstract observers to the entire situation.

It is regrettable. The critic for the Liberal Party of Canada and the Liberal caucus stressed this position on Friday and articulated the concerns the Liberal Party has as well as some of the minor improvements that had been made within the body of Bill C–86.

When we discuss immigration we are discussing one of the most emotional areas of federal public policy; emotional because we are saying who can come and who cannot come into the country and the reasons for those individuals not being able to come or to stay.

There is nothing more difficult than for members of Parliament to go back to their constituencies where immigration is a very important item and to be the messengers of those negative decisions whether it be for a student who wants to come here to study, a visitor for a marriage or a funeral, a refugee who has no other option but to be deported, a Canadian who cannot have his brother or sister join his family here. It is a very emotional area and yet at the same time, for the last number of years, it has probably been one of the most mismanaged areas of federal public policy. A wide array of ministers for immigration have brought with them new priorities, new directions. This has caused a great deal of frustration, not only in the immigration constituency but for Canadians coast to coast to coast.

Nothing has highlighted that mismanagement more than the entire refugee determination process, a process that has lacked management. This government wants to come across as a government that wants to get tough with refugees and wants a system that is going to be respected. It has been the manager of this so–called new system.

Look at the refugee backlog. How many millions of dollars have been spent? Count the years that people have not been able to see their own families, people who get refused and then do not get deported at the end of that day. The system is clearly breaking down. The architect of this system is not some former government, the architect of this system, which is being changed again, is in fact this government.

• (1310)

We have to wonder sometimes whether the government has the best interests of the immigration dossier at heart or whether it is playing fast and loose with this dossier against the interests of Canadians across the country, all for political expediency.

If we cast our minds back a few summers ago, there was a clear example of utilizing that dossier in the very worst way. That famous summer, 157 migrants landed off the east coast of this country. Rather than dealing with them in a rational, professional way of giving due process, this government, and this Prime Minister, called it "a national emergency" and then called an emergency sitting of Parliament to deal with 157 people.

In 1980, we—and I say we—government and Canadians, accepted 100,000 Vietnamese boat people just as one single movement, apart from all the other classes of immigration during those years. That is in the best interests of trying to educate a country, of trying to bring Canadians along to accepting these immigrants and the positive things they will be doing for our country. Yet, only a few years later, this same country, this government, said halt to 157 people because it is a national emergency.

What really happened was the government was very low in the polls, some Canadians were excited and traumatized by these 157 boat people, and the government took full advantage, exaggerated the situation, blew it out of proportion, and gave the word refugee a black eye in this country, a black eye they have still not recovered from and a black eye that is getting darker by the day.

It is easy for the government to bring in a bill and say that it wants to control the situation, it wants people to respect the laws. Who is saying anything different? We have told successive Tory ministers of immigration the very same thing and they promised an expedient, fair system that would not weigh upon the Canadian government or the Canadian taxpayers. We have been waiting almost seven years for that better mousetrap to begin to work.

It is particularly easy for this government to try to give the impression that it is acting tough, particularly during tough economic times. Why? During tough economic times, as we are going through right now, there is always the vulnerability among Canadians who are unemployed to look at immigration in a negative fashion, to say that rather than bringing in new immigrants, why do we not allow unemployed Canadians to get their jobs back first, and when times are better we will think about opening the doors a little wider.

That is why the timing of this bill is no coincidence. The government is trying to project a sense of professionalism and of concern, yet over the seven years it has had ample opportunity to act and it has not taken the opportunity of doing so. We have to be very careful not to give in to the myth that just because we are down in the economic cycle we should not invite new Canadians to join in the rebuilding of the economy and of the country. Most studies that have been done during good times and bad, particularly the latter, show consistently that net migrations of people to Canada, at the end of the day when all the factors are put into the equation, is a net creator of jobs. At the end of the day there is a net number of immigrants who become entrepreneurs, who establish businesses, who take risks and who give jobs to other people. They become consumers and therefore consumer spending and consumer demand goes up. Last, those people, quite frankly, also take jobs that perhaps you and I do not wish to do.

Therefore, in the fine line between myth and reality, when we talk about the most sensitive and emotional areas of public policy, namely immigration, we need to be very careful about the messages that we as a Parliament are sending out. Immigration to this country has played a very significant and over-all a very productive and positive force in building the country that we have built thus far.

What we also have to continue to strengthen is the view that we are not asking people to come to Canada because we feel we have to do that for various cultural communities, but we have to strengthen the idea that immigration is one of those building blocks that we need to continue to rely on if we are to enjoy the standard of life that we have come to know as Canadians. The Canadian population is relatively small and it is an aging population. The birth rate is dwindling. The economy needs people that sometimes our schools and academic institutions are too slow to produce. Therefore, immigration is not the be all and end all, but it is clearly one positive answer to the needs of a country and the future of a country.

While we have to be stern and disciplined in having our immigration laws respected, we must be very careful to create laws that are not based on perception or myths. Unfortunately, this government, when it has come to the whole public policy of immigration, I believe as one member of Parliament on this side, has preferred to base its rationale on perception and myth rather than promoting the reality of this situation and giving Canadians a law that responds to those realistic attributes of immigration.

As I mentioned, the bill is 113 pages long. Given my limited time, I cannot begin to deal with every facet of the legislation, but I am going to highlight three general directions that I think are some cause for concern.

The first one is that the Conservative government continues to be preoccupied with, quite frankly, it dominates much of their agenda, the fast-tracking and increasing the proportion of of immigrants with entrepreneurship and investment dollars. By that I do not mean that I or my party are against that category because in fact it was our party that created that immigration class within the Immigration Act. At the same time, the Liberal Party was prepared to put that class in a certain perspective. One of the first things that this government did in 1984, after assuming power, was double the number of immigrants with some cash.

There is nothing wrong with people who have made a buck. There is nothing wrong with people who create jobs and help the economic prosperity of a country. However, it is wrong if the message that goes out far and wide is that it is easier to come to this country if your pockets are deep than if your pockets are shallow. That clearly is a perception and a reality that has gone out from the first day that this government assumed power. There is a double standard at play that contradicts the history of immigration in this country.

• (1320)

The history of immigration for this country has been that for many people, the vast majority of people, including my own parents, who had come to this country, their pockets were very shallow. Their hearts, however, were very big and their willingness to build for themselves and their families and their country was unchallenged and unquestionable. In the process, those immigrants who are now Canadian citizens today not only give thanks to a country like Canada but they reciprocate that thanks and that loyalty by giving back to the country and by building a foundation that is unshakeable.

If the same laws were in place post-Second World War, many of those people would not have had the opportunity of coming to this country. Many of those people would not have been able to realize their dreams in that period. If that had been the case, Canada would not have been able to found itself on people who did not have the big dollars but, as I mentioned, had shallow pockets and big hearts.

Therefore we have to be very careful in creating that double standard because an instant doubling or tripling of wealthy immigrants has had ramifications. In posts abroad I have visited as a former immigration critic for my party, I have talked to managers of those immigration operations and they have had to pull people, their visa officers, off other desks such as visitor visa or family class in order to facilitate the doubling and the tripling of quotas imposed by this government.

Not only have we had a preoccupation with trying to search for immigrants who are wealthy, but that has also played in a negative way against the other streams of immigrants just as worthy if not more.

Therefore what I have been advocating and what I advocate again is not to do away with that class but to put a greater perspective on it and not allow that entrepreneurial wealthy immigrant class to impose negatively and to have smaller numbers in our other classes of immigration so that we can satisfy those individuals with money. The second problem is that there is little follow-up in this country to ensure that the wealthy immigrant who has promised to build a mousetrap factory in Downsview, Ontario actually does so. There is little to no follow-up in order to ensure that that mousetrap has been built.

We get tougher on immigrants who do not have proper documentation than on the person who got a visa to build that mousetrap and who has not built it. Those individuals are not asked to leave. That follow-up is not done.

Not only are immigrants buying themselves into this country but in the end of it they are getting it free of charge because they have not put up the investment they promised.

That is the first concern with the preoccupation to help those who are only defined by the dollar sign. We have to take the program back, put it in perspective, ensure the follow-up and let us not let it undermine the other classes of immigration.

A second concern I have with the general direction of Bill C-86 is the whole question of family class. The government purports in Bill C-86 to try to accelerate the family unification but that is only the immediate family class. It says nothing or does nothing essentially for the extended family. If you compare the results from 1984 to the present you will find that the proportion of family class and extended family class base immigrants is much smaller than prior to 1984.

There is a very good reason for that. Previous Liberal administrations founded their policy on the cornerstone of family class immigration. There was good reason for it. We believe that it causes an immigrant to be a lot more at ease with himself or herself. You will have a more successful immigrant. You will have the family playing a role that sometimes the state is asked to play and you will have a more successful process of immigration.

The Chair mentioned that my time is limited. My third component is going to be the refugee component. This government really makes an art out of trying to pick on the most vulnerable in our society by returning to the safe third country concept and also by trying to make it more difficult to obtain refugee status.

I had wanted to say a lot more about this third element because what it is trying to do when it says streamline is minimize the number of applications in the refugee determination system. That is not the goal nor should it be the objective of the legislation. The goal of the legislation should be to have a good system in order to arbitrate who is and who is not a refugee and not to eliminate or streamline based on forbidding a number of people access. It is like saying we want to improve the hospitals by saying who we are going to admit as a person who needs help and who we are not going to admit.

I suggest that you cannot do that.

I would care to go on longer, if the House sees fit, or take any questions from members.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Finance and Privatization)): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member with great interest and I agree with him that there are a tremendous amount of myths out there and not facts on immigration. I agree whole-heartedly with what he said about immigration creating employment and being very important for our country, coming from an area like Brampton which is probably one of the fastest growing areas of Canada today and largely because of immigration which is very positive for the area.

He is right that a lot of people have misconceptions of immigration.

The hon. member was a little critical of the management of our refugee system, which we have had difficulties with. I am the first one to admit it. This is to try and alleviate some of the problems that we have experienced over the years in the refugee process. It was not only our government, it was the previous government as well that had a tremendous backlog of refugees when it left office. It is not only the current administration. We have had these problems.

The hon. member will know that other countries are having the same problems. Refugees are on the move today like never before. What we are trying to do is assure ourselves, and I think Canadians want to be assured, that the people who are coming in to Canada are legitimate refugees. There are a tremendous number of what we call economic refugees who do not fit into the United Nations definition of a refugee. What we are trying to do is assure that those who come here are legitimate refugees.

I think the hon. member will agree—coming from Toronto he knows—that there have been some problems there with fraud, not only in the immigration end of things but from that it goes into welfare fraud. That has been a major concern to the municipalities which have asked for some of the parts of this particular bill, especially the identification of those who are coming in. Heretofore we had no way of keeping track of them.

I want to ask the hon. member one specific question. He is absolutely right that immigration creates employment, economic activity and so on, and yet he criticizes this government and he talks about entrepreneurial class and so on.

Would he give the figures from 1991 to the House on family class, on refugees and on entrepreneurial class? If he does not have them on hand I will make sure he gets them. Second, can he explain why the Liberal government in 1984 cut back immigration to 80,000 people, whereas our goal this year is 250,000 and last year 200,000 new immigrants came to Canada?

If it is so important, and the Conservatives have bungled it as he likes to portray, can he tell us why the Liberals cut back so dramatically?

Mr. Marchi: I thank my hon. friend from Brampton for a number of questions.

First, on the refugee situation the minister says that the government is interested in trying to keep the illegitimate refugees out of the country. Members from all sides agree with that.

• (1330)

When you have in a system a person who says he is a refugee, it should be taken as the most serious and sensitive statement that one can make under our Immigration Act because it basically says that his life or that of his family is in the balance because of his religious or political views. Every member on this side agrees that those refugees who are fraudulent and who are allowed to stay undermine the authenticity of the real, legitimate refugee who needs refuge. There is nothing that has stopped this government from keeping those individuals out.

The minister points out that there is this legislation now that is going to all of a sudden allow it to do something it could not have done up to now. Obviously the minister does not know the bill or if he does he is certainly not giving us the straight goods. This government under the Immigration Act and under Bills C–84 and Bill C–55 had all sorts of powers to do that.

The fact of the matter is that this government has imposed a refugee determination backlog system that we, since 1986, have said is not working. Instead, it continues to spend millions. It continues to appoint refugee board officials. It continues to deny people work permits. It continues to deny people seeing their own families. All for what? Even the people who were denied were not deported in the end.

This government, which wants to give a perception that it is Mr. Tough Guy with refugees, was not serving the refugee, the taxpayer or this country. We have told the government that.

It is still in that backlog clearance program that it said was only going to take a year and only cost $75 million. It has now taken three or four years and we are in the hundreds of millions of dollars.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the member for York West. We should remember the fact that with the exception of our native peoples, we are all immigrants to this country. We have to treat this issue in a very sensitive way.

The member is a former critic on immigration and has been working with this issue for many years. My question has to do with the staffing. He knows, being a Toronto member, that probably 90 per cent of our work as members of Parliament today is taken up with immigration cases.

An hon. member: Is that all?

Mr. Mills: The member from Ontario asks if that is all. He agrees with us.

The problem that I have with this amendment procedure that we are debating in the House today is that the minister on Friday would not acknowledge that he needed more staff; in other words, that aspect of these amendments which is going to try to streamline and push the paper through so we can maybe go on looking after some of the other problems of the other 90 per cent of our constituents.

I do not see anything in this amendment or in the government's attitude which will help those public servants who are working on these problems to try to get the paperwork done so that people can get off social assistance and into the work force.

We have people who have been sitting around in Toronto, as the hon. member well knows, waiting for months and months trying to get their landed papers. The system is being shut down, I believe, because of lack of proper support staff in the department.

I wonder if the member could comment on that.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, the member for Broadview—Greenwood makes a very clear and very obvious statement that this government is not putting resources in its department to expedite the claimants, be they landed immigrants or refugees. They cannot even obtain their Canadian citizenship because there is such a barrage and a backlog on that front. At the same time, the government does not allow people to even work.

This minister from Brampton has the audacity to say that those people go on welfare. At least let them work while they are waiting for their status papers. This minister and this government do not give them work permits and then they get criticized for going on welfare. That is the double talk for which this minister and this government have become infamous.

Second, concerning the pressures across the globe, as the member knows, in places like Hong Kong, New Delhi and other various areas that are creating a lot of demand, the problem is that there are not enough Canadian visa officers. They do not have computer systems to try to make due with the situation at hand.

Therefore, if you come from Italy there is a six-month waiting process. If you try to come from Hong Kong or New Delhi or Manila, the waiting period is three, four, five and six years.

What the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood is trying to say is that there needs to be a consistency there and to try to have a response time that is both humane and fair to all individuals, wherever you come from. If you want to increase numbers and you want to do more, you need to put the resources in your program so that you can do what you want to do and not only say it.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, immigration is a complex issue and an important one for Canada.

The bill before us is a complex piece of legislation, more than 100 pages long. In many ways the basic idea behind the legislation is quite simple. Our immigration program should achieve clearly defined objectives efficiently, in a way that is cost effective and in a way that is fair and humane.

In order for it to do this in the 1990s, we need a new framework, one that allows us to set out clear rules, to enforce those rules effectively and to deliver the program with as little red tape and delay as possible.

I want to talk about the enforcement aspects of this legislation and about program delivery. It is important to keep in mind, especially when we are talking about enforcement, that this legislation—and I underline—does not change the objectives of our immigration program; objectives which have been fundamental to immigration in Canada for many years. The government remains firmly committed to the basic social, humanitarian and economic objectives set out in the current Immigration Act.

We remain committed to maintaining a reasonable balance between those objectives as set out in the five-year immigration plan in 1990 and confirmed by the minister last fall. We remain committed to a robust immigration program with the levels set at 250,000 immigrants for this year. These amendments do not change the fundamental objectives of our immigration program. What they will do is allow us to achieve those objectives in an environment very different from that of 1976 when the current Immigration Act was passed.

We need a modern management system, one that will allow us to set clear rules for the selection of immigrants and ensure that the selection process does not lead to bottle-necks and backlogs. That is only part of the story. We also need effective ways to re-enforce the rules fairly, firmly and in the best interests of Canadians.

There is not much point in having rules about whom you bring into a country if you cannot make sure that those rules have consequences. The truth is you cannot have an effective, balanced fair immigration program without an effective enforcement policy. You need enforcement to ensure that the program is meeting its objectives, to preserve the integrity of the ideals that underlie the program and to preserve the integrity of our borders.

Without effective enforcement you cannot have a fair program. You need to ensure the program is really helping those who most need Canada's protection.

Equally important, you put the very safety and security of Canadians at risk. Canada has the most open and generous immigration program in the world and we want to keep that way.

To do so we have to take firm action against those who would mistake our openness and generosity as signs of weakness. We have to face the fact that the world of the 1990s is a world of increasingly sophisticated, internationally organized criminals and terrorists. We have to be prepared to deal with what is now a multi-billion dollar migrant smuggling trade and those who would exploit the misery of people in the most desperate circumstances for their own personal gain.

• (1340)

This legislation includes important amendments to the Immigration Act that will provide new authority to meet the enforcement challenges of the 1990s, including measures that will help immigration officials provide Canadians and our way of life with much better protection.

For example, the medical inadmissibility provisions of the act are intended to protect the health and well-being of Canadians and ensure that people coming into Canada do not place an excessive demand on our medical and social service systems. The proposed amendments will clarify the definition of excessive demand in today's terms and ensure that the medical inadmissibility provisions are applied fairly and without discrimination.

The act currently provides authority to refuse admission to anyone who has been convicted of a crime. What about people who, while never convicted of a crime, are known to be part of a criminal or terrorist organization? These people pose a real danger. Their activities frequently have a global dimension but the current act does not prevent them from coming to Canada.

New measures will strengthen the definition of criminal inadmissibility and allow us to keep out people we know are active in such groups. They will give immigration officers the authority to refuse entry to anyone involved in serious criminal activities.

This legislation will also help those who try to enter Canada under false pretences or who otherwise try to break and circumvent the rules. The best way to stop such people is to intercept them before they get to our borders. That is why the government works closely with the airline industry, helping it to identify counterfeit travel documents and illegal migrants.

The proposed legislation will provide an additional incentive for airlines to work with the government by increasing the penalties for airlines that neglect their duty to determine undocumented passengers.

In some cases people arrive at our borders with travel documents which have a direct bearing on their admissibility to Canada, but at the present time they can simply refuse to show them to immigration officials. The customs officer, on the other hand, can search a Canadian citizen returning to Canada if he is suspected of concealing something as simple as an undeclared bottle of liquor. We think that an immigration officer should have similar authority to conduct a search and the legislation will provide that authority.

For example, someone who asks for protection as a refugee may claim to have no passport and the immigration officer cannot verify that claim even if the officer can clearly see a passport sticking out of the claimants pocket.

The legislation will also allow the use of fingerprints and photographs to establish an applicant's identity. The question of identity is obviously critical in many immigration cases and we need the most effective means available to deal with those cases firmly.

Under the new legislation immigration officers will have increased authority to identify and stop smugglers. This includes increased discretion to detain vehicles.

A number of recent reports by enforcement agencies as well as in the media have highlighted the dramatic increases in organized groups smuggling illegal migrants into Canada. A restructured system of fines will help deal with individuals involved in smuggling. Under the proposed legislation people caught smuggling will face penalties ranging from a $100,000 fine and five years in jail to a fine of $500,000 and ten years in jail.

For people who manage to enter Canada illegally or who have been determined not to have the right to remain in Canada, the legislation provides the tools necessary to ensure their prompt removal. We need to assure Canadians that people here illegally will not remain and that those who enter Canada legally will be held to their promise to respect Canada's laws.

The investigative capacity of immigration officials to identify, document and follow-up on infractions will be increased and made more effective.

There can be no question that examples of abuse undermine the integrity of our immigration system. Abuse also undermines the public's confidence in the value and effectiveness of the immigration program. The measures we have proposed to enforce the law and protect Canadian society will ensure that the immigration system, which has served Canada well for more than a century, continues to deserve the support and confidence of all Canadians.

Public confidence also depends on a program that operates and is seen to operate in a way that is fair, efficient and cost effective. Increasing numbers of people seeking to enter Canada have placed enormous pressures on the program and on the ability of officials to deliver efficient immigration services. As a result, the immigration program has become characterized, in some cases unfairly, by long lines, excessive delays and costly backlogs.

In recent years a number of significant improvements have been made in services provided by immigration offices in Canada and overseas. Response times to requests for information have been shortened and procedures have been simplified. Continued efforts to streamline service delivery along with new administrative procedures will ensure that a high and consistent level of service is provided at all immigration offices.

The steps being taken to improve service include new centralized information centres to allow Canadian residents to find out more quickly what is happening to applications from their families and friends; clear information for applicants about how long it will likely take for a decision to be reached on their applications; increased use in mail-in and drop-off services at Canada Immigration Centres; new application kits for services in Canada which include more timely information, more easily understood forms and additional staff training, particularly on ways to provide clients and interested parties with up to date information about immigration procedure.

The government is also proposing to streamline administrative procedures involved in issuing or renewing documents for visitors, students and returning residents. In many cases existing procedures are either ineffective or involve unnecessary time and expense. These kinds of administrative and service delivery improvements are important but we must recognize that problems in service are in many cases symptoms of deeper problems in the framework of the immigration program itself. This legislation will address those problems.

For example, the new three-tier management system makes it possible to establish clear priorities for processing immigrant applications according to clearly defined objectives. Those dealt with through stream one, for example, spouses and dependent children, would be processed on demand and within a reasonable time; about six months.

Applicants in stream two will be processed on a first come, first serve basis. They will be provided with accurate information on how soon they will be processed.

Those processed in stream three will be selected for excellence. The new authority to turn away applications when levels are reached may be used to reduce backlogs.

The proposed legislation will also make a big difference in the treatment of people claiming refugee status. Those people who have often been subject to long delays, long separations from their families and long periods of economic uncertainty will be processed much more quickly.

We hope to reduce the review process from fourteen months to six months and we will ensure that refugees can be landed within six months. Close family members will be landed at the same time.

It is important to see how all of the basic components of this legislation fit; a better immigration management framework, a streamlined refugee determination system, effective enforcement and improved service. They all work together to achieve the basic goal of a more efficient, fair and cost-effective immigration program.

Developed countries around the world are struggling to come to terms with the realities of immigration in the 1990s. In many countries we have seen a most disturbing trend toward a closed door approach to immigration. It should be made very clear that this legislation is not informed by that attitude.

This government believes that a robust immigration program is good for Canada but we also believe that a robust immigration program is one in which there are clear rules, clearly enforced, designed to maintain the integrity of the program that is vital to Canada's future.

The legislation we have proposed provides the foundation we need today and in the future. I would be happy to answer any questions.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I want to go back to something my friend from Athabasca said earlier in his speech. He mentioned that in some cases even though would-be immigrants had not been convicted of crimes, he would put them in a category of fairly unsavoury people.

• (1350)

I wanted him to elaborate on that because he is potentially treading on fairly dangerous ground once he begins talking about breaching the whole principle of innocent until proven guilty. How far do you carry that?

What constitutes an unsavoury character? Is it the colour of his skin, the kind of clothes he wears or how he wears his hair? Where do you draw the line?

I am sure the member did not want to leave the wrong impression. I say to him by way of feedback that the impression he left was a fairly frightening one. Early in his intervention he was talking somewhat off the cuff and he indicated, maybe unwittingly, that even when people are not convicted of a crime certain conditions ought to apply. I say to him that is a fairly frightening prospect. If that is the kind of ground rule he would envisage, I put it to him that suggestion undermines most of the rest of what he said about a robust policy and a open policy and that kind of thing.

Maybe unwittingly the member let us into his thoughts more than he intended. Before we judge him on that could he tell the House what he meant? Would he maybe give some examples of what types of individuals, though not convicted of crimes, he might seek to keep out of the country.

The second question flows from the first one. Is that kind of thinking to be applied by people already in the country? Do we have a certain broad-brush approach that would judge people even though the courts have not found them guilty of anything? Would we have a broad-brush approach that ostracizes those people? How far does he go with that? Does he advocate maybe deportation for those unsavoury characters? Where does he draw the line?

Mr. Shields: Mr. Speaker, I am always disturbed when someone tries to put a twist or a turn on something that is said very clearly and stated very clearly.

We in Canada today cannot, under the present immigration laws, bar from Canada known drug dealers who have formed cartels. We have no way of keeping them out under criminal activity. It is well known by Interpol and by the international enforcement agencies that they are drug dealers and that they belong to organized drug cartels. It is the same with organized crime in various countries. Interpol and the other agencies know that it is there. We all know the criminal activity that takes place and those who are higher up are insulated from it. It is known but it cannot be proven. Those are the activities that we in Canada are setting up so that we are giving immigration officers an effective way to determine inadmissibility based on those grounds.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Athabasca for a fairly clear setting out of certain matters. I would like him to enlarge on a couple of aspects relating to refugees.

At present in the refugee determination system for those who come to Canada to claim refugee status, they have the preliminary hearing in which most of them are found acceptable to continue on to the second stage hearing. The government has said that it has eliminated that hearing. It has put several elements, including one very controversial one, into the hands of the senior immigration officers at the port of entry.

If a person comes from a country considered not to be a refugee-producing country, he can be sent right back without a hearing under the new proposed act. If he came through a country that is considered to be a country with a fair refugee determination process, he can be sent back to that country under the new system.

My question to the hon. member is would he consider the United States a safe country to which to send back Guatemalan or Salvadoran refugee claimants who had come over land and through the United States to Canada to claim refugee status?

In face of the fact that the United States has generally accepted only 2 or 3 per cent of Guatemalans or Salvadorans claiming refugee status in the States, at least three-quarters of the ones who came to Canada, often more than three-quarters, were found by our refugee board to be genuine refugees. Would the member advocate that if this bill is passed, Guatemalan and Salvadoran refugee claimants coming to a Canadian port of entry through the United States should be sent back to the United States?

Mr. Shields: I want to thank my hon. friend for the question.

He refers to coming to Canada to claim refugee status. I hope he is not inferring that this is the only place that anyone can apply for refugee status. They can apply for refugee status at any Canadian embassy or consulate anywhere in the world. We have many of them and I think he knows that. People coming from Guatemala or San Salvador have other places they can apply rather than the border. The United States I would consider a safe country under the refugee determination system. It has proven that in the past. It has been a very generous country in the past. Whether Guatemalans or Salvadorans would be accepted or sent back to the United States would depend on the individual applying at the border.

I must remind my friend there are other places. You do not have to come to Canada and put your foot on the soil to apply for refugee status. We have been very generous in the past and we are going to continue to be generous in the future. We are not going to turn away genuine refugees who are seeking asylum in this country. We are not going to do that. We are not a people who will do that.

What we are trying to stop and what we are going to stop are the bogus claims that are made. The member is very well aware of the bogus claims that are made right across this country by people who claim refugee status. They are economic refugees but they are not refugees under the definition of the United Nations.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Mr. Speaker, I have a small comment and a question. This is a huge bill, about 100 pages long. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary could indicate to this House whether it would deal with the problem of consultants and con artists who exploit the immigrants or the refugees and whether it would deal as well with conflict of interest.

For instance, in Calgary we had an immigration manager who left a couple of months ago and six weeks later he was already advertising that he was a consultant and he was manager of Calgary's immigration.

Could the parliamentary secretary answer the question?

Mr. Shields: I am not sure that I understand the question, as it was rather garbled.

All I would say is the bill itself is a complex one and all of the issues that he has brought forward are being dealt with in the bill itself and are going to be discussed in committee very thoroughly. We want to get it into committee because of the very detailed work that has to be done over the summer. All of those questions will be answered at that time clearly.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for the opportunity to address the House on the subject of immigration. I am certain that other members will agree with me when I say it is the single most frequently raised issue in many constituencies.

• (1400)

Over the past four years I have heard horrible stories of an immigration system that lacks compassion, understanding and sensitivity to the needs of both Canadian citizens and those who aspire to obtain it.

It is with great disappointment that I read the proposed changes to Canada's immigration law because it is crystal clear to all of us on this side of the House that the government is abandoning any compassion our immigration process may have had.

Mr. Speaker: I regret I must interrupt the hon. member. It being two o'clock the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[Translation]

PROGRAMS ON CANADIAN PARLIAMENTARY SYSTEM

Mr. Marcel Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation decision to help Canadians learn more about their parliamentary system by producing a series of television programs on the subject.

I think it is very important for the public to understand the inner workings of Parliament if they are to understand and appreciate our democratic system, often referred to as an example in other countries. I urge educational institutions to make these programs available, which will show how important it is to have a decision-making centre where everyone is free to express the views of the population he or she represents.

[English]

FAMILY VIOLENCE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the University College of Cape Breton, in collaboration with the Cape Breton Interagency Committee on Family Violence and the Cape Breton Coalition for Sexual Assault Services has been successful in the first level of an application for federal support in the establishment of one of the three community-based research centres on family violence and violence against women.

The UCCB is particularly well equipped to carry out research that is responsive to community needs through its BA program in community studies and through its department of extension and community affairs.

The UCCB research team lead by Dr. Joyce Mannette, Professors Marshall and Claener, working with community groups, social service workers, police, health care workers and others are eager for the opportunity to build further on the excellent work they are already undertaking.

I recommend to the Minister of National Health and Welfare in very strong language that the Government of Canada now honour this request and honour it forthwith.

* * *

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, this past Saturday, June 20, the touring flags of the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs, Proud to be Canadian tour, were united once again in a very moving ceremony at the Terry Fox memorial site in Thunder Bay.

The two flags once flown above the Peace Tower have moved one from the east coast, the other from the west coast, through hundreds of communities across Canada in a symbolic way of uniting our country.

Along with the symbolic Peace Tower flags, there have been over 3 million signatures collected on 600 signature flags. The signatures are those of the young people of our country showing their love for a united Canada from sea to sea.

I commend all of those who participated in the tour with special commendation to the 16,000 Kinsmen and Kinettes across Canada whose efforts show that we truly are proud to be Canadian.

* * *

NCC GREENBELT LANDS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, in the 1960s the federal government had the foresight to protect environmentally sensitive land in the nation's capital with the establishment of the greenbelt lands.

The NCC is the federal agency responsible for these lands. The greenbelt was established to control urban sprawl, provide beauty to the nation's capital, assist municipalities in local improvements such as the cycling paths, the Stoney Swamp, the Pinhey Forest and the Log Farm. They have all added to the enhancement and beauty of the nation's capital.

The people of Nepean are most concerned that the NCC is moving away from that premise.

Does this government plan on continuing the status quo with the Nepean greenbelt lands or does the government plan on putting these lands up for sale?

The majority of us in Nepean clearly do not want the greenbelt chipped away for residential or commercial development.

Can this government assure the people of Nepean, the nation's capital and all Canadians that the greenbelt lands remain as the wonderful breathing space it was created for in the first place?

We want and we deserve and answer.

* * *

[Translation]

STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the federal government will model its Student Loans Program on Quebec's program, which is more efficient, according to senior officials from Treasury Board. According to deputy secretary of state Mark Rochon, Quebec's program is probably the best in Canada.

The federal government has accumulated $960 million in accounts receivable since it started its Student Loans Program in 1964, while Quebec has lost less than $10 million since it started its own program in 1966. Quebec only expunged four-tenths of 1 per cent of bad loans, which works out to $9.1 million. After $2 billion in loans was cashed on April 30, 1989, Quebec recovered most of the loans because it is very careful about expunging accounts receivable.

The Canadian program has a poor record, to say the least: $55 million in accounts receivable will be expunged this year because of failure to trace bad loans. In 1992–93, accounts receivable will total $1 billion.

* * *

[English]

QUEBEC

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, in the July edition of l'Actualité editor Jean Paré writes:

"It is time to face the facts. If after 30 years of agitation for independence, nine years of péquiste government, a referendum, and 10 years of threats, Quebecers still have not separated, it is because they do not want to."

"Very simply, Quebecers love Canada, with a secret, perhaps slightly embarrassed affection. Behind their speeches and periodic bouts of anger, they are Canadians in their hearts. If this country displeased them as much as has been made out, they would have left long ago."

These conclusions are based on a CROP poll which shows that when posed the hard question, the real question: "Do you want Quebec to remain a province within Canada or become an independent country," only 34 per cent of Quebecers opt for independence and 54 per cent choose Canada.

It is important that this House take note of these facts. They teach us that we are not wasting our time looking for the best constitutional offers we can find for Quebec and Canada as a whole.

* * *

THE ECONOMY

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, the recent evidence of growth should give all Canadians confidence in the economy. Many forecasters will be revising their earlier pessimistic forecasts to put them in a range the Minister of Finance has consistently referred to.

Contrary to speculation by some analysts of a double-dip recession, the recovery has now proceeded for four consecutive quarters. The Minister of Finance has consistently forecast that a growth rate for 1992–93 would be in the area of 2 to 2.3 per cent.

We believe he is right.

* * *

ARMENIA AND NAGORNO-KARABAGH

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, the recent events in Armenia and Nagorno-Karabagh have taken a serious turn for the worse. Recently, more than 500 people have disappeared and several hundred civilians, including children, have been injured or killed, all resulting from violent attacks by Azerbaijan.

Azeri motorized battalions, reinforced by heavy artillery and armoured vehicles are reportedly positioned for a large-scale offensive against Armenia. Sources have also reported that Azerbaijan's weapons are being supplied by Turkey, a member state of NATO.

I ask the Prime Minister to communicate Canada's profound concern over Turkish intervention in this conflict, and ask him to urge President Yeltsin of Russia, who still has a significant number of troops in the area, to secure the region and prevent any further Azeri attacks against the people of Armenia or Nagorno-Karabagh.

* * *

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY WEEK

Mr. Brian O'Kurley (Elk Island): As this week has been designated Canadian Occupational Health and Safety Week, I would like to underline how important it is for all of us to focus our attention and give priority to the occupational health and safety issues which are vital to the protection and preservation of the health of working people across Canada.

With the renewal of Canada's drug strategy, a new emphasis in employee assistance programming recognizes the increasing need to be concerned with substance abuse in the workplace. Labour Canada and Health and Welfare will be working in partnership with such organizations as the Canadian Centre on Substance Abuse and the Alliance for a Drug Free Canada to improve the ability of both business and labour to respond to a variety of health issues that may manifest themselves at the work site.

There is clearly much yet to be done and I support the joint efforts of employers, employees and government in achieving the health and safety objectives toward which we are all working.

* * *

CANADIAN COMPETITIVENESS

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, today we learned that despite a year of prosperity initiative propaganda our ranking in the world competitiveness report has dropped from fifth to 11th, behind such industrial powerhouses as Ireland and Finland. Again, our real problem is not the workforce but the people who manage it. Our workers are ranked eighth, our managers fifteenth.

• (1410)

Worse still, in R and D we are 17th. Meanwhile, the actions of the federal government amount to little more than fiddling while the R and D infrastructure burns.

The Science Council has gone. The Prime Minister's promise to double spending on R and D is gone. All we have had is a massive cross-country prosperity show. The Science Council described these consultations as mere proxies for leadership and condemned the lack of government action.

Yes, Mr. Prime Minister, you were right about our being in the junior B league of competitiveness. Clearly what we need is major league management. It is time to fire the coach.

* * *

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the first quarter 1992 results for the economy released by Statistics Canada confirm the recovery is continuing and at an improved pace over that of the second half of last year.

In fact, at a 1.7 per cent annualized rate the output increase in the first quarter was stronger than all analysts had been expecting. Exports were the key source of strength in the quarter with real exports increasing over 15 per cent, reflecting the success of the Canada-U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

It flows as well from the improving competitiveness of the economy instilled by government policies in the restructuring taking place in Canadian businesses.

The evidence of growth in its composition should buoy confidence in the economy. Most forecasters will revise their 1992 annual average growth rates back up to the 2 to 2.3 per cent range. Some no doubt will go higher. This will put them back in the range the Minister of Finance has consistently referred to since Statistics Canada revised 1991 growth after the budget.

The undue pessimism of some forecasters such as the Conference Board will now surely stand in even greater contrast. We are clearly on the right track. We must stay the course. Clearly the Minister of Finance and his predecessor have served Canada well.

* * *

EMPLOYMENT

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, Rudy Wilczek, my constituent, and 25 of his co-workers at Revenue Canada's Pearson airport customs and excise office, postal division, will have a hard time celebrating Canada's 125th birthday on July 1. They will be waiting for the unemployment office to open on July 2 to join the growing list of unemployed people in Toronto.

As of July 1 the customs and excise branch will hand off responsibility for collecting duties on international mail to Canada Post. Canada Post has retained employment agencies and a few students to do the work formerly done by customs and excise officers. The employment agencies will cost more than the officers did.

Worse yet, Revenue Canada, which for months has promised to find jobs for these displaced workers in other divisions issued lay-off notices to them effective July 1. Every time this group of Canadians watches one of the government's expensive feel-good ads for Canada's 125th birthday, they, like many unemployed people in Toronto, cannot help but feel the painful irony of this government.

* * *

OCCUPATIONAL HEALTH AND SAFETY WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of all members of the House the seventh annual Canadian Occupational Health and Safety Week. It began yesterday and continues until this coming Saturday, June 27.

We are moving toward an economy which is becoming increasingly advanced technologically. Consequently, we have to pay more attention to safety and health in the work place. The education and retraining of workers in response to these rapid changes must always incorporate the highest levels of safety awareness.

Strong emphasis must be placed on learning in the modern world of work. Accordingly, this year's theme is "Planning: Your Investment in Health and Safety". Business and labour share a joint responsibility to ensure that all activities related to the work place are studied in a spirit of co-operation. In this way, avoidable accidents can be reduced significantly.

On the occasion of Canadian Occupational Health and Safety Week, I ask my hon. friends to bring the challenges of this issue to their constituents' attention. In so doing, we may all one day be able to point with pride to the commitment which has made us the leading nation in the care and protection of all our workers.

* * *

[Translation]

125TH ANNIVERSARY OF CONFEDERATION

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, in this 125th year of Confederation, it is important more than ever before to celebrate Canada Day, even in the current political climate. There are a number of reasons why we should be optimistic. As we all know, Canada is an exceptionally beautiful country, endowed with exceptional riches. We should never forget that Canada is a democratic society. In a world torn by hatred, persecution and fanaticism, Canadians have always been known for their tolerance. This tradition helped us build a country on half a continent that has become a symbol to all of peace, prosperity, comfort and freedom, so much so that last year we were ranked by the United Nations as the best place in the world in which to live.

In fact, if we look at the news, we realize that our problems are minimal, compared with those endured by most of humankind. By building on our traditions, we will be able to solve our problems and offer a better life to all Canadians.

* * *

[English]

VOYAGEURS '92

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, today's Vancouver Sun contains an article questioning the success of the Voyageurs '92 program. The article draws a damning picture of a last minute program lacking adequate support, organization and community interest. There was a lot of negative and a lot of bunk.

I will tell you about the positive. The Fraser Valley Broadcasters, the Metro Valley Newspaper Group and the Times joined together in a united community media effort to get the Voyageurs off the ground in my riding, and what a job they did.

We have two groups heading off to Pontiac, Gatineau and Labelle tomorrow and are they excited.

We have already seen two groups come to the Fraser Valley and they had a great time. The Sto:lo Nation and Tribal Council put on a cultural extravaganza including, dancing, food, a visit to a First Nations police training centre, a tour of the valley and Vancouver. The groups rode the gondola across Hell's Gate on free passes. The officers at CFB Chilliwack took the kids water skiing on Cultus Lake. There was a trip to Victoria, there was an all-night block party and a barbeque to close things off.

We have churches, veterans associations, schools and service clubs like the Hope Rotary and Lions all working together. This does not sound very negative to me. It sounds like the community got together to celebrate Canada and being Canadian.

A lasting impression was made that will do more for Canadian unity and personal development than all the negative media in the world.

Voyageurs '92, making great Canadian history yet again.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

Throughout the worst recession since the Depression, the government has repeated incessantly that it was not to blame. It repeated that the recession was caused by the world situation and that other countries were also performing poorly.

However, in its 1992 report on competitiveness, the World Economic Forum showed that Canada's competitiveness has fallen from fifth to 11th place. The truth is that Canada's economy fell faster and deeper than in any other comparable country.

How can the Prime Minister deny his responsibility and deny the fact that Canada has the worst growth in goods and services of the industrialized world?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the fact that we have experienced a weak world economy, I think everyone should be encouraged by the first quarter results that have just been revealed today which show there has been a growth of 1.7 per cent in the Gross Domestic Product which indicates that there have been four consecutive quarters of positive growth. I think all Canadians should be heartened by that development. At least we certainly take comfort over here, notwithstanding the fact that we would like to see that growth more robust than it actually is.

With respect to the world competitiveness report, I would remind the hon. member that the data on which this report made its finding is stale dated. It is basically based on last year's evidence when Canada's inflation rate was 6.2 per cent, which was the worst inflation rate in the industrialized world. That has improved to 1.3 per cent.

The hon. member should also take cognizance of the fact that the government has embarked upon a very aggressive competitiveness and prosperity initiative, some of which we are seeing in the growth figures today.

Mr. Tobin: An advertising campaign.

Mr. Mazankowski: We are seeing a 2.5 per cent improvement in productivity in the first quarter of this year.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada confirmed what 1.5 million Canadians have known for the last two years, that this has been the worst and the deepest recession since the Great Depression.

After winning the 1984 election, the Conservative government launched a budget.

• (1420)

In the government's first budget eight years ago, it said its plan was to foster higher investment, greater innovation and increased international competitiveness. Eight years after announcing that plan, Canada has gone into a free fall from fifth to 11th place in international competitiveness.

In the same budget, the Conservatives said: "It is an ongoing priority of this government to encourage much improved research and development performance in Canada".

How does the Prime Minister explain that eight years after this promise, Canada ranked last in research and development among industrialized nations?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is categorically and absolutely wrong when she suggests that this downturn and this recession has been the worst since the 1930s.

She should know, and I will tell her what statistics will reveal. The peak to trough decline in 1981 was something in the order of 5.3 to 5.5 per cent. The peak to trough decline in this recession is something in the order of 3.6 per cent. That is a remarkable difference.

In so far as her point with regard to competitiveness and productivity, I remind the hon. member to look at the data that has been released today. She will find that the recovery is led by merchandise trade, by export trade and by improvements in our productivity. That should be good news to all Canadians.

Ms. Sheila Copps (Hamilton East): Mr. Speaker, his own document from Statistics Canada says: "This is the first time since the Great Depression that the economy has shrunk two years in a row".

It's report card time across this country and the World Economic Forum has issued a failing grade to the Government of Canada. We ranked last in balance of trade. Canada ranks last on export market diversification. We ranked last in research and development. We ranked second last in merchandising training. We ranked second last in manufacturing. We ranked third last in the industrialized world in competitiveness.

How can you claim that your competitive agenda is succeeding when all world indications show that Canada is failing the challenge of competitive economy?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, it is hard to believe the rhetoric of the hon. member because she was in the House last week. She would know that merchandise trade has improved.

As a matter of fact, exports have increased by 15 per cent. That is one of the reasons why we have had a 1.7 per cent increase in Gross Domestic Product in the first quarter of this year. Merchandise trade exports are at a record all-time high for the last two or three months. That is because we have a free trade agreement and because most of that trade is being done with the United States.

It is because we have taken initiatives to improve and enhance productivity and enhance competitiveness. That is why we are producing such good results that will be translated into jobs and further economic opportunity.

* * *

TRADE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, the latest leaked draft of the North American free trade agreement shows that Mexico will not capitulate as Canada shamefully has to U.S. energy demands. Mexico, unlike Canada, will not be forced to make up for U.S. shortages if there is a North American shortage.

Does this government not find it thoroughly embarrassing and thoroughly humiliating that Mexico has cut a better deal on energy than Canada?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is somewhat outdated in terms of what is likely to be in the energy package.

He is looking at or quoting Mexico's early draft. He will find that in terms of the negotiating text that we are now considering there are areas of disagreement. We have no final text. In that final text he will find that we are doing quite well in terms of resolving the energy differences between Mexico, the United States and Canada.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, under this text, which was apparently negotiated two weeks ago, if there are any energy shortages, Mexico will not be forced to divert scarce supplies to the United States, but Canada will.

If the government cannot negotiate a more favourable energy agreement, an agreement which is at least as favourable as Mexico is obtaining under this deal, if it cannot do that, will this government refuse to sign the North American free trade agreement?

An hon. member: Once again Peterson has his facts wrong.

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): I will repeat what I said before, Mr. Speaker.

It is very clear that my hon. friend is looking at an early draft which was not a Canadian draft. I would also like to remind him that there is such a thing as the International Energy Agreement which a previous government signed on behalf of Canada.

An hon. member: Which happened to be Liberal.

Mr. Winegard: It happened to be a Liberal government. There is no question at all, we do not have a final text on energy. Our opportunities are to open up the Mexican market for Canadian goods, including energy.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister.

The minister responding for the Minister for International Trade has just said: "Well we are all dealing with early drafts of the Mexican and NAFTA talks". Perhaps if members of this House and Canadians knew what this government was negotiating instead of being told: "Well nc, after it is signed", we could have an intelligent debate on what is in the NAFTA agreement.

Based on the reports today, it seems clear that this government is intent on taking a bad deal, the Canada–U.S. trade deal, and making it worse in the NAFTA deal by reducing our ability to control Canada's petrochemical energy industry, giving the U.S. more access to our energy resources and reducing Canada's ability to effectively conserve and manage our own energy resources.

Mexicans have had the guts to stand up and say: "No, you will not touch our energy resources". Why does Canada back down and why is Canada giving away our energy resources when Mexico refuses to do so?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the North American free trade agreement will not tie Canada's energy resources closer to the United States. That is another misconception being promulgated by the New Democratic Party that never wanted a free trade agreement in the first place because it is afraid of trade.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): A supplementary, Mr. Speaker.

The New Democratic Party is not afraid of trade. We want fair trade. The minister is afraid of giving a real answer and letting Canadians know exactly what is going on in these trade talks.

[Translation]

The minister knows the Canadian Constitution gives the provinces control over their natural resources. However, it seems the proposed trilateral agreement would include areas under provincial jurisdiction, including that of provincial power companies.

Before going any further, does the federal government intend to consult the provinces about their provincial power companies?

[English]

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, there have been consultations and discussions with the provinces all through the free trade agreement negotiations. The provinces have met with the Minister for International Trade from time to time and they have met with the negotiating team from time to time. There is no question at all that the provinces know exactly where we are going and trying to go in this negotiation.

As far as energy is concerned, I do not understand why the New Democratic Party does not want improved opportunities for Canadians, particularly those from the west, to sell exploration production techniques all to do with the petrochemical industry.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary for the Acting Prime Minister.

It is clear that in the draft that is available, through the news media not through this House of the NAFTA agreements, this government is signing an agreement which appears to extend into areas of provincial jurisdiction, namely to provincially-owned electrical utilities. There is no exemption cited in this chapter for provincial electrical utilities.

I again ask the Acting Prime Minister: Is it this government's intention to encroach on the constitutional right of provinces to control their own resources and utilities, yes or no? Will this government be clear that in fact provinces will have a say in any area that will affect their jurisdiction?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, that is why we have been consulting with the provinces right from the beginning, so that we will not do anything outside of the provincial jurisdiction. We want the provinces to be onside with us. We have made special attempts to have them onside with us. There is no question at all that we want an agreement that will be of benefit to all Canadians and of benefit to those provinces that have the resources.

* * *

• (1430)

ATLANTIC FISHERY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The minister will know that on the great northern peninsula of Newfoundland, and indeed including western Newfoundland, there has been a 67 per cent decline reaching 71,000 metric tons in cod landings over the last seven years and representing the longest and deepest decline in gulf cod landings recorded since 1960 by the federal department of fisheries.

The cod industry in western Newfoundland is in crisis. I want to ask the minister of fisheries what action the Government of Canada is going to take to rebuild the gulf cod stocks and what action, both immediate term and long term, the Government of Canada is going to take to assist the fishermen and fish plant workers who are being dislocated, displaced economically, because of this crisis in the gulf cod stocks.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we are continuing to manage the gulf fishery in accordance with the advice which we receive from CAFSAC and our Canadian scientists.

There has been a considerable decrease in the total allowable catch of the cod stocks in the gulf in the last several years, and in accordance with the scientific advice the total allowable catches have been reduced.

There is not any immediate crisis that I know of in that particular stock at the present time, with the exception that we have had to restrict mobile gear vessels because of the size of the cod that were being caught and because of some other activities which had to be discouraged.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, this member wants to assure the House that I want to work with the minister and with the government, but it is difficult to do that when the minister says there is not any crisis, when landings have gone from over 90 million pounds in 1982 down to 30-odd million pounds in 1991, and when there has been a 67 per cent decline in cod landings.

I want to quote to the minister from a report done for him by his department in December 1990, by William Steele of the program co-ordination and economics in the gulf region office. The report says in its conclusion, and I quote from the minister's own report: "The cod industry in western Newfoundland is in a crisis. The fixed gear fishery in western Newfoundland is at a point of no return if there is no strategy to rebuild the cod stocks in the near future".

That report is 24 months old and the rate of decline has continued over the last 24 months. What has the minister done since December 1990 to halt this crisis in decline in cod stocks? What is he doing now to rebuild those cod stocks and to assist the fishing families who are severely affected by this crisis; yes, a crisis in the cod fishery?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, there are no new figures being produced by the hon. member today.

Ms. Copps: There is no new fish either.

Mr. Crosbie: If I am allowed to answer I will answer. There is nothing new in the figures that have been announced by the hon. gentleman today. These total allowable catches were set some months ago based on the scientific advice we received from CAFSAC, from the Canadian scientists.

Because the hon. member rises in this House and shouts across the House does not make a situation a crisis. The cod stocks in the gulf are certainly cause for worry. Small cod were being caught in large numbers which had to be stopped, particularly by mobile gear vessels. The facts have been known for months and there is no sudden crisis today in the gulf.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, for some reason the minister is choosing today to downplay this problem. He knows that fishery in the gulf and the Atlantic fishery generally are in an absolute tailspin.

He has seen the numbers for 3PN and for 4R. They are even worse than the numbers for northern cod, as bad as they are. I say to him that no other industry in Canada is being so pulverized. This is the prairie drought of the 1930s.

People in his riding and mine are losing their homes. They are having their cars repossessed. They cannot buy the groceries. They need some money now. What is he going to do about it?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, we all know with reference to the northern cod stock that in the province of Newfoundland in particular there is a serious problem in connection with the fishery. We also know other stocks are under heavy pressure.

There is no sudden emergency that has just occurred with reference to other fisheries. There are difficulties in other fisheries as well. We have brought in programs, as we did last year, to meet those difficulties. I refer to the ice compensation program and others that were brought in last year.

Never in the history of Canada since Newfoundland joined it have so many programs been brought in to deal with problems in the fishery. They will continue to be brought in if the problems continue. It certainly seems likely with reference to the northern cod stock.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, all the reports tell the minister the contrary. We tell him the contrary. The fishermen's catches tell him the contrary. If he wants to paint a picture and say it has never been so good, if he enjoys that thought, let him get his jollies from it.

Will the minister answer the question? Fishermen and plant workers in Lawn and St. Lawrence with whom I met over the weekend and people along the southwest coast and the northeast coast in Nova Scotia are all hurting. They are really hurting. They are all asking the same question, and I am going to put it to the minister now, much as they put it to me.

When is the minister going to make a move? They are not talking about a song and dance to say how rosy the picture is. When is he going to make a move, a substantive move? When will he do something for those people at least to keep the wolf from the door for them?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion the hon. gentlemen is not serving the people he represents very well when he tries to exaggerate like this and when he deliberately distorts what I have said.

Has anybody else in the House heard me say how rosy the fishery picture is? Did I say that today?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: Did I say today that never in history has the fishery been as good?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Crosbie: This is the kind of exaggeration that does a disservice to this serious problem in Newfoundland which we are attempting to deal with and which will not be helped by purported hysteria by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

SEXUAL HARASSMENT

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Associate Minister of National Defence.

A woman soldier at CFB Comox has been harassed by superior officers. She has been called a "sexretary", a "biker mama", and asked about her dating habits. She has been subjected to other comments that I cannot even repeat in the House of Commons.

Her allegations of sexual harassment were inadequately addressed through military channels and now she is taking her case to the Human Rights Commission, but she is still being harassed. Her job has been threatened.

What will the minister do now to protect her while the matter is being investigated?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, yes, I am aware of the situation. It is an extremely unfortunate one. While I cannot comment on the individual's situation because indeed she has both redress of grievances in the system as well as a case before the Human Rights Commission, directions have gone out to the base commander to deal with this issue.

I understand certain actions have been taken, but there will be a further investigation to make sure. No woman should have to work in an environment which is poisoned as a result of sexual harassment.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's response, but since this woman went public the women's centre near the base has been inundated with further stories of harassment on military bases; in fact they are coming from all around the province now. One of these women herself is being threatened with a court martial.

The Robichaud human rights case ruled against DND several years ago and said it was a responsibility of DND to provide a work place free of sexual harassment.

What is the minister prepared to do now to stop this harassment and protect women members of the military?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise my hon. colleague that indeed there is a very good policy in place within the Department of National Defence dealing both with the military side and the civilian side.

Of course a policy is only as good as the way in which it is implemented. That is why the chief of the defence staff has taken this issue very seriously. We have incorporated into all of our training exercises for our base commanders just as recently as two weeks ago further information and education on how to provide harassment-free work places. This will be ongoing and every effort is being made to educate individuals about their rights as well as supervisors about their responsibilities to deal with the issue effectively.

* * *

• (1440)

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs.

The government's constitutional plan seems far from certain. While the minister has refused to declare which of the many options he and the government prefer in order to overcome the current impasse, the clerk of the Privy Council is now embarking on a national tour of provincial capitals while the associate clerk is advocating a constitution based on the Belgian model, which would have serious repercussions for our national government role as well as linguistic rights.

I ask the minister quite simply: What is the government's constitutional blueprint and what is the government's action plan that will guide its deliberation in the next and important few days?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister Responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as the House knows, we have made considerable progress on a Canada round of negotiations.

We have progress yet to make on four major issues. One is the Senate. A second relates to the amending formula. A third is to ensure that we have means to bring down barriers to trade in Canada. A fourth is to ensure there is agreement on a package relating to aboriginal Canadians.

At my instruction, the clerk of the Privy Council and other senior officials are meeting today in Halifax with senior officials of the Governments of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

They will meet in Calgary tomorrow with senior officials of the Governments of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and later I believe in Ontario with the Government of Ontario, not to negotiate but to determine where people are on each of those major points.

Then the Prime Minister and I, tomorrow night probably, will come to a view as to the next step we would recommend in this constitutional process. We very much hope that it will be possible for us to achieve agreement among governments.

That is our goal. That is what we are seeking to do. If we can get co-operation from enough governments across the country, as I hope we can, that is the way we will proceed.

[Translation]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister.

I think Parliament has a right to know exactly what the federal government's plans are, and it expects the government to be clear about legislation that is very important to all Canadians.

Why will the minister not reveal the next stage in the federal government's plan? Will there be a First Ministers' Conference? Will Parliament be recalled to consider a new agreement or a referendum? Does this government really know when we can expect an end to this constitutional dilemma?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (President of the Privy Council and Minister responsible for Constitutional Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think a number of things are clear. First of all, sometime after mid-July, the Government of Quebec wants to start public hearings and consideration by the committee which is to examine what the Quebec legislation refers to as Canada's offers. One way or another, the Government of Canada must prepare a Canadian position.

Actually, our government would prefer to have an agreement supported by the other governments in Canada. That is what we are seeking now. However, if it is impossible to get an agreement with the other provinces, then the Parliament of Canada will have to get ready to prepare proposals for consideration by the Government of Quebec.

For the time being, I can give no indication whether there will be another multilateral conference to seek an agreement by the various governments. If it is feasible, if there is a very real possibility an agreement can be reached, then of course the Government of Canada will convene another ministerial meeting to finalize such an agreement.

* * *

[English]

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

We learned this weekend that the federal government commissioned just one independent technical study before it committed $80 million in loan guarantees to the owners of the Westray coal mine.

We also learned that the energy department bureaucrat who conducted the review spent—and I want to underline spent—a meagre 18 hours reviewing safety and other issues at this mine.

Why was the Government of Canada content to spend only 18 hours reviewing the safety aspects before pouring $80 million into the Westray coal mine?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member already has the documentation. It is very clear that the CANMET report, which is the report to which he is referring, was a study of several other reports that had already been done and it was a report that concluded that the mine was technically feasible. It concluded that on the basis of at least three other large reports that were done by consultants.

Mr. David Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, the minister is contradicting his colleague, the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism somewhat. He said in the House on June 5, and I quote: "We did further studies of a technical type in order to make sure that our loan guarantee was reasonable".

We now know exactly the technical study which was done. It was an 18-hour review consisting of nine pages authorizing $80 million for the Westray coal mine.

Again I ask the question of the Deputy Prime Minister. Why was the Government of Canada content with only an 18-hour review, a nine-page summary of information with no further technical studies done to pour $80 million into the Westray coal mine? Why was there such gross negligence by the Government of Canada?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows, because he has had the documentation available to him for some time, that every party in the negotiation had its own interest. We had to be able to insure the bank loan.

We had the CANMET review. Eighteen months after the CANMET review we provided financial assistance for this project. ISTC undertook detailed economic and financial investigations of this project. The Bank of Nova Scotia undertook detailed technical, economic and financial investigations. The Government of Nova Scotia undertook to ensure that this project could be done, was technically feasible and could be done safely.

* * *

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mrs. Louise Feltham (Wild Rose): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. Many Canadians agree that Canada has too many military bases and that military bases must be closed.

The panel formed to provide guidance for the process has recommended that the decisions for closing bases be established on the basis of national security and not on considerations of regional development.

When future closures of military bases are made, will these closures be in line with the recommendations of this committee?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister Responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, as my hon. colleague knows, the work which that committee did was excellent and the report has now gone to the Standing Committee on National Defence and Veterans Affairs which has been hearing witnesses on it.

We will obviously await the recommendations of that committee. Our own department is reviewing the recommendations, as will other departments as it has implications for them as well.

Once this process is completed I hope we will have in place a good process by which we can evaluate the requirements for future bases. Until that process is in place, the minister has already indicated that there would be no base closures until that matter is finalized.

* * *

PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk—Red River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a question to the President of the Treasury Board.

As the minister knows, the Minister of Public Works brought forward a submission to refurbish St. Andrew's lock and dam and the submission was put over for further review. The minister also knows that the most recent safety report on the bridge states that the best case scenario is that the bridge would have to be closed by the end of this calendar year if not sooner.

With the greatest respect, I would like to ask the minister, what further review is necessary, what timeframe has been assigned this review and when will this issue once again be reviewed by Treasury Board?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question. I appreciate his concern.

We are reviewing the over-all program of public works. In the absence of the Minister of Public Works I would like to say that this particular department is monitoring very attentively the conditions of the structure and it is carrying out the emergency repairs as they are needed.

That being said, we are also aware that there will be ongoing discussions with the Government of Manitoba and they will discuss the future of this facility.

* * *

WESTRAY MINE

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of energy and it concerns the Westray mine.

• (1450)

Given that of the thousands of pages of documents tabled in this House, the only ones referring to a report by and for the federal government relate to the so-called 18-hour report, and given that there were a number of requests filed through access to information for the release of materials on the federal role in the Westray mine, will the minister assure the House that any information released will automatically be tabled in the House or with the Clerk of the House if the House is not in session?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, once again there seems to be some implication that the CANMET report was not a significant report. The CANMET report surely was significant because it reviewed at least three major technical papers having to do with whether this mine was feasible or not.

In terms of tabling information we are, of course, prepared under the Access to Information Act to look at whatever is available.

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker my supplementary question is for the same minister.

It is rather interesting that there is such heavy emphasis put on the CANMET report, when of the approximately 1,000 pages which were tabled, a mere nine concerned the CANMET report.

Given that Justice Richard, appointed by the Nova Scotia government to examine the Westray mine disaster, has indicated that he does not have jurisdiction to examine the federal government's role at Westray, will the minister explain what the process will be to allow for a full examination of the role of senior public servants opposed to the mine, the involvement of the Minister of Public Works in pushing for the mine and of the involvement of the Prime Minister?

Hon. William C. Winegard (Minister for Science): Mr. Speaker, both Judge Richard and the inquiry council have said that they are satisfied with the mandate of the inquiry. They have indicated they will inquire into the federal involvement in the Westray mine where they believe it is necessary. Of course, we will co-operate with the inquiry. We have always said we would co-operate with the inquiry.

* * *

[Translation]

STUDENT LOANS PROGRAM

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State.

This year, the Government of Canada will expunge $55 million in accounts receivable because of its failure to trace people who default on their loans under the Student Loans Program. We are talking about $55 million in taxpayers' money.

Will the minister establish a line of authority this year for the recovery of student loans, because today, the banks, the universities and a number of students could not care less about taxpayers' money?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that I have already started discussions with the provinces, students and other groups for the purpose of improving the process.

There are problems with the program. We are aware of the problems and we know the rate of loan defaults, but I have also started negotiations with financial institutions to develop a new financial structure for the program, in order to reduce payment defaults and make the program more efficient.

I can give all members of this House the assurance that this thorough review of the program is progressing very well and that by the end of the year we will be able to make an announcement in this respect.

[English]

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Last week the Solicitor General told us that occasionally he is required to be aware of the names of former CSIS informants on a need to know basis. However, he did not say anything about previous solicitors general or their political staff.

Will the minister tell this House whether the CSIS targeting committee was ever forced to permit the presence of political staff at its meetings between 1986 and 1990, thereby allowing the names of informants to be disclosed to these staff?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, naturally I am not in a position to say what happened under previous solicitors general. I have no reason to believe there has been any change in the process that would lead to the conclusion my hon. friend has made.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, will the minister agree today to assist us on this, to provide to the subcommittee on national security the rules governing informants and will he assure Canadians now that information about informants has not been used for any political purpose by his office or by the offices of members of cabinet?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that if he wishes to enter into discussions with the Security Intelligence Review Committee on that particular matter, I am sure its members can apprise him of whatever information is available which it is possible to reveal.

* * *

MEDICARE

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Immediately after last week's meeting of the federal and provincial ministers on medicare, the minister publicly questioned the high cost of providing medicare to the elderly.

Could the minister please indicate to the House why he has singled out the elderly? Does he not understand that these people have paid for medicare all their working lives so they would not have to worry about some government in their future deciding they are too old to be taken care of?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that is quite an extension to what I said last Thursday.

I will explain to my colleague that first, figures were provided by the province of Manitoba minister which showed that 50 per cent of the cost to the health care system is due to costs for people over 70 years of age. But I said, and he should know this, that there is no way the health care system which we have today, based on the five principles, will not apply to senior citizens. It means that any request for care by a senior citizen under the Canada Health Act will be provided. There is no reason to make any cuts.

We must consider the appropriateness of the ways and means we use money at all levels, particularly at this one. It does not mean that the ministers said there would be cuts. They said they will make an analysis of expenses to see the way to do it.

I repeat what I said, I confirm and I will always say that the five principles will apply, particularly to senior citizens.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister. The minister will know that when he introduces facts like 50 per cent of the cost goes to people over the age of 70, those people are sitting there listening to the minister speak and are very concerned about whether or not they are going to be under additional pressure.

The minister will also know that he has a responsibility to all Canadians under the Canada Health Act, despite pressures coming from the provinces, to defend medicare for everyone.

I would ask the minister to assure the House that he is not about to introduce any amendments to increase the so-called flexibility to the provinces.

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I repeat, I never said that.

May I ask the member something? How does he think the senior citizens consider a member who, when the minister said something is not true, repeats time after time that the minister said that? What do we call that kind of member?

* * *

[Translation]

FRENCH-LANGUAGE COLLEGES IN ONTARIO

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Last week, the Government of Ontario announced at the convention of the Association canadienne-française de l'Ontario that the provincial government intended to help fund two French-language colleges in Ontario. When will the federal government also announce that it is taking part?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, negotiations not only with the Government of Ontario but also with other governments are going well. Agreements in principle have been negotiated. Funding, specifically the amounts to be allocated, is being discussed. The government will make an announcement on this in a reasonable time, further to the discussions that have taken place so far.

[English]

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, there is great concern in the francophone community in Ontario about the fact that some 50 per cent of those who participate at the elementary and secondary level drop out at the post-secondary level. They are anxious to know when this government is going to make its announcement that it has committed itself, as has the Ontario government, to the quick initiation of these two colleges.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (Secretary of State of Canada): Mr. Speaker, negotiations have been ongoing for six to eight months with Ontario, as they have with other provinces. They are going very well and I think we have reached an agreement in principle on all the issues. The Government of Ontario must recognize that the provincial governments, not just Ontario but B.C., Saskatchewan and Alberta, have to introduce legislation to make something like this happen. We are talking about the monetary side of the equation. Negotiations are proceeding. In due time we will make the announcement.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

• (1500)

[English]

CORRECTIONAL INVESTIGATOR

ANNUAL REPORT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to lay on the table copies, in both official languages, of the annual report of the Correctional Investigator for the year 1990–91.

* * *

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SECOND ANNUAL REPORT ON EXPORT OF MILITARY GOODS FROM CANADA

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have two tablings today. Pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, copies of the second annual report on the export of military goods from Canada.

* * *

[Translation]

CANADIAN COMPANIES OPERATING IN SOUTH AFRICA

SIXTH REPORT ON ADMINISTRATION OF AND COMPLIANCE WITH CODE OF ETHICS

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table in the House the sixth report on the administration of the code of ethics for the employment practices of Canadian companies operating in South Africa and on compliance therewith.

[English]

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to section 36(8) of the Standing Orders, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 96 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

[Translation]

ENVIRONMENT

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Yvon Côté (Richmond—Wolfe): Mr. Speaker, as vice-chairman of the Standing Committee on the Environment, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on the Environment on the thinning and depletion of the ozone layer.

Pursuant to its mandate under Standing Order 108(2), the committee studied the depletion of the ozone layer. In this report, it expresses its concerns about ozone depletion and its effect on health.

I also want to point out how pleased I am that all members and all parties co-operated in writing this report.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings]

* * *

[English]

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATION

FOURTH COMMONWEALTH PARLIAMENTARY SEMINAR

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), may I present, in both official languages, the report on the fourth Commonwealth Parliamentary Seminar as a delegate from the Canadian branch of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association.

Allow me to record our gratitude to the CPA branch of the Trinidad and Tobago group for their sponsorship of this worth-while seminar. The benefits that accrue from the exchange of views and information by parliamentarians from across the Commonwealth demonstrates the value of maintaining Commonwealth relationships.

* * *

JUSTICE AND THE SOLICITOR GENERAL

10TH REPORT OF THE STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General.

In accordance with its order of reference of Tuesday, March 31, 1992, your committee has considered the draft regulations on gun control and has agreed to report it with 37 recommendations.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

* * *

STATISTICS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–356, an act to amend the Statistics Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 68(2), the motion is deemed adopted.

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, this bill attempts to establish a status for Statistics Canada which is more independent than the present position it has. This desire to achieve greater independence for the agency comes after attempts by the finance department to pressure Statistics Canada to make changes in withdrawals in a study which Statistics Canada presented earlier this past year. It is for this reason that I think the need arises to establish more clearly the independence from government pressure of Statistics Canada so it will be able to report directly, clearly, and honestly to the people of Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps I should advise the House that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor was out of time in the filing of material. However, with consent I would be very pleased to proceed. Do we have consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Langdon moves that the bill be now read the first time and printed.

Pursuant to Standing Order 69(1), the motion is deemed adopted.

Bill read the first time and printed.

* * *

PETITIONS

PROUD TO BE CANADIAN

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present two petitions from many people in the riding of Beaver River, from Bonnyville, Ardmore, Medley, Grand Centre and Cold Lake.

These people recognize the Proud to be Canadian project that was undertaken by the Kinsmen and Kinette Clubs of Canada. The flags travelled across the country and they, along with these petitions, were sent down to celebrate that Canada is a wonderful country.

The petitioners support the Proud to be Canadian project as an opportunity to nurture a positive, life–long relationship with our heritage and our flag, to encourage stronger ties among all Canadians for the further advancement of Canada as a leader in world circles and to promote our tremendous pride in being Canadians.

WATER DIVERSION

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of residents of the North Thompson Valley who point out their concern regarding a plan to divert water from the North Thompson River near Valemount into the California area. The petitioners call upon the Canadian government to prohibit any notion of this type of interbasin water transfer.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by a number of veterans from Kamloops, British Columbia. They call on the government to maintain the current level of services provided to veterans through the Veterans Independence Program and to assure there is no increase in charges to veterans for board and lodging in institutions for long–term care.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, the petitioners call on the House of Commons to ensure that if a referendum is called regarding the Constitution that it be binding upon Parliament although they realize this is impossible technically but simply to reflect the views of the petitioners.

HOUSING

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another topic, the petitioners from Kamloops call on the government to reconsider the decision not to proceed with more co-operative housing. They feel this provides adequate housing, accessible for people who normally have difficulty accessing decent housing.

NATIONAL REFERENDUM

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to present a petition from Simcoe Centre area, which humbly prays and calls upon Parliament to enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject constitutional amendments proposed by the government.

CHINESE HEAD TAX

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions to present.

The first one which is quite detailed comes from a large number of Canadians of Chinese origin and concerns the Chinese head tax. The petitioners state that Chinese immigrants came to Canada in the early part of this century and had to pay a racist head tax. Some 81,000 Chinese immigrants paid approximately $23 million, a sum worth over $1 billion today. That was followed by the Chinese Immigration Exclusion Act, which was not repealed until 1947, and which prohibited virtually all Chinese immigration. Both these policies had a very negative impact on Canadians of Chinese ancestry, led to a bachelor society, severely hindered—

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker: I think the House is very aware of the matter the hon. member is raising but we are limited in remarks made at the presentation of a petition. I would ask the hon. member to proceed with the petition itself.

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, the petitioners ask for an all-party resolution to consider this matter. They call on the Government of Canada to provide symbolic financial redress of $10,000 for the head tax certificate, community financial redress and post-commemorative plaques regarding the Chinese Canadians who worked on the railways. They ask Parliament to pledge again to ensure such injustices will never happen again, including reform of the charter of rights, and in particular to respect section 33.

That was my first petition. I have several which I will combine into one although they are different.

Mr. Speaker: Do I have assurance they are on a different subject?

HOUSING

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the three petitions are on the subject of co-op housing. They are quite different petitions but I will combine the essence of them.

These petitioners are from throughout Vancouver and B.C. who are very concerned the federal government has discontinued the co-op housing program and are reducing the CMHC programs. They urge the federal government to reinstate co-operative housing.

RWANDA

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present a petition from a number of residents of the cities of Toronto, Scarborough, Downsview, and North York.

The petitioners are concerned about the military dictatorship in Rwanda which has lasted for 30 years. The pass laws, the only ones in the world similar to South Africa's pass laws, refuse to let two million exiled Rwandans return.

They urge Parliament to urge the Canadian government to apply pressure on the Rwandan regime to immediately stop killing innocent Rwandans, to urge the Canadian government to stop economic aid and other forms of assistance to the current Rwandan regime, and to urge the Canadian government to support the European Community resolution on Rwanda issued on February 20, 1992.

CFB CORNWALLIS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I too rise at this time to petition the House on behalf of my constituents and a few others from outside of South West Nova who are in support of the establishment of the peacekeeping training program in Canada.

They call upon Parliament to maintain CFB Cornwallis as a multi-purpose training facility and to establish the proposed peacekeeping training program at CFB Cornwallis.

TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my first petition deals with cuts to education, training, retraining, research and development, with a special emphasis on the reductions of transfer payments and the 3 per cent tax on student loans.

These petitioners request that the government reverse its policies because they believe they are contrary to increased effectiveness and enhanced productivity.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my other petition deals with the goods and services tax on books and reading materials. These petitioners point out there has never been any such tax in our country. They believe it is contrary to the basic principles of a democratic society and they ask this tax be removed.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my other petition deals with fair taxation. The petitioners point out that certain people get tax credits with respect to child care facilities while others do not. They believe there are a number of tax measures that are discriminatory. They ask for a simpler and fairer tax system.

[Translation]

HERITAGE LANGUAGES PROGRAM

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present several petitions bearing 1,850 signatures.

The petitioners humbly declare that for nearly 20 years the federal government has had a policy of multiculturalism based on preserving and promoting heritage languages and that the federal government affirms that the preservation and promotion of heritage languages should be supported and encouraged.

For these reasons, they humbly ask the Parliament of Canada to restore the full financial support for the Heritage Languages Program of the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship, which the government reduced in its budget of February 1990.

[English]

PENSIONS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition signed by hundreds of Canadians from Vancouver and Burnaby, British Columbia; St. Lawrence and South River, Newfoundland and many areas in between which states:

"We your petitioners draw to the attention of the House the following: That hundreds of thousands of Canadian senior citizens live below the poverty line; that over 80 per cent of single women over the age of 65 live in poverty; that the 37 cent increase in Old Age Security pensions in April 1992 is inadequate to meet the needs of Canadian seniors; that it is desirable for all Canadians to provide senior citizens with the necessary support to live their lives as independently as possible; that the federal government has a primary responsibility to ensure the adequacy of seniors' pensions. Therefore, your petitioners call upon Parliament to urge that the government ensure that Canadian Old Age Security pensions are sufficient to meet the basic needs of Canadian senior citizens."

* * *

OFFICIAL REPORT

Hon. Alan Redway (Don Valley East): Mr. Speaker, after reviewing my remarks in the House as recorded in Hansard on June 12 of this year I note that the third sentence in paragraph 2 on page 11971 is incorrect and should be replaced by the following:

> It seems incredible to me that someone in Mrs. Bisset's case could not share on a credit-splitting basis the pension of her husband after 35 years of marriage, 28.5 years as the wife of a military officer and the other 6.5 while her husband served in the Public Service. A maximum of 35 years of contributions to the pension plan was paid up prior to the separation and divorce. As you know, when a wife is divorced from her husband she is disentitled to the benefits acquired under the marriage.

Thank you very much for the opportunity of correcting the record.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Jim Edwards (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, Question No. 315 will be answered today.

[Text]

Question No. 315—Mrs. Mitchell:

What is the total estimated cost of the special production in conjunction with the Just For Laughs organization, of a humorous history of Canada announced in April, 1992 and how much of this cost will be borne directly or indirectly by the government, and through which departments or agencies?

Hon. Henry Perrin Beatty (Minister of Communications): The special production in conjunction with the Just for Laughs organization is privately funded.

According to information available, Telefilm Canada, the National Film Board and the Department of Communications' Cultural Initiatives Program have not been solicited to participate directly or indirectly in the funding of this project, defined as a humorous history of Canada, which was set up in collaboration with the organization Just for Laughs.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

* * *

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

ATLANTIC FISHERY

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I ask leave pursuant to Standing Order 52 to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of a debate on a matter of great urgency, namely the crisis in the fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador and other parts of Atlantic Canada.

S. O. 52

With the House of Commons about to recess for the summer in 24 hours, today presents the last opportunity for there to be a proper debate on the crisis in the fishery in Newfoundland and Labrador specifically, but also in Atlantic Canada.

I ask the Speaker to give consideration to this request so that an emergency debate may be held today.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I believe you realize this is on exactly the same issue. We believe this is an emergency situation with the collapse of the Atlantic cod fishery and the devastation, not just to the resource itself but to the people living in those areas, particularly Nova Scotia and Newfoundland, and the need for some emergency action to protect the resource itself and also to deal with the problems of the people living there.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte some days ago, also the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan, and subsequently 40 other members have indicated their wish that there be an emergency debate with respect to the situation resulting from the difficulties in the northern cod fishery.

• (1520)

I notice that the request is that these Canadians urgently require an indication of the kind of short-term and long-term strategies the government will employ, et cetera.

I have listened very carefully over several days to the questions and the answers. There is no question that the matter is of importance and concern to all members of the House.

After careful consideration, under the provisions of Standing Order 52, I am in a position to grant the request for an emergency debate today. However, the House is in a quandary as it adopted last June 9 an order to extend the hours of sitting until 10 p.m. In addition, earlier today the House agreed to a motion for time allocation on Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, which would require, if necessary, an interruption 15 minutes before the expiry of time provided for government business, namely 9.45 p.m.

While Standing Order 52 governing emergency debates states that such a debate be held at 8 p.m. until midnight, I have also gone back and looked at the McGrath report. In light of the spirit of the McGrath report, which sought to allow for emergency debates without infringing on the time of the House, I am prepared to set down for debate at 10 p.m. the matter raised by the hon. member and members.

This debate will conclude at no later than 12 midnight, as specified by the Standing Orders.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Allmand (p. 12472).

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Madam Speaker, it disturbs me a great deal that this government is determined in pushing the most significant changes to immigration laws in almost 15 years without providing opposition parties sufficient time to review the legislation in detail and consult with various non-governmental organizations and other immigration experts.

Bill C-86 has more than 120 sections and is over 110 pages long. Since the emphasis of this legislation is on trying to improve the management of the system and has new enforcement measures, these provisions must be examined very closely because they may impact directly on immigration policy and can be far more significant than simple technical or administrative changes.

I am worried about this legislation for another reason. This bill is shifting the responsibility from Parliament to the regulatory process. It is of profound concern that this bill is transferring powers away from Parliament. It leaves the system wide open to abuse.

Canada deserves an immigration system that is understanding of the needs of Canadians and that treats immigrants and refugee claimants with dignity and respect. Anything less would be unacceptable.

Far too often the process has treated both immigrants and refugee claimants with disdain. My constituency office is swamped with files of cases showing how insensitive the immigration and refugee determination process has been.

The policies and practices of this department seem to run on the assumption that all refugee claims are bogus and that immigrants should consider themselves lucky to be admitted to this country. This type of attitude fails to recognize that Canada benefits from their arrival on our shores and that no matter where they come from and no matter what experience they bring to Canada they contribute greatly to our economy and form an important component of who we are as a nation.

As an illustration of how the process has treated people, I want to tell the members of this House about the Mirzad family. These people came to Canada with four children. They escaped from Afghanistan, a nation devastated by the Soviet invasion in 1979 and perpetually victimized by a civil war that has killed thousands upon thousands of innocent people.

They came to Canada hoping for a new life and to escape from the mindless violence that plagued their homeland. When they arrived in this country they applied for refugee status and entered the process. While waiting for immigration and refugee officials to decide their case, the Mirzad family proceeded with their lives. They even had a fifth child here in Canada.

When the decision of the first step of the refugee determination process was reached, officials claimed that the parents did not have credible basis to remain as refugees in Canada. At the same time, the same body that rejected the parents gave their young children at least part of the required status to remain here. In effect, this decision would create orphans in this country by allowing children to stay and sending their parents back to a life-threatening situation.

A couple of months ago I rose in this House asking the Prime Minister to look into this case. He stood in this Chamber and said he would investigate the matter.

I am sure that members of this House will be shocked to learn that the result of this commitment was a government appeal of the decision granting the children credible basis. His own people.

After the Prime Minister's intervention, the children, including one born here in Canada, may be forced to return to Afghanistan. This decision is completely incomprehensible.

What this bill will do is give more power to the people who make these kinds of decisions. We must remain a compassionate nation. We were at one time. We must reach out and understand that human rights of all people is something Canada must uphold.

[Translation]

With this bill, the first part of the refugee determination process will be eliminated. With this proposal, even the Mirzad children could have been deported from Canada.

Refugees can present their case without being biased by a system that does not take into account neither what is going on in their country of origin nor the problems associated with being a newcomer in Canada.

This legislation will empower immigration officers at Canadian ports of entry to turn down refugee claims. I am not convinced that this provision of the legislation will effectively entitle refugees to a lawyer and an interpreter and, more importantly, to a fair assessment.

We cannot and should not leave decisions affecting the life of these people in the hands of a single person. They have a right to be heard by Canada, while Canada has to carry out the international responsibilities it has under the refugee conventions.

Again, this legislation describes a safe third country system in which immigration officers would be allowed to send refugees back to the country through which they entered Canada. This provision ignores the reality of far too many refugees. Many countries may be safe to visit for someone born in Canada but be very risky for people from other countries.

How can we make sure that the list of safe countries reflects reality? Political and military changes happen all the time. We must be sure that government will recognize these changes as they happen.

The refugee determination process, as it stands, calls for only one member of the two-member determination board to accept the individual as a refugee. Under Bill C-86, a unanimous decision will be required. Again, access to our country is made more difficult for people who are legitimate refugees.

[English]

This bill will make it somewhat easier for family reunification but it is still less than what is recommended by the Official Opposition and various non-governmental organizations.

We must make sure that family reunification is swift and that it is sensitive to the various definitions of family. It should not be one only based on the North American notion, but one which recognizes that the definition of family is as varied as the quilt that makes up Canadian society.

[Translation]

Every one in this House remembers the incidents reported by the media where members of the determination board looked down on refugees. Unfortunately, this is an all too common occurrence, which forces us to question the integrity of such a system.

• (1530)

That is why I support the proposal to create a system for disciplining board members who do not understand the importance of what they do, the seriousness of the situation and the impact of their decisions.

Too often, we have heard that board members did not understand the situations experienced in many countries of origin. For that reason, they do not show compassion and sympathy for families who have had to live through trying situations and only want an opportunity to start over in peace and harmony in the best country in the world. The system must deal with the problems that we find too often now.

I want to talk about the case of a married couple living in my riding. The woman is Canadian and the man is from the Middle East. They have been married for two years, and it certainly was not a marriage of convenience. The woman is now two months pregnant. They are building a life and making a family in Canada.

Immigration officers want to force this father-to-be to leave Canada because his passport is no longer valid, having expired. The embassy of his home country does not want to renew it because he has not yet done his military service, which is compulsory in that country.

He does not want to return to the Middle East because he does not want to die there. His wife does not want to go to the Middle East because she wants her child to be born in Canada, where it can live in a peaceful society.

The members of that family want to live together, but our Canadian refugee system will force them to live apart for two to three years. This is another humanitarian reason that we could mention here, Mr. Minister. I hope that the proposed changes may improve such a situation.

It is surely not by fingerprinting and photographing refugee claimants, as the new bill proposes, that Canada will be perceived as a welcoming country. It is not by having the preconceived idea that refugees come here to cheat the government that those who decide on their fate will be more equitable. This part of the bill is particularly humiliating for those who come to Canada to flee political situations that are humanly unacceptable and to have a chance to work and live without fear.

Will their first contact be questioning by the host country? That is unacceptable. Why would we accept for others what we would find completely out of place for ourselves? It is a double standard.

I can only approve if the government wants to improve the immigration program, but deciding where newcomers must live and for how long before they are free to choose where to settle is surely contrary to human rights.

How can Canada define itself as an open and hospitable country when it fingerprints and photographs applicants for the record and tells them where to live for x number of years, which will probably be monitored very closely? That is a funny kind of welcome.

[English]

Many people have come out and said that the provision which would force immigrants to live in a specific region could violate the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It would in effect be creating two types of immigrants: one group that is free to move as it pleases and another that is restricted to a specific area.

I have serious doubts as to whether this provision will stand up to a charter challenge. Why not try to find out first? Several immigration lawyers have said quite publicly that they did not believe this provision was constitutional.

If we are to be sure of the integrity of the immigration and refugee process then we have to make sure the law is constitutional. Immigrants, as well as Canadian citizens, have to know that the immigration law will be applied consistently and equitably across this country for years to come.

I sincerely hope we will be able to examine this legislation very carefully in committee. It is imperative that the immigration and refugee system we create follows some very basic principles. It must be a fair, compassionate and responsive system that meets the needs of Canadians, respects and treats with dignity those people from around the world who wish to join us, and helps us contribute to a greater Canada.

[Translation]

Of course, some of the proposed changes will make the immigration procedure more efficient, but the obvious flaws, that is, the inhumane proposals, must be corrected right now to give refugees and immigrants the greatest chance in this country. If they need us, we also need them. Only together can this country grow; otherwise it will die a slow death.

[English]

Canada is a vast country. We must realize that in a world that is overcrowded, where human rights violations are an all too often occurrence and where people struggle to better their lot in life, Canada is a natural choice. We have so much to offer and we must be generous. This generosity not only benefits the people coming to our shores but benefits us.

We cannot submit to the tiny minority of Canadians who because of misinformation are hostile to immigrants. Together, native born or naturalized, we have a role in building this country. Canada's immigration process must recognize this fact.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I compliment my colleague from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. She referred to the family from Afghanistan in her speech. I believe the parents were given a deportation notice and the children were allowed to stay.

This case is just one example of many that happen like this week in and week out. We know how tough it is when parents of young students in high school come into our constituency offices. They could be weeks away from getting their grades. The teacher is saying that they are good students. They are established in the community and their parents have received deportation notices. It is just a mess, the way families can be torn apart.

We have tried on Friday and today to be very constructive in this debate with the government. We have pointed out certain aspects of this bill that we support. However, I come back again to the fact that the best plan can go off the rails if there is not the proper staff to support the implementation of the plan.

The member talked about the right to decide who stays and who goes being put into the hands of officials. This can be a very dangerous transformation of powers. In a situation where public servants are stressed out because they are overworked and because of the volume of immigration cases coming at them, it is absolutely impossible to have all of them keep their cool all the time. Quite often rash decisions are being made.

Does the member think that one of the real problems in this legislation is that the Government of Canada is not giving the Public Service of Canada enough person-years to make sure that its best intentions in implementing this plan go forward properly? I happen to think that without the proper person-years this is going to be fiasco.

• (1540)

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. He has touched on one element that is very important. When this commission was first founded a lot of money was put into it in the hope and with the assurance that it could complete the job. It has been a long time and it still has a backlog of a couple of a hundred thousand people. No wonder its people are tired.

The government's preoccupation is to get rid of our debt only at the cost of anything else. It does not matter to the government. It wants to try to lower the deficit, which none of us can complain an awful lot about, but it should not at the cost of human lives and human dignity, which is what is happening here.

It is easy to say that our public servants are tired and overworked with some of the cases I have read about. The Prime Minister of this country stood in the House and said that he personally would look at the case. Then his own government decided to appeal in the case of the kids. They had credible basis accorded to them in one hearing. The parents know about Afghanistan. Another problem is that there are people sitting on this commission who do not know what is going on in the Third World countries.

Our own Prime Minister stood up. The minute the talk is about children, he loves to get to his feet, but when he has to do something he does not do it.

Mr. Lewis: Cheap shot.

Mrs. Maheu: It may not be a cheap shot. The minister should take a look at the dossier.

Mr. Lewis: Cheap shot artist.

Mrs. Maheu: I have many other cases. Another case from Afghanistan is being given the same response.

Mr. Lewis: Cheap shot.

Mrs. Maheu: The minister keeps repeating "cheap shot". When five kids are at stake, I am glad I am in a position to give a cheap shot because none on that side of the House would. You are talking about a baby here, Mr. Minister. I am sorry, Madam Speaker. I say through you to the minister that we are talking about children. You know very well how I must feel, Madam Speaker, because we are both mothers.

I have a second case which is the same. People were tortured and left the country, and a couple of members who do not know anything about Afghanistan say: "We do not believe him. We do not believe he was tortured. The marks are not enough". Sometimes electric shocks do not leave enough marks. He does have other marks.

What I question is how this government has so many hard-hearted people on this commission. If the minister has ever granted for humanitarian reasons to let someone stay in this country, I wish he would share it with this House because in my riding there have been several cases that could have had and should have had the minister's intervention. I would like to know where he did get involved for humanitarian reasons.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, in her remarks the hon. member from Saint-Laurent—Cartierville referred to the case of the Afghan family where the parents were accepted and the children were refused, leaving us with a very inhumane situation where the parents were expected to go back to their country of origin and the children would stay here. It was very ridiculous.

As my hon. colleague from Toronto said, in our offices we get similar cases all the time. I had a similar case where a Lebanese family of three brothers: two were allowed to stay in Canada and one was deported to Lebanon. They were all involved in the same political movement in Lebanon. The mother was allowed to stay but one brother was sent back.

There is no appeal on the merits in the Immigration Act, nor is there any provision of it in the bill. There is an appeal on law but none on the merits. Since no board is perfect, the only recourse for these people who were rendered these terrible decisions by the board was to appeal to the minister under section 114(2) on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. Since this particular minister has become minister he has virtually closed that door. Even the two previous Conservative ministers used to use that clause for humanitarian and compassionate reasons and admit cases such as the ones we were just discussing like the Afghan family or the Lebanese family.

I want to know from the hon. member who does a lot of immigration work in her office and from her experience in her constituency whether she would confirm to me that this clause has been virtually closed down, this access for justice on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

I wonder if it is like mine. It is almost impossible now even to get the minister's staff or anybody in his office to consider admitting horrible cases like this to Canada—horrible in their outcome—as sort of an appeal to overcome the harsh decision or the ridiculous decision of the board. What is her experience?

Mrs. Maheu: Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce for giving me this chance.

I have had cases in which even the minister's staff has said it wished there were something it could do. There is a little bit of a point in the law that does not quite cover it. I am thinking of the young couple waiting for their baby and he has to go back to fight in a war.

There is room for a little bit of humanitarian consideration in this case and I wish the minister had stayed. I would have liked to have had him try and explain to us what he meant when he said he makes decisions on humanitarian grounds.

If he does would he please tell us where because we are not seeing it, not at our level anyway. I have one of the most multicultural ridings in the country.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be here today to have an opportunity to address the House on the proposed amendments to the Immigration Act which have been introduced by my colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

After a great deal of consideration and discussion by our caucus, a caucus which is representative of the entire country and not one particular area, it has been vetted with elected members, all of whom have experienced some of the problems which have been referred to in this House.

I am quite satisfied it will ensure that Canada's immigration system continues to contribute the unity and prosperity of Canada.

[Translation]

Several of the proposed amendments deal with security and enforcement issues of particular concern to me as minister responsible for CSIS and the RCMP.

[English]

Before addressing those provisions in the legislation I want to make a few comments as to the over-all thrust of the legislation. I think it is important we note that in this bill we are going to streamline the refugee determination system.

References have been made this afternoon to delays and hardships. I do not think it is in anyone's interest to delay the determination of whether a person is a true bona fide refugee fleeing from political persecution and persecutions in other countries. There is no question Canadians want to open their doors to legitimate bona fide refugees.

I do not think there is any question also that Canadians realize the strength of what immigrants have brought to this country and I will make some references to that at the end of my remarks.

We are a country which has grown in stature over the last 125 years and that is because of the strengths which refugees from various countries have brought to Canada. We intend that they continue to come and continue to provide our country with the asset of effort and determination that immigrants bring to a country.

At the same time, and I think this is important in this day and age, one of the over-all thrusts of this bill is to better protect Canadian society. There is no question from time to time individuals who would not have been selected for immigration try to test our laws, our regulations, our openness and our generosity as a country.

• (1550)

Quite frankly, Canadians are fed up with people trying to beat the system. This bill addresses that frustration in Canadian society. We want to provide an immigration program which is fair, balanced and effective.

It is fair to say that refugee determination is a world-wide problem. I visited the Trevi meeting of European security ministers two weeks ago in Lisbon, Portugal. The question of asylum was a major topic of discussion; what constituted appropriate asylum. There was the question of the Dublin convention. The question of visas and the abuses of visas is a very major political issue as most western countries are facing growing pressures from migrants seeking political and economic stability. Others were: the conflict and political instability in many countries; the economic disparity that exists; increasing availability of transportation that resulted in unpredictable flows of people toward western Europe, Australia, the United States and, naturally, Canada.

This unplanned and large-scale movement of people presents a challenge to Canada and to other industrialized countries. It is a multi-faceted issue that cannot be solved by any country on its own. We need international co-operation to address the root causes of this mass migration and also to address those who would tend to abuse the system.

Countries such as Canada have to take steps to maintain effective immigration policies which ensure that persons are treated fairly and equally but also to ensure that the country's interests are protected.

I believe there is a tradition in this country to respect the queue and Canadians understand that we have to have rules and regulations for immigrants. Canadians become annoyed at those who want to beat the system. We have a long-standing tradition of welcoming persons in need of protection but quite frankly, we are concerned about those who try to beat the system.

As well, there is no question of the rising costs of the immigration program. If that immigration program is skewed by illegal refugees, people who take advantage of our openness, people get annoyed at the whole immigration program. That is what we are trying to prevent with this bill. We are trying to prevent people from circumventing immigration controls, plain and simple. The integrity of our immigration program cannot be maintained unless we as a government address the problem which is represented by those who abuse the system.

I believe that the legislation addresses the concerns of Canadians and will ensure that persons who endeavour to abuse the immigration process are not successful. That is why, as Solicitor General with the responsibilities that I have, I am especially pleased to give my full support to the entire bill and especially to those legislative amendments that relate to the security and law enforcement aspects of the immigration program and therefore the responsibility of CSIS and the RCMP.

One of the things that the bill does is introduce legislative changes that strengthen the inadmissible provisions of the act so that we are not going to become as a country a safe haven for retired or active terrorists. Over the past several years there has been a growing concern within the national security establishment about persons with terrorist backgrounds who are seeking entry to Canada. Quite frankly, the legislation is going to close the door on those individuals. It is going to increase our capacity as a government to close that door.

As well, we are going to increase our capacity to exclude persons with criminal backgrounds or who are associated with criminal organizations. This will assist the RCMP and other police forces in their battle with organized crime.

If we have reasonable grounds to believe that a person has committed a crime, that person would be barred from Canada.

While some civil libertarians may decry that fact, Canadians who obey the law, welcoming legitimate immigrants who just want to come here to make a new home for themselves, do not welcome people with known criminal records who want to find a new place to commit further crimes.

I am pleased as well to support the amendments to the security certificate provisions of the act. These are provisions that enhance the ability of the Solicitor General and the Minister of Employment and Immigration to exclude from Canada persons who pose a security risk.

These changes will give greater protection for sensitive information which we receive from allied governments that we use in support of certificate cases before the federal courts. The legislation will ensure that persons who are the subject of certificates cannot attempt to avoid the rule of Canada by making a claim to refugee status.

It also gives the government authority to exclude from Canada persons who are members of or associated with organizations or governments that have been involved in war crimes and human rights abuses.

We have to be able as a country to exclude individuals whose admission serves no public interest and whose very presence in Canada is offensive to the democratic values of Canadians so that we will take care of that type of individual.

I also would point out that Canadians are going to be pleased to see that under the proposed amendments criminals can no longer make a refugee claim in order to avoid extradition. We will take care of that particular abuse of our system and our openness as a country.

I am also supportive of the provisions which are aimed at curbing the activities of individuals who are more involved in migrant smuggling. There cannot be anything worse than people who set up a business to try to cheat people out of their money and land them on our shores without proper documentation. To take advantage of people like that in any country is not on. We will be able to stop that. The RCMP will play a major role in this part of the initiative.

I also want to endorse the legislative changes to the restructuring of the review and appeal mechanisms. These provisions are going to curtail the abuses in the system and defend the integrity of the program which is essential to our social and economic development.

I am firmly in support of the bill and what it does for our ability as a country to secure our borders against illegal refugees. One has to realize that this bill enhances immigration and takes on the people who would abuse the immigration system.

We have raised our levels in recent years to help us build this country and to help people who are in difficulty in other countries. I have always been in favour as an individual and as a member of Parliament of increased immigration in this country. There is no question were we to continue our current birth rates and the old immigration policies we would see our population diminish. That does not suit our purposes as a country that either looks forward or wants to welcome people who want to make a new lives for themselves.

• (1600)

I want to particularly mention policies which I believe are not shared by any of the three major parties in this House. I want to specifically refer to the policies of the Reform Party. I want to quote the Reform Party president. As I said, I am sure my colleagues in the Liberal and New Democratic parties and in my party do not support this type of comment. This is a comment from the president of the Reform Party of Simcoe North:

> "We're bringing in the riff-raff of the world," says Jill Patterson, president of the party's Simcoe North riding association. "Not all of them, I'm not saying they're all riff-raff, but a lot of them are."

That is the policy of the Reform Party of Canada. I reject it out of hand.

The best way I have found to reject it is to remind people of the backgrounds of the people who built this country. It is best said by a writer named Pete McGarvey. He used to be on the radio in Toronto. In the Huronia Sunday of May 3, 1992 he took her on on this riff-raff thing. His words are very appropriate:

—let's not forget the 'rabble' of Britain and Europe provided an immigrant labour force that built Canada in pioneer days, just as the 'rabble' of the Orient slaved and died to complete the Rocky Mountain portion of our national railway. It was the 'riff-raff' Irish who built the city streets of North America early in this century and the 'rabble' Italians who built the buildings.

An hon. member: My ancestors.

Mr. Lewis: You are right. My hon. colleague from Brantford says his ancestors. I say my ancestors because I am the first Lewis in my family born in this country. When we talk about immigration people forget there were a lot of poor English that came to this country, built it and participated in it. The same for the poor Irish and poor Italians. They all came here and made great futures for themselves and their children. They built this country.

We do not want to stop that. We want to enhance it. We want to build our immigration levels and build this country. At the same time, we are determined that people who want to cheat the system are not going to cheat our system and people who want to take advantage of Canada are not going to take advantage of Canada.

I agree with my hon. friends when they raise concerns. When this bill goes to committee there will be ample opportunity to take a look at it and to make sure that we have provisions in there that are fair but at the same time protect Canadian society, not against somebody who comes here and wants to make something of themselves but against people whose first step on coming into the country is to try to beat the system.

With this bill we will tighten that up and endeavour to have a country which is known as open to immigration but at the same time closed to cheating.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, I am pleased that the Solicitor General is here. He might be able to explain a clause in the bill which I just cannot understand. It is with respect to detention.

At the present time an official of the department of immigration can put a prospective immigrant or refugee in detention, not because there is a charge of an offence against that refugee or immigrant, but because the official has reason to believe that the immigrant or refugee might not turn up for an inquiry that is planned in a few weeks' time. That is the immigration official's opinion, that the individual might not turn up for the inquiry or it is his or her belief that this individual could be a danger to the public.

I am saying there is no charge against these individuals. If they were charged they would be in a criminal court or a criminal institution. These are immigration detention centres.

Under the present law once the official decides that the immigrant should be put in the detention centre there is a review of that detention within 48 hours and then thereafter every seven days.

Since most of these immigrants and refugees cannot speak English or French a lot of them have great difficulty getting ready for the first review at 48 hours. The great majority of them do get ready for the seven day review and the vast majority are released on that seven day review because it is shown that they are not really going to flee the country or avoid the inquiry and they are not really a danger to the public.

In this bill the government is proposing to extend the seven-day review periods to 30-day review periods, more than four times the present time allowed for a review of one of these cases. I just cannot understand it. This means that the same practice or tradition we have now that the great majority of these people will stay in detention centres for at least 30 days in order to get a release.

I want to know from the minister, who is involved in law enforcement as the Solicitor General, why was it necessary to increase the seven-day review period and it was for every seven days in the present law? Why is it increased to four times that amount to 30 days and 30 days thereafter each time? It would seem to me that not only is that unfair and unjust to the immigrant who is put in detention but it is also going to greatly increase the cost of the system.

I have one of these detention centres in my constituency. It is going to have to triple or quadruple in size keeping all these people for 30-day periods and 30-day periods thereafter.

I ask the minister, since he is supporting the bill, what is the reason for increasing the detention review from seven days to 30 days over and over again?

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question. To answer, I should go back one step.

Obviously, if the people my hon. friend referred to came with all their documents in order, they would not go into the detention home. Immigrants come with documents in order. My hon. friend suggests that people without documents come in here carte blanche and if we cannot decide the case in seven days they should be walking the streets. Canadians do not want that. If a bona fide legitimate immigrant comes with the necessary documentation and presents that documentation, there will be no difficulties.

An hon. member: That is not the case.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of very serious questions to ask the minister concerning the difference between normal procedures where a person is going to be deprived of certain rights because we can document that the individual has been involved in certain activities.

This bill starts by saying that if a person is a member of an organization that is deemed to be a criminal organization, a terrorist organization or a subversive organization or associates with them the person can be removed without any indication that the person himself is involved in any of those activities or had any intention to be involved.

We have organizations in this country which have been deemed as having some kind of negative connotation, for example, Palestinian and Jewish organizations and organizations from the Innu Canadian community.

My understanding is CSIS will determine that a certain organization is involved in terrorist activity. The public will never be told. An individual will never be told. That individual becomes involved in an activity someone has deemed that organization is involved in. By being associated with that organization which the individual knows nothing about or involved in very open community affairs be they philanthropic, religious or otherwise of which the community is very much aware, that individual is liable to removal from Canada simply based on that association. Not only can they be removed because they associate with an organization nobody has publicly named, but they did so in an ex parte court hearing that neither they nor their lawyer had access to.

• (1610)

I am wondering if in the fervour of making sure legitimately, as I think all Canadians want, people who are involved personally and individually in activities that are criminal, terrorist, or subversive are removed, people, particularly in ethnic communities will be frightened to be involved in any community activity in case CSIS has deemed that organization is subversive.

Mr. Lewis: Madam Speaker, I had a chance to discuss the matter briefly with the minister of immigration. He advises me we have simply added the clauses in the Geneva convention pertinent to this particular area to the provisions in our present legislation.

This is not always a nice business. People we are refusing admission to do not play by the same rules as you and I. They often do not have any rules, or they have rules you and I find abhorrent.

Mr. Karpoff: So we are going to adopt the rule.

Mr. Lewis: Now wait a minute. My hon. friend dismisses the fact there has to be a full court hearing where the individual in question is represented by counsel, and the lawyers for both sides have an opportunity to put their case before a Federal Court judge. There is also an appeal process. There is that protection plus the CSIS review, if my hon. friend wants to address it too. All of these provisions are in there to protect the legitimate immigrant who wants to get into this country.

We are simply saying these folks do not play by the same rules as you and I, which Canadians respect and want to protect the public. We are saying we have enough people who respect the rules who want to come to this country. We are going to exclude those who do not respect the rules.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, this government once again is introducing in Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act. It is a very controversial piece of legislation and I think very unjust in many respects. The government is already ramming it through second reading at the end of a session when there is not sufficient time to either debate it in full or have adequate consultation. Already groups, including immigration lawyers, churches, refugee support groups, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Ethnocultural Council and others are protesting many aspects of this bill.

The bill changes the priorities for immigrants and refugees to settle in Canada. There are very different priorities in these three streams being proposed. Ironically this minister has reversed many of the changes that were made by the last Conservative minister of immigration, which supposedly were supposed to streamline procedures, get rid of the backlogs and prevent fraud. We know of course the last Immigration Act did none of these things.

Bill C-86 is not an improvement. It is restrictive, unjust and inhumane in many aspects. First of all it allows people to buy their way into Canada. That is one of the first priorities. It reflects therefore Conservative and Reform Party values and not the values of fairness and generosity toward immigrants, which have been a Canadian tradition.

Government priorities are reflected in three streams. Just to remind people, the first stream would give priority to and fast-track wealthy investors and families, as well as UN approved refugees.

The second stream would be first come first served. If there is a long waiting list, many people would have a very difficult time making it. That includes extended families, self-employed people who have contributed greatly to our economy and people with confirmed job offers.

The third and last stream would take only limited numbers and this I find very difficult to understand. It includes business entrepreneurs and independent immigrants who have a job confirmed. Why on earth would they be last? These people are surely going to make good settlers, be employed and contribute to Canada.

The priorities of course are geared to the Conservative philosophy. Let us bring in as many wealthy people as possible and leave others much lower down on the list.

In a world where populations are exploding, civil wars are rampant, human rights are being violated, children are starving, and families are being separated for years, surely we in Canada can afford to be more generous and fair in our immigration policy.

We should not approach immigration with corporate values that allow wealthy immigrants to buy their way into Canada as a first priority. As a multicultural country we should recognize multicultural values and customs. This means we should include grandparents in the primary family group. We should not be imposing the traditional North American concept of family.

The minister must also accept more refugees based on humanitarian appeals. I agree with my colleague for Saint-Laurent—Cartierville. The minister was not here when she spoke but I agree completely, he does not seem to be approving any people on humanitarian grounds through the appeal procedure. I have put through many well-documented appeals based on humanitarian grounds and I doubt he has even seen them, much less really considered them seriously.

It is very important we look at immigration in a much more fair way. Hopefully the minister will look at appeals with more compassion than he has to date.

We must not allow criminals of course to come into Canada or allow organized crime to infiltrate with false documents and so on. However, security measures should surely be implemented by CSIS, not by fingerprinting all refugee applicants as if all were criminals. Indeed, if we are going to do that we might as well do it to all Canadians. I wonder what they would say.

I want to quickly summarize some of the characteristics of this bill. First of all we are told this bill is based on excellence. There will be a new élitist system of quotas to enable the department to select immigrants according to its view of excellence.

The credible basis, which was the first stage of refugee claims process will be eliminated and we are in favour of that. We did not want it in the first place.

A senior immigration officer will be given authority at the border to decide whether or not a person is eligible for a full hearing. The officer can of course decide to refuse a hearing too. We might have some questions about that depending on the immigration officer.

I have already referred to the fingerprinting of refugee claimants, which will be required as if all applicants are criminals.

There is the item of family reunification. When a refugee claimant in Canada is accepted and able to apply for landing, the spouse and children will automatically begin to be processed for landing. We are in favour of speeding up the applications for families. However, as I said earlier we think this should include grandparents and they should not be in a much lower category.

There is the safe third country rule. Refugee claimants who enter Canada through another country such as the U.S. may be removed for a refugee hearing there. We know many refugees from Latin and Central America in particular will be deported by the United States, yet the minister is going to encourage that by refusing them at the border.

Federal Court appeals will only be allowed on points of law and not on merits. This is too narrow a basis for appeal and many experts have said this.

There will be legislated changes to allow speedier removal of rejected refugee claimants, even though an appeal is pending and before appeals are processed. Immigration officials will have authority to search arrivals they may suspect of carrying forged or illegal documents

• (1620)

On the denial of the right to work, refugee claimants will not be allowed to work until they are accepted. This is another regressive move because people need to work and learn English or French to keep their self-respect while they are waiting and it helps them to adjust in Canada afterwards.

Detention will be reviewed after at least 30 days instead of every seven days. My colleagues were just speaking on that.

Finally, there will be better provisions for disciplining IRB commissioners. I hope this approves better appointments of refugee appeal board persons as well so that they will be based on qualifications rather than on political background.

We agree with some of the changes. We agree with the elimination of the credible basis and we want the processing to be speeded up. Long delays in the past of one to three years have not helped claimants who are left in limbo, many of them living in poverty and desperately hoping to stay in Canada while their children become Canadianized and then have been sent back. To be deported after two or three years is inhuman and yet we are told that in B.C. 77 per cent of refugee claimants have been refused during the first three months of 1992.

I have appealed many cases as have others in this House, particularly where children are involved. I have carefully documented children at risk. It very definitely contravenes and aggregates our commitment to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child. I am thinking of a number of Polish families in particular. The minister refused every one of them.

In not one case that I have referred has this minister made a positive response to appeal for humanitarian, compassionate consideration to families that are refugee claimants and could be given consideration to remain in Canada. I doubt, as I said earlier, that he even looks at these personally. If he does, he must have a very cold heart.

We want the processing of refugee claimants to be dealt with more quickly but we also want a more sincere and compassionate appeal process to allow for humanitarian considerations. We want refugee claimants to be allowed to work and to learn French or English and to save the costs of welfare while they are waiting for their cases to be heard.

We also approve the proposed measures to process families more expeditiously. Hopefully this will be under six months. The long delays in reuniting married couples and bringing in family members have caused undue hardship for many immigrants. I would like to say that it has been particularly long for people who have applied from Asian countries whom we are very familiar with in B.C.

I asked the minister to give special attention to the very long delays in India, China, the Pacific islands and Africa where immigration offices are very distant and it is very difficult for families and very costly.

We do not agree, however, with the government's concept of family and the restrictions which give priority to the nuclear family but deny entry to extended families, the basic family unit in many Asian and other countries.

New Democrats have pressed this government for years to include single adults as part of the primary family group. The former minister, I am glad to say, did approve this policy but then it was rescinded by the present one. Now we see in this bill that the nuclear family will have priority in the first stream while grandparents must wait until much later. Surely Canadians can afford to be more generous toward extended families.

Experience proves that relatives in immigrant families help each other. They often develop family businesses that contribute to our economy and to employment. Immigrant families work hard, often at jobs that Canadians refuse and their goal usually is to buy a home as quickly as possible. This, again, contributes to our economy as consumer goods are purchased and more homes are built.

Grandparents are an important part of the family in transmitting the original language and culture as well as helping to care for children. They are the link between the past and the future which makes us a multicultural country. The so-called security measures to be imposed by this bill have been severely criticized by groups across this country.

I could quote many immigration lawyers who referred to the fingerprinting policy for refugee claimants as being odious. "It reflects the standing paranoia of the government which over the years progressively restricted human rights of non-citizens in Canada, particularly those seeking protection as Geneva convention refugees", said Barbara Jackman, a Toronto lawyer.

They object also to the ability to appeal which is even more restricted under this bill and to the whole question of returning people to a so-called safe third country which I referred to earlier as well. The Canadian Ethnocultural Council also criticized exclusion of grandparents and feels that the bill reflects a bias against refugees.

These are the kinds of things, the points of view, that the government must listen to. There has not been time enough to get these views out and made known to the public.

I want to express another deep concern. While this government welcomes wealthy entrepreneurs and gives them top priority for very speedy processing in coming to Canada, it gives low priority to workers with skills and those with professional training and those who have job confirmations. I cannot understand this.

Unfortunately our country is not producing skilled tradespersons and for the future we are short of these people. We need experience and expertise in many fields. Why should these people be restricted to go only to certain areas of Canada? That also seems to me smacks of a slave camp psychology and certainly is not something we should accept. Mobility is a basic right in Canada.

Skilled workers should not be restricted to work in designated areas. The government does not value human resources. Perhaps it values material resources, money in particular, but not the human qualities of immigrants. It does not use the education and professional training of many people who have come to Canada as landed immigrants.

We must find a way, along with provinces, of accrediting professionals so that they can practice in their fields of expertise and so they contribute their knowledge to Canada.

Finally I want to appeal to this government to be more generous toward refugees on humanitarian grounds. Why did it send back well educated, skilled tradespeople from Poland who had been here from two to three years, who had proven they were excellent workers in Canada, who were political refugees at the time of their arrival and who had children who were going back to very risky situations? I referred earlier to the eight cases which I appealed to this minister and he turned down.

It was very unjust and very unfair and also very expensive to send these people back. The appeal process must not be so restricted in the future.

I would like to say also that at this time there is a man called Steven Ogun Wuyi, a Nigerian refugee, who is in sanctuary in a church in Vancouver. He is in sanctuary because he is threatened with deportation. He did not have adequate legal representation. He did not speak much English and his lawyer was not adequately prepared and he was refused an appeal by the minister afterwards.

This Nigerian refugee has been in Canada over two years. He was linked to a military coup in his homeland. As a southern Christian in Nigeria, where the government power groups are not Christian, surely he will face persecution and imprisonment if he is deported to Nigeria.

As I say, he is presently in sanctuary in a church in Vancouver and I ask the minister to grant him permanent asylum in Canada.

The director for immigration for B.C. and the Yukon has stated: "Canada's immigration laws had to be changed because of enormous changes sweeping the world and the need to attract skilled people. Unfortunately this bill does not target skilled persons".

• (1630)

She also said: "Mainly because of civil wars there are 80 million people on the move around the world and many of them want to come to Canada". This is certainly true.

We must look at world conditions when we develop immigration policy and we must be as generous and humanitarian as possible in sharing our wonderful country with newcomers.

Despite the Reform Party and members of the Tory party who spout rhetoric to the contrary, immigration contributes to the wealth of Canada with human resources, people who are rich in skills, experience, enthusiasm and a drive to settle and make a good life for their families. They bring cultures from many lands, as well as contribute many economic advantages.

This bill denies all these benefits and must have full debate with extensive amendments. Better still, it should be withdrawn.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have listened to the hon. member who was all over the place in her comments on the immigration proposal. She and many members here today, especially of that party, have talked about the investor program. She talked about the processing of categories of immigrants and she alleged priorities were being given in this bill to investors.

I would like her to explain to Canadians that in reality what we are proposing is that the streams of categories of immigrants recognize that in Canada family members will be reunited without limits, that refugees will be accepted without limits and that investors will be accepted in Canada without limits.

What is the hon. member trying to achieve here? All provincial governments are in favour of the investor program because it brings new Canadians with capital to regions of Canada in which they can create jobs, in which they create wealth for the Canadian people.

As principal applicants in 1981, investors represented less than 1 per cent of the movement of immigrants to Canada. Why make a big fuss about investors when they constitute less than 1 per cent of the number of immigrants?

She pictures these changes as trying to clamp down on refugees. Why would the United Nations high commissioner for refugees in Canada endorse these proposals if it meant less compassion and less attention to our Geneva Convention obligation of protecting refugees?

My last point is that in the last eight years we, this government, have increased the number of immigrants, the number of people we have welcomed to Canada from 88,000 in 1983 to 250,000. Surely that is not a sign of a government that does not care about the need for immigration for Canada.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the minister's comments.

The minister heard me, I hope, when I quoted—and I was quoting from reliable information—that the proposal in this bill, in his new policies, would have no limits on number and would fast-track wealthy investors, immediate family members and approved refugees.

It is not that we object to entrepreneurs. Of course there is a place for them. I would like to ask the minister why he is giving priority to fast-tracking wealthy investors and yet stream number three would limit the numbers on applicants who are business entrepreneurs and independent immigrants with skills that we need.

He is biasing it to the élite, to the moneyed élite, rather than to traditionally what has been a cross-section of people who would be coming to Canada. I do not know why wealthy investors should be fast-tracked any more than people who have a confirmed job or people who are business entrepreneurs. The family entrepreneurs are the strength of this country, the immigrants in particular.

He also talked about a clamp-down on refugees. I did not say that this bill was clamping down on refugees. Of course they are defined by the UN convention. What I was saying to the minister was that he personally was clamping down on the ability that he has as a minister to consider appeals on compassionate and humanitarian grounds.

I would like to know how many cases he has approved on that ground. Every one that I have put forward—and I have documented them very carefully and very sincerely—has been turned down and I am sure other members had the same experience.

I do not think he is being at all generous or compassionate to people who have been here several years. Many of them were in the backlog, and I mentioned the people from Poland in particular.

Turning to my final point, I think the minister mentioned that the number of 250,000. We agree with that. We support the government. We think we should be taking as many people in Canada as we can possibly take, but it should be a fair policy as I said earlier. It should not just favour wealthy entrepreneurs.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, to the member of the New Democratic Party on the same question of entrepreneurship, in my province I happen to know that the NDP will say one thing but will practise another.

In this particular area right now in the province of Ontario we are welcoming entrepreneurial immigration to this country. I agreed with a lot of the things the hon. member said in her speech about these cases where we would like to have a much more aggressive humanitarian spirit in the department.

I do not want to get into that, but I think of the thousands and thousands of jobs that have been created in the province of British Columbia by Japanese entrepreneurial investors and by Chinese entrepreneurial investors. They do not just come here and invest their money and it sort of sits there. They buy into housing projects and into ski lodges which creates jobs.

I know in the province of Ontario right now our premier—and I salute him for it—is travelling the world trying to pull in investment capital and entrepreneurial immigrants so we can reprime our manufacturing industry.

Why is the NDP putting a stigma on a wealthy entrepreneurial immigrant who wants to come to Canada for the express purpose of creating jobs of which we are in such dire need right now?

By the way, I might also say to the hon. member of the New Democratic Party that a lot of these successful, to use her expression, wealthy entrepreneurial people are craftsmen and skilled people in their own right. They may have started poor or started small, but they grew through their skill and their wealth. Why the NDP is against bringing in that kind of person or why it is not encouraging them is a mystery to me.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I think my hon. Liberal friend is not reading this bill or the explanation of this bill correctly.

In my speech I asked why stream one would fast-track and give unlimited numbers to wealthy investors, and yet at the same time stream three would place strict limits on the number of applicants who were business entrepreneurial and independent immigrants. Why should one have top priority, his friends obviously? We need entrepreneurs. I am not saying we do not need them, but why should they be given much higher priority and much quicker processing than those in stream three which will have strict number limitations and be processed much more slowly? It is a reverse of what I think was Liberal policy when they were government.

I am surprised that the hon. member who has been up on his feet so much today would not understand that. It is the priority in government that we are objecting to. It is not a stigma on any particular group. It is fairness we are talking about.

• (1640)

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, before I begin my debate, I would like to respond to the member from the New Democratic Party. My point in bringing to the attention of the House and of the member the reason we encourage and promote entrepreneurial immigration to this country was not just because we were trying to give somebody preferential status. It has always been for me, and I think for most members of this House, a linkage to direct job creation almost instantaneously.

Sometimes we refer to wealthy people whom the NDP seems to think are always getting preferential treatment. These same people come here and invest literally hundreds of millions of dollars. In the process of doing so they like to see what they are investing in and where their money is going. In my judgment if it means that it can save some Canadian jobs or save some Canadian companies from going under or going bankrupt, if it responds that way, I think we should be sensitive to making sure they are welcomed. At least that has always been the position of the party I am associated with.

I want to return to some of the minister's remarks last Friday when he started speaking. He referred to the fact that an immigration policy of a country is really a mirror of the country's value system. I believe that. I have always believed that Canada was a country that had and still has to this day an image of being a caring, approachable, compassionate country. When we travel abroad, very few people say negative things about our country. We are in an enviable position.

The legislation we are putting through the House today concerns me. Bill C–86 has some 113 pages. I can honestly say that I have not had the time in the last three or four days to read every line of it. As much as I am in support of streamlining and improving, pushing this bill through the House in a couple of days is really playing a little fast and loose. I am a bit concerned about it because part of the amendment gives departmental officials of the Public Service of Canada a lot more power to judge.

I asked the minister last Friday—and I have asked it of a couple of other government members in debate today—what happens when this legislation is implemented? What happens when all that judgment ability is passed on to the Public Service?

I am in no way, shape or form knocking the Public Service of Canada. We have a lot of great officials in the Department of Employment and Immigration. However a reality exists in the department, that these public servants are overworked whether it is on the international end, visas abroad, people coming here, or even departmentally. I had no idea of the amount of work of this particular sector of government when I became a member of Parliament. I can honestly say being a member from downtown Toronto—and I know all my colleagues in urban areas have the same experience—that the immigration issue takes 90 per cent of our time. We cannot walk down the street, we cannot go out to a ballpark or a hockey arena, we cannot go and buy a dozen oranges without someone approaching us about an immigration problem in the city of Toronto.

Invariably our constituents come to us with problems because they say that the department is backlogged or cannot seem to process their applications.

When I asked the minister the other day about adding some person-years I was not asking him to do so to put an added burden in terms of cost to the taxpayer or raising taxes or to make life easier per se for the public servants who are already in his department. If he is to have a shot at making these amendments work he is going to need proper staff.

The Minister of State for Finance said earlier that the volume has gone up and that is why the public servants cannot process. He is absolutely right. The volume has gone up. Yet the support staff to handle that volume is not there. Somehow we cannot seem to make the point.

What happens when people are caught in terms of waiting for two, three and four years and the system starts to break down is that they start to cheat and to abuse the system. What they will do is encourage friends abroad to forget the queue, to come over as visitors, to throw their passports in the toilets on the planes and once they get here to declare refugee status and they are covered off. A lot of these cases are as a result of the system breaking down because it does not have the proper support staff. I really believe that.

When the Solicitor General talked earlier he referred to the fact that the government side of the House was opposed to people who abuse the system. Everyone in this country is opposed to people who abuse the system. We on this side are as fed up with people who abuse the system as any member on the government side.

However, we can too quickly put people in the category of abusing the system and the next thing we know we have developed a very callous attitude. In the process of public servants taking a signal from the government that it is going to be much tougher in the name of fighting abuse, I am afraid there may be a lot of good people who get caught. The very mirror he referred to in his remarks, that our immigration policy was a mirror of our country, may get some marks on it in the process of them getting caught. I think that would be the beginning of a tarnish which could affect us in many other areas. It could even effect us in the area of entrepreneurial or business class people coming here.

The reality right now is that Canada is the greatest country in the world and people do want to come here. But there are also some other countries that are beginning to clean up their act. We may end up, if we get a little tarnish on our immigration policy, losing some of these people to other countries. Within a very short period of time there is going to be, if you can imagine this, a competition for the best and the brightest people in the world. We have always had a policy of trying to attract the best and the brightest from all over the world, whether they are skilled people, entrepreneurial, business class, we have always been very generous that way.

• (1650)

I am afraid that we will send the wrong signal to the public servants, that we are cracking down on abuse and so we are going to back them if they make a quick judgment. If a public servant is overworked and on a Thursday or a Friday afternoon is bogged down and because he is frustrated and wants to get out, all of a sudden that deportation or that refusal stamp is a little too aggressive, then the system really begins to break down. That is just one note of caution I want to put into this.

It affects us as a community because we have a lot of problems in processing the unification of families. Not a weekend goes by in my riding when I am not approached by young married couples who say that they would like their mother and father to come and live with them. If you can believe it, some of them have waited two and three years. For those of us who have been here all our lives, I cannot imagine the frustration of waiting two and three years to be reunited with my mother or father. It is a very tough thing for these people.

I also think of the cases that are caught in between right now. I think of people who maybe came here before these amendments, are caught in the system and are on the long list. I think of many Bulgarians in my community who came here when there were problems in their country. While they are waiting for their applications to be processed things are much better in Bulgaria.

These people have made their way here, many of whom are skilled crafts people and they are caught in the process. There is nothing more emotional than to have the owner of a business come to you and say: "This Bulgarian gentleman is one of the best mechanics I have had in 20 years. When he came here there was a legitimate problem regarding his refugee status and yet now because things are much better in his country I am going to lose him. If I lose him I am going to lose a lot of my business which has been built on his skill and contribution".

These are the kinds of things that really concern me about the amendments to this legislation. My colleague from York West said earlier today that this is a highly emotional issue. It really is a highly emotional issue when your kids come home at night from school and say: "Mr. and Mrs. Shakala are going to be deported but their daughter can stay here and be a part of our welfare system, almost part of an orphanage".

I know that not for a second would this minister not have compassion for these cases if he was in our constituency office in downtown Toronto. It is a heck of a lot different in the province of New Brunswick and I know that for a fact. It is just not the same thing. These cases come at you day in and day out, and again I am not talking about people who abuse the system. The Solicitor General talked about the Reform Party referring to cleaning up the riff-raff in the immigration system. For me riff-raff are people who abuse the system and I am opposed to people who abuse the system.

If the Reform Party meant it is opposed to people who abuse the system then I agree with that particular woman the Solicitor General was quoting. The Solicitor General said he was opposed to people who abused the system and he said it about seven times in his speech.

I would like to know how he would define that kind of person. He would probably call them riff-raff too because they are the people who give the whole system a bad name. In many cases they put a stigma on the whole immigration system.

I want to go back to the fact we are a multicultural nation where no culture is less than or greater than another culture. It seems there are cycles in our country. As the Solicitor General said earlier, the English and the Irish came here at a certain period of time. Then a large wave of Italians came, for example, to Toronto and then there was a very strong wave of people from the Greek community. Now we have many people from east India coming into our community as well as many people of Chinese origin.

This is what makes my city one of the most exciting cities in the world. All of us on all sides of the House welcome these people because we need their expertise, we need their skills. They give us a trading advantage when they go back to their countries, because they have the facility of language and they can open doors for us. I do not think there would be anyone in this House that would argue that point.

I want to make one point here. The one point I want to make is that our public servants in the department of immigration, with the best intentions, do not really implement the act because there is too much coming at them all at once.

I really do believe that if these amendments are going to have a shot at putting our Immigration Act back on track, which can also be an instrument of pulling this country together, then I beg the minister to make sure the necessary person-years are there so that those of us who are MPs in urban areas do not have to spend 90 per cent of our time looking after 5 per cent of our community.

If that is done, we will then be able to serve some of the other people in our community that are just as important to us and need our services just as badly as those people who are immigrating here.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have a few comments and I would like to ask the hon. member a question.

The first point he made was about the lack of resources in the department. I think it is quite telling to Canadians to refer back to the year 1957 when we welcomed into Canada 282,000 people with fewer resources. At that time we had a less cumbersome and complicated system which was not as much judicialized. What we are attempting to do here is give the department the tools to manage effectively the influx of migration into Canada.

The hon. member referred to specific cases in his riding that call for humane and compassionate considerations. Sometimes people do not fit the refugee criteria, they do not fit a category of immigrants. They would have to go back. The minister does have the discretion to accept people on humane and compassionate grounds.

• (1700)

However my experience in the few months I have been in the department is that you get thousands and thousands and thousands of people who want their case considered on humane and compassionate grounds by the minister. That is just impossible.

In section 6(3) and 6(5) of the proposed act, and 114(2)—these are the agency considerations—he will find that I am proposing that we establish by regulation criteria that will allow us to determine and grant to officers in the department the power to make that determination on humane and compassionate grounds. It will not be a decision that is made out of thin air, there will be criteria that we will ask them to apply in order to exercise that discretion which I submit shows the real face of Canada to the world, which is a face the world has come to trust.

I would like his comments and his views on this transparency because the cases he referred to are examples in my own mind of situations where, if there were transparent criteria, an officer could exercise in favour of this Bulgarian he spoke about.

Mr. Mills: Madam Speaker, in 1990 I wrote a letter to the then minister responsible for immigration talking about an idea where members of Parliament could act as quasi-deputies of the minister of immigration. If I took the time to hear an hour or two or three of a constituent's case, subject to the departmental approval, I could write a letter to the department asking it to please allow this person to work or please take this person off a deportation notice.

The minister is missing the fact that by giving all of this power to the officials, by taking the political culture out of it, he has not relieved the burden of the member of Parliament. The workload will not be less for the official, it is just that he has more power. But now at least the constituent has access to a member of Parliament and so the member of Parliament can be lobbied by church groups, by the immigrant's employer: here is a person who is working, here is a person whose daughter is getting good marks in school, and on and on.

Right now, as a member of Parliament, I have no power to help these people. A lot of them are good people. I am as opposed to abuse as much as the minister, but there are many people who are good people and my hands are tied. The minister has just admitted something I have known for months, he is getting thousands and thousands of cases. I am almost embarrassed to call his office on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

If we could organize an amendment to this bill that would give a member of Parliament some responsibility, subject to the department's review, then I could give someone a recommendation that I believe he or she should enter the country on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. I should be able to judge humanitarian and compassionate grounds just as easily as anyone else. The minister, once he signs humanitarian and compassionate grounds, it is through. If members of Parliament could sign for humanitarian and compassionate grounds with a condition on it, in other words subject to the department reviewing my judgment, then at least we could provide some hope for those constituents who are coming at us day after day. Quite often I know when we really take the time to analyze them, 90 per cent are on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. The minister just said the volume of them right now is difficult to cope with. Rather than just handing that process over to officials, give it to the politicians, the elected people who are accountable to the community. Do you think I am going to sign on humanitarian and compassionate grounds if the guy is trying to scam or if he is a bogus operator? Do you think we are going to do that? Then we would be accountable to our community at large. But give the elected members of Parliament some responsibility so we can deal meaningfully when our constituents come to us with legitimate cases.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, I did not want to rise on this because I got involved in a fight over a similar issue in 1987 with Bill C-55. In this case, however, I am very pleased to see that 14 of the 19 amendments I had recommended were included in this bill. These 14 amendments were not changed and I hope that will be acknowledged. The hon. member seems to use "immigrant" and "refugee" indiscriminately and I think that a distinction should be made between the two. I agree that it is the same bill, that it is one and the same thing. If there is a riding where there is a problem with immigration, it is mine. There are 350 cases pending at all times. I would have many questions, but I will ask this one about refugees, a subject that requires that we exercise judgment because there are humanitarian considerations involved.

First of all, most people who request refugee status have already been admitted either as a visitor or as a student. They have had a chance to appreciate our way of life. In spite of all that we may say about it, Canada is the best place to be in the world. We have our freedom, three meals a day and we truly live in a fascinating country. I have a great deal of difficulty agreeing with the meaning the hon. member is giving to humanitarian grounds. I would like to know if he would take the decision himself, if a foreign national wanted to come and visit Canada and swore that he or she would not remain in this country without requesting refugee status or trying to obtain, through his member of Parliament, immigrant status while remaining in the country. I would like some clarifications on that because, believe me, I am having a great deal of difficulty understanding.

[English]

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I think with these amendments there will probably be fewer people coming on a visitor's visa and trying to claim refugee status.

I am opposed to bogus refugees. I am now talking about the fact we have about 60,000 people in the city of Toronto who are in a state of limbo because the system is not functioning properly. I would like to see that particular group get expeditious service. If your officials in the department are not in a position to process these people quickly, then members of Parliament should be given conditional power to sign on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. Then rather than sitting at home collecting social assistance cheques, these people could find work or continue to work and their kids could go to school until the department made a proper analysis.

It is the people who are in this state of limbo who are driving those of us who are members in urban ridings crazy.

• (1710)

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Vézina (Minister of State (Employment and Immigration) and Minister of State (Seniors)): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on major amendments to the Immigration Act.

In his speech the Minister of Employment and Immigration made it clear that the proposed amendments will not satisfy those who want to slam the door and they will not satisfy those who want us to give away the store. These amendments will satisfy Canadians who understand there is a happy medium between these two extremes.

We are proposing these amendments because we believe it is possible to strike a balance between our needs as a country and Canada's humanitarian tradition.

For more than 125 years, immigration has played a major role in shaping the values that identify and unite Canadians. It has helped to strengthen our fundamental respect for diversity, our tolerance and our generosity and has also helped us to build a prosperous and competitive economy.

Immigration is the story of people who had a chance to start a new life in Canada and gave the entire country the benefit of their skills. It is the story of John Polanyi, the scientist who won the Nobel Prize for Canada, and of Lap-Chee-Tsui, whose discovery of the cystic fibrosis gene was a major step in fighting this disease.

It is also the story of Rey Pagtakhan and Otto Jelinek, of Phil Edmonston and Stanley Knowles, and of many other members of this House. However, the system Canada established to manage immigration and the integration of generations of newcomers is coming under increasing pressure, both nationally and internationally.

Countries like Canada must react to these population flows and the problems they create for our immigration programs. However, our ability to react effectively is restricted by the Immigration Act, which was drafted in the 1970s to manage the demands of a simpler time.

In the 1990s the challenge of immigration is more than the simple processing of applications of people who wish to immigrate to Canada. It is also about Canada's ability to attract people with the skills we need. As Canada adjusts to the economy of the future, based on science and advanced technology, the demand for increasingly skilled workers will grow. However, in some cases, there are no Canadians with the skills required to fill specialized jobs.

Immigration helps find some of these skilled workers. Conversely, such immigrants fill jobs that help our economy remain competitive and thus, either directly or indirectly, they create more jobs. However, the present system for selecting qualified workers is too slow and is unable to meet the demands of Canadian industry.

Furthermore, immigration should contribute to regional economic development. Here again, the current legislative framework does not provide the means to encourage immigrants to locate in regions where their skills are most in demand.

Changes are necessary to maintain and improve a Canadian program that has helped us to become aware of our identity and has contributed to our prosperity for generations.

In 1976, we adopted the current Immigration Act which introduced the program's three fundamental objectives: reunite families, protect refugees and promote Canada's economic development. These objectives remain primordial in the bill before the House today.

Our current legislation requires the federal government to set annual levels of immigration. We set those levels after consultations with the provinces. However, although the federal government is responsible for setting annual immigration levels, we lack the means to actually deliver on those targets.

The proposed changes will give us the means to control our immigration program more effectively. The new management system will help us adapt the program to Canada's needs.

These changes will introduce greater certainty to our planning. Greater certainty means fewer delays, it means more predictable processing times and greater fairness for applicants. More specifically, we will be able to avoid the buildup of backlogs which are costly and a constant source of frustration.

We have proposed three streams for selecting immigrants. Immigrants belonging to various categories will be selected and their applications processed according to clearly defined principles.

Applications made by claimants from the first stream, namely spouses and dependent children, would be processed as they are submitted and according to specific time standards. There would no fixed limit on the number of such applications approved each year.

Applications submitted by claimants from the second stream, which include parents and grandparents of Canadian residents, would be processed on a first come first served basis. There would be ceilings for applications from each group within this stream. The other applications would be eligible the following year.

Applicants from the third stream would be selected for excellence, accepting only the most highly qualified individuals. Again, only the allotted number of applicants specified in the annual plan would be accepted. Once the ceiling for the year would be reached, the other applications would no longer be accepted, again to stop costly backlogs from accumulating.

The third stream would include individuals from the independent or entrepreneurs categories or people qualified in designated occupations.

These changes will provide us with the modern management tools that we need to ensure that the immigration process better serves the interests of Canadians. However, we must also take into account the needs of the provinces and territories. Immigration can and must play an important role towards achieving their social and economic objectives. The proposed changes will help us to better take into account their concerns. In particular, the new measures proposed by the federal government reflect the present agreement between the federal government and the province of Quebec.

For the first time, the federal legislation on immigration will reflect the new sharing of responsibilities between the Governments of Canada and Quebec, pursuant to the 1991 Quebec–Canada Agreement on Immigration. The legislation recognizes the exclusive responsibility of the Quebec government regarding the selection of immigrants wishing to settle in that province. It also recognizes Quebec's responsibility to set up and manage the sponsorship commitments made by Canadian permanent residents for members of their family wishing to settle in Quebec.

By virtue of the agreement, the Government of Canada is committed to pursuing an immigration policy that allows the arrival in Quebec of a percentage of immigrants that is at least as high as the percentage of the Canadian population represented by that province, thus preserving its demographic weight within our country. Right now, measures of an exclusively administrative nature enable us to meet this commitment. This bill is therefore aimed at providing us with a safe legislative framework.

By specifying the percentage of immigrants that Quebec can have, as well as its role regarding the make-up of the flow of immigrants, this legislation recognizes the importance for Quebec to plan its own migration movements.

A press communiqué released earlier this week by the Department of Cultural Affairs and Immigration of Quebec said that regarding the reunification of families, the minister noted the will of the federal government to speed up the processing of immigration applications from spouses and children. This initiative follows repeated requests made by cultural communities in Quebec.

Finally, as regards the sharing of responsibilities in the field of immigration between Quebec and Ottawa, the Quebec minister noted that the federal bill reflects the provisions of the Quebec–Canada agreement on immigration and temporary entry of foreigners, that was reached in February 1991.

This bill is drafted in such a way that it applies equally to any agreement that the federal government might conclude with a province regarding the selection of immigrants.

Many regions of the country have trouble attracting immigrants, especially those who have skills that a particular area may greatly need. To rectify this situation, some skilled workers will be offered a sort of contract arrangement. They will be admitted provided that they settle for a specific period, two or three years, in a given region where their particular skills are in demand. It will be up to the communities concerned to create the right conditions to encourage the immigrants to stay there. Of course, I am thinking of the lower St. Lawrence, Gaspé peninsula and north shore.

Our immigration program for investors brings to Canada business people who can contribute to regional economic development nationally and regionally.

Between January 1986 and December 1991, the program drew about 7,500 applicants, with total investments of approximately $1.5 billion. Furthermore, they created some 10,000 jobs in Canada.

• (1720)

To improve this program, we will establish national standards, with provincial input, for the kinds and levels of investment provided by the program.

Furthermore, we will take measures for more effective enforcement of the program rules so that Canada can get as much as possible from it.

The generosity and openness of the immigration program shows our understanding of the value of immigration and the role it has played and continues to play in developing this country.

We must ensure that this essential national program continues to promote Canada's prosperity and unity for generations to come.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I listened to the minister with a great deal of interest. I know that she has been particularly involved in the immigration and refugee considerations.

She has had a very attentive ear to many of the concerns that I have expressed. I have listened to other colleagues who have problems with humanitarian concerns. I, on the other hand, have found the minister very open and very understanding. There are constraints that she faces and I understand that. Notwithstanding that, every humanitarian case is a very difficult one. If I follow up on the observations of my colleague from Toronto, I do not think that any of us would find the task of making decisions on people's lives very easy. I certainly would not care to think about the sleepless nights that must be involved.

There is one area that I want to ask the minister about. I hope she can perhaps clear this up. As the minister well knows, 95 per cent of the people who come to this country are not trying to crash the gate. She knows from the process that has been in place that these are rightful seekers of justice at the door of this country. What about those who have been caught in the backlog for two, three and four years, who have established themselves here? They had reasonable and credible grounds when they first came here to be accepted as refugees.

Circumstances changed in their country. They could go back now, so we say, but they have established themselves with a life here, having children here. Does the minister not think at this point, when we did not bring in administerial review and a sort of general amnesty that these families who are established with a good job, who are working well, who have been here three or four years, who have children and new children born here, should automatically receive special consideration and humanitarian consideration?

[Translation]

Mrs. Vézina: Madam Speaker, what we are trying to do with this bill before us today is to give ourselves the best tools and instruments to manage our immigration program effectively, and of course we also want to improve our refugee determination process.

With the changes we are making, we wanted to clarify the act and to have regulations so that we no longer depend on procedures which in the past unfortunately led to such large backlogs, to which our colleague refers.

It is important that this revision enable us to select effectively those who want to come to Canada. With the bill before us today, we also want to protect Canadian society from applicants who abuse the system and we especially want to simplify the process.

What will happen to the backlogs? It will be up to cabinet and the minister responsible for immigration to make the appropriate decisions. The important and urgent thing was to make these amendments so that we finally have what we need to manage the system properly, while maintaining this humanitarian tradition that Canada has always had and of course respecting refugees. Always remember that there is an immigration system but also very specific treatment for refugees, who are selected individually and can appeal.

I think that this whole process, which we are trying to make as humane as possible, makes Canada what it is, a welcoming country; it shows respect for those who respect our system.

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for the good speech that she made earlier. I would also like to emphasize three points that are often brought to my attention in my riding.

Many people in my region, whether they are officially recognized refugees or immigrants, want to settle and work but have difficulties doing so, for various reasons. Let me give you the example of a doctor.

A doctor must go back to school and start his studies all over again because the Quebec Medical Association—or even that of Canada, but I refer in particular here to Quebec's—does not allow a qualified doctor from another country to start practising immediately. I am convinced that we would help some regions—I use the example of a doctor, but of course there could be other occupations—by recommending to immigrants that they settle in those regions. In fact, the majority of regions do not have immigrants. Occasionally, I talk to my colleagues about immigrants and they do not even know to what I am referring. I will not repeat the little joke that I tell them, but since they do not even know about this issue, they cannot discuss it.

I think this will be a very good thing, because it will help the regions that need qualified people but cannot get them because Quebecers or Canadians do not want to go there. I am convinced that there is an endless number of immigrants that will be proud to come to Canada and to work in those regions to help the local population.

The second stream, which is of great interest to me, concerns spouses and children. I will talk briefly mostly about spouses.

I know of spouses that have had to wait two and even two and half years. When people get married, they want to live together and not be separated by continents and have to phone to hear from each other. I once told a minister that if he and I were in that situation, people would hear us say things that would not be very nice.

Again, I congratulate my colleague because I believe that this second stream is very important, especially as regards children and spouses.

I now want to say a word about job creation. This afternoon, when I was coming back from my riding, we got talking on the famous Constitution and on job creation. We need investors to create jobs. The investors program has already created 10,000 jobs. This is extraordinary. Several people from Hong Kong are now settling in my riding to create jobs. I congratulate the two ministers for having included this stream in their program.

Mrs. Vézina: Madam Speaker, I will simply say that it is perfectly in order to think about remote areas, and I can say that where I come from, there are not many immigrants. It would definitely be a big plus to be able to attract skilled immigrants, and the medicine field is an excellent one. Indeed, where we have problems attracting doctors, such as in remote areas, it would be great if, through an immigration policy, we could give provinces the responsibility of identifying the qualified resources to improve the quality of life.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I want to thank the minister for participating in the debate on this bill this afternoon, and I also want to thank her for the help that she provides to all the members that raise with her issues dealing with immigration.

I want to ask her why the government does not give refugee status claimants the possibility of an appeal on the merits of their case, following a negative decision from the refugee board. The minister knows that in Rabbi Plaut's report tabled in the mid-1980s, non-governmental organizations, churches and lawyers specializing in immigration issues all recommended such a right to appeal based on the merits of a case.

• (1730)

She must also know that not having a right to appeal leads to requests based on humanitarian considerations which end up on her desk or her colleague's. She also knows that such requests are rather futile. According to statistics compiled by non-governmental organizations, in Ontario and Quebec, only 23 out of 3,485 requests for humanitarian considerations were accepted in 1991. She knows why an appeal on merit is important. A claimant may present evidence that he was unable to corroborate at the initial hearing. For several other reasons that I intend to explain in my speech shortly, an appeal is necessary. Why did the government not accept this right to appeal? Could the government consider such an amendment when this bill is studied?

Mrs. Vézina: Madam Speaker, I can reassure this House that even after the act is amended, everyone will still be able to demand fair and equitable treatment. Even under this new legislation, every case will be considered individually, in a humanitarian way. Of course we will be able to make the appropriate decisions based on personal circumstances.

As I was saying a little earlier, what we are trying to do with our amendments to the act is to maintain this balance between our humanitarian tradition in dealing with refugee claims and reliable and efficient management of our immigration system.

[English]

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, we all ought to know that Canada is a country built by immigrants and which continues to depend heavily on immigrants for its growth. It is this fact which has created on Canadian soil a unique multicultural society.

My own riding, Mount Royal, is a microcosm of that Canadian dream that has drawn so many millions of people to this land, whose diversity is a source of cultural and economic wealth and is proof of our potential to make not only this century but the next one also, a century of Canada's greatness.

The matter of immigration is a matter we all ought to take to heart. It is a very sensitive matter and it is a very emotional issue.

As a Canadian of Jewish faith I certainly know about refugees and I certainly know a great deal about immigration. I know about there being no safe haven, about the fact that there is no open door and about boats being refused at our ports. I know about that, as do many other groups in our society who have come here as immigrants. We all just have to think back to Nova Scotia and Newfoundland and their shores and the fears that were aroused with the Tamil arrivals and of the Sikhs.

There are groups, not only in my riding, but across this land that know about not having access or safe harbour with an open spirit at times. Times have changed, attitudes have changed and I would hope that Canada's great open spirit to that change will never close down.

Montreal is one of the great cultural mosaics in this country. The centre of that cultural mosaic is Côte-des Neiges, a Snowdon district, which is in my riding. The many cultures which coexist there side by side in this district has given it a degree of vibrancy, a sense of being alive and fascination and differences. We have learned not only to be tolerant, which I find not to be the kind of word I particularly like, but we have learned to have respect for each other. We live in that area of my riding in very close quarters under very difficult circumstances with a lot of emotional trauma that is accompanied by the impact of having to live as either a refugee with an unsettled case or as a new immigrant trying to find one's way, whether it be in the linguistic sense or the cultural sense, in a whole new milieu.

With this new mosaic that has built into this wonderful part of my riding, we have seen self-help groups arise. We have seen community service groups come into being. We have seen ethnic centres that are helping out and extending a hand. We have a wonderful place called Project Genesis that has done some wonderful work so there is better understanding about the cultural way of life, because it is a cultural way of life. It is different for each one of these groups that come here, whether it is landlord tenant relations, whether it is how you shop in the store, whether it is your transportation system, your education system, language at work, language at home, the mores of a society which are different from the mores of many of the societies from which these people come.

I can tell you that there are many aspects that go into the development of an immigration and refugee policy that must be taken into consideration. I guess that is one of the reasons I regret so sincerely that we have had closure called on this bill. This is one of the last bills on which this government should ever have considered closure.

This is a bill that touches the very fibre and heart and life cycle in this land. There are so many things that need to be discussed that are left out, never mind that which is included.

If we could perhaps have raised those issues it could have sensitized the committees when they went out to have some discussions. It is not only me and my riding. It is almost every single member of this House who spends hundreds and hundreds of hours with people who are stressed, who are concerned and upset. They do not understand why their children are behaving the way they behave. They do not understand our education system. They do not understand what the changes have done to their husbands from families that were patriarchal and where the mother is now the breadwinner and they have turned to a matriarchal society.

We need to do things to help the immigration and the integration into our larger society, not only for the people coming in but for those of us who are on the receiving end.

To be fair, there are many things in this bill which are interesting proposals and I hope will help us accomplish our national goals of prosperity. Indeed, we should encourage different forms of immigration and particularly those who can afford to invest in this country, those who have a spirit of or demonstrate a sense of entrepreneurial capacity or talent.

We have essentially three streams put in here. The first stream says "wealthy investors". I am not 100 per cent keen about wealthy investors. I am keen about people who are prepared to invest. What does wealthy mean? If you have $150,000, is that wealthy? If you have $200,000, is that wealthy? If you have $2 million, is that wealthy? If you are going to live in a major city, does that make you less or more wealthy, depending on the money you have in your pocket? I think it is a very difficult decision to make as to what is a wealthy entrepreneur. I suppose if you start in the millions and lots of zeros beyond which I am normally not able to count, that would be the wealthy investor.

What about the entrepreneur? I think that is very important. What about the independent immigrant? The reason I raise these three streams, whether it is the wealthy investor, the family member or the accrued refugee in the first stream which are fast-tracked, or the limited access, which are the parents and the grandparents, the self-employed, and people with job offers, or the third stream of entrepreneurs, independent immigrants, who are going to be based on point systems, these will all be defined in regulation, but not in the act. That means they can be changed around at will. There will be no accountability for the House of Commons. I think in a bill of this nature we need a serious sense of responsibility.

• (1740)

There is another aspect of this bill that I do not know how one gets around. People do not recognize the importance of immigration to the well-being of this country, that all immigrants are a boon to Canada, that they are the taxpayers, they are the consumers, they become the producers, and they become the employers. We have a very important study in that regard, the 1992 study of the Economic Council of Canada. They outperform native-born Canadians in labour force participation. No greater a percentage end up on welfare than do native born. That is a myth that people like to circulate which is unfounded. Almost 28 per cent have some university training as compared to approximately 24 per cent among native-born Canadians.

Studies by other learned institutions, and I have a lot of studies in front of me, debunk a lot of the myths, studies from the Laurier Institute and as I said from the Economic Council. I might get around to quoting some of them. Right at this moment they all support the findings that it is vital and important that we increase the people of Canada, the numbers of people who fill this vast land, through immigration. We are certainly not doing it through our own repopulation systems right here in this land. Immigrants are a boon and they are a treasure.

Is that message getting out? I do not think so. We have been sending wrong messages. It is very important that we change the language of discourse, the language that makes us feel that they are not an important asset and a boon to our society.

The fact is that the message that immigration is a blessing, as I said, is not out there. If it were out there, the fact that racists in our country continue to suggest or imply or insinuate that immigration somehow harms us, or takes away jobs, or dilutes our national identity would not be current, if we were doing our job.

The fact is that thousands of signed petitions against turbans as an acceptable headdress or a head covering for the RCMP officers would never have come in and been deposited in this House if we understood the significance of dress as a cultural part of life for certain streams of immigrants coming into this land. That does not make them any less or any better than any other Canadian.

The fact is that some suggest that racism is exacerbated by immigration to Canada of visible minorities, of people of colour. The fact is that some go so far as to suggest that only those immigrants who look and act "like Canadians", whatever that may mean, should be admitted because they will integrate more quickly into the mainstream of Canadian life and Canadian society.

That language is anathema to me. I find it would not be on the tongue, in the mouths or in the minds of people if we had done a proper job in the integration and in the instruction within our school system and within the larger society so that we could count those blessings for the blessings that they truly are.

Does the legislation dispel this myth in any way or any of the other myths about immigration? I do not believe so. Many pieces of legislation have come into this House with preambles that are absolutely overflowing with fanciful language that find no place in the law. This was a perfect time to put a preamble in that would indicate the strength and the importance of immigrants to the growth and the development of Canada.

Somehow or other there was such a rush to get this massive bill in here and through here we forgot some of the key phrases and the key thoughts that could have been there that would underscore the fact that the definition of Canada is unity in diversity. Whether it is the diversity of our geography, the diversity of our regions, the diversity of our people, the diversity of their colour or the diversity of their language, that is what has built this country. As we go across this land we can appreciate that and we can understand it. We should have written it into a preamble in this bill.

As we did not accompany this bill with any kind of an education campaign, I think we had better look to that as the next step so that we can debunk the myths that are out there.

One of the big concerns that I heard over the past weekend as I was home and saw large numbers, as all of us do, of constituents, is that they are very concerned about the lack of prior consultation. Many a group committed to Canada's present and future and committed to a fair and equitable immigration and refugee policy has expressed dismay at the lack of consultation which preceded the tabling of this important legislation. These groups are not opponents but are allies of Canada, Canadian immigration, and the minister. They know the immigration and refugee field well and they seek the best for our country. The minister would have been well advised to have consulted them.

Why did we hear there was no prior consultation? We have learned all too well in recent years how far a faulty process can go to derail even the best of proposals. I am not going to read chapter and verse in here about all the failures by this government since it came to power, the backlog, and all that business.

I have in front of me a number of press releases. I will read the B'Nai Brith Canada release which along with the Canadian Jewish Congress is well known for its interventions in the interest of a very good and healthy immigration and refugee bill.

I do not have to remind this House about the role of Rabbi Plaut in setting the stage for the first of the trilogy of bills that are in here. The B'Nai Brith says:

> That while the proposed changes to the Immigration Act introduced yesterday in Parliament address many issues in need of attention, the lack of prior consultation in drafting these changes and some of the proposed changes themselves are a cause of concern to B'Nai Brith Canada's Institute for International Affairs. The institute was deeply involved in the debate over changes to refugee legislation adopted by the first Mulroney government and has continued to express concerns over fairness and humanitarianism in the management of refugee change.
>
> As a community that has experienced the consequences of restrictive immigration and refugee policies, we are committed to the development of a fair and effective process in this area. B'Nai Brith has supported significantly increased immigration targets for Canada which is a country built by newcomers and which will grow primarily through immigration. While it is natural that Canada would act in its own interest in recruiting perspective immigrants we must never neglect our humanitarian obligations.

This is Frank Dimant, chief executive officer of the Institute speaking.

I would bring to your attention:

> The legislation does not deal with major concerns which have existed for some time regarding fair procedure. The appeals procedure is inadequate and the benefit of the doubt has been eliminated in requiring a unanimous decision by refugee board adjudicators hearing cases of individuals arriving without documents. Finally, refugee claimants should be able to work as soon as they make their claim rather than only once it is accepted. There are a few other points that are made here.

I often look at this saying you are supposed to arrive here as refugees with your documents. What are you supposed to do? Go back to the city hall and say please while I am running away to save my life and save my children could you please just go to your files and get out my birth certificate? Really there is some insanity that goes along with this whole thing.

With respect to the lack of consultation and the shortness of debate on this bill, the closure which I find totally unacceptable, I do not understand what the rush is. We have already got enough problems with this. I think we should do this, do it this time, and do it right.

The shift from legislation to regulation, I would like to move from process to the substance in a sense or to a substance process issue. The bill provides for far greater use of regulation by the minister and officials. Matters which were once in law are now going to be brought in through regulation.

I am sick and tired of this government bringing things in through regulation. There is a lack of respect for Parliament, the democratic process, and that must be corrected. The fact you have called closure is one example. The fact you like to do so many things by regulation. I will never understand why you want to do that.

One day you are not going to be the government and you are going to dump all this muck on the heads of this party. Who needs it. Thank you very much. Do your job. Put it in law. Never mind regulations that are going to drive ministers crazy.

An hon. member: You are not helping the Liberals.

Mrs. Finestone: I would suggest, as I said, the power of Parliament is being reduced. The system becomes more susceptible to abuse. At minimum these regulations should be submitted to Parliament for a review.

With respect to the obligation to settle in specific areas or in specific regions in terms of the substance of the bill, the legislation makes it easier for potential immigrants to gain admission to Canada if they agree—if you put it in regulations—to settle in a specific area where their particular skills may be needed.

• (1750)

Questions have already been raised in this House and around the country whether or not this is an infringement on mobility rights as set out in our charter. Did anyone check? Has anyone gone to see about court challenges?

I see the minister is coming in. I must have aroused his interest in some remark I made. Welcome.

I would really like to know from the minister if anyone checked about court challenges. I think it is very important to know whether the charter is going to stand up in this area.

The key to an immigrant's becoming a fully productive member of Canadian society is integration. I talked about integration.

Will adequate integration services be available to all those who settle in smaller centres? Will immigrants' integration be hampered by the absence of people of similar origin who may have been here for some years now?

Much of this is very important in the settling of people who are very, very uncomfortable when they first arrive here. Immigrants have been gravitating to Côté-des-Neiges in Snowdon because they see it as a place where they can establish themselves when they first arrive. There is a sense of tolerance and respect for differences in this community because people living close together here know they are all going through the same experience.

The last point I would like to make is this question of the excessive demands on health and social services.

When this bill refers to this excessive demand, are these code words for AIDS victims, for HIV-positive people? Are these provisions for more assuredly removing barriers for handicapped people, and people who seek to immigrate here who might cause us some extra weight on our social services? I do not know, but there are some serious problems there.

There are also serious problems in the refugee determination system. The government has given criminal images to refugees and wants to fingerprint them. It wants to do all kinds of things for refugees to find out if they are going to be abusers. I think the number of abusers we have had indicate we do not have to worry about it but if we did, we should have an appeal on merit.

I am sorry my time has come to a close. I would like to have addressed the question of a safe third country. A lot of work needs to be done when this bill goes to committee. I hope there will be an openness of spirit, and the legislative committee will not be like a kangaroo court. I hope we can make significant and important changes for these people.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, my colleague made a very good speech, but she said two completely different things.

[English]

One was positive, the other was negative.

We have been handling refugee status since 1985. I have attended 800 to 900 different meetings and we have consulted 500 to 600 different organizations. It always comes to the same thing. They want this and they want that.

When Bill C-55 came into effect I was against it because the committee had not made enough recommendations. Right now she is saying we should have more consultations. I think we have already had enough. Now this bill is applying some of the Bill C-55 recommendations, such as having one level for refugee status.

When people come in now and ask for refugee status, we will know right away if they are acceptable or not. Having just the one level will shorten the period by about a year and a half for them to attempt to go to the second level. We will have no backlog. It will be done within five to six months. Before with the first level they would say you might be a refugee. It looks like you have a credible basis, but you have to go to the second level to prove it.

Right now there is only one level. It is going to go much faster. It will be fast, efficient and honest for the people coming in, and they will not have to wait. People are not going to have to wait two and a half or three years to get to the level. They will already have been passed and accepted or not. There will be a better screening test and the refugees will be honest to goodness refugees. People in my riding are complaining that some are using the back door because it takes too long. Before Bill C-55 we had six or seven levels and now we have two. We said we should have one level and now we have it. Thank you very much, Mr. Minister. I consulted with him enough in the last three years and have said to every minister of immigration there should be only one level. There has been enough consultation, let us start the ball rolling. We are using closure because we have to. It should have been done yesterday. It should have been done six months ago.

Believe it or not, I agree with a Liberal that people do not know how much of an asset to the country immigrants are. One member from Toronto said we should make decisions, so let us tell the people out there in Canada immigrants are an asset. They buy clothes, shoes and food. They even buy from one of my stores. We definitely should have this.

Mrs. Finestone: I thank my hon. colleague from the other side of the House. I often tell people for the most part every one of us are friends behind the curtains, but we have different ideological points of view sometimes. I think we can be respectful of that difference.

We have gone to many meetings together. We have shared similar concerns with respect to many of the dossiers. We had great admiration for your stance as chairman of that committee on employment and immigration. It was not easy for you to take the courageous stand you took and we acknowledge that.

I would like to remind you our competent critic, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, indicated as early as last year, on May 21st I believe, we should have eliminated the two-tier system. We certainly should not have done what we did. It did not prove to be effective anyway, as 95 per cent passed the first stage of the hearing.

I think you would agree with me no one in this world is perfect. As refugees come across the border, who is to say the immigration person they see is not wrong? I think you would agree there is a potential margin of error. I would not even use the word "abuse" although that could be, depending on your point of view. We are dealing with a human life. We cannot afford a margin of error when we are dealing with a human life.

There has to be a method of review. There has to be the right to fair or due process. So when officers at the port of entry reject a refugee applicant, there has to be the right of due process. I think that was the nature of your question.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to say to my colleague from Mount Royal I share her view on the emotional trauma people go through. We cannot seem to get through to the government today the emotional trauma people experience when they are caught in the system and not getting the proper service.

I want to cite a very specific case. I have a gentleman in my riding whose name is Mohammed Ali. Mohammed was given his convention refugee status in November of 1990. He was told by employees at the Immigration and Refugee Board it would take approximately two years to get his landed immigrant papers. After a few months they asked for his fingerprints. They wanted to check to make sure he did not have a criminal record. Mohammed sent his fingerprints to the department and knew there was certification there had been no criminal record because it was an FBI clearance. He then went ahead and made arrangements to marry a person this summer from Sweden. The wedding was organized, but the papers would not come through. They discovered two months ago the department lost the fingerprints. We got another set of fingerprints taken but now because the department is so busy, they cannot be processed in time and he has had to call off the wedding. These are the kinds of things that really cause emotional trauma. If the minister had proper person-years to address these situations a lot of this frustration would be alleviated.

• (1800)

I want to ask the member if she can tell me why she thinks the minister refuses to give this department enough person-years to do this job properly.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I would love to be able to understand why this minister does a number of the things he does. I cannot answer that question.

I can tell you that I went to Hong Kong and pretended to be a refugee and an immigrant applying through the procedures in the Hong Kong office after having visited the Vietnamese camps there. I do not know how the staff in Hong Kong stand the stress. They are overworked and stressed. People are coming in with serious problems that create emotional tension. There is a building that has nothing but files in it. There are not enough people. I understand that New Delhi is worse. It takes anywhere from two to three years to even find the file. As members of Parliament we know how frustrating the whole thing is.

I would presume that the Minister of Employment and Immigration would love to have more staff. I would presume he has made an application to Treasury Board and I would presume that either the Minister of Finance or Treasury Board have been tight. If they are so tight, why do we have a $160 billion budget, a deficit and we are still short-staffed? I do not know the answer. I wish I could help but I am sorry, I do not have a crystal ball. I cannot answer that question.

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure this afternoon to take part in the debate on Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof.

I was somewhat surprised to learn how many pages were in this bill. When this is sent to the legislative committee it is going to have its work cut out.

I would also like to tell the people that are listening, as other members have said, because of closure we cannot make changes in it. There will be no changes made in this bill here in this House during second reading. The only changes that will be made will be made in committee and brought back to the House at report stage. Therefore, we do a disservice when we insinuate that because there has been a limitation to the amount of hours we will take in this House of Commons to debate this, it is against democracy and all those things that go along with that. That is not telling people the truth about how things work in the House of Commons here in Ottawa.

The member opposite also alluded to the fact that there have been no consultations. There have been continuous consultations on immigration matters. This is now the second bill we brought into this House since we came to power in 1984.

Canada has the most open and generous immigration and refugee program in the world. Unfortunately, over the past 10 years our generosity has been perceived as a weakness instead of a virtue. In short, I would say our generosity has been abused. This has been a sore point for many Canadians. When we extend our hand to others in friendship we are not anxious to have our hospitality spurned. Yet there are many who are quick to abuse us.

The tools of the multibillion dollar migrant smuggling trade are sophisticated and include colour photocopiers, high-tech printing techniques and new computer technologies. They challenge the ingenuity of Canadian immigration officials and law enforcement staff around the world.

This is the ultimate irony. People want to come to Canada because our society is open and tolerant. People can achieve anything to which they turn their hands. We have created such a society because of our parliamentary system and our belief in the rule of law. Law is paramount in Canada and all people are equal before the law. Yet to benefit from the society which our laws have helped create, many are quick to break those very laws.

I find this unacceptable. The residents of my riding of Fraser Valley East and indeed all Canadians find this outrageous. As generous as Canadians may be as a people, we will not be abused. Canada will defend the integrity of its society and the integrity of its laws.

Back in 1984, when I first entered politics, I included in my personal platform a pledge to do what I could to help restore control of our borders. I know that immigration has a positive effect on our economy, our standard of living and our quality of life. But an open door policy, a policy that is open to abuse does a disservice to all Canadians and immigrants alike.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration has risen to the challenge of the 1990s and has introduced amendments to the Immigration Act that meet these challenges. Among the proposed changes is a series of important measures that will help those at the immigration desk and in the field to give better protection to all Canadians and our way of life. That issue is a matter of effectiveness. All of the best policies are not worth very much if those who are to administer the policies are not given the tools to carry out their jobs.

Consider that customs officers can search a suspected smuggler for something as innocuous as perfume, a lighter or a watch. Yet we have all heard of the limits imposed on customs officers when they are confronted with an individual who claims refugee status and cannot be searched even when a passport is visible on their person. The limits are astounding. These changes are coming none too soon.

There are also the stories of smugglers collecting passports during a flight so that they can be destroyed and refugee status can be claimed. What about those who file duplicate refugee claims under different names? The time has come to end such absurd abuses.

Really what we had in the Immigration Act up until now were limitations so that our officers were not able to carry out their duties as we would wish them to. They need to have that enshrined in law so that they can carry out the various things that people expect them to be able to do.

This legislation includes provisions that extend more discretion to officers to seize documents, to detain vehicles, to search individuals and to use fingerprints and photos to establish an identity. I do not apologize for giving this role to our officers because if we are going to have control of our borders, and we know that we want to have immigrants come to our country, we want the people that are willing to obey our laws. As well, we also want to make sure that they are the people that we desire to come here, that they are bona fide and are legitimate refugees.

Action is needed and action is forthcoming in this legislation. New provisions for document searches and a restructured system of fines are proposed to deal with these document couriers and others who would abuse our generosity and our hospitality. These migrant smugglers can be likened to the slavers of old. They prey upon the desperate and the downtrodden and they deal in people. Now they will be caught and they will pay. In fact those caught smuggling could face fines ranging from $100,000 and five years in jail up to $500,000 and 10 years in jail.

There are measures to allow removal of illegal entrants in an expedient manner. We are addressing the problems and we are taking the necessary action.

Are we putting up barriers to immigration and refugees? I say, hardly. The numbers of people we accept exceed 200,000 annually. What are some of the things that we have in this bill before us, Bill C-86?

We know that the Immigration Act requires the government to announce each year the number of immigrants to be admitted during the following calendar year. This announcement follows consultation with the various interested parties, including the provinces. However, the current act does not provide the authority to manage the admission of immigrants in such a way as to achieve the levels in the plan and to realize other policy objectives.

What is being proposed in this legislation is that there will be three new management streams. The first one would not be subject to fixed annual limits. What does this stream involve? This stream is of particular benefit to spouses and dependent children, in other words the immediate family members of people living in Canada, including adopted children.

• (1810)

One asks if the family reunification plan is alive and well. You bet your boots it is. It is alive and well and we encourage it. There are no limitations on that.

I want the people who are here and looking forward to having their family members join them to know that there is no cause for them to be alarmed about what is in this legislation. It will if anything help them be. It will help do away with some of the clutter that is clogging up the system.

People found to be convention refugees by the Immigration and Refugee Board and business persons applying under a revised immigrant investor program can contribute significantly to Canada's economic development.

Are refugees going to be welcome in Canada? Yes, they will be. Are there limitations? Are there numbers being put upon these refugees who land here and are claiming refugee status? No, there will not be limits placed upon them.

The second stream, what does it take in? It will deal on a first come, first served basis. What are some of the characteristics of what will be in the second stream? They will be the parents and grandparents of Canadian residents. They will be government assisted and privately sponsored refugees. They will be applicants who have arranged employment or are self-employed and apply to come to Canada as live-in caregivers, and people allowed into Canada under special programs that may be set up for public policy reasons.

What takes place in the third stream? This will be selected on the basis of excellence because they are the best in their category, for example the most highly skilled workers demanded by Canadian employers in a field for which Canadians are not available.

Those in stream three are subject to limits established in the annual plan. These are people who are applying to come as independent immigrants, people who are qualified in certain designated occupations, and people who are qualified entrepreneurs with business experience who can contribute to Canada's economic development.

When we look at the over-all scene of what is taking place in this bill, it is clear that Canada is open for people to immigrate to our country. We are encouraging people, but by the same token we are going to make sure we have adequate controls on the system.

What we are doing is ensuring that our system is effective. Fairness has been maintained. We will not sacrifice our commitment to fairness, but make no mistake about it, we will not be abused. We cannot afford to sacrifice effectiveness in the name of fairness.

This legislation contains, as I have outlined, a balanced approach that considers and safeguards the principles of fairness and effectiveness. Too often we hear about rights and about freedoms. What we do not hear enough about, what we can never hear enough about, is the responsibility that must necessarily accompany rights and freedoms.

Freedoms and rights come at a cost. That cost is responsibility back to the society which extends the rights and freedoms. There is nothing worse than when we have freedom without responsibility, because then we have irrational behaviour and sometimes we have illegal behaviour.

In Fraser Valley East the community is comprised in large part by descendants of immigrants. We have all come to the Fraser Valley to build a better life for ourselves. We have worked hard and we have created a wonderful community, a community which welcomes immigrants with open arms. We do not welcome abusers who pervert our system and break the laws. We welcome those who will meet their commitments to our society and those who will become responsible citizens in our country.

Our generosity is great. Our tolerance is great, but we will not be abused. This is the message I have heard from my constituents. This is the message I have endorsed and relayed to the minister on more than one occasion. I am happy to see that the minister is taking action, and I encourage all members of this House to support this legislation.

Before I sit down I would like to reiterate that if there are things which are flawed in this legislation there is a means of correcting those flaws. That can come from any side of the House. We do not want something to go forward that will cause problems in the future.

We want something that will help make sure people are treated fairly and we also want to make sure that it is not letting people jump the queue, so to speak, to get in other than at the times they have been selected to come to Canada. We know that during the closing of this debate at second reading, which will be later on this evening, there will be a legislative committee struck to work over the summertime so that some time in the early fall this bill will be brought back to the House. Hopefully there will not be too many amendments but if amendments are necessary, I sincerely trust that the committee will endorse these amendments and bring them back to the House so we can deal with them to make sure the legislation is correct in every way possible that we know how. We are only human. We are not perfect but nonetheless I am committed to make sure we do the best job we know how.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to my colleague who said, I believe that Canada was one of the most advanced in the world when it comes to admitting immigrants. I would not say that Canada is the most progressive, but I agree with him when he says that we have an enviable reputation over several countries for having admitted so many immigrants.

As an immigrant myself, I can tell you that, so far, I have found Canada to be a very welcoming country indeed, but I am concerned about this bill, because I get the feeling that government is trying to further limit access to Canada for immigrants. Let me give you two examples and then ask my colleague to comment.

The first thing I noticed was this: there are presently hundreds of thousands of claims in the system and I suggest that the power to cancel them retroactively is an abusive power which could be challenged under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Second, I know from my experience as a member of the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee that government demanded maximum mobility on the part of Canadian workers to move from one place to the other, to work where they want them to, precisely to ensure Canada remains as competitive as possible.

What we see in this bill is the exact opposite of what we were advocating, what we promoted before the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee. Government can prevent immigrants from going where they want. It can force them to stay in the same place—say Moose Jaw, La Prairie, the Saguenay or Chambly—for a number of years. It can force them to stay there for a given length of time. On the other hand, I wonder how it will manage to enforce such regulations.

Why is this government which is so anxious to avoid challenges under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as we have seen with the referendums legislation, prompting such challenges by acting the way I just described in these two examples?

[English]

Mr. Belsher: I want to thank the member opposite for his intervention and for his questions.

What we are trying to do here is work with the provinces. The provinces want to end up having some say as to what will happen with regard to people who come into Canada and they want to see if they can have some influence on that.

• (1820)

I see nothing wrong with that. I think it is perfectly legitimate. We already have an agreement worked out with the province of Quebec. I know British Columbia has actively pursued working out an agreement with the federal government with regard to immigration.

Various provinces have desks around the world to seek out people who want to come to their province and to help set up businesses in their province and they will do everything they can to assist them.

The member opposite asks whether it is wrong to force people to go to a place. I do not think there is anything wrong in asking people to come and make a commitment that they will stay for x number of years in a particular area. If people want to come to Canada and seek this as their home, I see nothing wrong with asking them to make that sort of commitment ahead of time.

He talks about the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The charter says everyone will be treated fairly under the law. If a person is going to say he would like to come to this country and he will stay in a particular place, and then after he gets here he goes and claims the charter is against him, that person is being dishonest with us. We do not want people who are dishonest with us, when they do not put down on paper what they say they will do when they come to our country. Everyone wants to hide behind the charter as to what they will do.

We want to try to discourage that. Such is the case that people get on an airplane with papers and suddenly when they get off the airplane they no longer have papers. What happened? Did they disappear into thin air? We have to have the ability to take corrective action.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I would like to invite members of the House and people who read Hansard or who are watching this debate on television to really question the speech that was delivered by the member for Fraser Valley East. I want to point out that the member started off by saying that Canada has the most open and generous system in the world but then alleged that the system is too generous and people are taking advantage of it. He introduced no evidence whatsoever to support the claim that people are taking advantage of our system.

He also said that Canada must defend the integrity of its society. Again, the assumption is that the integrity of our society is in danger. There is no support for such a sweeping statement.

He then said when he was elected he pledged to restore the control of our borders, again suggesting that somehow Canada has lost control of its borders. Again, he introduced no evidence to that effect and I certainly would challenge him on that point.

The member was engaging in a pretty familiar technique which is to set up a straw man and then knock it down. I would really like to tell him that I feel he was engaging in a pretty cynical exercise which is called fear mongering or scare mongering among Canadians that somehow the gates of the country are open and the hordes are about to descend upon us.

The Canadian council for refugees in a press release dealing with the government's legislation said that it is disturbed by the language and orientation of the government's statements. The emphasis on control and abuse, not justified by any available statistics, will undermine public sympathy for refugees. That is the kind of cynical exercise that this member and this government are engaged in.

Mr. Belsher: Madam Speaker, I take great exception to what the hon. member opposite has been saying. Where I come from there have been refugees who have been sponsored into our area and they have been well received and well looked after. They have been a tremendous asset to Fraser Valley East.

We also make no apologies for wanting to have control of our borders as to whom we invite to come to our country and that is what this bill is talking about. I make no apologies for that. That is what is taking place in this bill before us here today.

We have a situation now in which our officers are not able to carry out their jobs adequately. There are instances of that. I do not have them chapter and verse here. He knows it.

That is what this bill is addressing. I encourage members to let this bill go forward to committee so that it can be scrutinized in a very thorough manner.

I think is only right. There will not be a single amendment made to this bill here in the House during second reading. It will all be done in the committee room and there will be weeks and months of work at the committee level. That is what is necessary and I endorse it on that basis.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak on this very important legislation from the point of view of my own constituents. Surrey is the fastest growing riding in Canada and is now nearly the largest one. We have had an increase of 10,000 households since the last election and many of these people who are moving into the riding are new Canadians or recent immigrants who come from diverse backgrounds: eastern Europe, Central America, Latin America, the Philippines, India, China and the British Isles.

The community has been blessed by this diversity, particularly with the Indo-Canadian community. It has contributed greatly to our economic strength, being involved in small business, labour organizations, gardening and agriculture. It has added greatly to a social milieu within the community, particularly its concepts of family and community responsibility. It holds very strongly to assisting not only its own families and extended families but other people in that community. It has added greatly to the richness of the culture, the language, the music and the food.

I also have had many of these people and their friends and relatives approach me about the problems of immigration. This bill does nothing to address their concerns and the concerns of the average Canadian. This bill does a couple of things that are diametrically opposed to what most people say they want to see in terms of immigration.

First of all, it makes fast-tracks for the wealthy. The person who is in a position to invest a lot of money in Canada is given priority and as some people say he is allowed to buy Canadian immigration status and a Canadian citizenship.

It is fixed. It is proposing to speed up the process for spouses and children but I will tell you that it was done administratively a year ago and it is now taking less than six months for most countries to unite spouses and children with relatives in Canada. Therefore it is not going to do anything for that because it has already been fixed administratively. It only needed the will of the government.

It is changing the fundamental concept of what the family is. Particularly, it is down playing the idea of extended families. In many of our communities the family is more than the mother and father and minor children. A family is parents and grandparents. A family is adult children who are not married. This bill now puts them into a lower category in which it is going to take a long time to be processed.

It puts an emphasis on recruitment of skilled workers at a time when people tell me this government should be putting more money into training within Canada to ensure that we have the skills we need in our work force. Let us not rely upon immigration as a method of recruiting skilled workers when we should be building up the strength within our own community.

• (1830)

In this whole business of immigration, there is concern that the policies reflected in this bill do not reflect the values of Canadian society.

Another thing that is not addressed in this legislation is the real problem in administration of immigration throughout the world.

Recently I had the opportunity to travel to India and to see the numerous problems facing immigrants and people applying for visitor visas in the immigration office in New Delhi.

First of all, it was obvious the office was dramatically understaffed. The immigration case-load had grown from 6,900 in 1986 to 12,300 in 1991 with no increase in staff. This resulted in tremendous pressure on that office.

Of the cases coming to the office in New Delhi, 75 per cent come from the Punjab. It is difficult and even dangerous for many of the Sikhs to travel from the Punjab down to New Delhi.

The government is talking about opening a second immigration office in Bombay. I have been urging this government to open up an immigration visitor visa office where it is needed. That is in the Punjab.

Within the New Delhi office there is a problem with interpreters who understand the Sikh religion and customs. One must remember that the bulk of the people applying for immigration from India are Sikhs and from the Punjab.

There are approximately 80 locally hired staff in that New Delhi office. In other business establishments in New Delhi obviously there are Sikhs working, but in our Canadian immigration office which is dealing with 70 or 75 per cent Sikhs or Punjabi-speaking people, there is no one who is Sikh.

I went with one of my staff members who is fluent in Hindi, Punjabi and English. We sat in on an interview and the interpreter misinterpreted the interview. These same people are advising Canadians on what is Sikh religion and custom as it pertains to immigration. For example: "Is this a valid marriage? No, it is outside the custom". The people who are giving that advice do not know what the religion and custom is and they will give our officers incorrect advice. I have suggested they hire some Canadian-born Sikhs to work in the office. They hire local.

There are physical problems at the embassy. People line up from three o'clock in the morning and stay all day hoping to get a chance to get a ticket to see an immigration officer. There are no washrooms available, no water available, no shelter. That kind of a situation in a Canadian embassy would not be tolerated in any other part of the world where 300 people line up starting at three o'clock in the morning and we do not even make washrooms or water available. The temperature gets up to 40 degrees.

In the administrative process of handling immigration there are things we repeatedly make people come back and forth from the Punjab to New Delhi for. For example, we refuse to have medicals done in the Punjab. Why do we not designate four doctors who are authorized to do medicals in each of the major cities? If they submit medicals that are not appropriate, we strike them from the list. It is very easy. Some people have had to come back not only two but three times to get medicals because they last only six months and their name has not come up for immigration.

There is also another problem that this legislation has not dealt with that is as much a problem and that is the issuing of visas for visitors. Visitors visas are issued arbitrarily by the officer, with no right to appeal. The officer says: "I decide that you are not a bona fide visitor". They do so on whim and I will give you a couple of cases and our response.

I know a young man who is the president of a travel agency for all of southern India. He has been to Canada three times. He has been here with his wife and his daughter. He has always returned home. His sister is a very prominent Canadian. He applied for a visitor's visa to visit his sister for two weeks. He wanted to bring his daughter, an eight year old. His wife was going to stay behind because of her job. Immigration said he could not bring his daughter because he might abandon her in Canada. He was told he had to come the six hundred kilometres from Kerala to Delhi.

Another woman applied to bring her two children to visit her parents in Canada. Her husband was going to stay behind. She had a job to go back to. They had land in India. She was told she could not come to Canada unless she left her two infant children behind. In other words, the Canadian government said that it would hold the children hostage to guarantee the woman's return. That is the kind of decision that is being made on visitors' visas.

When my assistant was getting married, her grandmother and grandfather applied. The immigration officer gave her grandfather a five-year multiple entry visa and denied her grandmother for absolutely no reason. It was an arbitrary decision.

The community is relying on priests in Jutha to help them within their religion. Immigration arbitrarily says this man is a farmer because in their custom and religion the guy does more than just be a priest and therefore they will not allow him to come.

We have made very strong recommendations that people who have visited Canada, the United States, North America and have returned to India should be granted visitors' visas without the need of going all the way to Delhi for an immigration interview.

The general interpretation of the legislation is that the onus is on the person who must prove beyond any doubt he or she will be going back home. The fact that the immigration officer says you are going to abandon your husband, your children and your farm and stay in Canada, that is nonsense. We need a reasonable interpretation that the person is a reasonable visitor.

Parents and grandparents should automatically be given five-year visas. A grandparent coming from England can come and go when he or she wants. Why do we not give a five-year visa and simply let them come and visit their children and grandchildren when they wish to and go back home when they wish to. Let us give special consideration to issuing visitors visas for priests in Jutha.

My concern is that a lot of the problems in the issuing of visitors visas from New Delhi are based on the arbitrariness of immigration officers.

Mr. Mills: Who are overworked.

Mr. Karpoff: Now we have in this bill that a lot of the same types of arbitrary decision-making powers are going to be given to officers as they deal with other areas within the immigration and refugee process. They are going to be able to arbitrarily make decisions.

I want to talk about two or three other points of administration before I start talking about some of the refugee problems. We have another tremendous administration problem in immigration in Canada.

• (1840)

People in my riding who have applied for immigration, who have been here and are now eligible to become Canadian immigrants, because of the delays in processing their applications sit there for 18 months or longer from the time they have completed their qualifications to become a Canadian citizens until they actually get Canadian citizenship. They have met all the requirements. They simply need the opportunity to go before an immigration judge, satisfy the judge that they meet the requirements, and go before the citizenship court.

There are delays now, long delays of a year, 18 months and more. We are taking a person and depriving him of job opportunities. You cannot work for the province of British Columbia unless you are a Canadian citizen. You have other losses that you are suffering. This legislation does not deal with any of the real issues that most Canadians and immigrants are concerned about. It does not deal with the real issues. It deals with the straw man model that there is a real problem with fraud in the refugee section and there is a real problem in fraud in the immigration section. There are people who are coming here who are unqualified, who do not want to work or are going to end up on welfare. That is not true.

There is another thing that really disturbs me about this piece of legislation and that is the government's approach to it. This is a significant change in immigration legislation. It is fraught with problems that are ill–thought through. What does the government do? It waits until three or four days before Parliament rises. It introduces the bill in the House. It forces it through the House on closure so we have basically two days to debate it, discuss it or look at the implications.

It is a huge bill. This is not a one–paragraph bill. It is 110 pages and some of them are very complex. They are difficult to understand. Now what is the government proposing? During the middle of the summer it proposes to rush this through a committee.

People out there in the community are in the process of getting ready for summer holidays. They are going to be away. Ethnic organizations, religious organizations, immigrant organizations are winding down for the summer. Their staffs are going on holidays. They are not going to be able to get together in two weeks, prepare detailed briefs in response to all of these technical questions and interpretations of law and legislation, get it presented to this government and have it properly considered over the summer.

What is the hurry? If the government really feels it is right, why did it not bring this legislation in two years ago when there was lots of time? We would have had two or three years. Why is it waiting until the dying days of its mandate?

Some people in my community over the weekend suggested to me it was a another sceptical ploy to try to see if it could get before Parliament as an election issue rather than take a serious look at the needs of Canada in terms of immigration to look at our history. Under this piece of legislation my father would have never been admitted to Canada. Maybe some of you on that side feel that is quite acceptable. I will bet most of your parents and grandparents would not have been admitted to Canada either.

The people who have built this country, the people who have made this country strong, the people who have enriched this country are the ones who are no longer going to be admitted. That is a shame. It is more shameful when there is an obvious attempt by the government side to push this through the House now, to push it through committee during the summer when organizations will not have the time and resources to properly bring before the committee their concerns about the bill and then bring it back either late in August, as we are now even hearing rumours, or early in September and dump it through the House. I do not think that is acceptable.

I want to close by saying one additional thing and it has been mentioned before. Canada needs immigrants. We have a growing elderly population and the percentage is growing significantly. We need to have younger people to develop the strengths within our community.

We also need to ensure that the diversity of Canada which is its rich heritage is continued. An open and liberal immigration policy is what is needed.

[Translation]

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the remarks of the hon. member opposite.

When the hon. member mentions that it takes at least six months for a spouse to enter this country, has he talked to the immigration critic?

Moreover, he mentioned that we should have additional manpower in New Delhi and he quoted a case in point. If we increased our staff in New Delhi, creating additional expenses, what would his reaction be?

I went to New Delhi and I was able to see all the people lining up. If we agreed to increase our staff, what would happen to the many hundreds of people waiting in line? Would that speed up the process? To do so, we need sound criteria and I think we can do it with what we already have.

The member also mentioned that it could take one or one year and a half to get an immigration visa. I do not want to enumerate all the changes that will affect family members and multicultural communities. When they will all come into effect, an immigration visa will be granted faster to a refugee's close family members, whether they are already in Canada or not, and whether they are in the applicant's country of origin or not.

Has the member carefully reviewed all the changes that will be made? A moment ago, he said that we should have done it two years ago. I must say that I am puzzled by that. The law was already in place two years ago, we are simply improving on it. Believe me, we have been working very hard for the past two years to improve this piece of legislation. This bill is a very good one.

[English]

Mr. Karpoff: Mr. Speaker, I consulted with immigration people in New Delhi and they said to me that they need a minimum of six full-time additional immigration officers. What would be the effect? It would cut down on the line-up so maybe people would not be waiting around for 11 or 12 hours.

Maybe they would not deal with visitor visa applications so arbitrarily. Maybe they would sit there and listen to the person for five or ten minutes and actually find out why they wanted to come and get the correct information instead of arbitrarily dismissing them. Maybe they would not make arbitrary decisions that say, for example, this is not a legal marriage or a proper marriage because the woman is older than the man.

In some parts of India that is not considered custom but in the Punjab it is done all the time. Maybe if they had more time, they would make better judgments. They would be more humane judgments.

That is what is necessary in order to increase it. You talk about the six months.

Mr. Jourdenais: You are lucky if you get it in six months.

Mr. Karpoff: After much yelling and hollering for the last three years and documenting cases, one year ago last summer, unbeknownst to this government, the officers in New Delhi took it upon themselves, with the sanction of the senior bureaucracy in Ottawa, to change the procedure.

• (1850)

They simply said it is unacceptable that a spouse who has been waiting three years, four years—I have one who has been waiting six years—to come. They said they are going to process them in six months.

Other than in a case where there is a problem with the documentation, they have lived up to that and they are processing spouses within six months. In fact, they are doing it within three months and four months by simply changing their policy.

This legislation only now sanctions what the people through their own initiative in the Delhi office were able to do simply by changing their procedure. They simply said: "We are going to do it. We are not going to put them to the bottom of the pile and let them sit there for three or four years".

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the member for Surrey North on his remarks. I think he really communicated the emotional frustration we all experience very well.

I want to hear his views on an idea that I put to the minister earlier today when I was asking him specifically about giving members of Parliament some authority to have conditional approvals on some of the applications that are before the system, that are delayed because of the lack of person-years in the department due to their inability to catch up.

The minister in this legislation seems to be very quick in giving all of this authority to unelected officials, but he does not seem to want any authority given to members of Parliament. Quite frankly, we are much more accountable to our constituents.

In other words, we are certainly going to be put in a harsh light if we put someone through the system on a conditional approval if it were the kind of person who was scamming the system or to quote the Solicitor General, who I think called them riff-raff.

My concern is that the minister seems to be so rigid in his way. He does not want to recognize that we as members of Parliament could be part of this solution. I just wonder what his remarks would be on that. We do sign passports and why not immigration cases?

Mr. Karpoff: It is a novel I idea but my first reaction to it is I did not get elected to Parliament to become an immigration officer.

Mr. Mills: But we are.

Mr. Karpoff: No, we are not. We sign passports saying this is the person's picture and we know them. I really think that would end up being a sham because in my riding I would spend all of my time reviewing refugee cases in detail. As it is now, my staff spend too much time.

The government mucks up, the government has improper procedures, the government does not have a system in place. I do not think the proper solution is for us then to take it over.

One of the things you get into is this whole arbitrariness, particularly with refugees. One of the things in this bill that bothers me is the provisions for removal of immigrants or landed people and how the government is proposing to broaden the arbitrary ability to remove people. I read this section and I wonder if this is really Canada. It says: "Provisions would be introduced to protect the disclosure of information obtained in confidence from foreign governments or intelligence agencies. The court would examine information in camera in the absence of the person to be removed, or his or her counsel".

Are you suggesting the MP become the person that hears that information in camera without the benefit of the person's counsel?

Mr. Mills: On humanitarian grounds.

Mr. Karpoff: This is on the same kind of arbitrariness. The government is setting in place procedures that are undemocratic, arbitrary, and not even open to the person to know what is going on.

The government in a case such as that can have CSIS quietly designate the organization as subversive and not say anything to the public. A person then goes to a social event sponsored by the organization and is removed from Canada after a hearing that is held in camera in his or his counsel's absence.

As an individual member of Parliament I certainly do not want to get involved in any of that kind of nonsense whatsoever. It is bad legislation. Let the government make proper legislation. Let the government deal with it in a normal administrative manner, but do it properly and humanely and with justice.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): The first five hours of debate are now expired.

[Translation]

Pursuant to Standing Order 74, I may remind hon. members that the maximum length of speeches is now 10 minutes, without questions and comments.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Terrebonne.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on second reading of Bill C-86, an Act to amend the Immigration Act.

When a main thoroughfare becomes so congested that rush hour becomes practically synonymous with traffic jams, constant slowdowns and drivers who never know when they are going to get home, city planners start reviewing their traffic plans. The expressways, intermediate roads and access roads they design will help deal with the problem. After that, traffic flows at a far more logical rate and the overall impact is more satisfactory. People spend less time on the road and the number of accidents decreases.

In recent years, the number of immigrants to Canada has increased regularly. This year, 250,000 immigrants and refugees will be admitted to Canada. They come to our country, attracted by the opportunities available to those who live in a country as rich as ours. And why not, when the United Nations ranks Canada first in the world for its quality of life? They also come to this country because economic and social conditions in their country of origin are such that they want to seek a better life for themselves. In any case, the number of people who are leaving their countries for political, economic or social reasons is constantly increasing, and this creates many new challenges for Canada and other industrialized countries.

We currently have an Immigration Act that was designed to manage the demands of simpler times. For instance, in 1980, approximately 1,500 people applied for refugee status. Last year, more than 30,000 people asked for our assistance: from 1,500 to 30,000 people per year in twelve years. This means that the situation has changed drastically and we can no longer take the same approach to the problem. Compare Germany, which expects 400,000 people to claim refuges status in that country this year.

However, we did not wait until the problem took on crisis proportions. Two years ago, the federal government introduced a five-year plan for immigration, setting the numbers and categories of immigrants we will admit annually until 1995. There is an element of response in this plan. However, today the time has come to update the instruments we intend to use to implement the action plan and that is the purpose of the amendments to the existing legislation.

The federal proposals include a new traffic plan that will help us accelerate the arrival of newcomers and fully integrate them in Canadian society, as quickly and as fairly as possible. We would do well to remember why Canada opens its doors to newcomers. There are three reasons for this. More often, it is to reunite the family of a Canadian resident. In other cases, the doors open to offer protection and asylum to refugees.

• (1900)

Last but not least, we regularly open our doors to independent immigrants and entrepreneurs whose presence here will strengthen our labour market or add to our expertise, technology or investment capital.

The amendments proposed by the federal government will divide our immigrant selection process into three streams or channels. Each stream would have a mix of candidates meeting our three main objectives, but the three streams would differ widely in terms of procedures and priorities.

Applications from qualified individuals in stream one would be processed as they were received, with no set limit on the total number approved in any year. These applicants would be processed in very precise time frames, such as within six months for spouses and dependent children.

This stream would include spouses, fiancés and dependent children of persons already living in Canada, all those recognized as convention refugees by our Immigration and Refugee Board and immigrant investors who are willing and able to invest in our economic development upon their arrival.

Stream two could also reflect our threefold interest in families, refugees and independent immigrants. This second stream would include parents and grandparents of Canadian residents, refugees sponsored by a government or a private organization and anyone benefiting from a special government program arising from a particular international problem, as well as applicants with reserved employment, working independently or admissible as domestic workers.

Applications from these people would be processed in order of receipt and, for the first time, the total number of applications in each category would be subject to limits set in the annual immigration plan. Processing time limits would be set for each application, according to the number of persons already in the system and the total provided in the annual plan. Once the limit for a category was reached, applications would be deferred until the following year.

Finally, stream three would include persons selected on the basis of excellence. There would be no refugees in this stream, since there is no connection between excellence and the need for protection.

Distant family members who are not in the other two streams will be classed with independent immigrants, sometimes in specially designated professions, and qualified entrepreneurs.

Only the best in each category, independent or entrepreneur, the most qualified or those whose qualifications were most in demand with Canadian employers would be selected. There would be precise limits for each category. In this stream as well, once an application was refused, the applicant's file would be closed. He or she would have to apply again.

In summary, these streams would speed the processing of immigrants. Stream one, the express lane, would enable us to process applicants rapidly within precise time limits. The new control measures for stream two, the intermediate lane, would help improve the flow of immigrants, but the processing times would not be as precisely guaranteed as for stream one.

The third stream would give us something that we greatly need, as we all know. We need a selection method based on success, but which in itself would take nothing away from generosity, a way of channeling excellence into the mainstream of Canadian society.

From the beginning, we wanted to be sure that with the changes made to the Immigration Act, the program would continue to serve the best interests of all of Canada and all Canadians. We are convinced that these amendments will help us achieve our objective, which is to have a fair, balanced, efficient program.

For all these reasons, I am pleased to support the bill and I will vote for it because it is what Canadians want.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to debate Bill C-86 which profoundly amends the present Immigration Act.

Let me begin by quoting from Sir Wilfrid Laurier's eulogy to the first and greatest Canadian Prime Minister: "The life of Sir John A. Macdonald—is the history of Canada".

The history of Canada at that time was one shaped by a vision of unity, of a binding from sea to sea. The cords that were to bind the country were the people, people of every race, colour and creed, of every language and culture, toiling to make a better life for themselves and those they loved.

Macdonald himself emigrated from Scotland. Laurier, the first Canadian-born Prime Minister, opened Canada to the immigration movement. He filled the land with hard-working souls who built the railways, ploughed the prairies, and mined the hard, unforgiving rock. Trees were felled. Towns were built. Boats of every size and shape plied the waters of the Atlantic and Pacific, bringing fish to port or goods to market.

The vision: the country came before region, unity before language and culture.

These two great men, one an immigrant, another Canadian born, began through the process of immigration a legacy of nation building that has set Canada apart in the world. Ours is a country that now is a shining example of compassion to immigrants and refugees.

Last Tuesday, June 16, the minister's office released a communiqué on Bill C-86. The opening paragraph read:

> Bernard Valcourt, Minister of Employment and Immigration, today announced a series of important changes to the Immigration Act which will ensure that the country's immigration system continues to contribute to the unity and prosperity of Canada.

Yet the message of the Minister of Employment and Immigration had a distinctly unpleasant after-taste. When he speaks not from prepared text his language really reveals and echoes the intent of his government. The message comes through loud and clear to the people on the other end of this legislation, refugees and immigrants and those who volunteer on their behalf, that what is in their bank account is of greatest importance when they reach Canadian soil.

In his press conference the minister remarked on bogus refugees and welfare cheats, on immigration scams and asylum shopping. He said:

> We are going to give ourselves the powers to stop welfare abuse.

I felt that in many ways the minister perpetuated myths that the government should be trying to refute, myths that our immigrants and refugees are a strain on the system, that they are a commodity to be managed, that they are to be accepted or rejected as mere commodities.

The minister perpetuates the myth that immigrants are a drain on the public purse, suggesting our welfare system is abused. Studies show that to the contrary costs associated with the arrival of foreigners are short-term and that a much lesser number of them go on welfare compared to Canadian-born citizens. Also, immigrants take jobs that have been shunned by Canadians or for which there are not enough qualified people in Canada.

The Employment and Immigration Advisory Council reported Canadians need to be educated on the benefits of immigration. Yet the government has never supported such an education campaign. For its good advice the advisory council was axed by this government. The minister himself repeats the cheating immigrant myth, telling the media at his press conference about a refugee collecting multiple welfare cheques.

• (1910)

Why has the minister not highlighted the achievements of Canadian immigrants instead?

These people include: Wilder Penfield, founder of the Montreal Institute of Neurology, an American turned Canadian and one of the foremost brain specialists of our times; Timothy Eaton from Ireland and Sir Donald Smith of Scotland, who headed two of the largest chains of department stores in Canada and who were players in our history; Tommy Douglas, also Scottish, who broke the ground for some of this country's most loved social programs including medicare; and more recently we think of Dr. John Polanyi, a Canadian chemist and Nobel prize winner who was born in Berlin and immigrated to Canada in 1934.

Canadian arts and culture have flourished under the attention of immigrants like Ofra Harnoy, a world renowned cellist from Israel; Rohinton Mistry of India, winner of the 1991 Governor General's award for fiction; and Austin Clark, a novelist from Barbados.

Broadcasting owes much to Adrienne Clarkson who immigrated to Canada from Hong Kong. Rosemary Brown, advocate for women's rights, was the first black woman elected to political office in Canada. She came to this country from Jamaica.

Recognition for excellence in sports goes to Sharif Kahn of Pakistan, many times world squash champion.

For success in business, who could forget Thomas Bata, a Czechoslovakian who built the largest shoe manufacturing company in Canada.

For a legal luminary, do not forget Justice Bertha Wilson, born in Scotland, who was the first woman appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada.

As an immigrant from the Philippines and now a member of this Parliament, I take pride in the precedent set by these immigrants whose hearts and talents have long belonged to Canada. I can only aspire to the heights they as immigrants and Canadians have reached.

At that press conference soon after tabling the bill, the minister with his 113-page bill on the table before him was writing himself a blank cheque to be the one to manage the immigration system. In effect he is writing Parliament out of the process with regulations that bypass the legislative process. He is removing the rights of refugees to appeal Immigration and Refugee Board decisions to a court of law.

Precedents are abundant to show that a court of law has not always agreed with the decisions of the refugee board. Has this government forgotten that the courts are the fortress of law and justice, that democracy becomes meaningless if natural justice is denied? Have the minister and this government failed to remember that courts of appeal prove to the world the vitality of democracy by which we live? Truth does not have to be afraid of appeal, particularly in a court of law where men and women dedicate themselves to the noble pursuit of justice and understanding.

Arbitrary decisions on visitors visas in the past have also infringed on the rights of both Canadians and of their visiting family members.

Recently I intervened on behalf of a Mrs. Kaur from India, the sister of a man who died in my constituency. She travelled long and arduously from her home in the Indian countryside to the Canadian Embassy in New Delhi, applied and was denied. I intervened on her behalf, and after a prolonged agony a minister's permit was given. How many more Sarjit Kaurs are refused visitors visas every day?

Recently a constituent invited a relative from Ukraine. The visitor was refused admittance for similar reasons. Ukrainians until now had been prisoners in their own country, until the collapse of the Soviet Union. Is it not ironic that again they are prisoners this time because of Canadian immigration policy?

I would like to conclude by saying that this country was built by immigrants. It is a country that was not built overnight, yet overnight the government is trying to drastically change the whole immigration process. Some changes are good, but some changes are bad. We and the people who care about immigrants and the continued growth and prosperity of this country should be given time to study this bill.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too, am very pleased to stand here to speak to Bill C-86. The motion put forward by the immigration minister refers to the second reading and reference to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope of Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof and on the amendment by my colleague, the hon member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, seconded by the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys:

> That the motion before us be amended by deleting all of the words after the word "That" and substituting the following therefor:
>
> That Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be not now read a second time but that it be read a second time this day six months hence.

It is saying the bill should not be passed this evening but it should be given an extension allowing us the opportunity to scrutinize it.

The complex and extensive bill was tabled less than a week ago. There has not been enough time to carefully scrutinize it or to have broad consultation. It is disappointing the government has not allowed a full and open discussion about this most serious bill which would involve all parties concerned.

The government is attempting to regain votes lost to its extreme right-wing adversary, the Reform Party, by catering to the perception that the system is being abused and manipulated by a significant percentage of refugees and immigrants. Available studies prove that the opposite is true and that in fact, immigrants contribute far more to this country than they take away.

The language of the bill is disturbing in that it concentrates on issues of control and abuse and not on the interests of helping genuine refugees while at the same time streamlining the process.

We know that 95 per cent of those who come to Canada are approved for recognition as refugees in the first stage of the present system.

We need time to study this bill in order to offer constructive criticism. Instead, the government would rather blindly push the legislation through to suit its own political agenda. This fact has added significance when one considers that this legislation constitutes the most extensive revisions to the Immigration Act since 1978. There are obviously many flaws and we must have time to deal with the issues properly.

When we are dealing with refugees we are dealing with life and death situations. As the opposition critic for human rights, I know from experience that those who are sincere refugees—and the vast majority are—come to Canada to escape severe oppression and in many cases death.

Let us for a moment try to understand the people we are supposed to be helping through our system of refugee determination. According to article 1 of the 1951 United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees, a refugee is "a person who, owing to well-founded fear of being persecuted for reasons of race, religion, nationality, membership of a particular social group or a political opinion, is outside the country of his nationality and is unable, or owing to such fear, is unwilling to avail himself of the protection of that country".

In 1969, Canada signed the United Nations convention relating to the status of refugees and in 1989 Canada received the UN High Commissioner for Refugees highest award for humanitarian assistance. That speaks tremendously well of Canada.

In 1986, the Special Joint Committee on Canada's International Relations published a report entitled Independence and Internationalism. It concluded that Canada's refugee policies were consistent with the country's larger foreign policy objectives, namely humanitarianism, humanitarian assistance to disadvantaged peoples and our interest in a stable and just international order.

There are few countries in the world which have sufficient resources and the capability to provide temporary or permanent asylum to refugees. Canada figures prominently on that short list.

• (1920)

I submit that our enviable record has slipped. It has slipped at a time when the world needs us most. Environmental disasters, chronic famine and regional conflicts are factors contributing to the creation of new classes of refugees and give rise to even more confusion about what should constitute a precise definition of a refugee.

Recently, global trends have placed unprecedented pressure on Canada's refugee determination process. In 1981, 3,450 refugee claims were made to Canada. The 1980s saw a remarkable increase in claims. In 1987, there were 25,000 people claiming refugee status and by 1989 that number had increased dramatically to 95,000. We saw an incredible backlog as a result.

In order to deal with this the government introduced legislation in an attempt to streamline the process. The changes prove over time to be slow, open to abuse and grossly unfair to many of the refugees who get caught in this trap. Today, we look at the government's attempt at improving the process.

Many of the provisions proposed in this legislation deal with management of the system and with enforcement. Whether or not they can actually be considered an over-all improvement to Canada's immigration system is yet to be determined.

As has been the case with other bills passed recently by this government, Bill C-86 grants to the minister and cabinet a greater use of regulation and removes several matters from the law.

The measures included to speed up family reunification of young children, husbands and wives are indeed very welcome.

Our immigration critic, the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, recommended some time ago, on May 21, 1992, that those granted refugee status should be allowed to sponsor their families as soon as they are recognized as refugees.

One-third of refugees have spouses &/or children and many have been separated for over five years as they get caught in the extremely slow process. It makes sense to allow immediate reunification of refugees with their families since approximately 95 per cent of refugees are eventually granted landed status.

The bill also resurrects a safe third country provision which was opposed a few years ago in former Bill C-55. This allows an immigration officer to return a refugee applicant to certain countries which the applicant passed through on the way to Canada.

According to the Canadian Council for Refugees much decision-making has been taken away from the quasi-independent immigration adjudicators and given to senior immigration officers. The CCR continues that decisions that will be made without the claimant having a right to counsel. Genuine refugees because of that may be sent away at the border having no recourse at all.

Changes as well are proposed to the process of the refugee panel. In the present process only one member of a two member panel need approve the applicant for recognition as a refugee. Under this bill the approval of two members out of two will be required in certain cases.

Under the legislation the minister will be allowed to choose among applicants for immigration those he or she considers to be the best for one reason or another. This would replace the system of first come first served for a system of pick and choose. The cynical side of me can only guess which immigrants from which countries will get preferred treatment, especially if we were to believe the majority of the proposed changes are politically motivated.

Other changes include that the general stay for visitors visas has been extended from three to six months, but nothing has been done to correct the abuse in rejecting legitimate applications for visitors visas. The bill introduces more stringent provisions against potential terrorists and criminals involved in organized crime. It is not clear how freedom fighters, for example, would be distinguished from terrorists. I think it is critical that this distinction be made quite clear.

The bill also shifts a substantial burden from the government to transportation carriers for enforcement of the law. There could be serious implications here for cost accountability and control. It is interesting that the government is expressing such a desire to control immigration and the influx of refugees on the one hand and on the other hand to relinquish some control to transportation carriers. It just does not seem to make sense to me. One good provision is the inclusion of a system of discipline for members of the Immigration Refugee Board who misbehave or are negligent. There were several cases where board members were rude and ridiculed refugee applicants. I think most of us were quite shocked by that.

While it is good to clearly define what is acceptable behaviour, I am left wondering whether it is a politically motivated inclusion or whether it has been included in the interests of humanitarian concern for people who have already suffered enough.

There are a number of areas that have not been dealt with by this bill. There is no provision for an appeal on the merits of a case from decisions rejecting refugees at the border or at the refugee board. There is an appeal on questions of law to the federal court, but even this is restricted. No board is perfect and an appeal system is essential where human rights are involved.

While the bill will clarify and improve the enforcement provisions of the act, nothing is being done to clarify and improve the use of section 14, which provides for admission of refugees on humanitarian and compassionate grounds.

I prepared a 20–minute speech and unfortunately now have to cut it down to 10 minutes. There are a lot of other things I wanted to speak about, but obviously I do not have the time. Members on this side of the House and I believe the bill needs more study in consultation with immigration refugee experts. There needs to be genuine improvement, which will incorporate efficiency and compassion, not just attract some of the voters who have fled to the Reform Party.

This bill has serious implications for Canadians. To close debate and ram through bad legislation is a disservice to Canadians and a betrayal of the people of this world who are not fortunate enough to enjoy the same freedoms we do.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak for 10 minutes on this bill.

First of all, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Employment and Immigration. This is not a bad bill at all. This is a good bill that I think is welcomed by our constituents and Canadians from coast to coast.

It will help Canadian residents be reunited with close family relatives from abroad. It will commit Canada to providing shelter to legitimate refugees and it will promote the development of a strong and viable economy in all regions of this country.

The government is proposing a series of changes to the way we have been doing things since the last immigration act was passed in 1976. They are sensible, pragmatic and important changes that will ensure immigration continues to serve the best interests of all Canadians. Some measures will streamline the way we identify and receive refugees, while others will place more emphasis on attracting to Canada those with particular skills and talents we require. Others will reduce the abuse of these programs and clear up the inefficiencies to make the system fair to all.

The changes are needed because the context for our immigration program is very different than it was in 1976. Political and economic conditions around the world are less stable today. Natural disasters, regional conflicts and economic collapse have sparked large–scale and unpredictable movements of people. Some experts suggest as many as 80 million people are on the move at any one time.

In 1983, for instance, about 95,000 people sought asylum in OECD countries; in 1991 that number had jumped by 800 per cent to 700,000. Most of those asylum seekers would not qualify as refugees according to United Nations definitions.

There has been a blurring of the distinction between refugees and economic migrants.

At present, the number of individuals wanting to enter Canada is enormous. The demand is impossible to predict and moreover the classification of newcomers is far from straightforward. In this environment we need the tools to help us manage the ever–increasing demand on our immigration program and help us make the most straightforward determination and the best selection possible in the best interests of Canada.

Embedding efficiency and control in our system is particularly important right now, given the future all industrial nations face as we learn to deal with this mass movement of people. It is not a question of closing the doors as some have suggested. It is a question of managing our programs in the most effective way possible with the resources at hand in order to best serve the interests of this country.

• (1930)

One of the problems with the 1976 act was this. The federal government was given the responsibility of establishing the over–all level of immigration in a given year but it was not provided with the authority to actually achieve those levels. To effectively manage the immigration program, the Government of Canada requires that authority. It is given that authority in Bill C–86.

To make sure Canada's immigration program benefits all Canadians, we must be sure that our system is under control. Many of my constituents in Niagara Falls, through surveys they have returned to my office, through their letters, when speaking to me in the street, believe that we are in danger of losing control of the system. In that fear I believe they are right. That is why new enforcement measures are needed.

There are individuals on our doorstep who are very adept at circumventing immigration procedures and our laws. We see this in increasing numbers and we also see the sophistication of fraudulent documents, new techniques for avoiding legal entry, and methods of smuggling illegal immigrants into Canada. It is time for some new and appropriate tools to fight these and other forms of abuse which attack the integrity of our immigration program.

Within our borders things have changed too since the current Immigration Act first went into effect. The needs of provinces and regions for residents with specific skills and experience are an even greater priority now during a time of economic difficulty and increased urbanization than it was in 1976.

As well we have a much more pointed sense of where inequities in our system exist. For example, why does it take so long to process the applications of legitimate immigrants from around the world? It is one of the difficult things that all of us as members of Parliament face when we get constituents who say they have somebody in the old country who has filled out all the proper forms, they qualify, they have the medicals, they have everything in place and then they are told they may have to wait three years. That is a system that works in nobody's interest and it is one which should change.

These proposed changes will go a long way to reducing those kinds of frustrations for individuals immigrating to Canada. It will at the same time deter cheating at the time of entry and ensure that the balance among the three primary goals of our immigration system best serve Canadians.

The changes we propose will make that system fairer and more straightforward for everyone and that is why I support it. That is why I think all members of the House should support this legislation.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, I am going to begin my speech on Bill C–86, the immigration bill, by picking up where my hon. colleague left off. As a member on the government side, he said that this immigration bill is a bill which is going to provide a sense of fairness to the immigration procedure and process. I do not buy that. I do not buy that at all.

If you look at the bill carefully you can easily pick out five or six areas where it does not provide this fairness. I ask for my friends on the government side to bear with me and listen. Perhaps they will see why I consider the bill unfair.

First, we are talking about the requirement that we have developed where the wealthy get into this country no matter what their competency is, no matter what the need is. As long as they have money they jump to the head of the line.

It is like a new head tax except it is much more expensive nowadays. I guess the government is keeping a line on inflation and has decided if you have enough money you can come into the country. It is made even worse with this bill because they are given even higher priority. Actually we are making this injustice even worse than it was before.

The second objection I have concerns the speeding up of the reuniting of families. I understand this has already been done administratively. It is not necessary to have a bill.

We talk about reuniting families and allowing the working family to exist and allowing immigrants to work. However, by the time the paperwork is finished and the citizenship granted, what good does it do a family if they cannot earn any money because they are not Canadian citizens until about one year or 18 months after the paperwork has been done?

What happens to those people who are waiting for their paperwork to be processed? Some of the people in some provinces have to go on welfare. Some of the people in some provinces have to work illegally. They do not pay any taxes. The government is shooting itself in the foot because it does not allow these people to work. It takes so long to give them their citizenship that actually these people are withholding money the government legitimately should have through taxes. This bill does not even address that fundamental problem.

Third, we should look at the fundamental rights of immigrants when you come to this country. We are all immigrants to this country I suppose except for the First Nations. Perhaps I am one of the most recent immigrants. I am an immigrant from the United States.

When I talk about fundamental rights I know what that means when you are an immigrant and you come to that border and you are given an interview with someone who has more information on you than you know about.

I recall vividly when I went before the immigration authority seeking to become a Canadian citizen after renouncing my American citizenship, after being in the U.S. army for three years, after being honourably discharged, having spent my time in Panama. On the other side of the desk the immigration authority asked me if I had ever been in trouble. Had I ever been in trouble? I wish I had a dime for every time I had been in trouble. I would be a rich man today. I grew up during the turbulent 1960s.

I was in charge of a boycott in my college which saw the president resign. Spiro Agnew, who was the governor of Maryland, jailed me overnight along with others because we were suspected of inciting to riot because we were boycotting classes. We were working with groups affiliated with Martin Luther King. I guess I was some kind of terrorist because I had been arrested for marching in demonstrations.

I knew from information that the immigration authority who was interviewing me had, that I had a chance to respond, to explain, and to give examples. He understood. I was allowed to come into Canada and I guess we are all suffering for that right now.

Here I was, relatively well educated, someone white coming into a country which wanted to have I suppose immigrants such as myself. I had done all the paperwork. Then at that one moment of fundamental right, and we call that audi alteram partem which means being able to speak on the other side and being able to confront your accuser.

We do not have that in this bill. Immigrants will not know what they have got on them. They can say you are a member of some suspicious organization, some terrorist organization. What is the difference between a terrorist and a patriot? The one who wins.

Talk to me about the Stern gang in Israel. Talk to me about the PLO, the Contras, talk to me about anyone who is fighting for principle. If you are fighting for principle it takes many different forms, many different ways, and it just takes one high-level bureaucrat to decide you do not fit into his or her way of trying to change society. It does not matter if that is the way it is in your country. Therefore, you are to be excluded without ever knowing what the accusations were.

That is what is so dishonourable. That is what is so unjust. That is what is so obscene about this bill. You will not have a chance as an immigrant to confront your accuser.

• (1940)

I have another problem with this bill about requiring immigrants to stay in one place. I do not think it can be enforced. On the Beaudoin–Dobbie committee we looked at mobility across the country. We needed mobility, people working where they were needed. We wanted to promote that.

We have a bill right now saying: "Look, you are black. Why not go to Moose Jaw? We think we could have you in Moose Jaw for two, three or four years". "You are brown. Let us see. What colour do we want to paint the northern part of this country?" "Maybe in the eastern part we will make it a little darker hue". This is tantamount to disaster. This will not work. We cannot force people to go into areas where they do not quite naturally belong and where they do not want to be. They are going to go where their families are, and to do otherwise is cruel and unusual punishment.

There are a number of things about Bill C–86, the immigration bill, which I disagree with. It is a contempt of Parliament mainly because much of what is in it is going to be decided by regulation. The government through regulation and orders of cabinet will be able to reward with favours people it wishes to favour and restrict people who it wishes to restrict without having a debate in Parliament.

I think that is wrong. It is even a contempt of the Supreme Court and the Singh judgment of 1985 wherein the Supreme Court said that the government was wrong, that it had to give them a fair hearing, and that it could not exclude people from entering this country without listening to the basic reasons which brought them here.

In conclusion, I would like to say there is a cherry on this cake, this gift to the Reform Party, this pre-electoral cake. The cherry on top of this putrid cake is the ability to cancel retroactively applications which are already working through the system.

There are 300,000 applications in the system. This is what the government is talking about when it talks about streamlining. That is its definition of streamlining: retroactively cancelling applications.

I do not know how this fits into the lexicon on the government side when it talks about fairness, equity and streamlining. It seems to me this is a bid to reduce immigration. This is a bid to make it so difficult that people will not try as hard as they have in the past to come to our country.

Perhaps our country has not been the best as far as receiving immigrants, but it has been damn good. If we compare the United States where perhaps 7 per cent to 10 per cent of applicants are admitted to Canada where we have close to 60 per cent admitted, I think it is something to be proud of. Bill C-86 is not something to be proud of. I am very much ashamed that we have a government on the other side which dares to present it.

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I am not an authority on immigration but I would say to my hon. colleague, the last speaker, that this bill is not something to be ashamed of. I think, frankly from what I have seen of this bill, that it is something to be very proud of.

It is not surprising that the recent recognition of Canada by the United Nations as the best place to live in all the world has been previously heralded by the immigration and refugee pressures which have been upon this country from virtually every nation around the globe. Canada, as we all know, is in tremendous demand as a place in which to build new lives.

Immigration is not just a one-way consideration, however, because Canada needs new citizens just as surely as so many new Canadians want to come here.

For example, I am told present economic and demographic statistics show a minimum immigration requirement annually of 1 per cent of our population or more than 250,000 new immigrants each year just to keep our economic viability in balance on a population basis.

Contrary to what the hon. member has just said about immigration not increasing, immigration in 1991 was at the level of 220,000 immigrants. In 1992 and onward it is estimated and projected at 250,000 as a constant. The chances are that as conditions dictate, those figures may increase in the future.

Immigrants want Canada and Canada needs immigrants. Thus our immigration policies and management of them are a critical part of our nation's master plan for the future, both economically and socially. This Bill C-86 not only contains important measures to make our immigration program work to an improved potential but it is comprehensive, constructive and responsible. It addresses four main themes. They are the immigration management system, which comprises several areas of attention, selecting and processing immigrants, special programs, provincial and regional interests, geographic and occupational mobility and the Immigrant Investor Program.

The second major structure is that of protecting society, of intercepting illegal immigrants, border controls, new search provisions to enable apprehension at the border and certification of legitimate immigrants at border points and the enforcement of our immigration policies in Canada to prevent abuse to our welfare programs, abuse of the refugee system by criminals and to provide for necessary removals and deportations as they may occur.

The third structural pinnacle of the bill is the refugee status determination system where access and international co-operation are featured, streamlining the system so that the Immigration and Refugee Board operates more efficiently in the service to all involved so that there is timely action with respect to faster landing, clearances to employment, to removals and deportations where required and to an appeal process through the Federal Court of Canada.

Last, the fourth major pinnacle of the structure is that of improved services, procedures which are simplified, response time which is faster, better information systems, issuing and renewing of documents, returning resident permits and perhaps, very significantly also, the transparency of the program, the fact that the rules and the procedures are open and visible to all.

Immigrants are very well served by their new status as permanent Canadian residents, but the increasing numbers of people seeking to enter Canada have put enormous pressures on a system which is not adequately designed to handle them. As a result, the process that immigrants must go through is marred by less than satisfactory service. The road to landed status for an immigrant or a refugee can be filled with line-ups and delays, with uncertainty as to when important events will take place, with forms that are complicated and with rules and procedures that are both hard to understand and unclear as to their purpose.

Unsatisfactory service is both troubling and troublesome as a symptom of certain problems within our immigration program. To deal directly with those causes this Bill C-86 has been introduced. As I said, it contains some very comprehensive elements to bring improvement to our entire immigration system.

The most important of these changes is a plan to subdivide the flow of immigration and refugee requests into three main streams, distinct in priority and procedure. It is worth dwelling on those three streams for clarification.

The first stream is the one which is to be demand driven, where applications will be handled on demand, where there will be no limits. These will include immediate dependent family, spouses and children, refugees and investors and their families. That portion of the immigration flow, based on 1991 figures, I have estimated to be in the order of 24 per cent.

The second stream is what has been termed the first-come first-served stream where there will be limits on the total immigration allowable count and where time standards will be set. These will include parents and grandparents of immigrants and their families and selected refugees from abroad. That category will comprise an estimated 35 per cent of the total immigration flow.

Last, the third stream will be immigrants who are selected for excellence. There will also be a limit on the number of those immigrants annually and there will be a schedule and a timetable. Those will consist of entrepreneurs, not just investors bringing dollars, but entrepreneurs, people will skills, people who have demonstrated their ability to run a business and to create wealth. It will include those with special skills and it will include assisted relatives of families.

• (1950)

In speeding up the process of the immigration flow, earlier this afternoon a reference was made to delays at the immigration office in Delhi. It was suggested that it was only the immigration officers at that one post who were responsible for bringing about improvements in the processing of spouses and dependent children.

It is true that the immigration officials at our posts throughout the world are very efficient, innovative and have much ingenuity. For the record, I think it is important to note that the improvements at Delhi and at other posts are the direct result of the five-year immigration plan improvements which were introduced in this House in November 1990. The commitments contained in that plan and in that introduction are contained in this bill.

The qualified applicants in stream one as I have said will be processed on demand with no fixed limit to the total number of applications. Those in stream two would be processed on a first come, first serve basis with the total number in each category subject to limits set out in Canada's annual immigration plan. Finally, stream three would include individuals who are selected for excellence, as I have said earlier, entrepreneurs, those with special skills and assisted relatives.

Only the best in this last stream, the most highly skilled or those with skills that the Canadian employers need, will pass through in numbers also corresponding to the limits of the annual plan.

The proposed management streams would greatly improve the treatment of all potential newcomers. If spouses, dependent children, refugees and immigrant investors are placed in stream one they will receive immediate attention. As for those in stream two, the new authority to turn away applications when levels are reached will eliminate backlogs which presently drain our resources and which presently limit our flexibility to handle emergency situations. Finally, no backlogs will be allowed at all in the build-up in stream three, backlogs which presently drain our resources and reduce our flexibility to help others.

In closing, I would just like to say the Immigration Act in 1976 committed Canada to an ongoing immigration program with high principles and a series of clear goals. Those goals which are as vital today as they were then are to help Canadian residents to reunite with close family relatives from abroad. They commit Canada to provide shelter to refugees fleeing persecutions and they promote the development of a strong and viable economy in all regions of Canada.

The proposed changes in Bill C-86 will go a long way to reduce frustrations for those immigrating to Canada, to deter cheating at the time of entry and to ensure that the balance among the three primary goals of our immigration policy best serve the interests of all of Canada.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that the government will proceed very carefully with this legislation. It is my hope that the government will go out and speak to the special interest groups, church organizations, non-governmental organizations and those in fact who would be affected before this legislation is passed into law.

Just a few days ago I had the pleasure of speaking with a representative of the local organization in my riding, the Bootleggers. They are inviting a team from Moscow to come and play here in Ottawa. The team's name is the Moscow Swans. In fact, the Governor General wrote a very nice letter welcoming the team to Canada.

The team arrived in New York only to be told that they could not enter Canada unless each one of those players pays a $50 fee for his or her visa. This is not very healthy, simply put.

The tourism industry in my view will be the largest industry in Canada over the next few years because of the beautiful land that we have, because of the country that we have. To that extent, to put a charge on each individual who wants to come to Canada to visit will not enhance tourism. It will be a deterrent. That is exactly what happened in this situation in which the people who invited the team to come to Canada in order to celebrate Canada 125 were quite upset and rightly so. There is nothing in the legislation that would give the minister the right or the provision whereby visa charges can be waived.

Having said this, while it does apply to visitors it also applies to immigrants. An applicant for permanent residence would have to pay $350 regardless of whether he or she is approved. How much of that is fair? I think each applicant should go through a preliminary interview with a preliminary application. If he or she passes the test, they can proceed from there. To use the immigration system as a measure to generate revenue to the Government of Canada is not fair. I would suggest it is also discriminatory.

Eighty per cent of the cases that my office deals with are immigration cases, refugee cases and visitor applicants. Believe it or not, in some cases it takes up to three months for somebody who wants to come and visit Canada to get a visitor visa issued. I received a call from a local lawyer who told me in business you have to move fast. If there is a deal here in Canada and a prospective investor from Hong Kong, in this particular case the applicant is from Hong Kong, that prospective investor cannot wait two months to receive his visitor visa to come to Canada and have a look at the project at hand. There are certain aspects that need to be addressed.

In many cases prospective applicants have to wait over two years, separated from their wives and their families, before they hear an answer. I have many people who will arrive in the office asking why their brother or sister or cousin was refused when so and so was accepted: "Why was my brother, who speaks the language and has these qualifications, refused when so and so was accepted?" There is inconsistency and simply put, to a large extent when we talk about applications from outside of Canada, the applicant is at the mercy of an immigration officer. That has to be clarified and put in a way that is consistent.

You bring those landed immigrants here to Canada, many of them with Ph.D.s, with a lot of qualifications. I want to say it has saddened me to see many of them are cab drivers, waiters, garbage collectors, doing all sorts of odd jobs, and not because they want to do those jobs. Simply put, it is because in the way we deal with it, in our educational system, there is absolutely no provision to recognize their qualifications so they could fit in to the mainstream.

I have dealt with a dentist who finished his degree in the United Kingdom. He came here to Canada only to end up being a sales person, a real estate agent, for two and a half years and could not qualify in order to practice as a dentist here in Canada even though he had his degree from the United Kingdom. A physician, an electrical engineer and so on, many of those professions are very much needed here and yet we do not deal with their qualifications in an effective way in which we could give them the accreditation they deserve so they could be full-fledged citizens.

On second language training, we have many immigrants who bring their moms, their dads or their children who do not have second language training, who do not speak either French or English back at home. Our second language training in Canada is a total failure. Simply put, there is no system that is in place in order to see whether all of this money we are pouring into second language training is getting the results we should be getting.

School-boards are getting stuck with the end product. Many children are coming to a school in which they do not speak the language. The teachers have to be not only social workers but moms, planners, nurses—just about everything.

• (2000)

The government has not done enough in order to set up a fair and equitable system that is accessible whereby we could take our immigrants and put them into the mainstream by first giving them the education they deserve, and that is second language training, or the education they need to become full-fledged citizens.

My colleague from British Columbia alluded a little bit to citizenship. It is a major disaster. The Citizenship Act is a total failure in a lot of ways, not only because an applicant for citizenship would have to wait over one year in order to receive an application form to become a Canadian citizen, but after that one year, once he or she is given the application, they would have to wait up to another eight months to have an interview with a judge, only to be asked by the judge about the length of the St. Lawrence River, the number of lakes between Canada and the United States. These are not the kinds of questions we should be asking landed immigrants. We should be asking landed immigrants about what they have done since they arrived in Canada, whether they have been in trouble with the law, whether they have raised their families, whether they have been full participants in the mainstream. These are the questions we should ask landed immigrants.

My colleague from Quebec agrees with me. He is shaking his head. That is the way we measure citizenship. Unfortunately the Citizenship Act which we have right now is not only discriminatory against potential citizens, it is also unfair, ineffective and a total failure. While we accept in excess of about 250,000 landed immigrants a year, we are not processing even one-third of that number for people who want to become full-fledged citizens of this country. Simply put, our citizenship courts are full. Take a number, as my colleague is saying; it is a long queue.

Nothing in this bill addresses the question of the full integration of immigrants in Canada. Nothing in this bill addresses the question of citizenship in Canada. Nothing in this bill addresses the question of what to do with qualified landed immigrants once they arrive in Canada.

I want to say that there are a lot of good things in the bill but my suggestion to the government is to go for a full-fledged public consultation before it makes it law.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend from Davenport for allowing me this opportunity to discuss for a few moments the contents of the bill that we are presently debating before this House, a bill that is designed to change the immigration policies of Canada.

My comments will be very general in nature inasmuch as this bill changes the policy and changes the philosophical principles by which we have built Canada over the past 50 years. The clause by clause interpretation will be handled by my colleague, the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce, and myself as members of the immigration committee as the bill finds its way through the committee stage before it is reported again in the House at third reading. We intend to be involved very much in the process of trying to implement the changes that we on this side of the House feel are so necessary with respect to the policies and the philosophy by which immigration should be handled in this country.

Again, as a preface to the bill, it is very interesting to me inasmuch as immigration policies in this country allowed my family to enter Canada some 45 years ago. I guess I could be construed as a product of the immigration policies of Canada at that time. The bill is of particular importance to me because it dictates what we will be doing in the next 50 years in the progress of Canada as we build toward a stronger and unified future. I would like to repeat the words of our colleague from Windsor West who was applauded in this House just a few days ago for having served 30 years as a member of the House of Commons in almost every portfolio. Let me reiterate his words because I think they express what immigration in Canada is all about in the best terms I have heard. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, as you know I am proud to be the son of Jewish immigrants from eastern Europe.

If I could just paraphrase, if any member of this House were speaking she or he could substitute child of Finnish immigrants, Portuguese immigrants, Ukrainian immigrants, Polish immigrants, Cuban immigrants, Haitian immigrants, Italian immigrants, or immigrants from any of the countries Canada has been able to build and draw from for so many years.

The hon. member for Windsor West went on to say:

> Looking at the story of my parents and their hopes and aspirations, and looking at my part in that story makes me want to say to the members of this House that it is only a small part of the larger story of the Canadian dream, which is being told and retold every day in this country by the strivings of tens of thousands of people who are working to create better lives for themselves, for their families and thereby to build a better country for all of us.

Those were the words spoken by the member the other day in this House and they are as apropos today as they were 50 years ago.

Our immigration policy and procedure must give those people who choose Canada as the new home for themselves and their families every opportunity to do so in an efficient, streamlined and empathetic manner. We must make future Canadians feel welcome, needed and wanted by the country they have chosen as their new home.

The reality of the fact is history has taught us Canada is no longer a country made up primarily of those with English backgrounds. Nor do we have a country made up primarily of those with francophone backgrounds. Today in Canada more than 12 million Canadians, more than a third of its population, came from other lands and countries around the world.

Many people came to this country at the turn of the century and in the great immigration waves of the late 1940s, early 1950s, and early 1960s. Their fathers, mothers, sons, daughters, grandsons and granddaughters have made very substantial contributions to the future of this country.

They came to Canada with the ability and desire to work. They came to Canada because they wanted freedom and hopefully they came to Canada because they wanted to make a better life for themselves and their children.

I think it is inevitable when we look at what Canada is today, that the United Nations just recently voted Canada the number one country in the world in which to live.

Those people who came from all the countries in the world and chose Canada as their home have truly succeeded in helping to make Canada the country it is.

With this bill we are not just talking about another piece of legislation. We are not just talking about another bill. We are talking of developing a philosophy through this new immigration law of where Canada shall go as a country in the next 50 years.

There is no question in my mind once we overcome this debate on unity we are presently going through, many of the people who choose Canada as their home will add as substantially as those who have come to Canada in the past 50 years.

• (2010)

As a result, the legislation must be regarded not as just another piece of legislation, but it must be regarded as a philosophical concept of how we want and where we want this country of ours to go.

I must show my displeasure, not with the entire contents of the legislation but with the manner and procedure which was used to introduce it into this House. Last week the immigration bill that will guide Canada's immigration policy for perhaps the next decade, was introduced on Wednesday in this House. There was a short debate on it Friday—Monday is also a short day in this House. I am told—I was not able to be here early today—time allocation was announced and some one hour and a half from now there will be a vote for passage at second reading and then the bill will go to a committee.

To develop such important policy for the country, to develop the criteria we are going to need to help us build this country, we cannot do justice to this bill by speaking on it in this place for just 10 or 15 or 20 minutes over a shortened debate. There are many members on this side of the House and I am sure on that side, who want to make a contribution that elected members of Parliament should be making with respect to the future allocation of people in this country.

I wish that I did have more time to expound on some of these principles. Let me say something else about this legislation. It is time—and I come to the support of all the municipalities in this country—that we stopped passing legislation that passes the burden of cost on to the municipalities. I see in this legislation, just in a cursory review, that again we have not come to grips with the fact that we make the laws and we pass the burden of responsibility for most of the costing on to the municipalities right across this country. We know that in these difficult economic times the costs involved in welfare, schooling and hospitalization are passed to the provinces which passes them on to the municipalities. It is putting a heavy burden of responsibility on these communities, which is intolerable.

As we go through the committee structure after second reading approval, we must always bear in mind on this side of the House, as will I hope my colleagues on the left, that we must stop putting the burden of responsibility for paying for legislation at the federal level on the municipalities of this country.

Those two areas are the only two areas that I have the time to discuss today and I thank you very much for the opportunity of making those two points.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak to a bill that will fundamentally change our immigration system. This bill will give great arbitrary powers to use discretion in immigration selection. Instead of fair rules, which treat immigrants as human beings, a big brother attitude will now permeate the Canadian immigration system.

Immigrants to Canada will be required to live in a place chosen by the Canadian state, despite the wishes and the family and support networks that these immigrants might have elsewhere in Canada. Immigrants to Canada will be required to work in an occupation chosen by the Canadian state despite the skills, training and education they may have in another occupation.

I know of a doctor from India who was working as a taxi driver because his credentials as a doctor were not accredited in Canada. This type of situation can only increase under this bill. That doctor may at least now have the opportunity to requalify for his profession, but under this bill the Canadian government can say that there are too many doctors in Canada, you are not allowed to qualify or work as a doctor. You must drive a taxi or sweep floors instead.

This is clearly a violation of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. More than that, it breaks the code of common sense and compassion to which I believe all Canadians aspire. Canadians are proud of their country. We see our country as being a tolerant country in a free society. The new immigration system is not tolerant and limits the fundamental freedoms of a certain class of human beings within Canada. It is simply wrong.

Along the big brother theme, this bill gives border officials greater powers to detain, even fingerprint and photograph people arriving, particularly refugee claimants, but also Canadians. These border officials have not necessarily received any anti-racist training.

I want to tell you a story about a person who worked with me here in my Ottawa office. She was from the west coast like me. She was sitting in a committee room one day with many others in the audience listening to an important session on my behalf. A security guard came into the room and surveyed all the people as a matter of routine. There was no disturbance, no noise. All the people in the room were white except for the staff person who worked with me.

The guard walked across the entire room to demand to see her House of Commons pass. She showed it to him immediately. He looked at the pass then looked at her again and said: "Whom do you work for?" She said: "Dawn Black". He asked: "What is the phone number of her office?" This kind of checking is unheard of. She had a valid pass, she told him the office number and he still looked suspicious but he then dropped the matter. He did not approach anyone else in that crowded room. He approached the only person in that room that was not white.

This is not an isolated incident. Black and aboriginal people talk about being stopped on the streets by the police when they were simply walking, talking, shopping or attending to their own business.

We have all read in the papers of examples of refugee officials being insensitive, such as the recent case of two refugee board officials making fun of the fact that a man had been tortured.

Refugee boards have ruled to send women back who would face persecution, violence and perhaps even death in their country of origin because these officials did not understand the different cultures in the world. A story broke only last year about a Canadian immigration official demanding sex from a woman in exchange for entry to Canada.

Most immigration officials are trying to do the best they can and operate ethically, but they are overworked, understaffed and under a great deal of strain.

We have also heard of instances where there have been abuses of power. These front line government officials certainly need more support and training, particularly, anti-racist and anti-sexist training. We need employment equity with mandatory goals and timetables in these and in all Public Service professions to ensure that these officials reflect what is the diversity of Canada.

This big brother bill would also turn away refugees who come to Canada through a third country that Canada has ruled to be safe. This is neglecting our role in the international community. Canada does not border any country from which refugees can come directly. Canada's new rule would mean that countries bordering other nations from which refugees come would be inundated and overloaded with refugees that have no hope then of going on to settle somewhere else. It is not fair to expect only a handful of countries in the world to take the entire load of refugees.

Canada cannot remain a strong and proud member of the international community if we send refugees back the way we have seen recently, the way the Americans are doing with the Haitian refugees right now. Canada has had a shameful past in this regard. It is important for all of us to acknowledge that and to remember it.

Before and during World War II Canada refused entry to Jewish refugees from Europe who were attempting to escape from certain persecution and death.

The Komagata Maru was a ship of predominantly Sikh passengers which sailed to Vancouver and arrived in 1914. They, like many Europeans, wanted to emigrate to Canada. The ship sat in the Vancouver harbour, denied docking, and Canadian officials would not even allow supplies of food and water to be taken aboard. The Canadian government sent those people back.

• (2020)

My riding has a large Indo-Canadian community which has in fact enriched our economy and enriched the culture of the Vancouver region. Many discretionary measures have been used in Canada's immigration past. The Chinese head tax was used to limit Chinese immigration to Canada. The Asiatic Exclusion League stirred up hatred against Chinese and Japanese immigrants and targeted Asian businesses for physical attack and looting.

This big brother bill before us would pass regulations similar to those passed in 1908 to limit Asian immigration. In 1908 a Canadian government regulation was passed requiring immigrants to arrive in Canada by way of a continuous journey from their place of birth or citizenship. As there was no direct steamship from India, this measure virtually eliminated immigration from India.

In 1992 this regulation has been recycled for refugees. Only those who have made it directly to Canada and not passed through any so-called safe third country can stay here. There are no direct flights or ships or any other means of transportation from Somalia, Sri Lanka, El Salvador, Guatemala, China, Bulgaria, Iran or Lebanon, and most other countries in this world in turmoil.

In 1907 Prime Minister Robert Borden said in a speech in Vancouver: "British Columbia must remain a white man's country". The Prime Minister redrafted immigration regulations citing an overcrowded labour market in British Columbia and made it illegal for those of certain occupations to enter B.C. Of course those occupations were predominantly those of Asian immigrants.

In 1992 this government is revisiting these regulations. This proposed legislation sets up a system of quotas by country or otherwise that can be used to weed out immigrants from so-called undesirable places.

One's country of origin says nothing about how hard working someone is, how much they care about their family and society, how willing they are to contribute in every way to an economy and to our society. Everyone deserves an equal chance based on their own ability to adapt to Canada, not on some stereotypical notion a bureaucrat or a politician may have about their country of origin.

In addition, this big brother legislation restricts the principle of benefit of the doubt in Immigration and Refugee Board hearings, a principle to which Canada subscribes through its signature on UN conventions. Refugee claimants are assumed to be lying or defrauding the system even if there is no proof. This bill also further restricts the right to appeal, which is the right of all other persons in Canada.

The time for racism is over. Canada should be able to prove to the world that we are all equal no matter what race we are and that we can all live and work together, share our ideas and our customs and respect each other's religious beliefs. This is the tolerant and harmonious Canada I want to live in and work for, one in which everyone has equal access to the justice system, to services, and to fair and respectful treatment.

This bill and its cousin, the new immigrant language training program, are not steps toward this goal. This bill not only disregards the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms but also the UN conventions that Canada has signed. It is a step backward into a tarnished past.

This is Canada's 125th birthday. We should remember the positive aspects of our past and become active in changing what needs to be changed in our society.

Mr. Speaker, you are signalling me that my time is up. I just want to mention that we should remember, unless we are First Nations people, that we or our ancestors arrived in this country as immigrants. For the sake of peace in our country and around the world, we must eliminate racism and all unfairness, and we should begin with immigration and refugee system.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, one of the negative aspects of this proposed measure is that it reinforces the government's favouritism toward immigrant applicants from the Third World who are wealthy and well educated. My colleague from York West earlier today spoke quite eloquently about the discriminatory and negative effect of that policy for Canada. I would like to talk about its disastrous consequence from a sustainable development perspective, and particularly seen from the southern hemisphere perspective.

What we have here is a government which is working at cross-purposes with itself. On the one hand it funds the International Development Research Centre as previous governments have. If I remember correctly, it was founded in 1971. It does so for the purpose of supporting the establishment of scientific, educational and social infrastructures in the developing world. In doing so it supports the work of researchers and scientists in the developing world to develop research that helps the economic and social well-being of the people in the southern hemisphere where most of the developing nations are.

This work has two purposes: to help developing nations deal with its problems on their own terms and to help the educated élite to remain in the land for the total benefit.

The International Development Research Centre in major part was established to help developing countries begin to provide the necessary leadership, educational structures, research facilities and international prestige for their educated citizens so that they would stay at home and help in the development of their economies and their structures.

Yet on the other hand the government brings forward for consideration by this House a bill which would entice the well educated population in the developing world to emigrate, and hence aggravate an already serious brain drain to the northern hemisphere, toward developed countries.

Much mention is made of the growing wealth gap between north and south, the growing brain drain to the northern hemisphere of intellectuals and scientists from the south to the north. It is a serious matter. Emigration of educated persons from the south to a country such as Canada represents a much greater loss for the country of origin, since there are fewer individuals in the developing world to carry out the difficult struggle of providing the necessary expertise.

The world population is expected to double between now and the year 2050 to 10 billion. This bill seems to have been conceived in a vacuum. It does not deal with long-term population policies. It does not deal with the size that we intend or expect in our urban centres since most immigrants settle in urban centres. It is a measure that seems to be conceived as a reaction or as an attempt to improve previous measures. It does not have any sense of vision nor a sense of long-term breadth and scope. It is just intended to rectify here and rectify there.

We must take into account the fact that over 80 per cent of this doubling of the population from 5 billion to 10 billion will take place in the developing world. With a consequent reduction in resources such as fresh water and arable land, the need for these developing nations to keep their own expertise becomes more crucial than ever. Bangladesh, not Canada, will need its best people to solve its critical problems. At the OECD in Paris, a publication was produced in 1989 which dealt with the impact of international migration on developing countries. In that OECD report the following statement is made:

• (2030)

> Migration of manpower from a developing to a developed country is bad because it inflicts irreparable losses on the former and robs it of irreparable innovative individuals.

It goes on to say:

> The brain drain leads to increased inequality; the rich countries continue to become richer while the poor countries become poorer – It removes strategic manpower from key positions in a country, causes loss of present and future production, of present and future saving, of taxes and potential innovation.

One must conclude that the Conservative government's pursuit of immigration policies which result in the steady increase of educated élites as successful applicants at the expense of a southern hemisphere developing nation is wrong within this broader context. It is wrong within the longer term and within the perspective of Canada's aid and development and international research policies aimed at assisting developing countries. In other words, it does not make sense. It does not add up.

On refugees, I would like to bring to the attention of the House because of this debate the plight of Somali refugees in the city of Toronto where I come from.

In the first quarter of this year some 118 Somali refugee claimants have been rejected by the department. Why? Because of the claim that safe areas do exist for Somalis in their native land to which they can return. I submit that these claims are inaccurate.

The minister of immigration must be aware—and if he is not he should perhaps have a briefing by his colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs—Somalia is in a state of unbridled chaos without any sort of government in control.

The International Red Cross has stated that Somalia is presently suffering from the worst inhuman situation in the world today, without exception. Somali families are separated, many living in dangerous situations in their native land or in refugee camps in Kenya.

Measures are needed for those who are here. This was stressed and underlined by public demonstrations on June 4 at Queen's Park in Toronto.

It was repeatedly asked that the department of immigration do the job it was intended to do traditionally. That job is to provide settlement and adjustment programs for people who come to Canada as refugees and as immigrants upon arrival so as to facilitate and accelerate their integration into Canadian society. In the case of the Somali refugees it has been an abysmal failure so far.

In this measure there is also a denial of mobility rights if this proposal becomes law. It is unacceptable that one should expect from immigrants, be they in the category of refugees or otherwise, to give up their freedom of movement which every Canadian has. Once an immigrant is landed in this country that person cannot be expected to live in a designated area and remain there unless there are strong incentives for that purpose.

I hope the minister will reconsider that clause so that the legislation covering immigrants to Canada will allow them the same basic mobility rights that have been recognized for Canadians in general.

[Translation]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, it cannot be repeated often enough that immigration and refugee determination do not apply the same criteria. We use immigration to try and meet the needs of this country. Our economic interests, our manpower requirements—which often include the need for skilled workers—and family reunification all meet the needs of this country. I would like to stress that yes, family reunification responds to the need of Canadians to live with their families. However, when we admit refugees, We are meeting their needs, their need for security. The 1951 Geneva convention where the signatory countries agreed to wave their right to select those who enter the country, is an exception to the rule of international law.

This evening, I will speak very briefly about immigration, but I would prefer to focus on the issue of refugee status determination. As far as immigration is concerned, the government has announced that in the family class, files will be processed according to specific deadlines. The government says that its objective will be to process applications from people in the immediate family category in six months, whether they apply in Germany or in India. We welcome this kind of specific timeframe and objective. I hope the government will be able to meet this objective.

[English]

As I said, I want to concentrate most of my remarks on the question of the determination of refugee status because I believe that it is in this area that the government is spreading misconceptions about the nature of the problem we face and about the nature of the humanitarian question we are trying to deal with.

In reading this bill and listening to the speeches of the spokespersons for the government, I have to conclude that the government has not learned very much.

I believe that the minister should apologize to Canadians for wasting taxpayers' money in the past five years. He should apologize to church groups and other non-governmental organizations. He should apologize to immigration lawyers. He should apologize to Rabbi Plaut for ignoring their advice. They all said that the initial screening would not work.

I want to emphasize that this government five years ago set up a two-stage process. The first stage was a screening known as the credible basis stage when it was the job of an adjudicator and a member of the refugee division to determine whether there was a credible basis for the claim. The second stage was the hearing on the merits before two members of the refugee division.

Rabbi Plaut, in his report submitted to this government in about 1985, rejected the idea of screening out refugee claimants with what are really known in international practice as manifestly unfounded claims which is really what the credible basis process was all about.

He reviewed this practice in those countries that had tried to introduce such a screening system only to find it unworkable. In these countries some cases which at first were judged to be manifestly unfounded claims eventually were determined to be refugees by a higher authority.

Rabbi Plaut then said that kind of procedure was not needed, but the government ignored all of the unanimous advice it received and went ahead.

I refer to the document that the government tabled with this bill last week. Today, the government says:

• (2040)

"The first stage has proved less effective and more costly than expected. Experience has shown that over 95 per cent of claimants have a credible basis for their claims so that the first stage actually screens out very few claimants. This preliminary stage will be eliminated. This change alone will reduce delays in the system by three to six months, depending on the circumstances of specific cases".

This was the recommendation of the non-governmental organizations and Rabbi Plaut six years ago. Does the minister today acknowledge the error he made? Does he acknowledge the enormous costs that were imposed on people, the delays in people's lives? Does he say he made a mistake but today he recognizes this and is going to correct that mistake? Not a chance. Not one chance that this government would admit a mistake even as blatant as that one.

Another mistake which shows again that the government has not learned from past experience is the lack of an appeal. Again this is an area in which the government ignored the advice of non-governmental organizations and failed to provide refugee claimants an appeal on the merits from a negative decision of the refugee board. This bill, again, provides for no such appeal. The government, presumably, has not recognized the folly of its ways. Because there is no appeal the only recourse for an unsuccessful refugee claimant is to apply to the minister for consideration on compassionate or humanitarian grounds.

The circumstances under which such considerations are given are extremely restrictive. Inevitably it ends up on the minister's desk. This recourse, as I said, because it is so restrictive, is futile. In Ontario and Quebec in 1991 only 23 such applications were accepted out of a total of 3,485. The door is practically hermetically sealed.

What I would like to suggest to the minister and to the government tonight is that they provide an appeal on merits and if they did we would not need this futile procedure known as an application on humanitarian and compassionate grounds to the minister.

Why should there be an appeal? I would like to ask the House to reflect on the reasons for courts of appeal in general, in civil and in criminal law in our system of law. Quite simply it is because people make mistakes. Should there not be an appeal on decisions when it is a matter of life and death?

Remember the context. Refugees have left their homes because of war and persecution. Even refugee claimants who one might expect to be fairly articulate, such as lawyers, teachers and union leaders, have been known to break down during refugee hearings. They have been unable to face the past, unable to talk about the experiences to which they have been subjected. We must understand that refugee claimants are in a new country. They may speak neither English nor French. Unquestionably they are unfamiliar with our laws and our procedures.

It is vital that such an appeal be provided for by the government in this procedure. Again, I hope this is an area which the government would reconsider.

In closing, I wish to quote from a communiqué published by the Canadian Council for Refugees which said that it is disturbed by the language and orientation of the government's statements. The emphasis and control and abuse, not justified by any available statistics, will undermine public sympathy for refugees.

As I said earlier in comments in the House this evening, this is perhaps the most deplorable aspect of the government's campaign of disinformation. By standing up and suggesting that we have somehow lost control of our borders, by standing up and suggesting that the country is being flooded by thousands of refugees with totally unfounded claims not supported by any statistics, this government is setting up a straw man which it will then proceed to knock down with its legislation and with its speeches in what I regard as a very cynical gesture. I am confident that Canadians will not accept this subterfuge.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill because it signals the reality of Canada in the global context.

There are not too many things we can be sure of in this day and at this time. We can be sure of one thing and that is that the population of the world is growing. We are now talking about five billion people. These are five billion people who are crowding the borders of almost every nation in the world.

They are crowding the cities of the world. As they crowd they seek what we have and that is open space, the number one place, the best country in the world according to the United Nations. Naturally there is a strong demand in the world for Canada, a strong demand that cannot possibly be met by Canada alone.

This is complicated by the situation that the world used to move freely among itself. The world no longer moves freely among itself. It used to be that in the world there were many countries that should you or I or anyone else choose to move to, you could do so easily. It used to be that if there were a political or a natural catastrophe here, you could move across the border in the next place and it would welcome you.

Those welcome mats have disappeared everywhere in the world. Every country has said it has closed its borders. Canada was the last country to come to this closing process through a target or quota system, a quota system that was put in place by every nation in the world in a very stringent way.

The world borders have been closing and as the world's borders close, it creates the 10 or 15 million refugees in the world; displaced people who cannot find another country for their home.

There are a lot coming as the hon. member knows. We were both in those refugee camps. Bud Cullen was the Liberal minister at the time and I said to him when we set that target level back why not take some as refugees. They would make the best citizens in the world we could find; people fleeing for their safety and their security from their own country. I asked: "Why not set a target of 5,000?" He said to me, and it is in the proceedings of the committee: "Good idea. If you think you have the Conservatives", the opposition at that time, "to go along, then let us have a look at it". Six weeks later he announced 5,000, the first target of refugees.

Then in 1978–79, we had the boat people and our minister in government at that time said it would take 60,000.

What we were doing in that process was responding to a world that was tightening down and opening our doors to a very worthwhile group of people who have made fine citizens for Canada. Really we only opened the door a little crack because what is 60,000 out of 15 million? Anyone in a refugee camp would choose to come to Canada given that opportunity.

Canada as an oasis of hope and opportunity is facing the pressures of a world that wishes to come here. What a change from 40, 60 years ago when Canada went out and advertised for immigrants: please come to Canada. It had to give all kinds of incentives to come to Canada. That is not the situation today and our Immigration Act needs to reflect that. Canada is under the pressure of a massive number of applications. Our program now is to choose from among those applications, both in the interest of the person wishing to come and in the interest of our country.

• (2050)

The interest of our country changes from time to time. Right now there is a very strong interest and need in our country for young people with skills to come and help us build our country. There is a need for business men and business immigration and our act addresses this issue. It says we should welcome the entrepreneurs and business men of the world because this is now a global economy. Any part of the world that says it is going to be an isolated island is doomed to failure, poverty and a reduced quality of life.

We have to respond to choice. We have made the most generous choice of any nation in the world by saying we will set a target of 250,000. Who will these 250,000 be? As I said, they need to be young people, skilled people and business people. Of course we must have a very special place for immediate family and true and legitimate refugees. That is what this act says.

I do not think there is a Canadian sitting there listening to us tonight or reading in Hansard tomorrow who would disagree with those priorities. That is what this legislation is doing. It is saying we will create stream one and we will not put a limit on it. In that stream we will look to the priority of Canada's needs: immediate family, refugees and business immigration.

Of course that is not to say I agree with everything in the report. My immigration committee will report back to the House soon I hope. We are getting near the end and we are going to support business immigration. We are recognizing business immigration is more than just investors who will not become actively involved and just invest money in Canada. It is also entrepreneurs and the self-employed.

Therefore we suggest the government give us an idea of how the system might work. It is not fixed in stone at this stage. The government will look at the report of our committee and at the Ernst & Whinney report that is coming in later. It will take the Ferguson task force report, its own internal report and we will create the regulations that look to these kinds of examples as outlined here.

Obviously we want to take control of Canada. What kind of a government would not take control of Canada? That means we shall select the millions of people who want to come here in the interest of Canada, our country. That is 250,000 now for the next three years and perhaps some adjustment to that target over the intervening years. Perhaps that target will even grow because as we become stronger perhaps this country should not be just 30 million. Maybe it should be 50 million. Maybe 50 million is a viable population, a small not very dense population for the second largest country in the world that can deliver a high quality of life and place for many more people in the world. The old days have gone. Looking at our land as a vast empty unused land just waiting to be filled is an entirely wrong concept in this day and age.

Let us modernize our act. Let us gain control of those who are coming into Canada illegally and let us sort them out. Let us keep those who are legitimate refugees and let us send the rest home and tell them to come and pick through the regular process. I know this is what my constituents want. They want the government to take control of immigration. They want the government to use immigration to build Canada. They want to show our compassionate side through conventional refugees. They want to show our human side through recognizing immediate family and they want to build our economy through recognizing business immigration.

All of us here have a responsibility to participate in this act, in its process, to get it to committee, to travel across the country and hear the views of Canada. As we hear the views of Canada, and I know that the opposition knows in their heart their job is to oppose, but they know that this act is the right place and the right time.

I have been working on this committee for many years. I remember 1975 changes, 1976 and 1977 in the committee. I think this is the right time, this is the right act and I support it most energetically and enthusiastically.

Mr. Cole: Mr. Speaker, I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to tabling of committee reports, with your permission.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, if the parliamentary secretary wants to table anything, I am sure we would be amenable to the usual consultation and after that is done, be willing to do that. I think this is highly irregular to do so without such consultations. If there have been consultations I have not been made aware of them, as the acting person directing the debate for our group tonight. Neither the critic nor myself have been made aware of this and we would prefer this consultation first. We will revert to that if there is consent at a later time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): As I understand, there is not unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, it has been a pleasure to sit in the House and listen to the debate and listen to the comments, the direction and the tenor. I of course prefer our side of the argument rather than the side opposite, but it has been interesting to hear the discussion and to see the different points of view as we approach this legislation.

I do not think anybody doubts that Canada has to have an improved immigration law and that we have to have a proper system of immigration. All we have to do is look at our history to realize that is an essential component of building this nation. As we look at the history we see that immigration primarily from Europe made an absolutely most important contribution to making Canada what it is today.

We hear some of the naysayers and some of the negative people in our country saying it is time to close the door and to shut down immigration all together. All we have to do is to look at the statistics to realize the implications of that.

If we were to shut off immigration entirely now, by the year 2010 we would probably only have about 13 million Canadians because our birth rate is not keeping up and we would face that eventual decline in population rather than an increase. I read as well, and statistics will indicate this, that by the year 2015 if we just keep the present level of immigration, then our population will only be around 17 or 18 million. We need to have immigration if we are going to survive as a country, maintain the social programs and all of the things that we hold dear in Canada.

Immigration can make a tremendous contribution to this nation, but I think we have to realize that immigration as it is now happening will drastically change the mosaic of this nation. There will be a change and it will be one that will cause some people some difficulty. There are all kinds of misconceptions about immigrants and refugees coming and stealing jobs from Canadians, that they are making things difficult and lowering the wage rate, all of those types of arguments. Those are misconceptions that have to be cleared away from this issue.

We have to analyse the legislation on its merits to see whether it achieves the goals that we want. That is for a system that is fair and equitable to all and allows proper immigration and refugees to reach our shores and our country and to be properly taken care of once they are here. We on this side are most supportive of the concept of coming up with legislation and amendments to legislation in order to achieve that goal and that objective. But when you look at this particular bit of legislation, does it achieve the goal? We have to say, no, it does not.

• (2100)

As is typical, there are always some good sides to the legislation and there are some things we are supportive of. Obviously the first stage hearing being eliminated is a positive step because it did not work. It did not have any effect. About 90-some-odd per cent of the people got through that stage no matter what was there. In that sense it did not work.

We are concerned about things, and all we have to do is look at them very quickly because time is limited. This bill shifts the onus away from this place and puts it in the regulations and in the hands of administration, rather than having legislation with the weight of legislation.

There is a shift in authority. One wonders where the accountability will be. We know that we should have those regulations at least as a bare minimum brought back to this place to be reviewed to see there is the just system that we are all striving for.

We are concerned as well about the idea of a safe third country and the concept that if a refugee passes through a country before arriving in Canada, we can send that person back to that "safe country". All you have to do is look at the example of some of the people who have fled countries through the United States to arrive here, knowing that if they are sent back to the United States they will be sent back to their own country and face the responsibilities of fleeing that country and the possibility of death associated with that type of decision. So we have concerns about the safe third country concept.

We agree with the idea that there is more discipline as far as the refugee board is concerned. We have all been appalled at some of the shenanigans that have gone on with respect to that. In that sense we would like to see the changes put in so that something is accomplished there.

We also have to look at what happens in this whole area and what happens to new arrivals to our country. At the same time this government is cutting back on social programs and putting added burdens on the provinces and we are not sure whether the housing and the health and educational systems are in place to handle what is contemplated. I think we have to go back and hear more and not rush this legislation. Rushed legislation is normally bad legislation and this bill has the potential to be quite bad in the long run.

We are concerned about the idea that the minister can pick where an immigrant or a refugee will go once they arrive here. That is fundamentally opposed to our Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I know that there are many people in this country who will say well, you do not acquire those rights and freedoms until after you are admitted into the country as either a landed immigrant or accepted as an immigrant, up until then you have no rights, and then you do not even have rights until you really become a citizen. That is wrong. The charter of rights is to protect all because those are fundamental rights. They do not have to be designated that they are rights for only certain people.

I am worried about the idea that a lot of the decision-making process will fall into the hands of administrators. We had a problem in Moncton, quite frankly, under the refugee program that was trying to attract entrepreneurs. I know there are all sorts of questions about whether you are buying a passport into Canada. In looking at that whole process and hearing the testimony of Zuoy Lam from Moncton, the investors were told: "Do not come to New Brunswick, it is a bad area. You should not be there, you will lose all your money. They are poor investments". This is the type and calibre of person who is advising people as to where they should be going.

As well, you hear things about the administration having fingerprinting and photos and greater powers of search. I think we are going to have to take a good long look at those types of provisions to see whether the legislation is treating refugees and immigrants fairly, as our system should.

There are many other reasons and rationale for us to take a long steady look at this legislation.

There is no provision for appeals on merit, to name some. There is nothing in the legislation that deals with the use of section 114 and the admission of refugees on humanitarian or compassionate grounds. There is nothing to deal with refugees who were legitimate when they fled their country, but now that things have changed—and we see that in eastern Europe—they are being asked to go back home. We have even seen that in my community. We have a small population of refugees and immigrants, but we have seen that happen.

What is fundamental in all of this—and I am sure that all of us on this side of the House are most concerned about it—is the use of time allocation in order to ram this legislation through. We have known for months and months and months that this legislation was necessary, that it had to come forward. Then, at the time when the democratic process provides a chance to have an input, this government brings in time allocation and gives in effect a day for debate or less than a day.

Under those circumstances we on this side cannot support quick passage. There may be some aspects that we are supportive of, some things that we want to see improved, but we cannot have this type of legislation rammed down the throats of Canadians and soon to be Canadians.

We on this side are going to oppose this legislation on some of the grounds that will become clear in committee but also on account of the high-handed manner in which this government has proceeded.

Mr. Cole: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There have been discussions on both sides of the House, and I would like to seek Your Honour's permission and unanimous consent of the House to revert to the tabling of committee reports.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. DeBlois): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

HOUSE MANAGEMENT

48TH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 48th report of the Standing Committee on House Management.

Pursuant to Standing Order 113(1), this report is deemed adopted upon presentation.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Valcourt that Bill C-86, an act to amend the Immigration Act and other acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee in the Departmental envelope; and the amendment of Mr. Allmand (p. 12472).

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to join what is for my constituency perhaps the most important debate this House has dealt with, that is the rules in this country concerning immigration.

This has been an issue that Canadians have gone back and forth with perhaps every decade since World War II, but it is time that we come to grips with this issue, to show the progressive side of this country and to put aside a lot of the concerns and hesitation we have shown in the past.

Unfortunately Bill C-86 amending the Immigration Act is in fact a step backward. This bill is extremely complex and deals with 128 sections and 113 pages. It was presented to the House only a week ago. The House has been asked to deal with it in a very speedy fashion, which those Canadians concerned about legislation find very hard to believe.

I would like to spend my very short time in this debate because of the curtailment of debate explaining to Canadians why a more progressive piece of legislation is needed.

All parliamentarians hear from Canadians their concerns about the job market, about the changing nature of Canada, and about somehow or other losing a sense of what we were in the past through immigration policy. Governments come to represent one way or the other the voice of the past or the voice of the future. It is time this government realizes that it must become the voice of the future, not the voice of the past.

Let me give an example of an area of policy with which this government has refused to deal and which is fundamental to understanding this country. Several weeks ago the government introduced changes in family reunification. Leaving aside the details for the purpose of this debate, they have made it very difficult to bring family members over. Bill C-86 has not in any way addressed the question of the limitations put on family reunification.

For many of the people watching and listening to the debate, questions of family reunification seem to be, in the old Canadian sense, a question of bringing over mothers, sisters, aunts, uncles, cousins and distant relatives simply to have people together in the same house, in the same neighbourhood. It is a social reason for many Canadians and that is all.

• (2110)

For Canadians wishing to retain in their mind a traditional notion of the country, this is offensive because they ask the question in times of high unemployment, in times of the deep recession, why we need so many people when we already have enough here in this country.

If we stop to think of it from a different point of view, if we stop and ask ourselves the basic question about the Canadian economy, we all know from various studies done in the late 1960s right through until the 1980s that the Canadian economy is facing a very difficult problem of foreign ownership.

If we leave aside the banking industry, almost every industrial sector in this country is owned by non-Canadians. We continue to be depleted by profits, by dividends and by industrial strategies outside our country.

We ask ourselves how in the next 30 or 40 years we build up the Canadian corporate structure. We must do it through some type of industrial base, manufacturing base and service industry in this country.

Then we ask who is going to come into this country to build up a base and use that base to expand and take on the country.

The answer in many cases is families working together. Families work together because they trust each other with cash. They trust each other's commitment. They trust each other's use of cash. They move from one generation to the other. It is no good trying to think that one generation is going to build up a company that is going to take on the whole world. In three or four generations they will be able to take on the world if they have enough family members working together. Canadians forget about that because many Canadians have not been involved with the building of a business.

We hear the international trade cliché. We hear the Minister for International Trade talk about competitiveness, getting out and facing the world. Let us stop and think about what the world is. Let us stop and think about our industrial growth rate being somewhere in the optimistic range of 1.5 per cent or 2 per cent per year to perhaps even a shrinkage. Then we can look at the Asian countries which are averaging 3 per cent, 4 per cent, 5 per cent and 7 per cent for the sake of argument. Sometimes it is higher than that. Over a 10-year period, 10 times 3 is 30 per cent growth; 10 times 7 compounded means a doubling of the size of the economy; and 10 times 1 per cent is probably a total growth over a decade of 12 per cent.

The growth we are looking for is over in Asia. To delve into Asian markets means we must have language skills, cultural skills and a knowledge of that particular business community.

I for one, as much as I want to encourage people, will never be an expert trader in Vietnam, Cambodia, Hong Kong, China, Japan, Indonesia or the Philippines, but I want some Canadians to be there. I want some Canadians to have a base for trading from Canada into those countries so that we understand their trading patterns and we understand how to use what they are doing to our benefit.

